debtor's ability to use the proceeds in the ordinary course of business, but this depends entirely on the security arrangement negotiated between the debtor and the secured party. Consider the following scenario:

> SP finances the acquisition of inventory by an automobile dealer (D), and is granted a security interest in the inventory. The wholesale security agreement provides that D may sell the inventory in the ordinary course of business and that upon doing so D must immediately remit the wholesale purchase price of the automobile to SP.

In this scenario, SP clearly does not permit the debtor to use the proceeds of inventory to pay its employees. Indeed, it is common for SP to regularly monitor the debtor to ensure that the debtor is not "out of trust" by failing to remit the proceeds of sale.

75 In summary, the true test of whether the licence to sell inventory includes the right to pay wages must therefore be a matter of interpreting the contractual arrangement between the parties. The focus is not so much on the circumstances of the selling of inventory, but rather the permitted usage of the proceeds of inventory. As in Professor Wood's example, where the licence has a limited scope, that licence may not include the right to use proceeds to pay wages. However, the expression of a limited use for proceeds of inventory cannot prevail if the arrangement between the parties is such as to allow, in practice, the debtor to use the inventory proceeds in the course of its business. In this respect, I agree with Professor Wood's comments regarding the appropriate test for determining whether a licence to sell inventory includes permission to pay wages with the proceeds ("Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp.", supra, at pp. 435-36):

> This is not to say that the analysis should hinge on the existence of a trust proceeds clause or other contractual provision requiring the debtor to remit proceeds. A contractual provision of this type should not govern if the real arrangement between the parties is such that the debtor has the freedom to use the proceeds of inventory in the ordinary course of business.
> To make any sense at all, the licence theory must, at the very least, be restricted to cases where the secured party permits the debtor to pay employees either out of its collateral or out of the proceeds of its collateral. This permission cannot be derived merely from the existence of a licence to sell inventory. The test should be whether the debtor had the freedom to use these funds in the ordinary course of business as opposed to being under an obligation to remit them to the secured party. [Emphasis added.]

76 In the case at bar, the GSA contained an express licence permitting Sparrow to sell inventory in the course of its business and use the proceeds available; the BAS contained an implied licence to this effect. While it is true that the GSA contained a trust proceeds clause, I find that this cannot have the effect of limiting the scope of the licence where the real arrangement between the parties was, as expressly stated, that Sparrow could use the proceeds of inventory in the course of its business. The bank in this case was not a small inventory financier who required Sparrow to immediately remit proceeds of inventory to it. To the contrary, the bank was a large scale lender who permitted Sparrow to use inventory sales to maintain the viability of its enterprise. For these reasons, applying Professor Wood's test, I find that under the licence to "sell ... inventory" "in the ordinary course of ... business" and "use [the] [m]oneys available" the bank permitted Sparrow to sell inventory to pay wages and, necessarily, payroll deduction obligations.

77 For all these reasons, through the application of the licence theory, it is my conclusion that the appellant's s. 227(5) deemed trust must take priority over the bank's security interests in the disputed collateral. The trust fund representing the deducted amounts, while without identified subject matter from the date of its inception, is capable of identifying property subject to that trust ex post facto. To reiterate, the bank consented to the reduction in its security in inventory in order to pay wage deductions at the time those deductions were made, and s. 227(5) ITA has the effect of carrying forward that consent to the time of receivership. By consenting to the payment of wages out of the proceeds of inventory during the course of Sparrow's business, the bank ipso facto consented to the statutory scheme under the ITA designed to cover unpaid wage deductions. In short, in the present case the licence to deal with inventory proceeds coupled with the statutory scheme in s. 227(4) and (5) ITA gives priority to Her Majesty's claims for statutory wage deductions. This result is obtained both in regard to the bank's GSA, and its BAS.

78 The respondent bank has submitted that this result is necessarily precluded with regard to their BAS by virtue of s. 428(1) of the Bank Act, which provides as follows:

Digitized by Google

> 428. (1) All the rights and powers of a bank in respect of the property mentioned in or covered by a warehouse receipt or bill of lading acquired and held by the bank, and the rights and powers of the bank in respect of the property covered by a security given to the bank under section 427 that are the same as if the bank had acquired a warehouse receipt or bill of lading in which that property was described, have, subject to subsection 427(4) and subsections (3) to (6) of this section, priority over all rights subsequently acquired in, on or in respect of that property, and also over the claim of any unpaid vendor. [Emphasis added.]

I cannot agree with this submission. It is true that s. 428(1) secures the respondent bank's proprietary right to the disputed collateral. However, for the reasons I have expressed, the fact remains that the bank has consented to the divestment of this interest. Such a waiver of priority, in my view, renders s. 428(1) of no assistance to the respondent bank.

79 I add as a final matter that in addition to providing certainty in disputes between consensual and non-consensual security interests, the licence theory has the virtue of achieving fairness in commercial law. Here, the respondent bank had permitted Sparrow to sell its inventory in the course of its business in order to, among other things, pay wages and wage deductions. To this extent, therefore, the bank permitted the reduction in the value of its security interest in Sparrow's inventory, during the ordinary course of Sparrow's business. Implicit in the bank's consent is the assumption that in so doing, Sparrow would generate profits from the conversion of inventory into revenues; this economic process, as I noted above, ensures that interest payments owing to the bank would be paid to them on a sustainable basis. In short, the bank benefitted in a general sense from Sparrow's carrying on its business operations, an endeavour which required Sparrow to pay wages and wage deductions. More specifically, however, when Sparrow stopped paying its wage deductions, as required, the bank could be said to benefit from the artificial increase in Sparrow's working capital, allowing an extension of the life of Sparrow's business.

80 Now, when Sparrow's business is no longer a viable enterprise, the bank says that it is entitled to the very payments which allowed Sparrow, in part at least, to stay in business longer than was legally economical. In essence, the bank is willing to accept the benefits of Sparrow's non-payment of statutory deductions, and can be said to have reasonably permitted the use of its collateral to pay these deductions at the time they should have lawfully been paid, but refuses to accept the burden of Sparrow's unlawful action at the time of its receivership. In my view, it should be the policy of the law that the respondent bank be held accountable for Sparrow's outstanding statutory obligations. The licence theory, as I have developed it, ensures that in appropriate circumstances this result will obtain. In this way, in my opinion the licence theory is grounded not only in legal principles, but also in sound policy.

81 Since writing the foregoing, I have had the benefit of reading the careful reasons of my colleague, Mr. Justice Iacobucci. With deference however, I do not share his views or his concerns.

82 I note that Iacobucci J., in his reasons, has taken me to have adopted the licence theory in extremely broad terms. Specifically, when summarizing the conceptual basis of my reasoning, he states at para. 91:

> Consequently, says the [licence] theory, the bank's claim to the inventory must give way to any debts incurred in the ordinary course of business. [Emphasis added.]

Similarly, Iacobucci J. writes at para. 97:

> The satisfaction of any legitimate debt or obligation, whenever incurred, is arguably "in the ordinary course of business". Certainly, the payment of creditors is a permissible "use" of the proceeds of a sale of inventory. Following my colleague's reasoning, this would mean that every subsequent claim should prevail over the respondent's general security agreement, because every rival claim might have been satisfied out of the proceeds of a hypothetical sale of the inventory. [Emphasis added.]

83 With respect, as he acknowledges, my reasons do not go this far. It is not the consent to payment of wage deductions from the proceeds of inventory simpliciter which drives me to the conclusion that Her Majesty's interest must prevail. This is a necessary, but not sufficient, condition. In addition, however, what is significant to the outcome of this case is that the bank has consented to payment of wages including deductions, out of inventory which, at the time of the deductions, are by statute deemed to be taken out of the estate of the debtor (see ss. 153(3) and 227(4) ITA). Section 227(5) carries that consent forward to the time of liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, to realize Her Majesty's claim out of the bank's inventory.

84 Therefore, the unique nature of the statutory provisions applicable to wage deductions, and the bank's consent thereto, are integral to the success of the s. 227(5) claim in the case at bar. In this way, the licence theory, as I have employed it, is circumscribed.

85 It must be stressed that the issue relates to wages actually paid to employees -- not a simple obligation to pay wages -- a portion of which has been deducted from the amount remitted to the employee and must be remitted to Her Majesty. Pending such remittance, the amount deducted is deemed under s. 227(4) to be held in trust for Her Majesty. By virtue of these ITA provisions, and unlike ordinary debts and obligations, unpaid wage deductions are, in law, performed obligations. The consent by the bank to the payment of wages out of the proceeds of the sale of inventory must be taken to cover the wages paid according to law including that portion which has been deducted from the remittance to the employee, pursuant to the ITA, in order that it be remitted to Her Majesty. While the value of the bank's security in the inventory may be thereby reduced, this is by virtue of specific statutory requirements under well-defined rules limited in their application to actual payment of wages. These requirements are well known and are encompassed by the bank's consent to the payment of wages in the ordinary course of business and do not open the door to uncertainty as to the value of security. Any risk to the bank's security is part of the very risk involved in consenting to the payment of wages. This does not open the door to any uncertainty as to the value of the bank's security arising from unperformed obligations incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business.

86 For these reasons, I cannot agree with the premise underlying Iacobucci J.'s reasons, namely, that the licence theory as I have employed it is inimical to the integrity of commercial law. It does not have the extensive application suggested by my colleague; it does not create uncertainty in commercial transactions. Instead, the licence theory operates narrowly, in conjunction with unique statutory provisions, so as to actualize legally performed obligations when they, in fact, exist.

VI - Conclusion

87 It is possible to summarize my conclusions in this case into the following five propositions:

1. Priorities between statutory trusts and consensual security interests are resolved by determining which interest has an attached interest in the disputed collateral at the time the statutory trust becomes operative.

2. The s. 227(5) ITA deemed trust attaches to any property of the debtor which exists upon liquidation, assignment, bankruptcy or receivership.

3. For example, if deductions are made prior to the attachment of a fixed charge over collateral, the s. 227(5) deemed trust will engage to retroactively attach Her Majesty's beneficial interest to that collateral. The fixed charge over that collateral will thereafter be subject to Her Majesty's pre-existing claims for unremitted payroll deductions.

4. Otherwise, if a security interest is in the nature of a fixed and specific charge, that interest gives the holder legal title to the collateral, such that a subsequent competing statutory trust will not be able to attach its interest. In such a case, all the statutory trust can attach to is the equity of redemption in the collateral.

5. However, as an exception to propositions 2 and 4, where the holder of a fixed security interest permits the debtor to sell the collateral, this may provide an opportunity for the statutory trust to attach. Whether this actually occurs depends entirely on the facts of each case. The test is whether, at the time the deductions occurred, the debtor had the right to sell the collateral and use the proceeds to pay the obligation to which the statutory trust is related.

88 I have found that, on the facts of this case, the licence invoked to sell inventory included the permission to use its proceeds to pay wages or wage deductions. The test in proposition 5 has therefore been made out. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal with costs.

The judgment of Sopinka, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ. was delivered by 89 IACOBUCCI J. -- I have read the lucid reasons of my colleague, Justice Gonthier, and although I agree with much of his reasoning, I cannot, with respect, accept the conclusion that he reaches. In particular, I do not accept that the deemed trust that arises in favour of the Crown by operation of s. 227(4) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (hereinafter "ITA"), takes priority over the security interests that the respondent has under the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c. 46, and the Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05 (hereinafter "PPSA"). Even conceding that the latter interests are subject to a licence to sell, the licence is not nearly so broad as to encompass the satisfaction of income tax obligations. As I will discuss below, a licence to sell inventory authorizes at most only the satisfaction of obligations that are immediately incidental to an actual sale of the inventory.

90 Because my only disagreement with my colleague is in his application of the licence-to-sell approach to this case, I do not propose to discuss the facts or background that he has so ably described or to dwell on any other part of his reasons. I need not say anything more about the character of the respondent's security interests than that they are fixed and specific.

91 My colleague disposes of this appeal on the basis of the so-called "licence theory". Briefly, the licence theory holds that a bank's security interest in a debtor's inventory, though it be fixed and specific, is subject nevertheless to a licence in the debtor to deal with that inventory in the ordinary course of business. Consequently, says the theory, the bank's claim to the inventory must give way to any debts incurred in the ordinary course of business. The leading articulation of the licence theory appears in McLachlin J.A.'s (as she then was) reasons in R. in Right of B.C. v. F.B.D.B., 1987 CanLII 156 (BC CA), [1988] 1 W.W.R. 1 (B.C.C.A.) (hereinafter "FBDB"), at p. 40.

92 The theoretical basis of the licence theory seems to be that a creditor who has granted a licence to sell inventory has thereby consented to the subjection of his security interest to other obligations that may arise "in the ordinary course of business". My colleague says this in his reasons, at para. 68:

> In short, where the bank has consented to the reduction in the value of its security in order to pay statutory deductions at the time those deductions are made, they have to the same extent, by virtue of s. 227(5) [ITA], consented to the reduction in their security at the time of receivership.

This is sensible, because it is only if the licence is understood as a kind of tacit lessening of the creditor's security interest that the appellant's cause is advanced. Certainly the actual operation of the licence is not relevant, because in this case the inventory in question was never actually sold pursuant to the licence. Rather, the receiver sold it by court order. If the licence is to have anything to do with the disposition of this appeal, it must be by virtue of the evidence it affords of the respondent's intention to take less than an entire security interest in the inventory.

93 In my view, the licence affords no such evidence. My colleague seems to think that the potential sale of the inventory amounts to an actual limitation of the security interest. For my part, I do not see what the one thing has to do with the other. There is a great difference between saying, on the one hand, that if a debtor sells inventory and applies the proceeds to a debt to a third party, then the third party takes the proceeds free of any security interest and saying, on the other hand, that because a third party could take the proceeds free of any security interest, no security interest exists in the proceeds as against that third party. A licence to sell inventory in the ordinary course of business is a condition of the former kind. The consequent (defeasance of the security interest) follows only if the antecedent (sale of the inventory and application of proceeds to an obligation to a third party) is satisfied. In other words, the security interest in the inventory disappears only if the debtor actually sells the inventory and applies the proceeds to a debt to a third party.

94 That this is so is suggested by s. 28(1) PPSA, which provides:

> 28(1) Subject to this Act, where collateral is dealt with or otherwise gives rise to proceeds, the security interest
> (a) continues in the collateral, unless the secured party expressly or impliedly authorized the dealing, and
> (b) extends to the proceeds,
> but where the secured party enforces a security interest against both the collateral and the proceeds, the amount secured by the security interest in the collateral and the proceeds is limited to the market value of the collateral at the date of the dealing.

In accordance with this provision, the result of a sale of inventory is to give the purchaser an unencumbered interest in the inventory and the licensor a continuing security interest in the proceeds of the sale. It is only if the debtor subsequently uses the proceeds to satisfy an obligation to a third party that the proceeds will be removed from the scope of the licensor's security interest in them. Accordingly, what a security agreement with a licence to sell creates is a defeasible interest; but the event of defeasance is the actual sale of the inventory and the actual application of the proceeds against an obligation to a third party.

95 I recognize that the operation of s. 28(1) PPSA is not necessarily inconsistent with the broad interpretation of the licence to sell that my colleague advances. However, it seems to me that this is an appropriate case for the invocation of the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The statute prescribes certain consequences for the security interest that follow a dealing with inventory. In particular, the statute contemplates defeasance of the interest if the debtor actually sells the inventory and applies the proceeds to an obligation to a third party. Significantly, the statute does not contemplate a defeasance on the happening of any other event. In my view, the statute occupies the field and crowds out other possible interpretations of the licence, including the one that Gonthier J. favours.

96 Because in this case there was no actual sale of the inventory in question, let alone any disposition of the proceeds, the licence can have had no effect on the respondent's security interest. What the debtor might have done with the licence does not matter.

Digitized by Google

97 If it were otherwise, the licence to sell inventory would entirely eviscercate the respondent's general security agreement. The satisfaction of any legitimate debt or obligation, whenever incurred, is arguably "in the ordinary course of business". Certainly the payment of creditors is a permissible "use" of the proceeds of a sale of inventory. Following my colleague's reasoning, this would mean that every subsequent claim should prevail over the respondent's general security agreement, because every rival claim might have been satisfied out of the proceeds of a hypothetical sale of the inventory. Moreover, the priority rules of the PPSA, whose general policy is to assign priority to the earliest registered security interest, would be turned on their head. Presuming that every charge against inventory is subject to a licence to sell -- a presumption that accords with the interest of creditors in ensuring the debtor's continued vitality -- the last security interest would take priority over all earlier ones, because only the last interest would not be subject to some charge arising in the ordinary course of business. In answer to this objection, it might be said that as between two PPSA securities, the rules in the Act should be applied to determine priority. However, such an answer would not be consistent with the licence theory, which supposes that the original security interest in the inventory ends where obligations incurred in the ordinary course of business begin. The subsequent interest would prevail because the earlier interest would disappear before it.

98 It is open to my colleague to distinguish the fact situation in this appeal from the hypothetical priority contests I have mentioned on the ground that the Crown's interest in the inventory is unlike other charges against inventory in that it depends on the fictional device of deeming. What makes this case different, it might be said, is that the ITA deems to have been done what could have been done. On this understanding, it does not matter that the inventory was not actually sold and the proceeds were not actually remitted to the Receiver General, because s. 227(4) and (5) ITA deem these things to have been done. But in my view, this answer cannot succeed because the inventory was not an unencumbered asset at the moment the taxes came due. It was subject to the respondent's security interest and therefore was legally the respondent's and not attachable by the deemed trust. As Gonthier J. himself says (at para. 39):

> . . . [s. 227(4)] does not permit Her Majesty to attach Her beneficial interest to property which, at the time of liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, in law belongs to a party other than the tax debtor.

99 The deeming is thus not a mechanism for undoing an existing security interest, but rather a device for going back in time and seeking out an asset that was not, at the moment the income taxes came due, subject to any competing security interest. In short, the deemed trust provision cannot be effective unless it is first determined that there is some unencumbered asset out of which the trust may be deemed. The deeming follows the answering of the chattel security question; it does not determine the answer.

100 Indeed, Gonthier J. does seize on the peculiar nature of the deemed trust as a possible ground for distinguishing the Crown's interest from rival interests. However, his argument differs from the one I have outlined to the extent that it emphasizes the deemed performance of the obligation to the Crown. It appears to be my colleague's position that the licence to sell represents a reduction in the value of the security interest only with respect to performed obligations but not with respect to unperformed ones. In his view, this represents a sufficient check on the licence theory. I agree that, if the distinction between performed and unperformed obligations were maintainable, then the likelihood of the licence consuming the security interest would be greatly reduced. However, in my view, the distinction cannot be maintained. As Gonthier J. says more than once in his reasons, the licence theory rests on the consent of the parties. But the parties to this case consented to the sale of inventory "in the ordinary course of Debtor's business". The language is unqualified. No distinction is drawn between performed and unperformed obligations. The only performance that is contemplated in the licence is the actual sale of the inventory and the application of the proceeds to a debt. And, as I have already argued, the deeming mechanism does not furnish the needed actual sale. Accordingly, I conclude that if the words of the licence are to be given their due as an indicium of the parties' intent, then there can be no distinction between performed and unperformed obligations.

101 My colleague places great emphasis on the fact that the debtor covenanted, in the general security agreement, "to pay all taxes, rates, levies, assessments and other charges of every nature which may be lawfully levied, assessed or imposed against or in respect of Debtor or Collateral as and when the same become due and payable". But this covenant is not part of the licence. And in any event, it is merely a covenant to obey the law. It adds nothing to s. 153(1) ITA. Furthermore, it does not prescribe the outcome of a priority contest. What is more, the covenant to pay taxes is only one of several in the agreement. Another covenant provides that the debtor shall "carry on and conduct the business of Debtor in a proper and efficient manner". Presumably the debtor might incur subsequent debts in the course of carrying on and conducting its business. Gonthier J. advances no principle that might permit the settlement of priority disputes as between the Crown and subsequent lenders. In the event of a dispute, both would have the benefit of the licence to sell inventory and of express covenants, so that some other criterion would have to be found to determine which takes priority. Here, as before, the prospect of a reversal of the ordinary priority rules is immediate and troubling.

102 My colleague also relies on comments made in FBDB. In that case, the British Columbia Court of Appeal said, after having disposed of the appeal on another ground, that a licence to sell inventory carries with it a requirement that the licencee should satisfy obligations incurred in "dealing with the stock in the ordinary course of business": FBDB, supra, at p. 40. Because the obligation to set aside provincial sales taxes is a "legal incident" of the sale of inventory, a lien for unpaid sales taxes comes within the scope of the licence and so is excepted from any security interest that is subject to it: idem.

103 As I understand the comments in FBDB, a licence to sell inventory permits the satisfaction of obligations out of the proceeds only to the extent of the "legal incidents" of the sale. In itself, this greatly limits the scope of the theory. Because the payment of wages, except perhaps to the sales agent, is not a "legal incident" of the sale of inventory, deduction of income taxes from wages does not come within the scope of the licence. This alone would appear sufficient to distinguish FBDB from the instant appeal.

104 However, I think that on closer examination it turns out that FBDB does not even depend on a licence theory, or at least does not depend on a licence theory of the kind advanced by my colleague. I say this because his reasons posit a charge that arises against the value of the inventory as a result of the operation of the licence. But the sales taxes that were at issue in FBDB were not against the value of the inventory. Rather, they were superadded to the underlying value, which is to say that they were calculated on the basis of the sale price of the inventory. Thus, the sales taxes that attend a sale of inventory represent something over and above the value of the inventory. Because a bank's charge is against the inventory, it does not extend so far as the sales taxes generated by a sale of inventory. But income taxes are not like sales taxes in that they are not as directly related to sales of inventory as sales taxes are. To the extent that income taxes have anything to do with the proceeds of a sale of inventory, they are payable out of the monies received for the value of the inventory. A bank's charge against the inventory is therefore adequate to defeat subsequent claims for the payment of income taxes. For this reason, McLachlin J.'s reasoning in FBDB is not contrary to what I am advancing herein.

105 I should also mention that in 1988, when the FBDB case was decided, British Columbia's Personal Property Security Act, S.B.C. 1989, c. 36, was not in force. As a consequence, the British Columbia Court of Appeal did not have to contend with the legislative considerations that we face in this appeal. In particular, there was at the time no equivalent in British Columbia law to s. 28(1) of Alberta's PPSA. The Court of Appeal therefore had greater latitude than we have to interpret a licence to sell as a tacit consent to a reduction of the security interest in the inventory. It seems to me that as a result of the enactment of the PPSA, something more than an unadorned licence to sell is needed to justify the conclusion that a creditor intended to abridge considerably its security interest in inventory.

106 And so I conclude that the licence to sell inventory is not an exception to the respondent's fixed and specific charge against the debtor's inventory. To hold otherwise would be to eviscerate the respondent's security interest. This is not to say, however, that Parliament could not legislate otherwise. Parliament has shown that it knows how to assert priority over rival security interests. See Alberta (Treasury Branches) v. M.N.R.; Toronto-Dominion Bank v. M.N.R., 1996 CanLII 244 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 963, at p. 975. All that is needed to overtake a fixed and specific charge is clear language to that effect.

107 Though I consider the above legal arguments sufficient to dispose of this appeal, I observe that policy considerations also tell in favour of the conclusion I have reached.

108 In this respect, the first thing to notice is that the security agreement that the debtor and the respondent had in this case is an example of a very common and important financing device. To a considerable extent, commerce in our country depends on the vitality of such agreements. As several leading academics have observed, the amounts at stake run into the billions of dollars each year. And though not every creditor seeks security, the incentives to do so are powerful. See Jacob S. Ziegel, Benjamin Geva and R. C. C. Cuming, Commercial and Consumer Transactions (Rev. 2nd ed. 1990), at pp. 957-60. Accordingly, tinkering with security interests is a dangerous business. The risks of judicial innovation in this neighbourhood of the law are considerable.

109 Chief among these is the risk that attends legal uncertainty. If the legal rule is not clear, then inventory financiers will have to provide against the risk that their security interest might be defeated by some rival claim. The danger is particularly acute where as here, the language is as broad as "in the ordinary course of business". In this regard, I agree with what Professor Roderick J. Wood said in his article ("Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp." (1995), 10 B.F.L.R. 429, at p. 429) that my colleague cites:

> . . . there is little controversy with the proposition that a priority rule should be capable of producing reasonably predictable results. An unclear priority rule imposes a number of social costs. It means that creditors must plan their affairs against less certain outcomes. Uncertain rules generate more litigation than clear rules. Over time an uncertain rule is sometimes transformed into a clear rule through the process of judicial interpretation. However, this is a piecemeal approach which often occurs at a glacial pace.

110 Indeed, the consequences of my colleague's approach might be more dire than even Professor Wood supposes. For, as I have observed, almost any subsequent financial arrangement might be in the ordinary course of business. Accordingly, the possibility is real that my colleague's proposed rule would effectively obliterate the PPSA charge against inventory. As insurance against this outcome, the costs of financing would presumably increase. I agree that if Parliament mandated this outcome, the courts must perforce accept it. However, judges should not rush to embrace such a weighty consequence unless the statutory language requiring them to do so is unequivocal.

111 Moreover, and for reasons I have already given, there is every likelihood that a broad interpretation of the licence theory would do violence to the PPSA. The Act clearly contemplates that inventory financing will be an important commercial device. But allowing the mere potential operation of a licence to sell to defeat a security interest in inventory would deprive the interest of all efficacy. It would not be any sort of security against subsequent obligations.

112 Finally, I wish to emphasize that it is open to Parliament to step in and assign absolute priority to the deemed trust. A clear illustration of how this might be done is afforded by s. 224(1.2) ITA, which vests certain moneys in the Crown "notwithstanding any security interest in those moneys" and provides that they "shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to any such security interest". All that is needed to effect the desired result is clear language of that kind. In the absence of such clear language, judicial innovation is undesirable, both because the issue is policy charged and because a legislative mandate is apt to be clearer than a rule whose precise bounds will become fixed only as a result of expensive and lengthy litigation.

113 It remains to make a few remarks by way of conclusion. Because I believe that the respondent's general security agreement gave it a fixed and specific charge against the debtor's inventory, and because I conclude that the licence to sell that inventory does not derogate from the respondent's security interest, I conclude that this appeal should be dismissed. I do not need to decide whether the Bank Act security would have priority over the deemed trust as well; though given that the licence to sell inventory under the Bank Act security is only implied, I do not see how the Crown could have a greater claim under the Bank Act than it has under the PPSA.

114 Therefore I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

JUDGMENT PRONOUNCED February 21, 1989
VANCISE J.A.

There are two principal issues raised on this appeal. The first is whether s. 20(1)(d) of The Personal Property Security Act, S.S. 1979-80, c. P-6.1, which subordinates the interest of an unperfected lessor to the interests of a trustee in bankruptcy, is legislation in relation to "property and civil rights" and therefore within the constitutional authority of the Province.

The second issue, if the section is found to be constitutional, is whether it is rendered inoperative by reason of an operational conflict with s. 107 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3.

a) Facts

On July 26, 1984, the respondent Paccar Financial Services Ltd. leased four Kenworth trucks to Sinco Trucking Ltd. It is common ground that the lease was a "pure lease" under which the lessee obtained no interest in the trucks.

On November 1, 1985, Sinco entered into a bill of sale with Carrier, purporting to sell him one of the trucks for $90,500, which was to be paid in full by December 31, 1985. On June 1, 1986, Sinco purported to sell Brian Greyeyes another of the trucks for $80,000, which was to be paid in full by June 30, 1986.

Both Carrier and Greyeyes had leased the trucks from Sinco prior to purchasing them and claimed the trucks as purchasers for value without notice of Paccar's interest.

On September 15, 1986, Sinco made an assignment in bankruptcy which resulted in the appointment of Touche Ross as trustee. The trustee immediately took possession of three of the trucks and made an arrangement with Greyeyes for the truck which was in his possession.

Carrier filed a claim for the truck he purported to purchase from Sinco pursuant to s. 56 of the Bankruptcy Act. On October 6, 1986, Paccar filed a proof of claim with the trustee, claiming to be the owner of the four trucks and seeking possession.

Digitized by Google

Greyeyes did not file a claim, but the trustee has acknowledged that this claim is the same as Carrier's and will be dealt with on the same basis.

On October 20, 1986, the trustee served notice on Paccar that it disputed Paccar's right to ownership and possession in the following terms:

> Each of the vehicles referenced aforementioned was leased from Paccar Financial Services Ltd. by Sinco Trucking Ltd. by way of a Lease for a Term more than One Year as such term is defined in The Personal Property Security Act in and for the Province of Saskatchewan (hereinafter referred to as the "Act"). As Paccar Financial Services Ltd. had not perfected its security interest in the four vehicles in question prior to the date of the bankruptcy of Sinco Trucking Ltd., the interest of Paccar Financial Services Ltd. would be subordinate to the interest of the Trustee in accordance with Section 20(1) of the Act. The Leases of the four vehicles in question are Leases to which the terms and provisions of the Act apply.

On October 27, 1986, Paccar commenced proceedings pursuant to s. 59(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, seeking a declaration that it was the owner of and entitled to possession of the four trucks.

Paccar also gave notice pursuant to The Constitutional Questions Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. C-29, that it intended to argue that s. 20(1)(d) of The Personal Property Security Act was unconstitutional. Those grounds are set out as follows:

> 1. Those sections of The Personal Property Security Act that subordinate the interests of an unperfected lessor to the interests of the Trustee in Bankruptcy are ultra vires the provincial legislature since such legislation is in pith and substance directed toward matters of "Insolvency and Bankruptcy" and not toward "Property and Civil Rights in the Province"; or
> 2. Those sections of The Personal Property Security Act that subordinate the interests of an unperfected lessor to the interests of a Trustee in Bankruptcy, while being within the legislative competence of the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan, are in conflict with valid legislation of Parliament relating to insolvency and bankruptcy, namely, the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, Ch. B-3, and therefore, by virtue of the doctrine of federal paramountcy the federal legislation prevails.

Paccar also questioned the applicability of The Personal Property Security Act to its lease of the four Kenworth trucks in the following terms:

> The applicant is not regularly engaged in the business of leasing goods as defined in s. 2(y)(iv) of The Personal Property Security Act and, therefore, need not register its interest in the Personal Property Registry.

The relevant provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are ss. 47 and 107(1).

b) Constitutionality of section 20(1)(d)

Section 20(1) reads as follows:

> 20(1) An unperfected security interest is subordinate to the interest of:
> (a) a person who has a perfected security interest or who is otherwise entitled to priority under this Act;
> (b) a person who causes the collateral to be seized under legal process, including execution, attachment or garnishment, or that obtains a charging order or equitable execution affecting the collateral;
> (c) a sheriff who has seized or has obtained a right to the collateral under The Creditors' Relief Act; .
> (d) a representative of creditors, but only for the purposes of enforcing the rights of persons mentioned in clause (b), and a trustee in bankruptcy;
> (e) a transferee who is not a secured party and who acquires his interest for value without notice of the security interest and before it is perfected;
> (i) in documents of title, securities, instruments or goods, where the transferee receives delivery of the collateral;
> (ii) in intangibles other than accounts;
> (iii) in accounts acquired through a transaction not otherwise governed by this Act;
> (iv) in chattel paper acquired through a transaction not otherwise governed by this Act, where the transferee receives > possession of the chattel paper.

When construing an impugned provincial statute, one must by virtue of the presumption of constitutionality, presume the legislature is acting within the sphere of its competence rather than without. See Deloitte, Haskins & Sells v. Workers' Compensation Board, 19 D.L.R. 457 at 593; Scowby v. Glendenning et al., 1986 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 226 at 233.

The proper approach to determine the issue here was outlined by Cartwright J. in The Validity of the Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alberta), 1960 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1960] S.C.R. 571 at 590 as follows:

> ... I think I am right in saying that in every decision of the Judicial Committee or of this Court in which provincial legislation, impugned on the ground that it affected the rights and obligations of an insolvent entity and its creditors > and thereby trenched on the subject matter comprised in head 21 of s. 91, has been upheld it appears that in the view of the Court two conditions were found to exist; (i) that the impugned legislation was not in truth and substance primarily in relation to Bankruptcy and Insolvency but rather in relation to one or more of the matters enumerated in s. 92; and (ii) that in so far as it affected the rights and obligations of an insolvent and its creditors it did not conflict with existing valid legislation of Parliament enacted in exercise of the power contained in head 21 of s. 91.

One must first determine whether s. 20(1)(d) of the Act is within the competence of the provincial legislature. To determine the dominant substance of this impugned section, one must first identify or characterize the subject matter. Hogg, in his text Constitutional Law of Canada (2nd ed. 1985), states at p. 318:

> The process of characterization is not a technical, formalistic exercise, confined to the strict legal operation of the impugned law....The Court will look beyond the direct legal effects to inquire into the social or economic purposes which the statute was enacted to achieve.

At this stage of the inquiry the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are not relevant. If the section is in truth and substance legislation in relation to one or more of the enumerated heads in s. 92 and therefore constitutional it will, at that point, be necessary to determine whether s. 20(1)(d) is rendered' inoperative by reason of an. operational conflict with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. This two-stage approach was adopted by Dickson J. in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon et al., 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161 at 168:

> As Professor Hogg has pointed out in his work Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), at p. 102, the doctrine of paramountcy applies where there is a federal law and a provincial law which are (1) each valid and (2) inconsistent, adding that "the issue does not arise unless each law has first been held to be valid as an independent enactment. In determining the validity of each law, the existence and terms of the other law are irrelevant".

The Parliament of Canada has by head 21 of s. 91 the exclusive legislative authority in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. The primary purpose of the Bankruptcy Act is to protect the creditors of persons who are insolvent and to ensure that the assets of the bankrupt will be distributed in an orderly manner. See Langille et al. v. Toronto-Dominion Bank (1981), 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 35 (N.S.S.C. A.D.), affirmed, 1982 CanLII 154 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 34. The constitutionality of the Bankruptcy Act, and in particular ss. 47 and 107, is conceded by the Crown.

Head 13 of s. 92 gives the provincial legislature the power to legislate in relation to "Property and Civil Rights" in the Province. A part of that power encompasses the right to regulate the property and civil rights of debtors and creditors in the province and to establish a system of priorities. It was in furtherance of that power that the Province enacted The Personal Property Security Act. The object of that Act was recently commented on by this Court in Re Bell's Dairy Limited; International Harvester Corporation v. Touche Ross Limited, 1986 CanLII 158 (SK CA), [1986] 6 W.W.R. 161, where Cameron J.A. speaking for the Court, stated at pp. 168-9:

> The object of this Act is to modernize and consolidate the law of personal property as security for debts. The scope of the statute includes all transactions, regardless of their form and irrespective of the intention Of the parties, that either create or are deemed to create a security interest in personal property and fixtures. For the first time, both consignments of goods and true leases of goods are treated by the law as though the parties had intended the property to serve as security for the amounts owing by the consignee or lessee as the case may be. This is a singularly important departure from the law as it existed before this Act came into being.

That case involved a lessor of a vehicle who had failed to protect its security interest in the vehicle by registration. The lessor's security interest was subordinated to that of the trustee by virtue of s. 20(1)(d). The effect of that was to give to the trustee more rights than those possessed by the bankrupt. That is not a novel concept. The trustee in bankruptcy not only has the responsibility to gather in the assets of the bankrupt but also the responsibility to represent the creditors. Gilmore, Security , Interest in Personal Property (1965), Vol. II at p. 1286, describes the function of a trustee in bankruptcy as follows:

> Common law and statutory assignees for the benefit of creditors had always been thought of as standing in the debtor-assignor's shoes: claims which were good against the assignor were good against the assignee. From the beginning, the federal bankruptcy trustee had greater powers. In carrying out his function of assembling the bankrupt's assets and selling them, he was given a double capacity. In one capacity he acquired whatever property rights the bankrupt had before the institution of the proceeding. In his other capacity he acquired, or inherited, whatever rights the bankrupt's creditors had. Thus a claimed interest in the bankrupt's property was not necessarily good against the trustee simply because, under applicable state law, the claimant could have recovered the property from the bankrupt. To be good against the trustee the claim had to be effective not only against the bankrupt but against his other creditors. In his role as champion of the unsecured creditors, it was not only the trustee's right but his duty to seek to invalidate as many property claims as he could, since each defeated claim brought more assets into the estate and increased the fund for distribution. [Footnotes omitted.]

Prior to the enactment of the Act, a trustee in bankruptcy could have obtained a higher interest than that of the bankrupt by reason that certain provincial statutes empowered unsecured creditors to defeat the claim of the holder of an unregistered security interest, despite the fact that the bankrupt could not assert that right. Both The Conditional Sales Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. C-25 and The Bills of Sale Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. B-1, provided that the interests of an unregistered security interest were void as against a creditor, which would include the creditor's representative.

What then is the overriding purpose of the Act? Is it to establish a modern personal property regime which establishes priority security interests, or is it an attempt to establish legislation in relation to bankruptcy by establishing a scheme of priorities whereby the estate of the bankrupt is to be administered for the orderly payment of debts? In my opinion it is clearly the former. The purpose of Act is to regulate the property interests of debtors and creditors within the province by the establishment of a system of priorities based upon the perfection of security interests by the method set out in the Act.

A lease for more than one year is defined in s. 2(y) of the Act as follows:

> 2. In this Act:
> (y) "lease for a term of more than one year" includes:
> (i) a lease for an indefinite term even though the lease is determinable by one or both parties within one year of its execution;
> (ii) a lease for a term of one year or less that is automatically renewable or that is renewable at the option of one of the parties or by agreement for one or more terms, the total of which may exceed one year;
> (iii) a lease initially for less than one year, where the lessee retains uninterrupted or substantially uninterrupted possession of the goods leased for a period in excess of one year after the day he first acquired possession of the goods, and the lease is deemed to be a lease for more than one year as soon as the lessee's possession extends beyond one year;
> but does not include:
> (iv) a lease transaction involving a lessor who is not regularly engaged in the business of leasing goods;
> (v) a lease of any prescribed goods, regardless of the length of the term of the lease; ...

An unperfected security interest, such as a lessor of a true lease for more than one year, is by s. 20 of Act, subordinated to the interests set out in sections "a" to "e". The purpose and function of the registration scheme is to protect third parties who acquire an interest in the goods from the person in possession of them. The security interest of a person who parts with possession of the goods and fails to perfect his security interest by registration is subordinated to the interests described. The fact that one of the persons in favour of whom the security interest is subordinated is the trustee in bankruptcy does not alter the fundamental nature of the transaction. The trustee in bankruptcy, as noted, is asserting the claim of the unsecured creditors. to the goods and possessiohs of the bankrupt pursuant to the priorities established for competing perfected and unperfected security interests. It is simply a contest as between an unsecured creditor and the holder of an unperfected security interest.

The function of s. 20 is to establish what interests are superior to an unperfected security interest. The inclusion of the trustee in bankruptcy in such scheme does not taint otherwise valid provincial legislation. The trustee in bankruptcy is utilizing the scheme of priorities established under the provincial legislation in gathering in the assets of the bankrupt. That a trustee can make use of a valid provincial legislation when administering the estate of a bankrupt was decisively determined in Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., 1977 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 753.

There the trustee moved under The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397 (now R.S.S. 1978, c. F-20), to set aside as fraudulent a transaction entered into outside the three-month period provided for in the Bankruptcy Act for setting aside such transactions. Spence and Beetz JJ., endorsed a restrictive interpretation of the federal power in relation to bankruptcy. Mr. Justice Beetz stated at pp. 803-5 as follows:

> The primary meaning of "insolvency" in s. 91.21 of the Constitution is insolvency in a technical sense, not in a general sense. This Lord Thankerton made clear just a few lines after the passage quoted above: with respect to the jurisdiction of Parliament under s. 91.21, he referred to . . the statutory conditions of insolvency which enabled a creditor or the debtor to invoke the aid of the bankruptcy laws ..."
> When the exclusive power to make laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency was bestowed upon Parliament, it was not intended to remove from the general legal systems which regulated property and civil rights a cardinal - concept essential to the coherence of those systems. The main purpose was to give to Parliament exclusive jurisdiction over the establishment by statute of a particular system regulating the distribution of a debtor's assets. However, given the nature of general legal systems, the primary jurisdiction of Parliament cannot easily be exercised together with its incidental powers without some degree of overlap in which case federal law prevails. On the other hand, provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights should not be measured by the ultimate reach of federal power over bankruptcy and insolvency any more than provincial competence in relation to the administration of justice can be determined by every conceivable and potential use of the criminal law power.

See also the comments of Spence J. to the same effect at p. 794.

If a trustee in bankruptcy can rely upon provincial fraudulent preference legislation to attack the validity of certain transactions and have those transactions voided, there would seem to be no constitutional impediment to the trustee in bankruptcy invoking the priority scheme found in s. 20 of the Act, in order to assert a claim on behalf of the creditors.

In my opinion, the impugned section is not "in truth and substance" legislation in relation to bankruptcy but rather it is in truth and substance legislation in relation to property and civil rights in the province. I agree with the learned chambers judge that the section in question is not ultra vires the Province.

d) Paramountcy

Having found that s. 20(1)(d) of that Act is constitutionally valid, and the Crown having conceded that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are constitutionally valid, it is necessary to consider whether the section is rendered inoperative by virtue of ss. 47 and 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act.

The rule which has been adopted by the courts where there are inconsistent federal and provincial laws in actual and direct conflict of operation is the doctrine of federal paramountcy. Professor Hogg in his text states at p. 354:

> The doctrine of paramountcy applies where there is a federal law and a provincial law which are (1) each valid, and (2) inconsistent.... In determining the validity of each law, the existence and terms of the other law are irrelevant. Validity depends upon the principles discussed in the previous chapter: does the 'matter' (or pith and substance) of the law come within the 'classes of subjects' (or heads of power) allocated to the enacting Parliament or Legislature? If one law fails this test, then the problem is resolved without recourse to the doctrine of paramountcy. It is only if each law independently passes the test of validity that it is necessary to determine whether the laws are inconsistent.

The Supreme Court of Canada has recently dealt with the paramountcy rule in Multiple Access v. McCutcheon,supra, Dickson J. stated at p. 191:

> In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says 'yes' and the other says 'no'; 'the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things'; compliance with one is defiance of the other. The courts are well able to prevent double recovery in the theoretical and unlikely event of plaintiffs trying to obtain relief under both sets of provisions.

In reaching this conclusion Dickson J. considered Smith v. The Queen, 1960 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1960] S.C.R. 776 at 781, Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., supra, and Construction Montcalm Inc. v. Minimum Wage Commission, 1978 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 754.

Hogg, in his text, after reviewing those cases and Multiple Access, states at p. 363:

> The cumulative effect of the decisions seems to be that there is no room for an imputed inconsistency based on covering the field or negative implication. The sole test of inconsistency in Canadian constitutional law is express contradiction. This is the course of judicial restraint, allowing the fullest possible play to provincial legislation.

The respondent contends that there is an operational conflict.

The chambers judge in applying these principles found that there was an operational conflict between s. 20(1)(d) of the Act and the provision of the Bankruptcy Act. He noted that the Bankruptcy Act authorizes the trustee to take possession of and distribute the property of the bankrupt to his secured, preferred creditors as set out in s. 107(1) and, as well, the unsecured creditors as set forth in s. 107(3). He held that the property of the bankrupt is defined in terms of the common law and it does not include the "leased property of the bankrupt" within that definition. He equated the position of a lessor to that of a secured creditor. He stated at p. 507:

> In these circumstances, Paccar contends that the enactment of s. 20(1)(d)- to include the trustee in bankruptcy and the subsequent interpretation of the priorities created by s. 20, vis-a-vis goods leased for a term of more than one year, is in clear conflict with the distribution scheme under the Bankruptcy Act. Under the federal law the trustee would be required to return the leased goods to the owner. He cannot defeat the ownership interest of a lessor. Under the P.P.S.A. scheme the leased goods become a distributable asset for the benefit of the bankrupt lessee's creditors with the owner (lessor) reduced to the position of an unsecured creditor. When one considers that under the scheme of distribution outlined in the federal statute the owner's (lessor's) claim is the same as the secured creditor's, it is clear the two schemes of priority are in actual, not just perceived, conflict. In these circumstances, Paccar argues s. 20(1)(d) and any of the other provisions of the P.P.S.A. which support the scheme of priorities with respect to unperfected security interests, at least insofar as they affect true leases of goods for a period of more than one year, must yield to the distribution scheme of the federal statute.

And again at p. 508.

> While there is no doubt that the overriding objective of the P.P.S.A. is to protect the security of the holder of a "security interest" in goods through the mechanism of registration, it is my opinion that in the case of leased goods > for a term of more than one year the scheme is an actual and operative conflict with the scheme of distributions and priorities imposed upon a trustee in bankruptcy by the Bankruptcy Act. A lessor of goods under the P.P.S.A. loses his ownership to the bankrupt lessee's trustee. That could not happen to the lessor under the federal law. His ownership claim upon the goods is defeated by the purpose and intention of the scheme of priorities outlined in s. 20 of the P.P.S.A. This is an operational as opposed to an incidental or ancillary conflict between the two Acts and pursuant to the doctrine of paramountcy the provincial legislation, insofar as it relates to "leases for a term of more than one year", must yield to the federal statute. I might add that it has been noted that the P.P.S.A. in Saskatchewan is the only Act of this kind in Canada which includes commercial leases for more than one year within the definition of "security interest". One wonders if the reason is that it is recognized in other provinces that this type of revision creates a conflict with the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act?

With the greatest respect, I do not agree with the learned chambers judge. The primary position of the respondent is that it is a secured creditor under the Bankruptcy Act and that the registration scheme under the Act deprives it of its secured position. In my opinion that position is not correct. For convenience, I reproduce the definition of secured creditor which appears in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act.

> "secured creditor" means a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt due or accruing due to him from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based upon, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and upon which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable; ...

The respondent Paccar submits that s. 107 gives him priority as a secured creditor. As examination of the definition of secured creditor reveals that a lessor does not fall within that definition. The lease is a true lease and not a security agreement which grants a charge or lien against the leased property as security for a debt due or accruing to a creditor. As noted by Cameron J.A. in Bell's Dairies et al. supra, the trustee in bankruptcy has, pursuant to s. 12(2), a duty to take into possession all property of the bankrupt as a representative of the creditors. "Property" is defined in the Bankruptcy Act as:

> "property" includes money, goods, things in action, land, and every description of property, whether real or personal, movable or immovable, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of, or incident to property.

That definition is broad enough to include a leasehold interest. See In Re Cadieux (1952), 33 C.B.R. 15 at 16. Central to the finding of operational conflict by the chambers judge is his finding that under federal bankruptcy law the assets would belong to the respondent Paccar, and that by operation of the Act the goods are not subject to the same distribution scheme as a secured creditor. In so finding he has failed to take into account the nature of the security, the common law position of a lessor, and the integrated legislative scheme contemplated by the Bankruptcy Act.

The Bankruptcy Act is silent as to the rights of a lessor on the bankruptcy of a lessee. There is therefore no statutory conflict between the two Acts. Section 14(1)(k) does, however, set out the rights of the trustee in relation to leasehold property of the bankrupt. The section reads:

> 14(1) The trustee may, with the permission of the inspectors, do all or any of the following things:
> (k) elect to retain for the whole part of its unexpired term, or to assign, surrender, or disclaim any lease of, or other temporary interest in, any property of the bankrupt.

The trustee succeeds to the possessory right of the bankrupt in the leased goods. As this Court stated in Bell's Dairies, supra, at p. 174:

> In the first place, then, a trustee in bankruptcy, upon whom there devolves a chattel in the possession of the bankrupt under a commercial lease for a term exceeding a year, succeeds to the contractual or "possessory" interest of the bankrupt in that chattel, as well as to the bankrupt's statutory or "proprietory" interest therein ... .
> In the second place--and this a critical point--a trustee in bankruptcy may, as a representative of the creditors of the bankrupt, assert the interests of those creditors in the goods of the bankrupt, including goods in the possession of the bankrupt pursuant to a commercial lease for a term exceeding a year.

Section 49(2) of the Bankruptcy Act provides that a secured creditor can realize or otherwise deal with the security as if the bankruptcy had not occurred. Section 50(1) provides that the rights of secured creditors are not affected by the bankruptcy and s. 107 provides that the distribution of proceeds is subject to the rights of a secured creditor. It will be noted that these sections preserve the rights of secured creditors. They do not define what rights a secured creditor has in the collateral. A determination of what rights a secured creditor has in the collateral is made under provincial law; in this case, the Act. Section 50(6) of the Bankruptcy Act recognizes this integrated scheme. That section reads as follows:

> 50(6) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the the trustee is > entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by such law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

It is now clear that a legal integration of the Bankruptcy Act and the provincial laws relating to property and civil rights is not only permissible but desirable and essential. Mr. Justice Beetz, in concurring with Mr. Justice Spence, stated at pp. 808-9 of Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., supra:

> ... I am of the view that s. 50 subs. (6) of the Bankruptcy Act provides a clear indication that Parliament, far from intending to depart from the rule of operational conflict, did in fact aim at the highest possible degree of legal integration of federal and provincial laws: ...

Section 20(1)(d), far from conflicting with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, is an important part of the integrated scheme of legislation dealing with priorities in entitlement to property. In my opinion, there is no operational conflict between the Act and the Bankruptcy Act; the section remains operative and is determinative of the priority between the trustee and Paccar.

(a) Applicability of The Personal Property Security Act to Paccar

In addition to the constitutional questions which were submitted for resolution by the chambers judge, Paccar submitted that it was not required to perfect its security under the P.P.S.A. by reason that it was not regularly engaged in the business of leasing goods in the province and was therefore exempt pursuant to s. 2(y)(iv) of the Act. The chambers judge dealt with that issue fully and concluded that the exemption did not apply. He found that the exemption provisions in s. 2(y)(iv) were' designed to exempt a person who occasionally leased goods but could not be described as making it his business. He found in this case that Paccar did not fit the description because it was a large financial institution regularly engaged in financing the purchase of Kenworth trucks, and that while lease transactions were rarely used, they were in fact used for financing and as a result the exemption did not apply. I agree with that finding.

f) Claim of Carrier

In an effort to forestall further litigation in the event that he was wrong, the chambers judge considered the claim raised by Carrier respecting his claim to the goods as one who purchased the truck without notice of Paccar's interest in it.

The chambers judge considered all of the relevant material filed by the parties by way of affidavit, and concluded that Carrier did not have notice of Paccar's leasehold interest in the goods. In considering s. 20(1)(e) (reproduced above) and s. 67(3)(a), which reads as follows:

> 67(3) For the purposes of this Act, a person knows or has notice when:
> (a) in the case of an individual, information comes to his attention under circumstances in which a reasonable person would take cognizance of it.

he stated:

> So Paccar argues Carrier was not "without notice" because he had information come to his attention under circumstances that he should have known of Paccar's interest in the truck.
> However, on balancing the evidence on this issue I cannot agree with this contention because a reading of Carrier's explanation of his dealings with the management of Sinco explains clearly why he believed he was dealing with Sinco and why he would have no reason to believe Paccar had an ownership interest in the truck. The stealth and falsity of Sinco's treatment of Carrier is by any standard so reprehensible one is left to wonder why an investigation for fraud was not undertaken. Be that as it may, I am not satisfied on a balance of probabilities that Carrier had notice of Paccar's interest. It seems to me Sinco did everything possible to keep him from finding out they only had a lease on the truck when they purported to sell it to him. In my opinion, the evidence supports Carrier's contention that he was a purchaser of the truck without notice of Paccar's security interest.

I agree with that conclusion. In the dispute between Paccar and Carrier as to the entitlement to the collateral, Paccar's interest is subordinated to that of Carrier.

The question of priority between the trustee and Carrier was not in issue or argued before us. That determination must be made elsewhere.

The appeal is therefore allowed with costs to the trustee and Carrier on double Column V.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO
OSBORNE A.C.J.O., WEILER and CHARRON JJ.A.

IN THE MATTER OF THE BANKRUPTCY OF NYCOLE LANDRY, residing in the Township of Longueuil, in the County of Prescott, in the Province of Ontario	Robert J. Smith and John P. O'Toole, for the Appellant, Deloitte & Touche
	Matthew J. Halpin, for the Respondent Nycole Landry
	Heard: May 26, 2000

On appeal from the decision of the Honourable Mr. Justice James B. Chadwick dated September 13, 1999.

CHARRON J.A.:

[1] The respondent, Nycole Landry, declared bankruptcy on June 4, 1997 and the appellant, Deloitte & Touche, was appointed trustee of the bankrupt's estate. Landry has been discharged from bankruptcy on October 15, 1998. The trustee has not yet been discharged and is still attempting to realize upon the assets of the bankrupt's estate for the benefit of the creditors. This proceeding concerns one potential asset.

A. The Facts

[2] The relevant facts can be stated succinctly.

[3] In 1993, Landry was dismissed from her employment as a pilot with First Air. That same year, she brought a claim for unjust dismissal against First Air under the Canada Labour Code R.S.C. 1985, c. L-2. At the end of a first hearing, the arbitrator found that Landry had been unjustly dismissed.

[4] The employer successfully appealed the arbitrator's finding and a new hearing was ordered. Shortly before the second hearing, Landry changed solicitors. In May 1997, the first solicitor's costs were assessed in the amount of

$77,500. Landry declared bankruptcy on June 4, 1997. The first solicitor is the main, if not the only, creditor in the bankruptcy.

[5] Landry obtained an absolute discharge from her bankruptcy on October 15, 1998 which effectively discharged her from her debt to the first solicitor. The trustee did not oppose the discharge but made it clear to Landry that the trustee maintained the right to claim any part of an eventual award of damages for unjust dismissal.

[6] In December 1998, at the conclusion of a second hearing under the Canada Labour Code, a different arbitrator also found that Landry was unjustly dismissed. When the trustee became aware of the arbitrator's decision, the trustee unsuccessfully attempted to intervene in the proceedings to claim the first solicitor's costs.

[7] The arbitrator's decision on the award has not yet been delivered and apparently awaits the outcome of this appeal. Although the exact amount is uncertain, the parties agree that Landry can expect to receive, as part of the award, some monies for lost wages.

B. The Trustee's Motion

[8] In the Spring of 1999, the trustee moved before Chadwick J. under ss. 67, 68 and 71 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA") for various forms of relief with respect to the expected arbitrator's award. The trustee sought a declaration that any amount awarded in relation to lost wages[1] constituted property of the bankrupt that vested in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors, either through the automatic operation of ss. 67 and 71(2) or pursuant to an order that the court should make under s. 68. (Simply put, s. 67 defines the property of the bankrupt that is divisible among the creditors, s. 71(2) is a general vesting provision and s. 68 makes specific provisions with respect to either the "total income" of the bankrupt -if the current provision applies, or the bankrupt's "salary, wages, or other remuneration" from employment -if the former version applies.) The trustee also sought a declaration that Landry's claim against First Air vested in the trustee on the date of bankruptcy and that the trustee was therefore entitled to intervene in the proceedings before the arbitrator to seek an order for costs in relation to the first solicitor's account. Finally, the trustee sought an order for a lien under s. 34 of the Solicitors Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. S-15.

C. The Decision Under Appeal

[9] Chadwick J. held that, even if that part of the settlement related to wages in lieu of notice could arguably form part of the bankrupt estate under s. 67, 80% of this amount would be exempt pursuant to the provisions of the Wages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. W-1 incorporated under s. 67(1)(b) of the BIA. In view of the small amount of money that could be apportioned, the motions judge stated that he was not prepared to make any order under s. 67. The motions held further that the current s. 68 applied but that the trustee was precluded from resorting to its provisions because the section applied only to undischarged bankrupts and because the trustee had not followed the procedure set out under s. 68. On the question of costs, the motions judge held that neither the trustee nor the former solicitors had any status in seeking an order for costs before the arbitrator as the costs are those of the client Landry and that she had waived her claim for costs as a result of her bankruptcy. Finally the motions judge refused to make an order for a lien under the Solicitors Act and dismissed the trustee's motion. The trustee appeals from this decision on all questions except that the trustee does not pursue the request for a lien under the Solicitors Act.

D. The Issues on the Appeal

[10] This appeal therefore raises the following questions:

1. Does Landry's claim against First Air or any part of the resulting award constitute property of the bankrupt that vests in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71(2)of the BIA?
2. If so, does any exemption apply pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) so as to except any part of the property from the estate of the bankrupt?
3. Is s. 67 superseded by the provisions of s. 68 in relation to a bankrupt's wages?
4. If so, which provision applies, the former s. 68 which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy, or the present s. 68 which was in force at the time the trustee brought its motion?
5. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 after the discharge of the bankrupt?
6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to the current s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?
7. Does the trustee have standing to intervene in the proceeding under the Canada Labour Code to claim Landry's costs incurred at the first arbitration hearing?

E. Analysis

1. Does Landry's claim against First Air or any part of the resulting award constitute property of the bankrupt that vests in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71(2) of the BIA?

[11] As stated earlier, s. 71(2) is a general vesting provision. It reads as follows:

71(2) Vesting of property in trustee – On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

[12] "Property" is defined under s. 2 of the BIA as including:

money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property. [Emphasis added.]

[13] "Things in action" encompass a claim for damages for breach of contract, including an action for wrongful dismissal: Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701. The parties do not dispute that Landry's claim against her former employer under the Canada Labour Code is a "thing in action" and therefore constitutes "property" for the purpose of the BIA. Hence, pursuant to s. 71(2), Landry's claim against her former employer would vest in the trustee on the date she declared bankruptcy and she would cease to have any capacity to deal with it. However, s. 71(2) is subject to the other provisions of the BIA.

[14] Section 67 of the BIA defines what property of a bankrupt is divisible among her creditors and can serve to restrict the ambit of s. 71(2). The relevant part of s. 67 reads as follows:

67.(1) Property of bankrupt – The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under any laws applicable in the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides, or

(b.1) such goods and services tax credit payments and prescribed payments relating to the essential needs of an individual as are made in prescribed circumstances and are not property referred to in paragraph (a) or (b),

but it shall comprise

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

[15] It is clear that s. 67(1)(c) is wide enough to encompass Landry's claim against her former employer and, consequently, any award of damages (other than those relating to personal claims, see footnote 1, supra) would form part of the property divisible among her creditors under that provision. A question then arises whether any part of the property falls within the exception made for exempt property under s. 67(1)(b).

2. Does any exemption apply pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) so as to except any part of the property from the estate of the bankrupt?

[16] As provided under s. 67(1)(b), the property of the bankrupt divisible among her creditors shall not comprise any property that as against Landry is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of Ontario. Landry relies on s. 7(2) of the Ontario Wages Act which provides that "80 per cent of a person's wages are exempt from seizure or garnishment." Therefore, if any part of the arbitrator's award constitutes "wages" within the meaning of s. 7(2), 80% of that amount would not constitute property divisible among Landry's creditors and, hence, would not vest in the trustee.

[17] At the hearing, counsel did not seriously dispute that the case of Wallace, supra provides support for the contention that the arbitrator's award of damages for unjust dismissal, in so far as it relates to lost wages, can be equated to actual wages.

[18] Wallace made a voluntary assignment into personal bankruptcy and remained an undischarged bankrupt when he commenced an action for wrongful dismissal against his former employer. A question arose whether Wallace could bring this action in his own name given the vesting provisions under s. 71(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 which, as s. 71(2) of the present BIA, provided that a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to deal with his property.

[19] Iacobucci J., in the majority judgment, (all justices were in agreement on this issue) stated (para. 58) that the wording of the Act is clear and that an undischarged bankrupt has no capacity to deal with his or her property, including an action for breach of contract, outside the circumstances described in s. 99(1) (which circumstances are of no relevance to this appeal). The Court held further that the Act made no distinction whether that property was acquired before or after the assignment in bankruptcy. However, the Court went on to consider the provisions of s. 68(1) of the Bankruptcy Act as it then read (this is the provision which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy) and concluded that it carved out an additional exception to this general rule. Section 68(1), in this earlier version, provided as follows:

68.(1) Notwithstanding subsection 67(1), where a bankrupt

(a) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any money as salary, wages or other remuneration from a person employing the bankrupt...

Digitized by Google

the trustee may, on the trustee's own initiative or, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall, make an application to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the money as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

[20] More will be said about the effect of s. 68 later in these reasons. What is of relevance to the question presently under consideration is the finding by the Court that Wallace, an undischarged bankrupt, could maintain his action against his former employer for damages for wrongful dismissal not because of the timing of the acquisition of the property "but rather, because of the nature of the property in question" (para. 59) which the court equated to "wages". Iacobucci J. wrote as follows (paras. 65-66):

As I see the matter, the underlying nature of the damages awarded in a wrongful dismissal action is clearly akin to the "wages" referred to in s. 68(1). In the absence of just cause, an employer remains free to dismiss an employee at any time provided that reasonable notice of the termination is given. In providing the employee with reasonable notice, the employer has two options: either to require the employee to continue working for the duration of that period or to give the employee pay in lieu of notice: D. Harris, Wrongful Dismissal (1989 (loose-leaf)), at p. 3-10. There can be no doubt that if the employer opted to require the employee to continue working during the notice period, his or her earnings during this time would constitute wages or salary under s. 68(1) of the Act. The only difference between these earnings and pay in lieu of notice is that the employee receives a lump sum payment instead of having that sum spread out over the course of the notice period. The nature of those funds remains the same and thus s. 68(1) will also apply in these circumstances.

In the event that an employee is wrongfully dismissed, the measure of damages for wrongful dismissal is the salary that the employee would have earned had the employee worked during the period of notice to which he or she was entitled: Sylvester v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 353 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 315. The fact that this sum is awarded as damages at trial in no way alters the fundamental character of the money. An award of damages in a wrongful dismissal action is in reality the wages that the employer ought to have paid the employee either over the course of the period of reasonable notice or as pay in lieu of notice. Therefore, in accordance with the exception which is carved out in s. 68(1) for "salary, wages or other remuneration", this money is not divisible among a bankrupt's creditors and does not vest in the trustee. The right of action is the means of attaining these damages and is similarly exempt.

[21] On the authority of Wallace, I conclude that, to the extent that the arbitrator's award relates to the pay Landry should have received in lieu of notice, the monies would constitute "wages" for the purpose of the s. 67(1)(b) exception. However, what is also clear from Wallace is that s. 67 must be considered in conjunction with s. 68. This brings us to the next question.

3. Is s. 67 superceded by the provisions of s.68 in relation to a bankrupt's wages?

[22] Two versions of s. 68 must be taken into account: the former version under the Bankruptcy Act that was considered in Wallace and the current version under the BIA which will be discussed shortly. There are two reasons why both versions must be examined. The first is that the former version and its interconnection with s. 67 was considered by the Supreme Court of Canada in Wallace and in Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765 and the question arises whether the reasoning in those cases applies to the new version. The second reason is that the trustee contends that the former version is applicable to this case since it was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy rather than the current version which was in force at the time the motion was brought. This latter argument forms the subject-matter of the next question on this appeal and will be dealt with later. I will now deal with the interpretation of s. 68 and its interconnection with s. 67.

a) The former s .68

[23] Section 68 under the Bankruptcy Act provided the trustee with the means to obtain part of a bankrupt's salary, wages or other remuneration from employment notwithstanding the provisions contained in s. 67(1). For our purposes, it is only necessary to consider s. 68(1) and I reproduce it again for convenience:

68.(1) Notwithstanding subsection 67(1), where a bankrupt

(a) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any money as salary, wages or other remuneration from a person employing the bankrupt, or

(b) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive from a person any money as payment for or commission in respect of any services performed by the bankrupt,

the trustee may, on the trustee's own initiative or, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall, make an application to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the money as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

[24] This provision was considered at length by the Supreme Court of Canada in Marzetti. The particular facts and a number of other issues in Marzetti are not relevant to our discussion. What is relevant to this case is the Court's consideration of the interconnection between s. 67[2] and s. 68. Iacobucci J., in writing for the court, set out the issue as follows (at 178):

Digitized by Google

... I must determine whether s. 68 always controls the disposition of a bankrupt's wages. Is s. 68 a substantive provision, that is, one which always removes wages from the scope of s. 67, or does it simply create a procedural device for trustees?

[25] Following his analysis, he concluded as follows (at 185):

To summarize briefly, it is my opinion that the language of s. 68, the inferred purpose of that provision, and the decision of this Court in Vachon, supra, all support the conclusion that s. 68 is a substantive provision, one which is intended to operate as a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. These forms of property cannot fall within s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act as a bankrupt's after-acquired "property", and they cannot be considered "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67. They do not vest in the trustee through the simple operation of law.

[26] Hence, the Supreme Court in Marzetti, and later in Wallace, has authoritatively determined that s. 68 supercedes the provisions of s. 67 in so far as "salary, wages or other remuneration" from employment are concerned. It follows that, if this provision is applicable to this case, the Ontario Wages Act does not apply and neither does any other part of s. 67. There is no automatic vesting of Landry's claim against First Air or of any part of the arbitrator's award. The trustee, and the court, must look exclusively to s. 68 to determine what part, if any, of the award will form part of the bankrupt's estate for distribution to the creditors. The question becomes, does the same interpretation apply to the current s. 68 under the BIA?

[27] The current s. 68 in the BIA differs from the former version in a number of respects. The full text is appended to these reasons for ease of reference. First, the section does not refer to "salary, wages or other remuneration" but to "total income". "[T]otal income" is defined for the purpose of s. 68 as including, "notwithstanding s. 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source". The section still allows the trustee to apply to the court for a determination of the amount that a bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt out of her total income but an elaborate procedure must be followed before such an application is made. For our purposes, this procedure can be summarized as follows.

[28] First, the Superintendent is directed to establish standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Second, the trustee, having regard to these standards and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, must fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay, inform the official receiver of his decision and take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay. Third, where the official receiver determines that the fixed amount is not in accordance with the applicable standards, the official receiver must recommend an appropriate amount. Fourth, where the trustee and the bankrupt disagree on the amount to be paid, the trustee must send to the official receiver a request that the matter be determined by mediation. A creditor can also make a request for mediation. Fifth, the mediation takes place in accordance with prescribed procedures.

[29] In addition to this procedure, an application may be made to the court under s. 68(10):

68. (10) Where

(a) the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5),

(b) the issue submitted to mediation requested under subsection (6) or (7) is not thereby resolved, or

(c) the bankrupt fails to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section,

the trustee may, or on the request of the inspectors, any of the creditors or the official receiver shall, apply to the court for the hearing of the matter, and the court may, on the hearing, in accordance with the standards established under subsection (1) and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, by order, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt.

[30] In my view, the reasoning in Marzetti and Wallace that led to the conclusion that s. 68 was a complete code with respect to wages applies equally to this new section. The current provision applies to the "total income" of the bankrupt and, as such, is even wider than the earlier reference to "salary, wages and other remuneration"; the provision expressly excludes the application of s. 67(1)(b)[3]; its purpose is no different than that described in Marzetti (except that applications to the court now appear to be limited to those cases where the issue cannot be otherwise resolved); and the jurisprudential principles reviewed by the Supreme Court in Marzetti are equally relevant.

[31] I therefore conclude that s. 67 is superseded by the provisions of the current s.68 in so far as the "total income" of the bankrupt is concerned. It follows that, as in Wallace, Landry's claim against her former employer and any consequent award relating to lost wages do not automatically vest in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71. Resort can only be had to s. 68 for payment of any portion thereof to the estate of the bankrupt.

4. Which provision applies, the former s.68 which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy, or the present s.68 which was in force at the time the trustee brought its motion?

Digitized by Google

[32] In my view, the motions judge was correct in holding that the current s. 68 of the BIA applies to this motion. The following transition provision (S.C. 1997, c. 12, s. 60(2)) is relevant:

Subsection (1) [which re-enacted s. 68] applies to bankruptcies in respect of which proceedings are commenced after that subsection comes into force [April 30, 1998].

[33] A plain reading of the section would indicate that the trustee's motion under s. 68 itself is a proceeding within the meaning of that provision. Counsel could not articulate any policy reason why the new section should not apply.

[34] I therefore conclude that the current s. 68 under the BIA applies to this proceeding.

5. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 after the discharge of the bankrupt?

[35] The motions judge held that s. 68 was no longer available to a trustee after the discharge of a bankrupt. First, the motions judge noted that s. 68 refers to "a bankrupt" and that s. 2 defined "bankrupt" as "a person who has made an assignment or against whom a receiving order has been made or the legal status of that person". Second, the motions judge held that the section was intended to apply in the period from the assignment in bankruptcy or the receivership order until the discharge of the bankrupt. He therefore concluded that s. 68 applied to a bankrupt and not to a discharged bankrupt.

[37] First, it disregards the fact that the definition of "bankrupt" does not only refer to "the legal status of [the] person" - since Landry has been discharged, it is correct to say that she is no longer in the state of bankruptcy, but also to "a person who has made an assignment" - a description that clearly applies to Landry.[4]

[38] Second, the motions judge erred in his interpretation of the scope of the section. Although, from a practical standpoint, s. 68 may apply more commonly to periodic wages received during the period of time between the assignment and the discharge, I see nothing in the language of the provision that restricts its application to this time frame. It is clear from Wallace and Marzetti that s. 68 applies because of the nature of the property in question, regardless of the timing of the acquisition of the property or of the fact that the payment is made in a lump sum.

[39] Third, I do not see any policy reason why, in situations such as in this case where the income is only to be received after the discharge, resort to s. 68 would nonetheless have to be made before the discharge. Indeed, given the procedure set out under s.68, it may be impossible to resort to its provisions before payment is made or at least its quantum ascertained. Further, if resort to s. 68 were to be limited to the pre-discharge period, the trustee or the creditors would likely oppose any discharge if any payment of income was still pending at the time the bankrupt applied for a discharge. I am therefore concerned that such an interpretation would have the effect of unnecessarily postponing discharges until the full administration of the estate is completed. In cases where there is pending litigation over the payment of such income, the delay in obtaining a discharge could prove quite substantial. This result, in my view would militate against the prompt rehabilitation of the bankrupt. Finally, such an interpretation runs contrary to the established principle and practice that the trustee's obligation to realize and distribute the estate of the bankrupt continues until the trustee is discharged regardless of the prior discharge of the bankrupt: see Re Salloum 1990 CanLII 2260 (BC CA), (1990), 1 C.B.R. (3rd) 204 (B.C.C.A.).

[40] I therefore conclude that the trustee is not precluded from resorting to s. 68 by the fact that Landry has been discharged.

6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?

[41] The motions judge was correct in noting that, before an application can be made to the court under s. 68(10) to fix the amount of the bankrupt's income that is payable to the estate of the bankrupt, the trustee must bring himself under the terms of that provision. As discussed earlier, by its terms, s. 68(10) effectively limits the number of applications to the court to those cases where the issue has not otherwise been resolved by consent or mediation in accordance with the established procedure. In this case, of course, it was impossible for the trustee to have followed this procedure since the arbitrator's award was not yet ascertained. Once the arbitrator's decision is made, the trustee will be in a position to fix the amount which, in its view, must be paid to the estate and the balance of the procedure set out in s. 68 can follow its course. Hence, the trustee's motion, in so far as it purports to be made under s. 68(10), is simply premature.

[42] However, the trustee's motion was not made strictly under s. 68(10). It is apparent from the relief sought, which was mainly declaratory in nature, that the motion was brought with a view to preserving a potential asset in anticipation of a future determination of the parties' rights under s. 68. In my view, the motions judge erred in foreclosing any resort to s. 68 on the basis that the procedure set out thereunder had not been followed. At worst, the motion could have been dismissed as premature. However, in the circumstances of this case, it is my view that the motions judge should have exercised his discretion and directed that any monies awarded by the arbitrator to Landry as compensation for lost wages be paid into court until the resolution of the parties' respective rights under s. 68 or until further direction of the court. It is open to this court to make an order which could have been made by the motions judge and I would therefore make such an order.

7. Does the trustee have standing to intervene in the proceeding under the Canada Labour Code to claim Landry's costs incurred at the first hearing?

[43] The question whether it would even be within the arbitrator's power to award costs in relation to the first hearing is not before this court. The issue here is whether Landry's right, if any, to claim costs in the Canada Labour Code proceeding vests in the trustee. In my view, it does not.

[44] As stated earlier, on the authority of Wallace, Landry's claim against her former employer did not vest in the trustee upon her bankruptcy. Hence Landry had the right, as she did, to pursue her proceeding under the Canada Labour Code in her own name. Any right she may have to claim costs in relation to this proceeding is not an independent thing in action. Rather, it is simply a consequential right that may flow from the result. The trustee has not established any basis upon which it could intervene. I would not interfere with the motions judge's decision on this point.

F. Disposition

[45] I would therefore answer the questions as follows:

1. Does Landry's claim against First Air or any part of the resulting award constitute property of the bankrupt that vests in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71(2)of the BIA?

Yes but these provisions are superseded by s. 68 of the BIA.

2. If so, does any exemption apply pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) so as to except any part of the property from the estate of the bankrupt?

Yes but this exception is superceded by s. 68 of the BIA.

3. Is s. 67 superceded by the provisions of s. 68 in relation to a bankrupt's wages?

Yes.

4. If so, which provision applies, the former s. 68 which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy, or the present s. 68 which was in force at the time the trustee brought its motion?

The current s. 68 under the BIA.

5. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 after the discharge of the bankrupt?

No.

6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to the current s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?

No.

7. Does the trustee have standing to intervene in the proceeding under the Canada Labour Code to claim Landry's costs incurred at the first arbitration hearing?

No.

[46] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside Chadwick J.'s order, order that any monies awarded by the arbitrator to Landry as compensation for lost wages be paid into the bankruptcy court until the resolution of the parties' respective rights under s.68 or until further directions of that court. I would allow the trustee its costs of the motion and of the appeal against the estate of the bankrupt.

APPENDIX

Section 68 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act

68. (1) Directives re standard of living factors – The Superintendent shall, by directive, establish in respect of the provinces or one or more bankruptcy districts or parts of bankruptcy districts, the standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

(2) Interpretation – For the purposes of this section,

(a) "total income" referred to in subsection (1) includes, notwithstanding paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source; and

(b) a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate of the bankrupt is enforceable against all property of the bankrupt, other than property referred to in paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1).

(3) Trustee to fix amount to be paid – The trustee shall

(a) having regard to the applicable standards established under subsection (1), and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt;

(b) inform the official receiver in writing of the amount fixed under paragraph (a); and

(c) take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay.

(4) Modification by trustee – The trustee may, at any time, amend an amount fixed under subsection (3) to take into account

(a) material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt; or

(b) a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5).

(5) Official receiver recommendation – Where the official receiver determines that the amount required to be paid by the bankrupt under subsection (3) or (4) is substantially not in accordance with the applicable standards established under subsection (1), the official receiver shall recommend to the trustee and to the bankrupt an amount required to be paid that the official receiver determines is in accordance with the applicable standards.

(6) Trustee may request mediation – Where the trustee and the bankrupt are not in agreement with the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4), the trustee shall, forthwith, in the prescribed form, send to the official receiver a request that the matter be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt.

(7) Creditor may request mediation – On the request in writing of a creditor made within thirty days after the date of bankruptcy or an amendment referred to in subsection (4), the trustee shall, within the five days following the thirty day period, send to the official receiver a request in the prescribed form that the matter of the amount the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4) be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt and the creditor.

(8) Mediation procedure – A mediation shall be in accordance with prescribed procedures.

(9) File – Documents contained in a file on the mediation of a matter under this section form part of the records referred to in subsection 11.1(2).

(10) Court determination – Where

(a) the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5),

(b) the issue submitted to mediation requested under subsection (6) or (7) is not thereby resolved, or

(c) the bankrupt fails to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section,

the trustee may, or on the request of the inspectors, any of the creditors or the official receiver shall, apply to the court for the hearing of the matter, and the court may, on the hearing, in accordance with the standards established under subsection (1) and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, by order, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt.

(11) Fixing fair and reasonable remuneration in the case of related persons – The court may fix an amount that is fair and reasonable

(a) as salary, wages or other remuneration for the services being performed by a bankrupt for a person employing the bankrupt, or

(b) as payment for or commission in respect of any services being performed by a bankrupt for a person,

where the person is related to the bankrupt, and the court may, by order, determine the part of the salary, wages or other remuneration, or the part of the payment or commission, that shall be paid to the trustee on the basis of the amount so fixed by the court, unless it appears to the court that the services have been performed for the benefit of the bankrupt and are not of any substantial benefit to the person for whom they were performed.

(12) Modification of order – On the application of any interested person, the court may, at any time, amend an order made under this section to take into account material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt.

Digitized by Google

(13) Default by other person – An order of the court made under this section may be served on a person from whom the bankrupt is entitled to receive money and, in such case,
(a) the order binds the person to pay to the estate of the bankrupt the amount fixed by the order; and
(b) if the person fails to comply with the terms of the order, the court may, on the application of the trustee, order the person to pay the trustee the amount of money that the estate of the bankrupt would have received had the person complied with the terms of the order.
(14) Application is a proceeding – For the purposes of section 38, an application referred to in subsection (10) is deemed to be a proceeding for the benefit of the estate.

[1] The trustee acknowledged before the motions judge that any award of damages relating to personal claims other than for loss wages would not form part of the bankrupt's estate: Re: Holley (1986), 59 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17 (Ont. C.A.).
[2] Section 67 which was in force at the time has been modified in the current BIA but the changes are not relevant to this analysis.
[3] The fact that the current version is not expressly stated to apply notwithstanding the whole of s.67 as the earlier version did is, in my view, of no consequence. The remaining rationale in Marzetti leads to the conclusion that s.68 is a complete code with respect to this kind of property.
[4] The BIA contains many provisions where the word "bankrupt" is used in relation to the post-discharge period. See for example s.180 where the BIA provides that "[w]here a bankrupt after his discharge fails to perform the duties imposed on him by this Act, the court may, on application, annul his discharge." It is evident that "bankrupt" here applies to a discharged bankrupt.

In the Matter of the Bankruptcy of
DEBBIE LYNN ANDERSON

REASONS FOR DECISION of
R. P. Wacowich, Registrar in Bankruptcy

Application:
[1] The trustee applied for an absolute discharge of the bankrupt Debbie Lynn Anderson. Counsel for a major creditor appeared to make representations that funds received by the bankrupt during the bankruptcy in settlement of a motor vehicle personal injury claim should be paid to the trustee as part of the bankrupt's estate.
Facts:

Digitized by Google

[2] The bankrupt was injured in a motor vehicle accident on October 11, 1999. The matter was settled during the bankruptcy on March 8, 2004. The insurer's letter of settlement indicated the bankrupt received general damages of $65,000.00, loss of earnings capacity of $50,000.00, and past loss of earnings $30,000.00. There was a contingency fee of 25% so that the bankrupt received $37,500.00 for the loss of earning capacity and $22,500.00 for past loss of earnings. The creditor claims these funds should form part of the bankrupt's estate. They are currently in the trust account of the bankrupt's lawyer. The law is clear that the personal injury general damages do not form part of the bankrupt's estate and this was conceded by counsel for the creditor.

Issue:

[3] Do the heads of damage for loss of earning capacity and past loss of earnings constitute property or income under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (the Act). If so, are they payable to the bankrupt's estate?

Discussion:

[4] Cases dealing with personal injury compensation received during a bankruptcy often begin their review with a reference to Re Hollister (1926) 7 C.B.R. 629 (Ont. S.C.). In that case Fisher J. stated at pages 630-631:

> The law is well settled that the Bankruptcy Act never intended to increase the assets of an insolvent for division amongst his creditors of moneys recovered in an action for personal injuries, as these moneys are awarded as damages to the debtor for his pain and suffering and loss of comfort of life, to pay his physicians, nurses and hospital expenses and to compensate him whilst he is incapacitated from earning a living for himself and his family. (See Ex parte Vine; In re Wilson (1878) 8 Ch. D. 364, 47 L.J. Bk. 116, 38 L.T. 73, 26 W.R. 582). It is only actions which relate directly to the bankrupt's property and can be converted into assets for payment of creditors that pass to the debtor's trustee. Causes of action arising from bodily or mental suffering such as actions for assault, seduction, criminal conversation and damages for personal injuries remain in the bankrupt.

[5] The issue of loss of income recovered in an action for damages arising out of personal injury was dealt with in Lang v. McKenna, (1994) 27 C.B.R. 3d (Ont. Ct. of Justice) and in Re Bell (1996) 39 C.B.R. 3d 236 (B.C.S.C.). In Lang, after quoting Hollister Pardu J. states at page 213:

> Moneys recovered for lost wages in a personal injury action arising out of a motor vehicle accident are monies paid to compensate a party while he is incapacitated from earning a living for himself and his family and thus do not form part of a bankrupt's estate. It would be inappropriate for me to depart from this long standing authority of Re Hollister where no reason has been advanced to do so and where no contrary authority has been referred to me.

[6] According to Pardu J. then, in this case the bankrupt would be entitled to the past loss of income as money paid to compensate her while she was incapacitated from earning a living. This would be equally true for the future loss of income.

[7] In Re Bell, Wern J. of the B.C. Supreme Court dealt with a personal injury award to the bankrupt before discharge which included an amount for loss of wages. He reviewed Justice Pardu's decision in Lang and states at page 238:

> On my review of Re Hollister and particularly the other authorities relied on by counsel for the trustee, it cannot be said that the passage from Re Hollister relied on by Pardu J. is anything more than dicta, and certainly not, with respect, to be long standing authority. Every other authority distinguishes between an award for damage to property on the one hand and an award for damage to the person on the other, and placing an award for wage loss or compensation for diminished earning capacity in the former category.

[8] Wern, J. also refers at page 239 to Houlden and Morawitz on Bankruptcy Law of Canada where the authors state:

> It will be observed that there might be in an action for damages, two distinct causes of action, one for injuries to the bankrupt's property which would ultimately belong to the trustee and the other for personal injuries which belong to the bankrupt.

[9] Wern J. concludes by referring to a comment by Dickson J. in Andews v. Grand and Toy Alberta Ltd. 1978 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 229 at 251:

> What sort of career would the accident victim have had? What were his prospects and potential prior to the accident? It is not the loss of earnings but, rather, loss of earning capacity for which compensation must be made . . . A capital asset has been lost: What was its value?

[10] In conclusion Wern J. states:

Digitized by Google

> The award therefore was to compensate Mr. Bell for loss of or impairment of property, the capital asset called the capacity to earn, and accordingly the award rightly passed to the trustee to be distributed to the creditors.

[11] With respect, I do not agree that the loss of earnings capacity or past loss of earnings should be characterized as a capital asset. Andrews was not a case dealing with bankruptcy and this isolated quote from it should not be determinative of the issue in this case. I prefer the result in Lang but wish to further consider this issue.

> (a) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any money as salary, wages or other remuneration from a person employing, or using the services of, the bankrupt, in this section referred to as "employer", the trustee, if directed by the inspectors or creditors, shall apply to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration as the court may determine, having regard to family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

[13] At the Court of Appeal of Alberta (1992) 14 C.B.R. 3d 127, Major J.A., as he then was, explained that:

> "The reality of this situation is that the income tax refund, in so far as it relates to employer withholdings, represents wages that otherwise would have been paid to the bankrupt". (p. 134)

[14] At the Supreme Court, Iacobucci J. references the above quote and states at p. 11 in reference to it:

> He buttressed his conclusion with dicta from Dauphin Plains Credit Union Ltd. v. Xyloid Industries Ltd., 1980 CanLII 186 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1182 ... But he also qualified his conclusion by stating (at p. 135):
> "I do not conclude that all tax refunds are wages. It depends on the nature of the refund. In this case the refund was a result of taxes deducted directly from wages. Tax refunds may arise in other ways and to be determined when that case arises."

[15] Iacobucci J. goes on to discuss the very wide definition of property in the Act and concludes that the tax refund is in fact property for the purposes of the Act. He concludes at page 27 of Marzetti that:

> . . . Section 68 governs in this case as a complete code. Marzetti's post bankruptcy income tax refund retain its character as wages for the purposes of section 68. The trustee could access the refund only through section 68 application. None was made.

As a result, the income tax refund did not form part of the bankrupt's estate.

[16] In Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd. 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), (1997) 3 S.C.R.701, the Supreme Court dealt with a similar issue concerning a bankrupt who received an award of damages for wrongful dismissal. The Court reviewed the same section 68 of the Act that was reviewed in Marzetti. Iacobucci J. states at page 731.

> In the event that an employee is wrongfully dismissed, the measure of damages for wrongful dismissal is the salary that the employee would have earned had the employee worked during the period of notice to which he or she was entitled; Sylvester v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 353 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 315. The fact that this sum is awarded as damages at trial in no way alters the fundamental character of the money. An award of damages in a wrongful dismissal action is in reality the wages that the employer ought to have paid the employee either over the course of the period of reasonable notice or as pay in lieu of notice. Therefore, in accordance with the exception which is carved out in section 68(1) for, "salary, wages or other remuneration", this money is not divisible among the bankrupt's creditors and does not vest in the trustee. The right of action is the means of attaining these damages and is similarly exempt.
> In support of this finding, I note that several courts have interpreted the phrase "salary, wages or other remuneration" broadly. It has been held to include disability benefits (Re Ali (1987), 62 C.B.R. (N.S.) 64 (Ont. S.C.)), severance pay (Re Giroux (1983), 45 C.B.R. (N.S.) 245 (Ont. S.C.), and Re Greening (1989), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 24 (N.B.Q.B.)) and income tax refunds (Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765).

> Until alternative employment has been obtained, the wrongly dismissed employee will require funds to support him - or herself and his or her family. A damages award will satisfy this need, in essence, filling the pocket that would have otherwise been filled by salary or wages. If such an award is considered property divisible among a bankrupt's creditors that vests in the trustee, the bankrupt and his or her family may be deprived of essential income during a time of need. In my opinion, to remain true to the spirit of the Act, the words "salary, wages or other remuneration" in section 68(1) must include an award of damages for wrongful dismissal. .... To hold otherwise would run contrary to Parliament's intention to put the needs of family ahead of those of creditors.

[18] Section 68 was amended in 1997 effective 1998. The section now reads:

68(1) The Superintendent shall, by directive, establish in respect of the provinces or one or more bankruptcy districts or parts of bankruptcy districts, the standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

(2) For the purposes of this section,

(a)"total income" referred to in subsection (1) includes, notwithstanding paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source; and

(b)a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate of the bankrupt is enforceable against all property of the bankrupt, other than property referred to in paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1).

Trustee to fix amount to be paid

(3) The trustee shall

(a)having regard to the applicable standards established under subsection (1), and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt;

(b)inform the official receiver in writing of the amount fixed under paragraph (a); and

(c)take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay.

Modification by trustee

(4) The trustee may, at any time, amend an amount fixed under subsection (3) to take into account

(a)material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt; or

(b)a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5).

Creditor may request mediation

(7) On the request in writing of a creditor made within thirty days after the date of bankruptcy or an amendment referred to in subsection (4), the trustee shall, within the five days following the thirty day period, send to the official receiver a request in the prescribed form that the matter of the amount the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4) be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt and the creditor.

. . . . .

(10) Where

(a)the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5),

(b)the issue submitted to mediation requested under subsection (6) or (7) is not thereby resolved, or

(c)the bankrupt fails to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section, the trustee may, or on the request of the inspectors, any of the creditors or the official receiver shall, apply to the court for the hearing of the matter, and the court may, on the hearing, in accordance with the standards established under subsection (1) and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, by order, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt.

Application is a proceeding

(14) For the purposes of section 38, an application referred to in subsection (10) is deemed to be a proceeding for the benefit of the estate.

[19] The main thrust of the amendment was to do away with bankrupts being treated differently throughout Canada because of the different exemptions existing in different provinces relating to a bankrupt's wages and salary. The Superintendent now sets out directives to determine what amount is required for a bankrupt and the bankrupt's family over and above which a portion of the surplus income goes to the estate. However, the main thrust of the section has remained unchanged as Parliament continues to be concerned with the personal and family situation of the bankrupt in considering the amount to be paid to the estate. Also the section continues to allow the involvement of the Court to determine this amount where necessary. As it applies to this case, the section was not materially changed from the discussion of its predecessor in Marzetti and Wallace.

Analysis

[20] The decision in Bell classifying these funds as a capital asset would lead to a result inconsistent with the spirit and intent of the Act. When a person is discharged from bankruptcy they no longer have to contribute to the estate. It is clear that any future income earned is entirely that of the discharged bankrupt. The evidence is that this bankrupt can no longer work and has been compensated accordingly for funds she would have otherwise received in the future. The future income is not a capital asset.

[21] Were it necessary, I would follow the analysis in Lang over that of Bell and hold that both heads of damages in issue go to the bankrupt. However, I prefer to approach my decision based on the support of Wallace and Marzetti.

[22] Case law indicates why it was determined that there was a distinction between rights of action which recovered property damages as opposed to rights of action which recovered personal injury damages. In Rogers v. Spence, (1844) 13 M. NW. 571, 153 E.R. 239, Lord Denman C.J. stated:

> As the object of the law is manifestly to benefit creditors, by making all the pecuniary means and property of the bankrupt available to their payment, it has, in furtherance of this object, been construed largely, so to pass, not only what in strictness, may be called the property and debts of the bankrupt, but also those rights of action to which it was entitled for the purpose of recovering, in specie, real or personal property, or damages in respect of that which has been unlawfully diminished in value, withheld, or taken from him; but causes of action not falling within this description but arising out of a wrong personal to the bankrupt, for which he would be entitled to remedy whether his property were diminished or impaired or not, are clearly not within the letter, and have never been held to be within the spirit of the enactments, even in cases where injuries of this kind have been accompanied or followed by loss of property.

[23] The bankruptcy laws are not meant or intended to require payments by the bankrupt to the estate after the bankrupt's discharge. To require payment of any of the amount of future loss of wages to the estate would bring about this result. Accordingly, while the future loss amount may be property it is not property, "that may be acquired by or devolved on him before his discharge." (s. 67(1)(c)) And even if it could be said to have been acquired or devolved on him before discharge, it may be said that this constitutes personal damages because without the injury to the bankrupt through the motor vehicle accident there would be no entitlement to this head of damage under her action. Accordingly, no portion of the future loss of income is payable to the estate.

[24] Also, both past and future loss are "salary or wages" under s. 68 and are part of "total income" (s. 68(2)(a)). Even if it could be said that the creditor's position on this application constitutes a request under s. 68 for the bankrupt to pay the funds in issue to the estate, I would deny that application.

[25] With regard to the past loss of income the period of time during which the bankrupt was in bankruptcy was 19 months. Counsel are agreed that the estate would be entitled to surplus income over the amount of $1,600.00 per month net to the bankrupt. Counsel for the bankrupt has calculated the amount per month paid from past loss of income by dividing $22,500.00 by 53 being the number of months from the time of the accident to the time of the application before me which resulted in a monthly income of $424.53. In whatever way this amount is calculated, I am satisfied that the amount for this period would not leave any portion available as surplus income available to the estate. Accordingly for the 19 months in bankruptcy the bankrupt would receive a monthly income of $424.53 x 19.

[26] The question then arises as to the 34 months of income prior to the assignment in bankruptcy. The bankrupt's disability left her in dire financial straights. She could not work. Her house was foreclosed and she wasn't able to stay for the entire redemption period because she could not afford to pay the utilities. It is clear to me that if she had these funds for the 34 months prior to her assignment these funds would have been easily and properly expended. She was receiving $402.00 per month social assistance so if she received the additional $424.53 she would have received a total monthly net income of $826.53.

[27] However, there is a simpler way to approach this. The funds received were a lump sum for past loss of income and were received during the bankruptcy as income. The bankrupt was entitled to receive $1,600.00 per month with any additional funds constituting surplus income. As such the bankrupt is entitled to wages or salary during the period of bankruptcy of 19 months x $1,600.00 or $30,400.00 less the social assistance of $402 per month or $7,638. Therefore she is entitled to $30,400 less $7,638 or $22,762 which is more than she received for past loss of income.

[28] This finding is in keeping with the Wallace and Marzetti cases where the Supreme Court indicates that Parliament has demonstrated an overriding concern for the support of families before wages become divisible among creditors under section 68. In total the bankrupt will receive after contingency fees including general damages, $108,750 from the settlement. Hardly a windfall for a person who is unable to work.

[29] The bankrupt is granted an absolute discharge and is entitled to the funds in question. All parties will bear their own costs unless spoken to within the next 30 days.

WAKELING J.A.

This appeal raises the issue of what impact a discharge in bankruptcy has on professional fees contracted for prior to bankruptcy but paid after an absolute discharge has been obtained.

The facts, sufficient only to assess the problems that arise, are these. The appellant Pab C. Chetty (Chetty) practised law in Saskatoon and incurred several debts including a substantial debt to the Royal Bank for which he gave a general security interest on his assets and an assignment of his accounts receivable. Both were dated June 30, 1987 and registered under The Personal Property Security Act, S.S. 1979-80, c. P-6.1 ("PPSA"). The burden of his debts became so great that on May 12, 1992 Chetty made an assignment in bankruptcy and subsequently received an absolute discharge on March 8, 1993.

In 1990 Chetty had been retained by the Ray family to pursue a damage claim resulting from injuries suffered by the members of the family in an automobile accident. Chetty entered into a contingency agreement with respect to the claims of the three adult members of the Ray family. It subsequently became apparent that a conflict of interest had arisen between the adults and the children consequent upon a seatbelt issue and in November of 1990 Chetty made arrangements to have another solicitor, Dennis Quon, represent the interests of the children. A contingency agreement establishing Quon's fees was entered into between him and the infant plaintiffs. Chetty and Quon then entered into a further agreement to split between them any fees generated on both the adult's and the children's claims. The particulars of these agreements are not of consequence so are not detailed in this judgment.

Chetty moved to carry on his practice in B.C. shortly after May 1992 when he made the assignment in bankruptcy. Nonetheless, Chetty continued in his efforts on behalf of the adult Rays and in particular arranged for and attended meetings regarding settlement. He failed to disclose to the trustee that he had ongoing files and in particular did not disclose the Ray claims he was working on. The trustee, without knowledge of the prospect that these or any other fees might be paid, supported Chetty's application for an absolute discharge which was obtained on March 8, 1993.

In June of 1993, efforts at settlement of the Ray family claims were rewarded by an agreement paying substantial damages to the adults and infants. Under the terms of the contingency agreements, Chetty became entitled to a fee of $125,299.79 and when the trustee became aware of it he demanded it be paid to him as trustee rather than to Chetty. As a result, Quon paid this sum to the trustee and it is currently held as an asset in the Chetty bankruptcy estate. Upon becoming aware of this payment, the Royal Bank made demand for payment of its' claim based upon its general security and assignment of bank debts.

The trustee was prepared to pay the Bank's claim but before that was accomplished Chetty brought a motion seeking payment to him of the funds held by the trustee alleging that the Bank's security did not attach this money. The matter came before a Queen's Bench Judge who on January 20, 1994 gave judgment indicating that these funds were not property within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S., 1985, c.B-3 (the Act) and further that the Bank had no interest in these funds under their security agreements. This decision has been appealed by both the Royal Bank and the Trustee and both appeals have been consolidated into this one appeal.

The issues which arise are these:

1. Did the contracts under which the contingency fees were paid constitute property within the meaning of the Act?
2. If they were, did the fact they were paid after the absolute discharge prevent them from being part of the bankruptcy estate?
3. If the fees were part of the bankruptcy estate, was the security of the Royal Bank effective after the absolute discharge of the bankrupt?

There were other related issues raised by the appellants but they fall to be addressed in a general way when dealing with the above issues.

The answers to these issues would seem to require a review of what the Act describes as "property" and the impact a discharge has on the use and control of this property by the trustee.

Property is defined in s. 2 of the Act in this way:

> "property" includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property.

This is a very broad description designed to catch every conceivable type of asset. Indeed, the general scheme of the Act is to include virtually all assets and then to exclude certain specific assets from distribution to the creditors as is provided in s. 67(1):

> 67 (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise
> (a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

Digitized by Google

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

but it shall comprise

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

The control of these assets is then vested in the trustee by virtue of s.71(2):

71(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

The chamber judge took the view that the contract to pay professional fees to the appellant was not property of the bankrupt within the meaning of the Act. He found the employment of a solicitor is a contract for personal services, different from other forms of employment in that it involves a selection of a solicitor for his or her personal skills and experience, it involves special aspects of confidentiality and calls for performance of services which could not be carried out by the trustee. Further, these fees were payable on a contingency basis so they might never be paid. Only when they were payable could the fees be described as property and this did not occur in this case until after Chetty had received his absolute discharge.

There is no doubt that there are authorities which support the chamber judge's conclusion that a contract for personal services is not property within the meaning of the Act. These include comments contained in cases such as: Stead Lumber Company Limited v. Lewis (1959-60), 37-38 C.B.R. 24; Re Szatmari (1974), 18 C.B.R. (N.S.) 309 (Ont. S.C.); Re Goldman (1982), 43 C.B.R. N.S. 30.

However, none of these cases contain an explanation of how a contract for personal services escapes inclusion in the definition of property which is so all inclusive under the Act that it is hard to conceive of an interest that has been left out. True, the definition does not specifically include a contract to pay professional fees, but surely that contract is caught up by a phrase such as "every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable". And if that phrase doesn't cover such a contract, then s. 67(1) seems to take up any slack when it includes "any property wherever situated" and "such powers . . . in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit." The definition of property is so complete you would expect that if a contract for personal services was intended to be excluded, you would find it mentioned in s.67(1) where the exclusions are specifically identified. The breadth of the definition of "property" in the Act has been recently commented upon by the Supreme Court of Canada in Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 7 W.W.R. 623 at 635 and 636.

There is no doubt the contacts are accurately described as contracts of personal service for it is accepted that the trustee could not act as counsel for the Rays in place of the bankrupt Chetty, but why is that a telling factor? Chetty could have sold and disposed of his interest in his files to another lawyer as ever so many lawyers on retiring have done for one reason or another. I see no reason why the trustee could not do the same thing. Nor does the fact some files might be profitable and others unprofitable make them any less an item of commerce. I expect a lawyer interested in purchasing the files of another lawyer such as Chetty would assess and value each file and in so doing would apply a discount factor relative to the prospect of the client continuing to engage the services of the purchasing lawyer. The purchaser of a file would also assess the prospect of a successful result in a contingency contract. When one knows that a lawyer's files have commercial value, it is hard to rationalize why any one of them taken singly does not constitute an item of property.

The most that can be said is that traditionally the exemption for personal service contracts seems to have received judicial recognition. However, as a consequence of this apparent lack of logical consistency in the recognition of the special exemption granted personal service contracts, it seems appropriate to investigate the foundation for this exemption to determine if it remains applicable.

A useful starting point involves a more detailed consideration of Stead Lumber Company Limited v. Lewis (supra) at p. 34 which was primarily relied upon by the chamber judge. The quotation included in his judgment is as follows:

Rights under contracts where the personal skill or conduct of the bankrupt forms a material part of the consideration, which the trustee cannot perform on behalf of the bankrupt do not pass. As regards those contracts which the trustee can perform, he may elect either to adopt or disclaim them (2 Halsbury's Laws of England 3rd ed. p. 427).

This quotation seems to place reliance upon the dependability of the old and established Halsbury's Laws of England (3d ed.) which had this to say on the subject of personal service contracts in vol. 2 at p. 427:

> Thus all rights under contracts which would pass as part of the bankrupt's personal estate to his personal representatives if he had died, pass to the trustee, but rights under contracts where the personal skill or conduct of the bankrupt forms a material part of the consideration (p), which the trustee cannot perform on behalf of the bankrupt, such as a contract to marry or to render personal services or to paint a picture or to write a book, do not pass (q).

The footnotes giving support for this statement include in Re Shine, Ex Parte Shine, [1982] 1 Q.B. 522 (C.A.) which related to payments made to a bankrupt actor for his services on the stage. It was acknowledged he could not be compelled to provide these services and obviously the trustee could not do so in his stead. However, the court held that when the actor did honour the contract the compensation he received, if not wages, was certainly income and subject to payment to the trustee for settlement of his debts.

Another footnote reference was Bailey v. Thurston & Co., Limited, [1903] 1 K.B. 137 (C.A.). This case dealt with a bankrupt architect who had commenced action on his own for breach of his employment contract without joining the trustee or getting the trustee's consent to conduct the action. The defendant contended the action could not be brought by the bankrupt, but only by his trustee and the trustee could not do so as he was not an architect and therefore no one was in a position to enforce the contract. All three judges on this appeal agreed that a contract of personal services such as this did not pass to the trustee on bankruptcy as he could not provide the professional services called for in the contract. However, each of them also concluded the fruits of the action taken by the bankrupt architect would pass to the trustee if he intervened to received them. Stirling L.J. said this at p. 145:

> Such a contract is incapable of assignment, and in my opinion it is impossible to hold that it would vest in the trustee on the bankruptcy occurring. Two cases—Emden v. Carte [17 Ch.D. 169, 768] and Wadling v. Oliphant [1 Q.B.D. 145] — were relied on to support the view that the plaintiff could not recover in this action; but they seem to me to decide no more than that the trustee may intervene and claim the damages which the plaintiff has recovered.

Cozens-Hardy L.J. had this to say on the subject at p. 146:

> If, however, at the date of the bankruptcy a sum of money is due in respect of services rendered under the contract, the trustee and not the bankrupt will take the money. But as to future services, the bankrupt can sue for his remuneration under the contract, subject only to the right of the trustee to intervene and claim the fruits of the litigation.

The most recent edition of Halsbury's (4th ed.) retains exactly the same comment relating to contracts for personal services as referred to above, but the footnote instead of referring to decided cases for its authority, indicates:

> An order with respect to salary or income under a contract for personal services may be made, as with any other income, under the Insolvency Act 1986 s 310: see para 437 et seq post. [footnote 4, p. 223]

I take it from the above, that the situation remains basically unchanged in that there are no new decisions on the point, but the 1986 Insolvency Act in England has made it clear that earnings from personal services contracts are subject to an order for payment to the trustee in just the same way as any other earnings.

I return to the Canadian cases referred to by the chamber judge. The Stead Lumber case of 1957 referred to earlier involves a rather vague and uncertain building contract which the bankrupt completed and thereby avoided a complication the trustee did not wish to be involved in. The trial judge so stated at p. 35:

> I consider that in fact there was not an abandonment of the contract but that there was a variation thereof as a result of the bankruptcy, which prevented Kelland from carrying on business. The trustee's assent was given to his finishing this work on a basis that would permit him to retain his earnings and would save the trustee from involving the estate in any liability.

The case therefore adds little if anything to the law as set forth in Halsbury's which is quoted in the judgment.

R. v. Szatmari considered the issue of personal service contracts in the context of fees earned by a psychiatrist after his assignment in bankruptcy. Houlden J. concluded there was a difference in law between wage earnings and fees for professional services. He concluded the fees did not accrue to the trustee and he had this to say at p. 312:

> As I pointed out in Re Rasky (1971), 14 C.B.R. (N.S.) 296 (Ont.), I can see no reason why the earnings of a self-employed professional man should not be capable of being attached by a trustee as is the case in respect of a wage earner; however, this is not the law.

The issue was again considered in Re Goldman which dealt with legal fees earned after an assignment in bankruptcy and a claim by the Royal Bank to such funds under an assignment of accounts receivable which the case dealt more with the right of the Royal Bank, a secured creditor, to appear on an application for the discharge of the bankrupt than it does with a personal service contract, it does accept and affirm Szatmari. Henry J. had this to say at 32:

> In the present case, apart from all other general considerations, the income that the bankrupt earns from his professional services rendered after the date of the bankruptcy, according to the jurisprudence, is not > after-acquired property to which the trustee is entitled; see in this respect Re Rasky (1969), 13 C.B.R. (N.S.) 199 (Ont. S.C.), and Re Szatmari, [1972] 2 O.R. 348, 18 C.B.R. (N.S.) 309, 25 D.L.R. (3d) 508 (S.C.). As Houlden J. (as he then was) clearly indicated in the Szatmari case that proposition, notwithstanding any other reading of ss. 147 and 148 of the Bankruptcy Act, is the law.

To this point, I have referred only to those cases relied upon by the chamber judge, but I would also like to go one step further to consider the more recent decision of Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., reflex, (1993) 82 Man. R. (2nd) 253 (Man. Q.B.). In that case, Lockwood J. at p. 263 included in his judgment the following quotation from Bailey v. Thurston & Co. [1903] 1 K.B. 137:

> It has been established for many years that, notwithstanding the generality of the language used in the Bankruptcy Acts, there are some contracts and some rights that do not vest in the trustee. For the present purpose it is sufficient to mention contracts for purely personal service. Such unexecuted contracts are not assignable by deed, and they are not, by virtue of the statute, vested in the trustee. If, however, at the date of the bankruptcy a sum of money is due in respect of services rendered under the contract, the trustee and not the bankrupt will take the money. But as to future services, the bankrupt can sue for his remuneration under the contract, subject only to the right of the trustee to intervene and claim the fruits of the litigation. It is clear that the plaintiff's contract of service did not pass to the trustee. The plaintiff continued to act as traveller for the defendants after the bankruptcy . . ."

And then went on to say:

> [55] UGG submits that Bailey has not been followed anywhere in Canada, although no cases directly on point were cited. It is true that there is no mention of Bailey in Houlden.

After further consideration of Bailey and the other cases, he then concluded that the definition of property was now more extensive than in former acts and therefore a contract for personal services was property which vested in the trustee and the consent of the trustee was required to enable the bankrupt to sue for recovery under such a contract.

What seems to me to result from a review of the cases relating to personal service contracts, is that there has developed a general misconception that they are not property of the bankrupt because they are incapable of assignment. It is obvious these contracts cannot be enforced by a trustee who cannot for example, paint the picture or provide the architectural services the contract calls for, but that does not equate to the contract being exempt property. If the bankrupt artist paints the picture or the bankrupt architect performs the architectural service, then the amount received for such services is the property of the trustee to be held for the benefit of the creditors. The general misconception that there was a complete exemption for personal service contracts apparently originated with the way the subject was dealt with in Halsbury's, which stated that a contract for personal services doesn't pass to the trustee, rather than stating that it cannot be enforced by the trustee. The cases referred to in the footnote in Halsbury's, make it clear that the unexecuted personal service contract was the property of the bankrupt and was not enforceable by the trustee for the very practical reason that he did not possess the skill contracted for. However, once executed, the benefit of the contract which resulted from the actions of the bankrupt passed to the trustee.

Perhaps there is no need to put too fine a point on these matters, for if one wishes to retain the notion a personal services contract can't be property if it is not a contract the trustee can perform, then it matters little so long as it becomes property subject to the claim of the trustee when the contract has been performed by the bankrupt. The net result is the same no matter what route is travelled to reach it.

This misunderstanding of what property passed to the trustee seems to have carried through to fees paid to professionals. Because it is a contract of personal service, it somehow escaped passing to the trustee while wages did not. That has apparently now been clarified by legislation in England (see the footnote in Halsbury's 4th ed. referred to earlier) and in this country by the recent Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Section 68.(1) provides as follows:

> . . .
> (b) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive from a person any money as payment for or commission in respect of, any services performed by the bankrupt,
> the trustee may, on the trustee's own initiative or, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall, make an application to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the money as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

The authors of Houlden and Morawetz at p. 192 in their text Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act 1994 confirm that now professional earnings are to be treated no differently than other wages as a result of this amendment:

> Section 68(1)(b) greatly extends this scope of the section. Under the former s. 68 if a bankrupt was self-employed, such as a dentist, no order could be made under s. 68. Now an order can be made attaching such earnings. [p. 192, ss. 69-69.5]

Digitized by Google

I mention the amendments not to indicate my conclusions are dependent upon them, but to show fees and wages are now on a parity not previously recognized.

The net result, as I perceive it, is that contracts of personal service are property of the bankrupt, but they are not contracts which the trustee can take advantage of, and as such differ in this respect from other contracts. The trustee cannot compel the bankrupt to perform the contract, but if the contract is performed, then the benefits accrue to the trustee and in any event the trustee may elect to intervene as he may do with any after-acquired property, and in such case the fruits of the contract form part of the bankrupt's estate.

In this case, the relevant dates are as follows, the contracts between Chetty and the Rays were entered into in February of 1990, the further contract with Quon was entered into in December of 1990, the assignment in bankruptcy was made in May 1992, the bankrupt received a discharge on March 8, 1993, the settlement of the action which created the fees was made in June of 1993 and the trustee intervened to claim the fees which were received by Chetty in November 1993.

Certain conclusions are readily apparent from this synopsis of the facts: (1) the contracts for personal services were in existence before the date of the bankruptcy; (2) these agreements were executory contracts, the benefit of which would normally pass to the trustee; (3) the trustee could not avail himself of the benefit of the personal service contracts; (4) if Chetty performed them, the trustee was entitled to the benefits or at the very least to lay claim to the benefits the bankrupt would receive. Thus, the fees in question were, subject to considering the effect of the discharge of the bankrupt Chetty, properly payable to the trustee as part of the bankrupt's estate.

This leaves for consideration the effect of the absolute discharge which was granted before the fees became payable. Chetty alleges this discharge freed him from any further responsibility for payment of the bankruptcy debts. This is not the general scheme established by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the trustee continues to be responsible for the administration of the estate until all assets, including after-acquired property, are appropriately made available for the benefit of a bankrupt's creditors.

There is not a definition of after acquired property in the Act but I doubt whether this payment is properly so categorized. The money was received after Chetty had made his assignment but it arose from the performance of a contract entered into before the assignment. There is nothing to be gained by analyzing this issue as no matter how it is categorized it is subject to being claimed by the trustee as was the case here.

The next issue is whether the security held by the Royal Bank was invalidated by Chetty's absolute discharge. This Court in Andrew v. Farmstart, 1988 CanLII 217 (SK CA), [1989] 2 W.W.R. 127, made it clear that an absolute discharge in bankruptcy does not prevent a secured creditor from pursuing its security. Sherstobitoff J.A. at pp. 141 and 142 had this to say:

> The appellant also argued that the discharge of the appellant as a bankrupt extinguished his debt to the respondent by reason of s.148(2) [now s.178(2)] of the Act, which says that an order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy (subject to certain exceptions which do not concern us). Such an argument was dealt with in Pelyea at p. 388:
> > As to the respondent's first submission, what is extinguished by s.135(2) [now s.148(2)] of the Bankruptcy Act in the case of a secured creditor is the debt owing by the debtor at the time of the bankruptcy, not the security which was validly in existence at the date of the bankruptcy. It remains a valid security that the creditor is entitled to realize on or have valued pursuant to the provisions of ss. 40(2), 86 and 87 [now s.49(2), 98 and 99] of the Act, and the debt owing by the bankrupt, in so far as s.135(2) is concerned, is the balance remaining of the original debt after the security has been realized and applied on account or valued.
> See also Boe v. Boe, reflex, [1988] 6 W.W.R 122, 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 38 (Sask. Q.B.); Pisiak v. Dyck (1986), 63 C.B.R. (N.S.) 151, 32 D.L.R.) (4th) 287, 56 Sask. R. 107 (sub nom. Pisiak v. Dyck (Bankrupt)) (Q.B.); and C.I.B.C. v. Woodgrove Hills Dev. Ltd. (1982), 43 C.B.R. (N.S) 239 (Ont. H.C.). A secured creditor may realize upon his security after discharge of the bankrupt.

In summary, the contingency fee agreements with the Rays and Quon represented property of Chetty when he made an assignment in bankruptcy. The payment of the fees due under these agreements, though made after an absolute discharge had been granted to Chetty, was nonetheless part of the bankruptcy estate available for distribution. Finally, the Royal Bank is entitled to enforce its security agreement against this asset of the bankrupt.

The appeal therefore succeeds. The order of the chamber judge is set aside and an order shall go in the above terms. The appellants will each have costs of the appeal on double Column V.

DATED at the City of Regina in the Province of Saskatchewan this 4th day of January 1995.

on appeal from the court of appeal for nova scotia court of appeal

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Property — Commercial fishing licences — Fisher signing general security agreement with bank — Fisher subsequently making assignment in bankruptcy — Whether fisher's commercial fishing licences constitute "property" within scope of bankruptcy and insolvency legislation and within scope of personal property security legislation — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 2 "property" — Personal Property Security Act, S.N.S. 1995-96, c. 13, s. 2(w), (ad).

S holds four fishing licences. In order to finance his fishing business, he signed a General Security Agreement ("GSA") with a bank, as well as a guarantee for the debts of his company. The company entered into a parallel GSA. The GSAs gave the bank a security interest in "all . . . present and after acquired personal property including . . . Intangibles . . . and in all proceeds and renewals thereof". In 2004, the fishing business faltered and S made an assignment in bankruptcy. The following year, the receiver and the trustee in bankruptcy signed an agreement to sell the four licences and other assets to a third party for $630,000, but S refused to sign the necessary documents. The trustee in bankruptcy and the bank brought an application for declaratory relief. S claimed that the commercial fishing licences did not constitute "property" available to a trustee under the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"), or to a creditor who has registered a GSA under the Nova Scotia Personal Property Security Act ("PPSA"). For different reasons, both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal rejected this position.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The task in this case is to interpret the definitions of "property" in s. 2 of the BIA and of "personal property" in s. 2 of the PPSA in a purposeful way having regard to their entire context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament. A fishing licence is unquestionably a major commercial asset. The holder of such a licence, issued at the discretion of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans under s. 7(1) of the Fisheries Act, obtains a good deal more than merely permission to do that which would otherwise be unlawful. A s. 7(1) licence confers to the holder a right to engage in an exclusive fishery under the conditions imposed by the licence, and a proprietary right in the fish harvested and the earnings from their sale. The subject matter of the licence, coupled with a proprietary interest in the fish caught pursuant to its terms, bears a reasonable analogy to a common law profit à prendre which is undeniably a property right. While these elements of the licence do not wholly correspond to the full range of rights necessary to characterize something as "property" at common law, the issue is whether they are sufficient to qualify the "bundle of rights" conferred on S as property for the purposes of the BIA and PPSA. [16] [23] [28] [34] [43]

In an industry where holding one of a very restricted number of licences is a condition precedent to participation, the licence unlocks the value in the fishers' other marine assets. While "commercial realities" cannot legitimate wishful thinking about the notion of "property" in the BIA and the PPSA, these statutes are largely commercial instruments which should be interpreted in a way best suited to enable them to accomplish their respective commercial purposes. [14] [42]

The BIA is intended to achieve certain objectives in the event of a bankruptcy which require, in general, that non-exempt assets be made available to creditors. The s. 2 definition of "property" in the BIA should be construed accordingly to include a s. 7(1) licence. Parliament unambiguously signalled an intention to sweep up a variety of assets of the bankrupt not normally considered "property" at common law, and this intention must be respected if the purposes of the BIA are to be achieved. It is important to look at the substance of what is conferred, namely a licence to participate in the fishery coupled with a proprietary interest in the fish caught according to its terms and subject to the Minister's regulations. While it is true that the proprietary interest in the fish is contingent on the fish first being caught, the existence of that contingency is contemplated in the BIA definition and is no more fatal to the licence's proprietary status for BIA purposes than is the case with an equivalent contingency arising under a profit à prendre. It follows that the trustee was entitled to require S to execute the appropriate documentation to obtain a transfer of the fishing licences to the third party purchaser. [44] [46-47] [49]

A holding that a fishing licence is property in the hands of the holder for limited statutory purposes does not fetter the Minister's discretion under the Fisheries Act to issue, renew or cancel a fishing licence, according to the exigencies of the management of the fisheries. [48]

The fishing licence is also "personal property" within the meaning of s. 2 of the PPSA. The definition of "intangible" in that section includes an interest created by statute having the characteristics of a licence coupled with an interest at common law. The grant by the Minister of a licence, coupled with a proprietary interest in the fish caught, is thus sufficient to satisfy the PPSA definition. The registration is therefore valid to include the s. 7(1) licence and, in the absence of any other PPSA defence, the bank is entitled to proceed with its PPSA remedies. [51-52]

[1] BINNIE J. — The question raised by this appeal is whether a commercial fishing licence, which enables a fisher to engage in a regulated industry where participation is otherwise prohibited, constitutes "property" available to a trustee under the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), or a creditor who has registered a General Security Agreement ("GSA") under the Nova Scotia Personal Property Security Act, S.N.S. 1995-96, c. 13 ("PPSA").

[2] The appellant, a bankrupt commercial fisherman, and his wholly owned company, the appellant Bingo Queen Fisheries Limited, say that a fishing licence is merely a "privilege" to do that which would otherwise be illegal. As such, it does not pass to the respondent Royal Bank under the GSA which the appellants signed, nor to the respondent trustee in bankruptcy. In the result, they say, the appellant Saulnier, who holds the four fishing licences in question, is entitled to carry on fishing despite the bankruptcy, leaving the creditors to fight over the remaining assets. Without the licences the assets do not come close to covering the liabilities.

[3] The appellants were unsuccessful in the courts of Nova Scotia. The trial judge based his decision on "commercial reality". The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal agreed in the result but declined to base its decision on "commercial reality". Instead it looked to the rights acquired by the holder of a fishing licence to the earnings from the catch, and to the administrative law principles which the court felt would govern the exercise of the Minister's discretion in any application for renewal or transfer of the licence under the federal Fishery (General) Regulations, SOR/93-53 ("Regulations"). Collectively, in its opinion, the components of this "bundle of rights" invested the licence holder with property-like rights sufficient to bring the licences within the bankruptcy regime and the PPSA.

[4] For different reasons, and on a more limited basis, I also agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

I. Facts

[5] The appellant Saulnier holds four fishing licences (lobster, herring, swordfish and mackerel). Like most fishers, he required loans to finance his business. Accordingly, in April 1999, he signed a GSA with the Royal Bank. In January 2003, he signed a guarantee (limited to $215,000) to the Royal Bank for the debts of the appellant Bingo Queen, a company of which he was the sole owner. At that time, Bingo Queen also entered into a GSA. The standard form GSA gave the Bank a security interest in: "all . . . present and after acquired personal property including . . . Intangibles . . . and in all proceeds and renewals thereof". The GSA also specified that the term "intangible" would be interpreted according to its definition in the PPSA. The GSA contemplated a listing of specific property in Schedule C but in the case of both GSAs in question Schedule C was left blank.

[6] In 2004, the appellants' fishing business faltered. As of July 6, Mr. Saulnier owed the Bank $120,449, and Bingo Queen owed $177,282. On July 8, Saulnier made an assignment in bankruptcy. His Statement of Affairs under the BIA showed liabilities of $400,330, of which about $250,000 was owed to the Royal Bank. The trial judge found that according to the evidence, Saulnier's four fishing licences had a market value in excess of $600,000. This amount, if available to creditors, would be sufficient to discharge all debts and provide a surplus.

[7] On November 18, 2004, four months after the bankruptcy, Saulnier purported to lease his lobster licence to Horizon Fisheries Limited, whose principal owner was his common law spouse. In March 2005, the receiver and the trustee in bankruptcy signed an agreement to sell Saulnier's fishing licences and other assets to a third party for $630,000 (the sale was conditional on the trustee being able to effect a transfer of the licences). Saulnier refused to sign the necessary documents. The trustee in bankruptcy and the Royal Bank brought the present application for declaratory relief.

III. Judicial History

A. Supreme Court of Nova Scotia 2006 NSSC 34 (CanLII), (2006), 241 N.S.R. (2d) 96, 2006 NSSC 34

[9] Kennedy C.J.S.C. found that "the fair and correct approach is to characterize the federal fishing licences based on the reality of the commercial arena" (para. 49). He added that "[t]o accept the argument . . . that there can be no property in these licences in the hands of the holder, because of ministerial control would . . . foster an unrealistic legal condition based on an historic definition of property that ignores what is actually happening in the commercial world that the law must serve" (para. 53). In his view, the bundle of rights conferred by the licences "constitute marketable property capable of providing security" (para. 54) and also "property for purposes of the BIA" (para. 57).

B. Nova Scotia Court of Appeal (Bateman, Hamilton and Fichaud JJ.A.) 2006 NSCA 91 (CanLII), (2006), 246 N.S.R. (2d) 239, 2006 NSCA 91

[10] Fichaud J.A., writing for the court, found that while commercial reality and the market value attached to licences "may be a determinant in the accounting or appraisal contexts" (para. 17), the legal issue should be determined with reference to the definitions of "property" and "personal property" in the BIA and the PPSA.

[11] Based on his consideration of ss. 2 and 16(1) of the Regulations, he concluded that the licence itself is the property of the Crown, and not of the holder. However, "during the term of a license, a licensee has a beneficial interest in the earnings from use of the license. That interest, and the right to those earnings, pass to the trustee in bankruptcy of the license holder" (para. 38). An important issue, in his view, was whether Mr. Saulnier had any rights relating to the renewal or reissuance of his licences, and whether these rights pass to the trustee. He considered it important that the holder of a fishing licence not only had the right to request a renewal but a right not to be arbitrarily denied it. In these circumstances

> [t]he license holder has a legally recognized right — limited though it may be — that constitutes intangible personal property. . . . The security holder or trustee in bankruptcy takes the license holder's limited legal right or beneficial interest. The security holder or trustee takes [it] subject to all the risks of non-renewal that applied to the license holder — i.e. non-renewal on grounds that are not arbitrary. This ensures that the interest of the security holder or trustee in bankruptcy does not degrade the regulatory scheme of the [fisheries] legislation . . . . [para. 49]

[12] Fichaud J.A. cited cases in which bad-faith ministerial decisions had given rise to damages or had been judicially reviewed by the courts including St. Anthony Seafoods Limited Partnership v. Newfoundland and Labrador (Minister of Fisheries and Aquaculture) (2004), 245 D.L.R. (4th) 597, 2004 NLCA 59. On the strength of these decisions, he found that "[a] legal right to damages or to set aside a ministerial decision is, in my view, intangible personal property under the broad definition in s. 2 of the BIA" (para. 52). Moreover, while "[t]he PPSA's framework to define 'intangible' is less substantial than in the BIA", the result concerning the fishing licences is the same (para. 61). The holder's rights in the fishing licences are also personal property ("intangibles") for the purposes of the PPSA, in his view.

IV. Analysis

[13] A commercial fisher with a ramshackle boat and a licence to fish is much better off financially than a fisher with a great boat tied up at the wharf with no licence. Financial institutions looking for readily marketable loan collateral want to snap up licences issued under the federal Regulations, which in the case of the lobster fishery can have a dockside value that fluctuates up to a half a million dollars or more. Fishers want to offer as much collateral as they can to obtain the loans needed to acquire the equipment to enable them to put to sea.

[14] The Minister's claim to more or less unfettered discretion to renew or not to renew fishing licences each year is based on the legislation as interpreted in Comeau's Sea Foods Ltd. v. Canada (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans), 1997 CanLII 399 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 12. In that case, Major J. wrote for the Court:

> Canada's fisheries are a "common property resource", belonging to all the people of Canada. Under the Fisheries Act, it is the Minister's duty to manage, conserve and develop the fishery on behalf of Canadians in the public interest (s. 43). Licensing is a tool in the arsenal of powers available to the Minister under the Fisheries Act to manage fisheries. [para. 37]

Nevertheless, the fact is that the stability of the fishing industry depends on the Minister's predictable renewal of such licences year after year. Few fishers expect to see their loans paid off with the proceeds of a single year's catch. In an industry where holding one of a very restricted number of licences is a condition precedent to participation, the licence unlocks the value in the fishers' other marine assets.

Digitized by Google

[15] Yet the appellants are correct to say that just because a "right" or "power" to fish has commercial value, it does not follow that licences also constitute property within the scope of the BIA or PPSA. Earlier trial level decisions in Nova Scotia had held that fishing licences were not property and were not claimable by the trustee in bankruptcy. See e.g. Jenkins, Re 1997 CanLII 808 (NS SC), (1997), 32 C.B.R. (4th) 262 (N.S.S.C.), and Townsend, Re 2002 CanLII 37699 (NS SC), (2002), 32 C.B.R. (4th) 318 (N.S.S.C.). We cannot wish away the statutory language, however, much practical sense is reflected in the result reached by the courts below.

A. A Question of Statutory Interpretation

[16] The questions before the Court essentially raise a dispute about statutory interpretation. We are not concerned with the concept of "property" in the abstract. The notion of "property" is, in any event, a term of some elasticity that takes its meaning from the context. The task is to interpret the definitions in the BIA and PPSA in a purposeful way having regard to "their entire context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (R. Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (4th ed. 2002), at p. 1). Because a fishing licence may not qualify as "property" for the general purposes of the common law does not mean that it is also excluded from the reach of the statutes. For particular purposes Parliament can and does create its own lexicon.

[17] In determining the scope of the definition of "property" in a statutory context, it is necessary to have regard to the overall purpose of the BIA, which is to regulate the orderly administration of the bankrupt's affairs, keeping a balance between the rights of creditors and the desirability of giving the bankrupt a clean break: Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, at para. 7. The exemption of designated property from distribution among creditors under s. 67(1) is to allow the bankrupt to continue a living pending discharge and, when discharged, to make a fresh start. Those exemptions do not, it seems to me, bear much similarity to the proposed "exempting" of a valuable asset such as a commercial fishing licence. If Saulnier had "sold" his licences prior to discharge the cash proceeds would, it seems, be after-acquired property that would be divided amongst his creditors under s. 67(1)(c) of the BIA.

> "property" means any type of property, whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, as well as obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;

[19] The PPSA, on the other hand, is designed to facilitate the creation of a security interest to enable holders of personal property to use it as collateral, and to enable lenders to predict accurately the priority of their claims against the assets in question.

> Proceeding from the premise that all security agreements are designed to accomplish the same end and that borrowers usually have little bargaining power, the PPSA prescribes a detailed system for the regulation of default rights and remedies which is designed to provide consistency and fairness in the enforcement of security interests.
> (J. S. Ziegel, B. Geva and R. C. C. Cuming, Commercial and Consumer Transactions: Cases, Text and Materials (3rd ed. 1995), vol. III, at p. 18)

To the same effect see C.I.B.C. v. Marathon Realty Co., reflex, [1987] 5 W.W.R. 236 (Sask. C.A.), at p. 247, and Credit Suisse Canada v. 1133 Yonge Street Holdings Ltd. 1998 CanLII 6857 (ON CA), (1998), 41 O.R. (3d) 632 (C.A.).

[20] Within that overall purpose, an interpretation must be given to the somewhat circular definitions given in s. 2 of the PPSA:

> (w) "intangible" means personal property that is not goods, a document of title, chattel paper, a security, an instrument or money;
> . . .
> (ad) "personal property" means goods, a document of title, chattel paper, a security, an instrument, money or an intangible;

[21] Of course a creditor/lender who enters into a security agreement that is not registerable under the PPSA may still have contractual rights against the borrower. However, the objective of lenders is to achieve priority (or to know in advance what priority they can achieve) over other claimants. Otherwise a miscreant could enter into a series of unregistered financing agreements purporting to use and re-use the same boat and licence as collateral.

B. The Interest Conferred by a Fishing Licence

[22] The fishery is a public resource. The fishing licence permits the holder to participate for a limited time in its exploitation. The fish, once caught, become the property of the holder. Accordingly, the fishing licence is more than a

"mere licence" to do that which is otherwise illegal. It is a licence coupled with a proprietary interest in the harvest from the fishing effort contingent, of course, on first catching it.

[23] It is extremely doubtful that a simple licence could itself be considered property at common law. See generally A. M. Honoré, "Ownership", in A. G. Guest, ed., Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (1961). On the other hand, if not property in the common law sense, a fishing licence is unquestionably a major commercial asset.

[24] Successive Ministers of Fisheries have issued policies underscoring their support for stability in the fishing industry, which necessitates continuity in the ranks of licence holders. Despite a policy favouring stability and continuity, the Minister's Commercial Fisheries Licensing Policy for Eastern Canada, 1996 seeks to guard against any notion that such licences should be read as conferring a property interest on licence holders, which could possibly impose a fetter on the exercise of the Minister's "absolute discretion" in their issuance. Thus s. 5(a) of the Licensing Policy states:

> A "licence" grants permission to do something which, without such permission, would be prohibited. As such, a licence confers no property or other rights which can be legally sold, bartered or bequeathed. Essentially, it is a privilege to do something, subject to the terms and conditions of the licence.

The Minister's statement of policy expresses a departmental position that has no regulatory status and which, in the eye of the law, does not add to or subtract from his "absolute discretion" under s. 7(1) of the Fisheries Act to issue licences. Nor does this informal policy determine whether the licence can be construed as "property" for the purposes of the BIA and PPSA. The reality, as found by the courts below, is that the commercial market operates justifiably on the assumption that licences can be transferred on application to the Minister with the consent of the existing licence holder, that licences will be renewed from year to year, and that the Minister's policy will not be changed to the detriment of the existing licence holders. Thus, despite the Minister's protestations, the market attributes a high market value to what might otherwise be seen, as some of the cases put it, as a "transitory and ephemeral" right.

[25] The jurisprudence indicates a number of different approaches.

(i) The Traditional "Property" Approach

[26] The appellants rely on the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re National Trust Co. and Bouckhuyt reflex, (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 640. In that case, the court dismissed the trust company's claim that a valuable tobacco quota listed in a chattel mortgage could properly be made the subject of Ontario PPSA registration. Cory J.A., as he then was, referred to some traditional indicia of rights of property and concluded that renewal of the tobacco quota year to year was subject to the "unfettered discretion of the [Tobacco B]oard" and that the quota itself was "transitory and ephemeral" (pp. 647-48). Accordingly, the quota did "not constitute intangible personal property as that term is utilized" in the Ontario PPSA (p. 649). The Quebec Court of Appeal reached a similar conclusion under the BIA in relation to a fishing licence in Noël (Syndic) (Re), [1994] Q.J. No. 978 (QL).

[27] The Bouckhuyt approach has been followed in some of the Ontario PPSA cases; see e.g. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Hallahan reflex, (1990), 69 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (Ont. C.A.), and Bank of Montreal v. Bale (1992), 4 P.P.S.A.C. (2d) 114 (Ont. C.A.), but it has been criticized as insufficiently sensitive to the particular context of personal property security legislation, which (so the critics say) commands a broader concept of intangible property if the purposes of that legislation are to be achieved. See e.g. J. S. Ziegel and D. L. Denomme, The Ontario Personal Property Security Act: Commentary and Analysis (1994), at pp. 41-42. As discussed below, more recent cases have tended to restrict Bouckhuyt to its facts. Even in the "regulatory cases" the courts now adopt a more purposeful approach to the definitions in the BIA and in personal property security legislation, and consider traditional common law notions of property as less of a stumbling block to recognition of licences and quotas as "property" for statutory purposes. I agree with this evolution.

[28] In any event, there is a significant difference between a quota (as in Bouckhuyt) and a fishing licence, which bears some analogy to a common law profit à prendre which is undeniably a property right. A profit à prendre enables the holder to enter onto the land of another to extract some part of the natural produce, such as crops or game birds (B. Ziff, Principles of Property Law (2nd ed. 1996), at pp. 333-34; The Queen in Right of British Columbia v. Tener, 1985 CanLII 76 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 533; M. J. Mossman and W. F. Flanagan, Property Law: Cases and Commentary (2nd ed. 2004), at p. 545). Equally, a "profit of piscary" (being a type of profit à prendre) is recognized as a property right to fish in the privately owned waters of another.

[29] Fichaud J.A. in the court below noted numerous cases where it was held that "during the term of a license the license holder has a beneficial interest to the earnings from his license" (para. 37). See also: Waryk v. Bank of Montreal 1991 CanLII 945 (BC CA), (1991), 85 D.L.R. (4th) 514 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 521-24; British Columbia Packers Ltd. v. Sparrow, 1989 CanLII 2706 (BC CA), [1989] 4 C.N.L.R. 63 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 68; Buston v. Canada, reflex, [1993] 2 C.T.C. 2720 (T.C.C.), at pp. 2733-34. This is another way of expressing substantially the same idea. The earnings flow from the catch which is lawfully reduced to possession at the time of the catch, as is the case with a profit à prendre.

[30] Some analytical comfort may be drawn in this connection from the observations of R. Megarry and H. W. R. Wade on The Law of Real Property (4th ed. 1975), at p. 779:

> A licence may be coupled with some proprietary interest in other property. Thus the right to enter another man's land to hunt and take away the deer killed, or to enter and cut down a tree and take it away, involves two things, namely, a licence to enter the land and the grant of an interest (a profit à prendre) in the deer or tree.

And at p. 822:

> A right to "hawk, hunt, fish and fowl" may thus exist as a profit, for this gives the right to take creatures living on the soil which, when killed, are capable of being owned.

(See also Kelly v. Kelly (1990), 92 A.L.R. 74 (H.C.); Pennington v. McGovern (1987), 45 S.A.S.R. 27 (S.C.).)

[31] The analogy of a commercial fishing licence to the profit à prendre has already been noted by the High Court of Australia in Harper v. Minister for Sea Fisheries (1989), 168 C.L.R. 314. In that case a challenge was made to the authority of the Tasmanian government to issue a licence to fish for abalone, inter alia, in the Australian fishing zone beyond the coastal waters of the state of Tasmania. The facts are far removed from our case, as is the relevant statutory regime, yet of interest are the observations of Brennan J. with whom Dawson, Toohey and McHugh JJ. concurred:

> A fee paid to obtain such a privilege is analogous to the price of a profit à prendre; it is a charge for the acquisition of a right akin to property. Such a fee may be distinguished from a fee exacted for a licence merely to do some act which is otherwise prohibited (for example, a fee for a licence to sell liquor) where there is no resource to which a right of access is obtained by payment of the fee. [p. 335]

[32] The concurring judgment of Mason C.J., Deane and Gaudron JJ. pointed out that notwithstanding its resemblance in some respects to a profit à prendre, the fishing licence is nevertheless a statutory creation:

> What was formerly in the public domain is converted into the exclusive but controlled preserve of those who hold licences. The right of commercial exploitation of a public resource for personal profit has become a privilege confined to those who hold commercial licences. This privilege can be compared to a profit à prendre. In truth, however, it is an entitlement of a new kind created as part of a system for preserving a limited public natural resource . . . . [p. 325]

[33] In my view these observations are helpful. A fishing licence is, no doubt, a creature of the Fisheries Act and its Regulations. Our Court has already emphasized the broad scope and discretion of the Minister in relation to such licences in Comeau's Sea Foods. Nevertheless, there are important points of analogy between the fishing licences issued to the appellant Saulnier and the form of common law property called a profit à prendre, which may include a profit of piscary. If the question were whether a fishing licence is a profit à prendre, the answer would almost certainly be no. But that is not the question. The question before us is whether the fishing licences thus conceived can satisfy the statutory definition of the BIA and PPSA, purposefully interpreted.

[34] My point is simply that the subject matter of the licence (i.e. the right to participate in a fishery that is exclusive to licence holders) coupled with a proprietary interest in the fish caught pursuant to its terms, bears a reasonable analogy to rights traditionally considered at common law to be proprietary in nature. It is thus reasonably within the contemplation of the definition of "property" in s. 2 of the BIA, where reference is made to a "profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property". In this connection the property in question is the fish harvest.

[35] Of course, the holder's rights under a fishing licence are limited in time, place and the manner of their exercise by the Fisheries Act and Regulations. To say that the fishing licence is coupled with a proprietary interest does not encumber the Minister's discretion with proprietary fetters. The analogy used for present purposes does not prevail over the legislation. The licence is no more and no less than is described in the relevant legislation. Nevertheless, during its lifetime, however fragile, the fishing licence clearly confers something more than a "mere" permission to do something which is otherwise illegal.

(ii) The Regulatory Approach

[36] Bouckhuyt resulted in a line of cases in which licences and quotas were held to be intangible property (or not) according to the degree of renewal discretion vested in the issuing authority. In Sugarman (in trust) v. Duca Community Credit Union Ltd. 1999 CanLII 800 (ON CA), (1999), 44 O.R. (3d) 257 (C.A.), the court distinguished Bouckhuyt on the basis that the authority issuing nursing home licences was bound to grant licences to operators that qualified, with little discretion to refuse, and an administrative appeal procedure in the event issuance or renewal was refused. See also Foster (Re) reflex, (1992), 89 D.L.R. (4th) 555 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), at pp. 564-65. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in the present case adopted a variant of the "regulatory" approach in holding that a licence holder's ability to request a renewal or reissuance of a licence to its designate, and to resist an arbitrary denial by the Minister, forms part of a "bundle of rights" which collectively constitute a type of property in which a security interest can be taken. A somewhat similar approach was taken in the English case of Re Rae, [1995] B.C.C. 102, where the Court of Chancery held that a Minister's stated policy of renewing licences (similar to the policy in Canada) created what the Minister herself described as an "entitlement" sufficient to bring the fishing licence into the bankrupt's estate. It should be noted, however, that under the English legislation, unlike the Canadian legislation, a licence is issued "in respect of a named vessel", and the court was therefore able to say that the licence was an interest "incidental to property, namely his vessels" (p. 113).

[37] In my view, the debate about the extent to which licences are "transitory and ephemeral" is of limited value. A lease of land for one day or one hour is undeniably a property interest, as is a lease terminable at pleasure. A third party may be willing to pay "key money" to take over a shop lease that is soon to expire in the expectation (reasonable or not) that a renewal will be forthcoming. Uncertainties of renewal do not detract from the interest presently possessed by the holder, but nor does an expectation of renewal based on a Minister's policy which could change tomorrow, transform a licence into a property interest.

[38] A difficulty with the "regulatory approach" is that there are no clear criteria to determine how much "fetter" on the issuing authority's discretion is enough to transform a "mere licence" into some sort of interest sufficient to satisfy the statutory definitions in the BIA and the PPSA. In Bouckhuyt, the fetters on the authority issuing tobacco quota were considered too weak, the discretion too great, to qualify the tobacco quota as Ontario PPSA "property". In Sugarman and Foster the "fetters" placed on the issuing authorities of nursing home licences and taxi licences, respectively, were thought to be enough to confer a proprietary interest within the terms of the Ontario PPSA. The regulatory frameworks in all three cases were different to be sure, but at what point does a licence that does not qualify under personal property security legislation become transformed into a qualifying licence? See generally T. Johnson, "Security Interests in Discretionary Licences Under the Ontario Personal Property Security Act" (1993), 8 B.F.L.R. 123, at p. 240; J. S. Ziegel, "Regulated Licences and the OPPSA: No End in Sight to the Judicial Imbroglio" (1998), 30 Can. Bus. L.J. 284, at p. 284. The cases do not suggest an answer. No doubt criteria will emerge more clearly as cases that rely on a "regulatory approach" evolve. In this respect, however, I do not believe the "judicial review" paradigm offered by the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in this case is helpful. The Regulations permit anyone to apply for a fisheries licence and everyone is entitled to a ministerial decision that complies with procedural fairness. I cannot agree that these elements are capable, as such, of constituting a licence "property" in the hands of a holder.

[39] In any event, I agree with the observation adopted by Major J. in Comeau's Sea Foods that he could not find in the fisheries legislation any legal underpinning for the "vesting" of an interest in a licence "beyond the rights which it gives for the year in which it was issued" (para. 33). See also Joliffe v. The Queen, reflex, [1986] 1 F.C. 511 (T.D.), at p. 520; Bennett, Re (1988), 67 C.B.R. (N.S.) 314 (B.C.S.C.); Ward (Bankrupt), Re reflex, (2000), 229 N.B.R. (2d) 121 (Q.B.), and Dugas, Re (2004), 50 C.B.R. (4th) 200, 2004 NBQB 200. To the extent the regulatory cases are considered relevant here they do not assist the appellants, in my opinion. Section 7(1) of the Fisheries Act says that the Minister's discretion is "absolute".

[40] However, I do not believe the prospect of renewal, whether or not subject to an "unfettered" discretion, is determinative. For present purposes the appellants do not have to prove a renewal or even the reasonable prospect of it. The question under the PPSA is whether the holder (in this case the appellant Saulnier) had a qualifying interest in the licence either at the time he entered into a GSA with the Royal Bank in April 1999, or at the time the Bank sought to realize on Saulnier's after-acquired property, and the question under the BIA is whether he had a qualifying interest within the meaning of that Act when he made an assignment in bankruptcy on July 8, 2004.

(iii) The "Commercial Realities" Approach

[41] This approach is well illustrated by the trial decision of Kennedy C.J.S.C. in this case, who put the argument succinctly:

> That evidence confirms my understanding, that on the east coast of Canada fishing licenses, particularly for lobster, are commonly exchanged between fishermen for a great deal of money.
> Fishing vessels of questionable value are traded for small fortunes because of the licences that are anticipated to come with them.
> . . .
> To ignore commercial reality would be to deny creditors access to something of significant value in the hands of the bankrupt. That would be both artificial and potentially inequitable. [paras. 51-52 and 58]

Similar views have been expressed in other licensing contexts: see Saskatoon Auction Mart Ltd. v. Finesse Holsteins (1992), 4 P.P.S.A.C. (2d) 67 (Sask. Q.B.); G. Slocombe & Associates Inc. v. Gold River Lodges Ltd. 2001 BCSC 840 (CanLII), (2001), 2 P.P.S.A.C. (3d) 324, 2001 BCSC 840, at para. 8; and the English cases of Re Celtic Extraction Ltd., [2000] 2 W.L.R. 991 (C.A.), at p. 1000, and Swift v. Dairywise Farms Ltd., [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1177 (Ch.).

[42] The criticism of this approach is that many things that have commercial value do not constitute property, while the value of some property may be minimal. There is no necessary connection between proprietary status and commercial value. See generally T. G. W. Telfer, "Statutory Licences and the Search for Property: The End of the Imbroglio?" (2007), 45 Can. Bus. L.J. 224, at p. 238. I agree with the Court of Appeal that "commercial realities" cannot legitimate wishful thinking about the notion of "property" in the BIA and the PPSA, although commercial realities provide an appropriate context in which to interpret the statutory provisions. The BIA and the PPSA are, after all, largely commercial statutes which should be interpreted in a way best suited to enable them to accomplish their respective commercial purposes.

(iv) The Preferred Approach

[43] As described above, the holder of a s. 7(1) licence acquires a good deal more than merely permission to do that which would otherwise be unlawful. The holder acquires the right to engage in an exclusive fishery under the conditions imposed by the licence and, what is of prime importance, a proprietary right in the wild fish harvested thereunder, and the earnings from their sale. While these elements do not wholly correspond to the full range of rights necessary to characterize something as "property" at common law, the question is whether (even leaving aside the debate about the prospects of renewal) they are sufficient to qualify the "bundle of rights" the appellant Saulnier did possess as property for purposes of the statutes.

(a) Fishing Licences Qualify as Property Within the Scope of Section 2 of the BIA

[44] For ease of reference I repeat the relevant part of s. 2:

> "property" means any type of property, whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, as well as obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;

The terms of the definition are very wide. Parliament unambiguously signalled an intention to sweep up a variety of assets of the bankrupt not normally considered "property" at common law. This intention should be respected if the purposes of the BIA are to be achieved.

[45] Reliance was placed on s. 16 of the Regulations which provides that a fishing licence is a "document" which is "the property of the Crown and is not transferable". From this it was inferred that the licence, in its commercial dimension, is declared by the Regulations to be a property right in the hands of the Crown. I think s. 16 merely says that the Regulations contemplate that the documentation of the licence (as opposed to the licence itself) is the property of the Crown, in the same way that a Canadian Passport is declared to be the property of the Crown, not the holder: Veffer v. Canada (Minister of Foreign Affairs), 2007 FCA 247 (CanLII), [2008] 1 F.C.R. 641, 2007 FCA 247, at para. 6. A fisher whose licence is suspended or revoked cannot refuse the Minister's demand for a return of the documentation on the basis the Minister gave it to him and it is now his property.

[46] I prefer to look at the substance of what was conferred, namely a licence to participate in the fishery coupled with a proprietary interest in the fish caught according to its terms and subject to the Minister's regulation. As noted earlier, the BIA is intended to fulfill certain objectives in the event of a bankruptcy which require, in general, that non-exempt assets be made available to creditors. The s. 2 definition of property should be construed accordingly to include a s. 7(1) fishing licence.

[47] It is true that the proprietary interest in the fish is contingent on the fish first being caught, but the existence of that contingency is contemplated in the BIA definition and is no more fatal to the proprietary status for BIA purposes than is the case with the equivalent contingency arising under a profit à prendre, which is undeniably a property interest.

[48] Counsel for the Attorney General of Canada was greatly concerned that a holding that the fishing licence is property in the hands of the holder even for limited statutory purposes might be raised in future litigation to fetter the Minister's discretion, but I do not think this concern is well founded. The licence is a creature of the regulatory system. Section 7(1) of the Fisheries Act speaks of the Minister's "absolute discretion". The Minister gives and the Minister (when acting properly within his jurisdiction under s. 9 of the Act) can take away, according to the exigencies of his or her management of the fisheries. The statute defines the nature of the holder's interest, and this interest is not expanded by our decision that a fishing licence qualifies for inclusion as "property" for certain statutory purposes.

[49] It follows that in my view the trustee was entitled to require the appellant Saulnier to execute the appropriate documentation to obtain a transfer of the fishing licences to the third party purchaser.

[50] It may well be that in the course of a bankruptcy the fishing licence will expire, or has already expired. If so, the trustee will have the same right as the original holder of an expired licence to go to the Minister to seek its replacement, and has the same recourse (or the lack of it) if the request is rejected. The bankrupt can transfer no greater rights than he possesses. The trustee simply steps into the shoes of the appellant Saulnier and takes the licence "warts and all".

(b) The Fishing Licence Is Also "Personal Property" Within the Meaning of Section 2 of the PPSA

[51] I repeat, for convenience, the relevant PPSA definitions:

> (w) "intangible" means personal property that is not goods, a document of title, chattel paper, a security, an instrument or money;
> . . .
> (ad) "personal property" means goods, a document of title, chattel paper, a security, an instrument, money or an intangible;

The definition of "intangible" simply describes something that otherwise constitutes "personal property" but is not one of the listed types of tangible personal property. "Intangible" would include an interest created by statute having the characteristics of a licence coupled with an interest at common law as in the case of a profit à prendre. Again, to repeat, I do not suggest that a fishing licence constitutes a profit à prendre at common law, for clearly there would be numerous conceptual objections to such a characterization. Our concern is exclusively with the extended definitions of "personal property" in the context of a statute that seeks to facilitate financing by borrowers and the protection of creditors. In my view the grant by the Fisheries and Oceans Minister of a licence coupled with a proprietary interest as described above is sufficient to satisfy the PPSA definition.

[52] In this respect, the registration is therefore valid to include the s. 7(1) fishing licence and, in the absence of any other PPSA defence, the respondent bank is entitled to proceed with its PPSA remedies.

V. Disposition

[53] For these reasons I would uphold the result of the decision of the courts below and dismiss the appeal with costs in this Court to the respondents.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants: Nickerson Jacquard, Yarmouth.

Solicitors for the respondents: Wickwire Holm, Halifax.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada: Attorney General of Canada, Toronto.

Solicitors for the interveners the Seafood Producers Association of Nova Scotia, the Groundfish Enterprise Allocation Council, the BC Seafood Alliance, the Canadian Association of Prawn Producers and the Fisheries Council of Canada: Stewart McKelvey, Halifax.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE
MADAM JUSTICE PICARD

[1] The appellant, A. C. Waring & Associates Inc., trustee in bankruptcy, appeals the decision that a sofa and television are exempt from distribution in a bankruptcy proceeding, and that the trustee has no right in them.

[2] The bankrupts, who are not parties to this suit, leased the chattels from Direct Rental Centre (West) Ltd. ("Direct"). Direct did not register the lease pursuant to the Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05.

[3] The appeal raises the interplay amongst the following: the distribution provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"); the exemption provisions of the Civil Enforcement Act, S.A. 1994, c. C-10.5 ("CEA") and the priority provisions of the Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05 ("PPSA"). Relevant sections of those statutes are set out below.

Legislation

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3:

> 2(1) "property" includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;
> 37. Where the bankrupt or any of the creditors of any other person is aggrieved by any act or decision of the trustee, he may apply to the court and the court may confirm, reverse or modify the act or decision complained of and make such order in the premises as it thinks just.
> > (b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under any laws applicable in the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides, or ....
> 71(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

Civil Enforcement Act, S.A. 1994, c. C-10.5:

> 1(1) In this Act,
> > (kk) "property" includes
> > (i) things, as well as rights or interests in things,
> > (ii) anything regarded in law or equity as property or as an interest in property,
> > (iii) any right or interest that can be transferred for value from one person to another,
> > (iv) any right, including a contingent or future right, to be paid money or receive any other kind of property, and
> > (v) any cause of action;
> 5(1) The court may, on application by an interested party or an agency, give directions in respect of or determine any matter or issue that arises out of any civil enforcement proceedings.
> 88 The following property of an enforcement debtor is exempt from writ proceedings:
> > (c) household furnishings and appliances that are of a value not exceeding an amount prescribed by the regulations;
> 90(1) If
> > (a) an enforcement debtor owns more than one item of a type of property for which there is an exemption under section 88, and
> > (b) the total value of the items exceeds the maximum prescribed value of the exemption for that type of property, > the enforcement debtor may select the items, up to the maximum prescribed value of the exemption, that will be exempt.
> (2) If the enforcement debtor does not in a timely manner make a selection under subsection (1), the bailiff may select the items that are exempt.

91 On application to the Court to determine whether property is exempt, the Court must make its determination on the basis of the circumstances that exist

(a) at the time of the seizure, in the case of personal property that has been seized....

97 For the purposes of determining what constitutes a distributable fund, the following applies:

(c) money payable in accordance with section 89(2) or 98 does not constitute or form part of a distributable fund.

98 Where a distributing authority receives money that is exempt or that represents the proceeds of exempt property, that money constitutes a distributable fund subject to the following payments being made from that money:

(b) if there is not an enforcement creditor who qualifies to be paid under clause (a), the distributing authority shall, insofar as the amount of that money held by the distributing authority permits, pay to the enforcement debtor an amount that is equal to the maximum prescribed value of the exemption.

Civil Enforcement Regulation, Alta. Reg. 276/95:

37(1) The following are the maximum amounts allowed for exempt property under section 88 of the Act:

(b) the maximum exemption for household furnishings and appliances referred to in section 88(c) of the Act is $4000;

Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05:

12(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b) and without limiting other rights that the debtor may have in the collateral, a debtor has rights in goods leased to him or consigned to him when he obtains possession of them in accordance with the lease or consignment.

[4] At the request of this Court, both the Attorneys General of Alberta and Canada filed factums dealing with the question of whether there was a constitutional issue in the interplay of the PPSA and BIA in this case. They both submitted there was no constitutional issue. Their position is summarized in the following statement from the factum of the Deputy Attorney General of Canada:

> Subparagraph 20(1)(b)(i) PPSA presumes a priority competition between the trustee and a creditor claiming to have a secured position. However, if the trustee has no stake in a given asset (in terms of realizing and distributing the proceeds) because the asset is exempt, no priority contest arises and subparagraph 20(1)(b)(i) does not come into play.
> The PPSA provision only applies where the assets in question are not exempt as against the trustee.
> In this case, the source of the exemption is paragraph 88(c) of the Civil Enforcement Act which, in combination with paragraph 37(1)(b) of the Civil Enforcement Regulation, exempts household furnishings up to a value of $4,000 from enforcement by judgment creditor.

Facts

[5] The bankrupts entered into two leases with Direct, one for a sofa, the other for a television. Payments were to be made on a monthly basis for a maximum of 21 months. Provided that the bankrupts (lessees) were not in default of any term, they had the right to purchase the leased chattels either during the term of the lease, for an amount to be determined by Direct, or for $1.00 at the end of the 21 month period. Direct retained title to them until such time as the bankrupts acquired ownership pursuant to the terms of the agreement and could terminate for a default in payment. Direct did not register the leases at the Personal Property Registry although they could have been registered as they were for a term greater than one year.

[6] Therefore, Direct has an unperfected claim as a secured party.

[7] The leases were entered into approximately eight months before the bankrupts declared bankruptcy and the bankrupts were not in default at that time. It is accepted by all parties that the total value of the sofa and television is less than the exemption limit for furnishings under the CEA.

Decisions of the Registrar and Chambers Judge

Digitized by Google

[8] Master Funduk, Registrar in Bankruptcy, found that the PPSA did apply to the leases and the issue was priorities and not ownership of the chattels. He found he was bound by a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, Re McPeake 1994 CanLII 8985 (AB QB), (1994), 158 A.R. 144 ("McPeake"). He said he was not in a position to decide whether it was right or wrong. In response to submissions about that case, he said: "Nibbled to death by ducks is not, for me, a way to get around Re McPeake." (AB 115). Thus, he felt compelled to the decision that no exemption could be claimed for the chattels.

[9] The chambers judge allowed an appeal from that decision. He refused to apply McPeake and held that chattels encumbered by a chattel mortgage, or other security instrument, will not automatically be rendered non-exempt for the purposes of bankruptcy. He said that the PPSA cannot render non-exempt that which the BIA would deem exempt and concluded that the sofa and television were exempt regardless of the provisions of the PPSA. He also concluded that the bankrupts had a sufficient property interest in the chattels to vest them in the trustee and claim an exemption. He found that the chattels were exempt regardless of who asserted the claim and that the leases remained in force.

Issues

[10] The appellant and respondent seek through this action to have a determination of the nature and extent of the rights of a trustee in bankruptcy in chattels subject to a lease that was not registered under the PPSA. The analysis of the issues can best be done through the following questions.

1. What are the initial responsibilities and powers of a trustee in bankruptcy over the property of the bankrupt?
2. Do the bankrupts have an interest in the sofa and television, and if so, is it eligible for an exemption?
3. What is the nature of the CEA exemption: right or privilege?
4. Does the exempt status of the bankrupts' property prevent the trustee from enjoying priority over Direct's unperfected security interest?

Standard of Review

[1] The issues raised are questions of law and therefore the standard of review is correctness: see Kuziw v. Kucheran Estate 2000 ABCA 226 (CanLII), (2000), 266 A.R. 284, [2000] A.J. No. 944 (C.A.) online: QL (AJ) at para. 7: "This Court will apply a standard of review of correctness to the learned chambers judge's decision insofar as error of law or principle is involved."

1. What are the responsibilities and powers of a trustee in bankruptcy over the property of the bankrupt?

[2] Upon a receiving order being made in a bankruptcy proceeding, a bankrupt ceases to have capacity to deal with his property and it vests in the trustee, subject to the Act and the rights of secured creditors: BIA, s. 71(2).

[3] The Supreme Court of Canada in Royal Bank of Canada v. North American Life Insurance Co. and Balvir Singh Ramgotra, 1996 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 325 ("Ramgotra"), set out the stages of a bankruptcy. In the first, the property-passing stage, the trustee takes possession of the assets forming the bankrupt's estate. In the second, the estate administration stage, the trustee divides the property of the bankrupt amongst the creditors. But not all of the property is available to satisfy those claims as some is exempt from distribution: BIA, s. 67(1).

[4] In this case, the bankrupts' property in the sofa and television passed to the trustee. In order for the trustee to have the authority to deal with them, in the administration stage, it is necessary to determine the nature and scope of the exemption in them.

[5] The BIA states that the divisible property of the bankrupt shall not include any property exempt from seizure under laws applicable in the province where the property is situated.

[6] The provincial legislation that the BIA thereby engages is the CEA, s. 88(c) which, along with its regulations, makes exempt household furnishings up to a value of $4,000.

2. Do the bankrupts have an interest in the sofa and television, and if so, is it eligible for an exemption?

[7] There is no doubt that had the bankrupts purchased and taken title to the sofa and television those items would be exempt. The question of the extent or scope of the exemption arises because of the "lease-to own" basis upon which the bankrupts had possession. The question that arises here is whether the interest the bankrupts had in the two items comes within the definition of property so as to be suitable for an exemption.

[8] There is authority from this Court that the characterization of property as property within a class of exempt property is to be done on the facts as they existed at the time of the bankruptcy: Holthuysen (Trustee of) v. Holthysen (1986), reflex, [1987] 2 W.W.R. 304.

[9] What property in the sofa and television did the bankrupts have at the time of the bankruptcy? They had the right to possession and use and the right to purchase and acquire title either during the lease, for an amount that took into account their lease payments, or for one dollar after 21 months of payments.

[10] The BIA, CEA and PPSA all have sections which define the term "property". The term is used in the BIA to describe what vests in the trustee, in the CEA to describe what is exempt and in the PPSA to describe the interest of a debtor as lessee in a lease.

[11] The definition of property in the BIA, s. 2, is very broad and includes "every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property". The CEA definition is similarly broad, including "rights or interests in things and anything regarded in law or equity as property or as an interest in property".

[12] While the BIA and CEA definitions are critical, it is interesting to note a provision in the PPSA that specifically deals with the interest of a lessee or debtor. The PPSA, s. 12(2) in dealing with the attachable security interest of a lessee defines the lessee's rights in goods: "a debtor has rights in goods leased to him or consigned to him where he obtains possession of them in accordance with the lease or consignment.

[13] In Re Giffen, 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91 ("Giffen"), the Supreme Court of Canada held that a bankrupt's interest in a leased car was property for the purposes of the BIA and thus vested in the trustee.

[14] The bankrupts' interest in the sofa and in the television falls within the definitions of property in all three statutes. I find that the interest that the bankrupts have in the sofa and television falls within the scope of the exemptions possible under the CEA.

[15] Put simply, all of the bankrupts' interest in the sofa and television capable of vesting in the trustee is eligible for an exemption.

3. What is the nature of an exemption under the CEA: right or privilege?

[16] A determination of the issues between the parties to the litigation requires a determination of whether an exemption under the CEA is a right that the debtor need not claim to be effective, or a privilege that the debtor must claim. Because the bankrupts made no claim, Direct can only succeed if an exemption is a right. Older cases under earlier legislation were divided on this question.

[17] Assuming the exemption is a right, once property is determined by the trustee to fall within the exemption provisions of the CEA, the property would be unavailable for distribution. If it is a privilege and is unclaimed, there is the possibility that the exemption could be lost.

[18] This is not a case where an issue of the limits of value or number arises as regards an exemption; that is, it is not a case where the limits of the exempt category of "household furnishings" is challenged by the sofa and television, and it is not a case where a choice must be made between two specified chattels for the exemption, as would be the case with two motor vehicles. Those cases might well raise problems of selection. A trustee may have problems determining a bankrupt's exemptions. I repeat, those problems are not raised in this case. However, a concern about how such issues would be resolved in that period when the legislation contained no provision for reference to the courts resulted in decisions that the only practical resolution of the problems would be to require that an exemption be claimed. This can be seen in an examination of the older cases under earlier legislation.

[19] The cases interpreting the predecessor legislation, the Exemptions Act and the Seizures Act, illustrate the difficulties. In Rodi & Wienenberger Aktiengescellschaft* v. Kay reflex, (1959), 30 W.W.R. 229 (Alta. D.C.) ("Rodi") it was held that the debtor acquired an exemption as a right with no need to claim it. However in E.T. Marshall Co. Ltd. v. *Flemming reflex, (1965), 55 W.W.R.11 (Alta. D.C.) ("E.T. Marshall") it was held that the exemption was a right or privilege that the debtor had to claim.

[20] In the Rodi case, the court was interpreting language very similar to that in the CEA: The Exemptions Act, R.S.A. 1955, c. 104, s.2, identified property that "is exempt from seizure"; in the CEA, s.88 identifies property that "is exempt from writ proceedings". In arriving at its conclusion that an exemption was a right that need not be claimed, the court in the Rodi case stated that an injustice would be done if a debtor ignorant of his right failed to claim an exemption and thereby lost it.

[21] In the E.T. Marshall case, the court seemed very concerned with the administrative problems where there might be disputes and the possible need for a sheriff or bailiff to exercise a judicial function. This moved some courts to find an intention in the legislation that would at least partially deal with the problem, that is, a requirement that an exemption be claimed.

[22] It is critical that the older legislation did not provide for access to the Courts to resolve disputes. However, eventually, there was an amendment to the Exemptions Act which did just that. The decision and analysis of Stevenson, D.C.J. (as he then was), in Carmar Holdings Ltd. v. Harpe 1976 CanLII 281 (AB QB), (1976), 1Alta. L.R. (2d) 76, is most helpful to an understanding of the law at that time. He canvassed the law and said he preferred the interpretation in the Rodi decision. He noted that after the E.T. Marshall decision the legislation was amended, and the Exemptions Act, R.S.A. 1970, c.129 addressed the problem of the identification of exempt property by permitting the creditor to apply to the courts for a declaration that specific goods were not exempt. In his analysis he considered s. 45 of the Seizures Act which permitted the sheriff to seize and hold items that may have been exempt until such time as their status could be determined, and if exempt, they could be returned to the debtor. The amendment to the legislation removed the concern about the resolution of disputes as to exemptions, so the justification disappeared for requiring the debtor to make a claim in order to get an exemption.

[23] The CEA provides for recourse to the courts where there are issues as to exemptions (s. 91) or for the determination, on the application by "an interested party or an agency" of "any matter or issue that arises out of any civil enforcement proceeding" (s. 5). Both sections are very broad.

[24] Thus, the concerns about the resolution of disputes about exemptions have been taken care of in the CEA. That might be enough upon which to found a conclusion that there are now no barriers to an exemption being held to be a right. However, a look at the structure and intent of the CEA further supports the conclusion that an exemption is a right.

[25] The comprehensive scheme provided for in the CEA balances the interests of debtors and creditors, implementing social policy to protect debtors from the severest of consequences. The legislation creates classes of property that are exempt (s. 88), precludes waiver of the exemptions by the debtor (s. 2), and prevents the proceeds of exempt property from becoming part of the fund distributable among the creditors (ss. 97, 98). Where there might be an excess in value or number relating to an exemption, there is provision for the debtor to select exempt property from within the applicable class of exempt property (s. 90(1)). The legislation also permits a bailiff to select the exempt property if the debtor fails to do so (s. 90(2)).

[26] When the CEA is reviewed in the light of the earlier legislation and case law, it is clear that it was meant to be remedial providing a complete scheme for the enforcement of civil proceedings while removing some of the ambiguities and inadequacies found in the earlier legislation.

[27] While the CEA does inform the BIA of what property is exempt, the BIA is the statute under which the parties to the bankruptcy must operate.

[28] In the BIA, s. 67(1)(b) states, without qualification, that exempt property is not divisible by the trustee. The Supreme Court of Canada has affirmed this interpretation in Ramgotra. The trustee is the key to the proper administration of the legislative scheme in the BIA.

[29] It is significant that the trustee assumes responsibilities in two capacities: as the debtor's (or bankrupt's) representative and, as well, as the creditors' representative: L.Claude Mercure v. A. Marquette & Fils Inc., 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547 at 553. Thus, once it is clear that property is exempt and therefore not available for creditors, the trustee is in no position to limit or qualify the bankrupt's interest in that exempt property.

[30] Like the CEA, the BIA also provides for the resolution of disputes and, specifically, anticipates and provides for situations where an act or decision of the trustee may be questionable. The BIA, s. 37, provides for an application to a court by any person who is aggrieved by an act or decision of the trustee and provides the court with the power to make such order as it thinks just.

[31] Legislation dealing with bankruptcy and legislation dealing with the civil enforcement proceedings have a common feature: a limited protection of a debtor from creditors.

[32] In summary, the legislative history, the scheme and provisions of the CEA and the intention of the CEA support the conclusion that an exemption is not a privilege but a right. The express provisions in the BIA excluding exempt property, and imposing a duty on the trustee not to distribute exempt property affirms the right.

[33] Those provisions in the BIA and the CEA for recourse to the courts where an "aggrieved party" (s. 37 BIA) or an "interested party" (s. 5 CEA) seeks a determination or directions are a complete answer to concerns about determining the scope and nature of contested exemptions.

[34] In conclusion, I find that the exemption was a right which did not need to be claimed by the bankrupt debtor. Direct can make the claim.

[35] The trustee takes the position that he is required because of the unperfected interest of Direct in the exempt property to make that property available for unsecured creditors. This raises the question of the interplay between the PPSA and the BIA.

4. Does the exempt status of the bankrupts' property prevent the trustee from enjoying priority over the Direct's unperfected security interest?

[36] The appellant submits that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Giffen applies to this case. That is, because Direct did not register the leases under the PPSA, when the property interest that the bankrupts had in the chattel vested in the trustee at the time of bankruptcy, that vesting would have permitted the trustee to defeat Direct's claim to the chattels. As a result, the appellant submits, the trustee acquired Direct's property in the chattel and should be able to divide Direct's property in the chattel among the creditors. This would accord with the decision in McPeake.

[37] There is no doubt that jurisprudence dealing with the combined effect of the PPSA and the BIA has been profoundly affected by the Giffen decision, because the decision provides that a trustee can obtain greater rights to property than the bankrupt had in it. The appellant urges the case upon us because if it applies, the appellant submits, there would be no property for Direct to look to for any rights it might have flowing from the leases. That would follow if at the administration stage of the bankruptcy, s. 20 of the PPSA would allow the trustee to acquire the property of Direct in the sofa and television because Direct had not registered the leases under the PPSA.

[38] However, Giffen did not deal with property that was exempt; furthermore, there was no issue involving exemptions engaged in the case. It is therefore distinguishable from this case.

[39] In Giffen, a leasing company leased a car to an employer who then sub-leased it to its employee, the bankrupt. The leasing company did not register its lease under the PPSA of British Columbia. Upon the employee's bankruptcy the leasing company seized the car and sold it. The trustee claimed the net proceeds of the sale on the basis that since the leasing company's interest was not perfected by registration at the date of the bankruptcy, pursuant to s. 20 (which is the same in Alberta) the leasing company's interest was not effective against the trustee. The leasing company took the position that the trustee could not claim a greater interest in the vehicle than the bankrupt had in it. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the bankrupt had a leasehold right of use and possession and that this constituted "property" as defined by s. 2 of the BIA. Further, this property passed to the trustee upon the bankruptcy (s. 71(2) BIA), and the trustee could therefore assert a claim to the car. Thus, the Court had to determine the priority between the property interest of the bankrupt that had vested in the trustee and the leasing company's unperfected security interest. There was no claim by anyone that the car was exempt.

[40] The Court applied s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA and held that the leasing company's interest was ineffective against the trustee, and that the trustee in effect, though notably not in fact, ended up with full rights in the car in the circumstances of that case. While the result was contrary to the general rule that a trustee cannot acquire rights in property greater than what the bankrupt had, the Court found that the legislation supported a policy choice when the PPSA was enacted which was to make unsecured creditors' interests as represented by the trustee more meritorious than the unperfected interest of a secured creditor.

[41] To achieve the result that the appellant argues for in this case, the interpretation of the legislative intent would have to be taken a step further to find that exempt property subject to an unperfected interest of a secured creditor was so tainted by the failure of the secured creditor to register the interest that the trustee could exercise the right to seize and sell property normally shielded by the existence of an exemption, and thereby defeat Direct's claim to the chattel. Such a result would undermine the policy of the BIA, the PPSA, and the CEA.

[42] The intention of s. 20 of the PPSA is to rank interests and not to confer them. In the Giffen case, the Court said that the PPSA does not confer interests, at para. 44:

> [Section 20] does not grant title or any other proprietary interest to the trustee, but it prevents the lessor from exercising rights against the trustee.

[43] As well, there is support for the conclusion that an exemption prevents the trustee from exercising the right of division of the bankrupt's property. In Ramgotra, at para. 48 the Supreme Court of Canada found that the BIA barred the trustee from exercising the right of division with respect to exempt property. This principle and the principle identified above in Giffen operate in effect to prevent the trustee and the secured party respectively from exercising rights that would otherwise put them in competition with each other.

[44] The appellant also relies on McPeake apparently for the proposition that the exemption applies only to the debtor's interest in chattel, and that consequently the trustee is able to assert priority over the secured party's unperfected deemed security interest in the same chattel which, not being exempt, becomes available for division among the creditors. In light of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Giffen and Ramgotra, McPeake is of no assistance to the appellant in the circumstances of the case at bar.

[45] In McPeake a bankrupt had mortgaged a mobile home. Legislation provided an exemption for mobile homes. The trustee apparently was not interested in the bankrupt's exempt property in the mobile home but contested the mortgagee's unregistered claim to the chattel. The judge found that all of the property in a mortgaged mobile home, in which the bankrupt retained an equitable interest, formed part of the bankrupt's estate, and to the extent that the mobile home was encumbered by the chattel mortgage it was not exempt from seizure.

[46] As is apparent in reading Giffen, the property interests in chattel held by a third party with an unperfected deemed security interest are not altered by the operation of the PPSA. When seeking to enforce rights inherent in the property interest, a party will find that those rights will be viewed simply as giving rise to a deemed security interest and, being unperfected, that interest will lose priority to the interest of a secured party with a perfected security interest or to a trustee in bankruptcy. That being so, the mortgaged mobile home in the McPeake case, except for the equitable property interest that the bankrupt retained in the chattel, should not have formed part of the bankrupt's estate. In short, the mortgagee's interest in the chattel should never have become part of the bankrupt's estate. This is not to say that in the appropriate circumstances the trustee could not have seized, sold and transferred good title to the mobile home, this is simply to say that on the facts of the McPeake case, the appropriate circumstances do not appear to have existed. Though the property of the bankrupt vested in the trustee, the exempt status of that property should have precluded the trustee from contesting the unperfected deemed security interest of the mortgagee.

[47] The appellant in this case goes even further than the courts in either the Giffen case or the McPeake case. The appellant submits that the failure of Direct to register its leases permits the trustee to step into the shoes of Direct and acquire the interest of the bankrupts free of any exemption. They offer no authority to support this further proposition that the trustee steps into the shoes of Direct, other than Giffen. This submission is without merit and is not supported by the reasons in Giffen. At best the trustee steps into the shoes of the bankrupt and is able, in the appropriate circumstances, to defeat the claims of parties like Direct with unperfected security interests. However, that is not possible where there is an exemption as there is in this case.

[48] In light of the Supreme Court's decisions in the Giffen and Ramgotra cases, it is my view that the principle of law used to arrive at the result in McPeake was faulted. Nor does the Supreme Court's reasoning in the Giffen case lead one, on the facts in this case, to the same result as that in the Giffen case. The existence of an exemption in this case fundamentally alters the result that follows from an application of the principles enunciated in the Giffen case.

[49] In the case at bar, there is no basis for a contest over rights to the property as between the trustee and Direct. The property is exempt under the provisions of the CEA and the BIA and therefore the trustee has no right to divide it among the creditors. There is nothing to fight over.

[50] I find that the answer to the question is yes: The exempt status of the bankrupts' property in the chattels, which is the only property in the chattels that vest in the trustee, does prevent the trustee from enjoying priority over Direct's unperfected deemed security interest in the chattels.

[51] This conclusion is the same as that arrived at by the chambers judge. It is consistent with the policy underlying the PPSA. See the comments of Professors Ronald Cuming and Roderick Wood in Alberta Personal Property Security Act Handbook 4th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1998) at 193 - 195.

Post hearing Case Law

[52] Following the hearing of this case but prior to the release of any judgments, counsel provided to the panel a very recent decision from the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal, VW Credit Canada Inc. v. Roberts 2001 NSCA 42 (CanLII), (2001), 197 D.L.R. (4th) 274, 22 C.B.R. (4th) 266, [2001] N.S.J. No. 84, online: QL (NSJ).

[53] The majority in VW Credit, when considering the decision of the court below in this case, distinguished this case on the facts and, as well, said they chose to follow McPeake. I discussed McPeake earlier.

[54] I agree that the cases are distinguishable. Furthermore the path taken by the majority did not require an analysis of the interplay between the BIA and the equivalent of the CEA which is central to this case. Their decision was based on the finding that the bankrupt did not, under their PPSA legislation, have an exemption against VW Credit (who was in a similar position to Direct) and that the consequence was that there was no exemption under the BIA.

[55] In his dissent, Justice Freeman did deal with the interplay between the BIA and the provincial legislation dealing with exemptions. He reviewed the duties of the trustee and held that the property was exempt to the limits of the category into which it fit. His analysis and conclusion is consistent, in general, with this decision.

Conclusion

[56] The bankrupts have an interest in the sofa and television which qualifies for an exemption and, given the value of the chattels and the limits of the exemption category into which they fall, the bankrupts' interest, being less than unencumbered ownership, must necessarily all be exempt. The exemption is a right and exists although they did not claim it. The exemption is not defeated by the fact that Direct did not register the leases under the PPSA. The trustee, barred by the BIA from dividing the bankrupts' exempt property, is unable to challenge and defeat Direct's unperfected security interest in the chattel in which the bankrupts had property.

DISSENTING REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE BERGER

[11] The question to be decided in this appeal is whether a lessor who has failed to register a "lease-to-own" agreement as required by the Personal Property Security Act ("PPSA"), can rely upon the exemption provisions of the Civil Enforcement Act ("CEA") to preclude distribution by a trustee in bankruptcy of the property which is the subject of the agreement.

[12] The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") sets out a scheme of distribution of the assets of a bankrupt subject to the rights of secured creditors as defined in s. 2 of the BIA:

> "secured creditor" means a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt due or accruing due to him from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based on, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and on which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable;"

[13] Upon bankruptcy, prima facie, a party with a perfected security interest has priority over the property that is the subject of the security interest by virtue of the PPSA. In Re Giffen, 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91, the Supreme Court of Canada made clear that even though Parliament alone can determine distribution priorities, the BIA "is dependent on provincial property and civil rights legislation in order to inform the terms of the BIA and the rights of the parties involved in the bankruptcy." (at p. 118). See also Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453 per Gonthier, J. at p. 481 and per Iacobucci, J. at p. 531; J.S. Ziegel "Personal Property Security and Bankruptcy: There is No War! - A Reply to Roman and Sweatman" (1993), 72 Can. Bar Rev., 44 at p. 50; and R.C.C. Cuming, "Canadian Bankruptcy Law: A Secured Creditor's Heaven" (1994-95), 24 Can. Bus. L.J. 17 at 25-26.

[14] Section 20(1)(b)(i) of the PPSA provides that "a security interest in collateral is not effective against a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of bankruptcy."

[15] The parties are common cause that in the case at bar the "lease-to-own" agreement was not registered and, accordingly, was not perfected. The "property" which is the subject of the "lease-to-own" agreement consists of a sofa and television set of a total value not exceeding $4,000.

[16] Upon an assignment into bankruptcy, the bankrupt's property, subject to the BIA and the rights of secured creditors, forthwith passes to and vests in the trustee. Section 67(1)(b) of the BIA makes clear, however, that "any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under any laws applicable in the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides" cannot be distributed by the trustee.

> "88 The following property of an enforcement debtor is exempt from writ proceedings:
> (c) household furnishings and appliances that are of a value not exceeding an amount prescribed by the regulations;"

[18] Pursuant to s. 37(1)(b) of the Civil Enforcement Regulation, the maximum amount that can be claimed under s. 88(c) of the CEA is $4,000. Although the sofa and television set are acknowledged to be of a value not exceeding $4,000, it is unclear what the total value of household furnishings and appliances passing to and vesting in the trustee was.

[19] It follows that the following issues arise:

1. Does the merchandise which is the subject of the "lease-to-own" agreement qualify as "property" within the meaning of the BIA and CEA such that an exemption may be claimed?
2. What is the value of the exemption?
3. Must the exemption be claimed and, if so, who is entitled to claim it?

Does the merchandise which is the subject of the "lease-to-own" agreement qualify as "property" within the meaning of the BIA and CEA such that an exemption may be claimed?

> "'property' includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest > and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;"

[21] Accordingly, subject to s. 67(1) of the BIA, the sofa and television set fall within the definition of "property". However, because exemptions are governed by provincial legislation, the definition of property in the CEA will also be engaged. Section 1(1)(kk) of the CEA defines property as follows:

> "'property' includes
> i) things, as well as rights or interests in things,
> ii) anything regarded in law or equity as property or as an interest in property,
> iii) any right or interest that can be transferred for value from one person to another,
> iv) any right, including a contingent or future right, to be paid money or receive any other kind of property, and

[22] The parties are common cause that the bankrupt in this case does not hold title to the furnishings which are the subject of the "lease-to-own" agreement. No exemption may be claimed with respect to an interest that does not qualify as "property". The locus of title, however, is not determinative. As Iacobucci, J. stated in Re Giffen, supra, at pp. 108-109:

> "In my opinion, the bankrupt's right to use and possession of the car constitutes "property" for the purposes of the BIA and the trustee, by virtue of s. 71(2) of the BIA, succeeds to this proprietary right. I find support for this conclusion in Paccar Financial Services, supra, where the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal held that 'property' as it is used in the BIA is "broad enough to include a leasehold interest" (at p. 494, citing Re Cadieux and Jas. A. Ogilvy's Ltd. (1952), 33 C.B.R. 15 (Que. Sup. Ct.), at p. 16).
> The trustee assumes the bankrupt's possessory interest in the car through the operation of s. 71(2); it is upon this basis that the trustee can assert a claim to the car."

[23] In this case, the bankrupt has a possessory interest in the sofa and television set which falls within the definition of "property" under both the BIA and the CEA. The Supreme Court of Canada, however, did not address the question of exemptions in Re Giffen. There are two conflicting cases from Alberta as to whether an exemption may be claimed in circumstances where title to and ownership of the asset is in the hands of a third party. In Re Exemptions Act and Seizures Act; Re General Steel Wares Ltd. and Clarke (1956-57), 20 W.W.R. 215, Edwards, D.C.J. held that the debtor was unable to claim an exemption in a vehicle in which approximately $1,100.00 remained owing because the debtor had neither the title to nor property in the automobile.

[24] Decore, C.J.D.C. in Armbruster Lumber Ltd. v. Fishburne reflex, (1966), 55 W.W.R. 223 held otherwise. He was of the view that the definition of "property", pursuant to the then applicable Exemptions Act, included an equitable interest consistent with a fair, large and liberal construction of the statute. See also Gray Beverage (Alta.) Ltd. v. Wong reflex, (1981), 29 A.R. 385, Re Peterson 1996 CanLII 10376 (AB QB), (1996), 39 Alta. L.R. (3d) 187 and Re Cronin Fire Equipment Ltd. reflex, (1993), 14 O.R. (3d) 269 (Ont. Gen. Div.).

[25] In my opinion, the method of financing the purchase of a chattel cannot be the basis upon which an exemption is determined under the CEA. It is the type of goods and their value and the type of interest the debtor holds in them that must govern. It must be remembered that although title to the chattels does not pass immediately to the lessee, the acquired interest is such that many of the benefits and disadvantages of ownership are obtained pursuant to the lease.

[26] I conclude, accordingly, that both the BIA and the CEA recognize equitable interest in chattels. I also find that the equitable interest of the bankrupt in this case falls within both definitions of "property" sufficient to allow for a claim of an exemption over the property.

WHAT IS THE VALUE OF THE EXEMPTION?

[27] The issue here is whether an exemption claim is limited to the debtor's equity in the property or whether it is based on market value.

[28] Section 89(1) of the CEA reads as follows:

> "Where the enforcement debtor's equity in the property referred to in section 88 exceeds the prescribed value of the exemption for the property, that property is subject to sale pursuant to writ proceedings."

[29] It is suggested that the latter provision, referring as it does to the debtor's equity, is confirmation that a market value approach to exemptions would be anomalous. I respectfully disagree. Section 89(1), in my opinion, is intended only to confirm that the debtor's equity interest in the property will not override the prescribed value of the exemption even if that equitable interest exceeds it.

[30] Section 88(g) of the CEA (dealing with an enforcement debtor's residence) establishes that the property is exempt from writ proceedings only where the enforcement debtor's equity does not exceed the amount prescribed by the regulations. Again, there is no express legislative statement that would, on its face, limit the value of the exemption to the debtor's equity in the property. The enactment merely confirms that a debtor's equity interest will not override the prescribed maximum exemption value.

> "It seems to us that on the language of section 7 (6) neither the view of the Inland Revenue Commissioners nor that of the plaintiff can be said to be obviously wrong. The court, then, when faced with two possible constructions of legislative language, is entitled to look at the results of adopting each of the alternatives respectively in its quest for the true intention of Parliament."

[32] The market value approach has been affirmed in cases such as Re Ottaway 1980 CanLII 401 (BC CA), (1980), 110 D.L.R. (3d) 231 (B.C.C.A.) and Armbruster, supra. A contrary view was expressed by Bielby, J. in Re Pearson 1997 CanLII 14792 (AB QB), (1997), 51 Alta. L.R. (3d) 254. Her reasoning is premised, in part, on the proposition that there is no logical reason for interpreting the statute to create different results for unsecured creditors, depending on whether the debtor has or has not financed his property. With respect, that approach ignores the policy reasons underlying the need for exemptions as noted in Armbruster and as specifically approved in Ottaway. It also ignores the justification for exemption statutes as set out in C.R.B. Dunlop's Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, supra. Debtors should not be stripped of the means to support themselves and their families because poverty has precluded an outright purchase. The basic necessities of life, as a matter of legislative choice, are deemed to be equally vital to those who, through no fault of their own, are required to finance their purchases. The philosophical foundation for the exemption laws would be undermined if the value of an exemption were limited by the debtor's equity.

[33] I conclude, accordingly, that the exemption value must be calculated on the basis of the market value of the property.

MUST THE EXEMPTION BE CLAIMED AND, IF SO, WHO IS ENTITLED TO CLAIM IT?

[34] The question here is whether personal exemptions are mere privileges which must be claimed by the affected debtor, whether they may be claimed by creditors, or whether they are rights which exist whether asserted or not. In E.T. Marshall Co. Ltd. v. Fleming reflex, (1965), 55 W.W.R. 11 (Alta. D.C.), the Court held that pursuant to the Exemptions Act, it was for the debtor, after seizure, to assert his claims for exemptions which would then be determined by the Court. At p. 18, Cullen, D.C.J. stated:

> "The statute does not prohibit seizure — it confers a right or a privilege which an execution debtor may, at his option, exercise. It would not be in accord with the animus imponentis, the intention of the lawmaker expressed in the statute as a whole, to read into it words which from a practical point of view would make the statute inoperative, and from an administrative point of view would charge the sheriff or his bailiff with the constant exercise of judicial function. There are no words of prohibition; let us not read these into the statute."

[35] This reasoning was approved in obiter by McDonald, D.C.J. in Winnicky v. Grande Prairie & District Savings & Credit Union Ltd. 1975 CanLII 270 (AB QB), [1976] 1 W.W.R. 80 (Alta. T.D.) at p. 84:

> "Although it is not necessary to my decision in the present appeal to pass upon the point, in my opinion, the decision of Cullen D.C.J. in E.T. Marshall Co. Ltd. v. Fleming is correct, and I would adopt the reasons given by him."

[36] In Spence (Trustee of) v. Yellowhead Feeders Co-operative Ltd. (1994), 6 P.P.S.A.C. (2d) 359 (Sask. Q.B.), Baynton, J. confirmed that, under Saskatchewan law, property is not considered exempt unless the bankrupt makes a claim for exemption. Referring to the decision in Royal Bank v. Demyen (Trustee of) reflex, (1986), 53 Sask. R. 224 (Q.B.) and noting that the result in Demyen was different from that in Spence because the exemption had not been claimed by the bankrupts themselves but by the secured creditor, he remarked at p. 371: "It makes good sense that a secured creditor who fails to perfect its security is not permitted to defeat other interests by relying on a protection granted by legislation to debtors, not to creditors."

[37] A contrary view was adopted in Rodi & Weinenberger AG v. Kay reflex, (1959), 30 W.W.R. 229 (Alta. D.C.). It has been suggested that the words "are exempt from seizure", mean exactly what they say, and are conclusive of the absolute prohibition of any seizure. See L. Rutman, et al, Creditor's Remedies in Alberta, 2nd ed., looseleaf, (Carswell: Scarborough, 1996) at 10-16, York v. Flatekval (Dayle), 1971 CanLII 208 (AB QB), [1971] 3 W.W.R. 289 (Alta. D.C.), Canadian National Railways v. Norwegian, reflex, [1971] 1 W.W.R. 766 (N.W.T.) and Carmar Holdings Ltd. v. Harpe 1976 CanLII 281 (AB QB), (1976), 1 Alta. L.R. (2d) 76 (D.C.).

[38] In my opinion, s. 46 of the CEA informs the legislative intent. For ease of reference, I set it out in full:

> "46(1) Where an enforcement debtor wishes to object to a seizure of personal property, the enforcement debtor must within 15 days from the day that > a) the seizure documents are served under section 45(1)(a)(i) on the enforcement debtor or an adult member of the enforcement debtor's household, or
> b) the seizure documents are served under section 45(3) on the enforcement debtor, > serve a notice of objection in the prescribed form on the agency that carried out the seizure.
> (2) On being served with a notice of objection, the agency shall not sell or otherwise dispose of the property unless permitted to do so by the Court.
> (3) A notice of objection is void and shall be disregarded if
> a) a reason for the objection is not set out in the notice of objection, or
> b) the notice of objection is not served on the agency within the 15-day period provided for under subsection (1)."

[39] In the light of the latter provisions, and mindful of s. 90 of the CEA which sets out the procedure for selection of exempt property in circumstances where the value of the items seized exceeds the exemption limit, I prefer the conclusion reached by the Court in Marshall, supra. The rationale for the requirement that the exemption must be asserted accords with the fact that it is the debtor who has the information needed to establish the exemption. After all, it is the debtor who, in most cases, is the person claiming the exemption, and upon whom the onus to establish that property is exempt should lie. (L.W. Houlden & G.B. Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3rd ed., vol. 1, looseleaf, (Carswell: Scarborough, 2001) at 3-58.1).

[40] In addition to the foregoing, there are practical impediments that would render it difficult to apply an absolute exemption standard. Suppose, for example, that a number of chattels were held to be absolutely exempt without the assertion of the debtor. If the total market value of the chattels exceeded the prescribed limit, which chattels would be exempt? Which creditors would benefit? If it had been the legislative intention to impose such a regime, a scheme for distribution in those circumstances would, surely, have been enacted.

[41] This accords with the policy reasons underlying the legislative choice to allow for exemptions and is consistent with the justification for exemptions as articulated by C.R.B. Dunlop in Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, 2nd ed., (Carswell: Scarborough, 1995) at 454:

> "The obvious justification of exemptions statutes today is that they prevent judgment debtors from being stripped of all the means to support themselves and their families. It is not acceptable that creditors, no matter how just the debt, should have the power to take from debtors the basic necessities of life. Another aim often advanced to support exemptions laws is that they preserve to debtors the means to survive and to earn a living, thus contributing to their rehabilitation as citizens and to their capacity to repay their debts. . . . The philosophy of the exemptions laws is to encourage debtors to survive and to carry on their lives as economic and social elements in society." [Emphasis added]

[42] For all of these reasons, I conclude that an exemption under the CEA must be claimed and it is only the debtor or bankrupt who is entitled to claim it.

CONCLUSION

[43] It follows that the Respondent who failed to register the "lease-to-own" agreement in compliance with the PPSA is precluded from asserting the exemption that might be available to the debtor himself. This conclusion accords with the fundamental principle expressed by Iacobucci, J. on behalf of the Supreme Court in Re Giffen, supra, as follows (at pp. 119-120):

> "Section 20(b)(i) does not reorder federal priorities. Compliance with the perfection requirements of the PPSA is a precondition to maintaining secured creditor status under the BIA. In the event of bankruptcy, the consequences of a failure to perfect are spelled out in s. 20(b)(i). In effect, the secured party with an unperfected security interest becomes an unsecured creditor of the bankrupt:
> > . . . any secured party with a security interest in personal property, who fails to meet the requirements of the Act for perfecting its security interest prior to the date a petition is filed or an assignment is made, loses the status of a secured creditor in the bankruptcy and is relegated to unsecured status. (Cuming, supra, at pp. 25-26)."

[44] In VW Credit Canada, Inc. v. Roberts 2001 NSCA 42 (CanLII), (2001), 192 N.S.R. (2d) 79 at 92 (N.S.C.A.), the majority of the Court expressed the view, as summarized by Freeman, J.A. (dissenting on other grounds) that:

> "... the main points in Giffen make it clear that in the absence of a perfected security document, a creditor who would otherwise have had first priority becomes an unsecured creditor who as such must look to the Trustee for a share of the assets found in possession of the bankrupt."
> "Any property in possession of the bankrupt that is not protected by a perfected security document the Trustee must recognize passes into the hands of the Trustee and out of the hands of the bankrupt pursuant to s. 71(2) of the BIA. No matter how the property came into the possession of the bankrupt, after the receiving order or assignment, it is under the Trustee's control. The Trustee, not the bankrupt, must then divide all the property that was in the possession of the bankrupt into two heaps, as it were. One heap is for property exempt from division among creditors pursuant to s. 67(1). Even if the bankrupt makes no claim for the return of property in that heap, unsecured creditors have no right to it and the Trustee has no authority to divide it among them. The other heap contains all the remaining property, which is to be divided among creditors in accordance with the BIA."

[45] In my opinion, there is no policy or principled reason to confer upon a creditor who has failed to meet the requirements of the PPSA for perfecting its security interest, an advantage over other unsecured creditors.

[46] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and vacate the order of the learned chambers judge.

An airline in the modern era may consist of little more than a name, with its aircraft leased, its suppliers on week to week contracts and even its reservation and yield management systems outsourced to one of the global service providers such as Sabre or Galileo. Start-ups are relatively easy, balance sheets are often thin, and failure can be quick and (to outsiders) unexpected. Yet privatized Canadian airports and NAV Canada (the privatized civil air navigation service) are obliged by statute to provide service even to financially troubled airline operators. When an operator collapses leaving unpaid bills for airport charges and air navigation services, the question becomes: who takes the financial loss, the people who ultimately own the leased aircraft or the people who were obliged to (and did) provide the airport and navigation services?

Before going bankrupt, the airline companies Canada 3000 and Inter-Canadian operated their fleets of aircraft under leasing agreements with the respondent legal titleholders and were the registered owners of the aircraft under the Aeronautics Act. These airlines incurred approximately $33.75 million in charges for civil air navigation and airport services provided by NAV Canada and the airport authorities pursuant to the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act ("Airports Act") and the Civil Air Navigation Services Commercialization Act ("CANSCA").

The Collapse of Canada 3000

In November 2001, Canada 3000 applied for protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA"). NAV Canada and the airport authorities applied to a judge of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, under s. 56 of CANSCA and

s. 9 of the Airports Act, for authorization to seize and detain certain aircraft operated by the airline. The judge released the aircraft on the posting of security by the legal titleholders and later dismissed the seizure and detention motions, holding that the provisions in question of CANSCA and the Airports Act did not give the authorities priority over the rights of the legal titleholders to repossess the aircraft. He also held that the titleholders were not jointly and severally liable for the charges owed to NAV Canada under s. 55 of CANSCA, since they were not "owners" within the meaning of the Act. The majority of the Court of Appeal upheld the motions judge's decision.

The Collapse of Inter-Canadian

In December 1999, the airport authorities and NAV Canada obtained, pursuant to s. 56 of CANSCA and s. 9 of the Airports Act, an order of the Quebec Superior Court to seize and detain a number of aircraft operated by Inter-Canadian. The airline was subsequently deemed to have made an assignment in bankruptcy. Faced with the legal titleholders' claims that they were entitled to repossess the aircraft, the trustee in bankruptcy applied to the Superior Court for directions. The judge allowed a motion to release the aircraft in exchange for security. He later held that the legal titleholders were jointly and severally liable for the amounts owing. The majority of the Court of Appeal overturned the motions judge's ruling, concluding that the lessors' right to repossession took priority and that the legal titleholders were entitled to the return of their aircraft free and clear of the unpaid charges.

Held: The appeals and cross-appeals should be allowed in part.

This case is from first to last an exercise in statutory interpretation, and the issues of interpretation are closely tied to context. Prior to CANSCA and the Airports Act, civil air navigation and airport services were provided by the federal government. Under the current legislative scheme, the privatized NAV Canada and airport authorities operate as self-funded corporations that provide services on the basis of a cost-based tariff fixed by government regulation. They cannot withhold airport or navigation services even from an obviously failing airline. At the time the measures in question here were enacted, airline insolvencies and bankruptcies had become a fact of life throughout the airline industry. The legislative scheme shows that Parliament fully appreciated that in dealing with aircraft flown in and out of jurisdictions under complex leasing arrangements, the only effective collection scheme would be to render the aircraft themselves available for seizure, and thereafter to let those interested in them resolve their dispute about where the money should come from to pay the debts due to the service providers. [36-39]

No Joint and Several Liability for Charges for Air Navigation Services

The appeals are dismissed with respect to NAV Canada's claim that the legal titleholders are jointly and severally liable for outstanding civil air navigation charges incurred by the registered owners and operators of the failed airlines, since the legal titleholders are not "owners" within the meaning of s. 55 of CANSCA. It is clear from the statutory scheme and the legislative record that Parliament intended to create a "user-pay" system for civil air navigation services, and that the only "users" of those services within the contemplation of the Act are the airlines. While in some contexts the meaning of "owner" could include legal titleholders, a purposive interpretation of s. 55 excludes them. The definition of "owner" in s. 55(2) lists only persons in possession or legal custody and control of the aircraft. Section 55(1) should be similarly construed. Interpreting the list in s. 55(2) as exhaustive of ownership for the purposes of s. 55(1) is consistent with the rest of the statutory scheme governing aeronautics, the legislative history, and conforms with common sense. If NAV Canada's interpretation of s. 55 were correct, it would mean that a seizure and detention order issued in respect of Canada 3000's unpaid user charges could in theory attach not only to a legal titleholder's aircraft leased to Canada 3000, but also to any other aircraft to which that lessor holds title, including aircraft leased to other airlines. Moreover, to interpret "owner" as argued by NAV Canada would give preference to the ambiguous English text of s. 55 over the relatively clear French provision. A restrictive interpretation of "owner" is consistent with the policy and practice throughout the federal aeronautics scheme where the term "owner" is used to refer to the person in legal custody and control of the aircraft, not the legal titleholder. In enacting CANSCA, Parliament intended not to replace or override the existing regulatory framework but rather to fit cohesively within it. [41-61]

The Seizure and Detention Remedy

Although the legal titleholders are not directly liable for the charges due to the service providers, NAV Canada and the airport authorities were entitled to orders seizing and detaining the aircraft pursuant to s. 56 of CANSCA and s. 9 of the Airports Act, and are entitled now to have their claims (as assessed by the motions judges) satisfied out of the security posted in substitution for the aircraft. Whereas s. 55 of CANSCA identifies a group of persons who are made legally liable for the amounts owing, the detention remedy set out in s. 9 of the Airports Act and s. 56 of CANSCA has a different focus. This court-granted remedy entitles the authorities to possess the aircraft until the debt is paid or security furnished. It does not confer any interest in the beneficial ownership of the aircraft, and it cannot be circumvented by a leasing arrangement made between an airline and an aircraft lessor. Since ss. 9(1) and 56(1) do not distinguish between the unpaid charges accumulated by specific aircraft operated by a defaulting owner or operator, the amount in respect of which the seizure of each aircraft is made is the entire amount owed by that registered owner or operator. There is no limitation of debts on an aircraft by aircraft basis. [9-10] [62-75] [85-86]

Much of the potential unfairness complained of by the legal titleholders in the operation of the detention remedy can adequately be addressed by the motions judge. The right to seize and detain is not automatic. It requires a prior court authorization which may be subject to such terms as the court considers necessary. The court also has a discretion to limit the duration of the remedy by requiring the applicable authority to release a detained aircraft from detention prior to payment of the amount with respect to which the seizure was made. In any event, an authority that obtains an order is required to release a detained aircraft upon payment of the outstanding charges, or upon the provision of acceptable security therefor. Parliament has thus left the door open for the motions judge to work out an arrangement that is fair and reasonable to all concerned provided that the object and purpose of the remedy (to ensure the unpaid user fees are paid) is fulfilled. [73] [92]

The legal titleholders are sophisticated corporate players and are well versed in the industry in which they have chosen to invest. Since they can select which airlines they are prepared to deal with and negotiate appropriate security arrangements as part of their lease transactions, they are in a better position to protect themselves against this type of loss than are the airport authorities and NAV Canada. [71-72]

The intervention of bankruptcy proceedings in both Quebec and Ontario created procedural complications. In the case of Inter-Canadian, the detention remedies were applied for well before the assignment in bankruptcy. In the case of Canada 3000, the detention remedies were applied for while the CCAA stay was in effect and Canada 3000 remained the registered owner of the aircraft in question. In neither case did the aircraft become part of the bankrupt estate (because ultimate ownership was in the legal titleholder). The aircraft were legitimate targets of the detention remedies as they were still sitting on a Canadian airport tarmac and were still "owned or operated" (within the meaning of the relevant statutes) by the airlines at the relevant date. Given the authority to charge interest, the interest continues to run to the first of the date of payment, the posting of security or the bankruptcy. [77] [96]

In the proceedings involving Inter-Canadian it was not necessary for the Quebec Superior Court judge to resort to provincial law or, more specifically, to the Civil Code of Québec. The Aeronautics Act, the Airports Act, and CANSCA are federal statutes that create a unified aeronautics regime. Parliament endeavoured to create a comprehensive remedy that would be applicable across the country and would not vary from one province to another. This uniformity is especially vital since aircraft are highly mobile and move easily across jurisdictions. [78-79]

Two of the respondents leased to Canada 3000 the engines attached to two of the aircraft which, when seized, were airworthy. For the present purposes, the engines are part of the aircraft in respect of which charges were incurred and that are the subject of the detention. The Aeronautics Act does not envisage the dismantling of the aircraft (and thus of its value as security) on the tarmac. [87-89]

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

1 Binnie J. — When an airline collapses leaving unpaid bills for airport charges and air navigation services, the question becomes who takes the financial loss (or, as it is sometimes said, "the haircut"), the people who ultimately own the aircraft or the people who were obliged to (and did) provide the airport and navigation services?

2 The question lands before the Court because of the collapse of "Inter-Canadian (1991) Inc. Airline" in 1999 and, in 2001, of Canada 3000 Airlines Ltd. and Royal Aviation Inc. (collectively "Canada 3000"). The answer depends on the statutory interpretation to be given to provisions of the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act, S.C. 1992, c. 5 ("Airports Act"), and the Civil Air Navigation Services Commercialization Act, S.C. 1996, c. 20 ("CANSCA"). The important context for this interpretation is the unusual nature of the modern airline business.

3 After decades of financial turbulence, an airline in the modern era may consist of little more than a name, with its aircraft leased, its suppliers on week to week contracts and even its reservation and yield management systems outsourced to one of the global service providers such as Sabre or Galileo. Start-ups are relatively easy, balance sheets are often thin, and failure can be quick and (to outsiders) unexpected, as the history of Canada 3000 illustrates. When a financial collapse occurs (and these have been frequent in Canada and elsewhere in the past decade), there is little meat on the corporate bones for unsecured creditors. Doing business with such airline operators carries significant financial risks, yet the appellant Canadian airports operating under government supervision are obliged by statute to allow financially troubled airlines to make use of their services (and sometimes the airport will not know if an airline is in financial trouble or not). Airport costs are largely recovered through landing fees. If these and other fees go unpaid, the airport is out of pocket for the cost of the service it was obliged by law to provide.

4 "NAV Canada", the privatized successor to the former government-run civil air navigation system, is also obliged to offer its services to any aircraft flying through Canadian airspace on a cost-recovery basis. Its business is even riskier than that of the airports because quite often these aircraft do not even land in Canada, as in the case of transatlantic traffic flying the great circle route to and from the eastern seaboard of the United States: Pan American World Airways Inc. v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 215 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 565.

5 When Parliament adopted its policy of privatizing major airports and navigation services in the early 1990s putting such services on a commercial footing, potential investors were expected to insist on some assurance that they would in fact be financially viable serving the chronically unstable aviation business. Thus, Parliament decided to extend to the private operators of airport and navigation services a statutory power to apply to a superior court judge for an order to seize and detain aircraft until outstanding charges are paid, similar to the power Parliament had earlier conferred on the Crown in pre-privatization days under the Aeronautics Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. A-2, s. 4.5.

6 It is worth emphasizing that no power to seize and detain as such is conferred. A superior court judge is interposed between the aircraft sought to be seized and the airports or NAV Canada. As discussed below, the role of the judge is crucial to an understanding of the statutory detention remedy.

7 The respondents are primarily entities with the ultimate ownership of the aircraft in respect of which the charges in issue were incurred ("the legal titleholders"). Their position is that under the terms of their various leases with the defaulting airlines, they did not operate the aircraft, nor did they make use of the services for which charges were levied, nor did they derive benefit therefrom. They say that they are investors, and that when the lessees failed they were entitled to repossess their aircraft free of the charges which the defaulting airlines — not the legal titleholders — incurred. They consider it unjust that they were required in these cases to post security as a condition of removing "their" aircraft from the airports in question. The appellant airport authorities and NAV Canada, on the other hand, argue that the failure of Canada 3000 and Inter-Canadian reflects the sort of air carrier instability that Parliament rightly anticipated and in light of which it created the statutory remedies in question. Parliament must be taken to appreciate, they say, that an airline may be only a corporate shell but an aircraft under detention is a good, solid and enduring hostage for payment.

8 I agree with the courts below that the respondent legal titleholders are not subject to personal or corporate liability to pay the unpaid charges under s. 55 of CANSCA. But that is not to say that the aircraft are similarly unburdened.

9 In my view, the appellants are entitled to obtain judicially authorized seize and detain orders (hereinafter sometimes collectively referred to as the detention remedy) to be exercised against the security posted in substitution for the aircraft. The matters should be remitted to the motions judges to work out the details of the orders. Considered in the context in which the detention remedy was intended by Parliament to operate, the detention remedy cannot be circumvented as suggested by the respondents by the expedient of leasing arrangements made between the airlines and the aircraft lessors. The detention remedy is purely statutory and Parliament's intention to create an effective collection mechanism against the aircraft itself owned or operated by the person liable to pay the amount or charge must be given full effect.

10 On the other hand, the appellants' remedy, if an order is granted, is limited to possession. Simple possession under the statutes does not confer any interest in the beneficial ownership of the aircraft. I do not think the appellants' further claim to the airborne equivalent of a maritime lien is well founded, nor do they have any "implied" power to sell the aircraft once detained. They get what the statute says they get — a right to apply for a judicial order to seize and detain the aircraft until payment — no more, and no less.

11 For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeals and the cross-appeals in part, and return the seizure and detention applications to the respective motions judges to be dealt with in accordance with this judgment.

I. Facts

12 In 1992, the Airports Act privatized airports formerly owned and operated by the federal government. In 1996, CANSCA implemented the same objective in relation to Canada's civil air navigation services. Thus NAV Canada was incorporated as a non-profit corporation for the purpose of developing, operating and maintaining the civil air navigation system; see House of Commons Debates, vol. 133, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., March 25, 1996, at p. 1153. CANSCA implemented the transfer of what was Transport Canada's civil air navigation services to NAV Canada and established the commercial and economic regulatory arrangements for the continued operation of those services; see House of Commons Debates, vol. 134, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., May 15, 1996, at p. 2821.

A. Canada 3000

13 On November 8, 2001, Canada 3000 applied for protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). The effect of an initial court order made on the same day stayed all proceedings by creditors pending the filing of a plan of arrangement. Although the stay contemplated the continuation of operations, some five hours later the airlines' management issued a press release declaring that the airlines had ceased operations. The next day, November 9, a further order was issued grounding the fleet and providing for the return of aircraft operated by the airlines to Canada.

14 On November 9, 2001, NAV Canada applied to the Ontario Superior Court of Justice under s. 56(1) of CANSCA for an authorization to seize and detain certain aircraft operated by Canada 3000. The Greater Toronto Airport Authority ("GTAA") applied for relief against Canada 3000 but did not at that time seek leave of the court to seize and detain any aircraft.

15 On November 10, 2001, the directors and officers of Canada 3000 resigned. The next day the Canada 3000 companies were put into bankruptcy. At that time, the Canada 3000 companies owed approximately $7.4 million to NAV Canada, $13 million to the GTAA, and $8.35 million to the other Canadian airport authorities. On November 12, the GTAA moved to seize and detain aircraft under s. 9 of the Airports Act and on November 23, the other airport authorities applied for similar relief.

16 The detention remedy sought by the authorities was in relation to 38 aircraft operated by the Canada 3000 companies and collectively worth approximately US $1.1 billion. Despite the existence of the legal titleholders, all of the aircraft were registered in the name of Canada 3000 as owner under the Aeronautics Act. Canada 3000 held leases with the various respondents in respect of 36 aircraft. The lessors retained legal title to the aircraft. At the time of the CCAA application, rental payments under the leases were significantly in arrears.

17 The termination provisions varied somewhat from lease to lease. Under some, the leases came to an end and the lessors became entitled to repossession upon the granting of the CCAA order, under others by the cessation of operations, and under the rest by the assignment in bankruptcy. The CCAA stay operated, in effect, as an interim bar to repossession (see s. 11.31 CCAA). At the time the detention remedy was sought, the aircraft sought to be seized were grounded at the Canadian airports listed in the style of cause of the various proceedings.

18 On December 3, 2001, after the aircraft had been grounded for close to a month, the motions judge approved the terms of their release on the posting of security for 110 percent of the amounts alleged to be owed. The motions judge then heard the seizure and detention motions through December and into January 2002, and dismissed them on May 7, 2002. The airport authorities and NAV Canada appealed and on January 20, 2004, the Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed their appeal.

B. Inter-Canadian

19 Inter-Canadian operated its fleet of aircraft under leasing agreements with the legal titleholders but it too was the registered owner under the Aeronautics Act. On November 27, 1999, Inter-Canadian ceased operations and laid off 90 percent of its employees. At that point, it had accumulated unpaid charges totalling approximately $5 million owing to NAV Canada and to the airport authorities.

20 Through early December 1999 the airport authorities and NAV Canada moved to seize and detain a number of the aircraft. This was authorized by four orders made by the Quebec Superior Court between December 8 and 17. Before the seizure motions were launched, however, one of the respondents, Renaissance Leasing Corporation, had purported to terminate its lease with Inter-Canadian. The aircraft nevertheless remained on the tarmac at Dorval airport.

21 On January 5, 2000, Inter-Canadian filed a notice of intention to make a proposal to its creditors pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. The airline's creditors rejected its proposal in March and the company was deemed retroactively to have made an assignment in bankruptcy as of January 5. Faced with the legal titleholders' claims that they were entitled to repossession of the aircraft, the trustee in bankruptcy applied to the Superior Court for directions.

22 On July 7, 2000, the Superior Court allowed a motion to release the aircraft in exchange for security set at 150 percent of the claims of the airport authorities and NAV Canada. On November 9, 2000, Tremblay J., having heard the application on its merits, confirmed the validity of the detention and also held the legal titleholders liable for the amounts owing. His ruling was overturned by a majority decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, which held that the lessors' right to repossession took priority and that the legal titleholders were entitled to the return of their aircraft free and clear of the unpaid charges.

II. Judicial History

(1) Ontario Superior Court of Justice (Ground J.)

23 The motions judge concluded that the legal titleholders were not jointly and severally liable for the charges owed to NAV Canada under s. 55 of CANSCA. They were not "owners" within the meaning of the Act because none of the aircraft were registered in their name. Nor were any of the titleholders in possession of the aircraft when the charges were incurred. In his view, "the word 'owner' in [CANSCA] should not be interpreted to include persons who do not have custody or control of the aircraft, do not operate the aircraft, and do not make use of the air navigation services in respect of which the navigation charges are levied": 2002 CanLII 49584 (ON SC), (2002), 33 C.B.R. (4th) 184, at para. 52.

24 Further, the motions judge concluded that the seizure and detention remedies found in CANSCA and the Airports Act did not create a lien or security interest that ranked in priority to the ownership or perfected security rights of third parties. He preferred the analogy of a Mareva injunction:

I am not persuaded, however, that the legislation granting such detention rights should be interpreted as creating rights against third parties having ownership or perfected security interests in the aircraft such that they, in effect, become liable for the debts of third parties and must extinguish those debts before they can enforce their contractual rights to repossess the aircraft or enter into possession of the aircraft to realize on their security. [para. 43]

25 Accordingly, he dismissed the claims of NAV Canada and the airport authorities.

(2) Ontario Court of Appeal

(a) Cronk J.A., for the Majority

26 Cronk J.A. agreed with the motions judge that the titleholders were not jointly and severally liable under s. 55 of CANSCA. A restrictive definition of "owner" excluding legal titleholders was consistent with the user-pay model established by CANSCA, the broader regulatory system and the relevant legislative history, all of which demonstrated Parliament's intent to limit liability to "persons having legal custody and control and persons otherwise in possession of aircraft": 2004 CanLII 32169 (ON CA), (2004), 69 O.R. (3d) 1, at para. 118.

27 Cronk J.A. also agreed that the seizure and detention provisions in CANSCA and the Airports Act do not give the authorities priority over the rights of the titleholders to repossess the aircraft:

I conclude that the remedies under the Detention Provisions, if granted, do not create rights in the Aircraft that rank in priority to the interests in the Aircraft of the Lessors, the legal titleholders to the Aircraft, in the face of a claim for repossession and recovery of the Aircraft by the Lessors. . . . The Detention Provisions are intended to apply to aircraft of persons having legal custody and control or who are otherwise in possession of the aircraft. [para. 190]

28 In the view of the majority, even if the aircraft had been properly detained, the engines attached to the aircraft and leased to Canada 3000 by two of the respondents could be removed by their respective owners. The appeal of the various authorities was dismissed.

(b) Juriansz J. (ad hoc), Dissenting in Part

29 Juriansz J. (ad hoc, now J.A.) would have allowed the appeal in respect of the detention remedies. In his view, these remedies focus on the aircraft and not the persons liable to pay. As long as the aircraft is owned or operated by a person liable to pay then it may be the subject of an application to seize and detain it. The fact that other persons may have property interests in the aircraft is of no consequence:

The remedy is "in addition to any other remedy available for the collection" of the outstanding charges. The remedy is not confined to collection of outstanding charges from persons liable for the charges. The remedy is not directed to persons at all, but rather to "aircraft", and permits the Authorities, under court supervision, to seize, to detain and to refuse to release the aircraft until somebody has satisfied the outstanding charges. [para. 255]

Juriansz J. also held that the detention provisions apply to the leased engines since they were affixed to the aircraft that were subject to the detention remedy.

B. Inter-Canadian

(1) Quebec Superior Court (Tremblay J.)

30 The motions judge held the titleholders to be jointly and severally liable for the unpaid charges due to NAV Canada under s. 55 of CANSCA. CANSCA and the Airports Act provide for a right to retain the aircraft operated by a party that has not paid its charges. The motions judge relied on arts. 1592 and 1593 of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64, and determined that the authorities' right of retention of the aircraft took priority over the lessors' interests: [2000] R.J.Q. 2935.

31 Accordingly, by order dated November 9, 2000, the motions judge confirmed the validity of the seizures, and declared the respondents liable to pay the overdue charges.

(2) Quebec Court of Appeal

(a) Pelletier and Morissette JJ.A., for the Majority

32 Pelletier and Morissette JJ.A. reversed the motions judge's decision and absolved the legal titleholders from liability for unpaid service charges to NAV Canada under s. 55 of CANSCA. In their view, limiting the definition of "owner" to the enumerated categories in s. 55(2) was the only interpretation consistent with both the English and French versions of the statute and the statutory context. They noted that NAV Canada's interaction is primarily with the user of the aircraft, not the legal titleholders. They concluded, at 2004 CanLII 41230 (QC CA), (2004), 247 D.L.R. (4th) 503, para. 106, that [translation] these aircraft are in no way liable for the debts of Inter-Canadian for the simple reason that they do not belong to this debtor.

33 Moreover, in their view, neither the airport authorities nor NAV Canada had any right to an order to seize and detain the aircraft in priority to the rights of the legal titleholders. They rejected the motions judge's resort to the Civil Code.

(b) Nuss J.A., Dissenting

34 Nuss J.A. concluded that the intention and purpose of the statutory provisions would be defeated if the legal titleholders could obtain release of the aircraft without payment of the charges. However, he limited the liability of a legal titleholder to an obligation to pay the charges incurred in the operation of aircraft of which it is the titleholder:

. . . the titleholder, to obtain release of its seized aircraft must only pay all the charges, in the use of the airport, incurred (and unpaid) by the operator in the operation of any aircraft owned by the same titleholder. [Emphasis added; para. 145.]

III. Statutory Provisions

35 The statutory provisions are reproduced in the relevant paragraphs of the reasons.

IV. Analysis

36 This case is from first to last an exercise in statutory interpretation, and the issues of interpretation are, as always, closely tied to context. The notion that a statute is to be interpreted in light of the problem it was intended to address is as old at least as the 16th century; see Heydon's Case (1584), 3 Co. Rep. 7a, 76 E.R. 637. In a more modern and elaborate formulation, it is said that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87).

37 As this Court noted in 1915, part of the context is "the condition of things existent at the time of the enactment": Grand Trunk Railway Co. of Canada v. Hepworth Silica Pressed Brick Co. 1915 CanLII 65 (SCC), (1915), 51 S.C.R. 81, at p. 88. At the time the measures in question here were enacted, airline insolvencies and bankruptcies had become a fact of life throughout the airline industry. Many of the planes flown in and out of and across Canada were leased to, and flown by, airlines in, or close to, bankruptcy protection. Under the interpretation offered by the respondents and the majority decisions of the Courts of Appeal, the detention remedy would be opposable to everybody but the titleholder, whose aircraft is often the only asset to survive the financial wreckage. Parliament would be taken to have intended a remedy that is least effective when it is most needed. It is more likely that Parliament fully appreciated that in dealing with aircraft flown in and out of jurisdictions under complex leasing arrangements, the only effective collection scheme is to render the aircraft themselves available for seizure, and thereafter to let those interested in them, including legal titleholders, registered owners, sublessors and operators, resolve their dispute about where the money is to come from to pay the debts due to the service providers. I should add that I agree with Juriansz J. that the legal titleholders are not without benefit from the services provided, although the benefit is indirect. Without the day to day flight operations the legal titleholders would have no business. They lease the aircraft intending them to be used in the very activities for which the services are provided. By and large, the legal titleholders are sophisticated corporations. They are knowledgeable about the ways of the industry in which they have chosen to participate.

38 Part of the important context is the commercial reality of the marketplace where a statute is intended to function. Here the privatized appellants provide services on the basis of a cost-based tariff fixed by regulation. Prior to CANSCA and the Airports Act, civil air navigation and airport services were provided by the federal government. Central to the statutory scheme is the fact that these service providers are self-funded and intended to be financially viable and independent; see CANSCA, ss. 7 and 8; House of Commons Debates, March 25, 1996, at pp. 1152-54. The privatized service providers do not possess the financial resources of the Crown. The statutory remedies are clearly intended to promote financial viability within a risky business environment and to make privatization attractive and practicable to potential investors.

39 Another important commercial fact is that not only are NAV Canada and the airport authorities required to provide services according to a cost-based tariff, but they cannot withhold services from even an obviously failing airline. Pursuant to the lease agreement between Transport Canada and the Airport Authorities, the airports cannot limit the access of aircraft to their facilities except in cases of bad weather or emergency conditions; see Ottawa Macdonald-Cartier International Airport Ground Lease, s. 8.10.02. Similarly, NAV Canada is obligated under s. 9 of CANSCA to provide all users with its civil air navigation services. This reflects the obligation undertaken by Canada under international agreements; see, e.g., Air Transport Agreement Between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America, February 24, 1995 ("USA-Canada Open-Skies Agreement"), Annex I, s. 1.

40 With these preliminary comments on context (and in particular the vitally important commercial context in which these statutes were designed to operate), I turn to the two major questions raised by the appeals. Firstly are the legal titleholders liable for the debt incurred by the registered owners and operators of the failed airlines to the service providers? Secondly, even if they are not so liable, are the aircraft to which they hold title subject on the facts of this case to judicially issued seizure and detention orders to answer for the unpaid user charges incurred by Canada 3000 and Inter-Canadian?

A. Are the Legal Titleholders Jointly and Severally Liable to NAV Canada Under Section 55 of CANSCA for Outstanding Civil Air Navigation Charges?

41 In my view, on a purposeful interpretation of s. 55, the answer is no. I agree with Ground J. and with the unanimous view of both Courts of Appeal that the legal titleholders are not personally liable for the unpaid charges. Section 55 provides:

55. (1) [Joint and several liability] The owner and operator of an aircraft are jointly and severally liable for the payment of any charge for air navigation services imposed by the Corporation in respect of the aircraft.

(2) [Meaning of "owner"] In subsection (1), "owner", in respect of an aircraft, includes

(a) the person in whose name the aircraft is registered;

(b) a person in possession of an aircraft as purchaser under a conditional sale or hire-purchase agreement that reserves to the vendor the title to the aircraft until payment of the purchase price or the performance of certain conditions;

(c) a person in possession of the aircraft as chattel mortgagor under a chattel mortgage; and

(d) a person in possession of the aircraft under a bona fide lease or agreement of hire.

Digitized by Google

42 The appellants contend that the word "owner" in s. 55(1) should be given its ordinary meaning to include the legal titleholders. Who, more than they, should be considered an "owner"? The legal titleholders respond that it would be absurd to make them jointly and severally liable for civil air navigation charges related to air operations in which they did not participate, any more than the owner of a rented car should be liable for charges incurred by a renter in using a toll bridge. They point out that the practical effect of NAV Canada's argument would be mischievous. In this case, for example, Canada 3000 leased a number of aircraft from International Lease Finance Corporation ("ILFC") based in California, one of the largest aircraft leasing companies in the world. If NAV Canada's interpretation of s. 55 is correct, it would mean that a seizure and detention order issued in respect of Canada 3000's unpaid user charges could in theory attach not only to the ILFC aircraft leased to Canada 3000, but also to any other aircraft to which ILFC holds title, including aircraft leased to other airlines (e.g. Lufthansa, British Airways or United Airlines). Thus the wreckage created by Canada 3000's collapse could spread disruption widely and perhaps unjustifiably trigger a further crisis in other airlines.

43 It seems clear from the statutes and the legislative record that Parliament intended to create a "user-pay" scheme for civil air navigation services, and that the only "users" of the civil air navigation services within the contemplation of the Act are the airlines, not the legal titleholders.

(1) The Meaning of "Owner"

44 If s. 55(1) were read in isolation, the ordinary and grammatical meaning of "owner" would include the legal titleholder. However, this Court held, in Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, 2002 SCC 42, that one must consider the "entire context" of a provision before one can determine if it is reasonably capable of multiple interpretations. . . .

. . . It is necessary, in every case, for the court charged with interpreting a provision to undertake the contextual and purposive approach set out by Driedger, and thereafter to determine if "the words are ambiguous . . .". [Underlining added; paras. 29-30.]

45 Accordingly, to paraphrase the Court's decision in Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 26 (CanLII), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 533, 2005 SCC 26, it is necessary to suspend judgment on the precise scope of the word "owner" in s. 55(1) and first to examine the "contextual" elements of the Driedger approach.

(2) Statutory Context of Section 55

46 Understandably, the appellants lay great emphasis on the fact that s. 55(2) is introduced by the words

In subsection (1), "owner", in respect of an aircraft, includes . . . .

followed by a list of four subsections. In the French text, on the other hand, the introductory words are

Pour l'application du paragraphe (1), "propriétaire", relativement à un aéronef, s'entend . . . .

There was, as might be expected, much argument over the words "includes" and "s'entend" in s. 55(2). NAV Canada argues that "includes" expands the definition of owner beyond the enumerated groups and that its ordinary meaning encompasses titleholders. The legal titleholders respond that the sense of "s'entend" in the French text is usually conveyed by the English word "means", which generally precedes a definition to be construed as exhaustive, and which would therefore exclude them from personal liability.

47 The English word "includes" may also, depending on the context, precede a list that exhausts the definition; see, e.g., Dilworth v. Commissioner of Stamps, [1899] A.C. 99 (P.C.), at pp. 105-6; R. v. Loblaw Groceteria Co. (Manitoba) Ltd., 1960 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1961] S.C.R. 138.

48 In this case, in my view there are three significant reasons for adopting a restrictive interpretation of the word "includes" in s. 55(2), and thereby excluding the legal titleholders from liability under s. 55(1).

49 Firstly, it is significant that the French version signals a closed list; see Uniform Law Conference of Canada, Drafting Conventions for the Uniform Law Conference of Canada (online), s. 21(4). The shared meaning is not conclusive when such an interpretation would be contrary to the purpose and intent of the statute, but it is preferred; see Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038, at pp. 1070-72; Schreiber v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 62 (CanLII), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 269, 2002 SCC 62, at para. 56; and R. Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (4th ed. 2002), at pp. 79-90. Further, where one of the linguistic versions is broader than the other, the common meaning favours the more restricted or limited meaning; see Schreiber; R. v. Dubois, 1935 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1935] S.C.R. 378. As the English version is ambiguous, indicating that the list could be exhaustive or expansive depending on the context, the fact that the relatively clear French version signals that "owner" is restricted to the persons listed in s. 55(2) is a factor weighing against NAV Canada's expansive interpretation.

50 Secondly, I conclude (as did the Courts of Appeal) that interpreting the list enumerated in s. 55(2) as exhaustive of ownership for the purposes of s. 55(1) is consistent with the regulatory scheme as a whole and its legislative history, outlined below. In restricting "owner" to those in possession and legal custody and control of the aircraft, s. 55(2) is brought into conformity with the meaning that the word "owner" carries throughout the interlocking statutes that regulate aeronautics. For example, under the Canadian Aviation Regulations, SOR/96-433 ("CARs"), only a person who has legal custody and control may be a registered owner. Sections 55(2)(b) to (d) all explicitly state that the "owner" must be in possession of the aircraft. Also of significance is s. 55(2)(d), which includes as owner someone "in possession of the aircraft under a bona fide lease". No reference is made therein to the lessor. Parliament put its mind to aircraft leasing agreements and decided that the person in possession of the aircraft is the owner for the purposes of user charges.

51 Thirdly, exclusion of legal titleholders is consistent with Parliament's manifest intent to limit the scope of liability to "users" of NAV Canada's civil air navigation services. Section 32 of CANSCA authorizes NAV Canada to impose charges only on a "user", which s. 2(1) of the Act defines as "an aircraft operator." Part III of CANSCA lays out detailed mechanisms through which NAV Canada may impose fees. All of its provisions contemplate that it is the user who will be charged. Section 36(3)(a)(i) states that notice of changes to existing charges and notice of new charges must be sent to representative user organizations. Section 37(4) states that NAV Canada must advise representative user organizations once a new charge has been approved. Section 44 limits the right to appeal charges to "any user, group of users or representative organization of users".

52 In contrast, titleholders are not provided with notice of rates or accounts of the charges that their aircraft accumulate. In this case, the respondents in the Canada 3000 case were only notified of the $7.4 million owing to NAV Canada the day before the airline filed for protection under the CCAA. Thus Cronk J.A. observed that > the charges scheme of the CANSCA does not protect aircraft lessors and secured creditors from the possible imposition by NAV Canada of improper or arbitrary navigation charges precisely because it is not envisaged that such persons will have any liability for such charges. [para. 101]

53 In summary, in my view, the statutory context supports the exclusion of the legal titleholders from the definition of owner under s. 55 of CANSCA.

(3) The Broader Legislative Framework

54 As stated, aeronautics in Canada is governed by a complex web of statutes, regulations and international conventions. CANSCA and the Airports Act are part of this broader legislative framework. In R. v. Ulybel Enterprises Ltd., 2001 SCC 56 (CanLII), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 867, 2001 SCC 56, the Court emphasized, at para. 52, "the principle of interpretation that presumes a harmony, coherence, and consistency between statutes dealing with the same subject matter". See also Bell ExpressVu, at para. 27.

55 The policy and practice throughout the federal regulatory scheme is to use the term "owner" to refer to the person in legal custody and control of the aircraft, not the legal titleholder. The CARs, for example, define owner as "the person who has legal custody and control of the aircraft" (s. 101.01(1)). The Aeronautics Act refers only to "registered owners" and, under s. 4.4(5), only the operator or registered owner may face liability for charges imposed under that Act. Section 3(1) defines a registered owner as the person to whom a certificate of registration has been issued and the CARs make clear that an aircraft may only be registered by an owner who, again, must have legal custody and control of the aircraft; see ss. 202.15 to 202.17. Section 2(2) of CANSCA itself states that "[u]nless a contrary intention appears, words and expressions used in this Act have the same meaning as in subsection 3(1) of the Aeronautics Act." I appreciate that arguments are available to counter these points but in my view the legal titleholders have the better side of the debate.

56 Internationally, the Convention on International Civil Aviation, December 7, 1944, Can. T.S. 1944 No. 36 (the "Chicago Convention"), does not require legal title to correspond with registered ownership. Article 19 states that registration shall be in accordance with the laws of the contracting State. It is common ground that, by virtue of ss. 202.15, 202.16 and 202.17 of the CARs, an aircraft may only be registered in the Canadian Civil Aircraft Register by the "owner" of the aircraft as that term is defined under s. 101.01(1) of the CARs, and that that person is the entity having legal custody and control of the aircraft. Thus an airline operating aircraft in Canada under a long-term lease is named on the Certificate of Registration as "owner" of the aircraft, notwithstanding that title is actually held by the lessor; see D. H. Bunker, Canadian Aviation Finance Legislation (1989), at p. 764. We have been given no reason why the privatization legislation should be held to depart so strikingly from Canadian regulatory practice.

(4) Legislative History

57 Though of limited weight, Hansard evidence can assist in determining the background and purpose of legislation; Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at para. 35; R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at p. 484. In this case, it confirms Parliament's apparent intent to exclude legal titleholders from personal liability for air navigation charges. The legislative history and the statute itself make it clear that Parliament did not intend CANSCA to replace or override the existing regulatory framework but rather to fit cohesively within it. In introducing CANSCA, the Minister of Transport stated that the Aeronautics Act, which establishes the essential regulatory framework to maintain safety in the aviation industry, "will always take precedence over the commercialization legislation" (House of Commons Debates, March 25, 1996, at p. 1154). In the Ontario Court of Appeal, Cronk J.A. highlighted a number of other instances where government spokespersons emphasized to Members of Parliament that CANSCA was to fit within the existing regulatory framework which generally favours the narrow meaning of "owner"; see, e.g., House of Commons Debates, May 15, 1996, at p. 2834; May 29, 1996, at p. 3144; June 4, 1996, at pp. 3394 and 3410; and Debates of the Senate, vol. 135, 2nd Sess., 35th Parl., June 10, 1996, at pp. 588-89.

58 In 1985, during passage of the Aeronautics Act, a concern was raised in Parliament that liability under s. 4.4(5) (that Act's liability provision) could extend to legal titleholders. In response, the Government inserted the term "registered owner". The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport specifically stated that the change was made to ensure that liability did not extend to those who had a security or other financial interest in the aircraft; House of Commons Debates, vol. IV, 1st Sess., 33rd Parl., June 20, 1985, at pp. 6065-66.

59 In 1996, the Government considered Bill C-20 (which became CANSCA) as it transferred the operation of the civil navigation system from Transport Canada to NAV Canada. The Clause by Clause Analysis brief presented to the Senate Committee explained that s. 55 is based on the wording of the equivalent section of the Aeronautics Act which, as stated, restricts "owner" to registered owner; see "Clause by Clause Analysis for the Civil Air Navigation Services Commercialization Act", as presented to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, at pp. 51-52. However, the textual discrepancy noted above was not addressed.

(5) Conclusion on the Section 55 Issue

60 A purposive interpretation of s. 55 that takes into account the foregoing considerations compels rejection of the position urged by NAV Canada. Moreover, and importantly, the narrow interpretation of "owner" in s. 55(1) conforms with common sense. It would be a severe disruption to the functioning of the airline industry if, as a result of Canada 3000's failure to pay its charges, NAV Canada could seize and detain an aircraft operated by, for example, Air Canada. There is no reason to think Parliament intended to let the damage caused by a failed airline expand beyond that airline's fleet of aircraft.

61 Accordingly, applying Driedger's contextual approach to s. 55(1) of CANSCA, I agree with the Courts of Appeal that the titleholders of the aircraft are not jointly and severally liable for the charges due to NAV Canada. They are not "owners" within the meaning of that section.

B. The Detention Remedy

62 If the legal titleholders are not directly liable for the charges due to the service providers, they argue that it would be unfair and contradictory to hold their aircraft hostage for the payment. Section 56 of CANSCA and s. 9 of the Airports Act should be interpreted consistently with s. 55(1) of CANSCA, the legal titleholders argue, and their right to repossess the aircraft on termination of the lease should take priority over the statutory remedy.

63 On the other hand, Nuss J.A., dissenting in the Quebec Court of Appeal, put the contrary position:

If the titleholder could obtain release of the seized aircraft without the payment of the outstanding charges or providing security, the intention and purpose of the Detention Provisions enacted by Parliament would be defeated. This is so because the debt is constituted of charges incurred by the operator of the aircraft (who is often, as in this case, the registered owner) and not by the titleholder. Thus, if the contention of [the titleholders] were to prevail, the titleholder, who is neither the operator nor the "owner" within the meaning of the statutes, could always obtain release of the aircraft and the charges would not be paid. The recourse provided by Parliament would, inevitably, be of no avail. [para. 126]

I believe that Nuss J.A. is correct on this point.

64 The relevant provisions, which authorize applications to a superior court judge of the province in which any aircraft owned or operated by the person liable to pay the charge or amount is situated, are expressed in the two statutes in similar terms.

65 Section 56 of CANSCA provides:

56. (1) [Seizure and detention of aircraft] In addition to any other remedy available for the collection of an unpaid and overdue charge imposed by the Corporation for air navigation services, and whether or not a judgment for the collection of the charge has been obtained, the Corporation may apply to the superior court of the province in which any aircraft owned or operated by the person liable to pay the charge is situated for an order, issued on such terms as the court considers appropriate, authorizing the Corporation to seize and detain any such aircraft until the charge is paid or a bond or other security for the unpaid and overdue amount in a form satisfactory to the Corporation is deposited with the Corporation.

(2) [Application may be ex parte] An application for an order referred to in subsection (1) may be made ex parte if the Corporation has reason to believe that the person liable to pay the charge is about to leave Canada or take from Canada any aircraft owned or operated by the person.

Digitized by Google

(3) [Release] The Corporation shall release from detention an aircraft seized under this section if
(a) the amount in respect of which the seizure was made is paid;
(b) a bond or other security in a form satisfactory to the Corporation for the amount in respect of which the seizure was made is deposited with the Corporation; or
(c) an order of a court directs the Corporation to do so.

66 Section 9 of the Airports Act, under which the airport authorities bring their seizure and detention applications, is to the same effect.

9. (1) [Seizure and detention for fees and charges] Where the amount of any landing fees, general terminal fees or other charges related to the use of an airport, and interest thereon, set by a designated airport authority in respect of an airport operated by the authority has not been paid, the authority may, in addition to any other remedy available for the collection of the amount and whether or not a judgment for the collection of the amount has been obtained, on application to the superior court of the province in which any aircraft owned or operated by the person liable to pay the amount is situated, obtain an order of the court, issued on such terms as the court considers necessary, authorizing the authority to seize and detain aircraft.
(2) [Idem] Where the amount of any fees, charges and interest referred to in subsection (1) has not been paid and the designated airport authority has reason to believe that the person liable to pay the amount is about to leave Canada or take from Canada any aircraft owned or operated by the person, the authority may, in addition to any other remedy available for the collection of the amount and whether or not a judgment for the collection of the amount has been obtained, on ex parte application to the superior court of the province in which any aircraft owned or operated by the person is situated, obtain an order of the court, issued on such terms as the court considers necessary, authorizing the authority to seize and detain aircraft.
(3) [Release on payment] Subject to subsection (4), except where otherwise directed by an order of a court, a designated airport authority is not required to release from detention an aircraft seized under subsection (1) or (2) unless the amount in respect of which the seizure was made is paid.
(4) [Release on security] A designated airport authority shall release from detention an aircraft seized under subsection (1) or (2) if a bond, suretyship or other security in a form satisfactory to the authority for the amount in respect of which the aircraft was seized is deposited with the authority.
(5) [Same meaning] Words and expressions used in this section and section 10 have the same meaning as in the Aeronautics Act.

67 According to these provisions, the airport authorities or NAV Canada (upon obtaining a court order) may take possession of an aircraft and detain it. The aircraft must be either "owned" or "operated" by a person who is liable to pay. Either is a sufficient basis for an application.

68 The key difference between the joint and several liability provisions in s. 55 of CANSCA and the detention remedy provided for in s. 56 of CANSCA and s. 9 of the Airports Act is that the seizure and detention remedy lies against the aircraft. Whereas s. 55 identifies a group of persons who are made legally liable for the amounts owing, the detention remedy has a different focus. It provides for a right to possess aircraft until the debt is paid or security provided.

69 The legal titleholders argue that the claim of NAV Canada and the airport authorities to detain the aircraft must yield to their right under their respective leases to repossession. They liken the seizure and detention remedies to a Mareva injunction, in which the assets are frozen while various parties work out their respective entitlements; see Aetna Financial Services Ltd. v. Feigelman, 1985 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 2. However, in my view, there is no need to resort to analogies, especially loose analogies (e.g. Mareva injunctions are interlocutory, whereas the detention remedy is available whether or not a judgment for the collection of the charge or amount has been obtained. Moreover, Mareva injunctions are directed at persons (Aetna Financial Services, at pp. 25-26), whereas the seizure and detention remedy targets the aircraft itself).

70 The CARs, adopted pursuant to the Aeronautics Act, provide that an "operator" in respect of an aircraft "means the person that has possession of the aircraft as owner, lessee or otherwise" (s. 101.01(1)). At the dates of the applications for seizure and detention orders, Canada 3000 and Inter-Canadian were still the registered owners of the aircraft. Accordingly, if the Court is to read the words of the detention remedy in the context of the realities of this industry previously discussed, it seems to me that those remedies must be available against the aircraft of Canada 3000 (except any aircraft already repossessed by the titleholder prior to the CCAA application on November 8, 2001) and Inter-Canadian. (Once a titleholder reclaims possession, it becomes an operator in possession within s. 55(1) of CANSCA. However, as its possession post-dates the charges, no personal liability is incurred on that account.)

71 It is difficult to endorse the indignation of the legal titleholders with respect to detention of their aircraft until payment is made for debts due to the service providers. They are sophisticated corporate players well versed in the industry in which they have chosen to invest. The detention remedies do not affect their ultimate title. Investors who have done their due diligence will recognize that detention remedies have deep roots in the transport business. In The Emilie Millon, [1905] 2 K.B. 817 ("Mersey Docks"), for example, the English Court of Appeal examined a statute that stipulated that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board could cause a ship to be detained until all harbour and tonnage payments had been made despite the fact that the ownership of the ship did not correspond to the debtor who had incurred the charges. The ruling in that case reflects the traditional scope of this type of remedy (at p. 821):

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have a right by statute to detain the vessel until the dock tonnage rates and harbour rates are paid. That is an express statutory right, and the board have nothing to do with any sale of the vessel to a purchaser. That is a matter which only concerns those who are interested in the vessel. It does not concern the board. The board are entitled to detain the vessel, whoever is the owner, until the rates are paid. The order appealed against deprives them of that right, and without their consent purports to give them an option to try and make some claim to a lien upon or right against the fund in priority to other claimants. The board have no such lien or right. If this vessel had been allowed to leave the dock, the board would have been left to make a futile claim against the fund in court. [Emphasis added.]

This type of provision is not uncommon in the airline business, see, e.g., decisions under a differently worded U.K. Act such as Channel Airways Ltd. v. Manchester Corp., [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 456 (Q.B.), at p. 461, in which it was held that the Manchester Corporation Act "mean[t] what it sa[id]", and that the city could detain aircraft in respect of which charges had been incurred until those charges had been paid. The legal titleholders face this problem on the other side of the Atlantic. It is a risk they manage there. No reason was given as to why they cannot manage it here.

72 The legal titleholders are in a better position to protect themselves against this type of loss than are the airport authorities and NAV Canada. The legal titleholders can select which airlines they are prepared to deal with and negotiate appropriate security arrangements as part of their lease transactions with the airlines. In the case of the aircraft at issue in these appeals, many if not all of the leases provided for substantial security deposits. For example, the total amount posted by Canada 3000 to the ILFC as security deposits for airport fees and charges was approximately $15,305,500. It is unnecessary to catalogue all of the possible security arrangements, but these deposits demonstrate a legal titleholder's ability to negotiate protection at a time when the airline is solvent to cover the amounts in overdue charges that the airline may eventually be required to pay to the statutory service providers.

73 I agree with Cronk J.A. (at para. 133) that the detention remedy under the statutes is subject to several constraints: (i) the remedy is not automatic and requires prior court authorization; (ii) the remedy is discretionary and may be subject to such terms as the court considers necessary; (iii) under s. 9(3) of the Airports Act and s. 56(3)(c) of CANSCA, the court also has a discretion to limit the duration of the remedy by requiring the applicable authority to release a detained aircraft from detention prior to payment of the amount with respect to which the seizure was made; (iv) in any event, an authority that obtains an order under the detention provisions is required to release a detained aircraft upon payment of the outstanding amount or charges in respect of which the seizure was made or upon the provision of acceptable security therefor (ss. 9(3) and 9(4) of the Airports Act and ss. 56(1) and 56(3) of CANSCA); and (v) an order is not available under the detention provisions if the aircraft in respect of which the order is sought is exempt from seizure and detention under provincial law (s. 10(1) of the Airports Act and s. 57(1) of CANSCA) or, in the case of the Airports Act, under a regulation made by the Governor in Council (s. 10(2)).

74 On the other hand, the conclusion of Juriansz J., dissenting in part, was correct that "the wording of the Detention Provisions makes apparent that aircraft may be seized and detained without regard to the property interests of persons who are neither the registered owners nor the operators of the aircraft under the legislation. As long as the aircraft is owned or operated by a person liable to pay the outstanding charges, it may be the subject of an application to seize and detain it. The fact that there may be other persons, who are not liable to pay the outstanding charges but have property interests in the aircraft, is of no consequence" (para. 239).

75 I turn, then, to a number of additional arguments raised on both sides which, in my view, with respect, unnecessarily complicate a straightforward task of statutory interpretation.

(1) Whether or Not a Lien Existed

76 In the Ontario case, there was considerable debate about whether the detention remedy created a lien. However, as the English Court of Appeal commented in Mersey Docks, there was no need for the port authority "to . . . make some claim to a lien" (p. 821). Nor is it necessary here. In this case, as in Mersey Docks, the remedy is purely a creature of statute. Whether or not a lien could be said to arise by operation of law is perhaps of theoretical interest but it has no practical bearing on the result in these appeals.

(2) Effect of the Bankruptcy Proceedings

77 The intervention of bankruptcy proceedings in both Quebec and Ontario created procedural complications. For present purposes, it is sufficient to note that the detention remedies in Quebec were applied for well before the assignment in bankruptcy. In Ontario, the detention remedies were applied for while the CCAA stay was in effect and Canada 3000 remained the registered owner of the aircraft in question. In neither case did the aircraft become part of the bankrupt estate (because ultimate ownership was in the legal titleholder). The aircraft were nevertheless legitimate targets of the detention remedies as they were still sitting on a Canadian airport tarmac and were still "owned or operated" (within the meaning of the relevant statutes) by the airlines at the relevant date.

(3) Resort to the Civil Code of Québec

78 In the Quebec Superior Court, Tremblay J. held that the seizure and detention provisions create a right similar to that found in arts. 1592 and 1593 of the Civil Code of Québec. However, with respect, there is no need to make reference to provincial law or, more specifically, to the Civil Code, and to do so here is inappropriate. Section 56 of CANSCA and s. 9 of the Airports Act specifically state that the remedy is to be "in addition to any other remedy", which includes remedies under provincial law.

79 The Aeronautics Act, the Airports Act and CANSCA are federal statutes that create a unified aeronautics regime. Parliament endeavoured to create a comprehensive code applicable across the country and not to vary from one province to another. This uniformity is especially vital since aircraft are highly mobile and move easily across jurisdictions.

80 NAV Canada also relied on ss. 8.1 and 8.2 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, to urge that s. 56 of CANSCA provides for a civiliste right of retention. However, neither section applies in this case. Section 8.1 states that if in interpreting an enactment it is necessary to refer to a province's rules, principles or concepts forming part of the law of property and civil rights, reference must be made to the rules, principles and concepts in force in the province at the time the enactment is being applied.

If it were necessary to resort to provincial law, then the provincial law to be used is that of the province in which the provision is being applied: Peoples Department Stores Inc. (Trustee of) v. Wise, 2004 SCC 68 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 461, 2004 SCC 68. Here, for reasons stated, resort to provincial law is not necessary.

81 Section 8.2 of the Interpretation Act states that when an enactment contains both civil law and common law terminology, or terminology that has a different meaning in the civil law and the common law, the civil law terminology or meaning is to be adopted in the Province of Quebec and the common law terminology or meaning is to be adopted in the other provinces.

82 The issue here is not one of conflicting terminology. The language used in relation to the detention remedy is perfectly apt to make Parliament's intention clear bilingually and bijuridically. In short, resort to the Civil Code was neither necessary nor appropriate.

(4) Existence of a Power of Sale

83 The appellants argue that the existence of a seizure and detention implies (in their favour) a power of sale. No such power is contained in CANSCA or the Airports Act. Nor is it necessarily implied in the creation of a power to seize and detain. The only claim that the authorities have under federal aeronautics law is the claim to possession of the aircraft until their user charges are paid.

(5) Presumption Against Interference With Private Rights

84 The Ontario motions judge applied a narrow approach to the Detention Remedy on the basis that it invades what would otherwise be the proprietary rights of the legal titleholders. Reference was made to Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp., 1997 CanLII 377 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 411, where it was held that the legislation at issue in that case did not impose a charge in the nature of a lien because of the absence of clear and unambiguous language. However, only if a provision is ambiguous (in that after full consideration of the context, multiple interpretations of the words arise that are equally consistent with Parliamentary intent), is it permissible to resort to interpretive presumptions such as "strict construction". The applicable principle is not "strict construction" but s. 12 of the Interpretation Act, which provides that every enactment "is deemed remedial, and shall be given such fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation as best ensures the attainment of its objects"; see Bell ExpressVu, at para. 28:

Other principles of interpretation — such as the strict construction of penal statutes and the "Charter values" presumption — only receive application where there is ambiguity as to the meaning of a provision. (On strict construction, see: Marcotte v. Deputy Attorney General for Canada, 1974 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1976] 1 S.C.R. 108, at p. 115, per Dickson J. (as he then was); R. v. Goulis (1981), 33 O.R. (2d) 55 (C.A.), at pp. 59-60; R. v. Hasselwander, 1993 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 398, at p. 413; R. v. Russell, 2001 SCC 53 (CanLII), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 804, 2001 SCC 53, at para. 46. . . .)

In my view, there is no ambiguity in the statutory language creating the detention remedy and thus resort to "strict construction" is not called for.

(6) Limitation of Debts on an Aircraft by Aircraft Basis

85 The titleholders argue that it would be extremely unfair that one titleholder's aircraft, however recently leased, may ultimately be held hostage for all of the unpaid user charges of the airline that flew it. They contend that if (which they deny) the titleholders must pay charges in order to recover an aircraft, they should only be required to pay the charges incurred by the individual aircraft sought to be released, as opposed to the charges outstanding in relation to the whole fleet of the defaulting airline.

86 However, the statute says that an aircraft operated by the person liable to pay the amount can be seized and, absent further court order, need not be released until the entire amount owed by that operator has been paid. This point is made clearly by the release provisions in s. 9(3) of the Airports Act and s. 56(3) of CANSCA. The authorities must only release the aircraft if "the amount in respect of which the seizure was made is paid". Since s. 9(1) and s. 56(1) do not distinguish between the amounts accumulated by specific aircraft operated by a defaulting owner or operator, it seems clear that the amount in respect of which the seizure was made is the entire amount owed by that registered owner or operator.

(7) Limitation of Seizure to Exclude Engines

87 Two of the respondents, RRPF Engine Leasing Ltd. and Flight Logistics Inc. (the "engine lessors"), leased to Canada 3000 the engines attached to two of the aircraft which, when seized, were airworthy. The engine lessors argue that they should be entitled to repossess their engines because seizure of the aircraft is not seizure of the engines. They cite Laskin J. (as he then was) in Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. of Canada v. Industrial Acceptance Corp., 1970 CanLII 140 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 357, for the proposition that the doctrine of accession does not apply to a removable and identifiable object such as the engines.

88 In my view, the engines are part of the aircraft for present purposes. Engines and equipment such as onboard computers fall under the definition of "aeronautical product" in the Aeronautics Act (s. 3(1)). If the engines could be removed, third-party lessors could cannibalize any "aircraft propeller or aircraft appliance or part or the component parts of any of those things, including any computer system and software"; see Aeronautics Act, s. 3(1).

89 Firestone Tire is not of assistance here. In that case, a truck was repossessed under a conditional sales contract. The vendor in possession of the seized truck sought to retain the tires mounted on the truck as against the claim of the unpaid conditional seller of the tires. Laskin J. was concerned about the windfall one creditor might receive when repossessing the property of another unpaid creditor for which he "has given no value" (p. 359). Here, no beneficial interest is implicated. The engines are attached to the aircraft in respect of which charges were incurred and that are the subject of the detention. The Act does not envisage the dismantling of the aircraft (and thus of its value as a security) on the tarmac.

(8) Effect of Sub-Leases

90 The respondents Ansett Worldwide Aviation, U.S.A. and MSA V leased three aircraft to Canada 3000, two of which, in turn, had been leased by those respondents from other persons under head leases. These sub-lessors stand in no better position than the legal titleholders, and the aircraft in which they have a leasehold interest were subject to seizure.

C. The Important Role of the Motions Judge

91 The detention remedy does not create any rights unless, and until, a court order is made authorizing the seizure and detention of an aircraft. Instead, the provisions create potential remedies, available at the discretion of the court and subject to such conditions as the court considers necessary, as Cronk J.A. noted, at para. 134.

92 Much of the potential unfairness which the titleholders envisage in the operation of the detention remedy can be addressed by the motions judge. Section 56(3)(c) of CANSCA states that NAV Canada must release the aircraft "if . . . an order of a court directs the Corporation to do so". Similarly, s. 9(3) of the Airports Act states that an airport authority need not release the aircraft until the charges are paid, "except where otherwise directed by an order of a court". Parliament has left the door open for the motions judge to work out an arrangement that is fair and reasonable to all concerned, provided that the object and purpose of the remedy (to ensure the unpaid user fees are paid) is fulfilled. It would be open to a judge on a detention remedy hearing to determine an allocation amongst the titleholders that reflected such factors as the number of seized aircraft, the amount of charges in relation to a particular aircraft or the short duration of an aircraft's life spent in the doomed fleet. The judge need not make each aircraft hostage for the full amount of the unpaid charges, provided the result is that the authority is paid in full. In this way, what may otherwise be portrayed as a draconian remedy can be reduced to a fair and proportionate judicial response to the airline collapse.

D. Interest

93 The Airports Act explicitly authorizes the airport authorities to charge interest on the overdue amounts. Section 9(1) defines the amount on account of which the seizure was made as the "amount of any landing fees, general terminal fees or other charges related to the use of an airport, and interest thereon". While CANSCA makes no explicit mention of interest, ss. 32 to 35 lay out a broad authority for NAV Canada to set and charge its fees. A procedure has been established under s. 35(1)(a), whereby the Minister of Transport approves the charges imposed by NAV Canada. The Minister has approved a regulation imposing interest. Notice was provided to airline operators (although not the legal titleholders) and no judicial review of this regulation was sought.

94 The time value of money is universally accepted in ordinary commercial practice; see Bank of America Canada v. Mutual Trust Co., 2002 SCC 43 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 601, 2002 SCC 43. There is no reason for this principle to be excluded in the case of privatized aeronautics services, and it is not surprising that NAV Canada has been permitted to incorporate interest on unpaid charges into its charging scheme.

95 The question then turns to how long the interest can run. The airport authorities and NAV Canada have possession of the aircraft until the charge or amount in respect of which the seizure was made is paid. It seems to me that this debt must be understood in real terms and must include the time value of money.

96 Given the authority to charge interest, my view is that interest continues to run to the first of the date of payment, the posting of security or bankruptcy. If interest were to stop accruing before payment has been made, then the airport authorities and NAV Canada would not recover the full amount owed to them in real terms. Once the owner, operator or titleholder has provided security, the interest stops accruing. The legal titleholder is then incurring the cost of the security and losing the time value of money. It should not have to pay twice. While a CCAA filing does not stop the accrual of interest, the unpaid charges remain an unsecured claim provable against the bankrupt airline. The claim does not accrue interest after the bankruptcy: ss. 121 and 122 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

97 A particular issue is raised in the Quebec appeals regarding proper notice of the interest charges. This is an issue to be dealt with by the motions judge when these matters are returned for further consideration and disposition.

V. Disposition*

98 For these reasons, I would allow the appeals and cross-appeals in part, as follows:

1. I would dismiss the appeals of NAV Canada seeking to hold the respondents liable in their personal/corporate capacity;
2. I would allow the appeals of NAV Canada and the airport authorities of the dismissal of their seizure and detention applications and remit those applications to the respective motions judges to be dealt with in accordance with these reasons;
3. I would set aside the orders requiring NAV Canada and the airport authorities to reimburse the respondents for the aircraft detention costs;
4. I would allow the appeals of NAV Canada and the GTAA of the ruling that the engine lessors are entitled to repossess the leased engines;
5. Interest on overdue charges continues to run to the first of the date of payment, the posting of security or bankruptcy.

In other respects, the appeals and cross-appeals will be dismissed. Aéroports de Montréal, St. John's International Airport Authority Inc. and Charlottetown Airport Authority Inc. are entitled to their costs in the Quebec appeals. All other parties shall bear their own costs.

on appeal from the federal court of appeal

Bankruptcy -- Property of bankrupt -- Stay of proceedings -- Overpayment of unemployment insurance benefits before bankruptcy -- Overpayment reimbursed by source deduction from benefits payable to bankrupt during bankruptcy

-- Whether s. 49 of Bankruptcy Act contravened -- Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 48, s. 49(3) -- Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, s. 49.

Appellant received unemployment insurance benefits to which he was not entitled. When he made an assignment of his property under the Bankruptcy Act, appellant owed respondent Commission $922. The latter filed its proof of claim with the trustee. During the bankruptcy, respondent, relying on s. 49(3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, reimbursed itself from the benefits it would normally have paid appellant. As unemployment insurance benefits are exempt from execution, they are not part of the common fund available to creditors. After being discharged, appellant asked the Federal Court to declare that the deduction at source by respondent was unlawful. His action was dismissed and the Federal Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment. The appeal at bar is to determine whether recovery of an overpayment by deduction from the benefits at source is a remedy or proceeding against the debtor or his property within the meaning of s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The retentions made by respondent from the unemployment insurance benefits payable to appellant contravened s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. The remedies and proceedings mentioned in that subsection must be broadly interpreted and cover any kind of recovery, judicial or extrajudicial. These remedies and proceedings are not confined to property of the bankrupt which is part of the fund available for his creditors. The word "property" used in s. 49(1) is defined in s. 2, and is given a very broad definition not including such a limitation. Literal interpretation of the clear wording of the section supports the objectives of the Act, which is concerned not only with an equitable distribution of the debtor's property but also with his rehabilitation.

I--Facts and Proceedings

2. The parties were agreed on the facts summarized by the unanimous judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal:

1. Appellant owed respondent Commission the sum of $922.00 when he made an assignment of his property under the Bankruptcy Act;

Digitized by Google

2. This sum of $922.00 was owed by appellant under sections 47 and 49 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971; however, the debt had been incurred without fraud on the part of appellant, with the result that it was a debt from which he should normally be released by the order of discharge (see section 148 of the Bankruptcy Act);

3. The claim of the Commission was [a] claim provable in bankruptcy and the Commission filed its proof of claim with the trustee;

4. During the bankruptcy, when the Commission had not yet received anything from the trustee and appellant had not yet been discharged, unemployment insurance benefits became payable to appellant;

5. Rather than paying appellant all the benefits owing to him, the Commission withheld the sum of $922.00 owed to it by appellant from these benefits.

3. On July 3, 1979 an order of discharge was made concerning appellant, and on July 27, 1979 he brought against respondent a declaratory action in which he asked the Federal Court to [TRANSLATION] declare that defendant acted unlawfully in retaining unemployment insurance benefits amounting to $951, benefits which plaintiff was entitled to during his bankruptcy.

4. (Counsel for the appellant admitted at the hearing that the amount at issue is in fact $922, as stated by the Federal Court of Appeal, and not $951.)

5. The Federal Court dismissed the action and the Federal Court of Appeal, which considered the action as one for recovery of the monies retained, affirmed the trial judgment: hence the appeal.

6. In addition to the facts, the two parties admitted that:

7. (a) the Crown and respondent are bound by the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, in view of s. 187 of that Act;

8. (b) respondent's claim was a preferred debt under s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act, a debt which, if it had not been for the retention of benefits, would have been paid before the claims of ordinary creditors, had there been a distribution;

9. (c) unemployment insurance benefits which had become payable to appellant could not be assigned, charged, attached, anticipated or given as security, as a consequence of s. 48 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 48, s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act and art. 553.12 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

II--Legislation and Point at Issue

10. Section 49 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 is what imposes on a claimant a duty to repay any overpayment and which provides the procedure for recovery, including in subs. (3) retention from subsequent payments, which respondent applied in the case at bar:

49. (1) Where a person has received benefit under this Act or the former Act for a period in respect of which he is disqualified or any benefit to which he is not entitled, he is liable to repay an amount equal to the amount paid by the Commission in respect thereof.

(2) All amounts payable under this section or section 47, 51 or 52 are debts due to Her Majesty and are recoverable as such in the Federal Court of Canada or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act.

(3) Where a benefit becomes payable to any claimant, the amount of any indebtedness described in subsection (1) or (2) may, in the manner prescribed, be deducted and retained out of the benefit payable to him.

11. This method of recovering an overpayment, by retention from subsequent benefits, is a technique which is found in many statutes having a social purpose, federal as well as provincial. See, for example, Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-5, s. 65; Old Age Security Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. O-6, s. 22; Pension Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-7, s. 23(8); Social Aid Act, R.S.Q. 1977, c. A-16, s. 25; Act respecting the Québec Pension Plan, R.S.Q. 1977, c. R-9, s. 148.

12. The provision on which respondent's principal argument is based is s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act:

47. The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

...

(b) any property that as against the brankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides.

13. Finally, the provision which is at the heart of the dispute is s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, which must be cited in both versions:

49. (1) Upon the filing of a proposal made by an insolvent person or upon the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the debtor or his property or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the trustee has been discharged or until the proposal has been refused, unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

Digitized by Google

49. (1) Lors de la déposition d'une proposition faite par une personne insolvable ou lors de la faillite de tout débiteur, aucun créancier ayant une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite n'a de recours contre le débiteur ou contre ses biens, ni ne doit intenter ou continuer une action, exécution ou autres procédures pour le recouvrement d'une réclamation prouvable en matière de faillite, tant que le syndic n'a pas été libéré ou que la proposition n'a pas été refusée, sauf avec l'autorisation du tribunal et aux conditions que ce dernier peut imposer.

14. This provision is preceded by the subheading "Suspension des procédures", "Stay of Proceedings".

15. The question that must be decided is the following: does the recovery of an overpayment by retention from subsequent benefits, applied by respondent, constitute within the meaning of s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act a remedy against the debtor or his property, an action, execution or other proceeding which had been stayed except, as provided by this section, with leave of the Court or on such terms as the Court might impose?

III--Trial Judgment and Judgment a quo

16. The trial judgment simply cited and approved the submissions made by counsel for the defendant Commission. Among the arguments so approved by the trial judge, the following are the two principal ones:

[TRANSLATION] (1)...the setoff allowed by . . . the Unemployment Insurance Act, is neither a remedy nor a proceeding within the meaning of s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act. It is in fact an administrative act of recovery which is allowed by a specific statute and which, in my opinion, is not in the nature of a proceeding.

(2)...by thus reimbursing itself by recovery, the Unemployment Insurance Commission is not making payments to itself which are preferential over all other creditors, for its benefits cannot be attached and are not part of the fund available for creditors.

17. It would appear that the Federal Court of Appeal only adopted the first argument approved by the trial judge. Its entire reasoning is contained, be it said with respect, in one sibylline sentence:

In my view the right granted to the Commission under subsection 49(3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 is not a remedy, action, execution or proceeding. Subsection 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act does not therefore prevent it from being exercised.

18. The Federal Court of Appeal did not say why the right granted to the Commission by s. 49(3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 is not a remedy or a proceeding. It may be that this is because the right is not a remedy or proceeding of a judicial nature. It is also possible that this is for other reasons which the Federal Court of Appeal did not disclose.

19. In this Court, counsel for the appellant sought to show, first, that the remedies and proceedings covered by s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act are not confined to remedies and proceedings of a judicial nature and may include recovery by retention from subsequent benefits, such as that applied by respondent. Counsel for the appellant also sought, on the other hand, to answer the second argument approved by the trial judge, and adopted by counsel for the respondent, with further clarification, in support of the findings of the Federal Court of Appeal.

20. These two points must now be discussed.

IV-- General Nature of Stay of Proceedings Imposed by s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act

21. Appellant in my view properly relied upon the English version of s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, where the word recours is rendered by the word "remedy", giving to it and to the words "autres procédures" ("other proceedings") a very broad meaning which covers any kind of attempt at recovery, judicial or extrajudicial. Black's Law Dictionary (5th ed. 1979), defines "remedy":

The means by which a right is enforced or the violation of a right is prevented, redressed, or compensated.

Remedy means any remedial right to which an aggrieved party is entitled with or without resort to a tribunal.

22. Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law (2nd ed. 1977), vol. 2, gives an almost identical definition:

the means by which the violation of a right is prevented, redressed, or compensated. Remedies are of four kinds: (1) by act of the party injured . . .; (2) by operation of law . . .; (3) by agreement between the parties ...; (4) by judicial remedy, e.g. action or suit. The last are called judicial remedies, as opposed to the first three classes which are extrajudicial.

23. The courts have also interpreted the stay of proceedings imposed by s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act very broadly.

24. Thus, in In re Standard Pharmacy Ltd. (1926), 7 C.B.R. 424, the City of Edmonton wished to use a proceeding mentioned in its Charter to collect unpaid taxes, consisting alternatively of a distress of personal property or a simple notice to the trustee that there were taxes which had not been paid by the bankrupt. Tweedie J. of the Supreme Court of Alberta, sitting in bankruptcy, cited s. 8B of the Bankruptcy Act--now s. 49(1)--and wrote, at pp. 430-31:

This section applies to both judicial and extra-judicial proceedings; and distress being a remedy within the meaning of that section the section is, in my opinion, an absolute bar to any proceedings judicial or otherwise to enforce payment of taxes without the leave of the Court, which was not granted to, nor applied for on behalf of, the city.

In regard to the notice to be given by "the collector or other person authorized to collect the taxes" to the trustee in bankruptcy as provided in sec. 376a of the Charter it is evident from the reading of that section that the notice is a substitute for the distress, and that it was intended that such simple method, instead of the actual physical seizure of the property, should be the remedy to be pursued. Notice is a remedy or proceeding within the meaning of sec. 8B of The Bankruptcy Act and what has been said in regard to distress applies with equal force in regard to the notice and the city is deprived of its right to enforce payment in priority by the provisions of sec. 8B of The Bankruptcy Act.

25. At page 430, he gave the reason underlying this decision:

The city by reason of the authorized assignment was deprived of any opportunity of gaining priority in the distribution of the assets which it might have acquired in the enforcement of its remedies.

26. In Hudson v. Brisebois Bros. Construction Ltd. (1982), 42 C.B.R. (N.S.) 97, the Alberta Court of Appeal ordered that the trustee be repaid money distributed by the sheriff to certain creditors, in ignorance that the debtor was bankrupt at the time of the distribution. At page 103, Lieberman J. wrote in the unanimous reasons of the Court:

Section 49(1) has the effect of staying the proceedings taken by the appellant prior to the payment out by the sheriff. Thus the payment out by the sheriff, although completely innocent, contravenes s. 49(1) and is without authority.

27. In Quebec, public utilities have used s. 73 of the Gas, Water and Electricity Companies Act, R.S.Q. 1977, c. C-44, as authority for interrupting the service of a bankrupt subscriber. In a judgment, Re Plastiques Valsen Inc.; Gaz Metropolitain Inc. v. St-Georges (1981), 41 C.B.R. (N.S.) 7 (Que. S.C.), Jacques Dugas J. reviewed the decided cases, which as he recognized are far from being unanimous: but he nevertheless dismissed an application by Gaz Metropolitain Inc. for an order directing the trustee to give him access to the bankrupt's premises in order to cut off the natural gas service. He wrote (at pp. 10-11):

[TRANSLATION] Applicant enjoys no guarantee under the Bankruptcy Act. The rule for distributing property of a bankrupt is that the ordinary creditors receive equal shares of the common fund, once the trustee's expenses and secured debts have been paid. It would be contrary to the scheme of the Bankruptcy Act if it could by threatening to interrupt the service obtain more than the other ordinary creditors would get.

In Re Colonial Indust. Equipment Ltd.; Mercure v. Compagnie Bell Téléphone du Can., [1971] C.A. 564, the Court of Appeal vacated the payment which the telephone company had succeeded in prising from its debtor, six days before its bankruptcy, by threatening to interrupt service: this was a cancellable preferential payment. It would be unusual, to say the least, if the applicant could obtain from the trustee preference which the debtor could not give it: surely this is what the applicant is seeking here by making its threat of interrupting service.

The Court considers that the threat to interrupt service made by applicant is designed to obtain from the trustee preferential treatment for its debt, and this is contrary to the Bankruptcy Act. The Court has a duty to protect creditors against abusive use of s. 73 of the Gas, Water and Electricity Companies Act so as to obtain advantageous treatment at variance with the scheme of the Bankruptcy Act.

28. This Court of course does not have to decide whether the conclusions of these judgments are correct, but in my opinion the courts were right to give, expressly or by implication, a broad meaning to the stay of proceedings imposed by s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. This broad meaning is confirmed by the fact that the legislator took the trouble to exclude actions against either the creditor or his property.

29. As Houlden and Morawetz wrote in Bankruptcy Law of Canada, vol. 1, p. F-70.1, under s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act:

An ordinary unsecured creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy can only obtain payment of that claim subject to and in accordance with the terms of the Bankruptcy Act. The procedure laid down by that Act completely excludes any other remedy or procedure.

30. The Bankruptcy Act governs bankruptcy in all its aspects. It is therefore understandable that the legislator wished to suspend all proceedings, administrative or judicial, so that all the objectives of the Act could be attained.

31. Accordingly, I consider that s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act is sufficiently broad to include recovery by retention from subsequent benefits, such as the recovery at issue here.

V-- Section 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and the Immunity from Seizure of Unemployment Insurance Benefits

32. Respondent replied, however, through its counsel, that even if s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act is so broadly worded as to include an extrajudicial remedy or proceeding, such a remedy or proceeding is not a remedy or proceeding within the meaning of s. 49(1) when its purpose is to recover property of the bankrupt which, in view of its immunity from seizure, does not fall within the fund available for his creditors, as provided by s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Digitized by Google

33. Respondent submitted that s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act must be interpreted in accordance with the principles underlying the Act, and what is in its submission the purpose or reason for the stay of proceedings imposed by s. 49(1).

34. In the factum submitted by its counsel, respondent explained the purpose of s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act as follows:

[TRANSLATION] The true meaning of this section is determined by certain general principles underlying the Bankruptcy Act, both as regards the bankrupt's property and with respect to unsecured creditors.

So far as property owned by the bankrupt is concerned, it is worth recalling the rule in s. 50(5) of the Bankruptcy Act, that on a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, "a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and subject to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment...."

As we know, bankruptcy does not have the effect of depriving a bankrupt of all his assets, without exception. The property which passes to the trustee is limited to that which, under s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, constitutes what the Act calls the property of the bankrupt "divisible among his creditors", that is, property the proceeds from which are to be distributed pari passu among the unsecured creditors.

The property in question includes anything belonging to the bankrupt on the date of the bankruptcy or which may devolve upon him before his discharge. On the other hand, it does not include property which, as against the bankrupt, is immune from seizure. It accordingly follows that in a bankruptcy proceeding the property of a bankrupt actually falls into two categories: what falls within the assets of his bankruptcy and what remains external to it.

If the situation is considered from the standpoint of unsecured creditors, the fundamental principle of the Act is that the latter are to be regarded as on an equal footing in relation to each other: their rights are limited to being collocated pari passu in the proceeds of sale of property held by the bankruptcy, in accordance with the order of priority specified in s. 107 of the Bankruptcy Act.

So as to give full effect to the fundamental principles discussed above, it was necessary for the legislator to put property that would be part of the bankruptcy fund beyond the reach of individual actions that might be brought by any of the bankrupt's creditors, seeking payment of their own debts from the property in question and so obtaining an advantage over other creditors. The solution decided on by the legislator was to provide that, from the date of the bankruptcy, no creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy, including an execution proceeding, against the debtor or his property, unless with leave of the Court and on such terms as the Court may impose. As can be seen from the wording of s. 49(1), such a prohibition applies to any type of remedy the aim of which is to recover a claim provable in bankruptcy, regardless of whether it is a remedy that can be exercised by an action, or is a remedy in the nature of an execution proceeding.

35. Respondent concluded with this argument, which constitutes the crux of its second submission:

[TRANSLATION] It follows, therefore, that the only remedies to which s. 49(1) applies are those the effect of which is to take out of the property included in the bankruptcy anything which under the Act devolves on the trustee for the common benefit of creditors of the bankrupt. This section thus clearly cannot be interpreted, in our opinion, as prohibiting the exercise of a right which has no adverse effect on the common fund available to creditors of the bankruptcy.

36. Respondent submitted that, as unemployment insurance benefits are property which is immune from seizure, they are not part of the common fund available to creditors, and the retentions made by respondent did not have the effect of depriving the ordinary creditors of anything which belonged to the bankruptcy creditors' common fund. Such retentions cannot then be regarded as contravening s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act.

37. To this apparently plausible argument, the gist of which is contained in respondent's factum, counsel for the latter added another in their oral pleading, which also at first sight seems to carry considerable weight. It is the following: in reimbursing itself by retentions from subsequent benefits due to appellant, respondent did something which conferred a benefit on the mass of ordinary creditors--not only did it pay itself from property to which they had no right, but, at the same time, it released those ordinary creditors from the lien which it is given by s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act and in accordance with which it would have been paid before them in the event of a distribution.

38. However, the interpretation suggested by respondent comes up against a major obstacle: without adequate justification, it rejects the method of grammatical or literal interpretation of a very clear provision. This interpretation suggests that words be added to s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, by interpreting the word "property" as referring to "property divisible among his creditors". These words, which are contained in s. 47, are not found in s. 49(1) of the Act. That subsection uses only the word "property", of which s. 2 of the Act gives a broad definition not including the limitation in s. 47.

39. In The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (1984), Prof. Pierre-André Côté wrote at p. 209:

Assuming a statute to be well drafted, an interpretation which adds to the terms of its provisions or deprives them of meaning is suspect.

Since the judge's task is to interpret the statute, not to create it, as a general rule he should reject an interpretation which adds to the terms of the law. Legislation is deemed to be well drafted and to express completely what the legislator wanted to say:

"It is a strong thing to read into an Act of Parliament words which are not there, and in the absence of clear necessity it is a wrong thing to do." Per Lord Mersey, Thompson v. Goold & Co., [1910] A.C. 409, 420.

40. Respondent is thus asking the Court to make a distinction where the legislator makes none, and this prima facie is an error of interpretation.

41. Respondent sought to justify this distinction in reliance on a fundamental objective of the Bankruptcy Act, namely, an equitable distribution of property to the creditors.

42. First, it should be said that this is not the sole objective of the Bankruptcy Act. As Estey J. wrote, in giving the unanimous judgment of this Court in Industrial Acceptance Corp. v. Lalonde, 1952 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1952] 2 S.C.R. 109, at p. 120:

The purpose and object of the Bankruptcy Act is to equitably distribute the assets of the debtor and to permit his rehabilitation as a citizen, unfettered by past debts.

43. The rehabilitation of the bankrupt is not the result only of his discharge. It begins when he is put into bankruptcy with measures designed to give him the minimum needed for subsistence. These measures are contained in s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act concerning, inter alia, the exemption from execution of certain property, and in s. 48, regarding the wages of the bankrupt, which applies notwithstanding s. 47 and which empowers the Court to make an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration as the court may determine having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

44. The part of the wages paid to creditors does not necessarily correspond to the part which may be attached. It may be more or less "having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt". Houlden and Morawetz, op. cit., vol. 1, write at pp. F-66 and F-69:

Since the enactment of s. 48, wages have been removed from the operation of s. 47 so that no part thereof vests in the trustee to be divided among creditors unless he makes an application under s. 48 and then only to the extent allowed by the court: Re Giroux (1983), 45 C.B.R. (N.S.) 245, 41 O.R. (2d) 351, 146 D.L.R. (3d) 103 (S.C.).

Applications under s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act come down not to a question of law, but of fact; that is, whether the bankrupt after being given credit for his reasonable living expenses has excess funds which might be used to pay creditors. The Senate Committee poverty lines, while not binding on the court, are persuasive evidence: Re Michael; Re Superior Films Shops (1980), 34 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (Ont. S.C.).

45. In my view, appellant was right to see an analogy between the wages of a bankrupt and unemployment insurance benefits, and to argue that the partial or complete elimination of the latter may deprive the bankrupt of his means of subsistence, contrary to another objective of the Bankruptcy Act. If retentions from unemployment insurance benefits cannot be made without the Court's authority, as specified in s. 49(1), the Court will ensure that this other objective is not lost sight of.

46. Moreover, the sole objective of the Bankruptcy Act mentioned by respondent, namely an equitable distribution of the bankrupt's property to his creditors, and the interests of the latter, will also be taken into account by the Court, to which the respondent will apply pursuant to s. 49(1) for authority to recover the overpayment by retention from subsequent benefits. The Court may grant such authorization, refuse it or grant it only in part or on certain conditions, taking all the circumstances into account.

47. In other words, the grammatical or literal interpretation of s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, which makes retentions from unemployment insurance benefits subject to authorization by the Court, is not an obstacle to pursuing any of the objectives of the Bankruptcy Act. On the contrary, it makes possible the coherent pursuit of those various objectives, under the supervision of the Court. It may be added that it will also have the effect of facilitating the administration of the bankruptcy by the trustee, who will thus automatically be informed of retentions made by creditors who have also filed claims in the bankruptcy.

48. I accordingly consider that not only has respondent not shown any justification for an interpretation of s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act other than the grammatical or literal one, but the latter is the only possible one in view of the general scheme of the Act. As Elmer A. Driedger writes, in an oft-cited passage from his text Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87:

Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.

49. Before concluding, it may be worth mentioning that the Unemployment Insurance Regulations, SOR/71-324, also take into account the fundamental needs of a claimant, and even his bankruptcy. Section 175 of the Regulations in effect in 1977, when the bankruptcy in the case at bar occurred, provides:

Write-off of benefit wrongly paid

175. (1) Amounts owing under sections 47, 49, 51 and 52 of the Act may be declared by the Commission to be no longer due and owing, where

(a) the sums in the aggregate do not exceed five dollars, and a benefit period is not current;

(b) the claimant is deceased;

(c) the claimant is a discharged bankrupt;

(d) the claimant is an undischarged bankrupt, the final dividend has been received and the trustee has been discharged; and

(e) the Commission considers that, having regard to all the circumstances,

(i) the sums are uncollectable, or

(ii) the repayment of the sums would result in undue hardship to the claimant.

(2) Where the Commission, pursuant to subsection (1), declares that an amount is no longer due and owing, that amount shall be written off.

50. Neither of the two parties relied on this provision, which was not discussed. Counsel for the respondent simply referred to it in his oral argument, saying that he had not reproduced it in his factum, as he did not see how it was relevant.

51. It is probably unnecessary to say any more on the point. However, it may be observed that the additional benefit given to the bankrupt by this provision depends on the discretion of an administrative commission. It exists in addition to the rule stated in s. 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, but it in no way detracts from it.

VI--Conclusions

52. I am of the view that we should allow the appeal, set aside the judgments of the Federal Court of Appeal and the trial court, allow appellant's action and declare that respondent acted unlawfully by withholding, without the authorization of the bankruptcy court, unemployment insurance benefits totalling $922, to which appellant was entitled during his bankruptcy. The whole with costs in all courts.

Appeal allowed with costs.

APPEARANCES:

HEIDI M. ZETZSCHE- Counsel for the Trustee in Bankruptcy, Price Waterhouse
PAUL ERNEST PIGEON- The Respondent Was Not Present and Was Not Represented by Counsel
DATE OF HEARING: December 7, 1992

This is an application by the petitioner for an order declaring her interest in the matrimonial home to be in priority to any interest of the Trustee in Bankruptcy.

Mr. and Mrs. Pigeon were married on April 27th, 1968, and separated June 26th, 1990. An order under s.44 of the Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c.121, was made on April 7th, 1992 and a lis pendens was filed by Mrs. Pigeon in the Land Title Office on July 6th, 1992. A divorce was granted on July 29th, 1992. On September 22nd, 1992, Mr. Pigeon made an assignment in bankruptcy and on September 24th, 1992, the Trustee in Bankruptcy, Price Waterhouse, was appointed. On October 19th, 1992, Lamperson J. made a reapportionment order pursuant to s.51 of the Act granting to Mrs. Pigeon full title to the matrimonial home. Mr. and Mrs. Pigeon had, until that time, been registered as joint tenants of that property. It is a half duplex located in the city of Kamloops. There are no other family assets. Mrs. Pigeon is employed as a receptionist. Mr. Pigeon has, as his only source of income, a C.P.P. disability pension.

As a result of the declaration under s.44 of the Family Relations Act, each party has an undivided one-half interest in the property as described in s.43(2) of the Act. The difficulties between the parties arise after the triggering event, which is the s.44 declaration. Mrs. Pigeon says that her 100 percent interest in the equity of the matrimonial home as a result of the s.51 order granted by the court on October 19th, 1992 vested on the date of the triggering event, that is, April 7th, 1992, and relies on Blackett v. Blackett 1983 CanLII 200 (BC SC), (1989) 33 R.F.L. (2d) 366 for the proposition that reapportionment under s.51 of the Act is determined as at the date of the s.44 triggering event. The Trustee argues that the assignment to the Trustee in Bankruptcy was made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, a federal statute, and thus is paramount over any reapportionment made under s.51 of the provincial Family Relations Act.

Counsel for the Trustee argues further that a spouse cannot pursue proceedings for relief pursuant to Part 3 of the Family Relations Act after the assets of the other spouse have vested in the Trustee in Bankruptcy of that spouse's estate. Proceedings after that date must be brought under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Authority for this proposition appears in Walters v. Walters 1985 CanLII 528 (BC SC), (1985) 62 B.C.L.R. 334. MacKinnon J. cites various policy reasons supporting this decision at p.336:

> The purpose of the Bankruptcy Act was to provide for the orderly and fair distribution of the property of a bankrupt among his creditors on a pari passu basis: Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law of Canada (1984), vol.1, p.A-1.
> In addition, provisions of the Bankruptcy Act were enacted in order to avoid a multiplicity of proceedings: Re Abacus Cities Ltd.; Levitt v. Abacus Cities (1981), 38 C.B.R. (N.S.) 193 at 195 (B.C.C.A.).
> In addition, the Bankruptcy Act provides comprehensive procedures to ensure that the interests of all claimants (including the wife of the bankrupt) against the estate of the bankrupt are dealt with in a systematic and orderly fashion: ss.95(1), 95(2) and 97(1).

It is settled law that the spouse of a bankrupt is simply another creditor under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. A reapportionment under s.51 of the Family Relations Act cannot occur after an assignment in bankruptcy. The only option is for the other spouse to apply for an annulment of the assignment under s.181 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act if there has been a previous restraining order under s.53(1) of the Family Relations Act.

It has been argued that the s.44 order creates a trust until a determination is made under s.51. It seems to me that this Act does not so provide.

reapportionment is made regarding the circumstances at the time of the triggering event thus, in the circumstances of Mr. Pigeon, a s.51 reapportionment has priority over an assignment in bankruptcy made after the triggering event. Those cases, however, have to do with having registered a judgment against an interest in property. The assignment in bankruptcy is different, it is a vested property interest as described in s.71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985 C. B-3. That section is as follows:

> On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee name in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

Re Nadeau (1980), 36 C.B.R. 168 (B.C.S.C.) is authority for the proposition that all the property of a bankrupt vests in the trustee upon the assignment in bankruptcy.

> Subject to the rights of any secured creditors of her husband, his property is now vested in the trustee. The provisions of the Bankruptcy Act cannot abrogate or supersede the substantive provision of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with it. However, no substantive provisions in the Family Relations Act or in any other statute which has been referred to me or of which I am aware grants unto the wife any preferred right over the other creditors of her husband.

Accordingly, since Mr. Pigeon's half interest in the home vested in the trustee when the assignment in bankruptcy occurred on September 22, 1992, Mr. Pigeon had no interest to be reapportioned under s.51 in favour of Mrs. Pigeon on October 19th, 1992.

Section 51 of the Family Relations Act is discretionary, just as is s.7(1) of the Matrimonial Property Act of the province of Alberta as set out in Deloitte, Haskins& Sells Ltd. v. Graham (1983) 47 C.B.R. 172 (Alta.Q.B.). As a result, s.51 does not grant any proprietary rights.

Accordingly, the trustee in bankruptcy has priority over Mr. Pigeon's one-half interest in the matrimonial home because the interest vested in the trustee under s.71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the trustee cannot be deprived of that interest. (See Biedler v. Biedler (1983) 33 R.F.L. (2d) at 336, particularly at p.375.)

The application of Mrs. Pigeon is therefore dismissed. In the circumstances I make no order as to costs.

Before concluding this matter I wish to comment on the federal paramountcy argument advanced on behalf of the trustee. I have concluded in these circumstances that this doctrine does not apply. To apply there must be inconsistent or conflicting federal and provincial laws, in which case the federal law prevails. (See Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 2d Ed., (Carswell: Toronto), 1985 at 354.)

Reapportionment under s.51 of the Family Relations Act is a discretionary power to be exercised by the courts in situations where an equal distribution of family assets would be unfair. Section 51 is not in conflict with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act because it does not have to be exercised. In addition, there is not a conflict simply because the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act vests the bankrupt's interest in the trustee after the triggering event because there is no requirement under the Family Relations Act to retain the property until the time of a s.51 reapportionment unless a s.53 restraining order has been granted. Since there is no conflict, the doctrine of federal paramountcy does not apply.

Unfortunately, there are no other family assets and compensation to Mrs. Pigeon under s.52 of the Family Relations Act is not available.

R.A. Clarke Counsel for the plaintiff
M. Newcombe Counsel for the defendant
F.J. Quinn Counsel for BDO Dunwoody, Ward, Mallette Inc. Trustee in Bankruptcy of the Estate of Craig W. Thompson

The plaintiff seeks, pursuant to section 69.4 of the Bankruptcy Act, a declaration that sections 69 to 69.3 do not operate to prevent the plaintiff from continuing with this action. The trustee opposes the application saying the wife should pursue her claim in the bankruptcy proceedings. The facts are as follows:

In the Family Relations action commenced July 25, 1991 the wife seeks in part the following relief:

(a)A declaratory judgment under Section 44 of the Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1979 and amendments thereto, that the Plaintiff and the Defendant have no reasonable prospect of reconciliation with each other;

Digitized by Google

(f)An Order for determination of which assets of the parties are family assets, the determination of ownership, right of possession, and division of property, pursuant to Part III of the Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, Chapter 121 and amendments thereto;

(g)An Order for an unequal division of assets of the parties in favour of the Plaintiff, pursuant to Section 51 of the Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, Chapter 121 and amendments thereto;

(h)An Order for determination respecting ownership, right of possession, division of and sale of property of the spouses, pursuant to Section 52 of the Family Relations Act;

(i)An Order that the Plaintiff and Defendant be restrained from disposing of family assets and other property at issue, without order of this Court or agreement between the parties, pursuant to Section 53 of the Family Relations Act;

On August 9, 1991 this Court made an order, pursuant to section 53 of the Family Relations Act, restraining both parties from disposing of or further encumbering any assets "until further order of the Court or until written agreement made between the parties." The principal assets of the parties were the husband's business which was sold by the receiver of the business, the matrimonial home, and the husband's RRSP's. On October 10, 1991 this Court made a declaration, pursuant to s. 44 of the Family Relations Act, that the parties have no reasonable prospect of reconciliation. On March 29, 1993 the husband was adjudged a bankrupt and a receiving order was made against him pursuant to the petition of the Royal Bank of Canada filed February 25, 1993.

The title to the matrimonial home is registered in the name of the wife alone. This property was appraised on December 15, 1991 at $400,000. subject to there being proper access. The land, appraised at $120,000., was a gift from the wife's father to the wife. The house was constructed through monies borrowed from the Bank of Nova Scotia which has now taken foreclosure proceedings against the property, there being some $300,000. owing against the property. The husband made the mortgage payments until a few months prior to his business being put in the hands of the receiver. Although there is legal access to the property, the only practicable access is through the wife's father's property. The wife's father agreed to grant his daughter an easement through his property to her property but has not done so. There may be some doubt that a successor in title could compel the wife's father to grant the easement and that doubt would have an adverse effect on the return that might be expected from a forced sale, which sale seems inevitable as neither the wife nor the trustee are in a position to redeem. The wife and children live in the matrimonial home, the wife is unable to fully support herself and the husband is no longer paying maintenance. In those circumstances the wife's claim for an unequal division of the matrimonial property cannot be said to be without merit.

The trustee does not say that the husband's bankruptcy deprives the wife of her rights under the Family Relations Act. He says simply that to avoid a multiplicity of actions in respect of various assets the wife's claim should be pursued under the Bankruptcy Act. He says that the wife's claim is no longer that of a wife against her husband but that of a creditor against a bankrupt's estate.

The law provides as follows:

THE FAMILY RELATIONS ACT

44. On application by 2 spouses married to each other or by one of the spouses, the Supreme Court may make a declaratory judgment that the spouses have no reasonable prospect of reconciliation with each other.

43. (1) Subject to this Part, each spouse is entitled to an interest in each family asset on or after March 31, 1979 when respecting the marriage is first made.

(b)a declaratory judgment under section 44;

(2) The interest under subsection (1) is an undivided half interest in the family asset as a tenant in common.

(3) An interest under subsection (1) is subject to

(a) an order under this Part;

(my emphasis)

51. Where the provisions for division of property between spouses under section 43 or their marriage agreement, as the case may be, would be unfair having regard to

(a)the duration of the marriage;

(b)the duration of the period during which the spouses have lived separate and apart;

(c)the date when property was acquired or disposed of;

Digitized by Google

(d)the extent to which property was acquired by one spouse through inheritance or gift;
(e)the needs of each spouse to become or remain economically independent and self sufficient; or
(f)any other circumstances relating to the acquisition, preservation, maintenance, improvement or use of property or the capacity or liabilities of a spouse, the Supreme Court, on application, may order that the property covered by section 43 or the marriage agreement, as the case may be, be divided into shares fixed by the court. Additionally or alternatively the Court may order that other property not covered by section 43 or the marriage agreement, as the case may be, of one spouse be vested in the other spouse.

(my emphasis)

52. (1) In proceedings under this Part or on application, the Supreme Court may determine any matter respecting the ownership, right of possession or division of property under this Part, including the vesting of property under section 51, and may make orders which are necessary, reasonable or ancillary to give effect to the determination.

53 (1) On application by a party to a proceeding under this Part, the court shall make an order restraining another party to the proceeding from disposing of a family asset or any other property at issue under this Part until or unless the other party establishes that a claim made by the applicant under this Part will not be defeated or substantially impaired by the disposal of that family asset or other property.

55 (2) The rights under this Part are in addition to and not in substitution for rights under equity or any other law.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT

67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise
(a)property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,
(b)any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

but it shall comprise
(c)all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and
(d)such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

69. (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) and sections 69.4 and 69.5 on the filing of a notice of intention under section 50.4 by an insolvent person,
(a)no creditor has any remedy against the insolvent person or the insolvent person's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy,

69.3 (1) Subject to subsection (2) and sections 69.4 and 69.5, on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor has any remedy against the debtor or the debtor's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy, until the trustee has been discharged.

69.4 A creditor who is affected by the operation of sections 69 to 69.3 may apply to the court for a declaration that those sections no longer operate in respect of that creditor, and the court may make such a declaration, subject to any qualifications that the court considers proper, if it is satisfied
(a)that the creditor is likely to be materially prejudiced by the continued operation of those sections; or
(b)that it is equitable on other grounds to make such a declaration.

Because section 43 of the Family Relations Act begins: "Subject to this Part" and, because, section 51 expressly refers to section 43, sections 43 and 51 must be read together. When read together they provide that:

Each spouse is entitled to an undivided half interest in each family asset unless such a division would be unfair in which case the Court may Order that the property be divided into shares fixed by the Court.

When the property of a bankrupt vests in his trustee the only property that vests is that to which the bankrupt is entitled under the combined operation of sections 43 and 51. The trustee's rights, do not, in my view, afford him the benefit of the operation of sections 44 and 43 without reference to application of section 51. That is, the trustee cannot take advantage of legislation that says that a spouse is entitled to a half interest subject to the application of section 51 and then ignore section 51. The provisions of section 43 are expressly subject to the provisions of section 51. The property does not vest under section 43 and then divest if an order is made under section 51. The trustee takes the property either before the application of both sections 43 and 51 or after the application of both sections and not in between.

Counsel for the trustee submits that to read sections 43 and 51 together, as I have done, is contrary to the view taken by Hunter, J., in Pigeon v. Pigeon Kamloops Registry No. 08387, 14 January 1993. (to date unreported) In that case the facts were similar except the property was in joint tenancy and no section 53 restraining order had been made. I distinguish the decision of Hunter, J., not on the basis that the property here is in the wife's name alone but, on the basis that here a restraining order was made under section 53 prior to the section 44 declaration. Hunter, J. said at page 6:

> Reapportionment under s.51 of the Family Relations Act is a discretionary power to be exercised by the courts in situations where an equal distribution of family assets would be unfair. Section 51 is not in conflict with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act because it does not have to be exercised. In addition, there is not a conflict simply because the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act vests the bankrupt's interest in the trustee after the triggering event because there is no requirement under the Family Relations Act to retain the property until the time of a s.51 reapportionment unless a s.53 restraining order has been granted. Since there is no conflict, the doctrine of federal paramountcy does not apply.

I therefore find that I am able to distinguish the case at bar from that of Pigeon on the basis that a section 53 restraining order was made here before the section 44 declaration was made. Had that not been the case I would have felt bound to follow Hunter, J. on the basis of the principles set out in Re Hansard Spruce Mills Ltd. reflex, (1954), 13 W.W.R. 285, as this case does not, in my view, come within the exceptions found in that decision.

Inasmuch as I have concluded that the only interest that the bankrupt's estate has in the family assets is that which the husband would have following the applications of both sections 43 and 51 it is equitable that the determination of that interest be made in the Family Relations action because, if the husband has no interest in the family assets, those assets would not form part of his estate in bankruptcy.

The wife is entitled to a declaration pursuant to section 69.4 of the Bankruptcy Act that sections 69 to 69.3 do not operate to prevent the plaintiff from continuing the Family Relations action. The trustee, of course, must be made a party to that proceeding.

JUDGMENT — MALONE J.

February 6, 2003

[1] The respondent seeks permanent spousal maintenance and an unequal distribution of family property. The latter claim is based on her allegation the petitioner dissipated family property because of his addiction to gambling.

[2] The only remaining assets of the marriage that are subject to distribution are the petitioner's pension and the petitioner's share of the proceeds of the sale of the family home. Deloitte & Touche Inc., the Trustee in Bankruptcy for the petitioner, claims to be entitled to the petitioner's share of the proceeds of the sale of the family home and disputes the respondent's claim thereto.

[3] By agreement of all parties the various issues to be determined were consolidated in this proceeding.

[4] The petitioner and respondent were married on September 29, 1973, separated in 1997, reconciled in December of that year, and separated for the final time in 1998. The petitioner commenced his claim against the respondent in October of 2000.

[5] The family home was sold in September 2000. At the time the respondent executed the transfer she advised the petitioner, and the lawyer handling the sale on the their behalf, that she was claiming the petitioner's share of the proceeds as a result of her claim for an unequal distribution of family property. In due course the petitioner's share of the proceeds in the amount of $17,473.05 were paid into Court pending the outcome of these proceedings. The petitioner made an assignment in bankruptcy on January 9, 2001.

[6] On the basis of the petitioner's admissions and the evidence of the respondent I have little difficulty in finding the petitioner dissipated family property in the 1990s due to his gambling addiction. He exhausted all the family savings, cashed in RRSPs without the respondent's knowledge, on three occasions forged her name to cheques and, in due course, was required to obtain a new mortgage, the proceeds of which, in the main, were used to pay debts arising from his gambling addiction. It was not until 1997 that the respondent became aware of the seriousness of the petitioner's problem. They separated in 1997 which resulted in the petitioner finally obtaining counselling for his addiction. As a result of this they reconciled in December of 1997 however, the petitioner's gambling continued.

[7] Counsel for the petitioner argues that if any dissipation of family property occurred it took place at a time prior to two years before the petition was filed and relies on s. 28(1)(a)(i) and (b) of The Family Property Act, S.S. 1997, c. F-6.3 (formerly The Matrimonial Property Act, 1997, c. M-6.11) which provides as follows:

> 28(1) Where an application has been made for a family property order, the court has the powers conferred by subsection (2) where it is satisfied that:
> (a) a spouse has, before or after the coming into force of this Act or The Miscellaneous Statutes (Domestic Relations) Amendment Act, 2001 (No. 2):
> (i) dissipated family property in whole or in part;
> (b) the dissipation occurred ... not more than two years before the day on which either spouse commenced the application for the family property order.

[8] These proceedings were commenced on October 6, 2000 and accordingly it is necessary to consider the petitioner's conduct in the 24 months prior to this date.

[9] In the spring of 1998, the petitioner and respondent consolidated the family debt by taking out a mortgage for approximately $71,000.00. The sum of $18,000.00 was used to retire a debt owing by their daughter with the balance of $54,000.00 being used to pay the debts of the petitioner which were attributable to gambling. The parties also entered into a separation agreement on June 15, 1998 which contained the following provision:

> 2. The husband covenants and agrees that he shall not increase his debt load, either by non-payment of present debts as they come do [sic] or by obtaining new credit without first having obtained the wife's consent to same in writing prior to incurring any increased debt load. For further specificity, the husband warrants that the total debts consist of:
> (a) Mortgage on the matrimonial [family] home;
> (b) Personal loan with the Bank of Montreal;
> (c) MasterCard.

The petitioner also agreed to pay the respondent the sum of $2,000.00 per month as spousal support commencing June 1, 1998. In August 1998, the petitioner borrowed approximately $17,000.00 from the Bank of Montreal without the respondent's consent. He also exhausted his credit limit with American Express and CIBC, borrowed a further $8,000.00 from CIBC and a total of $6,000.00 from Associates Financial Services, all without the respondent's knowledge. Shortly after the proceedings were commenced he obtained an order from Kyle J. reducing his agreed monthly maintenance payments of $2,000.00 per month to $1,000.00 per month on the basis of his inability to pay the larger sum. Finally, he made an assignment in bankruptcy on January 1, 2001 claiming debts of $48,000.00 which were attributable to his gambling addiction. In 1998 the petitioner earned $93,000.00 and in excess of $90,000.00 for the years 1999, 2000 and 2001. He will continue to earn an income from his employment in excess of $90,000.00. Notwithstanding what many would consider to be a considerable income the petitioner continued to fall into debt as a result of his gambling which resulted finally in his assignment in bankruptcy. On the basis of these facts I, once again, have little difficulty in concluding that the petitioner dissipated family property in the two years prior to these proceedings being commenced and, accordingly, subject to the claim of the Trustee in Bankruptcy, find the respondent is entitled to an unequal distribution of family property.

[10] The respondent's claim to the petitioner's share of the proceeds from the sale of the family home is twofold. Firstly, she claims to be entitled to the sum of $4,500.00 pursuant to the order of Kyle J. as arrears of maintenance. Secondly, she claims the balance of the proceeds in support of her claim for an unequal distribution of family property.

[11] The order of Kyle J., of course, predated the assignment in bankruptcy however, for some reason, the funds were never paid out of Court to the respondent in accordance with the order. Counsel for the Trustee does not dispute the amount claimed, nor does counsel for the petitioner, however maintains that as a result of the assignment in bankruptcy the respondent's entitlement to this amount was in effect nullified. Furthermore, he argues because of the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 as am. S.C. 1992, c. 17, s. 2 and certain authorities cited in this regard that the respondent is not entitled to any portion of the proceeds of the sale.

[12] With respect to the respondent's claim for arrears of maintenance counsel for the Trustee has referred me to two authorities Burson v. Burson reflex, (1991), 29 R.F.L. (3d) 454 (Ont. Gen.Div.) (wrongly cited in counsel's brief of law as Peat Marwick Thorne Inc.(Trustee in Bankruptcy) v. Nesbitt Coulter Carr et al. reflex, (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 1) and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. McFadzean and Ennis, reflex, [1978] 5 W.W.R. 750 (Man. Q.B.).

[13] With respect to the last cited case I note that the Trustee in Bankruptcy paid from the estate of the bankrupt the then current arrears of maintenance and paid the balance of monies he held into court to determine whether a claim for future maintenance could be made against them. In dealing with the arrears of maintenance, Wright J. made the following comment at p. 752:

> No mention was made of the $1,000 paid for arrears and I therefore do not regard this as an issue on the motion.

[14] In the Burson case proceeds from the sale of a family home were paid to a trustee to be held until a court ordered some disposition of the money or until the parties themselves agreed to some other disposition of it. Thereafter Mr. Burson made an assignment in bankruptcy and the question arose as to whether the monies held in trust from the sale of the matrimonial home were subject to the bankruptcy proceedings. In this regard Misener J. stated at p. 459:

> ... No court order was made, and no agreement was reached with respect to its disposition up to the time of Mr. Burson's assignment into bankruptcy. With and by virtue of that assignment alone, Mr. Burson ceased to have any capacity to deal any further with his property and, subject only to the rights of secured creditors and to any express provisions of the

> Bankruptcy Act to the contrary, all of Mr. Burson's property vested in the bankruptcy trustee for the benefit of Mr. Burson's creditors .... [Emphasis added]

[15] In my opinion these authorities are not of assistance to the Trustee. In one instance the Trustee in Bankruptcy paid the arrears of maintenance to the spouse and the court made no further comment in this regard.

[16] In the second instance the learned trial judge emphasized that no court order was made with respect to the monies in dispute.

[17] In the present set of circumstances, a Court order was made, that of Kyle J., which predated the assignment in bankruptcy. In my opinion the determining factor herein is that a Court order was made with respect to arrears of maintenance prior to the assignment in bankruptcy and accordingly effect should be given to that order in preference to the claim of the Trustee. I conclude therefore the respondent is entitled to be paid the sum of $4,500.00 from the monies presently paid into Court and order accordingly.

[19] Counsel for the respondent argues that the sale of the family home was not voluntary and the petitioner is entitled to claim the proceeds of the sale as being exempt pursuant to The Exemptions Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. E-14. In this regard he relies on the case of Kirkpatrick, Re reflex, (1984), 35 Sask. R. 97 (Q.B.). In this case Wright J. determined that a sale was not voluntary and made the following comment at p. 99:

> [6] The next question is whether the exemption was lost because the bankrupt made a voluntary disposition of his interest in the property. The evidence establishes that the bankrupt's calamitous financial position, his permanent separation from his wife and children, his wife's demands that he sell the house so that she might have her share of the proceeds, the arrears owing on the mortgage on the house, the suit brought by the wife's father to collect a loan granted to the bankrupt, the Third Party Demands of Revenue Canada upon his employer and other pressures combined to force him to sell. Where a debtor is so overburdened and is overcome by such demands, his action in selling the family home is not, in my respectful view, voluntary. Common sense says it is not....

[20] While the sale of the family home in these proceedings occurred because of the insistence of the respondent, the petitioner, at the time of the sale was not in the same dire financial position as that described by Wright J. in the Kirkpatrick decision. He was not being pursued by other creditors, the mortgage was not in arrears and there were no third party demands from Revenue Canada. The petitioner agreed with the respondent's demand that the family home be sold and went so far as to voluntarily make improvements to it in order to maximize its sale value. Accordingly, I find that the sale was voluntary and not forced. Furthermore, I note that the petitioner, for whatever reason, has never claimed that his share of the proceeds of sale is exempt pursuant to the provision of the Saskatchewan Exemptions Act.

[21] I agree with counsel for the Trustee's submission that the law is clear that the provincial exemption in a debtor's home is lost where there has been a voluntary sale of the home prior to an assignment in bankruptcy. The authorities for this statement are set out in counsel's brief and are Gervais v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1985), 56 C.B.R. 238 (Sask. C.A.); Regal Distributors Limited v. Freele, reflex, [1931] 1 W.W.R. 299 (Alta. S.C. App. Div.); Alberta Treasury Branches v. Wilson reflex, (1996), 38 C.B.R. (3d) 245 (Alta. C.A.); and Dhalla, Re 1991 CanLII 5921 (AB QB), (1991), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 57 (Alta. Q.B.).

[22] Accordingly I find the Trustee in Bankruptcy is entitled to the petitioner's share of the proceeds from the sale of the family home less the maintenance arrears of $4,500.00 and so order.

[23] The remaining asset of the marriage is the petitioner's pension through his employment at Co-op Refinery in Regina. In my opinion the circumstances of this case demand that the pension be valued as of the date of trial and that it be divided equally between the parties at such time as the petitioner is eligible to receive the proceeds thereof and order accordingly.

[24] With respect to the claim for spousal maintenance I note that the petitioner and respondent were married on September 29, 1973 and accordingly the marriage can be considered as "a long-term marriage" or "a traditional marriage" as those terms are used in the various authorities. The respondent worked from time to time during the marriage however, her earnings were used initially to maintain the family unit and laterally to pay debts incurred by the petitioner arising from his gambling addiction. The only assets the respondent has received as a result of the termination of the marriage are her one-half share of the proceeds of the sale of the family home being $17,473.05 and, in due course, one-half of the petitioner's benefits. The petitioner however, will continue to earn a significant income in excess of $90,000.00 per year until such time as he retires. While I find the respondent is capable of obtaining employment, she will never be in a position to earn an income to the extent enjoyed by the petitioner.

[25] In these circumstances, I am of the opinion that the respondent should receive spousal support until such time as she is entitled to one-half of the petitioner's pension in the amount of $2,000.00 per month and so order. The order is to be effective as of November 1, 2002 and any arrears that have accumulated shall be paid by the petitioner to the respondent in the sum of $500.00 per month.

[26] With respect to the issues between the respondent and the Trustee, I make no order as to costs. The respondent however, is entitled to recover the taxable costs of the proceeding from the petitioner.

Bankruptcy -- Priority -- Post-bankruptcy income tax refund -- Husband ordered to pay monthly amount for child and spousal support to Director of Maintenance Enforcement -- Husband later filing voluntary assignment in bankruptcy and assigning post-bankruptcy income tax refund to trustee -- Director filing notice of continuing attachment against federal Crown -- Whether income tax refund properly payable to trustee or to Director -- Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, ss. 67, 68.

After his payments of child and spousal support fell into arrears, M was ordered to pay a monthly sum to the Director of Maintenance Enforcement. He later filed a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy and executed an agreement letter authorizing that any refund resulting from a post-bankruptcy income tax return be mailed to the appellant trustee as an asset for distribution to the creditors. The Director filed a notice of continuing attachment against the federal Crown. After M was discharged from bankruptcy, a garnishee summons was issued putting the notice of continuing attachment into effect. The trustee filed a post-bankruptcy income tax return, and a refund became payable. In response to a motion by the trustee, the Master declared that the refund constituted property of the bankrupt which vested in the trustee. Under s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act, the property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors comprises all property of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge. Under s. 68(1), however, "the trustee, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall apply to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt". Section 68(2) provides that the order must be directed to the bankrupt and his employer. The Master was prepared to accept that s. 68 removes wages from the scope of s. 67(c), but was not prepared to accept that income tax deductions from an employee's wages retain the character of wages. The Court of Queen's Bench reversed the Master's decision and ordered that the refund be returned to the Director. The Court of Appeal affirmed that judgment.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

A bankrupt's interest in a post-bankruptcy income tax refund can be considered "property" for the purposes of s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act. Even if a taxpayer who makes overpayments has no right to compel a refund prior to filing a return, that taxpayer has at least a future and contingent interest in the ultimate tax refund which would come within the definition of "property" in s. 2 of the Act. The property need not also meet the requirements of s. 67(d) before the trustee can claim it, since s. 67(c) and (d) should be treated as alternatives. The bankrupt's interest in his refund did not, however, vest automatically in his trustee. Section 68 is a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages or other remuneration, and such forms of property thus cannot be "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for purposes of s. 67. The trustee can access them only following a court application as contemplated by s. 68(1), and no such application was made in this case. A plain language interpretation of s. 68(1) favours the view that it is a substantive provision: the opening words "[n]otwithstanding section 67" are intended to make it clear that wages will not come within s. 67(c) but will be dealt with by s. 68. The mischief which s. 68 was intended to remedy reinforces this view. Since the section was intended to remedy province-to-province disparities in the application of the Bankruptcy Act, it necessarily follows that it is a substantive rather than a procedural modification to the pre-existing scheme.

The post-bankruptcy income tax refund in this case retained the character of wages to the extent that it represented a return of employer withholdings. The bankrupt earned a certain amount as wages after his voluntary assignment in bankruptcy, and the fundamental character of these wages is not affected by the fact that a portion was, by virtue of statute, automatically directed toward his tax liability. The only problems with the characterization of an income tax refund as deferred wages for the purposes of s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act are structural ones. The trustee's inability to act independently is a flaw inherent in s. 68(1), which has now been corrected by a statutory amendment. The fact that s. 68(2) orders can be directed only toward "the bankrupt and his employer" is a more serious problem, but this deficiency cannot affect the conclusion that an income tax refund retains its character as wages. While it would be preferable, from a trustee's point of view, to obtain an order directly against the Crown in respect of an income tax refund, an order against the bankrupt person alone does provide the trustee with the necessary legal entitlement to the refund. Moreover, the fact that the court is to have "regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt" demonstrates an overriding concern for the support of families. The discretion given to courts by s. 68 is amplified by the discretion which is necessarily left in the trustee, creditors and inspectors. Since these kinds of discretion are better able to respond to the costs of raising families, a purposive interpretation should be given to the word "wages" in s. 68, notwithstanding difficulties associated with s. 68(2).

The agreement letter was incapable of creating an effective assignment owing to s. 67 of the Financial Administration Act, which states that "[e]xcept as provided in this Act or any other Act of Parliament . . . a Crown debt is not assignable". "Crown debt" is defined to include not only existing debts, but also future debts "due or becoming due". The Financial Administration Act fails to permit such assignment, and no express authorization appears in any other federal statute. By taking steps to garnish the income tax refund, the Director thus necessarily obtained priority in this case.

IACOBUCCI J. -- This appeal involves a priority contest, the subject matter of which is a bankrupt's post-bankruptcy income tax refund. The contestants are a trustee in bankruptcy and the Director of Maintenance Enforcement. The appeal has been brought as a test case, with the parties proceeding on an agreed statement of facts.

I. Facts

In 1986, Arden Anthony Marzetti was ordered to pay monthly child and spousal support pursuant to the Divorce Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 3 (2nd Supp.). He fell into arrears, and a default hearing was held in December 1988. As a consequence, Marzetti was ordered to pay $250 per month to the Director of Maintenance Enforcement (the "Director"), who is appointed pursuant to s. 4 of the Maintenance Enforcement Act, S.A. 1985, c. M-0.5.

On June 7, 1989, Marzetti filed a voluntary assignment into bankruptcy. On that date, he also executed an "Agreement Letter" as requested by his Trustee in Bankruptcy, Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. The Agreement Letter reads:

> I hereby authorize Peat Marwick Limited, as Trustee of my Estate, to complete and file with Revenue Canada - Taxation my post-bankruptcy income tax return for the year 1989. I further authorize that any refund resulting from the post-bankruptcy income tax return be mailed to Peat Marwick Limited as an asset pursuant to Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act for distribution to my creditors.

On February 15, 1990, the Director filed a Notice of Continuing Attachment against the federal Crown under the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 4 (2nd Supp.). The Notice instructed the Crown to pay to the Director specified monies, namely, sums otherwise payable to Marzetti under any Act of Parliament.

On March 7, 1990, Marzetti was granted an absolute discharge from bankruptcy.

On April 13, 1990, the Department of Justice issued a garnishee summons, thus putting into effect the Notice of Continuing Attachment previously filed.

On April 30, 1990, the Trustee filed a post-bankruptcy income tax return for Marzetti. That return summarized Marzetti's tax liability for the period between June 7, 1989 and December 31, 1989. A post-bankruptcy income tax refund totalling $2,066.90 became payable.

Before the refund was paid, the Trustee applied for a declaration that the refund was properly payable to the Trustee rather than the Director. Although the Crown in right of Canada was served with notice of the Trustee's motion, the tax refund was nonetheless paid to the Director in August 1990. Counsel for the Attorney General of Canada acknowledged that this payment was made in error, and that the Minister of National Revenue did not intentionally make payment prior to resolution of the priority dispute.

In response to the Trustee's motion, an Alberta Master declared that the refund constitutes property of Marzetti which vested in the Trustee: (1990), 2 C.B.R. (3d) 109, 112 A.R. 70. The Director was ordered to pay the amount of the refund to the Trustee. The Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta allowed the Director's appeal, and ordered that the refund be returned to the Director: (1991), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 238, 123 A.R. 1, 82 Alta. L.R. (2d) 67, 35 R.F.L. (3d) 225. The Court of Appeal

The Attorney General for Alberta, a named respondent who participated in the proceedings below, was not represented in the appeal before this Court.

67. The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

but it shall comprise

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

68. (1) Notwithstanding section 67, where a bankrupt is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any salary, wages or other remuneration from any person employing, or using the services of, the bankrupt, in this section referred to as the "employer", the trustee, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall apply to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

(2) An order under subsection (1) shall be directed to the bankrupt and his employer and shall be expressed to continue for such time as the court may fix or until payment of a sum specified in the order and, unless otherwise stated in the order, it ceases to have effect on the discharge of the bankrupt.

(4) An order under subsection (1) shall be served on the bankrupt and is binding on him, and when the order is served on his employer, it is binding on the employer named therein and any subsequent employer of the bankrupt if a copy of the order is served on the subsequent employer, but nothing in this section shall be construed as requiring the trustee to serve such an order on any employer of a bankrupt if it appears to the trustee inexpedient to do so.

70. (1) Every receiving order and every assignment made in pursuance of this Act takes precedence over all judicial or other attachments, garnishments, certificates having the effect of judgments, judgments, certificates of judgment, judgments operating as hypothecs, executions or other process against the property of a bankrupt, except those that have been completely executed by payment to the creditor or his agent, and except the rights of a secured creditor.

(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

158. A bankrupt shall

(l) execute such powers of attorney, conveyances, deeds and instruments as may be required;

(o) generally do all such acts and things in relation to his property and the distribution of the proceeds among his creditors as may be reasonably required by the trustee, or may be prescribed by the General Rules, or may be directed by the court by any special order made with reference to any particular case or made on the occasion of any special application by the trustee, or any creditor or person interested . . .

B.Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 4 (2nd Supp.)

23. In this Part,

"garnishable moneys" means moneys authorized to be paid by Her Majesty by or under such Acts of Parliament or provisions thereof or programs thereunder as are designated by the regulations;

24. Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament preventing the garnishment of Her Majesty, Her Majesty may, for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, be garnisheed in accordance with this Part in respect of all garnishable moneys.

28. Subject to this Part and the regulations, service of the following documents on the Minister, namely,

(a) a garnishee summons,

(b) a copy of the support order or agreement containing the support provision to which the garnishee summons relates, and

(c) an application in the form prescribed by the regulations, binds Her Majesty for one year in respect of all garnishable moneys payable to the judgment debtor named in the garnishee summons.

C.Family Support Orders and Agreements Garnishment Regulations, SOR/88-181

3. The following Acts, provisions thereof and programs thereunder are designated for the purposes of the definition "garnishable moneys" in section 23 of the Act:

(a) sections 164 and 216 of the Income Tax Act as they relate to the personal return of income of the taxpayer for a particular taxation year; . . .

D. Financial Administration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-11

66. In this Part,

"Crown debt" means any existing or future debt due or becoming due by the Crown, and any other chose in action in respect of which there is a right of recovery enforceable by action against the Crown;

67. Except as provided in this Act or any other Act of Parliament,

(a) a Crown debt is not assignable; and

(b) no transaction purporting to be an assignment of a Crown debt is effective so as to confer on any person any rights or remedies in respect of that debt.

2. ...

(2) For the purposes of this Act, a person acquires a right to a refund of tax where that person, as between himself and another person, acquires a right to a refund of tax or to an amount equal to the amount of a refund of tax, notwithstanding that, by virtue of section 67 of the Financial Administration Act or any provision of any other Act of Parliament or of the legislature of a province, the refund of tax is not assignable.

III. Judgments

A.Alberta Court of Queen's Bench (1990), 2 C.B.R. (3d) 109 (Master Funduk in Chambers)

Master Funduk asked whether an income tax refund can be considered property of a bankrupt which vests in a trustee by virtue of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3. He answered that a refund is prima facie "property", as that term is used in s. 67 of the Bankruptcy Act. However, he realized that some courts have treated refunds as deferred wages, and that such courts, by invoking s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, have held that refunds do not automatically vest in trustees under s. 67.

Master Funduk was prepared to accept that s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act removes wages from the scope of s. 67(c). But after a comprehensive review of case law, he was not prepared to accept that income tax deductions from an employee's wages retain the character of wages. He stated, plainly: "I do not think that an income tax refund can logically be considered to be `deferred wages'" (p. 119).

Further, Master Funduk noted that, if the refund retained its character as wages, then the plain language of s. 68 would seem to preclude trustees from obtaining orders in respect of the refund. Pursuant to s. 68, while a trustee can secure an order to obtain wages, the s. 68 order can be directed only toward "the bankrupt and his employer". Master Funduk stated that s. 68 does not permit the attachment of a debt owed by a third party to a bankrupt.

Accordingly, Master Funduk held that the income tax refund is not within the scope of s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act. He held that it is property of the bankrupt within s. 67(c) which vested automatically in the Trustee. In light of these holdings, Master Funduk did not consider arguments relating to the Agreement Letter.

B.Alberta Court of Queen's Bench (1991), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 238 (Wachowich J.)

Wachowich J. (as he then was) agreed with Master Funduk that the tax refund is prima facie property within s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act. He also agreed that the refund is neither wages nor deferred wages within s. 68. However, Wachowich J. indicated that "[w]hile the tax refund falls within s. 67(c), it seems clear from the language of the Bankruptcy Act that s. 67(d) must also apply before the property can be dealt with by the trustee" (pp. 246-47). Wachowich J. stated (at p. 247):

> This means that the trustee's right to deal with this property is limited to those rights the bankrupt would have had had he not been bankrupt . . . . if Marzetti had not been bankrupt, he would have had no power to collect the portion of the tax refund garnisheed by the Director because of the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. Similarly then, the trustee has no right to that portion of the tax refund garnisheed and paid to the Director.
> Thus, the tax refund does not automatically vest in the trustee under ss. 67(c) and (d).

Wachowich J. next considered the Agreement Letter. He found that, under ss. 66 and 67 of the Financial Administration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-11, "there is a statutory prohibition against the assignment of Crown debts except as specifically authorized by federal legislation" (p. 247). Wachowich J. accepted that, by virtue of Re Northward Airlines Ltd. (1981), 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 137 (Alta. Q.B.), an assignment might nonetheless be effective as between an assignor and an assignee. However, Wachowich J. referred to Tailby v. Official Receiver (1888), 13 App. Cas. 523 (H.L.), and stated (at p. 249):

> ... while the assignment might bind the conscience of the assignor, it cannot bind the property until such time as the contract becomes capable of being performed. . . . the contract between the assignor and the assignee cannot be performed until the assignor has received his tax refund. Because of the nature of the garnishment proceedings available to the Director, the assignor (the bankrupt) never does receive the tax refund. Thus, the assignee's rights to the property never materialize.

Thus, Wachowich J. distinguished Re Northward Airlines on the ground that it did not involve a prior right to garnishee a Crown debt.

On the question of assignment, then, Wachowich J. concluded that the Trustee is "attempting to get through the back door something it could not get through the front" (p. 249). He stated that the Trustee could take action against the Director only if Marzetti could similarly take action, which he could not. He found that, once the refund passed to the Director, it ceased to be Marzetti's property under s. 67(c), in that Marzetti had "no power over or in respect of that property" (p. 249). Additionally, Wachowich J. stated that even if the assignment were otherwise enforceable, it would remain unenforceable on the facts because of the Trustee's failure to comply with ss. 69 and 70 of the Financial Administration Act.

The assignment being ineffective, and s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act being inoperative, Wachowich J. allowed the appeal. He declared that the income tax refund was properly attached by the Director. Accordingly, he ordered the Trustee to remit the refund plus interest to the Director.

C.Alberta Court of Appeal reflex, (1992), 14 C.B.R. (3d) 127 (Major J.A. for the Court)

Major J.A. (as he then was) first discussed the role of s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act. In his opinion, s. 68 legislatively overruled Industrial Acceptance Corp. v. Lalonde, 1952 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1952] 2 S.C.R. 109. Thus, Major J.A. interpreted s. 68 to mean that "only upon application to the court having regard to the enumerated considerations can a trustee access the wages or salary earned by a bankrupt" (p. 131).

Major J.A. next accepted as correct both Federal Commissioner of Taxation v. Official Receiver (1956), 95 C.L.R. 300 (Austr. H.C.) and Re Goulet (1977), 24 C.B.R. (N.S.) 222 (Ont. S.C.). This acceptance supported his conclusion, namely, that "tax deductions taken at source by an employer and remitted to Revenue Canada do not lose their character as wages" (p. 135). Major J.A. explained that "[t]he reality of the situation is that the income tax refund, insofar as it relates to employer withholdings, represents wages that otherwise would have been paid to the bankrupt" (p. 134). He buttressed his conclusion with dicta from Dauphin Plains Credit Union Ltd. v. Xyloid Industries Ltd., 1980 CanLII 186 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1182. But he also qualified his conclusion by stating (at p. 135):

> I do not conclude that all tax refunds are wages. It depends on the nature of the refund. In this case the refund was the result of taxes deducted directly from wages. Tax refunds may arise in other ways and can be determined when that case arises.

Then, as a final point on the wages issue, Major J.A. considered whether the language of s. 68 precludes a wages characterization for income tax refunds. He described the position of Master Funduk, namely, that since s. 68 does not contemplate an order against the Crown, a refund cannot constitute s. 68 "wages". For Major J.A., however, the alleged problem with s. 68 is irrelevant, inasmuch as it "cannot change the characterization of employer withholdings returned in the form of a tax refund as `wages'" (p. 135). He stated that any s. 68 problem associated with the making of orders is a problem for Parliament.

In the alternative, Major J.A. agreed with Wachowich J.'s other conclusions relating to the operation of s. 67 of the Bankruptcy Act, the effectiveness of the Agreement Letter, and the requirements of the Financial Administration Act. Major J.A. dismissed the appeal, and held that the Director was properly entitled to the refund because of the Notice of Continuing Attachment.

IV. Issues

The central issue in this appeal, as I have already noted, is whether the Trustee or the Director has priority in respect of Marzetti's post-bankruptcy income tax refund. In discussing this issue, I find it convenient to adopt the following structure:

A. What is the position under the Bankruptcy Act?

1.In general terms, is the Bankruptcy Act's reference to "property" broad enough to embrace the facts of this case?

2.In specific terms, must a court conclude that both ss. 67(c) and 67(d) of the Bankruptcy Act have been satisfied in order to conclude that there exists "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67?

3.Is s. 68 a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's wages?

4.Should a post-bankruptcy income tax refund be considered "wages" for the purposes of s. 68?

B. Did the Agreement Letter create an enforceable assignment?

In answering these questions, I will make frequent reference to the Bankruptcy Act. I do so with full knowledge that the relevant statute is now entitled the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: see S.C. 1992, c. 27, ss. 1 and 2. However, since the statute was known as the Bankruptcy Act at the pertinent times, and since none of the 1992 amendments materially affects my opinion, I will generally find it unnecessary to have regard to the amended version.

V. Analysis

Perhaps more for logic than for law, I consider it helpful, as an initial matter, to consider s. 67 of the Bankruptcy Act in isolation. That section is of critical importance to the Act's operation, inasmuch as it establishes certain rules regarding what will, and what will not, comprise "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". These rules, in turn, rest upon a definition of "property" found in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Both s. 67 and the "property" definition can trace their legislative roots back to the original Bankruptcy Act, S.C. 1919, c. 36. The "property" definition in that early statute is nearly identical to the existing definition found in s. 2. Likewise, s. 25 of the early statute performed much the same function as the current s. 67. In contrast, s. 68 is historically rooted in a relatively recent amendment: S.C. 1966-67, c. 32, s. 10. Although I will later conclude that s. 68 is operative in this case, both the long history and the fundamental importance of s. 67 lead me first to consider that section of the Bankruptcy Act in isolation.

1.In general terms, is the Bankruptcy Act's reference to "property" broad enough to embrace the facts of this case?

Section 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act provides that "[t]he property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors . . . shall comprise . . . all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge". At the "date of his bankruptcy" in this case, Marzetti had no interest in the tax refund, since that refund relates to income he earned following his voluntary assignment into bankruptcy. Accordingly, the relevant issue is whether Marzetti "acquired" any property, or whether any property "devolve[d] on him", prior to his discharge.

In discussing this issue, it must first be observed that Marzetti's income tax return was not filed until after his discharge from bankruptcy. This means that, if Marzetti acquired property in respect of the refund, or had such property devolve upon him, the acquisition or devolution cannot depend upon the filing of the income tax return itself. Can it be said that, prior to his discharge, Marzetti had property in respect of his eventual income tax refund, even though a return was not filed until after his discharge?

According to the Director, it cannot, and for this proposition the Director cited Munich Reinsurance Co. (Canada Branch) v. M.N.R., 91 D.T.C. 1137 (T.C.C.). In that case, Rip T.C.J. stated that "the right to a refund does not arise at the time an overpayment of any tax instalment is made but it arises on the day a return is filed" (p. 1143). In making this statement, however, Rip T.C.J. was speaking in terms of the taxpayer having "an enforceable right against the Minister" (p. 1143, emphasis added). In particular, he was considering whether the taxpayer who overpays an instalment acquires a right to receive interest income.

Viewed in context, therefore, the conclusion in Munich does not rest upon Rip T.C.J.'s independent assessment of the proprietary character of overpayments. Rather, it derives inferentially from the existence of a statutory refund procedure in s. 164(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148 as amended. In the words of Rip T.C.J., "[a]s section 164 makes clear, a refund is not due and payable until a return is filed" (p. 1143). Accordingly, assuming that Munich is correctly decided, it is of little assistance to the Director. There is a marked distinction between the existence, and the statutory enforceability, of a proprietary right.

Is there, then, a proprietary character to tax overpayments? Not surprisingly, the Bankruptcy Act defines the word "property" in very broad terms. In particular, I note that the definition includes "every description of property, whether . . . legal or equitable", and it specifically mentions "every description of . . . interest . . . present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property": s. 2. Even if a taxpayer who makes overpayments has no right to compel a refund prior to filing a return, surely that taxpayer has at least a future and contingent interest in the ultimate tax refund.

During oral argument, counsel for the Director was asked whether it might be valid to compare a tax overpayment to a demand promissory note, the suggestion being that each is a form of property, but that neither is enforceable prior to the satisfaction of certain preconditions. In the case of the promissory note, the precondition is the demand. In the case of the tax overpayment, the recognized preconditions relate to the filing of the return: see, e.g., Munich, supra, and Hughes v. The Queen, 91 D.T.C. 5290 (F.C.T.D.). In my view, the comparison is a good one. The argument of the Director artificially restricts the Bankruptcy Act definition of "property", and it fails to distinguish between accrued legal debts and other, inchoate, forms of property.

On this preliminary issue, therefore, I conclude that the Bankruptcy Act's reference to "property" is broad enough to embrace the facts of this case. More specifically, using the language of s. 67(c), I conclude that Marzetti acquired at least a future and contingent interest in his income tax refund at the time excess overpayments were withheld on his behalf.

2.In specific terms, must a court conclude that both ss. 67(c) and 67(d) of the Bankruptcy Act have been satisfied in order to conclude that there exists "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67?

According to Wachowich J., ss. 67(c) and 67(d) of the Bankruptcy Act must both be satisfied before a court can conclude that there exists "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". Those two paragraphs provide:

> The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors . . . shall comprise
> (c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and
> (d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

In other words, like Master Funduk, Wachowich J. concluded that the income tax refund could be considered "property" for the purposes of s. 67(c), such that it was capable of vesting automatically in the Trustee. However, for Wachowich J., s. 67(d) precluded automatic vesting on the facts. He reasoned that, by virtue of s. 67(d), the Trustee could exercise only those powers in respect of the refund which might have been exercised by Marzetti but for the bankruptcy. And, he stated, if the bankruptcy had not occurred, Marzetti could have exercised no power over the refund because of the garnishee instituted by the Director. So while Marzetti had "property" in respect of the refund, there was no "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". The Court of Appeal approved this reasoning, but without analysis.

With respect, Wachowich J. misinterpreted ss. 67(c) and 67(d). In effect, Wachowich J. characterized s. 67(c) as an inclusionary provision, and s. 67(d) as an exclusionary provision. Section 67(c) giveth, and s. 67(d) taketh away. But this interpretation ignores the structure of s. 67 as a whole, since ss. 67(a) and (b) are preceded by the phrase "[t]he property of a bankrupt . . . shall not comprise" (emphasis added), whereas ss. 67(c) and (d) are preceded by the phrase "[t]he property of a bankrupt...shall comprise" (emphasis added). If s. 67(d) were intended to limit the scope of s. 67(c), why would it not have been placed with (a) and (b)?

This criticism of Wachowich J.'s interpretation is echoed by L. W. Houlden and C. H. Morawetz in Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed. rev. 1992), vol. 1, at p. 3-6, where the authors comment upon Wachowich J.'s trial decision:

> . . . Wachowich J. of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench was of the opinion that if property falls within [s. 67(c)], it must also meet the requirements of [s. 67(d)] before the trustee can claim it. With respect, this seems wrong. Section [67(c)] and (d) have always been treated as alternatives.

In other words, because of the statutory structure, it is inappropriate to read paragraphs (c) and (d) restrictively when those paragraphs are intended broadly and inclusively to define the "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". Surely the better view is to give, at least at this stage of the analysis, a wider effect to these paragraphs so as not to reduce artificially the estate available to creditors. In grammatical terms, the word "and" which appears at the end of the English version of s. 67(c) must, by reason of its context, be read disjunctively. As stated by E. A. Driedger, "[t]he inclusive or and the several and produce the same result, and it remains for the context to indicate in what sense these two little words are used": Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 18.

Moreover, I am fortified in this conclusion by the French text of s. 67. Although the parties failed to highlight the point, the word "et" does not appear as a conjunction between ss. 67(c) and 67(d). Although the absence of a conjunction in the French version does not make Wachowich J.'s interpretation impossible, it does make the interpretation even less defensible.

For these reasons, a bankrupt's interest in a post-bankruptcy income tax refund can be considered "property" for the purposes of s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act. Moreover, it can be considered "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67 as a whole, since s. 67(d) in no way qualifies the operation of s. 67(c). This, then, is my initial conclusion.

In the absence of other considerations, the logical consequence of my initial conclusion would be that Marzetti's interest in his refund vested automatically in his Trustee: see s. 71(2). In this way, the Trustee would have obtained priority over the Director's garnishment: see s. 70(1). However, as I will now proceed to explain, my initial conclusion cannot govern in this case. It is overruled by s. 68.

To assess the importance of s. 68 in this case, I must do two things. First, I must determine whether s. 68 always controls the disposition of a bankrupt's wages. Is s. 68 a substantive provision, that is, one which always removes wages from the scope of s. 67, or does it simply create a procedural device for trustees? Second, if I determine that s. 68 is a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's wages, I must then proceed to consider whether Marzetti's post-bankruptcy income tax refund retained its wages character.

Prior to the enactment of what is now s. 68, it was clear that the salary, wages, or other remuneration of a bankrupt could sometimes constitute after-acquired "property", and so be considered "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of what is now s. 67. The pre-amendment position was clarified by Industrial Acceptance Corp., supra.

In Industrial Acceptance Corp., this Court was asked to explain whether wages or salary could be excluded from the definition of divisible property by s. 23(ii) (later s. 67(b)) of the Bankruptcy Act. According to the respondent bankrupt in Industrial Acceptance Corp., the terms of s. 23(ii) could not operate to exclude wages or salary, inasmuch as wages or salary can "only be reached by a garnishee or attachment procedure" (p. 118). This procedural reality was said to be important because s. 23(ii) excluded from the definition of divisible property only property exempted from "execution or seizure" under provincial law. Estey J. rejected the distinction between garnishment or attachment procedures on the one hand, and procedures by way of execution or seizure on the other hand, in the following terms (at p. 117):

> It would appear that Parliament, in adopting the language of s. 23(ii) (particularly when compared with the language of s. 38(2) in the English act) intended that only such portion of the salary as was subject to seizure by legal process under the law of the respective provinces should vest in the trustee. Moreover, the omission of any such provision as that contained in s. 51(2) of the English act, under which, on the application of the trustee, an order might be made against a bankrupt in receipt of a salary to pay the whole or part thereof to the trustee, appears to support the foregoing view.

In modern terms, Industrial Acceptance Corp. established that the language of s. 67(b), which removes from "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors . . . any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province", can operate to exclude wages or salary as contemplated by provincial exemptions.

In effect, therefore, the pre-amendment position was this: after taking into account provincial wage and salary exemptions, any remaining wages or salary of a bankrupt was "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". These excess wages vested automatically in the trustee. And it is clear from Industrial Acceptance Corp. that this conclusion was partly driven by the absence of a provision like s. 68, namely, one which permits, "on the application of the trustee, an order . . . against a bankrupt in receipt of a salary to pay the whole or part thereof to the trustee" (p. 117). But what is not clear in Industrial Acceptance Corp., and what must be resolved in this appeal, is how the presence of s. 68 alters this pre-existing structure.

Two possibilities present themselves. First, it can be argued that s. 68 is a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. Under this view, such forms of property cannot be "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for s. 67. They do not automatically vest in the trustee. The trustee can access them only following a court application as contemplated by s. 68(1). Proponents of this first view characterize the s. 68 amendment as a substantive amendment to the pre-existing structure, in so far as s. 68 leaves no room for the operation of s. 67 in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. The substantive view has judicial support: Re Giroux (1983), 45 C.B.R. (N.S.) 245 (Ont. S.C.); Re McCullough (1984), 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 313 (Ont. S.C.); Re Ali (1987), 62 C.B.R. (N.S.) 64 (Ont. S.C.).

The second view, not surprisingly, is that s. 68 is simply a procedural provision. Proponents of this view contend that the pre-amendment position persists, and that wages, salary, and other remuneration can still vest automatically in the trustee as non-exempt property under s. 67(b). To explain s. 68's existence, a procedural purpose is advanced to demonstrate that s. 68 applications can be beneficial from the trustee's perspective. Two variations of the procedural argument can be identified.

The first variation characterizes s. 68 as creating an additional remedy for trustees. It is said that s. 68 permits a trustee to access not only the non-exempt portion of a bankrupt's wages (which vests automatically), but also the otherwise exempt portion, subject to the court's discretion as defined by s. 68. This view is expressed in Re Beaton (1979), 30 C.B.R. (N.S.) 225 (Ont. C.A.), where Arnup J.A. stated (at pp. 227-28):

> Section 48 [now s. 68], in my view, adopted and enlarged upon the procedure in the English Act. It gave the trustee an expeditious and convenient means of getting into his hands not only the [non-exempt portion] which by s. 47 [now s. 67] was already the divisible property of the bankrupt . . . but possibly more, if the court saw fit to order a larger portion to be paid to the trustee....

The second variation of the procedural argument, which is not inconsistent with the first, emphasizes the convenience of s. 68 over its potential to increase a trustee's access to wages. This view is expressed by Kroft J. in Re Hoffer (1980), 34 C.B.R. (N.S.) 222 (Man. Q.B.), at p. 234:

...under s. 47 [now s. 67] alone the trustee could not attach the [non-exempt portion] until it fell due. How wages were attached as they became due was a source of considerable confusion, and the approaches across Canada were inconsistent.

> Section 48 [now s. 68] appears to have been passed to give trustees a fair and convenient procedure by which they can ask a court to determine the portion of wages which will be available to creditors and to direct the manner of payment.

In addition to Re Beaton and Re Hoffer, the procedural view was advanced in Re Kellaway (1977), 24 C.B.R. (N.S.) 14 (B.C.S.C.), though without explanation.

To proceed, I restate the question: is s. 68 a substantive or procedural provision in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration? In my opinion, the case law debate summarized above should be resolved in favour of the substantive view for three reasons. First, that view better accords with the language of s. 68. Second, it permits s. 68 to remedy more effectively the mischief which led to the original amendment. And, third, it has some support in authority from this Court. I will now elaborate upon each of these reasons in turn.

The language of s. 68 twice favours the substantive view. These points of support were described by Thorson J.A. dissenting in Re Beaton, supra. I can do no better than quote his cogent discussion of each. First, Thorson J.A. considered the implications of the phrase "an order directing the payment to the trustee", as that phrase is used in s. 68 (then s. 48(1)) of the Bankruptcy Act. He stated (at p. 237):

> It is not without significance that the only order which s. 48(1) authorizes the court to make is "an order directing the payment to the trustee" of a part of the bankrupt's earnings. The inference which I draw from this phrasing of language is that it contemplates a payment being made to the trustee to which the trustee would not be entitled in the absence of the order. There is no hint or suggestion anywhere in the subsection that the payment which is to be made is to take the place of, or is to be in addition to, some part of those earnings to which the trustee is in any event already entitled; rather there is the reverse implication that, but for the order, the trustee would have no right to be paid whatever part of those earnings he is seeking to have paid to him. [Emphasis in original.]

Second, Thorson J.A. examined the significance of the words "such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration" as they appear in s. 68(1). In the following passage, Thorson J.A. explains how those words favour the substantive view (at pp. 237-38):

> Furthermore, I cannot conclude that no significance is to be attached to the language of the legislative condition of s. 48(1), beginning with the words "where a bankrupt is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any salary, wages or other remuneration from any person employing, or using the services of, the bankrupt", when that language is then followed by language authorizing the making of an order directing payment to the trustee of "such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration" (the italics are mine) as the court may determine. If the contention of counsel for the trustee were to be accepted, the only meaning that could be given to the words "such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration" would be "such part of the portion of the salary, wages or other remuneration that has not already vested in the trustee", i.e., the portion that remains after deducting the 30 per cent portion of the bankrupt's wages to which the trustee has already become entitled.
> This is equally the result, in my opinion, of the argument of counsel for the Superintendent of Bankruptcy that s. 48 was not intended to, and does not, take away any rights that the trustee might otherwise have to the bankrupt's wages "at least until he has proceeded under s. 48". If he is correct, the only possible starting point of earnings from which a court could proceed to make an order under s. 48 would be from the remaining [otherwise exempt] portion of the bankrupt's earnings. [Emphasis in original.]

I agree with both points made by Thorson J.A. in Re Beaton, supra. In my opinion, a plain language interpretation of s. 68(1) favours the view that it is a substantive provision. When s. 68(1) indicates that it applies "[n]otwithstanding section 67", it means that it operates as a complete code in respect of the listed forms of property. Or, as stated by Houlden and

Morawetz, supra, at p. 3-126: "The opening words `notwithstanding section [67]' are intended to make it clear that wages, etc. will not come within [s. 67(c)] but will be dealt with by s. 68".

My interpretation of s. 68 is reinforced by my understanding of the mischief which that provision was intended to remedy. As described above, prior to the enactment of s. 68's predecessor, while wages could vest in trustees automatically, provincial law could operate to exempt wages from the definition of "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors": Industrial Acceptance Corp., supra. The necessary, and problematic, consequence of this statutory structure was that the treatment of a bankrupt's wages for Bankruptcy Act purposes varied from province to province: Houlden and Morawetz, supra, at p. 3-127.

Parliament no doubt considered it unreasonable for the treatment of bankrupt persons to depend upon the happenstance of provincial residence. Of course, even if one accepts that s. 68 is a complete code in respect of salary, wages, and other remuneration, the potential for uneven treatment across Canada remains in respect of other provincially exempted property. But it is hardly surprising that Parliament selected an important form of property -- salary, wages, and other remuneration -- and gave that property special treatment. In Re Beaton, supra, Thorson J.A. made the following statement with which I agree (at p. 235):

> It is thus legitimate to speculate that one of Parliament's objectives in enacting s. 48 [now s. 68] was to avoid this potential for unevenness (and its consequent potential unfairness both to bankrupts and to creditors alike) by providing an entirely separate regime for dealing with salary, wages or other remuneration received or entitled to be received by a bankrupt from his employer, which would apply uniformly throughout Canada regardless of differences in provincial laws.

The view I take is, moreover, reflected in Hansard extracts. Then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Louis-Joseph-Lucien Cardin, proposed to amend the Bankruptcy Act in the following speech (House of Commons Debates, June 16, 1966, at p. 6488):

> Other amendments clearly set out a procedure whereby bankrupts may be required to contribute some part of their post-bankruptcy income to the trustee for the benefit of the creditors. The present act would seem to indicate that a contribution may be required but this has been left to the discretion of trustees and the courts with the result that debtors are treated in a most inconsistent manner across the country. [Emphasis added.]

Accepting as I do that s. 68 is intended to remedy province-to-province disparities in the application of the Bankruptcy Act, the conclusion necessarily follows that s. 68 is a substantive rather than a procedural modification to the pre-existing scheme. If s. 68 were only intended to give trustees access to funds in excess of the non-exempt portion defined by s. 67(b), then uniformity of provincial application could only be achieved if courts in all provinces made s. 68 orders calculated to reflect the lowest common denominator of provincial exemption. In my view, however, not only is this outcome anomalous, but it is also probably prevented by the language of s. 68(1) itself, which language compels courts to have "regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt" prior to making s. 68 orders. It is thus reasonable to suppose that uniformity of provincial application was intended to be achieved through the operation of s. 68 as a complete code, whereby courts make orders in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration after considering only one standard: the one specified in s. 68 itself.

As a final point of support for the substantive view, I draw attention to the decision of this Court in Vachon v. Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, 1985 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 417. In Vachon, Beetz J. discussed the rehabilitative purpose of the Bankruptcy Act. He did so in terms which suggest this Court's acceptance of the substantive view (at p. 430):

> The rehabilitation of the bankrupt is not the result only of his discharge. It begins when he is put into bankruptcy with measures designed to give him the minimum needed for subsistence. These measures are contained in s. 47 [now s. 67] of the Bankruptcy Act concerning, inter alia, the exemption from execution of certain property, and in s. 48 [now s. 68], regarding the wages of the bankrupt, which applies notwithstanding s. 47 and which empowers the Court to make > an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the salary, wages or other remuneration as the court may determine having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

The part of the wages paid to creditors does not necessarily correspond to the part which may be attached. It may be more or less "having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt". Houlden and Morawetz, op. cit., vol. 1, write at pp. F-66 and F-69:

> Since the enactment of s. 48, wages have been removed from the operation of s. 47 so that no part thereof vests in the trustee to be divided among creditors unless he makes an application under s. 48 and then only to the extent allowed by the court: Re Giroux (1983), 45 C.B.R. (N.S.) 245, 41 O.R. (2d) 351, 146 D.L.R. (3d) 103 (S.C.).

> Applications under s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act come down not to a question of law, but of fact; that is, whether the bankrupt after being given credit for his reasonable living expenses has excess funds which might be used to pay creditors. [Emphasis added.]

As I read the above quotation, Beetz J. approves of the highlighted passage from Houlden and Morawetz, which passage, in turn, rests upon Re Giroux, supra. Interestingly, while Houlden and Morawetz reach a more qualified conclusion in the current version of their work, they continue to favour the substantive view. The authors state (supra, at p. 3-126): "The position in Re Giroux and Re McCullough seems more consonant with the amendment that was made to the Act by the addition of s. 68".

To summarize briefly, it is my opinion that the language of s. 68, the inferred purpose of that provision, and the decision of this Court in Vachon, supra, all support the conclusion that s. 68 is a substantive provision, one which is intended to operate as a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. These forms of property cannot fall within s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act as a bankrupt's after-acquired "property", and they cannot be considered "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67. They do not vest in the trustee through the simple operation of law.

Finally, for the sake of completeness, I note that this conclusion is not contradicted by Commonwealth authorities cited to this Court. The intervener the Superintendent of Bankruptcy cited Re Bertrand, [1980] 2 N.Z.L.R. 72 (C.A.). In that case, McMullin J. considered a provision which the Superintendent argued is similar to s. 68(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, and characterized it as "primarily a machinery provision" (at p. 77). But it is apparent from reading Re Bertrand that there is, in fact, no similarity between the two provisions at all. In the New Zealand case, the relevant provision operated "[w]ithout prejudice to any other rights conferred by" the Act in which it was found, and McMullin J. recognized that the provision was, therefore, not "intended to interfere with the pattern of vesting" (p. 77) otherwise apparent in the statute: cf. Federal Commissioner of Taxation, supra.

And it is also germane to observe that my reading of s. 68 in no way emasculates the importance of s. 67(b). There are many provincial exemptions from "execution or seizure" which have nothing to do with salary, wages, or other remuneration. See, for example, Houlden and Morawetz, supra, at pp. 3-39 et seq., where the authors review provincial exemptions in respect of such things as pension plans (at p. 3-45), real estate and homesteads (at p. 3-45), and tools and chattels used in the bankrupt's business, profession or calling (at p. 3-47). See also Canadian Encyclopedic Digest (Western 3rd ed.) vol. 13, Title 59, at pp. 59-83 et seq., and Canadian Encyclopedic Digest (Ontario 3rd ed.) vol. 12, Title 58, at pp. 93 et seq.

So I proceed upon the footing that anything called "wages" will not vest automatically in a trustee. But this case, of course, involves not wages per se, but rather Marzetti's post-bankruptcy income tax refund. This means that s. 68's role as a complete code will only matter if Marzetti's refund retained, for present purposes, its character as wages.

4.Should a post-bankruptcy income tax refund be considered "wages" for the purposes of s. 68?

Major J.A. held that Marzetti's refund retained the character of wages to the extent that it represented a return of employer-withholding deductions. The available authority supports his position, with which I agree.

The principal Canadian case is Re Goulet, supra, which raised the precise issue being considered, viz., whether a bankrupt or a trustee was entitled to a tax refund arising from post-bankruptcy wages. Henry J. held (at p. 223):

> When the minister returns the fund it then comes into the hands of the taxpayer, in this case the bankrupt, in the form of deferred wages. The fund in question is identified throughout as a deduction from wages earned and never loses its character as wages until it is finally applied by the minister to defray some portion of the tax liability.

Like Master Funduk, I fail to appreciate how Re Szatmari (1972), 18 C.B.R. (N.S.) 309 (Ont. S.C.), relied upon by Henry J. in Re Goulet, supports the passage quoted above. But Re Goulet was followed in Re Walker (1982), 43 C.B.R. (N.S.) 319 (Ont. S.C.), and I accept that both cases offer some direct support for the proposition that a tax refund can be characterized as deferred wages for Bankruptcy Act purposes.

There is also Commonwealth authority on point. In Federal Commissioner of Taxation, supra, legislation similar to the Bankruptcy Act in all material respects was considered by the Australian High Court. The court held that a tax refund should be considered "a refund of part of the earnings of the bankrupt and money which he is entitled to retain in the absence of an order of the court under s. 101 of the Act [the equivalent of s. 68]" (at p. 316 per Williams J.).

In an attempt to suggest that there is also contrary Commonwealth authority, the Trustee again cited Re Bertrand, supra, to this Court. The attempt must fail. In Re Bertrand, the New Zealand bankruptcy legislation considered by the Court of Appeal had no provision comparable to the Canadian s. 68 or the Australian s. 101. For this reason, the potential characterization of a tax refund as wages or earnings was irrelevant, since, under the common law, wages and earnings, like other forms of property, vest automatically in trustees. The court in Re Bertrand explicitly distinguished Federal Commissioner of Taxation, supra, on this basis (at pp. 77-78).

Finally, the Director cited Dauphin Plains Credit Union Ltd. v. Xyloid Industries Ltd., supra, and argued that obiter remarks by Pigeon J. in that case support a wages characterization. At issue in Dauphin was not a tax refund per se, but rather the nature of an employer's deduction, or withholding, in respect of an employee's taxes. Pigeon J. stated (at p. 1191):

> It is important to consider the nature of the deduction for income tax. It is not a deduction for the benefit of the employer, it is a withholding for the benefit of the employee because it is to be remitted to the Receiver General of Canada on account of the employee's tax indebtedness. By virtue of other provisions of the Income Tax Act if, as happens in a large number of cases, the withholdings exceed the employee's tax liabilities, a refund will be made to the employee by the Department of National Revenue. Therefore, the amount withheld remains a part of the wages, and subs. 153(3) provides that it is "deemed to have been received" by him at the time the payment was made less the deduction. [Emphasis added.]

I am willing to accept that the emphasized line in the above passage supports the Director's position. Certainly, the support is qualified, inasmuch as Pigeon J.'s opinion must be tied to s. 153(3) of the Income Tax Act, which states that withholdings are "deemed to have been received" by employees at the time of withholding, but which establishes this result only "for all the purposes of this Act" (emphasis added). But there is an element of support in Dauphin nonetheless, since Pigeon J. concludes that "the amount withheld remains a part of the wages" before he discusses s. 153(3).

Adopting a stance in opposition to these authorities, Master Funduk thought it was not "logical" to view tax refunds as deferred wages. He stated that "the statutory deduction requirement is just an enforcement process to ensure that the employee makes payments on account of his tax liability" (p. 120). I agree with Master Funduk that withholding provisions are designed to ensure that employees pay taxes, but, with respect, I fail to see how this advances his position. If an excess of wages is withheld, that excess does not fulfil the enforcement purpose. Accordingly, its character is not informed by that purpose.

In my opinion, the transformation of Marzetti's wages over time does not alter their fundamental character. Marzetti earned a certain amount as wages after his voluntary assignment into bankruptcy. The fact that some portion of his wages was, by virtue of statute, automatically directed toward his tax liability does not affect the question. The intervention of statute speaks to how Marzetti spent his wages, not to how much he earned in the first place. In common parlance, taxpayers do not draw false distinctions between the wages they earn and the refunds they receive. As stated by Fullagar J. in Federal Commissioner of Taxation, supra, "[h]is right to payment arises because, and only because, he worked for a remuneration which is found, on a contingency which was contemplated throughout, not to have been paid to him in full" (p. 322).

Therefore, Major J.A. was, I suggest, entirely justified in concluding that a tax refund is analytically similar to deferred wages in this case. He noted that "[i]f there is any money that can be easily traced in a modern society, it is the amount of taxes paid and the amount of taxes owed" (p. 133). It is difficult to dispute this statement, and I reject the Superintendent of Bankruptcy's suggestion that a wages characterization is precluded by the commingling of withheld sums in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Equally, I agree with Major J.A. that there is no necessary inconsistency between holding that a tax refund is a debt owed by the Crown, and holding that a tax refund represents deferred wages originally owed by an employer. Again, as stated by Fullagar J. in Federal Commissioner of Taxation, supra, "to say that payment of the sum . . . will be a repayment of income tax overpaid is not inconsistent with saying that that sum represents personal earnings of the bankrupt for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act" (p. 321).

Furthermore, like Major J.A., I note that there is no doubt in this case that the post-bankruptcy income tax refund derived from Marzetti's wages. Of course, tax refunds can be generated by other sources of income. In the words of Major J.A., therefore, the wages characterization "depends on the nature of the refund" (p. 135).

The only problems with the characterization of an income tax refund as deferred wages for the purposes of s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act are structural ones which relate to the trustee's ability to make applications, and the court's ability to make orders. The former problem causes me little concern. It is said that s. 68(1) of the Bankruptcy Act permits a trustee to make an application only "if directed by the inspectors or the creditors", and that the trustee's inability to act independently is a reason to reject the wages characterization. But this aspect of s. 68(1) is an inherent flaw, and it equally affects the trustee's ability to access a bankrupt's salary, wages, and other remuneration per se. The flaw does not become more serious simply because the definition of "wages" is expanded. Moreover, the flaw has now been corrected such that s. 68(1) permits applications "on the trustee's own initiative": see S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 34(1).

A bigger problem exists with respect to the making of s. 68(2) orders. Such orders can be directed only toward "the bankrupt and his employer", and not, for example, against third-party revenue authorities. Although s. 68(2) has also been amended by S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 34(1), the amendment does not seem to resolve this problem.

Like Major J.A. at the Court of Appeal, I am content to state that any deficiency in s. 68(2) cannot affect the conclusion that an income tax refund retains its character as wages. Major J.A. stated (at p. 135):

> ...the master opined that even if the refund could be characterized as "wages," s. 68 does not contemplate an order against the Crown. Therefore, he concluded, the refund could not possibly be wages under the Bankruptcy Act. With respect, that is irrelevant. The trustee has not nor is not seeking an order under s. 68. The difficulties, if any, in the wording of s. 68 cannot change the characterization of employer withholdings returned in the form of a tax refund as "wages." That may be a problem for Parliament but not in this appeal.

Although it would be preferable, from a trustee's point of view, to obtain an order directly against the Crown in respect of an income tax refund, the deficiency in s. 68(2) does not entirely remove refunds from a trustee's grasp. Orders can still be obtained as against bankrupt persons and employers under s. 68(2). Of course, in the circumstances of an income tax refund, service of a s. 68(2) order upon the employer would be meaningless. In this respect, I note that s. 68(4) of the Bankruptcy Act permits trustees to withhold service of the s. 68(2) order where the trustee regards same as "inexpedient". Thus, the trustee can effectively obtain a s. 68(2) order as against the bankrupt person alone, and although such an order is not ideal, it does provide the trustee with the necessary legal entitlement to the refund.

My opinion is, furthermore, fortified by public policy considerations. Although the absence of language in s. 68(2) permitting an order to be made against the Crown weighs in favour of the Trustee in this case, when family needs are at issue, I prefer to err on the side of caution. In s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, Parliament has indicated that, before wages become divisible among creditors, it is appropriate to have "regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt". This demonstrates, to my mind, an overriding concern for the support of families.

Furthermore, the discretion given to courts by s. 68 is amplified by the discretion which is necessarily left in the trustee, creditors, and inspectors. As stated by Houlden and Morawetz: "It is unlikely that the trustee would make, or that the inspectors or creditors would authorize, [a s. 68] application, unless the earnings of the bankrupt were in excess of what was needed for the adequate maintenance of the bankrupt and of his family" (supra, at p. 3-127). Since these kinds of discretion are better able to respond to the costs of raising families, I favour a purposive interpretation of the word "wages" in s. 68, notwithstanding difficulties associated with s. 68(2).

Moreover, there are related public policy goals to consider. As recently recognized by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Moge v. Moge, 1992 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 813, "there is no doubt that divorce and its economic effects" (p. 854) are playing a role in the "feminization of poverty" (p. 853). A statutory interpretation which might help defeat this role is to be preferred over one which does not.

To summarize briefly, s. 68 governs in this case as a complete code. Marzetti's post-bankruptcy income tax refund retained its character as wages for the purposes of s. 68. The Trustee could access that refund only through a s. 68 application. None was made.

Accordingly, the contest in this case narrows, and priority will be accorded in respect of one of two happenings: first, the execution of the Agreement Letter; second, the Director's garnishment. Since the Agreement Letter came first in time, if it is effective, it will prevail over the garnishment because the latter could have taken effect only once statutory requirements were satisfied: Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, s. 28. And so I turn to the final issue, and ask whether the Agreement Letter created an enforceable assignment.

B. Did the Agreement Letter Create a Valid Assignment?

The parties debated the effectiveness of the Agreement Letter under several heads, most of which I will not examine. They disagreed as to whether the Director's garnishee, in substance, created an equitable assignment, such that the priority contest might truly involve two equitable assignees. And, leaving aside other statutory considerations, they fundamentally disagreed as to whether the Agreement Letter could have created an effective assignment. This latter disagreement involved component disputes. Does the Letter demonstrate an intention to assign, or does it merely direct a Crown payment? Is the characterization of the assigned interest as future property significant? And, is it necessary to find consideration to support the Agreement Letter?

In my opinion, these points of contention do not require resolution in this appeal, inasmuch as the Agreement Letter is rendered ineffective by s. 67 of the Financial Administration Act. Section 67 provides, in part, that "[e]xcept as provided in this Act or any other Act of Parliament . . . a Crown debt is not assignable". The expression "Crown debt" is defined in s. 66 to include not only existing debts, but also future debts "due or becoming due". Marzetti did not obtain an accrued legal debt in respect of his post-bankruptcy income tax refund until his income tax return was filed, as I have already mentioned. But his interest in that return can legitimately be described as an interest in a future Crown debt becoming due.

This Crown-debt characterization means that the Financial Administration Act operates to prohibit assignment of an income tax refund, due or becoming due from the Crown, unless assignment is permitted by that Act or another "Act of Parliament". There is no question that the Financial Administration Act fails to permit such assignment, and no express authorization appears in any other federal statute.

In this context, I pause to note s. 2(2) of the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. T-3. That section permits a person to "acquire. . . a right to a refund of tax . . . notwithstanding that, by virtue of section 67 of the Financial Administration Act . . . the refund of tax is not assignable". This provision effectively illustrates a simple point: when Parliament means to make income tax refunds assignable, it can do so easily and with clarity.

The only effort made in this appeal to find statutory authorization for the Agreement Letter involved s. 158 of the Bankruptcy Act, but that effort must go unrewarded. Under s. 158(l), bankrupt persons are obliged to execute specified documents "as may be required", but this obligation says nothing about the independent validity of such documents in the face of a statutory proscription. Likewise, under s. 158(o), a bankrupt may be obliged to do "all such acts and things in relation to his property . . . . as may be reasonably required by the trustee", but it cannot be said that a trustee can "reasonably require" that which Parliament expressly prohibits.

In ss. 67 and 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, Parliament has established a regime which determines whether there exists "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". In my opinion, it would be very odd if trustees could attain that which appears to be unattainable on the face of those provisions, namely, an entitlement to an income tax refund without the need for a court application. In other words, I do not believe that a trustee and a bankrupt can use contract law to circumvent statutory law in this area.

In the absence of clear statutory authority to permit the assignment envisioned by the Agreement Letter, s. 67(a) of the Financial Administration Act takes hold and renders that Crown debt not assignable. Moreover, the grip of s. 67(a) is not loosened by Re Northward, supra, which was cited by the Trustee.

In Re Northward, an airline company purported to assign its book debts to a bank. The company later declared bankruptcy at a time when the federal Crown was the company's debtor. The bank claimed the value of the Crown debt as assignee, but the trustee relied upon the Financial Administration Act. MacDonald J. in Re Northward responded to these facts by holding that the rules of equity continued to apply as between the assignor and the assignee, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act. MacDonald J. reasoned that the company as assignor would hold monies received from the Crown in trust for the bank, and that trust monies, under the equivalent of s. 67(a) of the Bankruptcy Act, would not constitute property of the bankrupt which could vest in the trustee.

With respect, I think that Re Northward is wrongly decided. MacDonald J. stated that the Financial Administration Act "does not abrogate the rights of parties except to the extent of exercising rights or remedies in respect of the Crown debt" (p. 140). In other words, MacDonald J. held that an assignment will be invalid only to the extent that an assignee attempts to exercise "rights or remedies" directly against the Crown debtor. But this holding ignores the broad language chosen by Parliament in s. 67(b).

MacDonald J. in Re Northward interpreted s. 67(b) as if Parliament enacted a prohibition against attempts to assign to "any person any rights or remedies against the Crown as debtor in respect of [the Crown] debt". But, of course, s. 67(b) renders ineffective attempts to assign to "any person any rights or remedies in respect of [the Crown] debt" (emphasis added). I do not think it is possible to go behind this broad language as Re Northward suggests. Moreover, since s. 67(a) prohibits the assignment of a Crown debt, that prohibition alone would presumably give the Crown the same protection as would s. 67(b) under the Re Northward interpretation. In my view, s. 67(b) amplifies the broad prohibition apparent in s. 67(a), so that a purported assignment of a Crown debt is rendered absolutely ineffective, as between debtor and creditor, and as between assignor and assignee.

For these reasons, I conclude that the Agreement Letter executed by Marzetti was statutorily incapable of creating an effective assignment. Priority in respect of the post-bankruptcy income tax refund remains unaffected by that instrument, and falls to be determined according to the principles I have already described.

VI. Conclusion and Disposition

Under s. 24 of the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, the Crown may be garnisheed in respect of "garnishable moneys". By virtue of s. 23 of that Act, read in conjunction with s. 3(a) of the Family Support Orders and Agreements Garnishment Regulations, SOR/88-181, an income tax refund constitutes "garnishable moneys". Accordingly, the Director was properly able to file the Notice of Continuing Attachment as against the Crown to recover Marzetti's income tax refund, and thus to instigate the process which led to the garnishee summons.

In conclusion, by taking steps to garnish the income tax refund, the Director necessarily obtained priority in this case. That is because the refund did not automatically vest in the Trustee. It could have been accessed by the Trustee only through an application under s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act. However, since no application was made prior to the garnishment -- indeed, since no application was ever made -- the Director's claim to priority is effectively unchallenged.

I would dismiss the appeal. By agreement among the parties, there will be no order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed.

on appeal from the court of appeal for quebec

Bankruptcy -- Property of bankrupt -- Exemption from seizure -- Registered retirement savings plan -- Whether sums contributed by employee to Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan continued to be unseizable after being transferred into RRSP – Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, R.S.Q., c. R-10, s. 222 -- Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25, art. 553(12) -- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, s. 67(1)(b).

In 1991, after his termination of employment, the appellant asked the Government of Quebec's Commission administrative des régimes de retraite et d'assurance (CARRA) to transfer into his RRSP the sums that stood to his credit in the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan. The appellant's RRSP is a self-directed fixed-term annuity plan. Under this plan, the funds are invested mainly in guaranteed investment certificates or in Canadian securities, and may be withdrawn in whole or in part, subject to the conditions imposed by tax legislation. The appellant exercised that right on one occasion. In 1993, the appellant made an assignment into bankruptcy. The amount transferred by CARRA in 1991 was worth $77,603 on December 31, 1993. The trustee requested the reimbursement of the appellant's RRSP. The appellant refused and filed an application for declaratory judgment in which he asked that the sums held in his RRSP be declared unseizable. The Superior Court found that the amount transferred by CARRA was unseizable, together with an amount for appreciation in proportion to the total increase in the value of the plan. However, it declared the portion of the RRSP funds derived from the appellant's personal contributions to be seizable. The Court of Appeal, in a majority decision, reversed that judgment and declared that all of the assets of which the appellant's RRSP was composed were seizable.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Section 67 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act refers to the laws that apply in the province within which the bankrupt resides and within which the property is situated in order to determine what property is exempt from execution or seizure. Articles 1980 and 1981 C.C.L.C. set out the principle that seizability is the rule and unseizability the exception. Provisions that depart from this principle must be narrowly construed. Article 553(12) C.C.P. includes in the list of unseizable property anything declared unseizable "by law". In the instant case, s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan provides that "[a]ll sums paid or reimbursed under Titles I and IV [of the Act] are inalienable and unseizable". The sums that were reimbursed to the appellant and then transferred into his RRSP are not included in the expression "sums paid or reimbursed". It cannot be said that the appellant holds "sums" in his RRSP. When the sum reimbursed was transferred at the appellant's request into his RRSP, its nature, and the appellant's rights in it, changed. That sum was used to acquire an RRSP, that is, to create an onerous contract or purchase a "tax envelope". As of that moment, and from then on, the appellant's rights, and the sum invested, were governed by the contract. Moreover, the only way not to produce an absurdity and to give some meaning to the words "inalienable" and "incessible" in s. 222 is to interpret the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" to mean "the right to payment or to reimbursement of sums". Once that right has been extinguished, that is, once the sums have in fact been paid or reimbursed, their inalienable and unseizable nature has been permanently lost. This interpretation of the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" is consistent with the manner in which other declarations of unseizability have been construed. However, if the sum reimbursed to the appellant had been transferred directly into an unseizable plan, it would have remained sheltered from any seizure. The appellant instead chose a seizable RRSP.

It is also impossible to accept that the appellant's RRSP is unseizable because of the source of the funds used to create it, because the wording of s. 222 is not sufficiently clear to establish a new case of investment, reinvestment or real subrogation. Although there is a general principle of personal subrogation in civil law, our law contains no general principle of real subrogation and applies it only in a fragmented fashion. In addition, investment and reinvestment cases are exceptional and are expressly provided for in the law. When the Quebec legislature intended to extend the unseizability of certain sums derived from a retirement plan to the RRSP into which they had been transferred, it did so expressly and clearly.

I - Issue

1 This appeal raises a very specific issue relating to the interpretation of the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" found in s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, R.S.Q., c. R-10, and the extent to which those sums are unseizable under that section. The issue may be put as follows: did the sums contributed by the appellant to the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan continue to be unseizable after they were transferred into a registered retirement savings plan (RRSP)?

II - Facts

2 The appellant is a physician. From March 17, 1981 to November 30, 1990, while he was employed by the Government of Quebec, he contributed to the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan (Retirement Plan). On November 30, 1990, the accumulated value of the appellant's retirement plan was $55,982.31.

3 On December 20, 1990, the appellant acquired a self-directed RRSP. The Société nationale de fiducie was the trustee, and McNeil, Mantha Inc. was the agent. On January 21, 1991, the appellant asked the Government of Quebec's Commission administrative des régimes de retraite et d'assurance (CARRA) to transfer into his RRSP the sums that stood to his credit in the Retirement Plan. Since there was a waiting period of 210 days from the date of termination of employment before the contributions could be refunded, the appellant had to complete a second application for reimbursement, which he did on July 2, 1991. It was not until September 3, 1991 that CARRA finally sent the Société nationale de fiducie a cheque for $55,982.31, as reimbursement of the contributions paid by the appellant.

4 In the meantime, the appellant had an RRSP that he held with Lévesque Beaubien Geoffrion Inc. transferred to McNeil, Mantha Inc. On March 31, 1991, the appellant's two accounts with McNeil, Mantha Inc. were merged. On May 15, 1991, the appellant requested that his initial RRSP be replaced by an "unseizable RRSP" and a self-directed fixed-term annuity plan was then substituted for the original plan. The appellant designated his sister as beneficiary. That designation is revocable. On August 31, 1991, before the reimbursement was received from CARRA, the appellant had accumulated $16,778.36 in his RRSP.

5 In early 1992, the mis en cause acquired all accounts and plans held by McNeil, Mantha Inc., and Montreal Trust became the trustee of the appellant's RRSP. On February 10, 1992, the mis en cause RBC Dominion Securities Inc. sent the appellant a letter informing him that he had become its customer, and that [TRANSLATION] "[b]ased on current trends in the case law, your 'unseizable' RRSP account could in fact become seizable".

6 Under the appellant's fixed-term annuity plan, the funds are invested mainly in guaranteed investment certificates or in Canadian securities, and they may be withdrawn in whole or in part, subject to the conditions imposed by tax legislation. The appellant exercised that right when he withdrew $4,950 from his RRSP on February 26, 1993. He invested an additional $1,974 on November 4, 1992.

7 On April 6, 1993, the appellant made an assignment into bankruptcy. On December 31, 1993, the amount transferred by CARRA ($55,982.31) was worth $77,603. The other sums invested by the appellant were worth $20,011 on that date.

8 On April 5, 1994, the respondent requested the reimbursement of the appellant's RRSP. When the appellant refused, it informed him by letter dated November 24, 1994, that it would act unilaterally unless proceedings were taken to contest the trustee's position. On December 6, 1994, the appellant served an application for declaratory judgment on the respondent in which he asked that the sums held in his RRSP be declared unseizable. In the Superior Court, Landry J. found that an amount equal to the amount transferred by CARRA was unseizable, together with an amount for appreciation in proportion to the total increase in the value of the plan. However, he declared the portion of the RRSP funds derived from the appellant's personal contributions to be seizable. That decision was reversed by the Quebec Court of Appeal, which declared, by a majority, that all of the assets of which the appellant's RRSP was composed were seizable. Rousseau-Houle J.A. dissented.

III - Relevant Statutory Provisions

9 Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3 (B.I.A.)

67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides. . . .

Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25 (C.C.P.)

553. The following are exempt from seizure:

(7) Benefits payable under a supplemental pension plan to which an employer contributes on behalf of his employees, other amounts declared unseizable by an Act governing such plans and contributions paid or to be paid into such plans;

(12) Anything declared unseizable by law.

Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, R.S.Q., c. R-10

222. All sums paid or reimbursed under Titles I and IV are inalienable and unseizable.

IV - Judicial History

A. Superior Court of Quebec, J.E. 95-1850

10 For the purposes of his analysis, Landry J. drew a distinction between the funds accumulated by the appellant in the Retirement Plan and the RRSP accumulated through his personal investments. He dealt first with the funds that derived from the Retirement Plan. After noting that s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, unlike the legislative provision at issue in Re Neuls (1985), 56 C.B.R. 132 (Sask. C.A.), on which the respondent relied, refers to sums reimbursed and not to "moneys payable", Landry J. said he was of the view that the legislature had intended to express a different intention by using different terminology, that is, to protect "the principal" and not only "the act of reimbursement". Landry J. cited Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards v. Wadsworth, J.E. 92-1421 (Sup. Ct.), in support of that position. He concluded that by virtue of the combined effect of art. 553(7) C.C.P. and s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, the sums reimbursed to the appellant after his employment terminated were unseizable and continued to be unseizable even when they were invested in an RRSP with the mis en cause. He pointed out that the appellant had at no time had in his possession the sums transferred.

11 On the question of the sums that had been accumulated through personal investments, Landry J. held that they were seizable, given that the designated beneficiary of the appellant's fixed-term annuity RRSP was not one of the beneficiaries referred to in art. 2552 C.C.L.C., and accordingly that the requirements in order for s. 178 of the Act respecting Trust Companies and Savings Companies, R.S.Q., c. S-29.01, to apply had not been met.

B. Quebec Court of Appeal, 1997 CanLII 10011 (QC CA), [1997] R.J.Q. 2421

12 Since the appellant had withdrawn his incidental appeal on the question of whether the sums that derived from his personal investments were unseizable, the only issue to be resolved by the Court of Appeal was the issue relating to the funds accumulated in the Retirement Plan by the appellant and later transferred into his RRSP.

(1) Deschamps J.A. (Tourigny J.A. concurring)

13 Deschamps J.A. pointed out that most decisions at the trial level in which an RRSP has been declared to be unseizable when the funds used to create it were initially unseizable have relied either on one another or on Re Moysey (1977), 80 D.L.R. (3d) 152, a decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench. She was of the opinion that a cautious approach must be taken in examining common law decisions, and that because of the decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Re Neuls, supra, the position adopted in Re Moysey, supra, no longer carries the weight that was formerly attributed to it.

14 Deschamps J.A. found it difficult to include the securities held in the appellant's self-directed RRSP in the "sums paid or reimbursed" that s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan declares to be unseizable. After noting that cases of reinvestment are exceptional, she pointed out that the appellant's rights in respect of his self-directed RRSP had nothing in common with the rights he had in respect of the Retirement Plan. In her view, a creditor of protected rights can rely on the unseizable nature of the sums only so long as they retain the characteristics that are the reason the law protects them.

Digitized by Google

15 Deschamps J.A. rejected the argument that the different wording of s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, that is, the use of the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" instead of the expression "benefits payable", meant that the position adopted by the Court of Appeal in Lachance-Gariépy v. Page, [1983] C.A. 562, could be rejected, and the protection against seizure extended to the reinvestment of sums derived from the Retirement Plan. In her view, the words "sums paid or reimbursed" are insufficient to create a separate body of property that would allow the protection against seizure to be perpetuated.

16 In conclusion, Deschamps J.A. wrote, at p. 2433:

> [TRANSLATION] Because only the property specifically set out in the Act is unseizable, because the vehicle chosen by the respondent is not one such type of property, because neither s. 222 of the Act nor art. 553 C.P. create a separate body of property which would allow for tracing, the securities held in his RRSP devolved in their entirety to the trustee.

(2) Rousseau-Houle J.A. (dissenting)

17 Rousseau-Houle J.A. was of the opinion that the trial judge was correct in declaring the sum accumulated by the appellant while he was contributing to the Retirement Plan, which was then transferred into an RRSP, to be unseizable. In her opinion, the sums that were reimbursed to the appellant did not cease to be benefits paid to an employee under a supplemental pension plan when they were reimbursed. Accordingly, those sums were exempt from seizure in the new retirement plan to which they were directly transferred, regardless of whether or not the new plan was seizable. Rousseau-Houle J.A. found that the amendments to art. 553(7) C.C.P. and the new wording of s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan clearly indicated that the legislature intended to declare both sums paid and sums reimbursed after withdrawal from the Retirement Plan to be unseizable. Moreover, those changes meant that the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Lachance-Gariépy v. Page, supra, and the decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Re Neuls, supra, no longer applied. Rousseau-Houle J.A. concluded as follows, at p. 2424: [TRANSLATION] "If the sums paid derive from a pension fund that was itself unseizable by law, they continue to be unseizable in the new retirement plan in which they have been reinvested."

V - Analysis

A. Introduction

18 Section 67 B.I.A. refers to the laws that apply in the province within which the bankrupt resides and within which the property is situated in order to determine what property is exempt from execution or seizure. Articles 1980 and 1981 C.C.L.C. read as follows at the time the appellant made an assignment into bankruptcy:

> 1980. Whoever incurs a personal obligation, renders liable for its fulfilment all his property, moveable and immoveable, present and future, except such property as is specially declared to be exempt from seizure.
> However, a creditor may agree with his debtor that the latter will be bound to fulfil his obligation only on the property they describe and which is affected with a legal cause of preference in favour of the creditor.
> 1981. The property of a debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, and where they claim together they share its price rateably, unless there are amongst them legal causes of preference.

The following are the corresponding articles of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64:

> 2644. The property of a debtor is charged with the performance of his obligations and is the common pledge of his creditors.
> 2645. Any person under a personal obligation charges, for its performance, all his property, movable and immovable, present and future, except property which is exempt from seizure or property which is the object of a division of patrimony permitted by law.
> However, the debtor may agree with his creditor to be bound to fulfil his obligation only from the property they designate.

These articles set out the principle that seizability is the rule and unseizability the exception. Provisions that depart from this principle must be narrowly construed: see Caisse populaire de Lévis v. Maranda, [1950] B.R. 249, at pp. 259 (Galipeault C.J.) and 262 (Bissonnette J.). In addition, given that all declarations that property is unseizable affect the rights of the creditors, they may be expected to be worded clearly and precisely.

19 The Quebec legislature has included declarations that property is unseizable in a number of statutes, but they are found primarily in arts. 552 and 553 C.C.P. Paragraph 7 of art. 553 C.C.P. concerns supplemental pension plans. Since para. 12 of that article includes in the list of unseizable property anything declared unseizable "by law", and s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan declares "[a]ll sums paid or reimbursed under Titles I and IV" of that Act to be unseizable, it is not necessary to decide whether art. 553(7) C.C.P. is applicable and whether the Retirement Plan to which the appellant contributed constitutes a supplemental pension plan despite the fact that it is not governed by the Supplemental Pension Plans Act, R.S.Q., c. R-15.1 (s. 2(4) of that Act excludes from its application pension plans established by an Act). The issue can be decided by referring solely to s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan. But before looking further at that section, it is necessary to examine the overall scheme of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, and the nature of an RRSP in Quebec civil law.

B. Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan

20 The Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan is divided into five titles. Section 222 is part of Title V, "Miscellaneous and Transitional Provisions". Title I, to which s. 222 refers, includes provisions regarding the scope of application of the Act, pensionable salary, years of service, contributions and contributory amounts, benefits, and transfer and purchase of service. Titles II and III deal with regulations and the administration of retirement plans, respectively. Title IV deals with "Temporary Measures", including sabbatical leave with deferred salary, early retirement, anticipation of pension benefits, and persons placed on reserve.

21 Under that Act, an employer to which the Act applies must withhold the contribution set by the Act from its employee's salary. It must then pay that contribution to CARRA at the same time as its own contribution to the plan. By contributing to the Retirement Plan, an employee becomes entitled to receive a pension when he or she retires. The annual amount of the pension is based on the employee's average pensionable salary and years of service.

22 Reimbursement of contributions is governed by Title I of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, and more specifically by Division III of Chapter IV. At present, an employee who has at least two years of service and who ceases to participate in the Retirement Plan is not entitled to have his or her contributions reimbursed. Such an employee is entitled only to a deferred annuity: see s. 51. However, at the time when the appellant ceased to be employed, s. 48 read as follows:

> 48. Except where section 21 applies, if an employee ceases to participate in the plan before becoming entitled to a pension or to a deferred annuity, he may, if he has at least two years of service, apply for a deferred annuity or obtain, provided he does not again participate in the plan and subject to section 58, the refund of his contributions as long as he has not attained 65 years of age.
> In case of death, the contributions shall be refunded to his spouse or, if he has no spouse, to his assigns.

Thus in 1990 an employee who ceased to participate in the Retirement Plan had the option of choosing a refund or a deferred annuity. However, an employee who ceased to be employed before becoming eligible for a pension, and who was at least 45 years old and had at least 10 years' service, was not entitled to have his or her contributions refunded. Such an employee was entitled only to a deferred annuity or to a sum representing up to 25 percent of the actuarial value of that deferred annuity and a deferred annuity adjusted to take into account the payment of that sum (s. 51). The deferred annuity became payable to the pensioner only on the date of his or her sixty-fifth birthday (s. 54).

23 We see from reading s. 48 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan that the appellant had the option of leaving his contributions in the Retirement Plan and requesting a deferred annuity instead of reimbursement of his contributions. However, he chose to request a refund and to invest the reimbursed sum in an RRSP.

C. Nature of an RRSP

24 There are many varieties of RRSPs in Canada. They are offered by different institutions, including life insurance companies, trust companies, banks, caisses populaires, loan companies and securities brokers. RRSPs are tax creatures (M.-B. Paré, L. Quesnel and G. Carrière, "Les régimes d'épargne-retraite", [1986] 1 C.P. du N. 151, at p. 169). The Quebec Court of Appeal has examined the question of the nature of an RRSP in Quebec civil law, and concluded that an RRSP was simply a creditor-debtor relationship governed by the clauses of the contract between the two parties: see Cie Trust Royal v. Caisse populaire Laurier, 1989 CanLII 426 (QC CA), [1989] R.J.Q. 550. Authors have written that [TRANSLATION] "the retirement savings plan is not property, but rather an agreement that produces rights and obligations or, if you prefer, a tax envelope by means of which certain property may be acquired": see Paré, Quesnel and Carrière, supra, at p. 171.

25 The sums invested in an RRSP are therefore used to acquire other property. Accordingly, the nature of those sums changes, as do the rights of the person who invested them: they are then determined by the agreement between the parties.

26 In the instant case, the appellant acquired a self-administered RRSP offered by McNeil, Mantha Inc. Under the rules governing that RRSP, the trustee undertook to purchase an annuity payable to the Annuitant or to his or her spouse within the 120 days preceding the maturity date of the RRSP. The Annuitant in turn undertook not to contribute more than the maximum exemption permitted under federal and provincial income tax legislation. It is stated that [TRANSLATION] "[t]he contributions and any increase in the value thereof, in accordance with the instructions received from the Annuitant, may be retained in cash, invested in guaranteed investment certificates or invested, provided that no such investment is prohibited by the Income Tax Act or the regulations." (Emphasis added.) The appellant was therefore entitled to give instructions as to the investments to be made, something that he could not do when he was contributing to the Retirement Plan. Moreover, he had the option of withdrawing the funds invested, in whole or in part, at any time, subject to the conditions imposed by tax legislation. As I noted earlier, the appellant exercised that right by withdrawing $4,950 from his RRSP in February 1993.

D. Meaning of the Expression "Sums Reimbursed"

27 Section 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan declares certain "sums" ("sommes" in the French version) to be inalienable and unseizable. In the instant case, the appellant had a sum of money reimbursed to him. After the appellant applied for reimbursement and met all of the legal and administrative requirements, a sum of money equivalent to the contributions he had paid was transferred directly into his RRSP with McNeil, Mantha Inc., in accordance with his instructions. While the appellant never had that sum of money in his possession, he did have it reimbursed and his "claim" against CARRA was extinguished.

28 The appellant contends that the sums held in his RRSP are the same as the sums reimbursed by CARRA and that their nature has not changed. I cannot accept that argument, for two main reasons.

29 First, it cannot be said that the appellant holds "sums" in his RRSP. It will be recalled that under the appellant's fixed-term annuity plan, the funds invested are used to acquire guaranteed investment certificates, Canadian securities or other types of investments. As a result, when the sum reimbursed was transferred at the appellant's request into his RRSP, its nature, and the appellant's rights in it, changed. That sum was used to acquire an RRSP, that is, to create an onerous contract or purchase a "tax envelope". As of that moment, and from then on, the appellant's rights, and the sum invested, were governed by the contract. The appellant's rights under his RRSP are in fact different from the rights he had under the Retirement Plan, the most striking difference undoubtedly being that he had the option of withdrawing the funds invested in his RRSP, in whole or in part, at any time.

30 In short, what the appellant "holds" under his RRSP are rights that are conferred on him in the contract he has with the trustee and the agent. Those rights are not "sums paid or reimbursed", as the nature of those sums has changed. As a result, the declaration in s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan that the sums are unseizable no longer applies to them.

31 The second reason why I cannot accept the appellant's argument is that I am of the opinion that s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan does not protect the sums once they have been taken out of the Retirement Plan. If we were to interpret the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" in such a way as to cover the sums once they have been taken out of the Retirement Plan, the result would be absurd. If we read s. 222, we see that not only has the Quebec legislature declared sums paid or reimbursed to be unseizable, but it has also declared them to be inalienable ("incessible" in the French version). Of what use might inalienable or unassignable sums of money be? Such sums could not be alienated in order to be applied to a payment and would quite simply be useless. Consequently, if we consider the nature of a sum of money, saying that a certain sum is inalienable or unassignable is nonsense, and produces an absurd result. As Dickson J. wrote in Morgentaler v. The Queen, 1975 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616, at p. 676:

> We must give the sections a reasonable construction and try to make sense and not nonsense, of the words. We should pay Parliament the respect of not assuming readily that it has enacted legislative inconsistencies or absurdities.

Concerning this rule of interpretation, see also Dubois v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 350, at pp. 363-64, and P.-A. Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (2nd ed. 1991), at pp. 373 et seq. The only way not to produce an absurdity and to give some meaning to the words "inalienable" and "incessible" in s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan is to interpret the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" to mean "the right to payment or to reimbursement of sums". Moreover, the concept of incessibilité to which the French version of s. 222 refers usually applies only to rights. It is defined in the Dictionnaire de droit privé et Lexiques bilingues (2nd ed. 1991), at p. 301, as follows: [TRANSLATION] "Attribute of a right not susceptible of assignment." (Emphasis added.) The definition of the term "cession" ("assignment") is found at p. 81: [TRANSLATION] "Inter vivos transfer of a right, by onerous or gratuitous contract, in particular in relation to a claim." (Emphasis added.) Once the right to payment or to reimbursement has been extinguished, that is, once the sums have in fact been paid or reimbursed, their inalienable and unseizable nature has been permanently lost. It goes without saying, however, that sums paid or reimbursed that are transferred into another unseizable "vehicle" acquire the unseizable nature of their new "vehicle". Consequently sums reimbursed that are directly transferred into an unseizable "vehicle" remain sheltered from any seizure. Moreover, the appellant could have asked that the sums reimbursed be transferred into an unseizable plan, both at the time of reimbursement and later before his assignment into bankruptcy, but he did not do so, choosing instead a seizable RRSP.

32 I do not believe that interpreting the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" as meaning "the right to payment or to reimbursement of sums" does any violence to the text of s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan. On the contrary, this interpretation is consistent with the manner in which other declarations of unseizability have been construed. As Deschamps J.A. pointed out in her reasons, if we examine the situations in which the law provides for unseizability, the desire to protect claims for support in the broad sense seems to prevail. The objective is often to prevent seizures in the hands of third parties, that is, seizures at source. We need only consider art. 553(11) C.C.P., which declares a portion of "gross salaries and wages" to be unseizable.

33 As Côté notes, supra, at pp. 236 et seq., the meaning of words depends in part on the context in which they are used. The overall context of an enactment includes, inter alia, the other provisions of the statute, the related statutes and the other rules of the legal system. See Barreau du Québec v. Morin, 1988 CanLII 1044 (QC CA), [1988] R.J.Q. 2629 (C.A.), at pp. 2639-40. The manner in which other declarations of unseizability have been worded and construed is therefore a relevant factor to be considered in construing s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan. The fact that the Quebec legislature has clearly specified in certain enactments that it intends to grant protection for support claims after they are paid is also highly relevant. For example, s. 16.3 of the Act respecting Family Assistance Allowances, R.S.Q., c. A-17, provides that "[a]llowances are unassignable and unseizable. They do not become part of the patrimony of the person who receives them." (Emphasis added.) Unlike the wording of that section, the wording of s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan does not extend the protection against seizure to the period after payment or reimbursement.

34 In short, because the nature of the sums reimbursed has changed, and because s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan cannot be interpreted as protecting the sums that have been reimbursed once they have been taken out of the Retirement Plan, I believe that the sums that were reimbursed to the appellant and then transferred into his RRSP are not included in the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" in s. 222.

E. Property That Is Unseizable by Virtue of the Origin of the Funds

35 The appellant further submits that an RRSP may become unseizable if the funds that were paid into it were themselves unseizable under a specific statute. I cannot accept that argument. That would amount to arbitrarily extending the meaning of the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" and creating a new category of unseizable property. It would also go against the rule that exemptions from seizure should be narrowly construed, since, it must be recalled, they are exceptions.

36 The appellant's position, namely that there is property that is unseizable by virtue of the source of the funds used to acquire it, raises the problem of how to circumscribe the protection afforded by a declaration of unseizability. Where do we draw the line? Is the property unseizable in perpetuity, regardless of what use is made of the sums declared to be unseizable? Carrying the unseizable nature of certain sums over to an RRSP or to something else, as well as the very concept of "source of the funds", necessarily require that the rules of investment and reinvestment, and, it could even be argued, of real subrogation, be applied, since [TRANSLATION] "[t]he new property takes the place of the former property and is subject to the same legal status": see J. Carbonnier, Droit civil, vol. 3, Les biens (14th ed. 1991), at p. 118. Reinvestment is in fact described as [TRANSLATION] "a particular application of real subrogation": see L. Baudouin, Le droit civil de la province de Québec (1953), at p. 1035. Although there is a general principle of personal subrogation in civil law (arts. 1154 C.C.L.C. and 1651 C.C.Q.), our law contains no general principle of real subrogation, and applies it only in a fragmented fashion: see art. 450(3) C.C.Q. concerning the private property of the spouses, and art. 2497 C.C.Q. relating to the payment of an insurance indemnity to creditors holding hypothecs on the damaged property. See also Carbonnier, supra, at p. 118; V. Ranouil, La subrogation réelle en droit civil français (1985), at p. 21; F. Terré and P. Simler, Droit civil -- Les biens (5th ed. 1998), at pp. 334-37. In addition, investment and reinvestment cases are exceptional, and are expressly provided for in the law (see, for example, art. 418 C.C.Q. concerning the family patrimony, arts. 1230 and 1244 C.C.Q. concerning substitution and arts. 450 and 451 C.C.Q. concerning partnership of acquests). There is no provision of this sort in the case before us, and the expression "sums paid or reimbursed" cannot reasonably be construed in such a way as to create a new case of investment or reinvestment and to protect any use of such sums against seizure.

37 When the Quebec legislature intended to extend the unseizability of certain sums derived from a retirement plan to the RRSP into which they had been transferred, it did so expressly and clearly. For instance, s. 264 of the Supplemental Pension Plans Act provides:

> 264. Unless otherwise provided by law, the following amounts or contributions are unassignable and unseizable:
> (1) all member or employer contributions paid or payable into the pension fund or to the insurer, with accrued interest;
> (2) all amounts refunded or pension benefits paid under a pension plan or this Act and derived from member or employer contributions;
> (3) all amounts awarded to the spouse of a member following partition or any other transfer of benefits effected pursuant to Chapter VIII, with accrued interest, and the benefits deriving from such amounts.
> Except as far as they derive from additional voluntary contributions, any of the above-mentioned amounts that have been transferred to a pension plan contemplated by section 98, with accrued interest, any refunds of and benefits resulting from such amounts, and any pension or payment having replaced a pension pursuant to section 92 are also unassignable and unseizable. [Emphasis added.]

Section 98 of the Supplemental Pension Plans Act, to which s. 264 refers, allows a member of a pension plan governed by that Act to transfer certain sums into another pension plan governed by the Supplemental Pension Plans Act or into any pension plan or annuity contract prescribed by regulation. Section 28(3) of the Regulation respecting Supplemental Pension Plans, (1990) 122 O.G. II, 2323, reads as follows:

> 28. The pension plans not governed by the Act and to which transfers may be made under sections 98 and 100 of the Act are:
> . . .

By the combined effect of ss. 264 and 98 of the Supplemental Pension Plans Act and s. 28 of the Regulation, the unseizable nature of certain sums that are held in a pension plan governed by that Act may therefore be carried over to an RRSP. As I noted earlier in para. 19 of these reasons, the Retirement Plan into which the appellant paid is not governed by the Supplemental Pension Plans Act, and the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan contains no provision stipulating that the unseizable nature of the sums reimbursed is carried over to an RRSP.

38 It is also worth noting that other legislatures have also thought it advisable to make specific statutory provision for carrying over to an RRSP the unseizable nature of certain funds, in order to avoid any doubt. We might refer, for example, to s. 63(1) of the Saskatchewan Pension Benefits Act, 1992, S.S. 1992, c. P-6.001, which provides:

> 63(1) Subject to subsection (3), benefits, moneys that have been transferred to another plan, to a prescribed RRSP or to any other prescribed retirement plan that is registered pursuant to the Income Tax Act (Canada), including moneys transferred before January 1, 1993, and moneys earned by those transferred moneys:
> (a) may not be assigned, charged, alienated or anticipated; and
> (b) are exempt from execution, seizure or attachment.

39 French legislation also expressly provides, in s. 15 of Loi nº 91-650 du 9 juillet 1991, J.O., July 14, 1991, 9228, and s. 44 of Décret nº 92-755 du 31 juillet 1992, J.O., August 5, 1992, 10530, that when a bank account is credited with an amount from an unseizable source, the unseizability is transferred to the extent of that amount to the balance in the account. In other words, it has provided an exception to the rule of the fungibility of money and instituted [TRANSLATION] "a genuine theory of unseizable claims": see H. Croze, "Le décret du 31 juillet 1992 instituant de nouvelles règles relatives aux procédures civiles d'exécution: Guide de lecture", J.C.P. 1992.I.3635, at p. 560. No such theory as yet exists in Quebec law: see N. L'Heureux and É. Fortin, Droit bancaire (3rd ed. 1999), at pp. 90-91.

F. Change of Wording

40 The appellant attempted to base an argument on the change in the wording of s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan. The former s. 152 was worded as follows:

> 152. The benefits payable under this act are inalienable and unseizable.

Digitized by Google

It is worth reproducing the wording of s. 222 in order to facilitate comparison between the two sections:

> 222. All sums paid or reimbursed under Titles I and IV are inalienable and unseizable.

The appellant contends that the use of the term "reimbursed" in s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan can mean nothing other than that the unseizable nature of funds that derive from the Retirement Plan is preserved, because otherwise [TRANSLATION] "the legislature would have spoken in vain". I do not agree with this submission. In view of the clear language used in s. 264 of the Supplemental Pension Plans Act and the meaning of the expression "sums reimbursed", I am unable to conclude that by using the word "reimbursed" in s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan the legislature intended to create a new case of reinvestment.

41 That does not mean, however, that the legislature spoke in vain when it amended s. 222. The previous version of s. 222 dealt only with "benefits payable", and did not cover reimbursements of contributions. The sums reimbursed could therefore be seized, even in the hands of third parties. That is in fact what had happened in Lachance-Gariépy v. Page, supra. In that case, the Court of Appeal concluded that a seizure in third party hands became possible once an application for reimbursement had been made, because as of that moment participation in the Retirement Plan was terminated and the right to withdraw amounts from the plan had become part of the debtor's patrimony. Section 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan now protects both benefits payable and sums reimbursable. Because the right to reimbursement is unseizable, seizures in the hands of third parties are no longer permitted, and the sums are protected until they are withdrawn from the Retirement Plan.

G. Conclusion

42 In summary, I am of the opinion that the sums contributed by the appellant to the Retirement Plan did not retain their unseizable nature after they were transferred into an RRSP. The expression "sums paid or reimbursed" in s. 222 of the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan does not cover sums that have been withdrawn from the Retirement Plan. In addition, the sums used to acquire an RRSP cannot be described as "sums reimbursed" under the Act respecting the Government and Public Employees Retirement Plan, because the nature of those sums, and the appellant's rights to those sums, changed upon their being used to fund that onerous contract. Lastly, it is not possible to accept the appellant's argument that his RRSP is unseizable because of the source of the funds used to create it, because the wording of s. 222 is not sufficiently clear to establish a new case of investment, reinvestment or real subrogation.

VI - Disposition

43 For the foregoing reasons, I am of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs throughout.

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Donald R. Cameron dated July 7, 2002 and the costs award dated September 19, 2002.

FELDMAN J.A.:

[1] This case raises for the first time in this court, the issue of the proper treatment of RRSP proceeds following the death of the owner of the RRSP. Simply stated, the issue is whether: (a) following the death of the owner of an RRSP, the proceeds of the RRSP devolve directly to the designated beneficiary or form part of the estate of the deceased owner; and (b) even if they do not form part of the estate, whether creditors of the estate who remain unpaid have any claim against the proceeds of the RRSP in the hands of the designated beneficiary. This issue has caused a divergence of judicial opinion both within Ontario and in other provinces.

[2] The facts of the case are quite typical. The appellant is a creditor of the deceased. The respondent is the widow of the deceased and the designated beneficiary of two RRSP funds. She received the proceeds of the two funds from the two plan administrators. Because the estate of the deceased was unable to pay all of its debts and declared bankruptcy, the creditor sought to obtain payment of the outstanding debt owed by the estate from the beneficiary out of the proceeds of the RRSPs.

[3] The application judge denied the creditor any recovery. He held that RRSPs do not form part of the estate of the deceased but instead devolve directly to the designated beneficiary. He held further, and contrary to the position taken by the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Clark Estate v. Clark reflex, (1997), 115 Man. R. (2d) 48 (C.A.), that the creditor had no right to seek repayment of the debt from the proceeds of the RRSPs in the hands of the designated beneficiary when the estate was unable to pay its debts.

[4] I agree with the conclusion reached by the application judge. For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

FACTS

[5] Ashley James Perring died April 30, 1998. He made a will in 1994 naming his wife, the respondent, the executrix and sole beneficiary of his estate. He also designated the respondent as the beneficiary of two RRSPs, both in the will and in separate designations filed with the administrators of the RRSPs, one with Canada Trust Company and the other with the Royal Bank of Canada. The respondent received the proceeds of the RRSPs ($117,000) in May 1998. The estate filed an assignment in bankruptcy in April 1999, following which, the trustee in bankruptcy demanded that the respondent pay the proceeds of the RRSPs to the estate. She refused and proceeded to collapse the RRSPs, pay the withholding tax and retain the balance of $82,000. The respondent was also the beneficiary of her husband's three life insurance policies and upon his death received the proceeds in the amount of approximately $1.27 million.

[6] The appellant is a creditor of the bankrupt estate. The debt of $53,679.28 was owed by the deceased as a director of a contractor corporation for breach of trust under s. 13 of the Construction Lien Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C. 30. The appellant filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy but remains unpaid. The appellant obtained an assignment of the claim of the trustee against the respondent under s. 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B. 3 in respect of the RRSP proceeds, and brought the application in this matter on its own behalf.

[7] Cameron J. held that the RRSP proceeds do not form part of the deceased's estate and therefore of the bankrupt estate. He also addressed the secondary question whether the creditor could seek payment of its debt directly from the beneficiary of the RRSPs in accordance with the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Clark. Cameron J. declined to follow Clark on this second issue, and held that there is no basis for a creditor to claim any interest in proceeds that do not form part of the estate of the debtor. He therefore dismissed the application. He awarded the respondent costs of the application that he fixed in the amount of $30,000. The appellant seeks leave to appeal the amount of the costs award regardless of the outcome of the appeal on the merits.

ISSUES

(1) Do the proceeds of an RRSP devolve directly to the designated beneficiary, or do they form part of the deceased's estate?

(2) If the RRSP devolves to the beneficiary, do the unpaid creditors of the estate have a claim against the RRSP proceeds in the hands of the beneficiary?

(3) Should this court reduce the amount of costs ordered by the application judge?

Issue 1: Do the proceeds of an RRSP form part of the deceased's estate?

[8] The appellant submits that the application judge erred by not holding that the proceeds of an RRSP devolve to the designated beneficiary through the estate. The appellant relies on s. 2(1) of the Estates Administration Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E. 22 together with the proposition that at law, the designation of a beneficiary of a fund is a testamentary disposition and therefore the fund devolves to the estate and is subject to the claims of creditors before it can be paid out to a designated beneficiary: see A.H. Oosterhoff, Oosterhoff on Wills and Succession, 5th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 2001) at 499; James MacKenzie, Feeney's Canadian Law of Wills, 4th ed. (Markham: Butterworths, 2000) at 1.4 (para. 1.8). The appellant completes the argument by pointing to legislation in two provinces, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, which specifically excludes the proceeds of an RRSP from an estate and, in the case of Prince Edward Island, from the claims of the estate's creditors, and to s. 196(1) of the Ontario Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I. 8,[1] which specifically excludes insurance proceeds from the estate of the insured and from the reach of creditors of the insured. The appellant says that there is no comparable legislation for RRSP proceeds.

> 2(1) All real and personal property that is vested in a person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, on the person's death, whether testate or intestate and despite any testamentary disposition, devolves to and becomes vested in his or her personal representative...as trustee for the persons by law beneficially entitled thereto, and, subject to the payment of the persons' debts and so far as such property is not disposed of by deed, will, contract or other effectual disposition, it shall be administered, dealt with and distributed as if it were personal property not so disposed of.

[10] In Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Besharah reflex, (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 443 (H.C.J.), the first case to address the issue of how an RRSP devolves to a designated beneficiary, the trial judge reasoned that: (a) the RRSP was vested in the deceased during his life and the designated beneficiary had no vested interest in it until his death;(b) under s. 2(1) of the Estates Administration Act, the deceased's vested RRSP devolved to his personal representative; (c) counsel could not refer the court to any statutory exemption from the general rule, applicable to RRSPs, comparable to the section of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 218, s. 173(1) (now R.S.O. 1990, c. I. 8, s. 196) which provides that proceeds of a life insurance policy devolve directly to the designated beneficiary, not to the estate and are not subject to the claims of creditors of the estate; and (d) the RRSP therefore devolved to the deceased's estate to be paid out to the designated beneficiary after the creditors of the estate were satisfied.

[11] Unfortunately, counsel in the Besharah case did not refer the trial judge to s. 53 of the Succession Law Reform Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. S. 26, Part III, entitled "Designation of Beneficiaries of Interest in Funds or Plans", which provides:

> 53. Where a participant in a plan has designated a person to receive a benefit under the plan on the death of the participant,
> (a) the person administering the plan is discharged on paying the benefit to the person designated under the latest designation made in accordance with the terms of the plan...; and
> (b) the person designated may enforce payment of the benefit payable to him under the plan but the person administering the plan may set up any defence that he could have set up against the participant or his or her personal representative.

[12] Cameron J. read this section as excluding the personal representative of the deceased owner of the RRSPs from any right to enforce payment of the proceeds of a fund where there is a designated beneficiary, and as an exception for RRSPs (and other such funds) from s. 2(1) of the Estates Administration Act.

[13] This conclusion is fully in accord with the analysis of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in the 1957 case of Kerslake v. Gray, 1957 CanLII 13 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 516. In that case, the issue was whether a life insurance policy made payable by a declaration by the deceased under the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1950, c. 183, to an ordinary beneficiary, formed part of the estate of the deceased. Section 164 of the Insurance Act specifically provided that insurance monies payable to a preferred beneficiary were held in trust for the preferred beneficiary, were not subject to the control of the insured or his creditors and did not form part of the insured's estate. Section 161, which dealt with ordinary beneficiaries, did not so provide. Section 161(2) was in virtually the same terms as the current s. 53 of the Succession Law Reform Act. Section 161(1) permitted the insured to designate a beneficiary by contract or declaration and subsequently change the beneficiary; s.161(2) enabled the beneficiary to enforce the contract at its maturity for the beneficiary's own benefit and provided that the insurer could set up against the beneficiary any defence it had against the insured, and that payment made to the beneficiary discharged the insurer.

[14] The Supreme Court held that s. 161 operated with respect to ordinary beneficiaries in the same way that s. 164 operated in respect of preferred beneficiaries, and that the personal representatives of the deceased insured had no claim to monies that were payable under an insurance policy to an ordinary beneficiary. Those monies did not form part of the estate.

[15] Importantly, although s. 161 did not contain explicit words, such as those found in s. 164, protecting the proceeds of the insurance policy for the benefit of ordinary beneficiaries both from inclusion in the deceased's estate and from creditors of the insured, the court held that the effect of the two sections was the same.

[16] The Manitoba Court of Appeal in Clark, supra, interpreted a provision in the Manitoba legislation which dealt with RRSP proceeds and was worded similarly to s. 161 of the Insurance Act (as it was worded in Kerslake) and to s. 53 of the Ontario Succession Law Reform Act, to have the same meaning and effect as those sections. The Retirement Plan Beneficiaries Act, C.C.S.M. c. R. 138 was amended following the Manitoba Court of Appeal decision in Pozniak Estate v. Pozniak reflex, (1993), 88 Man. R. (2d) 36 (C.A.). In that case, the Court had followed the Ontario court in the Besharah case, holding that the proceeds of an RRSP fund formed part of the gross value of the estate and were available to pay the debts of the estate. Sections 14 and 15 of the amended Act read:

> 14. A person to whom a benefit is payable under a plan pursuant to a designation may enforce payment of the benefit against the administrator of the plan, but the administrator may set up any defence against the person that it could have set up against the participant who made the designation.
> 15. Payment by the administrator of a plan of the benefits under the plan in accordance with a designation is, in the absence of actual notice of a subsequent designation or a subsequent revocation of the designation, a full discharge to the administrator of its obligations under the designation.

[17] Based on the combination of the two new sections, and particularly on the wording of s. 15, which is virtually identical to s. 53(a) of the Succession Law Reform Act, the court in Clark held that the new sections were added to modify the decision in Pozniak, and to allow the court to find that the RRSP fund passed directly to the designated beneficiary and did not form part of the deceased's estate.

[18] In my view, the decision of the Supreme Court in Kerslake, which has not been overruled or disapproved since it was decided, compels the interpretation given by Cameron J. and by the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Clark. It appears very clear that neither that case nor s. 53 of the Succession Law Reform Act was brought to the attention of the trial judge in Besharah to assist the court in its analysis of the devolution of RRSP proceeds to a designated beneficiary.

[19] The appellant also relies on the Supreme Court of Canada decision in MacInnes v. MacInnes, 1934 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1935] S.C.R. 200, which held that a document made outside a will that designates a beneficiary to a profit sharing fund is a testamentary document. The appellant argues that an RRSP designation is such a document and because it is testamentary, the proceeds of the RRSP fall into the estate of the RRSP's owner. The problem with this argument is that it does not take the appellant any further than did s. 2(1) of the Estates Administration Act, because s. 53 of the Succession Law Reform Act has been interpreted to constitute a statutory exemption to the general rule that would otherwise apply.

[20] Cameron J. found logical support for his conclusion that the legislature intended to except the proceeds of an RRSP that have been designated to a beneficiary from devolution to the estate, in s. 72(1) of the Succession Law Reform Act which provides:

> 72. (1) Subject to section 71, for the purpose of this Part, the capital value of the following transactions effected by a deceased before his or her death, whether benefitting his or her dependant or any other person, shall be included as testamentary dispositions as of the date of the death of the deceased and shall be deemed to be part of his or her net estate for purposes of ascertaining the value of his or her estate, and being available to be charged for payment by an order under clause 63(2)(f),

(a) gifts mortis causa;

(b) money deposited, together with interest thereon, in an account in the name of the deceased in trust for another or others with any bank, savings office, credit union or trust corporation, and remaining on deposit at the date of the death of the deceased;

(c) money deposited, together with interest thereon, in an account in the name of the deceased and another person or persons and payable on death under the terms of the deposit or by operation of law to the survivor or survivors of those persons with any bank, savings office, credit union or trust corporation, and remaining on deposit at the date of the death of the deceased;

(d) any disposition of property made by a deceased whereby property is held at the date of his or her death by the deceased and another as joint tenants;

(e) any disposition of property made by the deceased in trust or otherwise, to the extent that the deceased at the date of his or her death retained, either alone or in conjunction with another person or persons by the express provisions of the disposing instrument, a power to revoke such disposition, or a power to consume, invoke or dispose of the principal thereof, but the provisions of this clause do not affect the right of any income beneficiary to the income accrued and undistributed at the date of the death of the deceased;

(f) any amount payable under a policy of insurance effected on the life of the deceased and owned by him or her;

(f.1) any amount payable on the death of the deceased under a policy of group insurance; and

(g) any amount payable under a designation of beneficiary under Part III.

[21] Section 72(1) lists a number of transactions by a deceased, the proceeds of which are deemed to be included as part of the deceased's estate for the purpose of making and enforcing orders for dependants' relief. Cameron J. reasoned that the existence of the section implies that the transactions listed in the section are not otherwise testamentary dispositions and their proceeds do not actually form part of a deceased's estate. Subsection (g) of s. 72(1): "any amount payable under a designation of a beneficiary under Part III" includes RRSPs. Section 51(1) in Part III provides:

> 51. (1) A participant may designate a person to receive a benefit payable under a plan on the participant's death,
> (a) by an instrument signed by him or her or signed on his or her behalf by another person in his or her presence and by his or her direction; or
> (b) by will,
> and may revoke the designation by either of those methods.

And "Plan" is defined in s. 50 of Part III as follows:

> "plan" means,
> (a) a pension, retirement, welfare or profit-sharing fund, trust, scheme, contract or arrangement or a fund, trust, scheme, contract or arrangement for other benefits for employees, former employees, directors, former directors, agents or former agents of an employer or their dependants or beneficiaries,
> (b) a fund, trust, scheme, contract or arrangement for the payment of a periodic sum for life or for a fixed or variable term, or
> (c) a fund, trust, scheme, contract or arrangement of a class that is prescribed for the purposes of this Part by a regulation made under section 53.1
> and includes a retirement savings plan, a retirement income fund and a home ownership savings plan as defined in the Income Tax Act (Canada) and an Ontario home ownership savings plan under the Ontario Home Ownership Savings Plan Act. ("regime") R.S.O. 1980, c. 488, s. 50; S.O. 1990, c. 9, s. 10; S.O. 1994, c. 27, s. 63(4), in force December 9, 1994 (R.A.). [Emphasis added.]

[22] Cameron J. concluded that if the proceeds of an RRSP were already part of the estate of a deceased, then s. 72(1)(g) would be meaningless. The appellant disputes this conclusion, arguing that the section is there to remove any doubt whether RRSP proceeds are included in the estate for the purpose of dependants' relief. In my view, Cameron J. is correct. The legislature has specifically included RRSPs in the s. 50 definition of a "plan", the benefit of which may be made payable to a designated beneficiary, and by virtue of s. 53, has excluded RRSPs from the estate of the owner. Section 72(1)(g) then includes RRSPs in the value of an estate for the specific purpose of dependants' relief. In this statutory context, there is no basis to suggest that the legislature was in doubt about an issue over which it maintained legislative control.

[23] Cameron J. noted that the Ontario cases, Fekete Estate v. Simon (2000), 32 E.T.R. (2d) 202 (Ont. Sup. Ct.) and Banting v. Saunders Estate (2000), 34 E.T.R. (2d) 163 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), followed Clark on the issue of the devolution of RRSP proceeds, rather than Besharah. After reviewing the current state of the law, he agreed with the recent case law that "the proceeds of RRSPs vest in the designated beneficiary on the death of the owner of the RRSPs."

[24] One issue that concerns some commentators about this interpretation of s. 53 of the Succession Law Reform Act is why the legislature did not use language similar to s. 196 of the Insurance Act, if its intent was to exempt RRSP proceeds from s. 2(1) of the Estates Administration Act and from devolving to the estate of a deceased planholder. The argument is that s. 53 is procedural only, but does not vest the proceeds of the RRSP plan in the beneficiary to the exclusion of the personal representative of the deceased or of the deceased's creditors.[2] One answer to this argument is that it is not necessary to compare and justify two sections that were enacted at different times and in different statutes. A second answer is that for all the reasons set out above, and following the interpretation given by the Supreme Court of Canada in Kerslake to language similar to s. 53, its effect is to vest the proceeds of an RRSP in the designated beneficiary to whom they are paid, without the specific language found in s. 196 of the Insurance Act.

Issue 2: Do creditors have a claim against the RRSP proceeds in the hands of the beneficiary?

[25] Cameron J. declined to follow the second part of the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Clark, that the proceeds of an RRSP in the hands of the designated beneficiary remain answerable for the debts of the deceased if there are insufficient funds in the estate to satisfy all of the creditors of the deceased. He found that there is neither a legal nor equitable basis for that conclusion.

[26] He began by observing that there is no authority other than Clark and the two Ontario cases that followed it, to support the conclusion reached by those courts on this issue. In summary, the analysis in the Clark case is: (1) there is no specific statutory exemption from creditors for RRSP proceeds; (2) unlike life insurance proceeds that never belonged to the deceased, RRSP proceeds did belong to the deceased before death and were answerable for the owner's debts; (3) therefore, if the estate cannot pay the debts, the proceeds should be available in the hands of the beneficiary to respond to the claims of creditors, because creditors rank ahead of a volunteer: Re Diplock [1948] 1 Ch. 465 (C.A.); (4) sections 14 and 15 of the Retirement Plan Beneficiaries Act, the equivalent to s. 53 of the Succession Law Reform Act, is only a mechanism for the payment of the RRSP proceeds to the beneficiary and does not immunize those proceeds from the claims of creditors of the deceased.

[27] Cameron J. disputed these findings and legal conclusions both as a matter of logic and statutory interpretation and as a matter of policy, to the extent that policy considerations assist in the interpretation of the intent and effect of s. 53.

[28] First, dealing with the legal effect of the RRSP proceeds devolving to the designated beneficiary and not the estate, Cameron J. stated that once that happens, there is no security interest in the proceeds in favour of the creditors or other means by which the proceeds remain liable to the claims of creditors. He likened the effect in that respect to jointly held property: prior to death, the creditors of each joint owner can claim that owner's share of the jointly held property, but upon the death of one owner, the whole property vests in the surviving joint owner and the creditors of the deceased have no further claim against it.

[29] Cameron J. next addressed the argument that insurance proceeds are different from RRSP proceeds because they never belonged to the insured and therefore could never be attached by the insured's creditors, whereas the RRSP was liable during the life of the owner to the claims of creditors. The argument here is that very specific language is therefore needed to remove the creditors' entitlement to RRSPs, whereas in the case of insurance proceeds, the creditors never had any claim to them during the life of the insured, so that nothing is being taken away. In response, Cameron J. pointed out first that contrary to this argument, some insurance policies have a cash surrender value that can be dealt with by an insured during his or her life and therefore potentially claimed by creditors during the life of the insured. Second, from a policy point of view, to the extent that both RRSPs and life insurance are used by people to provide security for their dependant spouses following their death, insurance paid for by premiums and RRSPs accumulated by tax-deferred savings over the years, are essentially equivalent vehicles. On that view, barring statutory language that would preclude such a result, both should be treated in the same way in the hands of a surviving beneficiary and not be subject to the claims of creditors of the deceased.

[30] Developing that theme further, Cameron J. weighed the claim of a spouse who has provided physical and emotional support to the other spouse during his or her lifetime against the claims of creditors of the deceased spouse, and rejected the conclusion that the equities necessarily favour the creditors. Put another way, a spouse beneficiary of an

RRSP is not a mere volunteer in the commonly understood sense; rather, a spouse has given consideration or a quid pro quo during the lifetime of the other spouse, and in return, receives the RRSP proceeds for support after the death of the other spouse.

[31] Finally, Cameron J. observed that there is no need for a specific statutory exemption from creditors in order to immunize RRSP proceeds from the claims of creditors of the deceased, again comparing the RRSP to jointly held property that devolves to the other joint tenant free of claims of creditors of the deceased without any specific exemption. He held that the absence of a specific exemption from creditors is not enough to conclude that, by default, creditors have a claim on the RRSP proceeds in the hands of a designated beneficiary. The comparison to jointly held property in this context may be less relevant because on death, the property passes by right of survivorship and belongs solely to the surviving joint owner; consequently there is nothing left that belongs to the deceased from which to except the claims of creditors of the deceased. However, as discussed above, I agree with Cameron J. that the absence of words that specifically exempt RRSP proceeds designated to a beneficiary from creditors does not derogate from the effect of s. 53, which is to remove the proceeds of an RRSP that have been designated to a beneficiary from the estate of the owner of the RRSP, and to insulate those proceeds from the claims of creditors of the deceased's estate.

[32] I also note the priority and procedural concerns for creditors suggested by Barry Corbin in "RRSPs: Partial Protection Against Creditors?" (2000) 20 E.T.P.J. 33 at 43-44, if the Clark analysis on the second issue is correct: (a) If there are two or more unsatisfied creditors, how do they attach the RRSP proceeds in the hands of the beneficiary and is there a mechanism for them to share those proceeds? (b) If there is more than one beneficiary, are they entitled to contribution and indemnity among themselves? (c) What is the priority between the estate creditors and creditors of the beneficiary, particularly if the beneficiary is bankrupt? Although these issues could be resolved on a case-by-case basis, their existence enhances the cogency of the argument that the legislature intended s. 53 to be a full exemption of RRSP proceeds from the estate of the deceased and from the claims of estate creditors. Otherwise, it would make more sense for the executor of the estate to have the obligation of collecting the RRSP proceeds and distributing them after creditors' claims have been paid.[3]

[33] I agree with Cameron J. that there is neither a legal principle nor statutory authority that requires that the creditors have any claim on the proceeds of an RRSP that devolve directly to a designated beneficiary. I also agree that the equities do not necessarily favour the claims of creditors over those of beneficiaries of RRSP. The beneficiaries are often spouses, and therefore, not volunteers in the traditional sense, but partners in life, who have provided support to their spouses with the expectation that they will be supported after the death of their spouses. Finally, there are several potential procedural difficulties if creditors are permitted to pursue beneficiaries directly for the proceeds of the RRSPs in their hands.

[34] I am also satisfied that in order to give full effect to s. 53 as an exemption from the rule that an RRSP designation is a testamentary disposition, and following Kerslake, it would be anomalous to hold that RRSP proceeds that have devolved to the designated beneficiary remain subject to the claims of the creditors of the deceased.

[35] I therefore conclude that the effect of s. 53 is to except RRSP proceeds in the hands of a designated beneficiary from the claims of creditors of a deceased RRSP owner's estate.

Issue 3: Should this court reduce the application judge's award of costs?

[36] The appellant submits that the application judge erred in his award of costs. He ordered costs payable by the appellant creditor on the partial indemnity scale in the amount of $30,000. The application judge justified the size of the costs award in part on the basis that the application originally included a claim to the life insurance proceeds of $1.27 million, which the appellant abandoned only 4 or 5 days before the hearing, after respondent's counsel had prepared his factum.

[37] I agree with the appellant that the application judge erred in this regard. Counsel are encouraged to abandon (or settle) in a timely manner, claims that they conclude are not meritorious. Although the costs award could take some account of the relatively late timing in this case, it is an error to award costs as if $1.27 million were at stake in this application.

[38] The application judge also viewed the case as putting the entire $82,000 of RRSP proceeds at risk, when the appellant's claim was for $53,679.28. Under rule 57.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, the first factor to be taken into account in considering the appropriate amount to award for costs is the amount in issue. The rule reflects the principle that the costs must be commensurate with the value of the lawsuit to the parties. In that light, an award of costs of $30,000 on the partial indemnity scale constitutes an error in principle, and rather appears to be an award on the substantial indemnity scale.

[39] I would grant leave to appeal the award of costs and reduce the award to $15,000.

CONCLUSION

Digitized by Google

[40] I would dismiss the appeal on the substantive issues, but grant leave to appeal and allow the appeal with respect to costs and reduce the costs awarded to $15,000.

[41] With respect to the costs of the appeal, this case raised jurisprudential issues for the first time in this court on a matter on which there is significant developing and conflicting case law and legal scholarship. For that reason and also again because of the amount in issue, I would limit the respondent's costs on the appeal to $15,000 inclusive of disbursements and G.S.T.

on appeal from the court of appeal for quebec

Bankruptcy -- Property of bankrupt -- Life insurance policy -- Right to surrender -- Policy not exempt from seizure under provincial law -- Whether cash surrender value of policy should be excluded from property divisible among creditors in bankruptcy -- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, s. 67(1) -- Civil Code of Lower Canada, arts. 2547, 2552, 2554.

The respondent policyholder insured her husband's life in a life insurance policy and designated herself a revocable beneficiary. She had the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value pursuant to the terms of the policy. The respondent, her husband and her children were petitioned into receivership. The trustee in bankruptcy advised the insurer that he was exercising the right to surrender the policy on behalf of the respondent, and that it should therefore resiliate the policy and pay into the bankruptcy its cash surrender value. The insurer complied. The Superior Court dismissed the respondent's motion for an order enjoining the trustee to return the cash surrender value to the insurer, and for another order enjoining the insurer to reinstate the policy. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision and ordered the trustee to return the cash surrender value to the insurer.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The trustee is entitled to seize the policy and exercise the surrender right to obtain its cash surrender value. The exemption provisions of the Civil Code of Lower Canada governing life insurance contracts were meant by the legislature to be exhaustive. The legislature's intention is derived from the language of arts. 2552 and 2554 C.C.L.C., considering the legislative history of the provisions and in particular the fact that the articles were introduced into the Civil Code of Lower Canada as part of the comprehensive insurance-law revision that took place in Quebec in the early 1970s, and the interpretation of arts. 2552 and 2554 C.C.L.C. themselves in the context of the themes running through the revision of the Civil Code of Lower Canada. It is clear that the legislature intended the provisions to protect from seizure all rights under those contracts that qualify, especially the right to surrender. At the same time, the legislature specifically stipulated that these rights were exempt from seizure only under the two described classes of policies. The natural conclusion, a contrario, is that the rights under all other policies, including the right to surrender for a cash surrender value, are seizable. The legislature chose to protect two particular classes of policies from seizure because it perceived a significant threat to these, namely the threat that creditors, to whom the right to surrender a life insurance policy was otherwise generally available, could terminate a policy by exercising the right. It is open to the legislature to enact an exhaustive set of rules governing seizability in a particular area. Where that is the case, the express rules themselves, and only those rules, govern seizability.

By virtue of s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, this exclusive provincial code of unseizability is determinative as to what rights the trustee can seize and exercise for the benefit of creditors. This determination avoids the need to consider the personal rights doctrine under both the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the general law of Quebec. The best interpretation of the life insurance seizability exemptions is that all the rights under a non-exempt policy are seizable, including the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value.

Here, the respondent's policy does not qualify under either of the only available exemptions, since under the policy, the respondent is both beneficiary and policyholder and since the designation of the respondent as beneficiary was never made irrevocable, and does not benefit from the presumption of irrevocability of art. 2547 C.C.L.C. Articles 2552 and 2554 C.C.L.C. therefore do not operate under s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act to exclude the rights attached to the respondent's life insurance policy from the property that passes to the bankruptcy trustee. The Quebec legislature maintained the unseizable class of family life insurance policies defined vis-à-vis the beneficiary's relationship to the policyholder, not the life insured. This Court cannot undo the Quebec legislature's express choices and adopt the policy of the common law provinces, only because it is convenient to do so in a particular case. This is something to be left for the consideration of the legislature itself.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal, 1997 CanLII 10201 (QC CA), [1998] R.J.Q. 1, 2 C.B.R. (4th) 303, [1997] Q.J. No. 3716 (QL), setting aside a decision of the Superior Court, [1993] Q.J. No. 2117 (QL). Appeal allowed.

Maurice Dussault, Madeleine Roy and Pierre Hémond, for the appellant.

Jean-Philippe Gervais and Simone Bonenfant, for the respondent.

English version of the judgment of the Court delivered by 1 GONTHIER J. – This case raises the following question: if a life insurance policy is not exempt from seizure under the law of Quebec, should its cash surrender value nevertheless be excluded from the property divisible among creditors in a bankruptcy? At the heart of this appeal is whether, notwithstanding the Quebec legislature's express choice to exempt from seizure the rights under only certain specific types of life insurance policies in arts. 2552 and 2554 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada (hereinafter "Civil Code"), the right to surrender a non-exempt policy should nevertheless be excluded from the trustee's seizin on the basis that it is a right strictly attached to the person. The analysis considers the relevant articles in the context of the Civil Code as a whole, while paying due attention to their source, An Act respecting insurance, S.Q. 1974, c. 70 (hereinafter "Insurance Act"), which introduced a new and complete code of rules to govern life insurance.

2 For the reasons set out below, I have concluded that the Quebec legislature intended its exemption provisions for life insurance contracts, that is arts. 2552 and 2554 of the Civil Code, to be exhaustive, and therefore, by virtue of s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, determinative as to what rights the trustee can seize and exercise for the benefit of creditors. This determination avoids the need to consider the personal rights doctrine under both the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the general law of Quebec. In my view, the best interpretation of the life insurance seizability exemptions is that all the rights under a non-exempt policy are seizable, including the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value.

I – Facts

3 On March 30, 1978, the respondent insured her husband's life for $300,000 in a life insurance policy taken out with La Laurentienne Vie Inc. (hereinafter "the Company"). The respondent policyholder designated herself a revocable beneficiary. The respondent had the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value pursuant to the following term of the policy:

[TRANSLATION] Cash surrender value or paid-up insurance

On written request and in consideration of the cancellation of this coverage and of any related extended benefit, the policyholder may:

– obtain the amount of the surrender value as determined according to the attached Table A;

4 From the mid-1960s to December 1992, the respondent was in business with her husband. At some time during this period (the record not being clear on this point), their children joined in. They operated hotels and office buildings. In December 1992, they were petitioned into receivership. On April 16, 1993, the appellant trustee in bankruptcy advised the Company that he was exercising the right to surrender the policy on behalf of the respondent, and that the Company should therefore resiliate the policy and pay into the bankruptcy its cash surrender value. At that time, the cash surrender value was worth $84,900. The Company complied with the trustee's request, resiliating the policy on May 5, 1993.

5 The respondent brought a motion to the Superior Court for an order enjoining the appellant to return the cash surrender value to the Company, and for another order enjoining the Company to reinstate the policy.

II – Applicable Legislation

6 The relevant provisions from the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3 (hereinafter "Bankruptcy Act"), are ss. 2 and 67(1):

> 2. In this Act,
> "property" includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;
> 67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise
> (a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person, [or]

Digitized by Google

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

but it shall comprise

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit. [Emphasis added.]

7 The Bankruptcy Act, as it applies in this case, incorporates by reference the exemptions from seizure for life insurance policies under the laws applicable in Quebec. The policy, at the time of the bankruptcy, was governed by Chapter Second – "Of Insurance of Persons" – of Title Fifth of Book Fourth of the Civil Code. Within this chapter (arts. 2501-2561), the rights under two classes only of life insurance are exempt from seizure. These classes are defined by arts. 2552 and 2554:

2552. When the beneficiary of the insurance is the consort, descendant or ascendant of the policyholder or of the participant, the rights under the contract are exempt from seizure as long as the beneficiary has not received the sum insured.

2554. The stipulation of irrevocable designation binds the owner even if the beneficiary has no knowledge of it.

As long as the designation of a beneficiary as irrevocable subsists, the rights of the policyholder, the participant and the beneficiary are unseizable. [Emphasis added.]

These exemptions from seizure also serve as the relevant exemptions in the Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25:

553. The following are exempt from seizure:

(12) Anything declared unseizable by law.

A. Superior Court, No. 200-11-001360-919, November 5, 1993

8 Letarte J. of the Superior Court rejected the respondent's motion. In keeping with the dominant view of the jurisprudence and doctrine in Quebec, he held that the respondent, as policyholder and beneficiary of the policy, possessed in her patrimony the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value, and that this right passed to the trustee pursuant to ss. 2 and 67(1)(c) and (d) of the Bankruptcy Act. The respondent's policy was not of the kind that benefited from either of the two exemptions from seizure provided for in the Civil Code, namely the exemption for privileged beneficiaries (art. 2552) and the exemption for policies with the designation of an irrevocable beneficiary (art. 2554).

9 The trial judge rejected the respondent's theory that the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value could not pass to the trustee because such a right was "exclusively attached to the person" (Civil Code, art. 1031). Instead, Letarte J. endorsed the view that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act extend further than art. 1031 of the Civil Code, even if this meant that the trustee in bankruptcy enjoyed greater rights than creditors did before bankruptcy.

B. Court of Appeal, 1997 CanLII 10201 (QC CA), [1998] R.J.Q. 1

10 The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the trial judge. Writing the unanimous opinion of the court, Baudouin J.A. arrived at his conclusion working from what he identified as the two controlling principles in the case.

11 The court held that the right to surrender a life insurance policy, in civil matters, had always been considered a "purely personal" right or a right "exclusively attached to the person". In support, Baudouin J.A. cited a line of authority extending from Banque canadienne nationale v. Carette-Poulin (1934), 56 B.R. 143, to Lauwers v. Tardiff, [1966] C.S. 79, referred to also in several subsequent Federal Court and Provincial Court decisions of the early 1980s. Creditors could never exercise for their benefit those of their debtor's rights that were extrapatrimonial or "purely personal". This, according to Baudouin J.A., was an established principle of both civil and common law. In Quebec civil matters, this principle was illustrated by art. 1031 of the Civil Code (the oblique action).

12 The court below extended this principle into the bankruptcy area, applying a second principle that Baudouin J.A. derived from this Court's decision in Royal Bank of Canada v. North American Life Assurance Co., 1996 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 325: [TRANSLATION] "bankruptcy cannot confer on creditors greater rights than they would have had if the bankruptcy had not occurred" (per Baudouin J.A., at p. 5, italics in original). Since the bankruptcy could not place creditors in a better position vis-à-vis their debtor, and since the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value could not be exercised by creditors in an oblique action, the court below allowed the appeal, and ordered the trustee to return the cash surrender value to the Company.

IV – Issue

13 The issue before this Court is whether the right to surrender a bankrupt's life insurance policy is exempt from seizure, even though the rights under the policy are not exempt, and whether a trustee in bankruptcy is thereby prevented from exercising this right and distributing the policy's cash surrender value among the bankrupt's creditors.

V – Analysis

A. The Bankruptcy Act

14 The Bankruptcy Act gives the trustee broad seizin over the bankrupt's property. The trustee, in essence, steps into the shoes of the bankrupt at the onset of the bankruptcy. In Mercure v. A. Marquette & Fils Inc., 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547, de Grandpré J. considered the role of the trustee as regards the bankrupt's insurance policies, in that case a fire insurance policy. At p. 553, he wrote:

> When the trustee is appointed he assumes responsibility in two areas:
> (a) he becomes the debtor's representative;
> (b) he becomes the representative of all the general creditors to the extent that he can even act on their behalf against the debtor.
> . . .
> From the time of the bankruptcy onward, all insurance policies should read as if the trustee's name appeared in place of that of the debtor: nothing more.

In Royal Bank, supra, at para. 49, I adopted as a correct statement of the law the following passage from the reasons of Henry J. of the Ontario Supreme Court in Re Pearson (1977), 23 C.B.R. (N.S.) 44, at p. 48:

> What comes into the hands of the trustee on the occurrence of the bankruptcy are the rights and interests of the insured in the insurance money and in the contract as they stood at the date of the bankruptcy.

Henry J.'s passage, and my reasons in Royal Bank, supra, at para. 49, went on to explain the relevance and operation of provincial exemptions from seizure in the bankruptcy context:

> . . . while an asset which is exempt under provincial law passes into the possession of the trustee at the time of bankruptcy, the exemption itself bars the trustee from dividing the asset among creditors where s. 67(1)(b) [of the Bankruptcy Act] is operative.

15 In this case, it would appear from the face of the relevant provincial legislation that s. 67(1)(b) is not operative. The respondent's life insurance policy is not exempt from seizure under the relevant law applicable in Quebec at the time of the bankruptcy, namely arts. 2552 and 2554 of the Civil Code. Article 2552 exempts from seizure the rights under a life insurance contract "[w]hen the beneficiary of the insurance is the consort, descendant or ascendant of the policyholder". The respondent's policy does not qualify for the exemption, since under her contract with the Company she is both beneficiary and policyholder. Being united in one person, there is no privileged relationship between the two "parties" that would attract the protection provided under art. 2552. Article 2554 exempts from seizure the rights of the policyholder and the beneficiary "[a]s long as the designation of a beneficiary as irrevocable subsists". Once again, the respondent's policy does not qualify for the statutory exemption, since the designation of the respondent as beneficiary was never made irrevocable, and does not benefit from the presumption of irrevocability of art. 2547 of the Civil Code. Articles 2552 and 2554 therefore do not operate under s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy Act to exclude the rights attached to the respondent's life insurance policy from the property that passes to the bankruptcy trustee.

B. The Parties' Submissions

16 The respondent submits that the right to surrender the policy is nevertheless exempt from seizure, drawing on jurisprudence under art. 1031 of the Civil Code. This provision codifies the creditor's remedy known as an oblique action:

> 1031. Creditors may exercise the rights and actions of their debtor, when to their prejudice he refuses or neglects to do so; with the exception of those rights which are exclusively attached to the person. [Emphasis added.]

Over the years, Quebec courts were required to determine which rights were "exclusively attached to the person". They found that the surrender option was such a right.

17 In Zenith Tire & Repair v. Angle & Lemessurier Reg'd, Sup. Ct. Mtl., E-106243, February 13, 1934, the Superior Court held that allowing a judgment creditor to exercise his debtor's right to surrender a life insurance policy would be "an illegal and unjust interference both in the rights of the insured and in the business of the [insurance] Company" (p. 3). The right to surrender was also referred to as "personal", and therefore unavailable to a judgment creditor, in Jarry Automobile Ltée v. Medicoff, [1947] C.S. 465.

Digitized by Google

18 In the case Gagnon v. City of Montreal, [1956] R.P. 385 (Sup. Ct.), at p. 393, the court concluded as follows:

> If, as a matter of principle, any judgment creditor of an insured was to be held to be entitled, at all times, to the cash surrender value of an insurance policy issued on his debtor's life, then the purpose for which life insurance is sought and obtained and the protection given by law to insured and beneficiaries would become illusory, precarious and would consequently be defeated. . . . On the ground of public policy, the right to exercise the cash surrender value option which automatically cancels all other essential rights under the policy must be held to be exclusively personal to the insured.

In that case, the creditors were seeking payment of court costs owed to them by the debtor, who held an insurance policy on his own life for the benefit of his mother.

19 In Lauwers v. Tardiff, supra, the Superior Court refused to grant the creditor's motion to order the debtor to surrender his life insurance policy. The insurance provider was subject to a garnishment order, and the cash surrender value would have gone to the creditor. The court held, first, that the oblique action was not appropriate in these circumstances, since the debtor had not neglected to exercise a right in any meaningful sense; he had simply decided to opt for keeping his insurance in place. In addition, the court held that the right to surrender the policy was personal, and could not be exercised by the creditor (at p. 81):

> [TRANSLATION] The right to exercise the surrender option accorded to the insured is personal; a creditor cannot decide to exercise this right in order to receive the cash surrender value. An insurance contract is an act which provides for future contingencies, and it would be contrary to its nature to allow creditors to divert it from its purpose by forcing surrender by the insured.

20 David Norwood, in his treatise on the law of life insurance in Canada, Norwood on Life Insurance Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1993), provides a comprehensive discussion on the protection against exigibility by an ordinary judgment creditor that the courts in Quebec and the rest of Canada have accorded to the right to surrender an in-force life insurance policy. I find it useful for our purposes to quote from his text (at pp. 246-48) at some length:

> The contest of execution by a creditor of the insured is most commonly exemplified by the attempt by the creditor to force the surrender of an in-force life insurance policy to meet the debt owed by the insured. The [Uniform Life Insurance] Act and the [Civil] Code expressly protect certain beneficiaries, but the issue of exigibility is best tested where there is no beneficiary in place, so that no statutory exemptions from execution or seizure cloud the picture.
> As will be discussed in detail, the in-force life insurance product is simply not exigible at law by a judgment creditor to the point that it may be forced into surrender, even when the eventual policy benefit is in favour of the insured or the insured's estate, and a beneficiary has not been designated.
> [S]urrender of a life insurance policy is cancellation of the contract and its insurance benefits. Surrender releases the insurer of its future obligation to pay insurance benefits upon the happening of the event insured against. The insurer may pay a cash surrender value for this release, but forcing surrender would destroy the basic purpose of the contract.
> Cancellation of the life insurance contract by a creditor would bring about irretrievable consequences, since the insured cannot buy back or restore the life insurance contract, which one could accomplish in almost every other form of personal property siezed [sic] by a creditor. In other words, a debtor whose property is seized may replace it at a later stage by buying it back or buying other property of equal value. This is not so, in the case of an in-force life insurance policy, for the reasons that (i) the life insured may no longer be insurable and (ii) even if the life insured is insurable, the individual cannot be insured at the original premium price because the life insurance premium is geared to age.
> In Quebec, civil law protects the insured from execution by a creditor against an in-force policy upon the basis that surrender is a personal right not available to the insured's creditors [art. 1031 of the Civil Code]. It is submitted that this has the same basis in logic as applies in the common law provinces. The Quebec courts have loudly pronounced the basic legal position that to permit a creditor to execute against the policy would cause an irrevocable loss contrary to the shelter inherent to the nature of life insurance. . . .
> Certainly, in the common law provinces as well as in Quebec, no court has allowed an ordinary judgment creditor to force the surrender of an in-force life insurance policy, even when no beneficiary is in the picture. [Emphasis in original.]

21 The respondent seeks to import this protective logic into the bankruptcy context by one of two ways. The first method involves invoking a principle that I acknowledged in Royal Bank, supra, at para. 16: "creditors should not gain on bankruptcy any greater access to their debtors' assets than they possessed prior to bankruptcy". The second method involves using bankruptcy case law in which courts have decided that certain rights of the bankrupt will not vest in the trustee on account of their "personal" nature. See e.g. Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701, at para. 38; Re Holley (1986), 59 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 35. In effect, we have been asked to find that the "personal rights" immunity co-exists at all times with, and should apply in addition to, the statutory exemptions for rights under specific life insurance contracts provided in arts. 2552 and 2554.

22 The appellant trustee pointed this Court to authority that has consistently upheld a bankruptcy trustee's power to seize and exercise the bankrupt's right to surrender a life insurance policy. In the case In re Max Mendelson (1940), 21 C.B.R. 304, the bankrupt had a life insurance policy on his own life, and had designated his brother beneficiary. The bankrupt died. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick held that the trustee in bankruptcy could not take the life insurance proceeds, but only because the trustee had not changed the beneficiary before the bankrupt's death. Before his death, the court held, the trustee had all the powers of the bankrupt policyholder, and could have surrendered the policy for its cash value.

23 In Crown Life Insurance Co. v. Perras, [1953] B.R. 659, the Quebec Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from a decision granting the trustee the power to surrender a life insurance policy, but only because the insured had acquiesced in the trustee's surrender. Barclay J.A., for the majority, dismissed the appeal because the bankrupt himself failed to appear, and the insurance company who did appear was held to have no standing. In Fortier v. Nault, [1954] C.S. 131, the Superior Court addressed the merits of the issue, and concluded (against some of the obiter dicta of the judges in Crown Life, supra) that the trustee does indeed have the power to surrender the bankrupt's policy. Ste-Marie J. cited s. 39(d) of the Bankruptcy Act (now s. 67(1)(d)), which gives the trustee broad powers over the debtor's property, and concluded that its scope extended beyond the limits on creditors' rights that had been held to exist under art. 1031 of the Civil Code. We were also referred to Re de Grandpré (1969), 15 C.B.R. (N.S.) 262 (Que. Sup. Ct.); Re Comptois (1981), 40 C.B.R. (N.S.) 118 (Que. Sup. Ct.); and Aubry (Syndic de), reflex, [1988] R.J.Q. 2211 (Sup. Ct.). In this review of the jurisprudence, it is also worth noting that in Lauwers v. Tardiff, supra, in which the surrender right was held to be "personal" and unavailable to an ordinary judgment creditor, Mayrand J. recognized that a different conclusion had been reached in the bankruptcy context, where a trustee's power had been held to include the exercise of the right (citing Fortier, supra).

24 The appellant also cited several learned authors who support the position that the trustee is vested with the power to exercise the surrender option under a life insurance contract. Didier Lluelles, in Droit des assurances — aspects contractuels (2nd ed. 1986), at p. 293, writes:

> [TRANSLATION] With respect to the trustee in bankruptcy, however, since the trustee is vested with the powers of the bankrupt in or over his or her property (Bankruptcy Act, R.C.S., 1970, c. B-3, s. 47(d)), the trustee may exercise the surrender option if there is no irrevocable beneficiary (C.c. 2554 and Bankruptcy Act, s. 47(b)) or no revocable beneficiary protected by article 2552 C.c. (Bankruptcy Act, s. 47(b)).

See also J.-G. Bergeron, Les contrats d'assurance (terrestre) (1992), vol. 2, at p. 474; S. Hardy-Lemieux, L'assurance de personnes au Québec (1989), at pp. 8,152 and 8,155. In his treatise at pp. 253-54, Norwood also devotes some attention to the trustee's, as opposed to an ordinary creditor's, position vis-à-vis the rights under the debtor's life insurance policy:

> Where the insured not only fails to meet a creditors's [sic] claim but goes bankrupt, federal law under the Bankruptcy Act meets up with provincial insurance common law and statutory law. In essence, the Bankruptcy Act prevails except where it expressly defers to provincial exemptions. . . . [T]he Bankruptcy Act honours the Uniform Act and the Civil Code when they exempt life insurance proceeds in the hands of a beneficiary since the proceeds fall outside of the estate of the insured, and exempt the in-force life insurance policy itself when a family beneficiary or an irrevocable beneficiary or a beneficiary for value is in place.
> Otherwise, the trustee in bankruptcy (unlike the ordinary judgment creditor) "steps into the shoes" of the insured, and may, accordingly, surrender the policy where it is payable to the estate of the insured or to a non-family beneficiary in circumstances where the insured himself could do so. [Emphasis in original.]

C. Articles 2552 and 2554 of the Civil Code

25 Reviewing these various arguments, I have decided that the most coherent way to approach this appeal is to decide first whether the exemption provisions of the Civil Code governing life insurance contracts, introduced in 1974 as part of a sweeping revision of insurance law in Quebec, were meant by the legislature to be exhaustive. To the extent that the legislature did so intend, arts. 2552 and 2554 displace and supersede, for the purposes of this appeal, the jurisprudence regarding the exigibility of the surrender value of life insurance contracts under art. 1031. Because I conclude that the legislature did so intend, this Court need not decide in this case whether the right to surrender a life insurance policy is a "personal right". Articles 2552 and 2554 of the Civil Code make irrelevant in the life insurance context any other basis for exemption which may have existed, and which might still exist for other purposes, under the general law of Quebec or the Bankruptcy Act.

26 In undertaking my analysis, I have considered Baudouin J.A.'s warning (at p. 9) against confusing the unseizability of an asset with the inherent nature of a right:

> [TRANSLATION] The concept of seizability of property or an asset must not be confused with the nature of the right. In order for a right to be seizable by creditors, it must necessarily be patrimonial in nature. Thus, the legislator may exempt an asset from seizure by the creditors, as it did, for example, in articles 2552 C.C. and 2457 C.C.Q., since the debtor's patrimony is the "common pledge" of his or her creditors (art. 2644 C.C.Q.). It appears to me to be another matter to be determined that, as is the case here, despite its unquestionable economic value, the right itself cannot be exercised by anyone other than the bankrupt. In such a case, unseizability has no importance whatsoever nor any legal relevance because it is not the monetary value which is unavailable to the third party, but the very exercise of the right that could lead to the recovery of that value.

In my view, however, it is open to the legislature to enact an exhaustive set of rules governing seizability in a particular area. Where that is the case, the express rules themselves, and only those rules, govern seizability. The court applies those rules to the exclusion of other considerations not because it has confused seizability as provided by those rules with the inherent nature of the rights at issue, but because the legislature's express and exhaustive rules supersede considerations that would cut across and undo the legislated divisions.

27 In this case, the legislature's intention of creating a comprehensive and exhaustive "unseizability code" for life insurance contracts is derived from the language of arts. 2552 and 2554, considered in their proper context. The analysis proceeds in two steps. I first consider the legislative history of the provisions, and in particular the fact that the articles were introduced into the Civil Code as part of the comprehensive insurance-law revision that took place in Quebec in the early 1970s. With this background, I then focus in on the interpretation of arts. 2552 and 2554 themselves, in the context of the Civil Code as a whole.

1. Legislative History

28 Articles 2552 and 2554 were introduced into the Civil Code as part of a comprehensive revision of insurance law in Quebec initiated in 1974 by Bill 7, which was adopted as the Insurance Act (proclaimed in force in 1976). This statute modernized the insurance law of Quebec and, of particular relevance to this appeal, significantly expanded the scope and detail of life insurance regulation in the Civil Code.

29 Before the adoption of the Insurance Act, there was no comprehensive body of rules regulating life insurance in Quebec. When Bill 7 was introduced in the National Assembly, there were 10 articles governing life insurance in the Civil Code, and a special statute governing life insurance in a narrowly circumscribed area of family relations, the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 296.

30 When Quebec's civil law was codified in 1866, marine insurance was the most important branch of insurance law, and its rules the most elaborated. Life insurance contracts were at that time looked upon with disfavour in the civil law, having been expressly prohibited in France until the mid-19th century. See É. Couteau, Traité des assurances sur la vie (1881), vol. 1, especially paras. 43-52. They were regulated in the Civil Code by a mere nine articles (arts. 2585-2593). A tenth (art. 2593*a*), relating to presumptions of death in relation to absentee insured, was added in 1933. None of these provisions exempted any class of life insurance from seizure.

31 The first life insurance legislation applicable in Quebec pre-dated Confederation. This was the Act to secure to Wives and Children the benefit of Assurances on the lives of their Husbands and Parents, S. Prov. C. 1865, 29 Vict., c. 17. This Act allowed a husband to insure his life for the benefit of his wife (and children), derogating from the prohibition against inter vivos gifts between spouses contained in art. 1265 of the Civil Code. The legislation was completely revised in 1878, by S.Q. 1878, 41-42 Vict., c. 13, which among other things introduced a policy of protecting family beneficiaries. The benefit of the life insurance policy could only be revoked in favour of another family beneficiary (s. 12), and the policy was "exempt from attachment for debts due either by the insured or by the persons benefited" (s. 26). In 1925, the Act became known as the Husbands' and Parents' Life Insurance Act, R.S.Q. 1925, c. 244. A discussion of the various permutations of this Act in the latter part of the 19th century, and a commentary on its policy of protecting the family, is provided in Rinfret J.'s decision in Banque Canadienne Nationale v. Carette, 1930 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1931] S.C.R. 33, at pp. 42-44.

32 Already in the 1930s, there was discontent with the state of insurance law in Quebec. In the introduction to his Report on the Codification of Quebec Life Insurance Law (1936), at pp. 1, 2 and 8-9, M. Versailles summed up the situation:

> The chief end and purpose of this report is to determine how the lacunae of Quebec Life Insurance law can be remedied by means of a codification of the principles and rules of law governing this particular subject.
> The Civil Code of Lower Canada, which was promulgated on August 1, 1866, contains but nine articles dealing exclusively with the subject of life insurance.

The Codifiers, at page 258 of their Seventh Report, say: "It is remarkable how few legal points relating to this contract have been litigated or settled by judicial authority. The reported cases are not numerous and they seem to have arisen oftener upon questions of fact than of law. The chapter consists of nine articles which have been derived chiefly from the few decisions alluded to, and some of them are taken from the Draft of a civil code for New York."

This clearly shows the paucity of authorities on this subject when the Civil Code was enacted, and the juridical inadequacy of these few rules to cover the modern technical development of the life insurance contract.

In 1865, the Parliament of Canada passed an Act (29 Vict., ch. 17) entitled: "An act to secure to wives and children the benefit of assurance on the lives of their husbands and parents." This Act was evidently copied from some American statute. It is very superficial in character, containing but six sections or articles.

At present, in Quebec, we are in the anomalous position of having what I might call two different sets of rules governing the rights of beneficiaries under life insurance contracts.

If the beneficiary is the wife or child of the assured, the rights of such beneficiaries are governed by an Act passed in 1878. . . .

If the beneficiary is anyone but the wife or child of the assured, the rights of such beneficiaries are governed by the principles underlying Article 1029 CC. . . . [Emphasis added.]

Versailles recommended the repeal of the Husbands' and Parents' Life Insurance Act and of the then nine articles of the Civil Code that related to life insurance, and he suggested the adoption, with appropriate modifications, of a French code on the subject of life insurance law.

33 By the 1960s, a consensus had emerged in favour of a complete reordering of insurance law as treated by the Civil Code. See J. E. C. Brierley and R. A. Macdonald, eds., Quebec Civil Law — An Introduction to Quebec Private Law (1993), at para. 812; see also L. Plamondon, "Life Insurance in Quebec Since 1976: Some Points of Interest", in Meredith Memorial Lectures 1978, The New Quebec Insurance Act (1979), 69, at p. 69. As early as 1959, a draft law to replace the title on insurance of the Civil Code had been proposed. See Québec, Ministère des Institutions financières, Compagnies et Coopératives, Service des assurances, Rapport Faribault (1957-60).

34 In 1974, the legislature finally reacted to these calls for reform, and adopted the Insurance Act. The wide-ranging criticism of the pre-existing state of insurance law is a compelling factor militating in favour of a finding that the legislature intended its revision of the law to be comprehensive. Such a conclusion is bolstered by the scope and detail of the reform apparent from the enactment itself. The Insurance Act replaced entirely the title on insurance of the Civil Code and re-organized completely the regulation of insurance contracts, including life insurance contracts. Some 100 new articles were added to the Civil Code. Articles 2468-2500 constituted a general introductory chapter on insurance. Reversing the priorities of the Code of 1866, provisions governing insurance of persons, including life insurance, received prominent treatment as the next chapter of the title on insurance (arts. 2501-2561). The Insurance Act also revised the regulation of property, fire and liability insurance (arts. 2562-2605), and to a lesser extent, because of its highly developed and detailed nature in the original Code of 1866, the provisions regulating marine insurance (arts. 2606-2692). In addition to introducing these amendments to the Civil Code in a first part, the Insurance Act also contained, in a second part, over 400 provisions that modernized and codified the administration and regulation of insurance companies as business entities (now R.S.Q., c. A-32).

35 With the necessary caution required in using this material (see Construction Gilles Paquette ltée v. Entreprises Végo ltée, 1997 CanLII 352 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 299, at para. 20; P.-A. Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (2nd ed. 1991), at pp. 364-67), I also draw attention to the legislative debates surrounding the adoption of Bill 7. These are of assistance in establishing the historical context within which the Insurance Act was passed, and show that the hypothesis of a legislative intention to enact a complete code on insurance law is not fanciful or far-fetched. On its second reading in the National Assembly, the Minister of Financial Institutions, Companies and Cooperatives, who sponsored the Bill, spoke generally about the proposed law:

[TRANSLATION] Bill 7 replaces the Insurance Act, the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act, the Diocesan Mutual Insurance Companies Act, the title on insurance in the Civil Code and the Claims Adjusters Act. It partially amends the provisions of the Civil Code with respect to marine insurance.

Mr. Speaker, the first part of the bill concerns the insurance contract. It deals with all of its aspects.

The contractual part of the current bill is based on the work of Marcel Faribault and the Honourable Judge Gérard Trudel, the law of Ontario, French insurance law, the work of the Civil Code Revision Office, submissions by various associations and works from a variety of other sources. 1. Marcel Léger, Member of National Assembly for Lafontaine, contributed the following: [TRANSLATION] "If it is hardly an exaggeration to speak of a code one book of which will be in our statutes and the other in the Civil Code, it is no exaggeration either to speak of a modern code." (Id., at p. 2875.)

36 The Insurance Act was therefore quite clearly intended to be a codification of insurance law in Quebec, in the sense given to the word by Côté in his text The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, supra, at p. 43:

> Applied to an entire statute, "codification" indicates the incorporation in a single enactment of a series of legal rules relating to a given subject. Codifiers may draw on both existing statutes and the rules of the common law. The result is deemed to give a coherent and sometimes exhaustive picture of the law in a specific field. The Bills of Exchange Act [R.S.C. 1985, c. B-4], the Criminal Code [R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46], and the Quebec Labour Code [R.S.Q., c. C-27] are examples. [Emphasis added.]

In other words, the legislature turned its mind to every aspect of insurance law, and where the Civil Code's general provisions were not adequate, crafted new provisions, all contained in the expanded title on insurance, to set out its new vision of the law.

37 The Insurance Act created an insurance code within the Civil Code. Each new provision, following the cardinal principle of interpretation of the Code, must also be read in the context of the Civil Code as a whole. See F. P. Walton, The Scope and Interpretation of the Civil Code of Lower Canada (1980), at p. 100; Brierley and Macdonald, supra, at para. 113. With this in mind, I now turn to consider the interpretation of arts. 2552 and 2554.

2. Articles 2552 and 2554

38 Articles 2552 and 2554 exempt from seizure the rights under only two classes of life insurance contracts, those with "privileged" or family beneficiaries and those with irrevocable beneficiary designations:

> 2552. When the beneficiary of the insurance is the consort, descendant or ascendant of the policyholder or of the participant, the rights under the contract are exempt from seizure as long as the beneficiary has not received the sum insured.
> 2554. The stipulation of irrevocable designation binds the owner even if the beneficiary has no knowledge of it.
> As long as the designation of a beneficiary as irrevocable subsists, the rights of the policyholder, the participant and the beneficiary are unseizable.

Given these provisions, should the rights under other types of life insurance contracts not declared exempt from seizure, such as the respondent's, also be exempt from seizure? In particular, should the right to surrender a policy be exempt from seizure under all life insurance contracts, whatever the particular relationships between policyholder, life insured and beneficiary therein? In my view, the provisions, considered as part of the Insurance Act reforms and within the context of the Civil Code as a whole, manifest a contrary legislative intention.

39 In undertaking its comprehensive reform of life insurance law, and determining what to exempt from seizure in arts. 2552 and 2554, the legislature must have had all elements of the life insurance contract in mind, including the right to surrender the contract for its cash surrender value. For a creditor, the most valuable right in his debtor's in-force life insurance policy is the right to surrender the policy for its cash surrender value. In this case, for example, that value amounted to $84,900. Indeed, it is the only right in an in-force life insurance policy that has the potential to create an immediate realization of value for the seizing creditor. At p. 251 of his treatise on life insurance law in Canada, Norwood discusses what other rights are available to a creditor if he cannot exercise the right to surrender the policy:

> The courts may make an order in favour of the creditor or appoint an equitable receiver to take any payment demanded by the insured from the insurer for the insured as and when the payment falls in, and this binds the insurer to turn over the payment which would otherwise flow into the hands of the debtor insured. In other words, if the insured later surrenders the policy or seeks the benefits of the policy, for example, in the form of eventually collecting annuity instalments, these proceeds have to flow to the creditor. [Bold in original; underlining added.]

In other words, if the exemption of "rights" in arts. 2552 and 2554 was not meant to protect the right to surrender the policy, the only remaining purpose of the articles would be to protect the debtor against a creditor who attaches the policy, and waits until the insured volunteers to surrender it or until some other payment eventually comes due. In my view, this would be an unreasonably restrictive reading of the provisions.

40 The legislature did not in any way restrict or qualify the use of the word "rights" in arts. 2552 and 2554. Moreover, art. 2501, in the same chapter of the Code, gives us important evidence of what "rights" the legislature had in mind in drafting the exemption provisions:

> 2501. In addition to the particulars prescribed in article 2480, the policy of insurance of persons must, where such is the case, indicate:

Digitized by Google

(e) the right of the owner to the surrender value or to advances on the policy; [Emphasis added.]

It is clear, therefore, that the legislature intended the provisions to protect from seizure all rights under those contracts that qualify, especially the right to surrender. At the same time, the legislature specifically stipulated that these rights were exempt from seizure only under the two described classes of policies. The natural conclusion, a contrario, is that the rights under all other policies, including the right to surrender for a cash surrender value, are seizable.

41 Any alternative interpretation of these articles empties them of much of their meaning. The respondent submits that arts. 2552 and 2554 simply supplement an underlying rule of unseizability for the right to surrender that exists for all policies under the general law, derived from art. 1031 of the Civil Code. If that were the case, however, the legislature's enactment of arts. 2552 and 2554 would in large part be redundant, given that the right to surrender, as we have seen, is the principal component of the life insurance contract that is being protected by these provisions. I prefer an interpretation which accords with the principle that the legislature does not speak for nothing. The legislature chose to protect two particular classes of policies from seizure because it perceived a significant threat to these, namely the threat that creditors, to whom the right to surrender a life insurance policy was otherwise generally available, could terminate a policy by exercising the right.

42 This interpretation is also suggested by the particularity of the language with which the legislature chose to express itself in arts. 2552 and 2554. Compared to art. 1031 for example, which is a general expression of the oblique action, arts. 2552 and 2554 are detailed and technical rules governing a particular feature of life insurance law. Article 1031 does not deal specifically with life insurance. Articles 2552 and 2554, on the other hand, describe in considerable detail the life insurance policies whose rights are exempt from seizure, and thereby set out, by necessary implication, those whose rights are not. This is an appropriate case in which to apply the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant and to give precedence to the particular rules of arts. 2552 and 2554 introduced by the Insurance Act. See Lalonde v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, 1992 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 261, at pp. 278-79. The legislature's decision to express itself in such detailed and specific language indicates an intention not to have the rules contained therein undermined by the application of more general provisions.

43 This textual analysis alone, however, is not determinative of the issue. Ultimately, whether to read the unseizability provisions as a code unto themselves, and as impliedly excluding other bases of exemption from seizure, depends on the coherence of the framework they would provide as such a code. In my view, the exhaustiveness of arts. 2552 and 2554 is supported by the larger themes running through the insurance law reform of the 1970s.

44 As is apparent from the legislative debates, the Insurance Act reforms were part of the larger movement to revise the Civil Code. Indeed, one of the sources for the Insurance Act was work done within the Civil Code Revision Office. See Journal des débats, supra, at p. 2873; Brierley and Macdonald, supra, at paras. 72-73, 75. It is therefore not surprising that the new insurance contract provisions, brought in by the Insurance Act, are rooted in the very themes championed by the revision of the Civil Code. These include consumer protection, the protection of the family unit, and the modernization of real security mechanisms over moveable property, giving a broader segment of society access to collateralized credit. See Civil Code Revision Office, Report on the Québec Civil Code (1978), vol. 1, at pp. xxix-xxxiii.

45 Consumer protection, while an overriding concern of the legislature in the reform of the insurance contract provisions of the Civil Code generally, plays no meaningful role in the interpretation of arts. 2552 and 2554. The legislative debates surrounding the adoption of the Insurance Act, on numerous occasions, attest to a concern for consumer protection, as does art. 2500, which makes many of the provisions governing life insurance contracts of public order, and others a minimum standard of conduct from which the parties to the insurance contract can derogate only "to the extent that it is more favourable to the policyholder or to the beneficiary". The exemption provisions, however, have little to do with consumer protection, since they involve not the relationship between the policyholder and the insurance company, but rather the relationship between the policyholder and his or her creditors.

46 Of greater significance for evaluating the coherence of the exemptions set out in arts. 2552 and 2554 are the competing considerations of family protection and financial flexibility and innovation. The exemption provisions are a manifestation of the legislature's desire to strike an appropriate balance between these policies.

47 Article 2552 continues the important policy of exempting from seizure the rights under life insurance contracts involving certain family relationships. This policy first appeared in Quebec in 1865, in the original version of the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act which prohibited seizure by creditors of the insurance money due to beneficiaries at the maturation of the policy. Nothing was said in the legislation about seizure pre-maturity. In Carette, supra, however, Rinfret J. ruled that creditors could not terminate or seize an in-force policy under the Act, since that would harm the rights of the family beneficiaries. After several minor amendments in 1869-70, the legislature in 1878 consolidated the law to secure to wives and children the benefit of life insurance. The earlier acts were repealed, and replaced by a lengthier statute of 29 articles (S.Q. 1878, 41-42 Vict., c. 13). Section 12 thereof introduced the notion of limited revocability: the benefit of the insurance policy to a family beneficiary could only be revoked in favour of another permitted beneficiary. Section 26 introduced broad protection for these insurance policies from creditors: it provided that the policies "shall be exempt from attachment for debts due either by the insured or by the persons benefited, and shall be unassignable by either of such parties". Such exemption did not apply, however, to any policy whose benefit reverted to and was held by the insured. The Act was amended several times thereafter, with no consequence to the exemption provision (except that it became s. 30, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 296). In Carette, supra, at p. 42, Rinfret J. noted that the policy of this special law, through its various permutations, was the protection of family beneficiaries. I underlined the importance of this policy in the bankruptcy context, in Royal Bank, supra, at par. 17, in that case implemented through s. 158(2) of the Saskatchewan Insurance Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. S-26:

> [T]he policy of exempting life insurance investments and policies from execution or seizure under the [Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act], where family members are designated as beneficiaries, is sound. Given the importance of insurance in providing for the welfare of dependents upon the death of the insured, an insurance policy may be characterized as a necessity.

48 Articles 2552 and 2554 in one sense broadened the protection of family in the life insurance context. Article 2552 broadened the class of relationships attracting protection from seizure for insurance contracts from wives and children under the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act to consorts, descendants and ascendants. Moreover, to the extent that the policyholder now wanted to protect a beneficiary that fell outside of the traditional family unit, art. 2554 now allowed him or her to do so by simply designating that person as an irrevocable beneficiary.

49 The Insurance Act revisions also weakened the protection of family in the insurance context. For example, while the designation of a family beneficiary was essentially irrevocable under s. 12 of the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act, under art. 2547 of the Civil Code, introduced by the Insurance Act, only the designation of a spouse is presumed irrevocable, and the policyholder can defeat the presumption by contrary stipulation. In Lalonde, supra, at p. 277, I noted that "art. 2547 . . . reflects an intention on the part of the legislature to make protection of the family property less strict".

50 In my view, arts. 2552 and 2554 demonstrate a careful balancing of the relevant considerations. Protection was accorded, but carefully circumscribed, to certain family beneficiaries, and to irrevocable beneficiaries. Underpinning these limits on protection of the family in arts. 2552 and 2554 was the legislature's desire to maximize the financial utility of insurance policies in the hands of their owners, illustrative of another broad policy pursued by the legislature in the revision of the Civil Code, namely the creation of a legal context within which individuals would better be able to use their moveable assets to secure credit.

51 This policy is evident in the new Civil Code of Quebec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64, which contains a general regime of hypothecs on moveable property (arts. 2696-2714 C.C.Q.). It is also evident in the insurance provisions introduced by the Insurance Act in 1974. As a result of the insurance reforms, a policyholder can now assign and pledge his or her rights under an insurance contract, even where the beneficiary has been designated irrevocably (arts. 2556-2558 C.C.L.C.; now arts. 2460-2462 C.C.Q.). Moreover, the assignment of insurance entails the revocation of the revocable designation of the beneficiary (art. 2558 C.C.L.C.; now art. 2462 C.C.Q.). See L. Plamondon, "Des bénéficiaires et des propriétaires subrogés en assurance sur la vie", in Meredith Memorial Lectures 1978, The New Quebec Insurance Act, supra, 115, at pp. 134-36. This is a significant change from the pre-existing law. Under the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act, s. 30, assignment of a family life insurance policy required agreement between the insured and the beneficiaries.

52 Against this background, it defies common sense to assume that the legislator wished to remain silent, in its exemption provisions, on the most important value of a life insurance policy for creditors – the cash surrender value. On the contrary, given the legislator's policy of making rights under insurance contracts more available to creditors as part of the policyholder's collateral, the most reasonable conclusion is that the cash surrender value of the insurance contract was exactly what the legislature had in mind when determining, in arts. 2552 and 2554, which policies should be exempt, and which should not be. The legislature, in carrying out its reform, would most certainly have wanted to address the very feature of the pre-existing law that hindered its policy, namely the tendency of the law to protect the cash surrender value from creditors. Why would a creditor want a policy as collateral if he could not exercise its principal value? It makes much more sense to conclude that the legislator wanted this value to be available to creditors, unless the policies themselves were exempt.

53 For these reasons, therefore, I conclude that the legislature intended arts. 2552 and 2554 to be a comprehensive and exclusive set of rules governing the seizability of rights under life insurance contracts.

D. Application to This Case

54 In this case, the respondent's policy fails to qualify for either exemption. For a policy to be exempt from seizure under art. 2552, the beneficiary must be the consort (or descendant/ascendant) of the policyholder. Here, the beneficiary is the consort not of the policyholder, but of the life insured (the individual whose life is insured). Nor does the respondent qualify for the exemption provided in art. 2554. She did not designate herself the irrevocable beneficiary of her own policy.

55 The respondent sought to impress upon this Court the relevance of the fact that she was the beneficiary of a policy insuring her husband's life. While she, as beneficiary, was not the consort of the policyholder, and therefore did not strictly meet the requirements of art. 2552, she was the consort of the life insured. The respondent argued that her policy was therefore of the same familial nature as those described by art. 2552 and merited similar protection from seizure.

56 This argument cannot succeed. The Quebec legislature maintained the unseizable class of family life insurance policies defined vis-à-vis the beneficiary's relationship to the policyholder, not the life insured. This is historically based in the Husbands and Parents Life Insurance Act, which defined the category of protected policies vis-à-vis the family of the policyholder, who was also always the life insured. This is noted by Norwood at pp. 249-50, who contrasts Quebec's statutory exemptions with those provided under the Uniform Life Insurance Act of the common law provinces:

> Protected family beneficiaries, under the Uniform Act encompass the spouse, child, grandchild or parent of the life insured. Family beneficiaries under the Civil Code encompass the spouse, descendant or ascendant of the insured. The distinction between the common law provinces and Quebec is historical in that the original Uniform Act statutory trust extended to all policies, so that the common denominator was the life insured, whereas Quebec's Husbands' and Parents' Life Insurance Act was applicable only to personal policies owned by the insured on the insured's own life, so that the protection rested upon the relationship between the policyholder and the beneficiary. [Emphasis in original.]

This Court cannot undo the Quebec legislature's express choices and adopt the policy of the common law provinces, only because it is convenient to do so in a particular case. This is something to be left for the consideration of the legislature itself.

E. Disposition

57 In conclusion, having regard to their language, their legislative history and their discernible policy justification, I believe that in arts. 2552 and 2554 the Quebec legislature has enacted a comprehensive and exclusive code regarding the unseizability of life insurance contracts, intended by the legislature to supersede more general rules provided elsewhere in the Civil Code or existing in the jurisprudence. This exclusive provincial code of unseizability meshes with s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy Act. Because the respondent's policy does not qualify under either of the only available exemptions, the trustee is entitled to seize the policy and exercise the surrender right to obtain its cash surrender value. The appeal is therefore allowed, the judgment of the Court of Appeal is set aside and the judgment of the Superior Court dismissing the respondent's motion is affirmed, with costs to the appellant in all courts.

Appeal allowed with costs.

In the Matter of the Bankruptcy of
Timothy Allen Piraux
And in the Matter of the Bankruptcy of Glenda Lynn Piraux

Reasons for Judgment of the
Honourable Mr. Justice S.J. LoVecchio

Introduction

[1] The Applicants Timothy Allen Piraux and Glenda Lynn Piraux are husband and wife. They made individual assignments in bankruptcy on January 31, 2003 appointing the Respondent Cameron Okolita Inc. as Trustee in Bankruptcy for each of their estates. They are both first-time bankrupts and there are no inspectors in the estates.[1]

[2] Among their assets was their residence located in northeast Calgary which they own as joint tenants. On their statement of affairs, the Applicants estimated the value of the residence at $165,000. They claimed the entire asset as exempt. Their justification for so doing is straight forward.

[3] First, they stated that approximately $130,000 was owing on a first and second mortgage, leaving them with equity of only $35,000. As this amount was below the $40,000 exemption amount prescribed in the Civil Enforcement Regulation, the property was considered to be exempt.[2]

[4] The encumbrances on the residence, in fact, totaled only approximately $128,000; but that is not the real problem. The Respondent was not satisfied with the Applicants' estimate of the value of the property and wanted it appraised. The Respondent did not specify a particular effective date for the valuation. The Applicants obtained an appraisal of their residence, which valued the property at $193,000 as at August 7, 2003.

[5] Needless to say, acceptance of this value by the Respondent and the Applicants might have created some residual value in the property for creditors as there might be $65,000 in net equity (193,000 - 128,000) being $25,000 in non-exempt equity (65,000 - 40,000). I say might because, as will be seen below, the date the property is valued (when we have a volatile real estate market) is critical to that determination.

[6] Unsatisfied with the $193,000 valuation and believing the appropriate effective date for the appraisal should have been January 31, 2003 (the date of their assignment in bankruptcy), the Applicants requested a further appraisal to value the property as at January 2003. The second appraisal valued the property at $185,000 as at January 15, 2003.

[7] This value might also have given rise to some residual value to the creditors. If the value of $185,000 were accepted, the net equity of the Applicants would be approximately $57,000, leaving $17,000 in non-exempt equity for creditors (57,000 - 40,000).

[8] In 2004, the Applicants obtained a further appraisal which valued the property at $180,000 as at January 14, 2004. This appraisal would also suggest there may be a small amount of residual value for the creditors – in this case $12,000.

[9] The Applicants suggest that the Respondent should, as a practical matter, treat the property as totally exempt even though in strict numbers there may be $25,000, $17,000 or perhaps $12,000 in equity for the creditors. Again, the justification for so doing is straight forward.

[10] The Applicants submit that, by the time real estate commissions, legal fees and any other expenses associated with a sale are paid, the excess value will be eroded such that there will be effectively no residual amount left for distribution to the creditors.

[11] The values assigned to the property in the various appraisals was not raised as an issue.

The Issue

[12] What is in issue are two divergent interpretations of the law respecting which party receives the benefit, or bears the burden, of a fluctuating marketplace in respect of limited exemption assets in a bankruptcy.

[13] To answer that question, this Court must examine at what point in time in the bankruptcy should the value be set for the bankrupts' residence. Based on the arguments made, only two possible points in time need to be discussed. They are the date of the assignment in bankruptcy or an essentially moving target, being the date the property is effectively dealt with by the Trustee.

Discussion and Analysis

[14] When an insolvent person becomes bankrupt, all of their property is vested in a trustee.[3] The trustee then administers the estate, which includes the realization and distribution of proceeds of the bankrupt's property to creditors.

[15] The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act also provides that, notwithstanding this vesting of the property of a bankrupt with a trustee, certain property of a bankrupt will not be available for division and distribution among their creditors.

[16] More specifically, Section 67(1)(b) states that "any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under any laws applicable in the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides . . ." is not available.

[17] In the case of Alberta, the applicable exemption is found in Section 88 of Civil Enforcement Act.[4] It provides in subsection (g) that "the principal residence of an enforcement debtor, including a residence that is a mobile home, up to the value prescribed by the regulations for that residence . . ." is exempt. [Emphasis added.]

[18] As already noted the amount prescribed by regulation is up to $40,000.

[19] What is important to note is that it is not the principal residence of a bankrupt that is exempt, but rather up to $40,000 of the value attributable to that property.

[20] There are several distinct phases of a bankruptcy; the first two are of import in this analysis. The first is the vesting phase triggered by the assignment. The second is the administration phase, during which a trustee determines which property will be realized and divided among creditors. It is during this second phase when exemptions and property values become important as they will ultimately dictate the source and the value of the fund from which a bankrupt's creditors will be paid.

[21] During this phase, a trustee must examine the value of the principal residence and determine whether or not the proceeds from a sale of the residence will exceed the aggregate of any amounts payable to any creditors secured by the property, the $40,000 exemption and any expenses of the sale.

[22] If it is clear the proceeds will exceed such amounts, then it is very likely a sale will occur; if it is clear they will not, then it is unlikely a sale will occur and in such a case the property would simply be returned to the bankrupt.

[23] There is a grey area in which the excess of the value over the secured creditor claims and the exemption amount approximates the projected expenses of sale. In such circumstances, I would be of the view that a trustee should simply be practical. That is, make a deal with the bankrupt, whereby the projected expenses of sale that are saved are taken into account in an equitable fashion in a return of the property to the bankrupt. There would be no prejudice to creditors, as they would be better off in that they would be receiving at least part of the amounts otherwise payable as expenses of sale, and they are the group the Trustee is trying to protect. In so saying, I am cognizant of the fact that in a negotiation between a bankrupt and a trustee, the field is not divided exactly in half.

[24] What we cannot lose sight of at this point are two things: first, the trustee is vested with the property; and second, the decision whether or not to proceed with a sale, return the property entirely to the bankrupt or negotiate with the bankrupt about a return of the property will depend upon a trustee's assessment of its potential sale value. Obviously, in a fluctuating marketplace, the point in time at which the property is valued – bankruptcy or a later point before discharge – will be of principal importance in deciding which avenue to follow.

What Date Should Control This Value?

[25] Four possible values for the property at various effective dates were part of the evidence in this case. They were:

(a) $165,000 – estimated by the bankrupts as at January 31, 2003, the date of their assignment into bankruptcy;
(b) $185,000 – an appraised value as at January 15, 2003;
(c) $193,000 – an appraised value as at August 7, 2003; and
(d) $180,000 – an appraised value as at January 14, 2004.

[26] The Applicants argue that the date at which the property should be valued is the date of bankruptcy – January 31, 2003. They submit that this approach provides a fixed point at which all of the variables will be either known or capable of estimation and will not be changing. With this certainty, the bankrupts may then bargain with the trustee for the non-exempt equity in their home, knowing the landscape will not change.

[27] The Respondent argues it is the point in time at which the property is effectively dealt with that should control the determination of its value.

[28] If I were to adopt the Applicants' submissions and value the property as at the date of bankruptcy, two of the aforementioned values might apply: $165,000 or $185,000. The $165,000 valuation was the Applicants' estimate and the $185,000 was from a third party appraiser. In the circumstances, I would select the $185,000 appraised amount as at January 15, 2003 as the best evidence of value as at the date of bankruptcy and on that basis there would be $17,000 (less any projected expenses of sale) in non-exempt equity available for creditors.

[29] Now if the bankrupt had negotiated a purchase of the non-exempt equity in the property any rise or fall in the value of the property after the date of the bankruptcy would have the economic effect of either increasing or decreasing the value to the bankrupt of the $40,000 exemption. The Applicants' counsel conceded this point in oral argument before this Court. Counsel also suggested that, by approaching the problem in this fashion, the Trustee would have no economic incentive to delay dealing with the bankrupt in a rising market such as we are experiencing in Calgary at the present time. That is true. However, in a declining market the Trustee may have no economic incentive to act as the economic consequences of delay would come out of the bankrupts exemption.

[30] On the other hand, if the Respondent's submission is correct, and the property is to be valued at the date it is effectively dealt with, then any increase or decrease in value during the administration of the bankruptcy would be reflected in the amount potentially available to the creditors as the exemption amount would remain constant. Here again, depending on which direction the market is moving there may or may not be an economic incentive to move.

[31] That being said, being a trustee is a statutory function and they are officers of the Court. As such, they must act responsibly and in an even handed fashion and I doubt speculating on the movement of real estate prices to gain a few dollars one way or the other should be a part of the job description. They should simply act expeditiously to settle the estate so the creditors may be paid and the bankrupts may get on with their lives.

[32] The Applicants have referred me to a number of authorities which they suggest support their position.

[33] In Re Prior,[5] a creditor objected to the bankrupts' discharge on the basis that the bankrupts' residence had appreciated in value during bankruptcy, and argued that a conditional order should issue requiring the bankrupts to pay the value of the increase into the estate. The Court in Re Prior determined that, in the circumstances, it was acceptable for the trustee to value the property at the date of bankruptcy in order to determine the exemptions.

[34] While at first blush this case would seem to be directly on point, it is important to note that Re Prior was a discharge application. Such applications are governed by Sections 172 and 173 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. As a result, the Court's decision in Re Prior would have turned on whether any of the facts in Section 173 were proven.

[35] The Court held that the increase in value of the residence was not large enough to diminish the integrity of the bankruptcy process and accordingly declined to take into account the increase in value between the date of bankruptcy and the date of discharge in the discharge application.[6]

[36] The Applicants also referred to the case of Re Gruber.[7] In that case, the Court dealt with a situation where the bankrupts voluntarily sold their exempt residence in the face of a foreclosure by a mortgagee. The trustee in that case sought advice and directions from the Court as to whether the proceeds of the residence were also exempt.

[37] Justice Forsyth found that the proceeds were exempt because assets that are exempt at the date of bankruptcy remain exempt, even if they are converted into otherwise non-exempt types of assets.[8] With respect, I do not think this case is helpful to the position of the Applicants; I would similarly suggest it is also not harmful. It really deals with a different issue – the notion that the Court would make an effort to preserve the substance of an exemption Parliament and the Legislature have seen fit to create is one I have little difficulty in supporting. No one is attempting to take away the exemption of the Applicants in this case.

[38] The Applicants also referred to the case of Re Firestone.[9] In that case, the Registrar held that a trustee was bound by an early disclaimer of the trustee's interest in the bankrupt's principal residence, notwithstanding a substantial increase in the property's value during the bankruptcy. Registrar Waller further opined in obiter dicta that if a principal residence is not subject to sale at the date of bankruptcy because of its value, then any increase in the value of the property during bankruptcy should accrue to the bankrupt. He acknowledged that his opinion differed from others in this Court and indeed other Registrars.

Digitized by Google

[39] Finally, the Applicants referred to the case of Re Dodyk.[10] In that case, Registrar Waller was asked to approve a settlement agreement whereby the bankrupts would purchase the non-exempt equity in their residence from the trustee. Registrar Waller found a conflict between Gazelle (a case I will discuss below) and Gruber because he had "difficulty reconciling Justice Burrows' interpretation of Gruber [in Gazelle] with Justice Forsyth's concluding paragraph" in Gruber. In view of the apparent conflict, Registrar Waller determined that the compromise between the bankrupt and the trustee was appropriate to avoid the cost of litigating the issue.[11]

[40] The Respondent relies primarily on the decision of my brother Justice Burrows in ICI Paints v. Gazelle.[12]

[41] In Gazelle, the applicant had obtained permission under Section 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act to commence a fraudulent preference action against the bankrupt relating to the transfer of the bankrupt's interest in his residence. While the trustee had determined at the date of bankruptcy that the residence would have been exempt and as a result took no interest in it, the value of the residence increased substantially during the 15 months after the assignment in bankruptcy.

[42] Justice Burrows reviewed the existing authorities. He explained in his decision that the Gruber line of authority stands for the principle that the conversion of exempt assets after bankruptcy into a non-exempt asset does not change the exemption available to the bankrupt. He noted, however, that the character of the property was not the issue – the value of the exemption was.[13] The Court ultimately held in Gazelle that the increase in value of the property during bankruptcy was non-exempt equity, which properly belonged to the trustee for the benefit of creditors.

[43] The Respondent also referred me to the case of Re Kabaachi.[14] In that case, Registrar Alberstat held that the increase in value of a principal residence beyond the $40,000 prescribed exemption belonged to the estate, not the bankrupt. He called the appreciation and the result that the property be sold "bad luck for the bankrupt."[15] As the Registrar noted, it would be unfair to hold that the creditors should go without a dividend while the bankrupt effectively would receive a windfall from the appreciation of his property. After all, it was the creditors who supported the bankrupt's lifestyle and essentially funded the acquisition of the property in the first place.[16]

[44] In my view, Justice Burrows and Registrar Alberstat have it right. The date of bankruptcy should not govern but rather the point at which the property is effectively dealt with should govern its proper valuation. This removes any market risk that might erode the economic value of the exemption and ensures the bankrupt has a certain amount with which to make a fresh start which is precisely the rationale for the exemption in the first place.

[45] This principle is not in conflict with the authorities noted such as Re Prior, Re Gruber, Re Dodyk and others.

[46] More specifically: when a principal residence vests in a trustee upon an assignment, the exemption remains unchanged during the second phase of the bankruptcy, even if the original property is converted (Re Gruber); it may be equitable to permit a bankrupt to retain the principal residence if its value is later found to exceed the exemption by a relatively insignificant amount as it were at the discharge phase (Re Prior); if a trustee has disclaimed his interest in the property based upon a determination of its value at the date of bankruptcy, the trustee should, as a matter of equity, be bound by that disclaimer even if the property increases in value (Re Firestone); and similarly, where an appropriate date for valuation is uncertain, a trustee may make a business decision to fix a value and reach a settlement with the bankrupt to achieve certainty for the creditors (Re Dodyk).

Conclusion on the Issue

[47] As I said, because the Legislature has determined that $40,000 in the value of the principal residence of the bankrupts is to remain with the bankrupts, it follows that the creditors, not the bankrupts, should effectively bear the burden of a declining market in a bankruptcy. By the same token, the creditors should receive the obvious benefit of a rising market as they have carried the risk for a declining market.

[48] The only way to preserve this result is to value the property at the date it is dealt with by the trustee. This approach strikes the necessary balance in that it preserves the statutory right of the bankrupts to a fixed sum with which to make a fresh start, while preserving the integrity of the bankruptcy system in maximizing the return for creditors.

[49] I am not insensitive to the fact that this decision will have the consequence in a rising market, such as we are currently experiencing, of requiring bankrupts possibly to purchase the non-exempt equity from their trustees when, at the date of their bankruptcies, there may not have been any such equity.

[50] I am also sensitive to the apparent inadequacy in the current housing market of a $40,000 exemption for the purpose of replacing a home and I note from an excerpt of the Holthuysen decision, quoted in Re MacKay, that the $40,000.00 exemption came into force in 1984.[17]

[51] A generation later, the $40,000 maximum might well be past its best before date. However, that is a matter for the Legislature not the Courts.

Disposition

[52] The Notice of Motion seeks a declaration as to the amount, if any, that should be properly paid by the Applicants in respect of the non-exempt equity in their residence. The evidence of whether there was a deal between the Applicants and the Respondent is in dispute. There is also conflicting evidence of value. This application is not the proper forum to weigh and determine the conflicting evidence. Therefore, I should not in this application make a final determination of the proper amount to be paid to the Respondent, if any.

[53] However, in this case a lot of water has passed under the bridge since the Applicants were discharged (with this item left for another day) and real estate values in Calgary are going out of sight. In these circumstances, using the average value of the three appraisals that were in evidence and making some adjustment for the projected expenses of sale may give something to everyone, which in this case may not be a bad result and may well avoid the cost of additional court applications for all concerned.

Costs

[54] The matter of costs was not really argued at the hearing of this matter. If the parties cannot agree as to their disposition, they may be spoken to within 30 days from the date of these reasons.

Heard on the 8th day of March, 2006.

Dated at the City of Calgary, Alberta this 5th day of June, 2006.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR MANITOBA

Debtor and Creditor—Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act (Bom.) 1934—Jurisdiction of Board of Review to entertain proposal—Party making proposal under the Act—Whether a "debtor"—Whether respondent is a "secured creditor"—Absence of privity—Grounds against proposal raised by way of certiorari—Jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals-Illegal transfer of property in order to bring it within reach of machinery of the Act—Abuse of statutory procedure—Certiorarir—Applicability to Board of Review—Board's confirmation of proposal quashed—Devisee of mortgaged land obtaining title after May, 1935—Effect of section 19 of the Act—When a debt is "incurred" in the sense of that section—Whether creditor should not have raised grounds against proposal before County Court—Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act (Dom.) 1934—Section 2 (2); section 2 (d) as amended by c. 47 of 1938; sections 5, 7, 12(5) (6) and section 19 as enacted by amending statute of 1938.

In September, 1919, one John McEwen borrowed $4,000 from the respondent and executed a mortgage upon his land in favour of the latter. He died on August 26th, 1934. His will appointed his wife, Jane, executrix and devised all his real and personal estate to her. The will was admitted to probate on August 13th, 1935. At the time of John McE.'s death, the whole of the mortgage debt was owing to the respondent, as well as a large sum for accumulated interest. The respondent, acting under the powers contained in its mortgage, leased the land to Robert J. McE. for terms from November, 1934, to November, 1936, and the widow continued to live on the farm until her death in 1940. In July, 1936, a proposal under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, was filed by the latter, in her personal capacity and not as executrix, with the Official Receiver, the only debts disclosed being the amount due to the respondent under its mortgage and a sum of $170 for taxes. Actually, Jane McE. had never assumed payment of the mortgage debt or interest, nor had she in any way obligated herself to the respondent. At the time of filing her proposal, the certificate of title to the land was held by the widow, not as owner but only as executrix. In October, 1936, she, as personal representative, purported to transfer the land to herself personally for an expressed consideration of $1, and a certificate of title was issued to her; but the estate had not yet been fully administered. Immediately upon receipt of notice of the proposal and again in November, 1936, the respondent advised the Official Receiver that it had no claim against Jane McE. and that she was not entitled to the benefit of the Act; and later, in March, 1937, the respondent's solicitors wrote to the Registrar of the Board of Review asserting lack of jurisdiction on the part of the Board. The Board of Review, in October, 1937, formulated its proposal, reducing the amount of the respondent's mortgage, and confirmed it in October, 1938. The respondent, in October, 1939, on its behalf as well as on behalf of all the creditors of the deceased, brought an action against the widow, both as executrix and in her own right, to have her required to administer the estate, to have the transfer of the land to herself as owner set aside and to have the land sold to discharge the respondent's debt. The Board's proposal was pleaded as a bar to the action, such proposal having allegedly operated to extinguish the liability of the estate. Jane McE. died in March, 1940, and probate of her will was granted to the appellants, Robert J. McE. and Edith McE. who obtained registration of the land in their names as personal representatives. On June 19th, 1940, they transferred the land to themselves in their personal capacities, and, on the same day, they both joined in a transfer to Robert J. McE. who became the registered owner. The respondent, in September, 1940, launched before the Court of Appeal for Manitoba an application for certiorari in order to bring the proposal before that Court and have it quashed. The Court of Appeal ordered the issue of the writ and later on made an order declaring the proposal to be beyond the powers of the Board of Review and directing that it be quashed.

Held, Davis J. dissenting, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal (reflex, [1941] 1 W.W.R. 129) should be affirmed.

Per the Chief Justice: Upon the admitted facts of this case, the land in question, before the transfer of it to herself in October, 1936, was not the property of Jane McE. in the sense of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Being beneficially entitled to the residue of her husband's estate, she was entitled to have the land, subject to the rights of the mortgagee, applied in payment of the debts of the estate; and as legal personal representative, it was her duty to see that this was done. As the estate was admittedly insolvent, she had no interest in the land which could lawfully be made available to satisfy her personal debts if she had any. Under such circumstances she could not properly transfer the land to herself. The purpose of such transfer was evidently prompted by the supposition that it might enable her to bring the land and the mortgage debt within reach of the machinery of the Act. With such facts before them, the Board of Review ought to have declined to act on the proposal made by Jane McE. on the ground that they were confronted by a manifest abuse of the statutory procedure; and, if the question had been raised by an application to the Court, it must inevitably have been held that by such devices the creditors of the estate could not be deprived of their rights.—Moreover, even assuming that, the title to the farm being vested in Jane McE. in virtue of the certificate of title or of the transfer to her in October, 1936, it was her property in the sense of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, and that the mortgage debt could be deemed to be her debt for the purposes of the Act, the amendments of 1938 to that Act which, it was contended, brought her into privity of contract with the mortgagee, had no application, for the reason that section 19 of that Act, added thereto by statute of 1935, c. 20, provides that the "Act shall not, without the concurrence of the creditor, apply in the case of any debt incurred after May 1, 1935": the essential condition being that the property affected by the security shall have been the property of the debtor in the sense of the amending statute, consequently, the mortgage debt in this case never became (constructively) the debt of Jane McE. until long after that date.—A "debt" (if it be a mortgage debt) cannot be "incurred" in the sense of section 19 before the property or interest on which it is charged has become the "property" of the debtor within the contemplation of section 2 (d) of the statute.

Per Rinfret, Crocket and Hudson JJ.—Under the circumstances of the case, Jane McE. was not entitled to file a proposal under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, for the reasons that she was not the owner of the land and that there was no privity of contract between her and the respondent company. She was in no way the "debtor" of the respondent within the requirements of the Act, even after the introduction of the amendment of 1938 to section 2(d). The only debt appearing in the proposal formulated by the Board of Review was the respondent's mortgage account; that was not her debt, so much so that the respondent could not have sued her for it; it was not a "debt provable in bankruptcy" against her, or against her estate in bankruptcy: the sole object of the procedure being to obtain a reduction on the debt owing to the respondent by the estate. Therefore, under the circumstances of this case, the Board of Review had no jurisdiction to deal with the respondent's mortgage debt and more particularly to reduce the rate of interest on that mortgage; and the Board could not, consistently with the provisions of the Act, deal with Jane McE.'s request, or formulate a proposal, in complete disregard of the position and interest of the respondent.—Also, the provisions of section 2 (d) of the Act, as amended by c. 47 of 1938, defining the word "creditor" did not confer any greater jurisdiction upon the Board in the present case; the object of the amended definition has apparently enlarged the class of "creditors", but did not alter the status of the "debtor".—Moreover, section 19 of the Act, above referred to, finds application in this case: "the debt incurred," referred to in that section, is necessarily a debt personally incurred by an applicant and does not concern a debt which, though at present owing by the applicant farmer towards the creditor, had been incurred by a previous debtor (who may not have been a farmer) and at a date prior to the first day of May, 1935, as it is in the present case.—Therefore the proposals formulated by the Board of Review were made without authority and jurisdiction and were invalid. It should also be held that the Court of Appeal had power to deal with the matter in controversy in this case on an application for certiorari by the respondent; that the preliminary questions raised by the respondent were of such a nature that, in an ordinary case, they would properly give rise to an inquiry on certiorari by a superior court and that, for the purposes of that inquiry, the facts bearing on the question of jurisdiction could be put before that Court by means of affidavits.

Per Davis J. dissenting—In view of all the facts and circumstances of this case, on one hand, the conduct of the respondent throughout has been such as to disentitle it to relief in certiorari proceedings and, on the other hand, allowance of the appeal would put the appellants the Board of Review, the Registrar, the executors of Mrs. Jane McE. and her son R. J. McE. to the burden of excessive and unnecessary costs of litigation.—The effect of the lodging by Mrs. Jane McE. with the Official Receiver of a composition, extension or scheme of arrangement, on July 31st, 1936, was to put the subject-matter of the proposal into the exclusive jurisdiction, subject to appeal, of the County Court of Dauphin, which was the judicial district where Mrs. McE. resided and the farm was located; such district being designated by section 5 (1) of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. And the Act moreover gave to the Board of Review a right to work out a proposal which might involve secured creditors, even in the absence of their concurrence. Although the respondent had the right at its own risk to deliberately ignore the proceedings under the Act, on the alleged grounds that Mrs. Jane McE. was not its debtor and that it was not a secured creditor, a very convenient and speedy remedy was available to the respondent when it got notice of Mrs. Jane McE.'s application with the Official Receiver, by moving at once in the County Court to have the proposal set aside upon any of the grounds alleged by the respondent in its present proceeding by way of certiorari. The county judge would have certainly entertained any such application and would have dealt with the matter at the time in a speedy and inexpensive manner; and, moreover, a statutory right to appeal from any decision so rendered would have been available to the respondent.

APPEAL, by leave of appeal granted by the Court of Appeal for Manitoba from the judgment of that Court[1], allowing a motion in certiorari proceedings to quash an order by the Board of Review for Manitoba under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, confirming a proposal thereunder.

The material facts of the case and the questions at issue are stated in the above head-note and in the judgments now reported.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—Jane McEwen's right to avail herself of the enactments of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as amended in 1938 necessarily rested upon two propositions:

first, that the farm which she as the legal personal representative of her husband had transferred to herself and for which she had procured a certificate of title to be issued to herself personally was her "property" within the meaning of sec. 2 (d) of the statute as amended in 1938; and second, that the respondent company was a "secured creditor" within the meaning of the amending enactments of 1938.

On the admitted facts it is not open to dispute that before the transfer of it to herself in October, 1936, the land was not her property in the sense of the statute. Being beneficially entitled to the residue of her husband's estate, she was of course entitled to have the land, subject to the rights of the mortgagees, applied in payment of the debts of the estate; and as legal personal representative it was her plain duty to see that this was done. As the estate was admittedly insolvent, the assets being insufficient to meet the mortgage debt, she had, of course, no interest in the land which could lawfully be made available to satisfy her personal debts if she had any. She ought to have been advised that in the circumstances she could not properly transfer the land to herself. The purpose of this transfer is plain; it was prompted by the supposition that it might enable her to bring the land and the mortgage debt within reach of the machinery of the Act. With the facts before them, the Board of Review ought to have declined to act on Mrs. McEwen's proposal (of the 31st July, 1936) on the ground that they were confronted by a manifest abuse of the statutory procedure. Had the question been raised by an application to the Court, it must inevitably have been held that by such devices the creditors of the estate could not be deprived of their rights.

This alone would be a sufficient ground for dismissing the appeal; because the Court of Appeal having held that the remedy by certiorari is properly applicable, I think with the greatest respect that we are not required, in such a palpable case of abuse of statutory procedure, to hold that their exercise of discretion is vitiated by reason of the grounds relied upon by Mr. Bergman.

This appeal, however, may be considered on the assumption that the title to the farm being vested in Mrs. McEwen in virtue of the certificate of title of the 20th October, 1936, or of the transfer to her of the 14th October, 1936, it was her property in the sense of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and that it was (from this point of view) sufficient that it should be so at the date when the Board of Review formulated their proposal, in order to give the Board jurisdiction in that behalf. Under the provisions of the amending statute of 1938 the respondent company is to be deemed by construction of law to have been at the date when the proposal was formulated by the Board of Review a secured creditor of Mrs. McEwen and the mortgage debt is deemed to be her debt, for the purposes of the Act.

As Mr. Bergman said in argument, the mortgage debt was, by force of the Act, her debt for the purposes of the Act. It would appear that the amending Statute of 1938 takes effect retrospectively at the date of the formulation of the proposal by the Board (if a proposal has been formulated) otherwise at the filing of the proposal of the debtor. But the essential condition is that the property affected by the security shall have been the property of the debtor in the sense of the amending statute; and consequently the mortgage debt in question here never became (constructively) the debt of Mrs. McEwen until long after the 1st of May, 1935.

Within the intendment of sec. 19 the debt is "incurred" when it is "incurred" by the debtor; the mortgage debt in question was "incurred" in that sense, constructively, by force of the amending Statute (the only sense in which it was ever "incurred"), when that Statute came into force in 1938, and, by relation, at a date not earlier than the date of the certificate of title of the 20th October, 1936, or than that of the transfer of October 14th, 1936.

Debts so constructively "incurred" (in virtue of the amending statute) are in my opinion within the intendment of sec. 19; and, I repeat, such a "debt" (if it be a mortgage debt) cannot be "incurred" in the sense of that section before the property or interest on which it is charged has become the "property" of the debtor within the contemplation of sec. 2 (d) of the statute. On this point, as to the application of sec. 19, I respectfully concur with Mr. Justice Trueman.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

The judgment of Rinfret, Crocket and Hudson JJ. was delivered by RINFRET J.—The facts of this case are complicated.

In September, 1919, one John McEwen, then of Dauphin, Manitoba, now deceased, borrowed four thousand dollars ($4,000) from the respondent and executed a mortgage upon his land in favour of the latter. The mortgage provided for repayment instalments of $250 on November 1st in each of the years 1921 to 1923 inclusive, and of the balance on November 1st, 1924, with interest at seven per cent per annum, payable annually.

John McEwen died on August 26th, 1934. Probate of his will was granted to his widow, Jane McEwen, on August 13th, 1935. By the will, the deceased after directing payment of his debts, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his widow.

At the time of John McEwen's death, the whole of the mortgage debt was owing to the respondent, as well as a large sum for accumulated interest thereon.

The respondent, acting under the powers contained in its mortgage, leased the land to Robert James McEwen for a term from November 7th, 1934, to November 1st, 1935, and for a further term from February 3rd to November 1st, 1936.

On or about July 31st, 1936, Jane McEwen, in her personal capacity, and not as executrix, filed with the Official Receiver of the Dauphin Judicial District a proposal purporting to be made under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934. The only debts disclosed by the proposal were the amount owing to the respondent under its mortgage, there placed at $6,000, and the further sum of $170 payable to the Rural Municipality of Dauphin in respect of taxes.

Actually, Jane McEwen had never assumed payment of the mortgage debt or interest, nor had she in any way obligated herself to the respondent.

At the time of filing her proposal, Jane McEwen was not the owner of the land, although afterwards, on October 20th, 1936, she, as personal representative, purported to transfer the land to herself in her personal capacity for an expressed consideration of $1.

By the proposal, Jane McEwen asked that the respondent's debt be reduced to $2,500, with interest at 6 per cent. spread over a period of fifteen years, and that other accounts be not affected. Outside of the sum due to the municipality of Dauphin for taxes, Jane McEwen apparently was not indebted to any person whomsoever.

By the proposal, she valued the land at $2,500. When applying for probate, she had valued it at $3,000. Afterwards, on August 17th, 1937, she insured the buildings for $4,050.

Immediately upon receipt of notice of the proposal, the respondent advised the Official Receiver that it had no claim against Jane McEwen and that it was not affected by the proposal. On November 28th, 1936, the respondent again wrote the Official Receiver that Jane McEwen was not a debtor and not entitled to the benefit of the Act.

Later, on March 29th, 1937, the respondent's solicitors wrote to the Registrar of the Board of Review, setting forth fully the objections of the respondent and asserting lack of jurisdiction on the part of the Board.

The Board heard the application on March 31st, 1937, and, on October 29th, 1937, purported to formulate a proposal. The respondent's mortgage account was the only obligation attempted to be dealt with. The proposal states that the amount of that debt as of November 1st, 1936, stood at $6,336.65. At the date of the proposal, another year's interest had accrued, so that the actual amount owing at that time would be $6,678.15.

The Board proceeded to direct a reduction to $2,800, with future interest at 6 per cent. The respondent dissented, as appears from a letter from its solicitors to the Registrar, dated November 9th, 1937.

The Board gave no effect to the various protests and objections of the respondent and confirmed the proposal on October 5th, 1938.

The respondent further, on several occasions, advised both Jane McEwen and Robert James McEwen, as well as Mr. A. T. Warnock, the Official Receiver, who was also apparently acting as their solicitor, that it would not be bound by or recognize the proposal. The respondent's attitude was definite and consistent throughout.

On October 10th, 1939, the respondent commenced an administration action in the Court of King's Bench against Jane McEwen, both as executrix of her husband's estate and also in her personal capacity. The action was brought on behalf of the respondent itself, as well as on behalf of all the creditors of the deceased. By its statement of claim, the respondent took the position that the debt of the deceased to the respondent was unaffected by the proposal, that the full amount was still owing and that the conveyance of the land to Jane McEwen as a devisee before satisfying the debts of the deceased constituted a breach of her duties as executrix. The respondent asked that the estate be administered, the conveyance set aside and the land sold to discharge the respondent's debt.

The statement of defence delivered by Jane McEwen as executrix urged that the proposal had operated to extinguish the liability of the estate. The respondent, by its reply, after setting up that the estate was not a party to the proceedings before the Board of Review, contended that the Board was without authority to deal with the matter.

It is stated that, at the request of defendant's solicitor, made because of the illness of his client, the litigation was not pressed for the time being.

Jane McEwen died on March 27th, 1940; and, on May 9th, 1940, probate of her will was granted to the appellants, Robert James McEwen and Isabella Edith McEwen. On April 28th, 1940, the respondent's solicitors wrote the solicitor for the appellant estate asking to be advised of the issue of the grant of probate. The necessary information was given by a letter dated June 29th, 1940.

It then appeared that, following the grant of probate of the will of Jane McEwen, the appellants Robert James McEwen and Isabella Edith McEwen had obtained registration of the land in their names, as personal representatives.

On June 19th, 1940, they transferred the land to themselves in their personal capacities; and, on the same day, they both joined in a transfer to Robert James McEwen, who became the registered owner. The respondent then felt compelled to take some step to have the proposal made by the Board of Review declared to be of no effect. For that purpose, on September 17th, 1940, the respondent issued a notice of motion to be made to the Court of Appeal for Manitoba, in order that the proposal be brought before that Court by way of a writ of certiorari, and so that an application to have it quashed might be proceeded with.

The Court of Appeal ordered the issue of the writ, to which a return was made by the appellants, the Chief Commissioner, the Commissioners and the Registrar of the Board of Review for the province of Manitoba.

Following the return, an order declaring the proposal to be beyond the powers of the Board, and directing that it be quashed, was made by the Court of Appeal. That order is now appealed from, leave to appeal having been granted by the Court of Appeal of Manitoba.

Before this Court, the appellant Board of Review and the appellants Robert James McEwen and Isabella Edith McEwen appeared separately; but their grounds of appeal are substantially the same. They contend that the court a quo should have refused the motion for a writ of certiorari because it had no power to deal with such a matter under the Act and the rules as well as under the procedure set up by the King's Bench Act; that the proposal returned into court pursuant to the writ of certiorari constituted the only and entire record before the court on the motion to quash and it was not open to the court to go behind the return and to consider extraneous material; that the majority of the court, in effect, dealt with the case as if it were an appeal from the decision of the Board of Review and failed to keep within the limits of its jurisdiction on certiorari; that the application for certiorari was, in any event, barred by delay, prejudice and estoppel; that the court erred in holding that Jane McEwen did not properly administer the estate and, therefore, improperly conveyed title to herself, or in holding that, at the date of the filing of the proposal (July 31st, 1936), she was not the owner of the land; and finally that there was error in the holding of the court that the proposal of the Board of Review was a nullity, owing to absence of privity of contract between Jane McEwen and the company, as a consequence of the wrong interpretation of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as amended in 1938.

The grounds of appeal may, in reality, be grouped under two heads:

(1) The Court of Appeal erred in deciding that Jane McEwen was not entitled to file a proposal under the Act, because she was not the owner of the land, and because there was no privity of contract between her and the respondent company;

(2) The Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to deal with these matters through a writ of certiorari; and it could not, pursuant to that writ, go behind the proposal of the Board of Review, whose jurisdiction, on the only record before the Court, was on its face conclusive.

Dealing first with head no. 1: In order that the Board of Review may have power and jurisdiction to formulate or confirm the proposal it did, on the application of Jane McEwen, it was necessary that she should be a farmer unable to meet her liabilities as they became due, and also that she should be the debtor of the respondent company which, in effect, in the premises, was her only alleged creditor. Otherwise, it stands to reason that the respondent could not be brought in the scheme of arrangement under the Act; and the Board of Review, in formulating its proposal, and subsequently in confirming it, exceeded its powers, authority and jurisdiction.

I think the recent decision in Diewold v. *Diewold[2] is conclusive on that point, so far at least as this Court is concerned.

The mortgage debt owing to the respondent, and which the proposal purported to reduce, was incurred by the deceased John McEwen. No other person ever assumed or personally became responsible for it before any application was made for a proposal. Following the death of John McEwen, the respondent had the right to look to his estate for payment of its debt.

The application which resulted in the proposal now under consideration was an application made by Jane McEwen in her personal capacity.

At that time (July 31st, 1936), Jane McEwen was not the debtor of the respondent and, moreover, was not insolvent. She was not, therefore, entitled to invoke the benefits of the Act, not to speak of the disputed question whether she could be classed as a farmer.

Had she come within that class, the only proposal which she could file with the Official Receiver was a proposal in respect of her actual personal obligations.

On the face of the proposal formulated by the Board, the only debt disclosed, for which she was liable, was the sum of $91 owing to The International Harvester Company of Canada, Limited, incurred in 1936 and which could not be the subject of a personal proposal.

The only other debt appearing in the proposal is the respondent's mortgage account. That was not her debt. The respondent could not have sued her for it. It was not a "debt provable in bankruptcy" against her, or against her estate in bankruptcy.

As it turned out, it seemed pretty clear that the sole object of the proceeding was to obtain a reduction in the debt owing to the respondent by the John McEwen Estate. Jane McEwen herself apparently was not indebted to any person whomsoever.

In order to bring the debt of the estate first before the Official Receiver, and then before the Board, the Act, at that time, contained no provision under which its benefits could be invoked. It was only in 1938, by the amendment adding sec. 6 (A) to the Act (sec. 4 of C. 47 of the statutes of Canada, 1938), that provision was made for proposals by legal representatives of farmers who died after the 3rd day of July, 1934, upon satisfying certain conditions there mentioned and obtaining leave of the court. This procedure was never resorted to in the present case.

Up to that amendment, it had been consistently held that an executor could only proceed as such, and not as a farmer; and, as a Board of Review could only deal with debts of farmers in order to keep them on the land, the necessary jurisdiction was lacking.

The form of the proposal herein and of everything connected therewith was, throughout, essentially a proceeding on behalf and for the benefit of the John McEwen estate ; and the only personal interest of Jane McEwen shewn therein was that her name appeared in it and purported to be signed, not by her, but "per Robert J. McEwen, her agent". It was the latter who verified the statement of affairs and who signed the statutory declaration before the Official Receiver.

The first duty of Jane McEwen as executrix of the estate of her deceased husband was to administer properly the estate and to apply the assets in reduction of the debts before any conveyance to a beneficiary. I need not here discuss the point whether, when attempting to transfer the land to herself, she committed a breach of trust, and, notwithstanding such transfer, she should be treated as a trustee for the creditors of the John McEwen's estate. It is sufficient to state that the security given by John McEwen for the respondent's loan could not be released, reduced or affected, so long as the liability of the estate existed, by means of a proposal made and filed by Jane McEwen personally.

Under the circumstances, the Board of Review had no jurisdiction to deal with the respondent's mortgage debt. More particularly, it had no authority to reduce the rate of interest on that mortgage; and the Board of Review could not, consistently with the provisions of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, deal with her request, or formulate a proposal, in complete disregard of the position and interest of the respondent.

It need not be said that, so that the Act may be validly invoked, it is not sufficient that there should be a debt; it is necessary that the applicant farmer should be the debtor of such a debt. Here, there was undoubtedly a debt, but the applicant for relief was not the debtor. The debtor was the John McEwen estate, which refrained from making an application, although it might have done so after the amending legislation of 1938.

On behalf of the appellants, it was argued that another amendment introduced by that legislation (1938), and to which reference has not yet been made, has had the effect of doing away with the necessity of some privity of contract between the applicant for a proposal and the creditor.

Up till then, the Court of Appeal for Ontario, in Gofton v. *Shantz[3] and in Nesbitt v. *Hogg[4] had held that the Act did not apply where the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist, as here. It was claimed, however, by the appellants that sec. 2(d) of the Act, as amended by ch. 47 of the statutes of 1938, conferred jurisdiction upon the Board in this instance.

The subsection just referred to provides:

> (d) "Creditor" includes a secured creditor and, notwithstanding the absence of privity of contract between the debtor and any of the persons hereinafter mentioned, a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof and, in case the debtor holds real property > under an agreement of sale or under an assignment of an agreement of sale, the vendor of such property or any person entitled under an assignment by such vendor.

I do not think this new section helps the appellants.

The object of the amended definition appears to have been to enlarge the class of "creditors"; but it does not alter the status of the "debtor". This was pointed out by Masten, J. A., in Swaffield v. Baycroft[5]. In that case, neither the holder of the mortgage, nor the owner of the land, was an original party to the mortgage; but the owner of the land had by an extension agreement specifically covenanted to pay the debt. Having become a "debtor", he would have come within the purview of the Act but for the fact that the extension agreement was entered into after May 1st, 1935, and that, by force of sec. 19, the Act "does not, without the consent of the creditor, apply in the case of any debt incurred after" that date.

Masten J.A., in my view, properly set forth the limits of the new definition:

> But there is nothing in the Act of 1938 which brings the situation within the principal Act if the farmer who is in possession does not owe the debt secured by the mortgage. By the statute of 1938 a limitation on this right additional to that created by the original Act is imposed on the holder for the time being of a security against the farm of the debtor; that is all. The rights and liabilities of the debtor are not referred to in the Act of 1938, and, in my view, are not affected.
> And I should only add that, in my view, it is impossible to conceive that the statutory alteration in the definition of "creditor" carries with it by implication a corresponding alteration in the common law meaning of "debtor". That would, in my view, be legislation by the Court.

Independently of the language of section 2(d), which does not purport to enlarge the class of "debtors," it should be noticed that the new definition therein contained still requires, notwithstanding the absence of privity of contract between the applicant and the "person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege," that the mortgage or hypothec, etc., must be a mortgage or hypothec "on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof." This requirement would make it impossible to include Jane McEwen within the meaning of the definition, as, at the time of the proposal, she was not the owner of the property mortgaged.

The reasoning of Masten J.A. is further strengthened by reference to the other sections of the Act, which assume throughout that the applicant must also be the debtor. An example of this may be found in sec. 11 (1), whereby > on the filing with the Official Receiver of a proposal, no creditor * * * shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor, or shall commence or continue any proceeding under the Bankruptcy Act, or any action, execution, or other proceeding for the recovery of a debt provable in bankruptcy * * * unless with leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

There can be no debt "provable in bankruptcy" unless the applicant for the proposal is the debtor of the "creditor, whether secured or unsecured."

I fail to see how the respondent could validly be brought in a scheme of arrangement with Jane McEwen, who was not its personal debtor and who did not own the land upon which it held its mortgage. Jane McEwen was in no way the "debtor" of the respondent within the requirements of the Act, even after the introduction of the amendment of 1938 to section 2 (d).

And section 19 of the Act does not improve the appellants' situation. It has already been referred to. It enacts that the > Act shall not, without the concurrence of the creditor, apply in the case of any debt incurred after the first day of May, 1935.

The appellants rely on that section and claim that, as the mortgage debt was incurred by John McEwen on September 29th, 1919, and as John McEwen died August 26th, 1924, the Act applies to the debt so incurred.

I do not overlook the respondent's contention that it cannot be so, since the will of John McEwen was probated only on August 13th, 1935, the transfer of the land to Jane McEwen made by her as personal representative to herself in personal capacity took place only on October 20th, 1936, and that, moreover, such a transfer was, in effect, a breach of trust which must be held ineffective, in so far as it may affect the interests and rights of the respondent. But it is sufficient to say that sec. 19 can have no other meaning than that the first day of May, 1935, therein mentioned, is referable and can be referable only to the date when the debt was incurred by the applicant farmer himself. The whole Act deals with the liabilities of the farmer who files a proposal with the Official Receiver and his "present and prospective capability * * * to perform the obligations prescribed", as well as "the productive value of his farm." The "composition, extension of time, or scheme of arrangement" for which he is authorized to file a proposal, or the Board of Review may formulate a proposal, concern only the applicant farmer, whom the Dominion Parliament has declared essential, in the interest of the country, to retain on the land as an efficient producer (See preamble of the Act). It follows that "the debt incurred", referred to in sec. 19, is necessarily the debt personally incurred by the applicant and does not concern a debt which, though at present owing by the applicant farmer, towards the creditor, was incurred by a previous debtor (who may not have been a farmer) and at a date prior to the first day of May, 1935, as is the case here.

As a consequence of the foregoing, the point raised by the respondent that if the Act, and more particularly sec. 2 (d), should be construed otherwise than was contended by it, the Act would be unconstitutional, need not be considered.

On that point, we have heard argument on behalf of the Attorney-General of Canada; and it is sufficient to say that as, in my view, the Act and the amendments of 1938 ought to be construed as submitted by the respondent, the latter has no interest to raise the question of constitutionality and it need not be gone into in the present case.

But the fact remains that the respondent has succeeded to establish that the Act did not apply to Jane McEwen at the time when she filed her proposal, or at the time when the Board of Review pretended to formulate or to confirm a proposal in respect of her liabilities; and that, accordingly these proposals were made without authority and jurisdiction and they were invalid, as held by the majority of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba.

There remains to discuss whether, as contended by the appellants, that Court had no power to deal with this matter on an application for certiorari, and it should have refused the motion for the issue of the writ.

I do not think this Court ought to concern itself with the procedure set up by the King's Bench Act and the rules thereunder. This is essentially a matter of practice which, at least in the present case, should properly be left as settled by the Court of Appeal of Manitoba.

The same thing may be said of the point raised by the appellants that the respondent's application for certiorari was, in any event, barred by delay, prejudice and estoppel. This, to my mind, was a matter to be determined according to the discretion of the Court of Appeal. Moreover, where the subject of the discussion raises not only the question of the competency of the Official Receiver and of the Board of Review, but might involve as well the constitutional jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, I do not think that, generally speaking, an objection based on delay, latches, or estoppel, could be held to deprive the courts of the power to inquire into the substantial points which are discussed in this appeal.

The fallacy of the appellants' contention is that the Official Receiver or the Board of Review were given the authority to pass upon these substantial questions. Starting from that erroneous premise, they asked the Court to hold that the Board of Review had made findings on these substantial questions, and, there being no appeal from the decisions of the Board, the findings so made must be held as conclusive and as thereby withdrawn from the supervisory authority of the provincial Supreme Court.

But, of course, a mere perusal of the Act shows that the Board of Review has been given no such authority. The Official Receiver or the Board, naturally, must proceed generally upon a prima facie case of jurisdiction being established, but that is vastly different from the suggestion that, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, the Official Receiver or the Board may determine the questions of law, as distinguished from the questions of pure fact (Reference concerning the Tariff Board of Canada)[6].

Of course, the status of a farmer, and whether he is able to meet his liabilities as they become due, and whether there exists between the interested parties the relation of debtor and creditor, are largely questions of fact; but whether these facts are covered by the Act, and whether they bring the matter within the meaning of the Act and under the jurisdiction of the Receiver and the Board are questions of law. The whole subject is one of mixed law and fact. Neither the Receiver, nor the Board, has been given by the Act the power to determine these questions in their legal aspect. The courts designated by the Act for that purpose are, in Quebec, the Superior Court and, in the other provinces, the County or District Court. The jurisdiction conferred on these courts by section 5 of the Act is stated to be "a jurisdiction in bankruptcy" and that wording implies a qualified jurisdiction. But such jurisdiction is sufficient to give to these courts the power to determine the status as a farmer of the applicant to the Official Receiver, as well as the other questions: Whether the farmer is unable to meet his liabilities as they become due and whether, for the purposes of the application of the Act, the relation of creditor and debtor exists between the interested parties.

Nowhere in the Act are the Official Receiver or the Board of Review given any such jurisdiction. And the existence of the status of farmer, or of his insolvency, or of the relation of debtor and creditor, is a condition precedent to the validity of the proceedings before the Official Receiver or before the Board; it is a prerequisite of their competency in the premises. Unless these conditions exist, the Official Receiver and the Board cannot enter into the matter at all. Further, the Receiver, or the Board, have not been given by the Act the power to decide these matters, they are specifically declared to be within the exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy of the courts named in section 5.

In this case, it was stated at bar, and it is apparent from the record, that these preliminary questions, which it was essential to have decided before the Receiver or the Board could acquire jurisdiction, were never brought before the County or District Court having territorial jurisdiction in Manitoba.

Upon the return to the writ of certiorari, the Board of Review certified to the Court of Appeal the proposal it made as of October 29th, 1937, confirmed as originally formulated and declared to be binding upon all creditors of the so-called farmer debtor on October 5th, 1938, and filed in the County Court of Dauphin on October 8th, 1938. This was the only document returned by the Registrar of the Board.

It is true that, as shown by that proposal, the Board therein found "the farmer entitled to the benefit of the Act," although it is not clear whether this may be taken as a finding that Jane McEwen was a farmer, or as assuming that she was a farmer and holding that she was otherwise entitled to the benefit of the Act. But, be that as it may, for the reasons above given, the exact meaning of the finding is immaterial. It is sufficient that it shows that the Board was treating Jane McEwen as a farmer entitled to invoke the Act and was proceeding to formulate a proposal as if the Act applied to her, notwithstanding the objections of the respondent clearly put before that body prior to the formulation of the proposal.

The document returned upon the writ and certified to by the Registrar of the Board of Review as being the proposal confirmed by the Board and intended to be binding upon the respondent discloses:

> That the farmer's son, Robert McEwen, who is at present living and working on the farm, intends to remain there and finds that the farm is being efficiently operated.

This statement is strongly suggestive of the fact that Jane McEwen herself was not farming the land, but that her son was the farmer who, in accordance with the preamble of the Act, was to be retained on the land as efficient producer. The statement so made, together with the facts otherwise established and related in the early part of this judgment (not forgetting that the farm was leased to the son by the mortgagee) sufficiently show that the status of Jane McEwen as a farmer was disputable and of such a doubtful character as should have required a decision by the court competent to pass upon it.

The proposal further states:

"There appeared to be no unsecured creditors"; and it mentions that > the taxes levied against the said land by the rural municipality of Dauphin have been paid to the 31st December, 1935;

and that > the claim of International Harvester Company of Canada, Limited, having been incurred since the first day of May, 1935, shall not be affected by this proposal.

The only liability apparent on the face of the document is the respondent's mortgage there stated to have been "given by John McEwen, now deceased, the farmer's late husband". Nowhere is it stated that this mortgage has become the debt of Jane McEwen either through will, through transfer or in any other way. As there shewn, it is a debt of the estate of John McEwen.

The result is that the document itself does not show the existence of any debt owing by Jane McEwen. If that be so, there was no evidence before the Board of the alleged insolvency of Jane McEwen and, accordingly, nothing to indicate or even to suggest that she was unable to meet her liabilities, since there were none. Nor was there even a scintilla of evidence that the relation of debtor and creditor existed between Jane McEwen and the respondent.

It is clear, therefore, on the proposal itself, that none of the conditions essential and prerequisite to the existence of the jurisdiction of the Board were present in the case. These facts were still made clearer, if necessary, by the evidence put before the Court of Appeal of Manitoba in the affidavits filed by the parties.

It was objected by the appellants that the proposal, returned into court pursuant to the writ of certiorari, constituted the only and entire record before the court on the motion to quash, and that it was not open to the court to go behind the return and to consider extraneous material. It was argued before us that, by taking the affidavits into account, the Court of Appeal was, in point of fact, exercising an appellate jurisdiction which it could not do in certiorari proceedings.

Although, in my view, the proposal itself is sufficient evidence of the lack of jurisdiction of the Board, more particularly if it is coupled with the admission at bar that the respondent's objections were never submitted to the County Court, it may be in order to mention that it is not strictly correct to say that a court, acting on certiorari in the exercise of its supervisory authority, should not be allowed to inquire into the actual facts, in order to determine the question of the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal (9 Halsbury, p. 898, sec. 1514, notes (p) and (q); Regina v. Bolton[7]).

The subject was fully considered in Rex v. Nat Bell Liquors Limited[8]. In that case, Lord Sumner, delivering the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council, said (p. 153):

> In Reg. v. *Bolton*7, Lord Denman, in a well-known passage, says: "The case to be supposed is one * * * in which the Legislature has trusted the original, it may be (as here) the final, jurisdiction on the merits to the magistrates below; in which this Court has no jurisdiction as to the merits either originally or on appeal. All that we can then do * * * is to see that the case was one within their jurisdiction, and that their proceedings on the face of them are regular and according to law * * * where the charge laid before the magistrate, as stated in the information, does not amount in law to the offence over which the statute gives him jurisdiction, his finding the party guilty by his conviction in the very terms of the statute would not avail to give him jurisdiction; the conviction would be bad on the face of the proceedings, all being returned before us. Or if, the charge being really insufficient, he had mis-stated it > in drawing up the proceedings, so that they would appear to be regular, it would be clearly competent to the defendant to show to us by affidavits what the real charge was, and, that appearing to have been insufficient, we would quash the conviction; * * * But, as in this latest case, we cannot get at the want of jurisdiction but by affidavits, of necessity we must receive them. It will be observed, however, that here we receive them, not to show that the magistrate has come to a wrong conclusion, but that he never ought to have begun the inquiry * * *

> The law laid down in Reg. v. *Bolton*7 has never since been seriously disputed in England.

> When it is contended that there are grounds for holding that a decision has been given without jurisdiction, this can only be made apparent on new evidence brought ad hoc before the Superior Court. How is it ever to appear within the four corners of the record that the members of the inferior court were unqualified, or were biased, or were interested in the subject-matter?

The hearing of the Board as a result of which the proposal was formulated was held ex parte, for the respondent did not appear, and there were no creditors present. The consequence was that the Board assumed the reality of the preliminary questions relating to its jurisdiction and, in the result, it established its jurisdiction, or took it for granted, by proceeding upon assumed facts. But, in the words of Lord Summer, "the reality of that assumption having been inquired into (in the Court of Appeal) on affidavit as to the facts, since questions going to the jurisdiction of the (Board) must, in case of need, be inquired into, and it having been found that in fact (Jane McEwen was not a farmer, was not insolvent and was not the debtor of the respondent), the order was rightly quashed" (Nat Bell case[9])., Further to quote Lord Sumner (p. 158):

> While the decision (of the Board) is final, if jurisdiction is established, the decision that its jurisdiction is established is open to examination on certiorari by a superior court.

Coleridge, J., delivering the judgment of the Court in Bunbury v. Fuller[10], stated the rule thus:

> No court of limited jurisdiction can give itself jurisdiction by a wrong decision on a point collateral to the merits of the case upon which the limit to its jurisdiction depends; and however its decision may be final on all particulars making up together that subject-matter which, if true, is within its jurisdiction, and however necessary in many cases it may be for it to make a preliminary inquiry whether some collateral matter be or be not within the limits, yet upon this preliminary question, its decision must always be open to inquiry in the superior court.

Upon the authority of those cases, I think it must be decided that the preliminary questions raised by the respondent were of such a nature that, in an ordinary case, they would properly give rise to an inquiry on certiorari by a superior court and that, for the purposes of that inquiry, the facts bearing on the question of jurisdiction could be put before that court by means of affidavits (The Security Export Company v. Hetherington[11]).

The judgment of this Court in the Hetherington case11 was reversed on the ground that the proceeding there in question was not judicial, but merely administrative; but the learned Law Lords fully endorsed the exposition, there made by my Lord the present Chief Justice, of the law pertaining to certiorari[12].

Since the enactment of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, procedure by way of certiorari in respect of proposals under the Act has been held to be available in many cases: Re Ratz (Manitoba Court of Appeal[13],
Re Hawkins (Manitoba Court of Appeal)[14], Re Hudson's Bay (Alberta)[15], Crédit Fonder v. Board of Review (Saskatchewan Court of Appeal)[16], Re Drewry (Saskatchewan Court of Appeal)[17]. See also The Queen v. Justice of Surrey[18] and The King v. Stafford Justices[19]. Short & Mellor, 2nd Ed., p. 48.

But there was a special reason in this case why the writ of certiorari should be resorted to. It appears by the document certified by the Registrar of the Board of Review upon the return to the writ, that the proposal, as formulated by the Board, was confirmed by the latter and declared to be binding upon all creditors of the so-called farmer debtor on October 5th, 1938, and that it was "filed in the County Court of Dauphin, on the 8th day of Oct. 1938." This filing in the court concluded the whole matter, so far as the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was concerned. Nothing remained to be done under it. The respondent Board of Review became functus officio as soon as it had confirmed the proposal formulated by it and such proposal was transmitted to the Official Receiver, to be filed by him in the court under Rule 23 of the Rules and Regulations made under the Act. The Official Receiver did file the proposal in court on October 8th, 1938, as appears on the face of the document returned upon the certiorari. There is no longer, under the Act, any provision that the proposal so filed should be approved by the court. Upon it being filed, it became immediately "binding upon all the creditors and the debtor" (subs. 6 of s. 12), and, in particular, upon the respondent, unless it elected to contest the validity of the same, so as to be relieved of the arrangement made by the Board.

As a consequence, the jurisdiction in bankruptcy given by s. 5 of the Act to the County Court was exhausted; and, assuming that jurisdiction was exclusive while the Act was operating, clearly it could no longer stand in the way of the supervisory authority of the Court of Appeal after the Act had accomplished its purpose and its effect (Prudential Ins. Co. v. Berg.[20].

In the circumstances of this case, certiorari was a remedy open to the respondent.
The latter might also have continued its proceedings in the Court of King's Bench in respect of its mortgage account claim which, as we were told, is still pending, although the statement of defence in that action pleaded The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and alleged that the confirmation and filing in court of the proposal was a bar to the respondent's action.
The respondent has refused consistently to recognize the jurisdiction of the Board of Review, it has never acquiesced in it, and it could validly invoke the authority of a superior court (in this case, the Court of Appeal of Manitoba) to question the jurisdiction of the Board and to have the Court inquire whether the conditions precedent and prerequisite to the Board's competency existed in this matter.
I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. There should be no costs to the Attorney-General of Canada.
DAVIS, J. (dissenting):—The Board of Review for the province of Manitoba under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, and amendments, assumed to reduce the amount of the respondent company's mortgage on, what may for convenience be called, the McEwen farm in Manitoba. The mortgage had been on the property since October, 1919; nothing has been paid on the principal amount of $4,000; and arrears of interest on the 1st of November, 1936, amounted to $2,332.15, which indicates that the interest on the mortgage could not have been paid for many years. No proceedings appear to have been taken at any time by the respondent either to recover the money debt or to enforce the security. John McEwen, who had made the mortgage in 1919, remained the owner of the farm until his death on the 26th of August, 1934. By his will he devised and bequeathed all his property, real and personal, to his wife, Jane McEwen, and appointed her the sole executrix of the will. The widow and a son appear to have continued to reside on and work the farm following upon the death of the husband and father. Then, on July 31st, 1936, Mrs. McEwen sought relief under the provisions of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement, Act, 1934, by lodging with the Official Receiver for Dauphin Judicial District a proposal under the statute for a composition, extension or scheme of arrangement. With the proposal was the required statement of affairs in which Mrs. McEwen said that her principal occupation was farming; that she was unable to meet her liabilities as they became due; and she gave as the amounts of claims of creditors the respondent's mortgage at $6,000 and arrears of taxes on the farm of $170. She was then, the statement said, 76 years old; had 170 acres under cultivation; the causes of her financial difficulties were, "Debt too heavy. Failure of crops and low prices."
The proceedings in connection with this proposal moved rather slowly. It was not until March 31st, 1937, that the Board of Review for Manitoba constituted under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act heard the matter, and it was not until October 29th, 1937, that the Board formulated, what is called under the statute, its proposal wherein it reduced the amount owing on the respondent's mortgage to $2,800 as at the 1st of January, 1937, including principal and interest, and the rate of interest (which had originally been 7 per cent per annum) from the said date was reduced to 6 per cent per annum; and special terms were imposed for the repayment of the reduced principal amount in instalments.
I interject in the narrative here the statement that the proceedings out of which this appeal comes to this Court were certiorari proceedings that were not commenced until September 17th, 1940, on which date the respondent served notice of motion upon the Registrar of the Board of Review and upon the executors of Jane McEwen (she having died in the meantime on the 27th of March, 1940) and upon the son, Robert James McEwen, to whom his mother had devised the property by her will and who was at the time in occupation of the farm. The notice of motion was made direct to the Court of Appeal for Manitoba (in accordance with the practice in that province) > for an order that a writ of certiorari do issue out of this Honourable Court for the return into this Court of the proposal made by the Board of Review under "The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act," and dated the 29th day of October, 1937, which said proposal purports to have been made binding by the filing of the same in the County Court of Dauphin, in order that the said proposal, or those portions contained in paragraphs numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4 thereof, may be quashed, and for such further or other order as to this Honourable Court may seem proper.

The grounds set forth in the notice of motion were that the Board of Review in making the said proposal acted without jurisdiction or in excess of jurisdiction; that Jane McEwen was not a farmer within the meaning of the statute and that she was not at the time of her application the owner of the property; and that she was not indebted to the respondent in respect of the said mortgage, never having assumed or undertaken to pay the debt secured by the said mortgage or to perform any of the covenants therein contained.
The Court of Appeal reviewed the matter at large, granted the writ and quashed the proposal made by the Board of Review, Dennistoun, J.A. dissenting, which meant that the reduction of the amount of the mortgage and the new terms of repayment were nullified. From that judgment the proceedings have come to this Court by way of special leave granted by the Court of Appeal. All phases of the matter were discussed at considerable length before us. Counsel for the respondent raised many objections to the whole course of proceedings under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, including an attack upon the constitutional validity of certain amendments to the Act that were made by Parliament in 1938. Some of the objections raised are undoubtedly formidable objections. But I am satisfied that the respondent misconceived its proper remedy and that in the special circumstances of this case the application for the issue of a writ of certiorari should have been refused. It may be fortunate for the respondent that an action it commenced in the courts of Manitoba many months prior to its commencement of these certiorari proceedings (to which action I shall later refer) is still pending. In that action the respondent itself put in issue the alleged invalidity of the proposal under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the alleged lack of jurisdiction in the Board of Review to deal with the matter under the statute.

I return now to the first step that was taken by Mrs. McEwen under the statute, i.e., the lodging with the Official Receiver (having jurisdiction in the county or district in which Mrs. McEwen resided) of a composition, extension or scheme of arrangement. That was, as I said before, July 31st, 1936. The effect of that first step was to put the subject matter of the proposal into the exclusive jurisdiction, subject to appeal, of the County Court of Dauphin, which is admitted to be the judicial district where Mrs. McEwen resided and the farm was located. The exclusive jurisdiction of the County Court of Dauphin in the matter, subject to the right of appeal provided by the statute, is to me the fundamental and most important fact in considering the certiorari proceedings which have come before us. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is part of the bankruptcy and insolvency legislation of the Parliament of Canada and the Act was made to be read and construed as one with The Bankruptcy Act. Sec. 2 (2). For the purposes of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, Parliament saw fit to designate the local courts, the County or District Courts (except in the province of Quebec), to have jurisdiction in respect of the statutory means provided whereby compromises or rearrangements might be effected of debts of farmers who were unable to pay (the recital in the Act). The following is the provision of the statute which gave the County Court of Dauphin exclusive jurisdiction, subject to appeal:

> Sec. 5. (1) In the case of an assignment, petition or proposal, in the province of Quebec, the Superior Court of the judicial district where the farmer resides, and in other provinces, the county or district court, shall have exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy subject to appeal as provided in section one hundred and seventy-four of the Bankruptcy Act.

Section 7 enacts that a proposal may provide for a compromise or an extension of time or a scheme of arrangement in relation to a debt owing to a secured creditor, or in relation to a debt owing to a person who has acquired movable or immovable property subject to a right of redemption, but in that event the concurrence of the secured creditor or such person, shall be required, except in the case of a proposal formulated and confirmed by the Board of Review. I am not forgetting that one of the strongest points made by counsel for the respondent is that the respondent was not a secured creditor of Mrs. McEwen because she was not its debtor. But leaving that question aside for the moment, it is important, I think, to observe that Parliament gave to the Board of Review a right to work out a proposal which might involve secured creditors, even in the absence of their concurrence.

The Board of Review is under the statute essentially an administrative body. A proposal first goes to the Official Receiver having jurisdiction in the locality and if at a meeting of creditors called by him the proposal or some modification of it is not approved by the creditors, the Official Receiver reports this fact to the Board of Review, and the Board then shall, at the written request of a creditor or of the debtor, endeavour to formulate an acceptable proposal to be submitted to the creditors and the debtor, and the Board shall consider representations on the part of those interested. Sec. 12 (4). If any such proposal formulated by the Board is approved by the creditors and the debtor, it shall be filed in the court and shall be binding on the debtor and all the creditors. Sec. 12 (5). But if the creditors or the debtor decline to approve the proposal so formulated, the Board may nevertheless confirm such proposal, either as formulated or as amended by the Board, in which case it shall be filed in the court (i.e., again the County Court) and shall be binding upon all the creditors and the debtor as in the case of a proposal duly accepted by the creditors and approved by the Court. Sec. 12 (6).

The proposal formulated and confirmed by the Board of Review was filed in the County Court of Dauphin October 8th, 1938. I think it obvious that the Board must have withheld the filing of the document, which was dated October 29th, 1937, because of its own doubt as to whether or not the Act applied to the case of a mortgage security which, while it lay as a charge against the farmer's lands, was not a debt which the farmer himself had incurred or had undertaken to assume and pay, until the 1938 amendments to the statute, which became effective July 1st, 1938, attempted at least to bring this sort of claim within the ambit of the statute.

In considering whether or not certiorari proceedings against the Board became available on the notice of motion that was not made until September 17th, 1940, it is important to observe that as early as August 5th, 1936, when the respondent was notified by the Official Receiver of the proposal he had received from Mrs. McEwen, the respondent took the position in a letter to the Official Receiver of that date, and has adhered to the position consistently throughout, that it was not in any way affected by the proposal. But the respondent at no time appeared or took any proceedings, either before the Official Receiver or before the Board of Review or in the County Court of Dauphin. Holding consistently to its position that Mrs. McEwen was not its debtor and that it was not a secured creditor, the respondent deliberately ignored, as it had a perfect right to do at its own risk, the proceedings under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, A very convenient and speedy remedy was available to the respondent when it got notice in August, 1936, that Mrs. McEwen had filed an application with the Official Receiver. It could have moved at once in the County Court of Dauphin, which in my view had exclusive jurisdiction, subject to appeal, to have the proposal set aside upon any of the grounds alleged by the respondent, that is, that Mrs. McEwen was not a farmer within the meaning of the statute, that she was not the owner of the lands and that she was not entitled to the benefit of the Act, or to stay proceedings or to have it determined that in any event the respondent was not a creditor of the applicant and was not affected by the proposal or proceedings under the statute. I have not the slightest doubt that the County judge would have entertained any such application and would have dealt with the matter at the time in a speedy and inexpensive manner. A statutory right to appeal from any decision that he might give was available. It may be that a declaratory action might have been brought in the Court of King's Bench to determine the rights of the parties and to grant relief by injunction or otherwise, though I do not find it necessary to pass upon that as an available remedy. The respondent did, however, commence an action in the Court of King's Bench on December 9th, 1939, (more than three years after Mrs. McEwen sought relief under the statute and more than a year after the Board of Review's proposal had been filed in the County Court of Dauphin), against Mrs. McEwen as executrix under the will of her deceased husband and against herself personally, for the administration of the estate of John McEwen and to have the lands ordered to be sold, subject to the mortgage, to satisfy the debts. In the statement of claim the respondent alleged that there was then owing to it under the mortgage the sum of $7,102 and that it had security for a portion of the said debt, namely, the sum of $2,612:15, but had no security for the balance, being the sum of $4,489.85. The important point is that in that action, in reply to a demand for particulars, the respondent as plaintiff in the action stated that the figure it had given for the security on the loan was the amount fixed by the Board of Review under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and in reply to the statement of defence, set up that the Board of Review > was without power or jurisdiction to compromise, reduce or in any way deal with the debt of the deceased or his estate under the mortgage, and, in the alternative, that > if the said proposal does purport to compromise, reduce or deal with the said debt, such proposal was made without power or jurisdiction and is void and of no effect.

That reply was delivered January 16th, 1940. No further step appears to have been taken by the respondent in that action and it was admitted that the action is still pending in the Court of King's Bench for Manitoba. Eight months after the respondent put in issue in that action the alleged invalidity of the proposal and the alleged want of jurisdiction of the Board of Review, it commenced these certiorari proceedings in the Court of Appeal for Manitoba against the Board, seeking an order that the proposal of the Board be quashed. The Board had become functus so far as this matter was concerned when it filed its proposal in the County Court of Dauphin in October, 1938. The proposal rested thereafter in the said County Court, which had exclusive jurisdiction in the matter, subject to the right of appeal.

Further, it is to be observed that sec. 11 (3) of the statute provides that no proposal shall be received in the province of Manitoba later than the 30th day of June, 1939. That means in this case that if the proposal is quashed, no new proposal can now be made by the owner of the farm to gain the advantage of the provisions of the statute. Notwithstanding that the original proposal was brought to the notice of the respondent by the Official Receiver as early as August, 1936, the respondent did not institute these proceedings by way of certiorari until September, 1940.

The Court of Appeal reviewed the evidence submitted to it as if the proceedings were by way of an appeal from the Board of Review, examining the merits of the case to the extent of even admitting particulars of fire insurance policies on the buildings and contents in an effort on the part of the respondent to show that the valuation of the applicant to the Board had been an undervaluation. Further, the confirmation and filing of the Board's proposal in the County Court made that proposal, by force of the statute (sec. 12 (6)), "binding upon all the creditors and the debtor" and had the effect of a judgment of that Court. There appears to be no reported decision in which certiorari has been granted to quash the judgments of inferior courts of civil jurisdiction. Halsbury, 2nd ed., Vol. IX, page 844, para. 1431, note (q).

In view of all the facts and circumstances of the matter, I am of the opinion that the conduct of the respondent throughout has been such as to disentitle it to relief in certiorari proceedings. To dismiss this appeal with costs is in my opinion, with great respect to those with whom I differ, to put the appellants the Board of Review, the Registrar, the executors of Mrs. McEwen and her son, Robert James McEwen, to the burden of what appear to me to be excessive and unnecessary costs of litigation.

The application for the writ ought, in my opinion, to have been dismissed and I should therefore allow the appeal and direct that the order be refused, with costs to the appellants throughout.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

John Honsberger, for respondent.
(Doc. 93-CQ-39905)
[1] June 29, 1995. CARRUTHERS J.: – This is yet another in a long line of cases in which a trustee in bankruptcy is involved in a contest over the ownership of funds standing in court to the credit of an action.
[2] Here the plaintiff commenced an action claiming some $90,000 as arrears of rent due under an offer to lease. On the 11th January 1994 it moved before Matlow J. for summary judgment under R. 20. On 13th May, 1994 [unreported] Matlow J. dismissed the motion ordering "that the action proceed to trial on condition that the defendant pay into court on or before 31 May 1994 the sum of $70,719.63 as security for the Plaintiff's claim".
[3] That sum was paid into court by the defendant within the required time and, two weeks later, on the 13th April 1994, the defendant was declared bankrupt and Richter & Associés Inc. was named as its trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee now moves for an order paying out to it all the money now in court.
[4] Although the plaintiff has yet to move for leave to continue its action against the defendant, it resists the trustee's motion principally on the ground that it is a secured creditor and intends to take the necessary steps to proceed with this action.
[5] The plaintiff relies upon the decision of Re Ford, Ex parte Trustee, [1900] 2 Q.B. 211 as support for its position that it is a secured creditor. In that case, as here, the plaintiff moved for judgment and leave was granted to the defendant to defend. The operative part of the order in that case reads as follows [at p. 211]:

> "It is ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to sign final judgment for the claim indorsed [sic] on the writ and costs to be taxed unless the sum of 1000£ be paid into court within three days."

[6] The money was paid into court and the defendant delivered a defence on 10th January, 1900. On January 29th, 1900 the defendant filed his own petition in bankruptcy and a receiving order was made. The trustee in bankruptcy applied for an order that the money in court be declared a "part of the bankrupt's estate and should be paid out to him". The application was dismissed.
[7] Wright J. at p. 213 states as follows:

> It seems plain in principle and on the authorities that Messrs. Jay are for the present entitled to the benefit of the security which they obtained by the order of September 21, 1899, and the payment into court in compliance with that order. The order must be treated as an order that the right to the money when paid into court shall abide the event: see Bird v. Bastow (1), where the order appears to have been in the same form as in this case; and it is settled that where money is ordered to be paid into court to abide the event it must be treated as a security that the plaintiff shall not lose the benefit of the decision of the court in his favour: Ex parte Banner (2); Ex parte Bouchard (3); Ex parte Navalchand (4); Tomlinson v. Hampson (5). The very object of such an order is that the plaintiff shall be in as good a position, so far as the money paid in extends, against contingencies such as bankruptcy as if he had got an immediate judgment; and the cases cited shew that, where the plaintiff has without default on his part failed to get judgment before the bankruptcy, "the event" is the decision of his right in the bankruptcy. The money must remain in court until "the event" is decided by the trial of the action, if that is to be tried, or by adjudication upon a proof by the plaintiffs in the bankruptcy.

[8] I was told by counsel for the plaintiff that the Bankruptcy Act in vogue at the time of Ford was similar in its provisions to the present Act and, specifically, s. 70(1) thereof.
[9] It appears to me that Wright J. had only in mind the provisions of the rule under which the money was paid into court in that case. The wording of that rule is of some significance given the language of the order of Matlow J. here. The rule referred to in Ford includes the words "subject to such terms as to giving security". The order, however, as can be seen above, does not in fact refer to the word "security".
[10] Of some interest for my present purposes is the fact that while of the five cases referred to by Wright J. in Ford, four involve bankruptcy proceeding, only one contains any reference to the provisions of what then represented the present s. 70(1) or "secured creditor".
[11] In Re Keyworth, Ex parte Banner (1874), 9 Ch. App. 379, counsel for the trustee in bankruptcy urged the court to conclude that the plaintiff in that action, who was claiming the money which had been paid into court, was not a "secured creditor under the terms of the 16th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869." The court in that case, in concluding that the plaintiff was entitled to the money standing in court, made no reference to whether it was a secured creditor under the Bankruptcy Act. Rather, the court concluded that [at p. 383] "[t]he sum in question was paid into Court to abide the event of the action... [i]t belongs to the party who was found eventually to be entitled to the sum in dispute."
[12] To my mind the essential issue in the present case, and, I would have thought as well in those earlier cases, including Ford, is whether the party opposed to the claim of the trustee in bankruptcy is, for the purposes of determining ownership of the funds in court, a secured creditor within the meaning of that term as it is used in the Bankruptcy Act [Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act]. If the plaintiff here is not such a secured creditor, then, it has no claim to the money in court in priority to that of the trustee in bankruptcy.

[13] Counsel for the trustee spent some time in argument dealing with the provisions of s. 70(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. It is his position that the words "other processes" as found there include an order for payment into court such as that which was made by Matlow J. I am not prepared to agree with that contention. In my opinion those words, "other processes", must be interpreted ejusdem generis. In this respect I agree with the decision of Master Funduk in V.I. International Holdings Ltd. v. Henbar Investments Ltd. (1982), 41 C.B.R. (N.S.) 304 (Alta. Master), at p. 307.

[14] To the extent that s. 70(1) specifically exempts "the rights of a secured creditor," provisions of that section are relevant; otherwise, in my opinion its provisions are not determinative of the issue here.

[15] The Bankruptcy Act defines "secured creditor" as follows:

> "secured creditor" means a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt due or accruing due to him from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based on, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and on which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable;

[16] Matlow J. ordered the money to be paid into court pursuant to the provisions of r. 20.05(3)(a) which reads as follows:

> (3) Where an action is ordered to proceed to trial, in whole or in part, the court may give such directions or impose such terms as are just, including an order
> (a) for paying into court of all or part of the claim;...

[17] In my opinion, an order made pursuant to the provisions of that rule does not make the person putting forward the claim in respect of which the money is paid into court a secured creditor within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act. In this respect I agree with the decision of Barr J. in Bank of Montreal v. Faclaris reflex, (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 348 (H.C.).

[18] To my mind, the fact that Matlow J. added the words "as security for the plaintiff's claim" to those of the rule, does not alter my conclusion. I hold the same view about the "security" to which Wright J. refers in Ford.

[19] There is a suggestion in some of the cases that when the judgment is ultimately obtained the money in court then belongs to the plaintiff exclusively. I cannot agree with that position because, if the plaintiff is not a secured creditor then s. 70(1) must apply at the time of judgment. In that event the money in court is available to be distributed along with the rest of the bankrupt's property in accordance with the terms of the Act. In circumstances such as the present it would be an anomaly if the plaintiff, prior to judgment, was given a greater right to the money in court than it would have following judgment. To my mind that appears to be the result attained in Ford and the cases referred to therein. For this reason I cannot follow them.

[20] In my opinion when paid into court pursuant to Matlow J.'s order, the money was the property of the bankrupt and has remained to be such. At the time of the claim of the trustee in bankruptcy to that money, it cannot be said that the plaintiff was a secured creditor within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act.

[21] Accordingly the trustee is entitled to the relief which it seeks. If cots are not to follow the event counsel may make written submissions to me, with those on behalf of the trustee to be made first to be followed by those on behalf of the plaintiff within ten days and with a right of response to the trustee within three days.

Motion granted.

on appeal from the court of appeal for alberta

Taxation -- Income tax -- Goods and Services Tax -- Garnishment -- Income tax and GST legislation providing for garnishment enabling Minister of National Revenue to intercept monies owed to tax debtors -- Whether provisions give Minister priority over creditors who have received general assignment of book debts from tax debtor -- Meaning of "secured creditor" -- Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, s. 224(1.2), (1.3) -- Excise Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-15, s. 317(3), (4).

Bankruptcy -- Priorities -- General assignments of book debts -- Income tax and GST legislation providing for garnishment enabling Minister of National Revenue to intercept monies owed to tax debtors -- Whether provisions give Minister priority over creditors who have received general assignment of book debts from tax debtor.

The first case involved in these appeals arose from a loan made by the respondent Alberta Treasury Branches to a hotel operator which was secured in part by a general assignment of book debts ("GABD"). The hotel operator was in arrears to the Minister of National Revenue ("MNR") for unremitted GST, plus interest and penalties. The MNR served requirements to pay under s. 317(3) of the Excise Tax Act ("ETA") on all possible debtors of the hotel operator. That section provides for a form of garnishment which enables the MNR in certain circumstances to intercept monies owed to a tax debtor. It applies to a "secured creditor", defined as "a person who has a security interest in the property of another person". After the hotel operator made an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, the trustee estimated the realization of the assets of the estate would leave a shortfall to Alberta Treasury Branches. The Court of Queen's Bench, in an application to determine priorities, held that the MNR had priority by virtue of the provisions of the ETA. In the second case, an excavation company borrowed money from Alberta Treasury Branches and granted it a GABD. After the company completed certain contract work, the client held holdback funds which were claimed by various creditors of the company, including the MNR, to whom the company was indebted for unremitted employee source deductions, interest and penalties. The MNR served two requirements to pay on the client, under s. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act ("ITA"), which provides for a garnishment remedy identical to the one provided for in the ETA. On an application to determine priority to the monies in question, the master decided that Alberta Treasury Branches had priority through its GABD. This decision was upheld on appeal. In the third case, a drilling company borrowed money from the respondent bank which was secured in part by a GABD. The company owed the MNR unremitted GST, interest and penalties. The MNR served requirements to pay under s. 317(3) ETA on the company's trade debtors. Another of its creditors successfully filed a petition under the Bankruptcy Act to have the company declared a bankrupt. In an application to determine priority, the Court of Queen's Bench held that the MNR had priority under the provisions of the ETA. In all three cases the Court of Appeal held that the lending institution had priority over the MNR.

Held (Iacobucci and Major JJ. dissenting): The appeals should be allowed.

Per La Forest, Cory and McLachlin JJ.: The definition of "security interest" is broad enough to include a GABD, and the wording of s. 224(1.2) ITA and s. 317(3) ETA is sufficiently clear and unequivocal to allow a transfer of property in the garnished funds to the MNR and to grant him a priority in circumstances where the balance of the section applies. Moreover, an assignee of a GABD is a "secured creditor" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA or s. 317(3) ETA because the assignee holds a security interest "in the property of another person". Each assignment of book debts made in these cases provides that it is to be a "continuing collateral security". Further, all the assignments limit liability to the extent of the outstanding indebtedness. Thus, if the loan secured by the GABD was repaid, the lending institution would have no further interest in the assignment. Since the assignment by its terms can be redeemed by payment of the debt, it should not be construed as an absolute assignment. Neither the lending institutions nor the debtor companies by their actions gave any indication that the institutions were the owners of the book debts. The lending institutions made no efforts whatsoever to realize upon the book debts or in any way to act as "owners" of them until the debtor companies were obviously in severe financial difficulty if not bankrupt. Both the wording of the documents and the actions of the parties indicate that they regarded the assignment to be given as collateral security for the indebtedness. So long as the possibility of redemption exists, the GABD remains as collateral security.

When there is neither any doubt as to the meaning of the legislation nor any ambiguity in its application to the facts, then the statutory provision must be applied regardless of its object or purpose. However, the very history of this case with the clear differences of opinion expressed as between the trial judges and the Court of Appeal indicates that for able and experienced legal minds, neither the meaning of the legislation nor its application to the facts is clear. Even if the ambiguity were not apparent, it is significant that in order to determine the clear and plain meaning of the statute it is always appropriate to consider the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act and the intention of Parliament. The Parliamentary intent was to confirm the overriding right of the MNR to collect by garnishment the taxes collected which ought to have been remitted by the debtor company to the MNR. These amounts so collected could be said to belong not to the collecting debtor entities but to the government. In those circumstances the priority granted to the MNR to recover such funds cannot possibly be said to be expropriation without compensation.

The same instrument cannot be both a "security interest" and an "absolute assignment". If an instrument is an absolute assignment, then since it is complete and perfect in itself, there cannot be a residual right remaining with the debtor to recover the assets. Pursuant to the instruments presented in this case the borrower retains the right to redeem the book debts once the debt is paid off. This right of redemption irrefutably demonstrates that the assignment is something less than absolute. A GABD represents a security interest with the legal title being with the lender and the equitable title remaining with the borrower. This conclusion is supported by s. 63 of the Alberta Personal Property Security Act, which stipulates the basis upon which the right of redemption in personal property, including book debts, will be terminated. To conclude that a GABD results in a change of ownership as a result of its absolute nature rather than constituting collateral security for a debt will have serious implications. It could result in a change in the ordering of priorities provided by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Canada Business Corporations Act. Further, it could constitute the means by which an unscrupulous debtor company, knowingly or unknowingly abetted by a creditor company, could so order its affairs that many other bona fide creditors could be adversely affected.

Per Major J. (dissenting): A GABD falls within the definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA. The phrase an "assignment . . . of any kind whatever" is broad enough to encompass the absolute assignments of book debts which are at issue in these appeals. The lending institutions, however, do not fall within the definition of "secured creditor" because they do not hold a security interest "in the property of another person". An assignment passes title and therefore property in the book debts is held by the lending institution and not by the tax debtor. The assignments in each of the three cases involved here all contain language which makes it clear that they are immediate and absolute. The fact that the GABD is referred to as "continuing collateral security" in the instruments does not make the GABD anything less than absolute. While the tax debtor retains an equity of redemption upon an assignment of its book debts, here the value of the loans secured by the book debts far exceeds the value of the debts themselves and there is thus no value in the equity of redemption. Further, an absolute assignment of book debts makes those book debts the property of the assignee, and they remain the property of the assignee until the assignor actually exercises his equitable right to redeem. In determining whether the book debts, once assigned, are the "property" of the assignor or of the assignee, the court must interpret the word in its plain and ordinary sense. The plain and ordinary meaning of "property" is legal title and not a contingent future equitable right to reacquire property which one does not presently hold. In the circumstances of these appeals, a strict reading of the taxation statute is appropriate. In the absence of clear and unequivocal language, there is a presumption that proprietary rights are not to be taken away without provision being made for compensation. In the context of these appeals, the interpretation urged by the MNR would have the effect of expropriating property to which the lender is legally entitled under its security agreement with the tax debtor. The plain and ordinary meaning of the statutory words simply does not bear the strained interpretation of property that, absent the security interest, is the property of another person. In addition to offending the principle that extra words should not be read into a section unless absolutely necessary, this proposed reading attempts to read in wording which can be expressly found in another part of the same section. If there is an ambiguity in the meaning of the word "property", then the specific effect of this section warrants a strict resolution of any ambiguity in favour of the respondent lending institutions.

Per Iacobucci J. (dissenting): While the general principles of statutory interpretation outlined by Cory J. were agreed with, the general assignments of book debts in this case were tantamount to an absolute transfer of property, as found by Major J.

The judgment of La Forest, Cory and McLachlin JJ. was delivered by

I. CORY J. -- At issue on these appeals is whether, on the facts of this case, lending institutions are secured creditors pursuant to the provisions of s. 224 of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63 (ITA) and s. 317 of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-15 (ETA), which are practically identical in their provisions.

II. The facts giving rise to these appeals and the decisions of the court below have been ably set out in the reasons of Justice Major.

Digitized by Google

III. Both the ITA and the ETA provide for the collection of funds due to the federal government by way of income tax deductions from the wages of employees and for the remission of monies owing for the Goods and Services Tax (GST). The sections under review provide for the recovery of monies owing from those who are responsible for the collection and remission of income tax deductions and GST collections by way of garnishment. This system of collection and remission of income tax is exceedingly important. For example, in 1987 some 87 per cent of all personal income tax was collected through employer's deduction and remission.

IV. In the cases under consideration, the company responsible for collection and remission of income tax and GST borrowed money from a lending institution. To secure their indebtedness the debtor companies made a general assignment of book debts (GABD) to the lending institution. If the submissions of the appellant prevail then the Government of Canada will recover the monies which ought to be paid to it by way of employees' income tax or GST. If the respondents are correct in their position, then the lending institutions will retain the funds which have come into their possession as a result of the GABD. Thus the decision in this case will have a very real significance for both the federal government and lending institutions.

V. In essence, s. 224(1.2) provides a form of garnishment enabling the federal government to intercept monies owed to tax debtors. It is not available for the collection of income tax generally, but is limited to the recovery of funds owing by a person or company which has withheld monies from another person, usually an employee, for income tax purposes pursuant to s. 153 ITA and has failed to remit the withheld amounts to the federal government. A similar garnishment remedy is provided by s. 317(3) ETA. It is applicable in circumstances where a company or an individual has failed to remit GST which was collected as required by the provisions of the ETA.

VI. Major J. has concluded that the Alberta Court of Appeal was correct in finding that an assignee of a GABD is not a "secured creditor"within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA or s. 317(3) ETA because the assignee does not hold a security interest "in the property of another person". Rather, the assignee is the owner of those book debts. With respect I cannot agree with that conclusion. However I am in complete agreement with these conclusions:

1.The definition of "security interest" is broad enough to include a general assignment of book debts even where that assignment is absolute.

2.The wording of s. 224(1.2) ITA as amended in 1990 is sufficiently clear and non-equivocal to allow a transfer of property in the garnished funds to the Minister of National Revenue (MNR) and to grant him a priority in circumstances where the balance of the section applies.

The Provisions of the GABD Made in These Cases

VII. It would be helpful first to consider the assignment of book debts made in these cases in order to ascertain the apparent intentions of the parties. The two assignments in which the Treasury Branch was the lender provide:

> THE PRESENT assignment and transfer shall be a continuing collateral security to Treasury Branches for the payment of all and every present and future indebtedness and liability of the undersigned to Treasury Branches. . . . [Emphasis added.]

To a similar effect, the Toronto Dominion assignment reads in part:

PROVIDED and it is hereby distinctly understood and agreed that these presents are and shall be a continuing collateral security to the Bank for the general balance due at any time by the Assignor to the Bank. . . .

PROVIDED ALWAYS and it is hereby distinctly agreed that these presents are and shall be continuing and collateral security to the present and any future indebtedness of the Assignor to the Bank. . . . [Emphasis added.]

VIII. Further, all the assignments limit liability to the extent of the outstanding indebtedness. Thus, if the loan secured by the GABD was repaid the Bank or Treasury Branch would have no further interest in the assignment. The documents themselves refer to the assignment as being a continuing collateral security for the payment of the indebtedness. The clear intention of the parties is that the assignment is given as security for the payment of a debt and upon payment of the debt the GABD is to be of no force or effect. That is to say the lending institution could not, after payment of the debt, make use of the GABD to realise upon any of the book debts of the assignor. In my view since the assignment by its terms can be redeemed by payment of the debt it cannot or at least should not be construed as an absolute assignment.

IX. Neither the lending institutions nor the debtor companies by their actions gave any indication that the respondents were the owners of the book debts. This is demonstrated by the fact that the lending institutions made no efforts whatsoever to realise upon the book debts or in any way to act as "owners" of them until the debtor companies were obviously in severe financial difficulty if not bankrupt. Only then did the lending institutions seek to realise upon their security. Both the wording of the documents and the actions of the parties indicate that they regarded the assignment to be given as collateral security for the indebtedness. In commercial affairs, it is well known that a GABD is indeed a means of granting collateral security for a debt. In my view, so long as the possibility of redemption exists, the GABD remains as collateral security.

X. In light of this customary commercial understanding of a GABD, it may be helpful to review the legislation to determine if, by its wording, it renders a GABD something other than collateral security for a debt and makes the assignee the owner of the book debts.

Pertinent Provisions of the ITA and the ETA and Their History

XI. As Major J. pointed out, prior to 1987 the provisions of the garnishment remedy in the ITA (s. 224(1)) were almost unanimously interpreted by the courts in such a way that a demand made under the section was ineffective to attach any of the assigned debts. The courts held that by the assignment the tax debtor had transferred all its interest in the accounts to the assignee with the result that there was nothing left for the Minister of National Revenue (MNR) to attach by garnishment.

XII. In an attempt to address these decisions, Parliament amended the ITA in 1987 by adding two new subsections. They provided that the MNR could garnish funds owed by a tax debtor to a "secured creditor" and defined the terms "secured creditor" and "security interest". As Major J. observed, there was a divergence of opinion in the provincial courts of appeal as to whether the 1987 amendments permitted the MNR to effectively garnish funds in the hands of an assignee of a GABD.

XIII. In order to further clarify the situation and resolve the differences of opinion in the appellate courts, Parliament again amended the ITA with the apparent aim of granting priority to the MNR. It may be helpful to set out s. 224(1.2) ITA as it now appears following the 1990 amendment:

> (1.2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy Act, any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any law, where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a particular person is or will become, within 90 days, liable to make a payment
> (a) to another person (in this subsection referred to as the "tax debtor") who is liable to pay an amount assessed under subsection 227(10.1) or a similar provision, or
> (b) to a secured creditor who has a right to receive the payment that, but for a security interest in favour of the secured creditor, would be payable to the tax debtor,
> the Minister may, by registered letter or by a letter served personally, require the particular person to pay forthwith, where the moneys are immediately payable, and in any other case, as and when the moneys become payable, the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor or the secured creditor in whole or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under subsection 227(10.1) or a similar provision, and on receipt of that letter by the particular person, the amount of those moneys that is required by that letter to be paid to the Receiver General shall, notwithstanding any security interest in those moneys, become the property of Her Majesty and shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to any such security interest. [Emphasis added.]
> "secured creditor" means a person who has a security interest in the property of another person or who acts for or on behalf of that person with respect to the security interest and includes a trustee appointed under a trust deed relating to a security interest, a receiver or receiver-manager appointed by a secured creditor or by a court on the application of a secured creditor, a sequestrator or any other person performing a similar function;
> "security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a debenture, mortgage, hypothec, lien, pledge, charge, deemed or actual trust, assignment or encumbrance of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for;

XIV. The question then is how should these sections be interpreted. At the outset it should be remembered that Parliament was responding to the division of opinion in the appellate courts and attempting to make it clear that the MNR could undertake garnishment procedure in those situations where a GABD has been made. The appropriate principles to be considered in interpreting taxation legislation were clearly set out in Friesen v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 62 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 103, at pp. 112-14. There the principles were summarized in these words:

C. Principles of Interpretation

> The central question on this appeal of whether the appellant is entitled to take advantage of the inventory valuation method in s. 10 of the Act involves a careful examination of the wording of the provisions of the Act and a consideration of the proper interpretation of these sections in the light of the basic structure of the Canadian taxation scheme which is established in the Income Tax Act.
> In interpreting sections of the Income Tax Act, the correct approach, as set out by Estey J. in Stubart Investments Ltd. v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1984] 1 S.C.R. 536, is to apply the plain meaning rule. Estey J. at p. 578 relied on the following passage from E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87:

Digitized by Google

> Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.
> The principle that the plain meaning of the relevant sections of the Income Tax Act is to prevail unless the transaction is a sham has recently been affirmed by this Court in Canada v. Antosko, 1994 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 312. Iacobucci J., writing for the Court, held at pp. 326-27 that:
> While it is true that the courts must view discrete sections of the Income Tax Act in light of the other provisions of the Act and of the purpose of the legislation, and that they must analyze a given transaction in the context of economic and commercial reality, such techniques cannot alter the result where the words of the statute are clear and plain and where the legal and practical effect of the transaction is undisputed: Mattabi Mines Ltd. v. Ontario (Minister of Revenue), 1988 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 175, at p. 194; see also Symes v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 695.
> I accept the following comments on the Antosko case in P. W. Hogg and J. E. Magee, Principles of Canadian Income Tax Law (1995), Section 22.3(c) "Strict and purposive interpretation", at pp. 453-54:
> It would introduce intolerable uncertainty into the Income Tax Act if clear language in a detailed provision of the Act were to be qualified by unexpressed exceptions derived from a court's view of the object and purpose of the provision. . . . (The Antosko case) is simply a recognition that "object and purpose" can play only a limited role in the interpretation of a statute that is as precise and detailed as the Income Tax Act. When a provision is couched in specific language that admits of no doubt or ambiguity in its application to the facts, then the provision must be applied regardless of its object and purpose. Only when the statutory language admits of some doubt or ambiguity in its application to the facts is it useful to resort to the object and purpose of the provision.

XV. Thus, when there is neither any doubt as to the meaning of the legislation nor any ambiguity in its application to the facts then the statutory provision must be applied regardless of its object or purpose. I recognize that agile legal minds could probably find an ambiguity in as simple a request as "close the door please" and most certainly in even the shortest and clearest of the ten commandments. However, the very history of this case with the clear differences of opinion expressed as between the trial judges and the Court of Appeal of Alberta indicates that for able and experienced legal minds, neither the meaning of the legislation nor its application to the facts is clear. It would therefore seem to be appropriate to consider the object and purpose of the legislation. Even if the ambiguity were not apparent, it is significant that in order to determine the clear and plain meaning of the statute it is always appropriate to consider the "scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament". What then was Parliament's intention in enacting the 1990 legislation?

The Purpose of the Legislation

XVI. There can be no doubt of the importance of levying taxation. The ITA entrusts to employers the duty of deducting income tax from the wages of employees and remitting it on their behalf. Similarly the ETA imposes on those who provide goods and services to others the duty to collect and remit the GST which is payable. In essence, companies collect taxes which they hold in trust for the government.

XVII. The purpose of the 1987 legislation, which I think is even more appropriately applied to the 1990 legislation, was very clearly and forcefully set forth in Pembina on the Red Development Corp. v. Triman Industries Ltd., 1991 CanLII 2699 (MB CA), [1991] 6 W.W.R. 481 (Man. C.A.). There, at pp. 488-89, Scott C.J.M. observed:

> To determine the dominant characteristic of the legislation, it is important to know the governmental policy behind the section. The tax debtor's bank is in the best position to know its customer and to structure its business arrangements accordingly. Revenue Canada, on the other hand, does not have the same opportunity to become acquainted with the affairs of the tax debtor or its creditors. It must therefore rely solely on the provisions of the legislation to mandate the employer to remit the employee income tax deductions as required by the [Income Tax] Act, and to establish its collectability in the event of default.
> The purpose of the Act is not only to levy tax, but to collect it. There is a strong public duty on employers to remit; indeed, this is central to the scheme of self-assessment under the Act.

Further, Lyon J.A., dissenting in the result, stated at pp. 506-7:

> One must always remember that the withholding tax or source deduction to which s. 224 applies is at the heart of the collection procedures for personal income taxation in Canada. Indeed, if one makes a calculation from the statistics reported in "Taxation Statistics, 1987," a publication of Revenue Canada Taxation, catalogue No. RV-1987, one finds that 87 per cent of all personal income taxes paid in Canada are collected by source deductions. It can thus be seen that Parliament in passing s. 224(1.2) made it as all-encompassing as it is in > order to ensure its continued viability. No other system is so crucial to the overall collection procedure adopted by the Crown. Parliament clearly meant to protect this system. Using the employer as a tax collector requires such extra protection in cases such as the one at bar where the employer converts the withheld tax money to its own purposes. Understandably, that conversion cannot be countenanced if the integrity of that system is to be preserved. Parliament, therefore, acting within its constitutional authority, has taken this extraordinary remedy to protect a major collection source.

> In my opinion it was intended by Parliament that anyone who, in the ordinary course of business, made credit arrangements with a tax debtor involving assignments of accounts receivable, did so subject to the overriding right of the Crown to satisfy the primary obligations of the tax debtor to collect and remit taxes withheld from its employees. The words of the statute can mean nothing less. The section is cast in the broadest of possible terms precisely because it was meant to interfere with and interrupt payments under such assignments and divert them to meet this statutory obligation. I do not know what other words Parliament could use to make its overriding intention and claim more clear.

XVIII. These statements can be applied even more forcefully to the 1990 amendments. The Parliamentary intent was to confirm the overriding right of the MNR to collect by garnishment the taxes collected which ought to have been remitted by the debtor company to the MNR.

What is the Nature of a General Assignment of Book Debts?

XIX. Like Major J., I am of the view that a GABD is a form of security for a loan which is always subject to the right of the debtor to redeem. It will be remembered that s. 224(1.3) defines the "security interest" in these words:

> "security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a debenture, mortgage, hypothec, lien, pledge, charge, deemed or actual trust, assignment or encumbrance of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for;

This definition encompasses the general assignments of book debts which are at issue in these appeals. However, I cannot agree with Major J.'s conclusion that the creditors are not secured creditors. I find it difficult, indeed impossible, to conclude that the same document can be both a security interest and an absolute assignment. The same document cannot, simultaneously, embrace two such conflicting concepts.

XX. Basically, security is something which is given to ensure the repayment of a loan. Black's Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1990), at p. 1357, gives a clear definition of a "security interest" in these terms:

> The term "security interest" means any interest in property acquired by contract for the purpose of securing payment or performance of an obligation or indemnifying against loss or liability. A security interest exists at any time, (A) if, at such time, the property is in existence and the interest has become protected under local law against a subsequent judgment lien arising out of an unsecured obligation, and (B) to the extent that, at such time, the holder has parted with money or money's worth.

XXI. This definition is consistent with that set out in the ITA. It is in sharp contrast to the definition of the word "absolute" set out in the same source at p. 9 in these terms:

> Complete; perfect; final, without any condition or incumbrance; as an absolute bond (simplex obligatio) in distinction from a conditional bond. Unconditional; complete and perfect in itself; without relation to or dependence on other things or persons.

XXII. These definitions are, in my view, correct. If that is the case, then it can be seen that the same instrument cannot be both a "security interest" and an "absolute assignment". If an instrument is an absolute assignment, then since it is complete and perfect in itself, there cannot be a residual right remaining with the debtor to recover the assets. By definition, a complete and perfect assignment cannot recognize the concept of an equity of redemption. An absolute assignment cannot function as a means of "securing" the payment of a debt since there would be no basis for the debtor to recover that which has been absolutely assigned. An absolute assignment is irrevocable. To say that the same instrument can operate both as an absolute assignment and as a security interest is to simultaneously put forward two incompatible positions. The two conflicting concepts cannot live together in the same document.

Cases Which Have Considered the Nature of a General Assignment of Book Debts

XXIII. Major J. expressed the opinion that it is "well-established law" that a GABD, such as those in issue, has the effect of transferring all title and ownership in the property assigned so that they can no longer be considered to be the property of the assignor. Yet ordinarily, in the world of commerce, a GABD is considered to be a security interest. As a security interest, it simply cannot transfer all "right, title and ownership in and to the property assigned". This conclusion has found support in other cases.

XXIV. In Thermo King Corp. v. Provincial Bank of Canada (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 369 (C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1982] 1 S.C.R. xi, Wilson J.A. (as she then was) held, for a unanimous court, that a GABD is a security document. In that case she was required to consider an instrument which was very similar if not identical to those presented in these appeals. At p. 381 she concluded:

> While these provisions appear on their face to constitute the assignor a trustee for the bank of any payments it receives from its customers and to permit the bank to appropriate them at will, whether or not any debt is then due to the bank by the assignor, this seems to be quite incompatible with the nature of the instrument as a collateral security. [Emphasis in original.]

Similarly, in Bonavista (Town) v. Atlantic Technologists Ltd. reflex, (1994), 117 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 19, Osborn J. considered a GABD. He wrote (at p. 24):

> One may ask, if the assignment is absolute to the point of ownership, why does it specifically give to the Bank the power to collect or dispose of the debts. Are not such powers incidents of ownership? Similarly, if the assignment is absolute, what remaining rights reside in the customer that may be "extinguished" if the Bank buys the accounts at a sale?
> In my view, the assignment contemplates that it will operate as a security interest. It vests in the Bank title to the debts owed to Atlantic, but such vesting is for the purpose of security; it is not to transfer ownership, as that term is commonly understood . . . . The Bank is a "secured creditor". The nature of the interest held by the Bank, even if considered to be an absolute assignment, cannot be divorced from the circumstances in which it arose. The commercial reality is that the Bank held a security interest in the property of Atlantic. Atlantic transferred its receivable to the Bank to secure payment of money Atlantic owed to the Bank. Once Atlantic paid off the Bank, it was entitled, not to a reassignment of the debt, but, by the wording of the assignment, "to the cancellation hereof". The Bank was a secured creditor holding a security interest. [Emphasis added.]

XXV. I agree with the reasoning expressed in these cases. As well, I would note that the Newfoundland Court of Appeal in Bank of Montreal v. Baird (1979), 33 C.B.R. (N.S.) 256, leave to appeal refused, [1980] 1 S.C.R. v, dealt with a GABD as a security interest. Further, the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in R.V. Demmings & Co. v. Caldwell Construction Co. (1955), 4 D.L.R. (2d) 465, found that a bank holding a GABD was a secured creditor, subject to an equity of redemption in the assignor company.

XXVI. I also find support for this conclusion from the reasoning in cases which considered a situation similar to that created by a GABD. These cases arise when a borrower grants to a lending institution a fixed charge or mortgage based upon the borrower's present and future stock-in-trade and inventory but reserves to the borrower the right to make sales of the stock-in-trade and inventory in the ordinary course of business.

XXVII. In R. in Right of B.C. v. F.B.D.B. 1987 CanLII 156 (BC CA), (1987), 17 B.C.L.R. (2d) 273, McLachlin J.A. (as she then was), on behalf of the majority of the Court of Appeal, considered the manner in which courts have dealt with such instruments and in so doing, reached the following conclusions at p. 303:

> Generally speaking, the authorities draw a clear distinction between fixed and floating charges, recognizing nothing between and taking the view that any charge which permits dealing in the ordinary course of business must be regarded as floating. . . .

XXVIII. She then went on, at pp. 303-4, to discuss the conceptual possibility of a fixed charge on stock-in-trade coupled with a licence to deal in those goods, a situation analogous to that which the lending institutions claim exists under a GABD. She noted at p. 305:

> The generally accepted view . . . is that such a charge should be regarded as floating rather than fixed because it involves no final and irrevocable appropriation of property to the creditor.

She also observed that the English courts have specifically rejected the possibility of an absolute assignment being coupled with a licence to deal (at pp. 305-6):

> . . . this theory was soon rejected by the English courts, as is seen from the comments of Lord Buckley in Evans v. Rival Granite Quarries Ltd., [1910] 2 K.B. 979 at 999 (C.A.):
> A floating security is not a future security; it is a present security, which presently affects all the assets of the company expressed to be included in it. On the other hand, it is not a specific security; the holder cannot affirm that the assets are specifically mortgaged to him. The assets are mortgaged in such a way that the mortgagor can deal with them without the concurrence of the mortgagee. A floating security is not a specific mortgage of the assets, plus a licence to the mortgagor to dispose of them in the course of his business, but is a floating mortgage applying to every item comprised in the security, but not specifically affecting any item until some event occurs or some act on the part of the mortgagee is done which causes it to crystallize into a fixed security. [Emphasis added by McLachlin J.A.]

XXIX. In determining whether a particular charge over book debts is fixed or floating, McLachlin J.A. referred (at p. 307) to R. A. Pearce in "Fixed Charges over Book Debts", [1987] J. Bus. L. 18, at p. 29:

> . . . the essential characteristic for deciding whether a charge of book debts is fixed or floating is whether the book debts can be disposed of free from the charge; if they can, the charge is a floating charge, otherwise it is a fixed charge.
> Modern authorities have accepted the either-or approach to fixed and floating charges upon which the courts settled in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. For example, they accept the conclusion that a fixed charge on book debts is inconsistent with the assignor having the freedom to deal with proceeds in the course of his business: see Siebe Gorman & Co. v. Barclays Bank Ltd., [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 143 (Ch. D.); Re Armagh Shoes Ltd., [1982] N.I. 59 (Ch. D.); Re Keenan Bros. Ltd. (1985), 5 I.L.R.M. 641 (S.C.). In Great Lakes Petroleum Co. v. Border Cities Oil Ltd., [1934] O.R. 244, [1934] 2 D.L.R. 743 (C.A.), an assignment of book accounts which permitted the debtor to continue to "collect, get in, and deal with said debts, accounts, claims, moneys, and choses in action in the ordinary course of the business" was held to be a floating charge. The same result obtained in R. v. Lega Fabricating Ltd. 1980 CanLII 641 (BC SC), (1980), 22 B.C.L.R. 145 (S.C.).

She indicated that the sole exception to this rule appeared to be the case of Evans Coleman and Evans Ltd. v. R.A. Nelson Construction Ltd. reflex, (1958), 27 W.W.R. 38 (B.C.C.A.), cited by Major J. in his reasons. Significantly she went on to observe at p. 307:

> Why did the courts reject the concept of a fixed charge with a licence to deal? In doing so, they undeniably limited the freedom of debtor and creditor to contract as they might choose in an age when freedom of contract was paramount. The answer, it may be suggested, lies in the effects which recognition of such a concept would have upon the rights of third parties and general commercial activity, as well as the perceived injustice of allowing the debtor to trade freely while remaining immune from the normal incidents of legal process. As Fletcher-Moulton L.J. put it in Evans v. Rival Granite Quarries Ltd., supra (p. 995):

> The results of such a contention are astonishing; it means that by giving such a debenture a company retains the full right of trading with untied hands and at the same time obtains immunity from the operation of all processes of law. I should be slow to come to the conclusion that such an anomaly was recognized by the law. Nor do I think that it is. A consideration of the effect of floating charges and of the fact that the freedom of the company to carry on its business is not based on special words creating that freedom, but on the nature of the charge itself, leads me to the conclusion that the right of the company to carry on its business as it wills pending the enforcement of the security must mean that it may carry it on in accordance with law, including a liability to the processes of the law if it does not pay its debts.

Finally, at p. 309, McLachlin J.A. concluded:

> In general, the courts have been unwilling to characterize charges which permit the debtor to deal with his property in the ordinary course of business as fixed charges with licenses to sell. Rather, the courts have characterized such charges as floating, with the result that they give the chargeholder no priority over third parties prior to crystallization. . . . In short, the answer to the question of whether the courts have recognized a fixed charge subject to a licence to sell in the ordinary course of business is no . . . .

The Significance of the Equity of Redemption

XXX. For the resolution of these appeals, it is essential that there be a clear recognition of the fundamental difference between an absolute and a conditional assignment of book debts. In an absolute assignment, all interests are transferred and no property remains in the hands of the assignor. It is, simply, a sale of the book debts of the company. This is the basis of the business of factoring. Factoring is described in R. Burgess, Corporate Finance Law (2nd ed. 1992), at p. 100, in this manner:

> "Factoring is a legal relationship between a financial institution (the factor) and a business concern (the client) selling goods or providing services to trade customers (the customers) whereby the factor purchases the client's book debts either with or without recourse to the client and administers the client's sales ledger."

From this definition it is apparent that factoring arrangements involve:

(1) the purchase of the client's book debts;

(2)the taking over and administration of the client's sales ledger and credit control functions; and

(3)the provision to the client of finance which will be a specified percentage of the nominal value of the debts.

The author goes on (at p. 101) to consider the requirements for an assignment of book debts under English law and observes that to be effective the assignment must be absolute. The text defines "absolute", in these terms:

> The ordinary legal meaning of "absolute" is unconditional, so, for an assignment to be absolute, it must not be conditional in any way; specifically, it must not purport to be by way of charge only.

Digitized by Google

XXXI. A factoring of accounts receivable is based upon an absolute assignment of them. It is in effect a sale by a company of its accounts receivable at a discounted value to the factoring company for immediate consideration. In my view, s. 224 ITA does protect those engaged in the factoring business and those lending institutions that have succeeded in perfecting their security interest prior to any intervention by the MNR. However, I cannot accept the submission that Parliament, by this section, intended to create an interest which was both conditional as a security interest and at the same time unconditional as an absolute assignment. There cannot have been an intent to combine such incompatible concepts.

XXXII. Clearly a GABD does not meet the standard required for a factoring arrangement which requires an absolute transfer of the proprietary interest of the assignor in the book debts. Pursuant to the instruments presented in this case the borrower retains the right to redeem the book debts once the debt is paid off. This right of redemption irrefutably demonstrates that the assignment is something less than absolute.

XXXIII. I agree with the MNR that what the actual equity of the borrower in the book debts may be from time to time is irrelevant for the purpose of determining the legal effect of the equity of redemption. It would be absurd if a company were to fluctuate between having title and not having title to their book debts based on their ratio of debt to assets. This is particularly true of a company engaged in a seasonal business. Yet if a GABD is treated as an absolute assignment, this can be the only result, as the bank is limited to recovering the amount of the loan. Since the bank could not recover any book debts if the company had a surplus in their account, the book debts would belong to the company. When there was a deficit, some or all of the book debts would belong to the bank. Such a fluctuating state of affairs is inconsistent with the certainty required in commercial matters. I believe that the correct view is that a GABD represents a security interest with the legal title being with the lender and the equitable title remaining with the borrower. This is supported both by the jurisprudence and by the wording of the section.

XXXIV. This Court, in Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061, interpreted "property of a bankrupt" in what is now s. 67 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, as including property subject to a security interest, even when the legal title to the property is transferred to the security holder. This indicates that the concept of "property" is not so narrow as to encompass only legal title. It would be inconsistent to hold in this case that a transfer of legal title by means of a GABD is an absolute transfer when it has already been held in another that an equity of redemption is a property interest which remains with the borrower.

XXXV. The recent case of Canada v. National Bank of Canada, 1993 CanLII 2937 (FC), [1993] 2 F.C. 206, applied Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), supra, to provide an appropriate answer to the question as to whether or not a borrower under a GABD retains a property interest in the book debts. Rothstein J. held (at pp. 224-25):

> Based on the reasoning of Houlden J. in Re Broydon Printers, supra, as approved by Lamer J. in Federal Business Development Bank, supra, the right of redemption of the book debts, in my view, comes within the definition of "property" in the Bankruptcy Act. As such, the reasoning of Lamer J. in Federal Business Development Bank would apply and the book debts would constitute "property of the bankrupt" for purposes of subsection 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act.

In summary, an assignment cannot be both absolute and yet leave an equity of redemption in the form of the right to redeem with the assignor. The retention of an equity of redemption is consistent with a security interest and not with an absolute assignment. A GABD simply cannot constitute an absolute transfer of property.

XXXVI. This conclusion is supported by s. 63 of the Alberta Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05, which stipulates the basis upon which the right of redemption in personal property, including book debts, will be terminated. There must be either a disposition of the collateral by the secured party or an irrevocable election made by the secured party creditor under s. 62 of the Act to take the collateral. In the absence of these events, the debtor has certain rights under the section to redeem the collateral. The facts presented on these appeals do not disclose whether the lending institutions prior to receiving notice from the MNR, sold or transferred the book debts, or met the requisite conditions in order to be deemed irrevocably to have taken the collateral. If they did not, it would appear that the debtor companies still retained a right of redemption under the statute.

XXXVII. I would further add that to conclude that a GABD results in a change of ownership as a result of its absolute nature rather than constituting collateral security for a debt will have serious implications. It could, for example, result in a change in the ordering of priorities provided by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-36, and the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-44. Further, it could constitute the means by which an unscrupulous debtor company, knowingly or unknowingly abetted by a creditor company, could so order its affairs that many other bona fide creditors could be adversely affected.

Summary

XXXVIII. In Friesen, supra, it was held that the words of the Income Tax Act should be given their plain and ordinary meaning in accordance with the structure and purpose of the Act. It is clear that in enacting the sections of the ITA and ETA under consideration Parliament was attempting to ensure the priority of the claim of the MNR over that of other creditors. The primary task of collecting and remitting taxes and contributions under both Acts rests with those who are employers and those who sell goods and services. These amounts so collected could be said to belong not to the collecting debtor entities but to the government. In a sense the funds collected but not remitted might be considered to be held in a form of trust since the entities that have collected these funds are not in any circumstances entitled to retain them. Rather, they must remit the funds. In those circumstances the priority granted to the MNR to recover such funds cannot possibly be said to be expropriation without compensation.

XXXIX. In an effort to ensure the recovery of these amounts collected for the MNR, Parliament has endeavoured to ensure the priority of the claims of the MNR to these funds over other creditors. The majority of the courts that have considered this issue since the 1990 amendment have concluded that Parliament has succeeded in achieving this aim: see: TransGas Ltd. v. Mid-Plains Contractors Ltd. 1993 CanLII 4413 (SK CA), (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 238 (Sask. C.A.), aff'd 1994 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 753; Berg v. Parker Pacific Equipment Sales, reflex, [1991] 1 C.T.C. 442 (B.C.S.C.); Lundrigans Ltd. (Receivership) v. Bank of Montreal reflex, (1993), 110 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 91 (Nfld. T.D.); Bonavista (Town) v. Atlantic Technologists Ltd., supra, as well as two of the trial decisions in this case on appeal.

XL. I am in agreement with Major J. that a GABD is a security interest and as well that "secured creditor" excludes those individuals who own property absolutely. However I cannot agree that a GABD constitutes an absolute assignment so that the assignee becomes the owner of the book debts. The two concepts in the same instrument are incompatible and an impossible contradiction. Quite simply, a GABD cannot be an absolute assignment since by its very nature it is a security interest.

XLI. In drafting the language of the sections it must be assumed that Parliament sought carefully to achieve its purpose, and that it did not intend to create an absurdity or a redundancy. My position can be summarized in this manner:

(i) The definitions of a "security interest" and a "secured creditor" cannot be contradictory. Parliament cannot have intended to create definitions which overlap and contradict each other with the result that the same instrument can, at the same time, be both a "security interest" and not a "security interest". This is not to say that all assignments are "security interests". Rather it is simply that an instrument, once having been defined as a "security interest", cannot also be an absolute assignment. By definition, an absolute assignment cannot be a "security interest".

(ii) GABDs are "security interests" and not absolute assignments because they:

(a) meet the definition of "security interests" as set out in s. 224(1.3) ITA;
(b) are defined as collateral security on their face;
(c) are treated as security for a loan on the part of the parties involved;
(d) have been defined by this Court as including an equity of redemption, and thus provide a property interest for the borrower. As a result they cannot be absolute;
(e) cannot be simultaneously a security interest and an absolute assignment;
(f) to recognize GABDs as absolute assignments would frustrate the purpose of several other statutes.

(iii) "secured creditor" is meant to exclude absolute owners. By definition, one cannot be a secured creditor and at the same time an owner of the security. An absolute assignee would be an owner of the book debts as is, for example, a factor. Parliament by this section has excluded those financial institutions engaged in factoring from the operation of the section, together with those financial institutions who have perfected their security interest by assuming ownership. There is no intention manifested by the 1990 amendment to accord any priority to holders of GABDs.

Disposition

XLII. I would allow the appeals, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal and confirm the priority of the MNR, and direct that the MNR recover in all three cases in the manner directed by the trial judge in The Queen v. Toronto-Dominion Bank. The MNR should have his costs throughout.

The following are the reasons delivered by

I. IACOBUCCI J. (dissenting) -- While I agree with the general principles of statutory interpretation outlined by my colleague Justice Cory, I agree with Justice Major that the general assignments of book debts in this case were tantamount to an absolute transfer of property. Accordingly, I would dispose of the appeals in the manner proposed by Major J.

The following are the reasons delivered by

MAJOR J. (dissenting) --

I. Introduction

II. These are appeals from a decision of the Court of Appeal of Alberta involving three cases. In all cases Her Majesty in Right of Canada as represented by the Minister of National Revenue (the "MNR") is a party. Alberta Treasury Branches is a party in two of the cases and the Toronto-Dominion Bank is the other party. Each appeal involves a priorities contest between the MNR's garnishee summons, and a general assignment of book debts ("GABD") to the lending institutions.

III. Section 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, as amended in 1990, S.C. 1990, c. 34, s. 1, provides a form of garnishment which enables the MNR in certain circumstances to intercept monies owed to tax debtors. This form of garnishment is not available for the collection of income tax debts generally. It is limited to the collection of amounts owing by a person who has withheld, or should have withheld, monies from another under s. 153 of the Income Tax Act and who has failed to remit the withheld amounts. An identical garnishment remedy, provided by the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15, s. 317(3), applies where a person has failed to remit GST which was, or ought to have been, collected from other persons.

IV. The issue in these appeals is whether the sections apply to give the MNR a priority over creditors who have received an absolute assignment of book debts from the tax debtor. The resolution of the appeals turns on the definition of "secured creditor", which requires the holding of a security interest in the "property of another person".

V. In my opinion, the sections do not grant the MNR a priority over a creditor who holds an assignment of book debts. As a matter of law, such a creditor owns the book debts in question and thus cannot be said to have a security interest in the property of another person.

VI. This result is dictated by the common law as well as basic principles of the interpretation of the Income Tax Act. The wording of the sections is simply not sufficiently clear and unambiguous to authorize the expropriation, without compensation, of a proprietary interest from the innocent holder of the assignment of the book debts.

II. Facts

VII. The first case arose in 1987 from a loan made by the respondent, Alberta Treasury Branches, to Country Inns Inc., an Alberta hotel operator. The borrowed money was secured in part by a general assignment of book debts. Country Inns Inc. was in arrears to the appellant MNR for $33,312.67 in unremitted GST, plus interest and penalties. Zurich Canada owed Country Inns Inc. $15,000 while Zurich Insurance Company was alleged to owe $95,000.

VIII. In June 1992, the MNR served requirements to pay under s. 317(3) of the Excise Tax Act on Zurich Canada and Zurich Insurance Company, and all other possible debtors. After Country Inns Inc. made an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, the trustee estimated the realization of the assets of the estate would leave a shortfall to the respondent Alberta Treasury Branches, which was owed in excess of $6,000,000. Forsyth J. of the Court of Queen's Bench, in an application to determine priorities, held that the MNR had priority by virtue of the provisions of the Excise Tax Act: 1992 CanLII 6182 (AB QB), (1992), 5 Alta. L.R. (3d) 141.

IX. In the second case, Pigott Project Management Ltd. contracted with Land-Rock Resources Ltd. for excavation work on the Old Man River Dam spillway. In 1989, Land-Rock borrowed monies from the respondent Alberta Treasury Branches and granted it a general assignment of book debts. After Land-Rock completed the contract work, Pigott held $161,821.77 in contract holdback funds. These funds were claimed by various creditors of Land-Rock, including the appellant MNR, to whom Land-Rock was indebted for unremitted employee source deductions, interests and penalties.

X. In 1991, the MNR served two requirements to pay on Pigott, under s. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, for almost $600,000. On an application to determine priority to the monies in question, Master Waller of the Court of Queen's Bench decided the respondent Alberta Treasury Branches had priority through its general assignment of book debts. An appeal to Hunt J. was dismissed: 1993 CanLII 7052 (AB QB), (1993), 9 Alta. L.R. (3d) 349.

XI. In the third case, Bodor Drilling Ltd. operated a drilling company which borrowed monies from the respondent Toronto-Dominion Bank. The borrowed money was secured in part by a general assignment of book debts. Bodor owed the appellant MNR $83,325.19, in unremitted GST, interest and penalties.

XII. In March 1992, the MNR served requirements to pay under s. 317(3) of the Excise Tax Act on the trade debtors of Bodor. Another of Bodor's creditors successfully filed a petition under the Bankruptcy Act to have Bodor declared a bankrupt. Bodor was indebted to the respondent Toronto-Dominion Bank in the amount of $266,331.12. In an application to determine priority, MacLeod J. of the Court of Queen's Bench held that the MNR had priority under the provisions of the Excise Tax Act.

XIII. All three cases were appealed to the Alberta Court of Appeal. It held that in each case the lending institution had priority over the MNR: 1994 ABCA 11 (CanLII), (1994), 16 Alta. L.R. (3d) 1.

III. Analysis

XIV. Before 1987, the primary garnishment remedy in the Income Tax Act was provided by s. 224(1), which stated:

> 224. (1) Where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a person is or will be, within 90 days, liable to make a payment to another person who is liable to make a payment under this Act (in this section referred to as the "tax debtor"), he may, by registered letter or by a letter served personally, require that person to pay forthwith ... the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor in whole or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under this Act.

XV. Where a tax debtor had assigned its debts to another party as part of a security arrangement, courts were virtually unanimous in finding that a demand under s. 224(1) was ineffective to attach any of the assigned debts. The courts held that, by the assignment, the tax debtor had transferred its interest in its accounts to the assignee, leaving nothing for the MNR's garnishment to attach. See: Royal Bank of Canada v. R. (1984), 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 198 (F.C.T.D.), at pp. 210-13, aff'd (1986), 60 C.B.R. (N.S.) 125 (F.C.A.).

XVI. Parliament amended the Income Tax Act in 1987 (S.C. 1987, c. 46, s. 66) and added two additional subsections (ss. 224(1.2) and (1.3)). Sections 317(3) and (4) were also added to the Excise Tax Act. For the purposes of the issue raised in these appeals the wording of the sections in the Excise Tax Act is identical to that of the Income Tax Act. For the sake of convenience I will refer to the sections of the Income Tax Act.

XVII. Section 224(1.2) provided that the MNR could garnish funds owed to a tax debtor or to a "secured creditor". Section 224(1.3) provided, inter alia, definitions of "secured creditor" and a "security interest":

> (1.2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy Act, any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any law, where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a particular person is or will become, within 90 days, liable to make a payment
> (a) to another person who is liable to pay an amount assessed under subsection 227(10.1) or a similar provision, or to a legal representative of that other person (each of whom is in this subsection referred to as the "tax debtor"), or
> (b) to a secured creditor who has a right to receive the payment that, but for a security interest in favour of the secured creditor, would be payable to the tax debtor,
> the Minister may, by registered letter or by a letter served personally, require the particular person to pay forthwith, where the moneys are immediately payable, and in any other case, as and when the moneys become payable, the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor or the secured creditor in whole in or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under subsection 227(10.1) or a similar provision.
> "secured creditor" means a person who has a security interest in the property of another person or who acts for or on behalf of that person with respect to the security interest and includes a trustee appointed under a trust deed relating to a security interest, a receiver or receiver-manager appointed by a secured creditor or by a court on the application of a secured creditor, a sequestrator, or any other person performing a similar function;
> "security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a debenture, mortgage, hypothec, lien, pledge, charge, deemed or actual trust, assignment or encumbrance of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for;

XVIII. The operation of the 1987 version of s. 224(1.2) as against the holder of a GABD was considered by courts in Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Nova Scotia.

XIX. In Alberta, in Lloyds Bank of Canada v. International Warranty Co. 1989 CanLII 3035 (AB QB), (1989), 64 Alta. L.R. (2d) 340 (Q.B.), rev'd 1989 ABCA 155 (CanLII), (1989), 68 Alta. L.R. (2d) 356 (C.A.), McDonald J. held that the new definition of "security interest" was broad enough to include monies which were equitably assigned by a tax debtor to a bank (at pp. 352-53):

> ...the definition of "security interest" is so broad as to include moneys which have been equitably assigned by the tax debtor to, for example, a bank. The ownership by the bank of the funds that are the subject of the assignment constitutes an "interest in property". That interest in property is one which "secures payment" of the "obligation" of the tax debtor.... The provision of such security is the very purpose of the assignment of book debts. Moreover, the bank's interest is one "created by or arising out of [an] assignment...of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising..."

As a result, he held that the MNR obtained priority to the garnished funds over the claim of Lloyds Bank as the assignee of the book debts.

XX. The Alberta Court of Appeal reversed the trial decision in Lloyds Bank but on other grounds. Relying on its decisions in Re Lamarre; University of Calgary v. Morrison, 1978 ALTASCAD 50 (CanLII), [1978] 2 W.W.R. 465, and Attorney General of Canada v. Royal Bank of Canada, 1978 ALTASCAD 354 (CanLII), [1979] 1 W.W.R. 479, the Court of Appeal held that the provisions of s. 224(1.2) provided at most for a form of extra-judicial attachment which could bring the funds into the custody of the MNR. The court held that the section fell short of effecting a transfer of property in the funds or establishing the priority of the MNR's claim. It concluded (at p. 362) that "[s]omething further is required to accomplish either purpose".

XXI. The decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal in Lloyds Bank was followed by the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Pembina on the Red Development Corp. v. Triman Industries Ltd., 1991 CanLII 2699 (MB CA), [1991] 6 W.W.R. 481, and the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Concorde International Travel Inc. v. T.I. Travel Services (B.C.) Inc. 1990 CanLII 1485 (BC CA), (1990), 72 D.L.R. (4th) 405. In the B.C. decision, Hinkson J.A. referred to the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal in Lloyds Bank and stated at p. 409:

> In my opinion, s. 224 styled as it is "Garnishment" deals in s-ss. (1) and (1.2) with the mechanics of garnishment. The Minister in serving a demand pursuant to that section must be proceeding upon the basis that he asserts a tax debtor's liability to him. That justified garnishing the funds in the hands of a creditor of the tax debtor. But, I am unable to see in that section any provision that would have the effect of transferring the property in the funds to the Minister or establishing a priority of Revenue Canada's claim. That was the point dealt with by the Alberta Court of Appeal. [Emphasis added.]

XXII. To the opposite effect are decisions by courts in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia: Royal Bank of Canada v. Saskatchewan Power Corp., reflex, [1991] 1 W.W.R. 1 (Sask. C.A.), aff'g reflex, [1990] 2 W.W.R. 655 (Sask. Q.B.) and Touche Ross Ltd. v. M.N.R. 1990 CanLII 2606 (NS SC), (1990), 71 D.L.R. (4th) 648 (N.S.S.C.T.D.).

XXIII. Apparently in order to deal with the competing lines of authority as to whether s. 224(1.2) was sufficient to grant a priority to the MNR, Parliament amended the section in 1990 by adding the following to the end of the section:

> ...and on receipt of that letter [i.e. the garnishment summons] by the particular person, the amount of those moneys that is required by that letter, to be paid to the Receiver General shall, notwithstanding any security interest in those moneys, become the property of Her Majesty and shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to any such security interest.

XXIV. This 1990 amendment was made to both the Income Tax Act and the relevant provisions of the Excise Tax Act. The three trial decisions in the cases at issue in these appeals are principally concerned with the issue of whether this amendment constituted the "something further" which Lloyds Bank had held was necessary to transfer the property interest in the funds to the MNR or to grant a priority to the MNR.

XXV. Two judges of the Court of Queen's bench held that the 1990 amendments did constitute the "something further" and that as a result the MNR gained priority over the book debts to the lending institutions in question. Forsyth J. based his decision expressly on the wording of the 1990 amendment and held that it was sufficiently explicit. In addition to the 1990 amendments, MacLeod J. placed reliance on the finding of McDonald J. in Lloyds Bank that a GABD falls within the definition of a security interest in s. 224(1.3).

XXVI. In the third case, the Master in Chambers held that the 1990 amendments were still not sufficiently broadly worded to allow Revenue Canada to attach monies in which the tax debtor has no interest by virtue of an absolute assignment. Hunt J. on appeal agreed with his conclusion. She relied on a perceived ambiguity in the definition of security interest, stating at pp. 360-61:

> I am of the view, moreover, that it is not clear whether the modifying provisions at the end of the definition of "security interest" (the words "of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for") are meant to apply to each of the enumerated types of interests or instruments (debenture, mortgage, assignment, etc.) or whether these words are meant only to modify the term "encumbrance". McDonald, J. [in Lloyds Bank, supra] assumed the former to be the case, but in my view the meaning is not without doubt. There is a third way of reading the modifying words at the end, namely that the words "of any kind whatever" describe "encumbrance", with the balance of the words applying to each of the listed types of interests. The words "of any kind whatever" might also be taken to apply to assignments and encumbrances. Were this provision more clear, it would be easier to conclude that Parliament meant to include all types of assignments, including unconditional assignments, in the definition. This would make it plainer that, indeed, Parliament intended Revenue Canada's claim to take priority over the property of someone other than the tax debtor, such as an assignee of the tax debtor's book debts. [Emphasis in original.]

XXVII. I agree with Forsyth J. that the 1990 amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act were sufficient to provide the "something further" which the Alberta Court of Appeal thought to be necessary in Lloyds Bank. As Côté J.A. in the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case stated about the amendment to s. 224(1.2), at p. 6:

> ...the amendments to that subsection say that service transfers the debt to Her Majesty, and that it shall be paid to Her Majesty notwithstanding the security interest, and in priority to the security interest. Where those amendments apply, in my view they reverse our Lloyds Bank decision and give the M.N.R. priority over earlier mortgages and assignments. I cannot confine them to floating or conditional assignments and must disagree with one of the Justices appealed from.

XXVIII. I also agree with MacLeod J. that McDonald J. at trial in Lloyds Bank was correct to hold that a GABD falls within the definition of security interest in s. 224(1.3). That section defines "security interest" as including:

... any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of ... [an] assignment ... of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising ....

XXIX. With respect, I do not accept the conclusion of Hunt J. that the definition of "security interest" is ambiguous and that the phrase "of any kind whatever" should be read to modify only "encumbrance" which is the last type of security listed. When the definition is read in its plain and ordinary sense, it is clear that the broad phrase "of any kind whatever" is intended to cover all of the listed types of security including an assignment. The phrase "a[n] assignment ... of any kind whatever" is broad enough to encompass the absolute assignments of book debts which are at issue in these appeals.

XXX. The finding that a GABD is a security interest for the purposes of the Income Tax Act or the Excise Tax Act is also consistent with the manner in which the assignments are dealt with in the contracts which create the assignments. For instance, the instrument which creates the assignment of book debts from Land-Rock Resources Ltd. to Alberta Treasury Branches provides, inter alia:

THE PRESENT assignment and transfer shall be a continuing collateral security to Treasury Branches for the payment of all and every present and future indebtedness and liability of the undersigned to Treasury Branches and any ultimate unpaid balance thereof with interest. [Emphasis added.]

XXXI. My conclusions that the GABDs at issue in these appeals fall within the statutory definition of a security interest and that the 1990 amendment is effective, when it applies, to give the MNR a priority over earlier mortgages and assignments, do not, however, lead inevitably to the conclusion that the MNR has priority over the lending institutions to the debts at issue in these appeals.

XXXII. A new argument was raised before the Alberta Court of Appeal and this Court to the effect that even if an unconditional GABD is a security interest, the lending institutions do not fall within the definition of "secured creditor" in s. 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act. Côté J.A. held at pp. 7-8:

The M.N.R. must believe or suspect that the intended recipient of the letter is liable, or will soon become liable to make a payment under para. (a) or para. (b) of the operative subs. (1.2). No one suggests that para. (a) applies here, given the general assignments of book debts and other assignments. So the effective precondition in these cases is para. (b). It says:

(b) to a secured creditor who has a right to receive the payment that, but for [a] security interest in favour of the secured creditor, would be payable to the tax debtor. (emphasis added)

Subsection (1.3) defines "security interest", and that definition appears to be satisfied in the present cases. But subs. (1.3) also defines "secured creditor".... I will restate that definition slightly using square brackets:

... a [certain] person who has a security interest in the property of another person or who acts for or on behalf of that person with respect to the security interest and includes... (emphasis added)

In each of these three appeals, there was a general assignment of book debts which purported immediately to transfer title to the Bank or Treasury Branch. Doubtless it was done to secure a loan, but legal title was thereafter in the transferee, the Bank or Treasury Branch. Therefore, the Bank or Treasury Branch is not a "secured creditor" under this definition, because it does not have any interest "in the property of another person". The Bank or Treasury Branch itself is the owner. The tax debtor, both sides agree, would have to be the "other person". But he has no title. So one cannot say that the book debts (receivables) assigned are "the property of" the tax debtor.

XXXIII. I agree. The wording of s. 224(1.2) clearly requires not only that there is a security interest, but also that the payment be made either to the tax debtor or to a secured creditor. Here, because of the assignments, the payments are made to the lending institutions and the question is whether these lending institutions meet the definition of "secured creditor" as defined in the statutes.

XXXIV. The definition of secured creditor is a "person who has a security interest in the property of another", that other being the tax debtor. The critical issue is whether, after an assignment, the lending institutions have a security interest in the property of the tax debtor. In my view, they do not. An assignment passes title and therefore property in the book debts is held by the lending institution and not by the tax debtor.

XXXV. It is well-established law that a GABD, such as the ones at issue in these appeals, has the effect of transferring all right, title and ownership in and to the property assigned so that it can no longer be considered the property of the assignor. Minister of National Revenue* reflex, (1990), 39 F.T.R. 102, at p. 105.

XXXVI. In Evans Coleman and Evans Ltd. v. R.A. Nelson Construction Ltd., the plaintiff attempted to garnish funds owing to the defendant which were held by a bank. A second bank held a GABD executed by the defendant. The British Columbia Court of Appeal concluded that the GABD passed property in the book debts absolutely, and that the defendant no longer had an interest that could be garnisheed.

XXXVII. In Royal Bank of Canada v. R., Muldoon J. of the Federal Court Trial Division came to a similar conclusion which was unanimously confirmed by the Federal Court of Appeal. Under the terms of the assignment, the assignor Miles contracted to act as a trustee for the funds assigned by him to the Royal Bank under a GABD. The MNR argued that an assignee can have no greater claim on the garnished money than the assignor. Muldoon J. rejected this argument and held at p. 212:

> With respect, that contention misses the point. To equate the respective rights of the assignee and the assignor in and upon the book debts is to overlook the very nature and effect of the assignment, for the assignee owns the book debts and the assignor does not. To those who have not searched in the personal property security register, the assignor, of course, might still appear to be an ordinary trade creditor, but having assigned the book debts, the assignor, Miles, was in reality a trustee of them for the assignee, the plaintiff bank. Here, the Crown has received that which belonged to the bank.

XXXVIII. In Lettner v. Pioneer Truck Equipment Ltd., Guy J.A. of the Manitoba Court of Appeal commented upon the nature and effect a GABD as follows at pp. 348-49:

> As between Pioneer Truck and the bank, Pioneer Truck knows that its accounts receivable or book debts belong to the bank. In equity it cannot be heard to say that it owns these book debts.
> The fact that banking practice in Canada permits the extension of credit to going concerns, and permits the borrowers (by licence, as it were) to collect some accounts to pay wages and current creditors, does not destroy the absolute and specific quality of the legal assignment to the bank.

XXXIX. In Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Minister of National Revenue, Jerome A.C.J. of the Federal Court Trial Division conducted a thorough review of the authorities, including those discussed above, and concluded at p. 105:

> In light of the preceding authorities, and particularly in light of the Federal Court of Appeal's decision in Royal Bank of Canada v. The Queen, which is entirely binding on this Court, I must conclude that the general assignment of book debts granted April 26, 1983, by J.K. Campbell and Associates Limited to the Toronto-Dominion Bank constituted an absolute transfer of all property and interest previously held by J.K. Campbell in its accounts or other book debts, present or future. Accordingly, after April 26, 1983, the Toronto-Dominion Bank had full legal and equitable title in all accounts that were owing or that would become owing by debtors of J.K. Campbell unless such right was otherwise expropriated by competent and valid legislation.

XL. In addition to establishing that an absolute assignment of book debts transfers property in the debts to the assignee, the cases discussed above also stand for the simple and obvious proposition that the true nature of an assignment can only be determined by examining the particular wording of the instrument which creates the assignment.

XLI. The assignments in each of the three cases which are involved in these appeals all contain language which makes it clear that they are immediate and absolute. Typical is the assignment from Land-Rock Resources to Alberta Treasury Branches, which provides:

> THE UNDERSIGNED Land-Rock Resources Ltd. for valuable consideration HEREBY ASSIGNS AND TRANSFERS to Province of Alberta Treasury Branches (herein called "Treasury Branches") all debts, demands and choses in action now due or hereafter to become due, together with all judgments and securities for the said debts, demands and choses in action, and all other rights and benefits in respect thereof which now are or may hereafter become vested in the undersigned.

XLII. It was noted in Royal Bank of Canada v. R., at p. 202, that there may be a distinction between an absolute assignment and one that provides that, in the event of default and the non-remedy of the default, the bank may without further notice deal with the book debts. Such wording appears to be less than an absolute assignment and creates for the lending institution a charge on the book debts which does not crystallize into property in the debts until there has been an unremedied default.

XLIII. While it does not fall to be decided in this case, it seems likely that such an assignment does not transfer property to the lending institution and thus, at least prior to default on the part of the assignor, the lending institution would be a secured creditor under s. 224(1.3). This type of conditional wording is not present in any of the instruments at issue in these appeals, all of which are unconditional and absolute.

XLIV. Moreover, at least one of the instruments provides that the assignor is a trustee for the book debts held by the lending institution. In Royal Bank of Canada v. R., Muldoon J. held that the fact that the assignor is in the position of a trustee is a further indication that the assignment passes property to the assignee. The assignment from Bodor to the Toronto-Dominion Bank provides:

> IT IS HEREBY DECLARED AND AGREED that all money received by the Assignor in payment of any debts, demands and choses in action...shall be received and held by the Assignor in trust for the Bank.

XLV. It should be noted that the fact that the GABD is referred to as "continuing collateral security" in two of the instruments does not make the GABD anything less than absolute. In both Evans Coleman and Lettner, the GABDs contained language that the general assignment of book debts would be continuing collateral security and in each case the courts held that such language did not affect the absoluteness of the assignment.

XLVI. At the Alberta Court of Appeal, the MNR took the position that even if legal title was transferred to the assignee by the GABD, the assignor tax debtor retained an equitable interest in the nature of an equity of redemption which was sufficient for the book debts to remain the "property" of the tax debtor.

XLVII. Côté J.A. responded to this argument by stating that while in theory the tax debtor held an equity of redemption, this equity could not be exercised in practice except by application to a court of equity. Such an application would only be granted by a court of equity where the value of the book debts exceeded the value of the loans which they secured. He concluded that in cases like the three on appeal, where the value of the loans exceeded the value of the book debts, there is no real equity of redemption. He also held that the only property of the tax debtor was the equity of redemption and that the MNR did not claim that interest.

XLVIII. I agree with Côté J.A. that the tax debtor retains an equity of redemption upon an assignment of its book debts. Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed. 1980), vol. 32, at para. 401, defines a mortgage as "a disposition of property as security for a debt" which "may be effected ... by an assignment of a chose in action" such as a book debt. At para. 407 Halsbury's also states that:

> Incident to every mortgage is the right of the mortgagor to redeem, a right which is called his equity of redemption.... This right arises from the transaction being considered as a mere loan of money secured by a pledge of the estate.

Thus prima facie an assignor of book debts retains an equitable right to redeem his assignment of the book debts once the debt obligation which is secured by the book debts has been completely discharged by the assignor.

XLIX. I also agree with Côté J.A. that in the context of these appeals the fact that the tax debtors in theory hold an equity of redemption in their book debts is of purely academic interest since, on the facts, the value of the loans secured by the book debts far exceeds the value of the debts themselves. Thus there is no value in the equity of redemption held by the tax debtors. While the equity of redemption theoretically exists, for practical purposes it is incapable of any realization.

L. The appellant MNR argues, however, that Côté J.A. erred by focusing his attention on whether the value of the loans exceeds the value of the book debts. The MNR points out that if the relative value of the loan and the security is the only relevant factor then a tax debtor who operates his business with the assistance of a revolving line of credit secured by an assignment of book debts (which is a common business arrangement) would fluctuate between being and not being a secured creditor on an almost daily basis depending on the relative value of the collectibles and the line of credit of the business.

LI. I share the MNR's concern that the relative value of the loan and the book debts is not the sole determining factor as to whether the assignor's equity of redemption makes the book debts his "property".

LII. As a matter of law, an absolute assignment of book debts makes those book debts the property of the assignee. Those book debts remain the property of the assignee until the assignor actually exercises his equitable right to redeem. It is a necessary precondition to the exercise of the equity of redemption that the loans secured by the assignment be paid off in full, along with any accrued interest and costs.

LIII. With respect, however, while it is a necessary precondition that the value of the security exceed the value of the loan in order to exercise the right of redemption, the fulfilment of this precondition is not sufficient to return the book debts to the property of the assignor. The assignor must also choose to exercise the right of redemption which will mean a termination of the loan arrangement with the lending institution.

LIV. At base, the equity of redemption is no more than a recognition that the assignment of debts to the creditor, while immediate and absolute, is for a limited purpose. In equity, the creditor cannot unjustly enrich itself by realizing on more security than the value of the loan which is secured. At any given time the value of the security may exceed the value of the loan, but upon termination of the lending relationship, the assignor of the security is entitled, in equity, to an accounting.

LV. In determining whether the book debts, once assigned, are the "property" of the assignor or of the assignee, the Court must choose between two competing definitions of "property". One definition is the immediate legal title to what had been assigned and the other is a potential interest enforceable only in equity to reacquire property which has been assigned to another, contingent upon successfully fulfilling the terms of the loan agreement.

LVI. In Friesen v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 62 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 103, it was held that the words of the Income Tax Act are to be read in their plain and ordinary sense. The plain and ordinary meaning of "property" is legal title and not a contingent future equitable right to reacquire property which one does not presently hold. The very term "equity of redemption" highlights the fact that property is not presently held by the assignor, but rather there is a limited right to reacquire property at a future date.

LVII. The central thrust of the MNR's submissions in this Court is contained in para. 45 of his factum, where he states that where title to property is transferred, the phrase "property of another person" must be read to mean "property that, absent the security interest, is the property of the person giving the security".

LVIII. This proposition is contrary to the traditional Canadian jurisprudence that the words of a taxing statute are to read strictly for their plain and ordinary meaning and that only if there is a true ambiguity is the intention of Parliament to be considered.

LIX. In the circumstances of these appeals, a strict reading of the taxation statute is appropriate. As pointed out by Hunt J. at p. 361, these appeals raise not only the traditional tax interpretation principle of resolution of ambiguity in favour of the taxpayer: Johns-Manville Canada Inc. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 46, at p. 72. They also raise the well-known principle that, in the absence of clear and unequivocal language, there is a presumption that proprietary rights are not to be taken away without provision being made for compensation.

LX. In the context of these appeals, the interpretation of s. 224 urged by the MNR would have the effect of expropriating property to which the lender is legally entitled under its security agreement with the tax debtor. The taxes which would be garnished and withheld from the lending institution are not taxes owed by the lender but rather taxes owed by its debtor.

LXI. The lending institutions are innocent third parties whose proprietary rights would be expropriated by the provisions of s. 224 and accordingly those provisions must be read strictly to determine whether the expropriatory language is clear and unequivocal.

LXII. However, it is not necessary to resort to strict interpretation to resolve these appeals. In this case the plain and ordinary meaning of the phrase "property of another person" is property now held by another person. This interpretation makes sense of the words without reading anything into the statute and respects the well-established principle of interpretation that statutes are to be read as though presently speaking.

LXIII. One of the cardinal principles of the plain and ordinary meaning approach is that nothing be read into a section unless no sense can be made of that section without the addition of the extra words. The plain and ordinary meaning of the statutory words simply does not bear the strained interpretation urged by the MNR of "property that, absent the security interest, is the property of the person giving the security".

LXIV. In addition to offending the principle that extra words should not be read into a section unless absolutely necessary, this proposed reading attempts to read in wording which can be expressly found in another part of the same section. Section 224(1.2)(b) applies to "a secured creditor who has a right to receive the payment that, but for a security interest in favour of the secured creditor, would be payable to the tax debtor". The emphasized words in s. 224(1.2)(b) are identical in effect to the words which the MNR seeks to introduce into the definition of secured creditor.

LXV. The use of a particular phrase in other parts of the Income Tax Act militates against reading that same phrase into a section of the Act where it is not found. This is particularly so where the phrase is found in the very same section as the disputed wording, and the section in question has been the subject of amendments twice within the last decade.

LXVI. If Parliament had intended that s. 224(1.2) should cover all persons who hold a security interest, it could have defined "secured creditor" as any person who holds a security interest without the deliberately limiting words "in the property of another person". Alternatively, it could have expressly provided "property that but for a security interest in favour of the secured creditor would be the property of another person", thus echoing the phrasing found in the rest of the section.

LXVII. In spite of two recent amendments to this section, Parliament chose not to define secured creditor in the manner urged by the appellant MNR. To read into the section the words suggested by the MNR would be an unwarranted judicial usurpation of the legislative function. The only conclusion which can be drawn from the plain and ordinary meaning of the words which do appear in the Act is that Parliament did not intend to bring creditors who actually owned the title to the security interest within the purview of the section.

LXVIII. It is my conclusion that these appeals can be resolved without resort to any special principles of interpretation tailored to the expropriatory nature of this particular provision.

LXIX. If I am mistaken in this conclusion, and there is an ambiguity in the meaning of the word "property" then I would hold that the specific effect of this section warrants a strict resolution of any ambiguity in favour of the respondents. Such an interpretation requires that "property" be read to mean present legal title in preference to a future contingent equitable right to reacquire property not currently held. It also requires that words expressly found in another part of the same section not be read without cause into the definition of secured creditor.

LXX. In summary, these appeals should be resolved as follows:

1.The definition of "security interest" is broad enough to include a general assignment of book debts even where that assignment is absolute.

2.The wording of s. 224(1.2), as amended in 1990, is sufficiently clear and unequivocal to allow a transfer of property in the garnished funds to the MNR and to grant him a priority in circumstances where the rest of that section applies.

3.An assignee of an absolute assignment of book debts is not a "secured creditor" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) because he does not hold a security interest "in the property of another person".

4.Therefore, s. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and s. 317(3) of the Excise Tax Act are not effective to grant the appellant MNR an interest in or priority over debts owed to the assignee of a GABD.

IV. Disposition

Directive / Instruction

N° 25

REALIZATION OF ESTATE ASSETS

Issued: August 14, 2009

(Supersedes Directive No. 22 issued on July 23, 1993, on the same topic)

Interpretation

1. In this Directive,

"Act" means the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;

"OSB" means the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy;

"Rules" means the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules.

Authority and Purpose

2. This Directive is issued pursuant to the authority of paragraphs 5(4)(b) and (c) of the Act.

3. The purpose of this Directive is to outline the position of the Superintendent with regard to realization of estate assets.

RÉALISATION DES BIENS DE L'ACTIF

Date d'émission : le 14 août 2009

(La présente instruction remplace et annule l'instruction n° 22 sur le même sujet émise le 23 juillet 1993.)

Interprétation

1. Les définitions qui suivent s'appliquent à la présente instruction :

« BSF » désigne le Bureau du surintendant des faillites;

« Loi » renvoie à la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité;

« Règles » s'entend des Règles générales sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité.

Autorité et objet

2. La présente instruction est émise en vertu de l'autorité conférée par les alinéas 5(4)b) et c) de la Loi.

3. La présente instruction a pour objet d'exposer la position du surintendant concernant la réalisation des biens de l'actif.

Policy

4 Except for property held in trust by the bankrupt or property exempt from execution or seizure, all property of the bankrupt, wherever situated at the date of bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him or her before the discharge, is available for the creditors within the meaning of section 67 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The trustee must therefore take possession of the assets and realize upon them for the benefit of the estate unless:

(a) the asset is specifically exempt from seizure or execution under the law;

(b) a specific applicable jurisprudence renders the asset exempt;

(c) a specific order has been obtained from the Court to exempt the asset; or

(d) in the opinion of the trustee, there would be no financial benefit to the estate as the cost of realization would exceed or equal the realizable value of the asset. In such a case, a document of explanation should be kept in the estate file

5. The onus of having an asset declared exempt from execution lies with the bankrupt, at the bankrupt's own expense, and not at the expense of the estate.

Politique

4 Au sens de l'article 67 de la Loi, tous les biens, où qu'ils soient situés, qui appartiennent au failli à la date de la faillite, ou qu'il peut acquérir ou qui peuvent lui avoir été dévolus avant sa libération, constituent le patrimoine attribué à ses créanciers, à l'exception des biens détenus en fiducie par le failli ou des biens exempts d'exécution ou de saisie. Par conséquent, le syndic doit prendre possession des biens de l'actif et les réaliser pour le bénéfice de la masse des créanciers à moins que :

a) l'actif ne soit expressément exempt d'exécution ou de saisie en vertu des lois;

b) la jurisprudence expressément applicable ne rende l'actif exempt;

c) une ordonnance précise n'ait été obtenue du tribunal, rendant l'actif insaisissable; ou

d) selon l'opinion du syndic, il n'y ait pas d'avantage financier pour l'actif car le coût de réalisation serait égal ou supérieur à la valeur réalisable de l'actif. Dans ce cas, un document explicatif devrait être gardé au dossier de l'actif.

5. La responsabilité de faire déclarer un bien insaisissable incombe au failli, qui doit le faire à ses frais et non pas à ceux de l'actif.

Realization of Assets

6. The following are examples of minimum requirements in the realization of certain assets by trustees. This list is not exhaustive as there are many other types of assets to be realized in the administration of estates, some of which are already covered under other directives (i.e. surplus income, tax refunds, etc.).

(a) Motor Vehicle

Although exemption provisions vary from one province to another, the fundamental principles are the same: unless exempted by the applicable legislation or applicable jurisprudence, a motor vehicle constitutes an asset of the estate and there is a statutory obligation on the part of the trustee to realize the asset.

If expedient, a trustee may choose to sell the motor vehicle back to the bankrupt. Before doing so, the trustee must obtain the consent of the inspectors and/or the creditors and document the file on the method by which the value of the vehicle was obtained (e.g. written appraisal, black book or other source).

Any payment for the motor vehicle made by the bankrupt to the estate shall not be considered as part of the payments from surplus income but rather from that portion of the bankrupt's income that he or she is entitled to retain.

Réalisation des biens de l'actif

6. La liste suivante comprend des exemples d'exigences minimales requises par le syndic dans le cadre de la réalisation de certains actifs. Cette liste n'est pas exhaustive, car il existe plusieurs autres genres d'actifs à être réalisés dans l'administration de dossiers, dont certains sont déjà couverts par d'autres instructions (p. ex., revenu excédentaire et remboursement d'impôt).

a) Véhicule à moteur

Bien que les modalités d'insaisissabilité varient d'une province à l'autre, les principes fondamentaux sont les mêmes : à moins d'être déclaré insaisissable par la loi ou la jurisprudence pertinente, un véhicule à moteur constitue un bien de l'actif et le syndic a l'obligation statutaire de le réaliser.

Lorsqu'un syndic le juge à propos, il peut choisir de vendre le véhicule à moteur au failli. Cependant, il doit obtenir, au préalable, le consentement des inspecteurs ou des créanciers et documenter son dossier sur la méthode par laquelle la valeur du véhicule a été déterminée (p. ex., évaluation écrite, livre noir ou autre source).

Tout paiement fait à l'actif par le failli pour le véhicule à moteur ne doit pas provenir du revenu excédentaire du failli mais de la portion du revenu qu'il peut conserver.

(b) Life Insurance

Although insurance legislation varies from one province to another, generally the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to realize the proceeds of a life insurance policy if payable to the estate of the bankrupt.

If a life insurance policy exists, as a minimum, the trustee must examine the bankrupt's life insurance policy, which may include a request to the insurance company for a written statement on the status of the policy to ensure that all moneys available for distribution to the creditors are paid to the estate.

(c) Registered Retirement Savings Plan

Under section 67 of the Act, amounts held in RRSPs are exempt from seizure in bankruptcy, subject to a possible clawback for contributions made in the 12 months preceding bankruptcy that will comprise property of the bankrupt's estate. Where provincial legislation exempts RRSPs from execution, the provincial legislation will apply. Where provincial legislation is silent regarding the treatment of RRSPs, they will be exempt subject to the clawback referred to above.

b) Assurance-vie

Bien que la législation sur les assurances varie d'une province à l'autre, en général, le syndic a le droit de réaliser le produit de la police d'assurance-vie si celle-ci est payable à la succession du failli.

Lorsqu'il y a une police d'assurance-vie, le syndic doit, comme mesure minimale, examiner la police d'assurance-vie du failli, ce qui pourrait inclure une demande à la compagnie d'assurance pour une confirmation écrite du statut de la police d'assurance-vie afin de s'assurer que les sommes disponibles pour distribution aux créanciers sont payées au syndic pour le compte de l'actif.

c) Régime enregistré d'épargne-retraite

En vertu de l'article 67 de la Loi, les régimes enregistrés d'épargne-retraite (REER) immobilisés sont insaisissables lors d'une faillite, mais les contributions effectuées durant l'année précédant la faillite sont saisissables et font partie de l'actif du failli. Là où la législation provinciale exempte les REER de la saisie, la législation provinciale s'appliquera. Là où la législation provinciale est silencieuse concernant le traitement des REER, ceux-ci seront insaisissables sauf pour les contributions effectuées durant l'année précédant la faillite

Supporting Documents

7. As it is a statutory obligation on the part of a trustee to realize on all assets for the benefit of the estate, it is therefore expected that a trustee will document the files as much as possible in support of the receipts, disbursements and actions taken on all the transactions. The official receiver may, at his or her discretion, request from the trustee a copy of that documentation.

Pièces justificatives

7. Étant donné que le syndic a l'obligation statutaire de réaliser tous les biens de l'actif pour le bénéfice des créanciers, il importe que le syndic justifie, autant que possible, toutes ses transactions quant aux recettes, déboursés et actions prises. Le séquestre officiel, lorsqu'il le juge à propos, peut demander au syndic de lui fournir une copie de ces documents.

(2) Subject to subsection (3), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a bankrupt shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty for the purpose of paragraph (1)(a) unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Crown claims — Goods and services tax — Provincial sales tax — Tax amounts that have been collected but not remitted, or are collectible, at time of bankruptcy of supplier — Legal characterization of Crown's rights in amounts of such taxes — Whether federal or provincial Crown is ordinary creditor or owner of tax amounts — Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15, s. 222(1), (1.1) — Act respecting the Ministère du Revenu, R.S.Q., c. M-31, s. 20 — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 67(2).

The GST imposed under the Excise Tax Act ("ETA") and the QST payable under the Act respecting the Québec Sales Tax are taxes that are collected, and in respect of which credits are available, at each step of the manufacturing and marketing of taxable goods and services. They are payable by the recipient, who is regarded as the debtor in respect of the tax liability to the Crown. In principle, the supplier acts only as a mandatary of the Crown in collecting and remitting these taxes and is deemed to hold the amounts so collected in trust for Her Majesty.

A number of businesses went bankrupt. The Canadian and Quebec tax authorities (the "tax authorities") claimed from the trustees the GST and QST amounts that had been collected but not remitted, or were collectible, by those businesses as of the dates of their bankruptcies. The tax authorities submitted that they were entitled to the amounts in issue as the owners thereof. Financial institutions that held various security interests in the property of the bankrupts contended that, under the law applicable in bankruptcy matters, the federal or provincial Crown is only an ordinary creditor and must be ranked as such with the debtors' other creditors, and that their security interests could therefore be set up against the Crown. The Quebec Superior Court found for the tax authorities on the basis that the GST and QST amounts were not part of the bankrupts' patrimonies. The Quebec Court of Appeal set aside the judgments.

Held: The appeals should be dismissed.

When a supplier goes bankrupt, the tax authorities do not own GST and QST amounts that have been collected but not remitted or are collectible at the time of the bankruptcy. Instead, they have an unsecured claim against the supplier. The legal characterization of the relationships between the tax authorities and the suppliers and recipients of goods and services cannot be considered in isolation from the overall context of the system for the collection and remittance of these taxes and from the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"). The tax authorities' position amounts to maintaining that the deemed trusts established by s. 222 ETA and s. 20 of the Act respecting the Ministère du Revenu ("AMR") continue to exist after a bankruptcy, which conflicts with both the words and the intent of the statutory provisions in question, and is inconsistent with the nature of the tax authorities' rights under the system for the collection and remittance of the GST and QST. [7] [21] [28-29]

In light of the 1992 amendments to s. 67 BIA, the deemed trusts established by ss. 222 ETA and 20 AMR are terminated at the time of the bankruptcy. Parliament also enacted concordance amendments to the ETA by adding subs. (1.1) to s. 222. As a result of this provision, deemed trusts intended to secure GST claims are ineffective in bankruptcy situations. Although the Quebec legislation does not contain a provision similar to s. 222(1.1) ETA, Parliament's legislative authority over bankruptcy prevents the provincial legislatures from modifying the order of priority established in the BIA. Thus, the trustee is responsible for liquidating patrimonies that include the GST and QST amounts in issue. The mandate the supplier or the trustee is deemed to have been given with respect to the two taxes involves the performance of obligations to collect and then to remit, not the amounts collected, but a balance resulting from offsetting claims of the Crown and the supplier. LEBEL J. —

I. Introduction

[1] In these three cases, the Canadian and Quebec tax authorities, on the one hand, and the trustees in bankruptcy of certain businesses and financial institutions holding various security interests in the property of the bankrupts, on the other, disagree about what should be done with taxes on consumption that had been collected but not remitted, or were collectible, as of the date of the bankruptcy. The tax authorities submit that they are entitled to the amounts in issue as the owners thereof. The respondents contend that, under the law applicable in bankruptcy matters, the federal or provincial Crown is only an ordinary creditor and must be ranked as such with the debtors' other creditors. The financial institutions submit that their security interests can be set up against the Crown as against any ordinary creditor. The Quebec Superior Court found for the Crown. The Quebec Court of Appeal set aside the judgments and accepted the arguments of the trustees and financial institutions. In my view, that decision is well founded, and I would uphold it.

II. Origins of the Cases

[2] These three cases result from the bankruptcies of a number of businesses and from problems that arose as a result of their insolvency in respect of the administration of the federal goods and services tax ("GST") imposed under the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 ("ETA"), and the Quebec sales tax ("QST") payable under the Act respecting the Québec sales tax, R.S.Q., c. T-0.1 ("AQST"). To begin, I will summarize the facts that must be considered to understand these cases. The relevant statutory provisions are reproduced in the Appendix.

A. Deputy Minister of Revenue of Quebec and Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada v. Caisse populaire Desjardins de Montmagny and Raymond Chabot Inc., in its Capacity as Trustee in Bankruptcy of 9083-4185 Québec Inc.

[3] In this case, a manufacturing company required, as a supplier, to collect the GST and the QST went bankrupt on September 7, 2005. Raymond Chabot Inc. was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. The debtor had hypothecated its claims and accounts receivable in favour of the respondent Caisse populaire Desjardins de Montmagny. Quebec's Deputy Minister of Revenue gave the trustee notice that he considered it to be his mandatary for the recovery of GST and QST amounts that had been collected but not remitted or were collectible. The tax authorities claimed that they owned the amounts in question. Furthermore, the record shows that some of the taxes that had been collected or were collectible at the time of the bankruptcy had been payable for more than 60 days. The Caisse populaire Desjardins de Montmagny claimed to hold valid security interests, which could be set up against the tax authorities, in the tax amounts related to the claims hypothecated in its favour. In view of these conflicting claims, the trustee asked the Superior Court to determine to whom the tax amounts belonged.

B. Deputy Minister of Revenue of Quebec and Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada v. Raymond Chabot Inc. in Its Capacity as Trustee for the Estate of the Debtor, Consortium Promecan Inc.

[4] In this case, Consortium Promecan Inc. went bankrupt on March 20, 2004, and Raymond Chabot Inc. was appointed trustee. The debtor had not filed returns with respect to the GST and the QST since February 1, 2004. Quebec's Deputy Minister of Revenue asked the trustee to remit to him all GST and QST amounts in respect of the period between February 1 and March 20, 2004 that had been collected or were collectible. The trustee replied that, in its view, the Deputy Minister was only an ordinary creditor in the bankruptcy, and it denied his request. The Crown appealed that decision to the Superior Court.

C. Deputy Minister of Revenue of Quebec and Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada v. National Bank of Canada

[5] The tax claims in this case result from the bankruptcies of two companies, Alternative Granite et Marbre inc. and Stone Vogue Ressources inc., on November 5, 2004. The Crown claimed GST and QST amounts related to the accounts receivable of the bankrupt debtors. The National Bank of Canada had obtained, on those accounts, security under s. 427 of the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c. 46, and movable hypothecs. It tried to exercise its rights under these various security interests and claimed the proceeds of the accounts receivable as well as the GST and QST amounts related to these claims. It then applied to the Superior Court to resolve the resulting dispute between itself and the tax authorities. In the meantime, the Bank's mandatary, the trustee and the Crown all collected portions of the disputed taxes and even of the accounts receivable.

III. Judicial History

A. Quebec Superior Court

[6]The Superior Court heard the three cases separately. The result was the same in all of them. All three judges concluded that the Crown owned the disputed GST and QST amounts. If the trustee in bankruptcy collected them, it was as a mandatary of the tax authorities. Quebec's Deputy Minister of Revenue and the Minister of National Revenue could not be considered to be mere ordinary creditors. In essence, the Superior Court judges held that the GST and QST amounts were not part of the bankrupt's patrimony: 2006 QCCS 2108 (CanLII), 2006 QCCS 2108, 34 C.B.R. (5th) 245 (per Boisvert J.), 2006 QCCS 6370, [2006] J.Q. nº 15239 (QL) (per St-Julien J.), 2006 QCCS 2656 (CanLII), 2006 QCCS 2656, 21 C.B.R. (5th) 289 (per Bouchard J.). All three judgments were appealed to the Quebec Court of Appeal.

B. Quebec Court of Appeal, Forget, Doyon and Duval Hesler JJ.A.

[7] Duval Hesler J.A., writing for the Court of Appeal, allowed the appeals and set aside the Superior Court's judgments: 2007 QCCA 1837 (CanLII), 2007 QCCA 1837, 2007 QCCA 1835, 2007 QCCA 1813, [2008] R.J.Q. 39. She acknowledged that the QST and the GST are direct taxes payable by the recipient of the good or service. But in her view, as a result of the 1992 amendments to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), the tax authorities must be treated as an ordinary creditor in such a case. They do not own tax amounts payable by purchasers of goods and services that are subject to the GST and QST, but instead have a claim against the supplier. Furthermore, any deemed trust in favour of the tax authorities ended at the time of the bankruptcy. The tax amounts in issue were therefore part of the bankrupt's patrimony but remained subject to any security interests that had been validly granted to creditors like the Caisse populaire Desjardins de Montmagny and the National Bank of Canada. This Court granted leave for three appeals from that judgment.

IV. Analysis

A. Issues and Positions of the Parties

[8] The issue is the nature of the rights of the tax authorities, the trustee in bankruptcy and the secured creditors to GST and QST amounts that have been collected but not remitted or are collectible at the time of the bankruptcy of a supplier within the meaning of the AQST and the ETA. In sum, the tax authorities submit that they own these amounts. In their opinion, the trustee collects the taxes on their behalf, as their mandatary, and these amounts are not part of the bankrupt's patrimony. The respondents reply that the amounts are part of the bankrupt's patrimony, subject to any validly granted security interests. In their view, the Crown does not have a right of ownership in the tax amounts and enjoys only the rights of an ordinary creditor in a bankruptcy situation. To resolve this issue, it will be necessary to begin by considering the nature of the two taxes in issue, the GST and the QST, and the mechanism for administering them. I will also need, before ruling on the legal characterization of the Crown's rights, to discuss the effect of the 1992 amendments to the BIA.

B. Nature of the GST and the QST

[9] The GST and the QST are similar types of taxes on consumption. The legal framework for imposing them was established almost 20 years ago now. They are considered to be direct taxes, and the ultimate recipient of taxable goods and services is responsible for paying them. However, the taxes are collected, and credits apply, at each step of the manufacturing and marketing chains. In principle, the supplier acts only as a mandatary of the Crown in collecting and remitting these taxes (Reference re Quebec Sales Tax, 1994 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 715, at pp. 720-22).

Digitized by Google

[10] The GST, which was implemented in 1990 by legislation that amended the ETA (S.C. 1990, c. 45), replaced the former federal manufacturers' sales tax. The GST can be regarded as a value-added tax. It is collected at every stage of the manufacturing and marketing of goods and services and is payable by the recipient, who is regarded as the debtor in respect of the tax liability to the Crown (s. 165 ETA). However, the supplier is responsible for collecting and remitting the tax (s. 221(1) ETA). The supplier is deemed to hold the amounts so collected in trust for Her Majesty (s. 222(1) and (3) ETA) and must periodically file returns and make remittances. In addition, the Act establishes a system under which input credits can be claimed, at each step of the marketing and supply of the good, in respect of the taxes the supplier has had to pay to his or her own suppliers (ss. 141.01 and 169(1) ETA). The ultimate recipient bears the full burden of the tax (R. Brakel & Associates Ltd., Value-Added Taxation in Canada: GST, HST, and QST (2nd ed. 2003), at pp. 2-3). This Court has confirmed this as a valid exercise of the Parliament of Canada's taxing power (Reference re Goods and Services Tax, 1992 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 445).

[11] In parallel with this federal tax reform, an in-depth review of the consumption tax system took place in Quebec. In 1991, the National Assembly enacted new sales tax legislation, the Act respecting the Québec sales tax and amending various fiscal legislation, S.Q. 1991, c. 67. The National Assembly's intention in enacting this statute was to achieve extensive harmonization with the GST and to align this aspect of Quebec's tax system with the model chosen by the Parliament of Canada. The legislation came into force on July 1, 1992 (Brakel, at pp. 3-4). Under an agreement with the Government of Canada, the Quebec government is responsible for collecting both the GST and the QST in Quebec (Brakel, at p. 4). Moreover, pursuant to s. 20 of the Act respecting the Ministère du Revenu, R.S.Q., c. M-31 ("AMR"), amounts collected by suppliers of goods and services are deemed to be held in trust for the State. This Court held that this new sales tax falls within the provincial taxing power under s. 92(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867 (Reference re Quebec Sales Tax).

C. Effects of the Amendments to the BIA on the Status of Claims of the Crown

[12] In 1992, the Parliament of Canada also made extensive changes to the BIA, and those changes are of particular relevance to this issue of the nature and extent of the Crown's rights to recover the GST and QST amounts. The amendments in question were set out in the Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, S.C. 1992, c. 27. Some of these changes related to the Crown's priority in bankruptcy situations. The federal government seemed at the time to want to respond to criticisms that the system establishing the priority of the Crown's claims often left nothing for a bankrupt's ordinary creditors. A government spokesperson acknowledged these concerns at the time of the introduction of the legislation to revise the Crown priority system:

> We also took steps to limit the priority of the Crown, one of the more blatantly unfair aspect[s] of the present Bankruptcy Act.
> (House of Commons Debates, vol. II, 3rd Sess., 34th Parl., June 19, 1991, at p. 2106)

[13] Felix Holtmann, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, also acknowledged the problems and injustices caused by the proliferation of deemed trusts developed to protect the Crown's claims. He stressed the need to reduce the extent of such trusts in order to achieve a better balance among creditors in bankruptcy situations:

> One of the main areas is Crown priority. Under the present Bankruptcy Act the Crown has a preferred claim for various types of taxes and ranks ahead of all unsecured creditors. In 1970 a study report made reference to Crown priority; then again in 1986 proposed bankruptcy amendments recommended the abolition of the Crown priority. With the Crown priority, creditors are less likely to participate in an insolvency, in a bankruptcy, and today rarely come out to meetings of creditors because there are no assets. The assets are fully secured to the secured creditors, banks and major lenders as well as to Crowns. As a result there is virtually nothing left for the unsecureds. We recommend that the Crown priority be abolished and that if the Crown wants to contract directly with the debtor, it be entitled to a contractual priority but not a Crown priority.
> (Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, Issue No. 9, September 5, 1991, at p. 9:5)

[14] During the parliamentary debates on Bill C-22 regarding the amendment of the BIA, comments by the government spokesperson confirmed that the government intended to reduce the Crown to the rank of an ordinary creditor in bankruptcy situations:

> A second very important point in the legislation is that the Government of Canada, the Crown, does not put itself in a priority position. It stands in line with the unsecured creditors in almost all cases except for the deductions of tax and unemployment owed.
> (House of Commons Debates, vol. IV, 3rd Sess., 34th Parl., November 1, 1991, at p. 4354)

In the course of the discussions in the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, the government spokesperson had clearly expressed the intention to abolish the deemed trust in respect of the GST in bankruptcy situations:

> As far as the GST is concerned, if there is a deemed trust for GST, it will not come under this particular provision so it will not survive. If there is a statutory lien or priority, or a statutory security interest for GST, it will not take priority under this legislation unless it is a registered interest.
> (Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, Issue No. 10, September 5, 1991, at p. 10:18)

[15] The amendments to the bankruptcy legislation appear to be consistent with the legislative intention announced during the parliamentary debates. First of all, s. 67 BIA reinforces the principle that all the bankrupt's property is part of the estate of the bankrupt and constitutes the common pledge of the creditors, although with the exception of property held in trust for another person. However, s. 67(2) BIA provides that, with certain exceptions, property may not be regarded as held in trust unless it would be so regarded in the absence of a statutory provision. This renders statutory trusts ineffective without affecting trusts resulting from the common law or the civil law or statutory trusts that secure claims of the federal and provincial Crowns related to source deductions for income tax, a comprehensive pension plan or the federal employment insurance program (s. 67(3) BIA). No mention is made of trusts related to the GST or to provincial taxes such as the QST. Moreover, s. 86(1) BIA confirms that the Crown is only an ordinary creditor in a bankruptcy situation:

> 86. (1) In relation to a bankruptcy or proposal, all provable claims, including secured claims, of Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or of any body under an Act respecting workers' compensation, in this section and in section 87 called a "workers' compensation body", rank as unsecured claims.

[16] In addition, not long after these changes to the BIA, the Parliament of Canada enacted concordance amendments with regard to GST claims (S.C. 1993, c. 27). It added subs. (1.1) to s. 222 ETA. As a result of this provision, deemed trusts intended to secure GST claims are ineffective in bankruptcy situations:

> (1.1) Subsection (1) does not apply, at or after the time a person becomes a bankrupt (within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), to any amounts that, before that time, were collected or became collectible by the person as or on account of tax under Division II.

[17] The Quebec legislation respecting the QST does not contain a provision similar to s. 222(1.1) ETA that renders the deemed trust in favour of the tax authorities ineffective in bankruptcy situations. However, according to a settled principle of constitutional law regarding the Parliament of Canada's legislative authority over bankruptcy and insolvency, the provincial legislatures may not modify the order of priority established in the BIA. In the event of conflict, the BIA will prevail and the provincial statute will be inapplicable regardless of the legislature's intention (D.I.M.S. Construction inc. (Trustee of) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 52 (CanLII), 2005 SCC 52, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 564, at para. 12, per Deschamps J.).

[18] The tax authorities do not dispute the clear terms of the statutory provisions. Rather, they argue that those provisions do not apply to the GST and the QST and that the Crown is not a creditor, but the owner of the tax amounts. Thus, the amounts collected or collectible at the time of the bankruptcy in respect of the GST or the QST do not form part of the bankrupt's patrimony. As a result, they are not included in the property that is to be liquidated in accordance with the order of priority established in the BIA. It will therefore be necessary to resolve the issue of the legal characterization of the Crown's rights with respect to the GST and QST amounts. The characterization of those rights will essentially resolve the dispute before this Court.

D. Legal Characterization of the Crown's Rights

[19] In this analysis, it is important to abide by the fundamental rules of contemporary statutory interpretation. Parliament's intent must be ascertained, and to do this, it is often necessary to review the statutory provisions at issue in their overall context (R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (5th ed. 2008), at p. 276). This approach casts doubt on the validity of the tax authorities' arguments.

[20] The appellants' arguments consist of a few fundamental propositions. They submit, first, that the GST and the QST are direct taxes on consumption. They are imposed on the consumer, and more specifically on the ultimate recipient of a taxable good or service. The legislation establishes a direct link between the Crown and the recipient, as the former may claim the taxes payable directly from the latter if they have not been collected (s. 296(1)(b) ETA). The appellants contend that where the GST is collected by a trustee in bankruptcy, the trustee, like the bankrupt supplier, collects it as an agent of, and on behalf of, the Crown. And the Crown is in a similar legal situation where the QST is concerned. The recipient owes the sales tax to the Crown pursuant to ss. 16 and 82 AQST. The supplier collects the tax on the Crown's behalf and is deemed to be a mandatary of the Crown pursuant to s. 422 AQST. Moreover, under s. 23 AMR, a person who does not collect a tax he or she was required to collect becomes a debtor of the State for that amount. The appellants further submit that, in the context of the ETA and the AQST, the supplier, a mandatary of the Crown, is responsible, after supplying a taxable service or good to a consumer, for the recovery of property — a GST or QST amount — that belongs to the Crown and that remains Crown property, until it is remitted to the Crown. The legal situation is the same regardless of whether the tax is collected by the supplier or by a trustee after its bankruptcy. In the appellants' view, when the collected tax is remitted, the mandatary does not settle a claim, but remits to the Crown its own property. Moreover, according to this argument, this Court has established a general principle that, in performing its obligation, the mandatary does not discharge a debt, but delivers over property belonging to the mandator (Victuni AG v. Minister of Revenue of Quebec, 1980 CanLII 169 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 580, at p. 584, per Pigeon J.).

[21] This set of legal propositions disregards the mechanisms for administering the GST and the QST. The legal characterization of the relationships between the tax authorities and the suppliers and recipients of goods and services cannot be considered in isolation from the overall context of the system for the collection and remittance of these taxes and from the provisions of the BIA.

[22] An initial comment must be made about the impact of the federal bankruptcy legislation. The appellants are oversimplifying the trustee's role and, in particular, his or her legal situation vis-à-vis the bankrupt. This Court has noted the complexity of the trustee's duties in, for example, Lefebvre (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 63 (CanLII), 2004 SCC 63, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 326, at paras. 35-37. The trustee's role is not limited to representing the bankrupt. The trustee manages the bankrupt's patrimony and is seized thereof as a result of the bankruptcy, but he or she also represents the creditors and is responsible to them for the liquidation and orderly distribution of the patrimony.

[23] In the cases before the Court, the trustees were responsible for liquidating a patrimony that included the GST and QST amounts in issue, as the Court of Appeal concluded (see paras. 51-55). In her reasons, Duval Hesler J.A. clearly and correctly defined the nature of the trustee's role in this respect. The reason why the supplier was given the status of a mandatary was to ensure that the tax qualified as a direct tax so that the imposition, by the province of Quebec, of the QST in a form compatible with that of the federal GST would be constitutional (para. 50). However, the fact that this tax is ultimately borne by the recipient does not support a finding that the supplier and then the trustee, the bankrupt's representative, merely collect and remit the Crown's "property" or "thing". The nature of the collection mechanism for the two taxes suggests another interpretation of the legal situation.

[24] This mechanism is designed to implement a direct tax that is also a tax on the value added at each stage of the production and marketing of the good or service until it is acquired by its ultimate recipient. In such a system, as Duval Hesler J.A. noted, —TRANSLATION— "[t]he dollar collected is not the dollar remitted" (para. 52).

[25] First of all, the collection mechanism does not require separate invoices for the GST and the QST. These taxes are indicated and included in the invoice or other document given to the recipient (s. 223 ETA; s. 425 AQST). Next, the tax amounts collected by suppliers are remitted in accordance with the accrual, not cash, method of accounting. At periodic intervals, which vary depending on the individual supplier's sales and sometimes on the nature of the business, suppliers remit to the tax authorities amounts corresponding to the tax amounts that have been billed for and are collectible during the reporting period in question even if these collectible amounts have not in fact been collected from the recipients. When sending remittances, suppliers deduct from the amounts being remitted credits corresponding to their own inputs, that is, to the taxes they have paid to their own suppliers. Thus, they remit net tax amounts based on the difference between the taxes they have collected and the taxes they themselves have paid (s. 228 ETA; s. 437 AQST). At times, under this system, they can obtain rebates.

[26] Moreover, nothing in the legislation respecting the GST and the QST requires suppliers to keep the taxes they collect separate. Until a bankruptcy occurs, only the deemed trusts established by s. 222 ETA and s. 20 AMR lead to this legal result by giving the tax authorities a right to equivalent amounts from the suppliers' assets. Finally, while it is true that the recipient owes the tax to the Crown, a supplier who has remitted the tax owed by the recipient but has not collected it has a cause of action against the recipient (s. 224 ETA; s. 427 AQST).

[27] The statutory mandate imposed on the supplier to collect the GST and the QST differs from the mandate in issue in Victuni, which related to the acquisition and development of an immovable. The mandate with respect to the two taxes involves the performance of obligations to collect and then to remit, not the amounts collected, but a balance resulting from offsetting claims of the Crown and the supplier. The existence of these offsetting claims confirms that claims for the amounts collected by suppliers are fungible, as this Court in fact pointed out in British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24, at pp. 34-35.

[28] I note that the appellants' position amounts to maintaining that the deemed trusts established by s. 222 ETA and s. 20 AMR continue to exist after a bankruptcy. The appellants' argument is inconsistent with the nature of their rights under the system for the collection and remittance of the GST and QST. It also conflicts with Parliament's clear intent and with the very explicit wording of the relevant statutory provisions regarding what is to happen if a supplier goes bankrupt. Before 1992, the Crown held a priority where certain tax claims were concerned. These claims were often protected by an increasingly complex series of statutory deemed trusts. The 1992 amendments to the BIA rendered these trusts ineffective in a bankruptcy situation, although there were exceptions with respect, for example, to claims for income tax source deductions (see, for example, Caisse populaire Desjardins de l'Est de Drummond v. Canada, 2009 SCC 29 (CanLII), 2009 SCC 29, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 94). Other than where these exceptions apply, when a debtor goes bankrupt, the Crown becomes an ordinary creditor. The trustee will give it the same priority as other creditors of the same rank. The trustee will be personally responsible for paying the GST or QST in respect of its own activities only (s. 265 ETA; s. 302.1 AQST).

[29] Canadian tax authorities are bound by the choice of legislative policy now expressed in the BIA. The order of priority established in the BIA is also binding on the Quebec tax authorities, even though the AMR is silent on what happens to the deemed trust established in s. 20 thereof in the event of bankruptcy. The appellants' arguments conflict with both the words of the statutory provisions in question and their underlying legislative intent, and cannot be accepted.

V. Conclusion

[30] For these reasons, I would affirm the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal and dismiss the appellants' appeals with costs.

Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E---15

165. (1) Subject to this Part, every recipient of a taxable supply made in Canada shall pay to Her Majesty in right of Canada tax in respect of the supply calculated at the rate of 5% on the value of the consideration for the supply.

221. (1) Every person who makes a taxable supply shall, as agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada, collect the tax under Division II payable by the recipient in respect of the supply.

222. (1) Subject to subsection (1.1), every person who collects an amount as or on account of tax under Division II is deemed, for all purposes and despite any security interest in the amount, to hold the amount in trust for Her Majesty in right of Canada, separate and apart from the property of the person and from property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, until the amount is remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn under subsection (2).

(1.1) Subsection (1) does not apply, at or after the time a person becomes a bankrupt (within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), to any amounts that, before that time, were collected or became collectible by the person as or on account of tax under Division II.

(3) Despite any other provision of this Act (except subsection (4)), any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), any enactment of a province or any other law, if at any time an amount deemed by subsection (1) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn in the manner and at the time provided under this Part, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust, is deemed

(a) to be held, from the time the amount was collected by the person, in trust for Her Majesty, separate and apart from the property of the person, whether or not the property is subject to a security interest, and

(b) to form no part of the estate or property of the person from the time the amount was collected, whether or not the property has in fact been kept separate and apart from the estate or property of the person and whether or not the property is subject to a security interest and is property beneficially owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada despite any security interest in the property or in the proceeds thereof and the proceeds of the property shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all security interests.

20. Every person who deducts, withholds or collects any amount under a fiscal law is deemed to hold it in trust for the State, separately from the person's patrimony and the person's own funds, for payment to the State in the manner and at the time provided under a fiscal law.

Where at any time an amount deemed by the first paragraph to be held by a person in trust for the State is not paid to the State in the manner and at the time provided under a fiscal law, an amount equal to the amount thus deducted, withheld or collected is deemed, from the time the amount is deducted, withheld or collected, to be held in trust for the State, separately from the person's patrimony and the person's own funds, and to form a separate fund not forming part of the property of that person, whether or not the amount has in fact been held separately from that person's patrimony or that person's own funds.

23. Every person who does not collect a duty that he was bound to collect as a mandatary of the Minister or does not withhold a duty that he was bound to withhold, under a fiscal law or a regulation made under such a law, shall become a debtor of the State for the amount of that duty, with the exception of the withholding provided for in section 1015 of the Taxation Act (chapter I---3), unless the withholding concerns a duty that a person was required to withhold from an amount paid to another person who is not resident in Canada for services performed in Québec.

24. Every person who deducts, withholds or collects an amount under a fiscal law is bound to pay to the Minister, at the date fixed by such law, or in accordance with the provision for such payment, an amount equal to that which the person must remit under the said Act.

67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(2) Subject to subsection (3), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a bankrupt shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty for the purpose of paragraph (1)(a) unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan or subsection 86(2) or (2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act (each of which is in this subsection referred to as a "federal provision") nor in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under any law of a province that creates a deemed trust the sole purpose of which is to ensure remittance to Her Majesty in right of the province of amounts deducted or withheld under a law of the province where

(a) that law of the province imposes a tax similar in nature to the tax imposed under the Income Tax Act and the amounts deducted or withheld under that law of the province are of the same nature as the amounts referred to in subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, or

(b) the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan, that law of the province establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection and the amounts deducted or withheld under that law of the province are of the same nature as amounts referred to in subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan, and for the purpose of this subsection, any provision of a law of a province that creates a deemed trust is, notwithstanding any Act of Canada or of a province or any other law, deemed to have the same effect and scope against any creditor, however secured, as the corresponding federal provision.

86. (1) In relation to a bankruptcy or proposal, all provable claims, including secured claims, of Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or of any body under an Act respecting workers' compensation, in this section and in section 87 called a "workers' compensation body", rank as unsecured claims.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO
OSBORNE A.C.J.O., WEILER and CHARRON JJ.A.

IN THE MATTER OF THE BANKRUPTCY OF NYCOLE LANDRY, residing in the Township of Longueuil, in the County of Prescott, in the Province of Ontario

Robert J. Smith and John P. O'Toole, for the Appellant, Deloitte & Touche

Matthew J. Halpin, for the Respondent Nycole Landry

Heard: May 26, 2000

On appeal from the decision of the Honourable Mr. Justice James B. Chadwick dated September 13, 1999.

CHARRON J.A.:

[1] The respondent, Nycole Landry, declared bankruptcy on June 4, 1997 and the appellant, Deloitte & Touche, was appointed trustee of the bankrupt's estate. Landry has been discharged from bankruptcy on October 15, 1998. The trustee has not yet been discharged and is still attempting to realize upon the assets of the bankrupt's estate for the benefit of the creditors. This proceeding concerns one potential asset.

A. The Facts

[2] The relevant facts can be stated succinctly.

[3] In 1993, Landry was dismissed from her employment as a pilot with First Air. That same year, she brought a claim for unjust dismissal against First Air under the Canada Labour Code R.S.C. 1985, c. L-2. At the end of a first hearing, the arbitrator found that Landry had been unjustly dismissed.

[4] The employer successfully appealed the arbitrator's finding and a new hearing was ordered. Shortly before the second hearing, Landry changed solicitors. In May 1997, the first solicitor's costs were assessed in the amount of $77,500. Landry declared bankruptcy on June 4, 1997. The first solicitor is the main, if not the only, creditor in the bankruptcy.

[5] Landry obtained an absolute discharge from her bankruptcy on October 15, 1998 which effectively discharged her from her debt to the first solicitor. The trustee did not oppose the discharge but made it clear to Landry that the trustee maintained the right to claim any part of an eventual award of damages for unjust dismissal.

[6] In December 1998, at the conclusion of a second hearing under the Canada Labour Code, a different arbitrator also found that Landry was unjustly dismissed. When the trustee became aware of the arbitrator's decision, the trustee unsuccessfully attempted to intervene in the proceedings to claim the first solicitor's costs.

Digitized by Google

[7] The arbitrator's decision on the award has not yet been delivered and apparently awaits the outcome of this appeal. Although the exact amount is uncertain, the parties agree that Landry can expect to receive, as part of the award, some monies for lost wages.

B. The Trustee's Motion

[8] In the Spring of 1999, the trustee moved before Chadwick J. under ss. 67, 68 and 71 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA") for various forms of relief with respect to the expected arbitrator's award. The trustee sought a declaration that any amount awarded in relation to lost wages[1] constituted property of the bankrupt that vested in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors, either through the automatic operation of ss. 67 and 71(2) or pursuant to an order that the court should make under s. 68. (Simply put, s. 67 defines the property of the bankrupt that is divisible among the creditors, s. 71(2) is a general vesting provision and s. 68 makes specific provisions with respect to either the "total income" of the bankrupt -if the current provision applies, or the bankrupt's "salary, wages, or other remuneration" from employment -if the former version applies.) The trustee also sought a declaration that Landry's claim against First Air vested in the trustee on the date of bankruptcy and that the trustee was therefore entitled to intervene in the proceedings before the arbitrator to seek an order for costs in relation to the first solicitor's account. Finally, the trustee sought an order for a lien under s. 34 of the Solicitors Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. S-15.

C. The Decision Under Appeal

[9] Chadwick J. held that, even if that part of the settlement related to wages in lieu of notice could arguably form part of the bankrupt estate under s. 67, 80% of this amount would be exempt pursuant to the provisions of the Wages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. W-1 incorporated under s. 67(1)(b) of the BIA. In view of the small amount of money that could be apportioned, the motions judge stated that he was not prepared to make any order under s. 67. The motions held further that the current s. 68 applied but that the trustee was precluded from resorting to its provisions because the section applied only to undischarged bankrupts and because the trustee had not followed the procedure set out under s. 68. On the question of costs, the motions judge held that neither the trustee nor the former solicitors had any status in seeking an order for costs before the arbitrator as the costs are those of the client Landry and that she had waived her claim for costs as a result of her bankruptcy. Finally the motions judge refused to make an order for a lien under the Solicitors Act and dismissed the trustee's motion. The trustee appeals from this decision on all questions except that the trustee does not pursue the request for a lien under the Solicitors Act.

D. The Issues on the Appeal

[10] This appeal therefore raises the following questions:

1. Does Landry's claim against First Air or any part of the resulting award constitute property of the bankrupt that vests in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71(2)of the BIA?
2. If so, does any exemption apply pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) so as to except any part of the property from the estate of the bankrupt?
3. Is s. 67 superseded by the provisions of s. 68 in relation to a bankrupt's wages?
4. If so, which provision applies, the former s. 68 which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy, or the present s. 68 which was in force at the time the trustee brought its motion?
5. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 after the discharge of the bankrupt?
6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to the current s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?
7. Does the trustee have standing to intervene in the proceeding under the Canada Labour Code to claim Landry's costs incurred at the first arbitration hearing?

E. Analysis

1. Does Landry's claim against First Air or any part of the resulting award constitute property of the bankrupt that vests in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71(2) of the BIA?

[11] As stated earlier, s. 71(2) is a general vesting provision. It reads as follows:

71(2) Vesting of property in trustee – On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

[12] "Property" is defined under s. 2 of the BIA as including:

money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property. [Emphasis added.]

Digitized by Google

[13] "Things in action" encompass a claim for damages for breach of contract, including an action for wrongful dismissal: Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701. The parties do not dispute that Landry's claim against her former employer under the Canada Labour Code is a "thing in action" and therefore constitutes "property" for the purpose of the BIA. Hence, pursuant to s. 71(2), Landry's claim against her former employer would vest in the trustee on the date she declared bankruptcy and she would cease to have any capacity to deal with it. However, s. 71(2) is subject to the other provisions of the BIA.

[14] Section 67 of the BIA defines what property of a bankrupt is divisible among her creditors and can serve to restrict the ambit of s. 71(2). The relevant part of s. 67 reads as follows:

67.(1) Property of bankrupt – The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under any laws applicable in the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides, or

(b.1) such goods and services tax credit payments and prescribed payments relating to the essential needs of an individual as are made in prescribed circumstances and are not property referred to in paragraph (a) or (b),

but it shall comprise

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

[15] It is clear that s. 67(1)(c) is wide enough to encompass Landry's claim against her former employer and, consequently, any award of damages (other than those relating to personal claims, see footnote 1, supra) would form part of the property divisible among her creditors under that provision. A question then arises whether any part of the property falls within the exception made for exempt property under s. 67(1)(b).

2. Does any exemption apply pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) so as to except any part of the property from the estate of the bankrupt?

[16] As provided under s. 67(1)(b), the property of the bankrupt divisible among her creditors shall not comprise any property that as against Landry is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of Ontario. Landry relies on s. 7(2) of the Ontario Wages Act which provides that "80 per cent of a person's wages are exempt from seizure or garnishment." Therefore, if any part of the arbitrator's award constitutes "wages" within the meaning of s. 7(2), 80% of that amount would not constitute property divisible among Landry's creditors and, hence, would not vest in the trustee.

[17] At the hearing, counsel did not seriously dispute that the case of Wallace, supra provides support for the contention that the arbitrator's award of damages for unjust dismissal, in so far as it relates to lost wages, can be equated to actual wages.

[18] Wallace made a voluntary assignment into personal bankruptcy and remained an undischarged bankrupt when he commenced an action for wrongful dismissal against his former employer. A question arose whether Wallace could bring this action in his own name given the vesting provisions under s. 71(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 which, as s. 71(2) of the present BIA, provided that a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to deal with his property.

[19] Iacobucci J., in the majority judgment, (all justices were in agreement on this issue) stated (para. 58) that the wording of the Act is clear and that an undischarged bankrupt has no capacity to deal with his or her property, including an action for breach of contract, outside the circumstances described in s. 99(1) (which circumstances are of no relevance to this appeal). The Court held further that the Act made no distinction whether that property was acquired before or after the assignment in bankruptcy. However, the Court went on to consider the provisions of s. 68(1) of the Bankruptcy Act as it then read (this is the provision which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy) and concluded that it carved out an additional exception to this general rule. Section 68(1), in this earlier version, provided as follows:

68.(1) Notwithstanding subsection 67(1), where a bankrupt

(a) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any money as salary, wages or other remuneration from a person employing the bankrupt...

the trustee may, on the trustee's own initiative or, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall, make an application to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the money as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

[20] More will be said about the effect of s. 68 later in these reasons. What is of relevance to the question presently under consideration is the finding by the Court that Wallace, an undischarged bankrupt, could maintain his action against his former employer for damages for wrongful dismissal not because of the timing of the acquisition of the property "but rather, because of the nature of the property in question" (para. 59) which the court equated to "wages". Iacobucci J. wrote as follows (paras. 65-66):

Digitized by Google

As I see the matter, the underlying nature of the damages awarded in a wrongful dismissal action is clearly akin to the "wages" referred to in s. 68(1). In the absence of just cause, an employer remains free to dismiss an employee at any time provided that reasonable notice of the termination is given. In providing the employee with reasonable notice, the employer has two options: either to require the employee to continue working for the duration of that period or to give the employee pay in lieu of notice: D. Harris, Wrongful Dismissal (1989 (loose-leaf)), at p. 3-10. There can be no doubt that if the employer opted to require the employee to continue working during the notice period, his or her earnings during this time would constitute wages or salary under s. 68(1) of the Act. The only difference between these earnings and pay in lieu of notice is that the employee receives a lump sum payment instead of having that sum spread out over the course of the notice period. The nature of those funds remains the same and thus s. 68(1) will also apply in these circumstances.

In the event that an employee is wrongfully dismissed, the measure of damages for wrongful dismissal is the salary that the employee would have earned had the employee worked during the period of notice to which he or she was entitled: Sylvester v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 353 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 315. The fact that this sum is awarded as damages at trial in no way alters the fundamental character of the money. An award of damages in a wrongful dismissal action is in reality the wages that the employer ought to have paid the employee either over the course of the period of reasonable notice or as pay in lieu of notice. Therefore, in accordance with the exception which is carved out in s. 68(1) for "salary, wages or other remuneration", this money is not divisible among a bankrupt's creditors and does not vest in the trustee. The right of action is the means of attaining these damages and is similarly exempt.

[21] On the authority of Wallace, I conclude that, to the extent that the arbitrator's award relates to the pay Landry should have received in lieu of notice, the monies would constitute "wages" for the purpose of the s. 67(1)(b) exception. However, what is also clear from Wallace is that s. 67 must be considered in conjunction with s. 68. This brings us to the next question.

3. Is s. 67 superceded by the provisions of s.68 in relation to a bankrupt's wages?

[22] Two versions of s. 68 must be taken into account: the former version under the Bankruptcy Act that was considered in Wallace and the current version under the BIA which will be discussed shortly. There are two reasons why both versions must be examined. The first is that the former version and its interconnection with s. 67 was considered by the Supreme Court of Canada in Wallace and in Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765 and the question arises whether the reasoning in those cases applies to the new version. The second reason is that the trustee contends that the former version is applicable to this case since it was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy rather than the current version which was in force at the time the motion was brought. This latter argument forms the subject-matter of the next question on this appeal and will be dealt with later. I will now deal with the interpretation of s. 68 and its interconnection with s. 67.

a) The former s .68

[23] Section 68 under the Bankruptcy Act provided the trustee with the means to obtain part of a bankrupt's salary, wages or other remuneration from employment notwithstanding the provisions contained in s. 67(1). For our purposes, it is only necessary to consider s. 68(1) and I reproduce it again for convenience:

68.(1) Notwithstanding subsection 67(1), where a bankrupt

(a) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive, any money as salary, wages or other remuneration from a person employing the bankrupt, or

(b) is in receipt of, or is entitled to receive from a person any money as payment for or commission in respect of any services performed by the bankrupt,

the trustee may, on the trustee's own initiative or, if directed by the inspectors or the creditors, shall, make an application to the court for an order directing the payment to the trustee of such part of the money as the court may determine, having regard to the family responsibilities and personal situation of the bankrupt.

[24] This provision was considered at length by the Supreme Court of Canada in Marzetti. The particular facts and a number of other issues in Marzetti are not relevant to our discussion. What is relevant to this case is the Court's consideration of the interconnection between s. 67[2] and s. 68. Iacobucci J., in writing for the court, set out the issue as follows (at 178):

... I must determine whether s. 68 always controls the disposition of a bankrupt's wages. Is s. 68 a substantive provision, that is, one which always removes wages from the scope of s. 67, or does it simply create a procedural device for trustees?

[25] Following his analysis, he concluded as follows (at 185):

To summarize briefly, it is my opinion that the language of s. 68, the inferred purpose of that provision, and the decision of this Court in Vachon, supra, all support the conclusion that s. 68 is a substantive provision, one which is intended to operate as a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. These forms of property cannot fall within s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act as a bankrupt's after-acquired "property", and they cannot be considered

"property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67. They do not vest in the trustee through the simple operation of law.

[26] Hence, the Supreme Court in Marzetti, and later in Wallace, has authoritatively determined that s. 68 supercedes the provisions of s. 67 in so far as "salary, wages or other remuneration" from employment are concerned. It follows that, if this provision is applicable to this case, the Ontario Wages Act does not apply and neither does any other part of s. 67. There is no automatic vesting of Landry's claim against First Air or of any part of the arbitrator's award. The trustee, and the court, must look exclusively to s. 68 to determine what part, if any, of the award will form part of the bankrupt's estate for distribution to the creditors. The question becomes, does the same interpretation apply to the current s. 68 under the BIA?

[27] The current s. 68 in the BIA differs from the former version in a number of respects. The full text is appended to these reasons for ease of reference. First, the section does not refer to "salary, wages or other remuneration" but to "total income". "[T]otal income" is defined for the purpose of s. 68 as including, "notwithstanding s. 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source". The section still allows the trustee to apply to the court for a determination of the amount that a bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt out of her total income but an elaborate procedure must be followed before such an application is made. For our purposes, this procedure can be summarized as follows.

[28] First, the Superintendent is directed to establish standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Second, the trustee, having regard to these standards and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, must fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay, inform the official receiver of his decision and take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay. Third, where the official receiver determines that the fixed amount is not in accordance with the applicable standards, the official receiver must recommend an appropriate amount. Fourth, where the trustee and the bankrupt disagree on the amount to be paid, the trustee must send to the official receiver a request that the matter be determined by mediation. A creditor can also make a request for mediation. Fifth, the mediation takes place in accordance with prescribed procedures.

[29] In addition to this procedure, an application may be made to the court under s. 68(10):

68. (10) Where

(a) the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5),

(b) the issue submitted to mediation requested under subsection (6) or (7) is not thereby resolved, or

(c) the bankrupt fails to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section,

the trustee may, or on the request of the inspectors, any of the creditors or the official receiver shall, apply to the court for the hearing of the matter, and the court may, on the hearing, in accordance with the standards established under subsection (1) and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, by order, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt.

[30] In my view, the reasoning in Marzetti and Wallace that led to the conclusion that s. 68 was a complete code with respect to wages applies equally to this new section. The current provision applies to the "total income" of the bankrupt and, as such, is even wider than the earlier reference to "salary, wages and other remuneration"; the provision expressly excludes the application of s. 67(1)(b)[3]; its purpose is no different than that described in Marzetti (except that applications to the court now appear to be limited to those cases where the issue cannot be otherwise resolved); and the jurisprudential principles reviewed by the Supreme Court in Marzetti are equally relevant.

[31] I therefore conclude that s. 67 is superseded by the provisions of the current s.68 in so far as the "total income" of the bankrupt is concerned. It follows that, as in Wallace, Landry's claim against her former employer and any consequent award relating to lost wages do not automatically vest in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71. Resort can only be had to s. 68 for payment of any portion thereof to the estate of the bankrupt.

4. Which provision applies, the former s.68 which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy, or the present s.68 which was in force at the time the trustee brought its motion?

[32] In my view, the motions judge was correct in holding that the current s. 68 of the BIA applies to this motion. The following transition provision (S.C. 1997, c. 12, s. 60(2)) is relevant:

Subsection (1) [which re-enacted s. 68] applies to bankruptcies in respect of which proceedings are commenced after that subsection comes into force [April 30, 1998].

[33] A plain reading of the section would indicate that the trustee's motion under s. 68 itself is a proceeding within the meaning of that provision. Counsel could not articulate any policy reason why the new section should not apply.

[34] I therefore conclude that the current s. 68 under the BIA applies to this proceeding.

5. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 after the discharge of the bankrupt?

Digitized by Google

[35] The motions judge held that s. 68 was no longer available to a trustee after the discharge of a bankrupt. First, the motions judge noted that s. 68 refers to "a bankrupt" and that s. 2 defined "bankrupt" as "a person who has made an assignment or against whom a receiving order has been made or the legal status of that person". Second, the motions judge held that the section was intended to apply in the period from the assignment in bankruptcy or the receivership order until the discharge of the bankrupt. He therefore concluded that s. 68 applied to a bankrupt and not to a discharged bankrupt.

[36] In my view, this interpretation cannot be supported.

[37] First, it disregards the fact that the definition of "bankrupt" does not only refer to "the legal status of [the] person" - since Landry has been discharged, it is correct to say that she is no longer in the state of bankruptcy, but also to "a person who has made an assignment" - a description that clearly applies to Landry.[4]

[38] Second, the motions judge erred in his interpretation of the scope of the section. Although, from a practical standpoint, s. 68 may apply more commonly to periodic wages received during the period of time between the assignment and the discharge, I see nothing in the language of the provision that restricts its application to this time frame. It is clear from Wallace and Marzetti that s. 68 applies because of the nature of the property in question, regardless of the timing of the acquisition of the property or of the fact that the payment is made in a lump sum.

[39] Third, I do not see any policy reason why, in situations such as in this case where the income is only to be received after the discharge, resort to s. 68 would nonetheless have to be made before the discharge. Indeed, given the procedure set out under s.68, it may be impossible to resort to its provisions before payment is made or at least its quantum ascertained. Further, if resort to s. 68 were to be limited to the pre-discharge period, the trustee or the creditors would likely oppose any discharge if any payment of income was still pending at the time the bankrupt applied for a discharge. I am therefore concerned that such an interpretation would have the effect of unnecessarily postponing discharges until the full administration of the estate is completed. In cases where there is pending litigation over the payment of such income, the delay in obtaining a discharge could prove quite substantial. This result, in my view would militate against the prompt rehabilitation of the bankrupt. Finally, such an interpretation runs contrary to the established principle and practice that the trustee's obligation to realize and distribute the estate of the bankrupt continues until the trustee is discharged regardless of the prior discharge of the bankrupt: see Re Salloum 1990 CanLII 2260 (BC CA), (1990), 1 C.B.R. (3rd) 204 (B.C.C.A.).

[40] I therefore conclude that the trustee is not precluded from resorting to s. 68 by the fact that Landry has been discharged.

6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?

[41] The motions judge was correct in noting that, before an application can be made to the court under s. 68(10) to fix the amount of the bankrupt's income that is payable to the estate of the bankrupt, the trustee must bring himself under the terms of that provision. As discussed earlier, by its terms, s. 68(10) effectively limits the number of applications to the court to those cases where the issue has not otherwise been resolved by consent or mediation in accordance with the established procedure. In this case, of course, it was impossible for the trustee to have followed this procedure since the arbitrator's award was not yet ascertained. Once the arbitrator's decision is made, the trustee will be in a position to fix the amount which, in its view, must be paid to the estate and the balance of the procedure set out in s. 68 can follow its course. Hence, the trustee's motion, in so far as it purports to be made under s. 68(10), is simply premature.

[42] However, the trustee's motion was not made strictly under s. 68(10). It is apparent from the relief sought, which was mainly declaratory in nature, that the motion was brought with a view to preserving a potential asset in anticipation of a future determination of the parties' rights under s. 68. In my view, the motions judge erred in foreclosing any resort to s. 68 on the basis that the procedure set out thereunder had not been followed. At worst, the motion could have been dismissed as premature. However, in the circumstances of this case, it is my view that the motions judge should have exercised his discretion and directed that any monies awarded by the arbitrator to Landry as compensation for lost wages be paid into court until the resolution of the parties' respective rights under s. 68 or until further direction of the court. It is open to this court to make an order which could have been made by the motions judge and I would therefore make such an order.

7. Does the trustee have standing to intervene in the proceeding under the Canada Labour Code to claim Landry's costs incurred at the first hearing?

[43] The question whether it would even be within the arbitrator's power to award costs in relation to the first hearing is not before this court. The issue here is whether Landry's right, if any, to claim costs in the Canada Labour Code proceeding vests in the trustee. In my view, it does not.

[44] As stated earlier, on the authority of Wallace, Landry's claim against her former employer did not vest in the trustee upon her bankruptcy. Hence Landry had the right, as she did, to pursue her proceeding under the Canada Labour

Code in her own name. Any right she may have to claim costs in relation to this proceeding is not an independent thing in action. Rather, it is simply a consequential right that may flow from the result. The trustee has not established any basis upon which it could intervene. I would not interfere with the motions judge's decision on this point.

F. Disposition

[45] I would therefore answer the questions as follows:

1. Does Landry's claim against First Air or any part of the resulting award constitute property of the bankrupt that vests in the trustee under ss. 67 and 71(2)of the BIA?

Yes but these provisions are superseded by s. 68 of the BIA.

2. If so, does any exemption apply pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) so as to except any part of the property from the estate of the bankrupt?

Yes but this exception is superceded by s. 68 of the BIA.

3. Is s. 67 superceded by the provisions of s. 68 in relation to a bankrupt's wages?

Yes.

4. If so, which provision applies, the former s. 68 which was in force at the time Landry declared bankruptcy, or the present s. 68 which was in force at the time the trustee brought its motion?

The current s. 68 under the BIA.

5. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 after the discharge of the bankrupt?

No.

6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to the current s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?

No.

7. Does the trustee have standing to intervene in the proceeding under the Canada Labour Code to claim Landry's costs incurred at the first arbitration hearing?

No.

[46] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside Chadwick J.'s order, order that any monies awarded by the arbitrator to Landry as compensation for lost wages be paid into the bankruptcy court until the resolution of the parties' respective rights under s.68 or until further directions of that court. I would allow the trustee its costs of the motion and of the appeal against the estate of the bankrupt.

APPENDIX

Section 68 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act

68. (1) Directives re standard of living factors – The Superintendent shall, by directive, establish in respect of the provinces or one or more bankruptcy districts or parts of bankruptcy districts, the standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

(2) Interpretation – For the purposes of this section,

(a) "total income" referred to in subsection (1) includes, notwithstanding paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source; and

(b) a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate of the bankrupt is enforceable against all property of the bankrupt, other than property referred to in paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1).

(3) Trustee to fix amount to be paid – The trustee shall

(a) having regard to the applicable standards established under subsection (1), and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt;

(b) inform the official receiver in writing of the amount fixed under paragraph (a); and

(c) take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay.

(4) Modification by trustee – The trustee may, at any time, amend an amount fixed under subsection (3) to take into account

(a) material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt; or

(b) a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5).

(5) Official receiver recommendation – Where the official receiver determines that the amount required to be paid by the bankrupt under subsection (3) or (4) is substantially not in accordance with the applicable standards established under subsection (1), the official receiver shall recommend to the trustee and to the bankrupt an amount required to be paid that the official receiver determines is in accordance with the applicable standards.

(6) Trustee may request mediation – Where the trustee and the bankrupt are not in agreement with the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4), the trustee shall, forthwith, in the prescribed form, send to the official receiver a request that the matter be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt.

(7) Creditor may request mediation – On the request in writing of a creditor made within thirty days after the date of bankruptcy or an amendment referred to in subsection (4), the trustee shall, within the five days following the thirty day period, send to the official receiver a request in the prescribed form that the matter of the amount the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4) be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt and the creditor.

(8) Mediation procedure – A mediation shall be in accordance with prescribed procedures.

(9) File – Documents contained in a file on the mediation of a matter under this section form part of the records referred to in subsection 11.1(2).

(10) Court determination – Where

(a) the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5),

(b) the issue submitted to mediation requested under subsection (6) or (7) is not thereby resolved, or

(c) the bankrupt fails to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section,

the trustee may, or on the request of the inspectors, any of the creditors or the official receiver shall, apply to the court for the hearing of the matter, and the court may, on the hearing, in accordance with the standards established under subsection (1) and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, by order, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt.

(11) Fixing fair and reasonable remuneration in the case of related persons – The court may fix an amount that is fair and reasonable

(a) as salary, wages or other remuneration for the services being performed by a bankrupt for a person employing the bankrupt, or

(b) as payment for or commission in respect of any services being performed by a bankrupt for a person,

where the person is related to the bankrupt, and the court may, by order, determine the part of the salary, wages or other remuneration, or the part of the payment or commission, that shall be paid to the trustee on the basis of the amount so fixed by the court, unless it appears to the court that the services have been performed for the benefit of the bankrupt and are not of any substantial benefit to the person for whom they were performed.

(12) Modification of order – On the application of any interested person, the court may, at any time, amend an order made under this section to take into account material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt.

(13) Default by other person – An order of the court made under this section may be served on a person from whom the bankrupt is entitled to receive money and, in such case,

(a) the order binds the person to pay to the estate of the bankrupt the amount fixed by the order; and

(b) if the person fails to comply with the terms of the order, the court may, on the application of the trustee, order the person to pay the trustee the amount of money that the estate of the bankrupt would have received had the person complied with the terms of the order.

(14) Application is a proceeding – For the purposes of section 38, an application referred to in subsection (10) is deemed to be a proceeding for the benefit of the estate.

[1] The trustee acknowledged before the motions judge that any award of damages relating to personal claims other than for loss wages would not form part of the bankrupt's estate: Re: Holley (1986), 59 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17 (Ont. C.A.).

[2] Section 67 which was in force at the time has been modified in the current BIA but the changes are not relevant to this analysis.

[3] The fact that the current version is not expressly stated to apply notwithstanding the whole of s.67 as the earlier version did is, in my view, of no consequence. The remaining rationale in Marzetti leads to the conclusion that s.68 is a complete code with respect to this kind of property.

[4] The BIA contains many provisions where the word "bankrupt" is used in relation to the post-discharge period. See for example s.180 where the BIA provides that "[w]here a bankrupt after his discharge fails to perform the duties imposed on him by this Act, the court may, on application, annul his discharge." It is evident that "bankrupt" here applies to a discharged bankrupt.

Manitoba Court of Appeal
Berthelette (Bankrupt) (Re)
Date: 1999-06-24
Docket: AI 98-30-03664
H. Günter and R.B. Lindey, for the appellant.
R. W. Schwartz, for the respondent, BDO Dunwoody Limited.
D.W. Leslie, for the respondent, Canadian Insolvency Practitioners Association.
The judgment of the court was delivered by Philp J.A.:
Introduction
[1] The amount in issue in this summary administration bankruptcy proceeding is $196.00. The Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the superintendent) argues, however, that important questions affecting the summary administration of estates under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (the Act) are raised which have resulted in disparate judgments in the courts of other provinces.
The Facts
[2] The issues arise out of uncomplicated factual circumstances that, apart from one inference the Court is invited to draw, are not disputed. On January 4, 1994, Nicole Marie Berthelette (the bankrupt), a first-time bankrupt, made an assignment in bankruptcy under the Act. On the same day, she signed a document entitled "Agreement Letter," which provided:

> I, Nicole Marie Bethelette [sic], hereby agree to pay David I. Guttman, Trustee in Bankruptcy, any deficiency in fees arising out of my Assignment in Bankruptcy.

[3] The bankrupt's realizable assets were negligible, and the administration of her bankruptcy proceeded summarily. On March 29, 1995, she received an absolute discharge.
[4] The trustee1 filed its final statement of receipts and disbursements on September 12, 1996. The statement disclosed receipts totalling $1,080.25 and disbursements of $231.90, leaving $848.35 for the trustee's fees. The fees to which a trustee is entitled for the summary administration of an estate are calculated, pursuant to Rule 115(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Rules2, on the receipts of the estate. On receipts of $1,080.25, the amount of the fees under the Rule is $1,011.84. (The trustee's statement erroneously shows this calculation to be $1,009.58.)
[5] There was, therefore, a shortfall or deficiency of $163.49 between the trustee's fees calculated pursuant to the Rule and the amount available for distribution.
[6] On October 31, 1996, the trustee received a payment of $196.00 from the bankrupt pursuant to the agreement letter. Four days later, on November 4, 1996, the trustee filed an amended statement of receipts and disbursements, which included the payment of $196.00 as a receipt of the estate. In the amended statement, the receipts total $1,276.25 and the trustee's fees, calculated on those receipts pursuant to Rule 115(1), are shown as $1,080.44.
[7] The amount available for payment of the trustee's fees in the amended statement has increased to $1,044.35 ($848.35 the amount available in the first statement, plus the payment of $196.00). The revised amount available is insufficient to pay his re-calculated fees, but more than sufficient to pay the fees calculated in the first statement on receipts of the estate before the payment of $196.00.

Digitized by Google

[8] The superintendent raised concerns that the trustee had not obtained an order under s. 68 of the Act with respect to the post-bankruptcy payment of $196.00 and with regard to the trustee's authority to collect or receive that payment after the bankrupt's absolute discharge. The superintendent requested that the trustee's accounts be taxed.

[9] To complete the factual circumstances, the superintendent invites the Court to make the finding not made by the registrar or the motions court judge that the payment of $196.00 came out of the bankrupt's modest monthly take-home pay. That is likely not an unreasonable inference to draw in light of her impecunious circumstances, but because of the conclusion I have reached with respect to the application of s. 68 of the Act, it is an inference I need not draw.

The Issue

[10] The registrar identified the issue before her as (reflex, (1997), 120 Man.R. (2d) 302, at para. 1):

> ...[W]hether the payment of $196 received from the bankrupt after her discharge should be included in the receipts on which the trustee's fee is based.

On appeal, Jewers J., the motions court judge, identified the issue in similar words. In this Court, the parties agree that the issue is:

> Did the Learned Motions Court Judge err in law in holding that there is no statutory provision, regulation, directive or policy which prevents the Trustee from accepting, and basing its fee upon, payments made by a bankrupt after the bankrupt's discharge pursuant to an agreement with the Trustee?

[11] As we will see, broader questions than those that have been put before the courts emerge from the factual circumstances.

Pertinent Legislation

[12] Sections 68(1), (2) and (8), 121(1), 178(1) and (2), and 202(1)(h) of the Act, as they were at the times relevant to the facts of this appeal, are set out in the appendix that follows these reasons. Section 68 was amended in 1997. A different regime for the attachment of a bankrupt's post-assignment (or post-receiving order) remuneration now applies to bankruptcies in respect of which proceedings are commenced after April 30, 1998 (the date the new section came into force). The earlier version, which applies to the circumstances of this appeal, is set out in the appendix.

Judgments

[13] The registrar concluded (at para. 9):

> ...[T]here is no statutory provision, regulation, directive or public policy which prevents the trustee from accepting, and basing its fee upon, payments made by a bankrupt after her discharge pursuant to an agreement with the trustee. Nor is there any judicial authority which binds or persuades me otherwise.

[14] In arriving at that conclusion, the registrar reasoned, and the motions court judge agreed, that court approval under s. 68 of the Act was not required "if the trustee and the bankrupt are in agreement."

[15] The registrar also reasoned (at para. 16) that any claim arising from the agreement letter arose "by reason of an obligation incurred on the day she became a bankrupt" and therefore "would not be a claim provable in a bankruptcy and would therefore not be released by s. 178(2)" (my emphasis). She declined to follow Privé, Re reflex, (1995), 36 C.B.R. (3d) 152 (Que. S.C.), in which Guthrie J. concluded (at para. 20) that s. 178(1) "must cover 'all debts' and not just 'claims provable in bankruptcy' (s. 178(2))" and that "[t]herefore, the 'debt' of the bankrupt towards the trustee, under the terms of their agreement, would also be released!"

[16] The motions court judge adopted the reasons of the registrar with respect to the application of s. 68 of the Act and the effect of s. 178(2). He, too, declined to follow Privé, Re. He wrote (reflex, (1998), 124 Man.R. (2d) 261, at para. 28):

> However, I agree with [counsel for the intervenor] that the reference to 'all debts' must be to debts provable in bankruptcy. The trustee can only certify that the debts provable in bankruptcy are released because the discharge obviously cannot and does not affect debts which are not provable in bankruptcy.

Analysis

Section 68

[17] I agree that s. 68 of the Act has no application to the circumstances of this bankruptcy, but not for the reasons given by the registrar and adopted by the motions court judge. The argument of the superintendent that "a trustee can only access [sic] a bankrupt's wages and salary for the purposes of making [sic] a deficiency in the minimum fees and disbursements that the trustee has set for its own internal purposes through a s. 68" order has no application to the facts before the Court. While it might be reasonable to infer that the payment of $196.00 came out of the bankrupt's wages or salary, it is not a reasonable inference that the payment, made 19 months after her discharge, was made out of her earnings after her assignment and prior to her discharge. The requirement for an order under s. 68 attaching post-assignment income of the bankrupt never arose in the factual circumstances of this appeal.

Digitized by Google

[18] Parenthetically, it should be noted that s. 68 of the Act, as re-enacted in 1997, provides a quite different regime for the attachment of the post-assignment income of a bankrupt. The trustee is now required, without an application to the court, to fix the amount the bankrupt must pay to the bankrupt estate.

[19] Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765 (S.C.C.), it would appear, was not referred to the registrar or motions court judge, or considered by them. In that decision, Iacobucci J., writing for the Court, concluded (at p. 794) that s. 68 (the 1992 version) is "a substantive provision, one which is intended to operate as a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration."

[20] The registrar and the motions court judge appear to have concluded that, notwithstanding s. 68, nothing in the Act prevented agreements between a bankrupt and his/her trustee relating to post-assignment remuneration. Courts in Quebec have reached a similar conclusion. See: Duquette, Re, [1995] R.D.J. 403 (Que. CA.); Sinsofsky, Re (December 23, 1998), Doc. C.A. Montreal 500-09-000482-950 (Que. CA.); and Vanderbanck, Re (December 23, 1998), Doc. CA. Montreal 500-09-000483-958 (Que. CA.). In Clark, Re (Alta. Q.B., April 6, 1998, No. BK-01-055797) [reported 1998 CanLII 18153 (AB QB), (1998), 8 C.B.R. (4th) 2 (Alta. Q.B.)], Forsyth J. was of a different view. He rejected the conclusion of the motions court judge in this appeal and found "that agreements of this nature are not contemplated by the Bankruptcy Act."

[21] Marzetti, it seems to me, resolves the dichotomy. I do not see how agreements relating to a bankrupt's post-assignment earnings can survive the Supreme Court's characterization of s. 68 as "a substantive provision, ... a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration." However, that is a conclusion that need not be made in the circumstances of this appeal.

Sections 121(1) and 178(2)

[22] As noted above, the registrar concluded that the bankrupt's obligation under the agreement letter "would not be a claim provable in a bankruptcy and would therefore not be released by s. 178(2)." That is so, she reasoned, because the obligation was incurred on the day the bankrupt became a bankrupt. The registrar did not consider the other arm of claims provable under s. 121(1); namely, "[a]ll debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupf (my emphasis).

[23] From information provided to the Court at the second hearing of the appeal, it would appear that the assignment, statement of affairs, and agreement letter were signed by the bankrupt at the same time and in that order, and that the assignment and statement of affairs were filed later the same day with the official receiver.

[24] In Houlden & Morawetz, The 1999 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (1998), the authors acknowledge (at p. 436) that:

> The expression "the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt" is ambiguous; presumably, it means the date on which the assignment is filed or the receiving order is made. A debt or liability incurred by the bankrupt after the filing of the petition but prior to the making of a receiving order is a provable claim: Re Tunnell (1924), 5 C.B.R. 73, 56 O.L.R. 100, [1924] 4 D.L.R. 862 (C.A.).

Other sections of the Act support that interpretation. Section 49(3) provides that an assignment "is inoperative until filed with [the] official receiver," and s. 71 (1)3 provides that "[a] bankruptcy shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at the time ... of the filing of an assignment with the official receiver."

[25] Applying that interpretation to the factual circumstances of this appeal, I conclude that whatever debt or liability arose under the agreement letter was one "to which the bankrupt [was] subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt." Assuming that the bankrupt's obligation under the agreement letter was enforceable at law — a conclusion questioned by counsel for the trustee at the appeal hearing, but not an issue before the Court for determination on the appeal — the obligation was a claim provable in bankruptcy pursuant to s. 121(1) of the Act. On the bankrupt's absolute discharge on March 29, 1995, her obligation under the agreement letter was released — s. 178(2). She was under no legal obligation to pay any sum to the trustee under the agreement letter after her absolute discharge. The sum of $196.00 which the bankrupt paid to the trustee on October 31, 1996, was not a receipt of the estate for the purpose of calculating the fees of the trustee pursuant to Rule 115(1).

[26] Permit me a few obiter comments that are prompted by the reasons of the registrar and the motions court judge and by the shifting arguments that were put before the Court by counsel as the appeal progressed.

[27] Firstly, s. 202(1)(h) of the Act was cited to the Court by counsel for the superintendent. He argued that the motions court judge erred in concluding (at para. 18):

> ...[I]n this case the remuneration to which the trustee was entitled exceeded that actually charged and Parliament could not have intended to make it an offence for the trustee to agree with the bankrupt that the latter should make up any deficiency in the fees and disbursements properly payable under the Act.

He points out, as the motions court judge recognized, that "there is no minimum fee under Rule 115" and argues, therefore, "there can never be any 'deficiency' in the fees and disbursements 'properly' payable under the Act." However, whether or not the agreement letter constituted an offence under s. 202(1)(h) is a question that is not before the Court for determination on this appeal.

[28] Secondly, the thrust of the argument of the trustee (and the intervenor) is that "[t]he payment of $196.00 is a voluntary payment made by the bankrupt to the Trustee pursuant to the agreement made on the date of the bankruptcy" (my emphasis). That is a contradiction in terms. The argument that the agreement letter was "collateral to the assignment" and was "inoperative until the assignment was filed" is simply an attempt to put too fine a point on an issue that need not be determined on this appeal.

[29] Finally, the provisions in the Act for the summary administration of estates may invite a relaxed interpretation of the statutory duties and obligations imposed upon the trustee in the administration of a bankruptcy. Policy considerations — the ability of debtors like the bankrupt in this appeal, who possess few, if any, realizable assets, to obtain access to the scheme of the Act and to become rehabilitated unfettered by his/her past debts and liabilities — would seem to support that kind of interpretation. The registrar and the motions court judge concluded that the Act did not prevent payments by a bankrupt to his/her trustee pursuant to an agreement. However, Forsyth J. observed in Clark, Re:

> ...[I]f it is determined that such agreements are of benefit to the creditors as a whole, it is up to parliament and not to this court to make amendments to the Act sufficient to make it clear that arrangements of this nature are in order.

[30] The trustee referred the Court to Directive No. 11, issued by the superintendent on October 23, 1986, entitled Bankruptcy Assistance Program. That directive outlines a program to accommodate "overburdened debtors [who] are unable to demonstrate to a trustee that sufficient funds will be available in the estate to cover administration costs" and are therefore "unable to secure services of a trustee to administer their bankruptcy." Paragraph 18 of the directive provides:

> In cases where a debtor's income is in excess of the amounts determined by the Superintendent's guidelines (which are based on the Senate Committee Poverty Lines (SCPL) as amended), the debtor is expected to provide voluntary payments to the estate in accordance with the SCPL guideline. In those circumstances where the debtor, without valid reasons, refuses to abide by these guidelines, the trustee may refuse to grant the debtor's request for bankruptcy service.
> (my emphasis)

[31] However commendable the purposes of the directive and the provision for "voluntary payments" by a bankrupt may be, the authority of a trustee to attach the earnings of a bankrupt, even by the expectation that the bankrupt will provide voluntary payments to the estate, has been put in doubt by the decision of the Supreme Court in Marzetti. In any event, the directive has no application to the circumstances in this appeal. There is no evidence that the bankrupt availed herself of the program or that the trustee was a "participating" trustee "designated" to act under the program in providing services to her. And the purpose of the agreement letter was not to have the bankrupt "provide voluntary payments to the estate in accordance with the SCPL guideline"; it was an agreement by the bankrupt to pay the trustee "any deficiency in fees arising out of my Assignment in Bankruptcy."

Disposition

[32] The appeal is allowed. The payment of $196.00 received by the trustee from the bankrupt is not a receipt upon which the trustee's fee is calculated and is to be returned to the bankrupt. There will be no order as to costs.

Appeal allowed.

(8) An application referred to in subsection (1) shall, for the purposes of section 38, be deemed to be a proceeding for the benefit of the estate.

121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

178. (1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from

(a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail;

(b) any debt or liability for alimony;

(c) any debt or liability under a support, maintenance or affiliation order or under an agreement for maintenance and support of a spouse or child living apart from the bankrupt;

(d) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity;

(e) any debt or liability for obtaining property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation; or

(f) liability for the dividend that a creditor would have been entitled to receive on any provable claim not disclosed to the trustee, unless the creditor had notice or knowledge of the bankruptcy and failed to take reasonable action to prove his claim.

(2) Subject to subsection (1), an order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy.

202. (1) A person who

(h) being a trustee, makes any arrangement under any circumstances with the bankrupt, or any solicitor, auctioneer or other person employed in connection with a bankruptcy, for any gift, remuneration or pecuniary or other consideration or benefit whatever beyond the remuneration payable out of the estate, or accepts any such consideration or benefit from any such person, or makes any arrangement for giving up, or gives up, any part of his remuneration, either as a receiver or trustee, to the bankrupt or any solicitor, auctioneer or other person employed in connection with the bankruptcy,

Directive / Instruction

N° 11R2-2013

SURPLUS INCOME

Issued: MAR 18 2013

(Directive No. 11R2-2013 updates Directive No. 11R2-2012, issued on March 20, 2012, on the same topic, to reflect the Superintendent's Standards for the year 2013.)

Interpretation

1. In this Directive,

"Act" means the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;

"spouse" means either of two persons who
- (a) are married to each other, or
- (b) are not married to each other and to whom at least one of the following situations applies:
  - (i) have been living together in a conjugal relationship for at least 12 continuous months;
  - (ii) have been living together in a conjugal relationship and
    - a child was born of their union;
    - have, together, adopted a child; or
    - one of them has adopted a child of the other;

Interprétation

1. Les définitions qui suivent s'appliquent à la présente instruction :

« conjoint » désigne l'une ou l'autre de deux personnes qui
- a) sont mariées, ou
- b) ne sont pas mariées mais à qui au moins une des situations suivantes s'applique :
  - (i) vivent maritalement pendant au moins 12 mois continus;
  - (ii) vivent maritalement, et
    - un enfant est né de leur union; ou
    - ont ensemble adopté un enfant; ou
    - l'un d'entre eux a adopté un enfant de l'autre;

« Loi » renvoie à la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (LFI);

"Superintendent's standards" refers to the table in Appendix A of this Directive;

"surplus income" means surplus income as defined in subsection 68(2) of the Act;

"total income" means total income as defined in subsection 68(2) of the Act.

Authority and Purpose

2. This Directive is issued pursuant to the authority of paragraph 5(4)(c) and section 68 of the Act and is intended to assist the trustee in determining equitably and consistently the portion of the bankrupt's income that should be paid into the bankrupt's estate.

Sections of the Act Concerned

Sections 68, 168.1 and 172.1.

Family Unit

3. In determining the bankrupt's personal and family situation for the purposes of subsection 68(3) of the Act, it is necessary to establish the earnings and expenses of both the bankrupt and the bankrupt's family unit. The bankrupt must disclose the earnings and expenses of each member of the family unit by providing the trustee with income and expense statements for the entire period of bankruptcy. Trustees must use their professional judgment in exercising their duty to apply due diligence when determining the bankrupt's average monthly income. The trustee's file should clearly document the method by which he/she calculated the amount, if any, the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate. As well, the trustee may question each member of the family unit as to their earnings and expenses.

« normes du surintendant » renvoie au barème établi à l'annexe A de la présente instruction;

« revenu total » désigne le revenu total aux termes du paragraphe 68(2) de la Loi.

Autorité et objet

2. La présente instruction, émise en vertu de l'autorité conférée par l'alinéa 5(4)c) et l'article 68 de la Loi, vise à faire en sorte que le syndic détermine de façon constante et équitable la portion du revenu que le failli doit verser à l'actif de la faillite.

Dispositions pertinentes de la Loi

Articles 68, 168.1 et 172.1

Unité familiale

3. Afin de déterminer les charges familiales et la situation financière du failli aux fins de l'application du paragraphe 68(3) de la Loi, il est nécessaire d'établir les revenus et dépenses du failli et de l'unité familiale à laquelle il appartient. Le failli est tenu de déclarer les revenus et dépenses de chaque membre de l'unité familiale et doit soumettre au syndic des états des revenus et dépenses pour la période entière de la faillite. Les syndics doivent exercer leur jugement professionnel pour s'acquitter de leur obligation de diligence lorsqu'ils déterminent le revenu mensuel moyen du failli. Le syndic doit clairement consigner au dossier la méthode utilisée pour calculer le montant, s'il y a lieu, que le failli doit verser à l'actif. De plus, le syndic peut questionner chaque membre de l'unité familiale quant à ses revenus et dépenses.

4. For the purposes of this Directive, the bankrupt's family unit includes, in addition to the bankrupt, any persons who reside in the same household and who benefit from either the expenses incurred or income earned by the bankrupt, or who contribute to such expenses or earnings. A person who does not reside in the same household shall be considered as a member of the family unit if the person benefits from or contributes to the expenses incurred or income earned by the bankrupt.

4. Pour les fins de la présente instruction, l'unité familiale du failli comprend, en plus du failli, toutes les personnes qui résident avec le failli et qui bénéficient d'une partie des dépenses encourues ou du revenu gagné par le failli ou qui contribuent aux revenus de l'unité familiale ou génèrent des dépenses pour l'unité familiale. Par ailleurs, une personne qui ne réside pas avec le failli pourra aussi être considérée comme un membre de l'unité familiale si elle bénéficie des dépenses encourues ou du revenu gagné par le failli, ou si elle y contribue.

Calculation

Calcul

5. (1) In order to apply the Superintendent's standards for determining surplus income (Appendix A), the bankrupt shall first complete the monthly income and expense statement of the family unit, including the bankrupt, in Form 65.

5. (1) Aux fins de l'application des normes du surintendant pour déterminer le revenu excédentaire (annexe A), le failli établit son état des revenus et dépenses ainsi que celui de l'unité familiale sur une base mensuelle en utilisant le formulaire 65.

(2) The family unit's total monthly income is determined by subtracting from the total of all of its members' monthly incomes the following amounts, as applicable:

(2) Le total du revenu mensuel de l'unité familiale est déterminé en déduisant de l'ensemble de ces revenus mensuels ceux des éléments suivants qui se rapportent à ce revenu :

(a) in the case of a salaried employee, minimum statutory remittances (income tax, pension and employment insurance deductions) and other mandatory deductions paid; or

a) dans le cas d'un salarié, les remises minimales exigées par la loi (l'impôt sur le revenu, les retenues en raison d'un régime de retraite ou de l'assurance-emploi) et les retenues obligatoires payées;

(b) in the case of a person who is self-employed, business expenses and deductions as permitted by the Income Tax Act or similar provincial legislation, minimum statutory remittances and instalment tax payments made.

b) dans le cas d'un travailleur autonome, les dépenses et retenues d'affaires permises par la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu ou par des dispositions provinciales similaires, les versements statutaires minimaux et les acomptes provisionnels.

(3) The family unit's available monthly income is determined by subtracting from the family unit's total monthly income the monthly non-discretionary expenses applicable to the personal and family situations of both the bankrupt and the bankrupt's family unit:

(a) child support payments;

(b) spousal support payments;

(c) child care expenses;

(d) expenses associated with a medical condition;

(e) Court-imposed fines or penalties that are in the process of being paid;

(f) expenses permitted by the Income Tax Act (or similar provincial legislation) that are a condition of employment;

(g) any other debt where a stay of proceedings has been lifted by the Court, and a recourse authorized; and

(h) interest paid on debts that are not dischargeable in bankruptcy under paragraph 178(1)(g) of the Act.

(4) The trustee shall verify the accuracy of the income and expense statement submitted by the bankrupt by requiring that the bankrupt provide:

(a) proof of income; and

(3) Le revenu mensuel disponible de l'unité familiale est déterminé en déduisant du total du revenu mensuel de l'unité familiale les dépenses mensuelles non discrétionnaires se rapportant à la situation personnelle et familiale du failli et de l'unité familiale, notamment :

a) les versements de pension alimentaire pour les enfants;

b) les versements de pension alimentaire destinés au conjoint;

c) les dépenses de garderie;

d) les dépenses relatives à une condition médicale;

e) les amendes et les pénalités imposées par le tribunal qui sont en cours de paiement;

f) les dépenses autorisées par la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu (ou une législation provinciale similaire) qui sont une condition d'emploi;

g) toute autre dette pour laquelle une suspension des procédures a été levée par le tribunal, et l'exécution des recours, autorisée;

h) les intérêts payés sur des dettes dont le failli ne peut pas être libéré par la faillite en vertu de l'alinéa 178(1)g) de la Loi.

(4) Le syndic doit vérifier l'exactitude de l'état des revenus et dépenses soumis par le failli en exigeant que celui-ci fournisse :

a) ne preuve des revenus;

Digitized by Google

(b) proof of payments made pursuant to paragraphs 5(2) and 5(3) above.

b) la preuve du paiement de tout montant versé en vertu des paragraphes 5(2) et 5(3) ci-dessus.

(5) For the purposes of subsection 68(3) of the Act, the trustee determines whether the bankrupt has surplus income by subtracting from the family unit's available monthly income the amount that, according to the Superintendent's standards (Appendix A), corresponds to the number of persons in the family unit.

(5) Aux fins du paragraphe 68(3) de la Loi, le syndic détermine si le failli a un revenu excédentaire mensuel en déduisant du revenu mensuel disponible de l'unité familiale le montant qui correspond au nombre de personnes composant l'unité familiale du failli, établi conformément aux normes du surintendant (annexe A).

(6) Where the bankrupt has monthly surplus income of less than $200, the bankrupt is not required to pay any amount to the bankrupt's estate under this Directive.

(6) Lorsque le failli a un revenu excédentaire mensuel inférieur à 200 $, il n'est pas tenu de verser un montant à l'actif de la faillite au titre de la présente instruction.

(7) Subject to the family situation adjustment described in paragraph 6(1) of this Directive and subject to an adjustment to the surplus income calculation based on average monthly income described under paragraph 7 or 8 of this Directive, where the bankrupt has monthly surplus income equal to or greater than $200, the bankrupt is required to pay 50 percent of the monthly surplus income to the bankrupt's estate.

(7) Sous réserve de l'ajustement selon la situation familiale décrit au paragraphe 6(1) de la présente instruction et de l'ajustement du revenu excédentaire fondé sur le revenu mensuel moyen décrit aux paragraphes 7 et 8 de la présente instruction, lorsque le failli a un revenu excédentaire mensuel égal ou supérieur à 200 $, il est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite 50 p. 100 du revenu excédentaire mensuel.

Family Situation Adjustment

6. (1) The amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the bankrupt's estate as determined in paragraph 5(6) or 5(7) of this Directive shall be adjusted to the same percentage as the bankrupt's portion of the family unit's available monthly income.

Ajustement selon la situation familiale

6. (1) Le montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite, déterminé selon le paragraphe 5(6) ou 5(7) de la présente instruction, doit être ajusté selon la proportion du revenu mensuel disponible de l'unité familiale attribuable au failli.

(See example in Appendix B)

(Voir l'exemple à l'annexe B.)

(2) Where the non-bankrupt spouse refuses or neglects to divulge his or her income or expenses, the trustee shall, for the purposes of determining surplus income, apply 50 percent

(2) Si le conjoint non en faillite refuse ou néglige de divulguer son revenu ou ses dépenses, le syndic doit, pour les fins du calcul du revenu excédentaire, appliquer

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

of the applicable Superintendent's standards (Appendix A) corresponding to the number of persons in the family unit.

(3) Where a person considered to be a member of the family unit as described in paragraph 4 of this Directive (other than a spouse), who is not a bankrupt, refuses or neglects to divulge his or her income and expenses, this person is deemed not to be a member of the family unit. The trustee shall describe these circumstances in Form 65, Monthly Income and Expense Statement of the Bankrupt/Debtor and the Family Unit and Information (or Amended Information) Concerning the Financial Situation of the Individual Bankrupt and, when required, in Form 82, Report of Trustee on Bankrupt's Application for Discharge.

Average monthly surplus income — bankrupts who are eligible for automatic discharge under section 168.1 of the Act

7. (1) In addition to the requirements of subsection 68(3) of the Act, the trustee shall review the financial circumstances of a bankrupt who is eligible for an automatic discharge to determine whether the bankrupt is required to make payments under section 68 of the Act on at least the following two occasions: (1) at the outset of the file when completing Form 65; and (2) during the eighth month in the case of a first-time bankrupt and during the 23rd month in the case of a second-time bankrupt.

(2) When reviewing the bankrupt's financial circumstances, the trustee shall calculate the bankrupt's average monthly income based on the income and expense statements. The average monthly income is to be used to determine the amount the bankrupt is required to pay to the bankrupt's estate.

50 p. 100 de la norme du surintendant (annexe A) qui correspond au nombre de personnes composant l'unité familiale du failli.

(3) Lorsqu'un particulier considéré comme un membre de l'unité familiale au sens du paragraphe 4 de la présente instruction (sauf pour le conjoint) qui n'est pas un failli refuse ou omet de révéler ses revenus et dépenses, cette personne est réputée ne pas être un membre de l'unité familiale. Le syndic doit faire état de ces circonstances dans le formulaire 65, État mensuel des revenus et dépenses du failli ou du débiteur et de l'unité familiale et information (ou information modifiée) concernant la situation financière d'un failli et, lorsque requis, dans le formulaire 82, Rapport du syndic sur la demande de libération du failli.

Revenu excédentaire mensuel moyen – Failli admissible à une libération d'office en vertu de l'article 168.1 de la Loi

7. (1) En plus de respecter les dispositions du paragraphe 68(3) de la Loi, le syndic doit examiner la situation financière du failli admissible à une libération d'office pour déterminer si celui-ci est tenu de verser les paiements prévus à l'article 68 de la Loi au moins aux deux occasions suivantes durant la faillite : (1) au moment de l'ouverture du dossier, à l'établissement du formulaire 65 et (2) au huitième mois dans le cas d'une première faillite ou au 23e mois dans le cas d'une deuxième faillite.

(2) Au moment de l'examen de la situation financière du failli, le syndic calculera le revenu mensuel moyen du failli basé sur les états des revenus et dépenses. Il faut utiliser le revenu mensuel moyen pour calculer le montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite.

Digitized by Google

(3) If, based on the average monthly income, there is a requirement to make payments under section 68 of the Act, the bankrupt will be required to continue to make payments under section 68 for an additional 12 months before being eligible for an automatic discharge under section 168.1 of the Act. Moreover, the average monthly income is to be used to determine the amount the bankrupt is required to pay to the bankrupt's estate for the 21 or 36 months, as the case may be. If there is a further material change in the bankrupt's financial situation, the trustee shall redetermine whether the bankrupt has surplus income, but the bankrupt is not eligible for an earlier discharge, subject to an application under subsection 168.1(2) of the Act.

(3) Si, selon son revenu mensuel moyen, le failli est tenu de verser des paiements au titre de l'article 68, il doit continuer de verser de tels paiements pendant une période supplémentaire de 12 mois avant d'être admissible à une libération d'office aux termes de l'article 168.1 de la Loi. En outre, il faut utiliser le revenu mensuel moyen pour calculer le montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite pendant la période de 21 ou de 36 mois, selon le cas. Si la situation financière du failli change de nouveau d'une manière considérable, le syndic doit réexaminer le dossier pour déterminer si le failli a un revenu excédentaire, mais celui-ci n'est pas admissible à une libération avant la date prévue, sous réserve d'une demande en vertu du paragraphe 168.1(2) de la Loi.

(4) If, however, based on the average monthly income, there is no requirement to make payments under section 68, the bankrupt is eligible for an automatic discharge at the expiry of the 9th month / 24th month after the date of bankruptcy, as the case may be.

(4) Si toutefois, compte tenu de son revenu mensuel moyen, le failli n'est pas tenu de verser des paiements en vertu de l'article 68, il est admissible à une libération d'office à la fin du neuvième ou du 24e mois suivant la date de la faillite, selon le cas.

(5) If the bankrupt is eligible for an automatic discharge on a date that is different from the date indicated on Form 68 or Form 69 sent by the trustee, the trustee shall immediately send an amended Form 68 or Form 69 indicating the new date on which the bankrupt will be eligible for an automatic discharge.

(5) Si le failli est admissible à une libération d'office à une date différente de celle qui figure dans le formulaire 68 ou 69 transmis par le syndic, ce dernier doit immédiatement envoyer un formulaire modifié indiquant la nouvelle date à laquelle le failli est admissible à une libération d'office.

(6) If the bankrupt fails to provide the trustee with the information needed to determine the average monthly income in accordance with paragraph 7(2) of this Directive, the trustee shall oppose the discharge of the bankrupt.

(6) Si le failli n'a pas fourni au syndic les renseignements nécessaires pour déterminer son revenu mensuel moyen conformément au paragraphe 7(2) de la présente instruction, le syndic doit s'opposer à la libération du failli.

(8) The trustee is not required to return to the bankrupt any payments that are made to the estate under section 68 of the Act where it is determined, based on the average monthly income, that the bankrupt was required to make payments of a lesser amount or no payments under section 68.

Average monthly surplus income — bankrupts who are not eligible for automatic discharge under section 168.1 of the Act

8. (1) In addition to the requirements of subsection 68(3) of the Act, the trustee shall review the financial circumstances of a bankrupt who is not eligible for an automatic discharge to determine whether the bankrupt is required to make payments under section 68 of the Act on at least the following two occasions: (1) at the outset of the file when completing Form 65; and (2) when completing Form 82.

(2) When reviewing the bankrupt's financial circumstances, the trustee shall calculate the bankrupt's average monthly income based on the income and expense statements. The average monthly income is to be used to determine the amount the bankrupt is required to pay to the bankrupt's estate.

(3) If the bankrupt fails to provide the trustee with the information needed to determine the average monthly income in accordance with paragraph 8(2) of this Directive, the trustee shall oppose the discharge of the bankrupt.

Revenu excédentaire mensuel moyen - Failli non admissible à une libération d'office en vertu de l'article 168.1 de la Loi

8. (1) En plus de respecter les exigences du paragraphe 68(3) de la Loi, le syndic examine la situation financière du failli non admissible à une libération d'office pour déterminer si celui-ci est tenu de verser les paiements prévus à l'article 68 de la Loi au moins aux deux occasions suivantes : (1) au moment de l'ouverture du dossier, à l'établissement du formulaire 65; et (2) au moment de l'établissement du formulaire 82.

(2) Au moment de l'examen de la situation financière du failli, le syndic calculera le revenu mensuel moyen du failli basé sur les états des revenus et dépenses. Il faut utiliser le revenu mensuel moyen pour calculer le montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite.

(3) Si le failli n'a pas fourni au syndic les renseignements nécessaires pour déterminer son revenu mensuel moyen conformément au paragraphe 8(2) de la présente instruction, le syndic doit s'opposer à la libération du failli.

(4) Si le failli n'a pas versé les montants prévus à l'actif de la faillite, le syndic doit s'opposer à la libération du failli.

bankrupt any payments that are made to the estate under section 68 of the Act where it is determined, based on the average monthly income, that the bankrupt was required to make payments of a lesser amount or no payments under section 68.

(See example in Appendix B)

Discontinuation of Payments

9. The bankrupt's requirement to make payments under section 68 of the Act shall cease when the bankrupt is discharged, or as otherwise ordered by the Court. However, if an opposition to the automatic discharge has been filed, the bankrupt's requirement to make payments under section 68 of the Act ceases on the day on which the bankrupt would have been automatically discharged had the opposition not been filed, or as otherwise ordered by the Court.

Coming into Force

10. This Directive comes into force on the day on which subsection 1(1) of Chapter 36 of the Statutes of Canada, 2007, comes into force. This Directive, applies only to a person who, on or after the day on which subsection 1(1) of Chapter 36 of the Statutes of Canada, 2007, comes into force, is described in one of (a) – (f) listed below:

(a) the person becomes bankrupt;

(b) the person files a notice of intention;

(c) the person files a proposal without failli les paiements versés à l'actif de la faillite en vertu de l'article 68 de la Loi s'il est déterminé, selon le revenu mensuel moyen, que le failli devait verser des paiements d'un montant inférieur ou nul en vertu de l'article 68.

(Voir l'exemple à l'annexe B.)

Cessation des versements

9. Le versement des montants que le failli est tenu de payer au titre de l'article 68 de la Loi prend fin dès la libération du failli ou selon l'ordonnance du tribunal. Si une opposition à la libération d'office est déposée, le versement de ces montants prend fin le jour où le failli aurait normalement été libéré d'office si l'opposition n'avait pas été déposée ou si le tribunal n'en avait pas ordonné autrement.

Entrée en vigueur

10. La présente instruction entre en vigueur à la date d'entrée en vigueur du paragraphe 1(1) du chapitre 36 des Lois du Canada (2007). La présente instruction ne s'applique qu'à l'égard des personnes suivantes :

a) celles qui deviennent faillis à la date d'entrée en vigueur du paragraphe 1(1) du chapitre 36 des Lois du Canada (2007) ou par la suite;

b) celles qui déposent un avis d'intention, à la date d'entrée en vigueur du paragraphe 1(1) du chapitre 36 des Lois du Canada (2007) ou par la suite;

c) celles qui déposent une proposition, à la having filed a notice of intention;

(d) a proposal is made in respect of the person without the person having filed a notice of intention;

(e) an interim receiver is appointed in respect of the person's property and all or part of the person's property comes into the possession or under the control of the interim receiver; or

(f) all or part of the person's property comes into the possession or under the control of a receiver.

As such, in order to determine whether Directive No. 11R2-2013 applies to a particular insolvency file, the question that needs to be asked is whether one of the "triggering events" described in (a) (f) occurred on or after the coming into force date.

The Superintendent's Standards ("S") are derived from the Low Income Cutoffs (LICO) released by Statistics Canada. The Superintendent uses the before-tax LICO for urban areas with 500,000 people and over. The 2013 standards are updated by adding to the 2011 LICO, the 2012 Consumer Price Index (CPI) (1.50%) plus a 1.80% adjustment reflecting the 2013 CPI expectation.

Les normes du surintendant (« N ») sont dérivées à partir des seuils de faible revenu (SFR) publiés par Statistiques Canada. Le surintendant utilise les SFR avant impôt pour les régions urbaines de 500 000 habitants et plus. Les normes de 2013 sont mises à jour en ajoutant aux SFR de 2011 l'indice des prix à la consommation (IPC) de 2012 (1,50%) plus un ajustement de 1,80% qui représente l'IPC anticipé pour 2013.

Example 2

Increase in income

A single, first-time bankrupt has regular monthly income of $ 1700 and is not required to make payments to the estate under section 68 of the Act.

In completing Form 65, at the outset of the file:

Bankrupt's available monthly income:	$1700
Other family unit member's available monthly income:	$0
Family unit's available monthly income:	$1700
Minus Superintendent's standard for a family unit of one as per Appendix A — 2013:	$2006
Total monthly surplus income:	$0
Payment required from bankrupt:	$0

During the fifth month of bankruptcy, the bankrupt's income increases to $3000 per month.

The trustee would average the bankrupt's monthly income in the eighth month to determine whether the bankrupt has surplus income.

Bankrupt's total income for seven months:

$1700 x 4 months =	$6800
$3000 x 3 months =	$9000
	$15 800

Exemple 2

Augmentation du revenu

Une personne célibataire faisant faillite pour la première fois a un revenu mensuel régulier de 1 700 $ et n'est pas tenue de verser des paiements à l'actif de la faillite en vertu de l'article 68 de la Loi.

Données à l'établissement du formulaire 65, à l'ouverture du dossier :

Revenu mensuel disponible du failli :	1 700 $
Revenu mensuel disponible de l'autre membre de l'unité familiale :	0 $
Revenu mensuel disponible de l'unité familiale :	1 700 $
Moins la norme du surintendant pour une unité familiale d'un membre selon l'annexe A – 2013 :	2 006 $
Revenu excédentaire mensuel total :	0 $
Paiement requis du failli :	0 $

Durant le cinquième mois de la faillite, le revenu du failli augmente pour atteindre 3 000 $ par mois.

Le syndic calcule le revenu mensuel moyen du failli au huitième mois pour déterminer s'il y a revenu excédentaire.

Revenu total du failli pour les sept mois :

1 700 $ x 4 mois =	6 800 $
3 000 $ x 3 mois =	9 000 $
	15 800 $

Digitized by Google

Bankrupt's average monthly income for seven months:
$15 800 ÷ 7 =	$2257
Minus Superintendent's standard for a family unit of one as per Appendix A — 2013:	$2006
Total average monthly surplus income:	$251
Payment required from bankrupt as per paragraph 5(7) of this Directive:
($251 x 50% = $125.50)	$125.50

Given that the increase in income has resulted in a requirement to make payments under section 68, the bankrupt must pay the amount owing to the estate ($125.50 x 9 months) and the bankrupt is required to continue to make payments under section 68 for an additional 12 months ($125.50 x 12 months), subject to a further material change in the bankrupt's financial situation that results in redetermination of whether the bankrupt has surplus income, before being eligible for an automatic discharge under section 168.1 of the Act.

Revenu mensuel moyen du failli pour les sept mois :
15 800 $ ÷ 7 =	2 257 $
Moins la norme du surintendant pour une unité familiale d'un membre selon l'annexe A – 2013 :	2 006 $
Revenu excédentaire mensuel total :	251 $
Paiement requis du failli en vertu du paragraphe 5(7) de la présente instruction :
(251 $ x 50 % = 125,50 $)	125,50 $

En raison de l'augmentation de son revenu, le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite le montant prévu en application de l'article 68 (125,50 $ x 9 mois) et de continuer de verser des paiements au titre de l'article 68 pendant 12 mois supplémentaires (125,50 $ x 12 mois), sous réserve d'autres changements importants dans sa situation financière qui entraîneraient un nouveau calcul visant à déterminer s'il y a revenu excédentaire, avant que le failli ne soit admissible à une libération d'office en vertu de l'article 168.1 de la Loi.

Example 3

Decrease in income

A single, first-time bankrupt has regular monthly income of $2400 and is required to make surplus income payments to the estate.

Bankrupt's available monthly income:	$2400
Other family unit member's available monthly income:	$0
Family unit's available monthly income:	$2400
Minus Superintendent's standard for a family unit of one as per Appendix A — 2013:	$2006
Total monthly surplus income:	$394
Payment required from bankrupt as per paragraph 5(7) of this Directive: ($394 x 50% = $197)	$197

During the fifth month of bankruptcy, the bankrupt's income decreases to $1000 per month.

The trustee will average the bankrupt's monthly income in the eighth month to determine whether the bankrupt has surplus income.

Bankrupt's total income for seven months:

$2400 x 4 months =	$9600
$1000 x 3 months =	$3000
	$12 600

Exemple 3

Diminution du revenu

Une personne célibataire faisant faillite pour la première fois a un revenu mensuel régulier de 2 400 $ et est tenue de verser des paiements à l'actif de la faillite parce qu'elle gagne un revenu excédentaire.

Revenu mensuel disponible du failli :	2 400 $
Revenu mensuel disponible de l'autre membre de l'unité familiale :	0 $
Revenu mensuel disponible de l'unité familiale :	2 400 $
Moins la norme du surintendant pour une unité familiale d'un membre selon l'annexe A – 2013 :	2 006 $
Revenu excédentaire mensuel total :	394 $
Paiement requis du failli en vertu du paragraphe 5(7) de la présente instruction : (394 $ x 50 % = 197 $)	197 $

Durant le cinquième mois de la faillite, le revenu du failli diminue à 1 000 $ par mois.

Le syndic calcule le revenu mensuel moyen du failli au huitième mois pour déterminer s'il y a revenu excédentaire.

Revenu total du failli pour les sept mois :

2 400 $ x 4 mois =	9 600 $
1 000 $ x 3 mois =	3 000 $
	12 600 $

Digitized by Google

Bankrupt's average monthly income for seven months:
$12 600 ÷ 7 =	$1800
Minus Superintendent's standard for a family unit of one as per Appendix A — 2013:	$2006
Total monthly surplus income:	$0
Payment required from bankrupt:	$0

Given that the decrease in income has resulted in no requirement to make payments under section 68, the bankrupt is not required to make payments under section 68, subject to a further material change in the bankrupt's financial situation that results in redetermination of whether the bankrupt has surplus income, before being eligible for an automatic discharge under section 168.1 of the Act. In accordance with paragraph 7(4) of this Directive, the bankrupt is eligible for an automatic discharge at the expiry of the ninth month.

Revenu mensuel moyen du failli pour les sept mois :
12 600 $ ÷ 7 =	1 800 $
Moins la norme du surintendant pour une unité familiale d'un membre selon l'annexe A – 2013 :	2 006 $
Revenu excédentaire mensuel total :	0 $
Paiement requis du failli :	0 $

Comme le calcul après la diminution du revenu indique que le failli n'a pas à verser des paiements en vertu de l'article 68, ce dernier n'est pas tenu de payer un montant à l'actif de la faillite, sous réserve d'autres changements importants dans sa situation financière qui entraîneraient un nouveau calcul visant à déterminer s'il y a revenu excédentaire, avant que le failli ne soit admissible à une libération d'office en vertu de l'article 168.1 de la Loi. Aux termes du paragraphe 7(4) de la présente instruction, le failli est admissible à une libération d'office à l'échéance du neuvième mois.

Irregular income

A salesperson who works on commission and receives payment on an irregular basis files for the first time an assignment in bankruptcy. During the seventh month of bankruptcy, the bankrupt receives three commissions in the amount of $5000, $4000 and $5000 for a total of $14 000. The average monthly income during the seven-month period of bankruptcy is $2000 ($14 000 ÷ 7 months = $2000) and this amount is the basis upon which to determine whether the bankrupt has surplus income according to the Superintendent's standards in place at the date of the bankruptcy and to determine the date on which the bankrupt is eligible for an automatic discharge.

Example 5

Increase in income (lump sum payment of pre-bankruptcy income)

If during the bankruptcy, the bankrupt receives a lump sum payment that represents a pre-bankruptcy income entitlement, for example, a wrongful dismissal settlement or a pay equity award, the trustee is required to determine what portion of the settlement or award is considered to be income for the purposes of section 68 of the Act. That amount then accrues to the estate for distribution to the creditors, except to the extent that it is required to meet the current needs of the bankrupt and his or her family. For greater clarity, the bankrupt is entitled to retain a sufficient amount of the payment to bring his or her income during the entire course of the bankruptcy up to the amount the trustee would normally allow the bankrupt to retain if the

Revenu irrégulier

Une personne qui travaille à commission et reçoit des paiements à intervalles irréguliers fait faillite pour la première fois. Au cours du septième mois de la faillite, le failli reçoit trois commissions de 5 000 $, 4 000 $ et 5 000 $, totalisant 14 000 $. La moyenne mensuelle du revenu pendant la période de sept mois de la faillite s'établit à 2 000 $ (14 000 ÷ 7 mois = 2 000 $); c'est ce montant qui sert à déterminer si le failli a un revenu excédentaire selon les normes du surintendant en vigueur à la date de la faillite, et à fixer la date à laquelle le failli est admissible à une libération d'office.

Augmentation du revenu (paiement forfaitaire d'un revenu gagné avant la faillite)

Si, durant la faillite, le failli reçoit un paiement forfaitaire correspondant à un revenu gagné avant la faillite, par exemple en règlement d'un congédiement injustifié ou à la suite d'un rajustement paritaire, le syndic doit déterminer quelle portion du montant doit être considérée comme un revenu aux fins de l'article 68 de la Loi. Ce montant revient ensuite à l'actif de la faillite aux fins de distribution aux créanciers, sauf dans la mesure où il est nécessaire au failli pour subvenir aux besoins courants de sa famille. En d'autres termes, le failli peut conserver une part suffisante du paiement forfaitaire pour amener son revenu sur l'ensemble de la période de faillite au montant maximal que le syndic autorise pour le revenu gagné sur une income were available on a periodic basis.

For example, a first-time bankrupt with regular monthly income of $1000 is not required to make monthly payments to the estate because the monthly income is below the Superintendent's standard for a family unit of one as per Appendix A. If, during the course of the bankruptcy, the bankrupt receives a wrongful dismissal award of $15 000 in the form of a lump sum payment (the full amount of which is considered to be income), the trustee determines the amount the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate in the following manner:

Bankrupt's monthly income:	$1000
Minus Superintendent's standard for a family unit of one as per Appendix A — 2013:	$2006
Total monthly surplus/shortfall:	($1006)
Bankrupt's lump sum payment:	$15 000
Minus shortfall x 9 months: ($1006 x 9 = $9054)	$9054
Portion of lump sum to accrue to estate:	$5946

In this example, the bankrupt is required to pay $5946 of the lump sum award to the estate, but has no ongoing requirement to make payments under section 68 of the Act. Subject to the exceptions noted in section 168.1 of the Act, the bankrupt is eligible for an automatic discharge at the expiry of nine months after the date of bankruptcy.

Par exemple, une personne faisant faillite pour la première fois et ayant un revenu mensuel régulier de 1 000 $ n'est pas tenue de faire des paiements mensuels à l'actif de la faillite puisque son revenu mensuel est inférieur à la norme du surintendant (annexe A) pour une unité familiale d'une personne. Si, durant la période de faillite, le failli reçoit un paiement forfaitaire de 15 000 $ en règlement d'un congédiement injustifié (qui est considéré en totalité comme un revenu), le syndic détermine comme suit le montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite :

Revenu mensuel du failli :	1 000 $
Moins la norme du surintendant pour une unité familiale d'un membre selon l'annexe A – 2013 :	2 006 $
Excédent (déficit) mensuel du revenu :	(1 006 $)
Paiement forfaitaire reçu par le failli :	15 000 $
Moins le déficit x 9 mois : (1 006 $ x 9 = 9 054 $)	9 054 $
	5 946 $
Portion du paiement forfaitaire à verser à l'actif de la faillite :	5 946 $

Dans cet exemple, le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite une partie du montant forfaitaire qu'il a reçu, soit 5 946 $, mais n'a pas à effectuer d'autres versements par la suite au titre de l'article 68 de la Loi. Sous réserve des exceptions énoncées à l'article 168.1, le failli est admissible à une libération d'office à l'échéance de la période de neuf mois suivant la date de la faillite.

However, if the bankrupt's monthly income is such that the bankrupt is required to make payments under section 68 of the Act, the trustee determines what portion of the settlement or award is considered to be income for the purposes of section 68 of the Act. That amount then accrues to the estate for distribution to the creditors. Subject to the exceptions noted in section 168.1 of the Act, the bankrupt is eligible for an automatic discharge at the expiry of 21 months after the date of bankruptcy.

Toutefois, si le revenu mensuel du failli est tel que ce dernier est tenu de verser des paiements à l'actif de la faillite en vertu de l'article 68 de la Loi, le syndic détermine quelle portion du règlement ou de la prime est considérée comme un revenu aux fins de l'article 68 de la Loi. Ce montant revient ensuite à l'actif de la faillite aux fins de distribution aux créanciers. Sous réserve des exceptions énoncées à l'article 168.1, le failli est admissible à une libération d'office à l'échéance de la période de 21 mois suivant la date de la faillite.

Non-bankrupt spouse refuses or neglects to divulge his or her income or expenses

In a family unit of four, where the non-bankrupt spouse refuses to divulge his or her income, the trustee, for the purposes of determining surplus income, would base the calculation on the amount of $1862.50 ($3728 x 50% = $1862.50) instead of $3728.

(Family unit of four)

Bankrupt's available monthly income:	$2200
Other family unit members' available monthly income (spouse refuses to divulge income):	$0
Family unit's available monthly income:	$2200

Exemple 6

Le conjoint non en faillite refuse ou néglige de divulguer son revenu ou ses dépenses

Dans le cas d'une unité familiale de quatre membres, lorsque le conjoint non en faillite refuse de divulguer son revenu, le syndic, pour les fins du calcul du revenu excédentaire, fondera le calcul sur la somme de 1 862,50 $ (3 728 $ x 50 % = 1 862,50 $) plutôt que sur 3 728 $.

(Unité familiale de quatre membres)

Revenu mensuel disponible du failli :	2 200 $
Revenu mensuel disponible des autres membres de l'unité familiale (le conjoint refuse de divulguer son revenu) :	0 $
Revenu mensuel disponible de l'unité familiale :	2 200 $

Subject: Directive No. 8R10, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act Forms — Forms 65 and 84

The Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (OSB) has amended Forms 65 and 84 to correct technical inconsistencies. The amendments are housekeeping in nature in that they amend incorrect cross-references only, reflecting no substantive changes to the forms.

Summary of Changes

1. Form 65, Monthly Income and Expense Statement of the Bankrupt/Debtor and the Family Unit and Information (or Amended Information) Concerning the Financial Situation of the Individual Bankrupt

Form 65 has been amended to correspond to the schema of the OSB electronic filing system. A reference to section 156.1 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) has been removed from line 12 of the form, resolving a discrepancy between the paper version of the form and the electronic version.

Date : 15 septembre 2010

À : Employés du BSF, syndics et registraires

Objet : Instruction n° 8R10, Formulaires de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité

Le Bureau du surintendant des faillites (BSF) a apporté des modifications aux formulaires 65 et 84 de manière à corriger des incohérences. Les modifications sont de nature administrative et ont pour objet de corriger des renvois. Aucune modification de fond n'a été apportée.

Résumé des modifications

1. Formulaire 65 – État mensuel des revenus et dépenses du failli ou du débiteur et de l'unité familiale et information (ou information modifiée) concernant la situation financière d'un failli

Le formulaire 65 a été modifié afin de correspondre au schéma du système de dépôt électronique du BSF. La ligne 12 du formulaire a été modifiée afin d'y supprimer la référence à l'article 156.1 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (LFI). Ceci résout les problèmes de concordance entre la version papier du formulaire et la version électronique.

Determination of trustee re surplus income - Sec. 68(3)

Digitized by Google

(3) The trustee shall, having regard to the applicable standards and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, determine whether the bankrupt has surplus income. The determination must also be made

(a) whenever the trustee becomes aware of a material change in the bankrupt's financial situation; and

(b) whenever the trustee is required to prepare a report referred to in subsection 170(1).

Duties of trustee relating to determination - Sec. 68(4)

(4) Whenever the trustee is required to determine whether the bankrupt has surplus income, the trustee shall

(a) if the trustee determines that there is surplus income,

(i) fix, having regard to the applicable standards, the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt,

(ii) inform, in the prescribed manner, the official receiver, and every creditor who has requested such information, of the amount fixed under subparagraph (i), and

(iii) take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay; and

(b) if the trustee determines that there is no surplus income, inform, in the prescribed manner, the official receiver, and every creditor who has requested such information, of that determination.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DRAPEAU C.J.N.B.

[1] Under the Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "Act"), the portion of the bankrupt's earnings that exceeds reasonable living expenses may be attached and used to pay creditors in bankruptcy. It is common ground between the parties that the bankrupt's earnings do not constitute property divisible among creditors pursuant to section 67(1) of the Act and that proceedings to attach those earnings can only be brought under section 68. The leading case on point is Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765.

[2] That said, on occasion, the Trustee lacks the information required to fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay out of his or her earnings in accordance with s. 68(3) and a constellation of circumstances operate to give rise to a real and substantial possibility that those earnings may dissipate. The question raised by the present appeal is whether, in those circumstances, s. 183(1) of the Act authorizes the Court of Queen's Bench to make an order granting the Trustee temporary control over the bankrupt's earnings, despite s. 68's silence on the subject. Section 183(1) is a provision of general application that invests the Court of Queen's Bench with such jurisdiction at law, and in equity, as will enable it to exercise original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy.

[3] In the case at bar, Justice Léger of the Court of Queen's Bench in a decision reported at [2003] N.B.J. No. 210 (Q.B.)(Q.L.), allowed the Trustee's application for relief under the Act and ordered that: (1) the revenues arising in 2003 from the appellant's crab-fishing license be paid directly to the Trustee; (2) the Trustee immediately pay all reasonable bona fide arm's length expenses arising out of the ordinary course of the fishing activities, including salaries; (3) the Trustee prepare a report for the benefit of the bankrupt and the creditors in bankruptcy of all revenues and expenses and then proceed in accordance with s. 68; and (4) any unresolved issues relating to the fishing activities, including reasonable expenses, be submitted for judicial determination.

[4] The appellant, Cyrenus Joseph Dugas, contends that Justice Léger lacked jurisdiction to make that order. In Mr. Dugas' submission, s. 68 constitutes a complete code for the Trustee's and the Court's jurisdiction over the bankrupt's earnings, and the provision does not authorize the making of an asset-preservation order of the kind made in the court below.

[5] Relying on Landry (Re) 2000 CanLII 16846 (ON CA), (2000), 192 D.L.R. (4th) 728 (Ont.C.A.), the Trustee counters that s. 68 only comes into play once it is possible to fix the amount to be paid out of earnings to the bankrupt's estate. The Trustee submits that where it is impossible to fix that amount, and the bankrupt's earnings are in need of protection for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy, the court may make an asset-preservation order, such as the order under appeal, effective until such time as the Trustee is able to make the determination under section 68(3).

[6] After hearing counsel for Mr. Dugas, the Court dismissed the appeal, with reasons to follow. These are the reasons.

The context

[7] On August 23, 2001, Peter Gaudet, Adam Gaudet, 508571 N.B. Ltd. and 100167 P.E.I. Inc. obtained a consent judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick against Mr. Dugas in the amount of $2,100,000. Under the terms of that judgment, Mr. Dugas was ordered to pay the sum of $50,000 forthwith and $2,050,000 within thirty days. The sum of $50,000 was paid, but Mr. Dugas defaulted on his obligation to pay the balance of $2,050,000. That debt remains outstanding in full.

[8] From April to October 2002, Mr. Dugas fished for crab, earning gross revenues in excess of $800,000. As noted, he did not pay down the judgment debt mentioned above.

[9] On October 27, 2002, following the end of the crab fishing season, Mr. Dugas made an assignment in bankruptcy for the general benefit of his creditors. The Trustee at the time, J.G. Touchie & Associates Ltd., filed with the Official Receiver, a copy of Mr. Dugas' Statement of Affairs. The only creditor listed in that document was Adam Gaudet who was shown as being owed $2,050,000.00.

[10] Under s. 68(3) of the Act, the Trustee is required to have regard "to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt" in fixing the amount that the latter is required to pay from earnings to the estate of the bankrupt. Form 65, entitled "Monthly Income and Expense Statement of the Bankrupt and the Family Unit and Information Concerning the Financial Situation of the Individual Bankrupt", is designed to assist the Trustee in assessing the bankrupt's personal and family situation.

[11] Mr. Dugas filed a Form 65 that indicated "0.00$" whenever a specific amount was to be provided. Thus, he specified "0.00$" for his net employment income, "0.00$" for the total monthly income of the family unit, "0.00$" for his monthly non-discretionary expenses, "0.00$" for the monthly non-discretionary expenses of the family unit, "0.00$" for his available monthly income, "0.00$" for the available monthly income of the family unit, "0.0%" for his portion of the available monthly family unit income and "0.00$" for the monthly surplus or (deficit) of the family unit.

[12] On November 1, 2002, Peter Gaudet, Adam Gaudet, 508571 N.B. Ltd. and 100167 P.E.I. Inc. filed proofs of claim. No other creditor, whether secured or unsecured, filed a proof of claim.

[13] The first meeting of creditors was held on November 19, 2002. At that time, PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. took over as Trustee and the list of creditors was expanded to include Peter Gaudet, 508571 N.B. Ltd. and 100167 P.E.I. Inc. On December 6, 2002, the first meeting of creditors reconvened and Mr. Dugas' examination began. At that time, Mr. Dugas testified that he had received an allocation of the snow crab quota for nearly every year since 1977 and that, in 2002, his gross income from crab-fishing amounted to $820,000.00, while the amount indicated in his tax return as taxable income was $287,000.73. Mr. Dugas disclosed, as well, that the expenses deducted from his gross income included the sum of $85,000 paid to his son, Serge, even though the latter had no direct involvement in fishing for crab. The meeting ended without Mr. Dugas' examination being completed.

[14] Mr. Dugas has since refused to submit to any further out-of-court examination by the Trustee.

[15] As mentioned, on May 27, 2003, Justice Léger allowed the Trustee's application and made the following order:

(a) That all revenues arising from Mr. Dugas' crab fishing licence for the year 2003 be paid directly to the Trustee;

(b) That the Trustee pay immediately all reasonable bona fide arm's length expenses arising out of the ordinary course of the fishing activities including salaries;

(c) That the Trustee prepare a report for the benefit of the Bankrupt and the Creditors of all revenues and expenses and then proceed according to the provisions of Section 68 of the Act; and

(d) That the hearing into the Trustee's motion resume on the 2nd day of July, 2003 at 1:30 p.m. in Bathurst, New Brunswick or at such other time as the parties may agree in order to determine all unresolved issues relating to the 2003 crab fishing activities including reasonable expenses.

[16] On May 29, 2003, Mr. Dugas filed a Notice of Appeal from Justice Léger's decision. That filing triggered the application of s. 195 and, as a result, all proceedings under Justice Léger's May 27, 2003 order were stayed until I made an order canceling that stay on June 6, 2003 (see Dugas (Re), [2003] N.B.J. No. 230 (C.A.)(Q.L.)).

[17] The parties agreed to adjourn sine die the hearing before Justice Léger scheduled for July 2, 2003. Neither party has sought directions from him with respect to the many "unresolved issues relating to the 2003 crab fishing activities including reasonable expenses".

Relevant Legislative Provisions

68. (1) The Superintendent shall, by directive, establish in respect of the provinces or one or more bankruptcy districts or parts of bankruptcy districts, the standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

(2) For the purposes of this section,

(a) "total income" referred to in subsection (1) includes, notwithstanding paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source; and

(b) a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate of the bankrupt is enforceable against all property of the bankrupt, other than property referred to in paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1).

68. (1) Le surintendant fixe, par instruction, pour les provinces ou pour un ou plusieurs districts ou parties de district, des normes visant l'établissement du montant du revenu total d'un particulier failli qui excède ce qui est nécessaire au maintien d'un niveau de vie raisonnable.

(2) Pour l'application du présent article :

a) le revenu total d'un failli comprend, malgré les alinéas 67(1)b) et b.1), ses revenus de toutes natures ou sources;

b) les biens du failli, à l'exception des biens visés à ces alinéas, peuvent faire l'objet d'une exécution à titre de montant à payer à l'actif de la faillite.

(3) Le syndic fixe, conformément aux normes applicables et compte tenu des charges familiales et de la situation personnelle du failli,

(3) The trustee shall
(a) having regard to the applicable standards established under subsection (1), and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt;
(b) inform the official receiver in writing of the amount fixed under paragraph (a); and
(c) take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay.
(4) The trustee may, at any time, amend an amount fixed under subsection (3) to take into account
(a) material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt; or
(b) a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5).
(5) Where the official receiver determines that the amount required to be paid by the bankrupt under subsection (3) or (4) is substantially not in accordance with the applicable standards established under subsection (1), the official receiver shall recommend to the trustee and to the bankrupt an amount required to be paid that the official receiver determines is in accordance with the applicable standards.
(6) Where the trustee and the bankrupt are not in agreement with the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4), the trustee shall, forthwith, in the prescribed form, send to the official receiver a request that the matter be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt.
(7) On the request in writing of a creditor made within thirty days after the date of bankruptcy or an amendment referred to in subsection (4), the trustee shall, within the five days following the thirty day period, send to the official receiver a request in the prescribed form that the matter of the amount the bankrupt is required to pay under subsection (3) or (4) be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt and the creditor.
(8) A mediation shall be in accordance with prescribed procedures.
(9) Documents contained in a file on the mediation of a matter under this section form part of the records referred to in subsection 11.1(2).
(10) Where
(a) the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5),
(b) the issue submitted to mediation requested

le montant que celui-ci doit verser à l'actif de la faillite, en avise le séquestre officiel par écrit et prend les mesures indiquées pour que le failli s'exécute.
(4) Le syndic peut modifier le montant fixé en application du paragraphe (3) pour tenir compte soit de tout changement important des charges familiales ou de la situation personnelle du failli, soit de la recommandation faite par le séquestre officiel au titre du paragraphe (5).
(5) S'il estime que le montant que doit payer le failli diffère substantiellement du montant payable en application des normes visées au paragraphe (1), le séquestre officiel recommande au syndic et au failli le montant à verser, au titre de celles-ci, à l'actif de la faillite.
(6) À défaut d'entente avec le failli sur le montant à verser, le syndic transmet sans délai au séquestre officiel, en la forme prescrite, une demande de médiation et en expédie une copie au failli.
(7) Sur demande écrite du créancier faite dans les trente jours suivant la date de la faillite ou de la modification visée au paragraphe (4), le syndic transmet au séquestre officiel, dans les cinq jours suivant l'expiration des trente jours, une demande de médiation en la forme prescrite relativement au montant que le failli doit verser à l'actif, et en expédie une copie au failli et au créancier.
(8) La procédure de médiation est fixée par les Règles générales.
(9) Les documents constituant le dossier de médiation font partie des dossiers visés au paragraphe 11.1(2).
(10) S'il ne met pas en oeuvre la recommandation du séquestre officiel ou s'il y a échec de la médiation ou défaut du failli d'effectuer ses paiements, le syndic peut, d'office, ou doit, sur demande des inspecteurs, des créanciers ou du séquestre officiel, demander au tribunal d'établir, par ordonnance, le montant du revenu que le failli doit verser à l'actif de la faillite, compte tenu des normes fixées par le surintendant et des charges familiales et de la situation personnelle du failli.
(11) Le tribunal peut fixer un montant équitable à titre de traitement, salaire ou autre rémunération pour les services rendus par le failli à un employeur ou à titre de paiement ou de commission pour services rendus à un tiers si ces personnes sont liées au failli; il peut établir, par ordonnance, le montant à verser au syndic sur la base du montant fixé, sauf s'il under subsection (6) or (7) is not thereby resolved, or

(c) the bankrupt fails to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section,
the trustee may, or on the request of the inspectors, any of the creditors or the official receiver shall, apply to the court for the hearing of the matter, and the court may, on the hearing, in accordance with the standards established under subsection (1) and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, by order, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt.
(11) The court may fix an amount that is fair and reasonable
(a) as salary, wages or other remuneration for the services being performed by a bankrupt for a person employing the bankrupt, or
(b) as payment for or commission in respect of any services being performed by a bankrupt for a person,
where the person is related to the bankrupt, and the court may, by order, determine the part of the salary, wages or other remuneration, or the part of the payment or commission, that shall be paid to the trustee on the basis of the amount so fixed by the court, unless it appears to the court that the services have been performed for the benefit of the bankrupt and are not of any substantial benefit to the person for whom they were performed.
(12) On the application of any interested person, the court may, at any time, amend an order made under this section to take into account material changes that have occurred in the personal or family situation of the bankrupt.
(13) An order of the court made under this section may be served on a person from whom the bankrupt is entitled to receive money and, in such case,
(a) the order binds the person to pay to the estate of the bankrupt the amount fixed by the order; and
(b) if the person fails to comply with the terms of the order, the court may, on the application of the trustee, order the person to pay the trustee the amount of money that the estate of the bankrupt would have received had the person complied with the terms of the order.
(14) For the purposes of section 38, an application referred to in subsection (10) is deemed to be a proceeding for the benefit of the estate.

estime que les services rendus n'ont bénéficié qu'au failli et n'ont pas procuré un bénéfice important à son employeur ou au tiers.
(12) Sur demande de tout intéressé, le tribunal peut modifier l'ordonnance rendue au titre du présent article pour tenir compte de tout changement important des charges familiales ou de la situation personnelle du failli.
(13) Lorsqu'une ordonnance rendue au titre du présent article est signifiée à une personne qui doit une somme d'argent au failli, elle est tenue de s'y conformer; si elle ne s'y conforme pas, le tribunal peut, sur demande du syndic, lui ordonner de verser la somme au syndic.
(14) La demande présentée au tribunal au titre du paragraphe (10) constitue, pour l'application de l'article 38, une procédure à l'avantage de l'actif.
183. (1) Les tribunaux suivants possèdent la compétence en droit et en equity qui doit leur permettre d'exercer la juridiction de première instance, auxiliaire et subordonnée en matière de faillite et en d'autres procédures autorisées par la présente loi durant leurs termes respectifs, tels que ces termes sont maintenant ou peuvent par la suite être tenus, pendant une vacance judiciaire et en chambre :

Analysis and Decision

(a) Preliminary procedural issues

(i) Non-compliance with Rule 37.03(b)

[18] Mr. Dugas contests the Trustee's right to invoke s. 183(1) of the Act to buttress its submission in support of Justice Léger's jurisdiction. Mr. Dugas rightly points out that the Trustee's Notice of Motion does not refer to section 183(1). Rule 37.03(b) of the Rules of Court is clear on the subject. A Notice of Motion must state the grounds to be argued, including a reference to any statutory provision to be relied on (see Lloyd's of London v. Norris, [1998] N.B.J. No. 351 (C.A.) leave to appeal dismissed reflex, (1998) 218 N.B.R. (2d) 400 (S.C.C.) at para. 10; Waugh et al. v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp. et al. (2000), 224 N.B.R. (2d) 39 (C.A.) at paras. 11-14 and Doiron v. Cameron, [2003] N.B.J. No. 301 (Q.B.)(Q.L.) at paras. 14-15).

[19] There is, however, nothing in the record to indicate that counsel for Mr. Dugas in the court below - who was not his current counsel, Ms. Sivret - raised any objection on the ground of non-compliance with Rule 37.03(b). Moreover, and contrary to what was noted in passing in my June 6, 2003 reasons for judgment, the motion heard in the court below was not concerned solely with sections 67 and 68 of the Act. Indeed, the Notice of Motion's prayer for relief is worded broadly and invokes the full jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench under the Act. As well, the motion appears to have been heard and determined on that basis. In his reasons for judgment, at paras. 1 and 2, Justice Léger describes the relief sought in these terms:

> This motion is brought by the Trustee in Bankruptcy [PriceWaterHouseCoopers] Inc as trustee of the Bankrupt Cyrenus Joseph Dugas requesting an order that the revenues from the 2003 crab fishing season be declared the property of the Bankrupt and therefore divisible among the creditors pursuant to the provisions of section 67 and 68 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. B-3 (hereinafter "the Act"), as amended.
> The other remedies sought in the motion are that all revenues derived from the fishing activities be paid directly to the Trustee who shall fix the amount to be paid to the Estate of the Bankrupt in accordance with Section 68 of the Act, supra. (Emphasis added)

[20] In my view, there is every reason to bring s. 183(1) into the mix as a potential source of jurisdiction for the order under appeal.

(ii) Further evidence

[21] By motion, Mr. Dugas asks that this Court receive evidence as to matters that have occurred since Justice Léger's May 27, 2003 order. Under Rule 62.21 (2)(b), the Court may receive evidence of this nature if it is relevant to the issues requiring determination on appeal.

[22] The issue at hand is whether Justice Léger had jurisdiction to make the May 27, 2003 order. Evidence as to matters that have occurred since then is irrelevant to the determination of that issue. Accordingly, I would dismiss Mr. Dugas' motion and reject the proffered evidence.

(b) Scope of s. 183(1)

[23] In Sam Lévy & Associés Inc. v. Azco Mining Inc., 2001 SCC 92 (CanLII), [2001] 3 S.C.R. 978, at para. 17, the Court noted that, on its face, the intent of s. 183(1) is to attribute to the bankruptcy court "powers and duties co-extensive with Parliament's jurisdiction over 'Bankruptcy' under s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867 except insofar as that jurisdiction has been limited or specifically assigned elsewhere by Parliament itself." The Court went on to note, at para. 38, that the broad scope of authority conferred by s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to Parliament had "been passed along to the bankruptcy court in s. 183(1) of the Act, which confers correspondingly broad jurisdiction."

[24] In Landry (Re), the bankrupt had brought an action for wrongful dismissal against her former employer and had been proceeding through arbitration, when she was discharged under the Act. The bankrupt was successful at arbitration and prior to payment of the award, the Trustee brought an application for a declaration that any amount awarded for lost wages constituted property of the bankrupt that vested in the Trustee for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy. The Trustee submitted that vesting could occur by way of section 68. The motions judge rejected that submission on the ground, among others, that the Trustee had not followed the procedure set out in s. 68 for the making of a claim in respect to earnings.

[25] On appeal, it was argued that the Trustee was precluded from resorting to s. 68 because the procedure provided therein had not been followed. The Ontario Court of Appeal dealt with that issue, as follows at pp. 741-742:

> 6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?
> [41] The motions judge was correct in noting that, before an application can be made to the court under s. 68(10) to fix the amount of the bankrupt's income that is payable to the estate of the bankrupt, the trustee must bring himself under the terms of that provision. As discussed earlier, by its terms, s. 68(10) effectively limits the number of applications to the court to those cases where the issue has not otherwise been resolved by consent or mediation in accordance with the established procedure. In this case, of course, it was impossible for the trustee to have followed this procedure since the arbitrator's award was not yet ascertained. Once the arbitrator's decision is made, the trustee will be in a position to fix the amount which, in its view, must be paid to the estate and the balance of the procedure set out in s. 68 can follow its course. Hence, the trustee's motion, insofar as it purports to be made under s. 68(10), is simply premature.
> [42] However, the trustee's motion was not made strictly under s. 68(10). It is apparent from the relief sought, which was mainly declaratory in nature, that the motion was brought with a view to preserving a potential asset in anticipation of a future determination of the parties' rights under s. 68. In my view, the motions judge erred in foreclosing any resort to s. 68 on the basis that the procedure set out thereunder had not been followed. At worst, the motion could have been dismissed as premature. [Emphasis added.]

[26] Viewing the Trustee's motion as one brought for the purpose of preserving a potential asset in anticipation of a future determination of the parties' rights under s. 68, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the motions judge had jurisdiction to direct that any monies awarded by the arbitrator as compensation for lost wages be paid into court until the parties' rights under s. 68 were determined. The Court allowed the appeal, and so ordered. Additionally in Cole (Re), [2001] N.S.J. 155 (Q.L.), at para. 41, Registrar Hill makes the following observations in connection with a yet-to-be adjudicated claim for lost income arising out of a motor-vehicle accident:

Digitized by Google

> ... If, prior to the amount of "income" to be received by the Bankrupt being determined, the Trustee becomes concerned that his ability to obtain any funds subject to a s. 68 order may be prejudiced for some reason, the Trustee may apply for an order such as that granted in Landry. In Landry the court ordered that any monies to be paid by the employer to the bankrupt as compensation for lost wages be paid into court pending resolution of the amount to be paid under s. 68.

[27] Courts should be chary of interpreting the Act's provisions in a manner inimical to the attainment of its objectives, chief among which is the equitable distribution of a bankrupt's assets among the creditors in bankruptcy (see Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, per Gonthier J., for the majority, at para. 7). In my view, the court's earnings-related jurisdiction under s. 183(1) is not limited to making an order directing their payment into court. Indeed, such an order would have been impractical in the case at hand. In my view, the scope of s. 183(1) is accurately delineated in Houlden & Morawetz, 2004 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, (Toronto: Carswell, 2004), at p. 774:

> For carrying out the purposes of the Act, there is deemed to be vested in the Bankruptcy Court the necessary power and jurisdiction to authorize and sanction acts required to be done by the trustee for the due administration and protection of the bankrupt estate, even though there is no specific provision in the Act expressly conferring such power and jurisdiction
> [Citations omitted.]

In that context, "bankrupt estate" is to be understood as including the bankrupt's "total income" within the meaning of section 68(1).

(c) Application to the case at hand

[28] I begin by noting that, in the court below, Mr. Dugas did not take issue with Justice Léger's jurisdiction to make the order under appeal. In fact, he was prepared to turn over to the Trustee 20% of the total income from his fishing operations in 2003. He suggested that the Trustee could then assess the amount to be given to him for reasonable living expenses in accordance with s. 68 of the Act. That said, Justice Léger could not acquire jurisdiction by consent: his capacity and authority to make the order under appeal must spring from the Act.

[29] In his reasons for judgment, Justice Léger makes the following observations:

(1) Historically, Mr. Dugas' crab fishing operations have generated substantial income over a very short period of time;

(2) Mr. Dugas is not a first-time bankrupt;

(3) The Trustee entertains serious doubts as to whether the expenses claimed in previous years by Mr. Dugas (in reduction of his gross income) were truly business-related;

(4) Mr. Dugas did not know the price of crab for the 2003 season. (In the affidavit that he filed in opposition to the Trustee's motion, Mr. Dugas asserted that the price could not be forecast because it would be influenced, to an unpredictable extent, by factors such as the exchange rate, the war in Iraq and "problems in North Korea").

[30] Justice Léger concluded that Mr. Dugas' earnings from crab-fishing were in need of protection and that "the best approach to ensure that the assets are protected is to order that all revenues from the 2003 crab fishing activities under the crab license # 23622 issued to the Bankrupt Cyrenus Dugas be paid directly to the Trustee [PriceWaterHouseCoopers] Inc." As noted, he went on to order that the Trustee prepare a "report for the benefit of the Bankrupt and the Creditors of all revenues and expenses and then proceed according to the provisions of Section 68 of the Act."

[31] Under s. 68(3), the Trustee must have regard for the bankrupt's personal and family situation in fixing the amount payable out of earnings to the bankrupt's estate. A duly completed Form 65 is essential if the Trustee is to competently perform his statutory mandate. Mr. Dugas failed, without justification, to complete Form 65 in any useful manner. Moreover, Mr. Dugas subsequently refused to fully comply with the Trustee's requests for financial information. Finally, the Trustee's doubts regarding the reliability of the financial data that Mr. Dugas did provide concerning his business operations in 2002 were far from fanciful and they led the Trustee to conclude that Mr. Dugas' 2003 earnings were in need of protection for the benefit of his creditors. In those circumstances, it was entirely proper for the Trustee to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for an asset-preservation order under section 183(1).

[32] Section 183(1) invests the Court of Queen's Bench with capacity and authority to make any order that will enable it to exercise its original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy. Under s. 183(1), the Court of Queen's Bench may authorize acts required "for the due administration and protection of the bankrupt estate, even though there is no specific provision in the Act expressly conferring such power and jurisdiction" (see Houlden & Morawetz, Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, at p. 774). In my view, nothing said in Marzetti contradicts that proposition. Any order designed to by-pass illegitimate obstacles to the due administration of the bankrupt's estate in accordance with the Act is authorized under section 183(1).

[33] The order under appeal falls squarely within the broad jurisdiction recognized by section 183(1). It was rendered having regard to the Trustee's inability to perform the mandate contemplated by s. 68 and the need to temporarily protect the bankrupt's earnings for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy. The order in question is both authorized by the Act and a judicious response to a practical problem whose genesis can be traced to the bankrupt.

Disposition

[34] For the reasons outlined above, the Court dismissed the appeal. There will be no order of costs.

Heather Hynes is the mother of three girls. They are aged 13, 12 and 8. Her only source of income is the wages she earns working for the Federal Government. Her monthly net income is $2,180.00. She does not receive any support from her former spouse.

Ms. Hynes has worked for the Federal Government for about 11 years. She qualified for a pay equity payment. She received a payment after she had made an assignment in bankruptcy, but before her discharge. The exact amount of the pay equity payment was not put into evidence. However, the Trustee's report filed under s. 170 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act states that the amount of the pay equity payment was $19,000.00.

The Trustee objected to the discharge of the Bankrupt. On the application for discharge, the Trustee argued that there should be a conditional order of discharge, whereby Ms. Hynes would be required to pay to the Trustee for the benefit of the Estate the pay equity payment she received, or at least a part of that payment.

There was scant evidence before me as to the nature of the pay equity payment. For the purposes of my decision here I characterize that payment as a payment of pre-bankruptcy earnings. This being the case, it is necessary to consider whether or not the Trustee's application should have been made pursuant to s. 68 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Does s. 68 apply to both pre-bankruptcy and post-bankruptcy wages?

A very useful article which addresses the question is that of Robert A. Klotz, Who Gets the Bankrupt's Pre-Bankruptcy Earning? (2000), 15 C.B.R. (4th) 153. In that article the author analyzes in particular the approach taken by the Supreme Court of Canada in three cases decided by the Court in which the Court had occasion to interpret s. 68 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765, 5 R.F.L. (4th) 1, 26 C.B.R. (3d) 161, 169 N.R. 161, 20 Alta.L.R. (3d) 1, [1994] 7 W.W.W. 623; Ramgotra (Trustee Of) v. North American Life Assurance Co., 1996 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 325, 37 C.B.R. (3d) 141, 132 D.L.R. (4th) 193, [1996] 3 W.W.R. 457; Wallace v. United Grain Growers Limited 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), (1997), 152 D.L.R. (4th) 1, 3 C.B.R. (4th) 1, [1999] 4 W.W.R. 86.

Marzetti dealt with post-bankruptcy income, in the form of an income tax refund. However, nowhere in that case did the Court specifically restrict its findings as to the applicability of s. 68 to post-bankruptcy earnings. The Court found that s. 68 was a substantive rather than procedural modification to the scheme in existence prior to its enactment. This being the case, the Court held that s. 68 was intended to operate as a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. Consequently, those forms of property did not fall within s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act (as it then was titled) and were not to be considered "property of a bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67 (at p. 644, W.W.R.).

That s. 68 is a substantive provision (rather than procedural) was supported in the view of the Supreme Court of Canada by three reasons. Viewing s. 68 as a substantive provision better reflected the language of s. 68. As a substantive provision, s. 68 would more effectively remedy the mischief which lead to its enactment. Finally, there was some support in authority found in prior decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada to take the substantive approach.

Section 68(1), as reviewed by the Supreme Court in Marzetti, and s. 68 as it now exists, are somewhat different, the present section having come into force on April 30, 1998. Neither s. 68 as it was, or as it is, specifically differentiate between pre and post-bankruptcy income. Section 68(1), as it now reads, provides for the establishment of standards to assist the Court in determining the portion of the total income of a bankrupt which exceeds that necessary for the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living:

> The Superintendent shall, by directive, establish in respect of the provinces or one or more bankruptcy districts or parts of bankruptcy districts, the standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

Section 68(2) provides an interpretation of the words "total income" referred to in s. 68(1):

> (a) 'Total income' referred to in subsection (1) includes, notwithstanding paragraph 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source; and
> (b) a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate of the bankrupt is enforceable against all property of the bankrupt, other than property referred to in paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1).

Section 68(10) provides in certain circumstances that a Trustee may, or when requested by the estate inspectors, any creditor, or the official receiver, shall, apply to the Court to determine the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the Estate.

In my view, the dominant rationale for the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Marzetti was that a substantive reading of s. 68 better reflected the underlying intent of Parliament in enacting the section. Prior to its enactment, there was uneven treatment of salary, wages, and other remuneration depending upon the province of residence of the individual bankrupt. As noted by the Court:

> Parliament no doubt considered it unreasonable for the treatment of bankrupt persons to depend upon the happenstance of provincial residence. Of course, even if one accepts that s. 68 is a complete code in respect of salary, wages, and other remuneration, the potential for uneven treatment across Canada remains in respect of other provincially exempted property. But it is hardly surprising that Parliament selected an important form of property--salary, wages and other remuneration– and gave that property special treatment. (at p. 642, W.W.R.).

The end result of the analysis in Marzetti was that s. 68 was a complete code, and that the "wages, salary, or other remuneration" in question could only be accessed by the Trustee through an application under the section. I note that in the case at bar there is no application under s. 68, but merely an objection to discharge whereby the Trustee seeks that I make a conditional order for payment.

In Ramgotra the Court briefly discussed s. 68. In differentiating between the estate-administration stage of bankruptcy and the property-passing stage of bankruptcy, the Court had occasion to refer to s. 68, although the application of s. 68 played no part in the decision. The Court commented:

> After-acquired property is also dealt with in s. 68, which constitutes a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. The provision stipulates that after-acquired remuneration will not pass to and vest in the Trustee unless the Trustee intervenes by applying for a court order directing the payment of the remuneration (or a portion of it) to the Trustee. (at p. 480, W.W.R)..

The Court was, of course, referring to s. 68 as it was then, and not as it is now. However, there can be no doubt that the Court viewed s. 68 as dealing only with after-acquired wages, salary or other remuneration.

In the Wallace case the Supreme Court, in its analysis, rested its conclusion on fairly broad public policy grounds, and found that Wallace's right to sue for severance pay arose not because of the time of the acquisition of a property right in that payment, but rather because of the nature of the property in question, i.e. wages. As noted by Robert A. Klotz in the article referred to: "Wallace won not because his claim was after-acquired property, but because it derived from wages and thus fell within s. 68." (at p. 157).

I agree with Mr. Klotz's interpretation of the decision in Wallace; however, it must be recognized that Wallace dealt with a fact situation where the wages, salary or other remuneration in question was "after-acquired".

Each of the Supreme Court of Canada decisions referred to dealt with s. 68 as it stood prior to the amendments which came into force in 1998. Nothing in the amendments would lead me to conclude that s. 68 is other than the substantive provision the Supreme Court of Canada found the prior legislation to be. However, I have concluded, based both on my analysis of the Supreme Court of Canada decisions referred to, and my analysis of s. 68 as it now stands, that s. 68 has application to both pre and post-bankruptcy income.

Section 68 as was referred to "any salary, wages, or other remuneration from any person employing, or using the services of, the bankrupt." Section 68 as it now reads speaks not to "wages, salary or other remuneration", but "total income". Total income is defined to be "all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source." It seems to me that by enacting s. 68 in its present form, the Parliament of Canada has clarified any confusion which may have existed in the minds of some as to the application of s. 68 to pre-bankruptcy income. Section 68 is a complete code. The "total income" in that section includes all the revenue of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source. Revenue, of course, would and does include income from employment. If we are dealing with income from employment of "whatever nature or source", surely we are dealing with both pre and post-bankruptcy income.

I am strengthened in this conclusion when I review the dominant rationale of the Supreme Court's decision in Marzetti as noted above. I see no reason why individuals in different provinces of this Country should have their income, either pre or post-bankruptcy, treated differently based on their province of residence. If it was unclear before, I believe it now to be clear that persons will not be so treated.

The issue of whether a pay equity settlement such as this was an asset that devolved upon a Trustee was considered by Registrar Sharp in Manitoba in Re Parkinson reflex, (1998), 9 C.B.R. (4th) 61 (Man.Q.B.). The Registrar found that the pay equity settlement in question was not "property". The Registrar reached this conclusion after an analysis of the nature of the pay equity award itself, finding that it constituted a "chose". He found the test was whether, at the date of the assignment or later, the Trustee could sustain an action for recovery of the monies. He found the Trustee could not and, therefore, it did not constitute "property". For the purposes of the pay equity award which is the subject of the application before me, it is interesting that Registrar Sharp in his decision also held that s. 68 had application, notwithstanding that the monies covered by the pay equity award would certainly have been earned prior to the assignment. I note that the Registrar did not refer to Ramgotra. As noted by Robert Klotz in his article (at footnote 21), the decision in Parkinson was reversed in an oral judgment of the Court of Queens Bench.

While I perhaps disagree with the ultimate conclusion reached by Mr. Klotz in his article, I would agree where he states

> ...it appears that the 'vesting' approach--under which the Trustee accrues 100 percent of the pre-bankruptcy wage entitlement--is no longer defensible, despite its eminent pedigree. One cannot be unhappy about this, because that approach has the affect of depriving the bankrupt of all of his or her unpaid pre-bankruptcy income, without regard to need or family responsibility. (at p. 158).

In Re Charron, [2000] J.Q. No. 527 (S.C.) the Supreme Court of Quebec found that a pay equity settlement paid after the date of bankruptcy which related to income in the pre-bankruptcy period fell within s. 68. I agree, and for the reasons noted I find that this pay equity settlement, which was paid after the date of bankruptcy, but which related to the period prior to bankruptcy, still falls within s. 68. There is no s. 68 application before me, and that being the case, I would decline to act.

I would note that even if this matter had come before me under the appropriate section, I would not be inclined to make an order. The income of Ms. Hynes, with which she is to support herself and her three daughters, falls well below the guidelines established by the Superintendent under s. 68(1). From the limited information before me it would appear that after taxes, and applied over the period of bankruptcy, the monies received would still not, on a monthly basis between the date of bankruptcy and the date of the hearing before me, bring the Bankruptcy's salary up to the minimum amount noted in the Guidelines. The Bankrupt is entitled to retain a reasonable amount of her income to sustain herself and her family. I would, therefore, not be inclined to make any conditional order for payment.

In summary, s. 68 applies to both pre and post-bankruptcy "income". There being no application under s. 68, I am not able to make an order. Even if s. 68 did not apply, I would not be inclined to make a conditional order for discharge for the reasons I have noted. I also note that if I am wrong in my interpretation of s.68 and it does not apply to pre-bankruptcy earnings the property in question would have vested in the Trustee upon the assignment, and no further order of this Court would be necessary in order to pass the property to the Trustee.

The Bankrupt shall have her discharge without conditions.
Dated at Halifax, Nova Scotia this day of September, 2000.

Summary

Résumé

5. Form 60, Request for Mediation Made by Trustee, and Form 63, Mediation Settlement Agreement, have been amended to introduce an email option to streamline the mediation process in cases where an agreement has been reached between the parties prior to the time set for the mediation. In these select cases, the OSB believes that email provides a suitable alternative to telephone conference calls or in-person mediation provided that all parties to the mediation agree to proceed by email. Therefore, parties choosing to communicate by way of email will have the ability to transmit a signed Form 63, Mediation Settlement Agreement – Expedited Mediation Process, electronically.

5. Le formulaire 60, Demande de médiation par le syndic, et le formulaire 63, Entente résultant de la médiation, ont été modifiés afin d'y incorporer une option de courriel visant à rationaliser le processus de médiation lorsqu'une entente a été conclue entre les parties avant la date fixée pour la médiation. Dans ces cas particuliers, le BSF estime que le courriel offre une bonne solution de rechange à la téléconférence ou à la médiation en personne, à condition que toutes les parties à la médiation acceptent de procéder par courriel. Ainsi, les parties ayant choisi de communiquer par courriel pourront transmettre par voie électronique le formulaire 63, Entente résultant de la médiation – Procédure de médiation accélérée, dûment signé.

6. Standard confidentiality clauses have been added to Form 63 for cases where the expedited mediation process is chosen. These clauses remind the parties that they must keep confidential all information disclosed during the mediation and must not use the information for any purpose other than for the mediation, except to the extent required by law or as authorized by the person to whom the confidential information relates.

6. Des clauses de confidentialité standard ont été ajoutées au formulaire 63 pour les cas où la procédure de médiation accélérée est choisie. Ces clauses rappellent aux parties qu'elles doivent garder confidentielle toute l'information divulguée pendant la médiation et qu'elles ne doivent pas utiliser cette information à des fins autres que la médiation, sauf lorsqu'elles y sont tenues par la loi ou lorsqu'elles ont obtenu le consentement de la personne visée par l'information confidentielle.

Form 67, Notice of Bankruptcy and First Meeting of Creditors, and Form 68, Notice of Impending Automatic Discharge of Bankrupt, have been combined into one new Form 68, Notice of Bankruptcy, First Meeting of Creditors and Impending Automatic Discharge of Bankrupt. Note that Form 67 is revoked.

faillite d'une personne physique, le formulaire 67, Avis de la faillite et de la première assemblée des créanciers, et le formulaire 68, Préavis de la libération d'office du failli, ont été combinés dans un nouveau formulaire 68 intitulé Avis de la faillite, de la première assemblée des créanciers et de la libération d'office imminente du failli. Par conséquent, le formulaire 67 est révoqué.

8. Paragraphs 2-6 of revoked Form 67, Notice of Bankruptcy and First Meeting of Creditors, were added to newly amended Form 68, Notice of Bankruptcy, First Meeting of Creditors and Impending Automatic Discharge of Bankrupt. As a result, in cases where the bankrupt is an individual, trustees will now send the notice of bankruptcy and first meeting of creditors along with the notice of impending automatic discharge of the bankrupt. Merging two forms into one will streamline some of the administrative obligations of trustees and enhance practical application.

8. Les paragraphes 2 à 6 du formulaire 67 révoqué, Avis de la faillite et de la première assemblée des créanciers, ont été ajoutés au nouveau formulaire 68, Avis de la faillite, de la première assemblée des créanciers et de la libération d'office imminente du failli. Par conséquent, lorsque le failli est une personne physique, les syndics enverront dorénavant l'avis de la faillite et de la première assemblée des créanciers avec l'avis de la libération d'office du failli. La fusion des deux formulaires en un seul vise à rationaliser certaines obligations administratives des syndics et à améliorer l'application pratique.

Creditor may request mediation - Sec. 68(7)

Digitized by Google

(7) On a creditor's request made within 30 days after the day on which the trustee informed the creditor of the amount fixed under subsection (4) or (5.1), the trustee shall, within five days after the day on which the 30-day period ends, send to the official receiver a request, in the prescribed form, that the matter of the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay be determined by mediation and send a copy of the request to the bankrupt and the creditor.

Mediation procedure - Sec. 68(8)
(8) A mediation shall be in accordance with prescribed procedures.

File - Sec. 68(9)
(9) Documents contained in a file on the mediation of a matter under this section form part of the records referred to in subsection 11.1(2).

Application to court to fix amount - Sec. 68(10)
(10) The trustee may, in any of the following circumstances — and shall apply if requested to do so by the official receiver in the circumstances referred to in paragraph (a) — apply to the court to fix, by order, in accordance with the applicable standards, and having regard to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt:

- (a) if the trustee has not implemented a recommendation made by the official receiver under subsection (5);
- (b) if the matter submitted to mediation has not been resolved by the mediation; or
- (c) if the bankrupt has failed to comply with the requirement to pay as determined under this section.

Fixing fair and reasonable remuneration in the case of related persons - Sec. 68(11)
(11) The court may fix an amount that is fair and reasonable

- (a) as salary, wages or other remuneration for the services being performed by a bankrupt for a person employing the bankrupt, or
- (b) as payment for or commission in respect of any services being performed by a bankrupt for a person,

where the person is related to the bankrupt, and the court may, by order, determine the part of the salary, wages or other remuneration, or the part of the payment or commission, that shall be paid to the trustee on the basis of the amount so fixed by the court, unless it appears to the court that the services have been performed for the benefit of the bankrupt and are not of any substantial benefit to the person for whom they were performed.

Modification of order - Sec. 68(12)
(12) On the application of any interested person, the court may, at any time, amend an order made under this section to take into account material changes that have occurred in the financial situation of the bankrupt.

Default by other person - Sec. 68(13)
(13) An order of the court made under this section may be served on a person from whom the bankrupt is entitled to receive money and, in such case,

Digitized by Google

(a) the order binds the person to pay to the estate of the bankrupt the amount fixed by the order; and
(b) if the person fails to comply with the terms of the order, the court may, on the application of the trustee, order the person to pay the trustee the amount of money that the estate of the bankrupt would have received had the person complied with the terms of the order.

Application is a proceeding - Sec. 68(14)
(14) For the purposes of section 38, an application referred to in subsection (10) is deemed to be a proceeding for the benefit of the estate.

Property included for enforcement purposes - Sec. 68(15)
(15) For the purpose of this section, a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate is enforceable against the bankrupt's total income.

When obligation to pay ceases - Sec. 68(16)
(16) If an opposition to the automatic discharge of a bankrupt individual who is required to pay an amount to the estate is filed, the bankrupt's obligation under this section ceases on the day on which the bankrupt would have been automatically discharged had the opposition not been filed, but nothing in this subsection precludes the court from determining that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate an amount that the court considers appropriate.

STAY OF PROCEEDINGS

Stay of proceedings — notice of intention - Sec. 69
69. (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) and sections 69.4, 69.5 and 69.6, on the filing of a notice of intention under section 50.4 by an insolvent person,

Digitized by Google

(a) no creditor has any remedy against the insolvent person or the insolvent person's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy,
(b) no provision of a security agreement between the insolvent person and a secured creditor that provides, in substance, that on
(i) the insolvent person's insolvency,
(ii) the default by the insolvent person of an obligation under the security agreement, or
(iii) the filing by the insolvent person of a notice of intention under section 50.4, the insolvent person ceases to have such rights to use or deal with assets secured under the agreement as he would otherwise have, has any force or effect,
(c) Her Majesty in right of Canada may not exercise Her rights under
(i) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or
(ii) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that
(A) refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, and
(B) provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, in respect of the insolvent person where the insolvent person is a tax debtor under that subsection or provision, and
(d) Her Majesty in right of a province may not exercise her rights under any provision of provincial legislation in respect of the insolvent person where the insolvent person is a debtor under the provincial legislation and the provision has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum
(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or
(ii) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection, until the filing of a proposal under subsection 62(1) in respect of the insolvent person or the bankruptcy of the insolvent person.

These were appeals from an order to vacate the sale of a seized immovable. After obtaining judgment in the Federal Court against Les systèmes de drainage modernes Inc., Hancor Inc. and United Extrusions Ltd. obtained a writ of fieri facias. On the instructions of the sheriff of the District of Beauharnois (Forest), bailiff Trudel seized the immovable. After the seizure, SDM lodged a proposal with its creditors and appointed a trustee. The creditors accepted the proposal, which was approved by the Superior Court of Quebec. The Trustee served a "notice of stay of proceedings" pursuant to Bankruptcy Act , section 69 on the Registry and bailiff Trudel. On the sheriff's instructions another bailiff, de Repentigny, sold the immovable in a judicial sale. The Motions Judge relied on Federal Court Act, subsection 55(5) and Federal Court Rules, Rule 360 in concluding that although the writ was directed to the sheriff, he asked bailiffs to act for him thus usurping a power of delegation which is conferred on sheriffs by Quebec law, but which they do not possess when acting as officers of the Federal Court under the Federal Court Rules. Federal Court Act, subsection 55(5) provides that where a sheriff is unable or unwilling to act, the process of the Court shall be directed to a deputy sheriff. Federal Court Rules, paragraph 360(1)(b) provides that where the sheriff or marshal in Quebec is unable or unwilling to act, any process may be issued to a bailiff duly authorized to act as such for the purposes of the Code of Civil Procedure.
The issues were: (1) whether the seizure and judicial sale of the immovable were carried out by a person with the authority to do so under the Federal Court Act and Federal Court Rules; (2) where an immovable is the subject of a proposal after seizure, must a judicial sale thereof to a purchaser in good faith be vacated?
Held, the appeal should be allowed.
(1) The Motions Judge erred in concluding that the sheriff lacked the power to act through bailiffs. "Provincial" sheriffs who act as sheriffs of the Federal Court may, unless otherwise provided by the Rules, execute writs of execution in the same manner as the writs they execute in performing their usual duties. The writ was directed to the sheriff of the District of Beauharnois. He executed the writ in the same manner as he executes any writ directed to him, by asking a bailiff to act for him. That constituted both execution of the writ by the sheriff to whom it was directed within the meaning of subsection 55(4) of the Act (requiring a sheriff to execute the process of the Court that is directed to him), and execution in the manner permitted by subsection 56(3), i.e., in the same manner as similar writs are required to be executed by the law of Quebec.
The Motions Judge could not rely on subsection 55(5) and Rule 360 to find that the sheriff lacked the power to act in the circumstances since those provisions concern cases in which the writ cannot be directed to a sheriff or where the sheriff is unwilling to act, which was not the case herein. Once subsection 55(4) applies, subsection 55(5) and Rule 360 no longer apply.

The purpose of Federal Court Act, subsections 13(2) and 56(3) and Rule 5 is to ensure that federal and provincial schemes of execution are complementary and fill any possible gaps by resorting, where necessary, to the provincial schemes. The Court must adopt the interpretation that best facilitates the integration of the two schemes. Reasons of administrative convenience as much as of certainty in civil rights matters have led the federal authorities to rely for all practical purposes on provincial practices.

There was no implied delegation of power. According to subsection 13(2), the provincial sheriff is a sheriff of the Court. According to the Sheriffs' Act, section 2, the bailiff acts for the sheriff and not in his place. The seizure was made by bailiff Trudel in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. The sale was carried out by bailiff de Repentigny in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. In both cases, the power exercised was that of the sheriff even though it was exercised by a bailiff.

(2) (a) Neither the sheriff nor the purchasers were told before the sale of the existence of a proposal. Although notice of stay had been served on the seizing bailiff Trudel, the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure provides that any notice concerning execution of a writ must be sent to the sheriff himself. Furthermore, bailiff Trudel was authorized to act for the sheriff only in respect of the seizure. Once the seizure was completed, he ceased to be a sheriff's officer. He was not a sheriff's officer for the purposes of the judicial sale.

(b) Once a sheriff's sale has taken place, it is only exceptionally and on very limited grounds that it can be set aside. This was not an exceptional case. The seizure and the judgment pursuant to which it was made were valid. The immovable sold by judicial authority belonged to the judgment debtor. The purchaser acted in good faith, the sheriff's conduct was beyond reproach and the alleged irregularity existed long before the date fixed for the sale and was due solely to the misunderstanding that arose between the judgment creditor, the secured creditor, the judgment debtor and the trustee.

(c) Bankruptcy Act, subsection 69(1) provides that on the filing of a proposal, no creditor shall continue execution for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the proposal has been refused. Subsection 69(1) applies to both a proposal and a bankruptcy. Section 73, which applies only to bankruptcy, moderates substantially the scope of the stay under subsection 69(1). If in spite of the prohibition imposed by subsection 69(1), a creditor nevertheless proceeds to execute the judgment and if the officiating sheriff has not at the time of the sale received a certified true copy of the assignment, the judicial sale will be valid, the purchaser in good faith will retain title and the sheriff may only, to the detriment of the judgment creditor, deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee. Subsection 66(1) provides that "All the provisions of this Act in so far as they are applicable, apply with such modifications as the circumstances require to proposals". In order to avoid inconsistencies concerning when a purchaser's title would be valid, subsection 66(1) should be given a more liberal interpretation than that proposed in the past. It is possible to adapt section 73 to proposals. The filing of a proposal, even one accepted by the creditors and approved by the Court, does not strip a purchaser in good faith of title in an immovable purchased in a judicial sale if nobody notified the sheriff of the proposal before the sale by sending him a certified true copy thereof. Such notice could, as in the case of bankruptcy, have been sent to the sheriff by the debtor personally, by one of the creditors or by the trustee.

The following is the English version of the reasons for judgment rendered by Décary J.A.: What, according to the Federal Court Act [R.S.C., 1985, c. F-7] and Federal Court Rules [C.R.C., c. 663], are the powers of a sheriff appointed by the Quebec authorities when seizing and selling an immovable by judicial authority in his or her capacity as sheriff of the Federal Court? Where an immovable is the subject of a proposal after being seized, must a judicial sale thereof be vacated to the detriment of a purchaser in good faith even though no notice of stay appears to have been served on the sheriff before the sale? These are the basic questions raised by these two appeals from the decision of a motions judge reported at reflex, (1993), 56 F.T.R. 82.

Background

On the strength of a favourable judgment of the Federal Court (the Court) in a patent case against Les systèmes de drainage modernes Inc. (SDM), Hancor Inc. and United Extrusions Ltd. (Hancor) obtained a writ of fieri facias (the writ) from the Court and seized an immovable belonging to SDM.

After the seizure, SDM lodged a proposal with the trustee Caron Bélanger Ernst & Young Inc. (the trustee) and the said proposal was accepted by the creditors, including the judgment creditor Hancor and the secured creditors Laurentian Bank of Canada and Laurentian Trust of Canada (Laurentian), and approved by the Superior Court of Quebec.

Due to a host of errors and misunderstandings that are outside the scope of the case before the Court,[1] the immovable under seizure was subsequently sold by the sheriff Gilbert Forest (the sheriff) in a judicial sale and awarded to purchasers, namely 118353 Canada Ltd. and 167899 Canada Inc./Ltd. (purchasers), whose good faith was not challenged in this Court.

Essentially on the basis that the judicial sale had been conducted in a manner contrary to the Bankruptcy Act[2] as it read prior to the 1992 amendments[3] and in contravention of the essential conditions and formalities prescribed by the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure [R.S.Q. 1977, c. C-25], three motions to vacate the sheriff's sale were filed, one by SDM and the trustee, a second by Hancor and a third by Laurentian. The Motions Judge allowed the three motions, not on the grounds alleged therein, which he dismissed, but on the ground, raised for the first time at the hearing, that the method chosen by the sheriff to carry out the seizure and sale, which is recognized under Quebec law, is not authorized by the Federal Court Act[4] and Federal Court Rules. The sheriff and the purchasers each appealed the decision and the two appeals were joined for the purposes of hearing and judgment.

The argument in this Court was limited to the two questions I asked at the outset of these reasons and to questions incidental thereto.

Question 1: Were the seizure and judicial sale of the immovable carried out by a person with the authority to do so under the Federal Court Act and Federal Court Rules?

The facts relevant to this part of the case are not in dispute. On October 10, 1991, at Hancor's request, a writ of fieri facias was issued by the Court in Toronto to the "Sheriff of the District of Beauharnois". On November 7, 1991 Hancor's Montréal counsel sent a copy of the writ to his usual bailiffs, Villeneuve et associés, to have them seize the immovable. On November 11, 1991 the bailiff Sylvain Trudel, a member of Villeneuve et associés, visited the sheriff of the district of Beauharnois, Gilbert Forest, and gave him the writ. The sheriff then instructed the bailiff Trudel to seize the immovable, writing the following words on the back of the writ:

[translation] Valleyfield, November 11, 1991
Instructions to bailiff Sylvain Trudel
To seize and sell
(signed) Gilbert Forest, Sheriff
[N.B.: the words "and sell" on this standard form were crossed out by hand.]

On November 14, 1991 the bailiff Trudel seized the immovable.

On January 11, 1992 the sheriff inserted a notice of public sale in the Gazette officielle du Québec. On January 27, 1992 he sent the said notice to the Vaudreuil registry office. On February 2, 1992 he inserted the notice in a local newspaper.

On March 10, 1992 the sheriff instructed another bailiff, Jacques de Repentigny, to sell the immovable in a judicial sale, which he did that very day. After the sale, the bailiff gave the sheriff the minutes of the sale, his report and the cheque issued by the purchasers. On March 30, 1992 the sheriff completed his own report, in which he certified that he had seized the immovable and that on March 10, 1992 he had offered it for sale by auction and awarded it to the two purchasers jointly and severally.

According to the evidence, this procedure (with the probable exception of the delay in preparing the sheriff's report) is that ordinarily followed by counsel, bailiffs and the sheriff in the district of Beauharnois and is in all ways consistent with the requirements of Quebec law.

The trustee and Laurentian argued before the Motions Judge that the said procedure was contrary to the requirements of the Federal Court Act ("the Act" in this first part) and Federal Court Rules (the Rules). The Motions Judge agreed with them.

The Motions Judge relied basically on subsection 55(5)[5] of the Act and Rule 360[6] [as enacted by SOR/79-58 , s. 2] in concluding that although the writ had been directed to the sheriff of the district of Beauharnois, the said sheriff, though there was no evidence that he was unwilling to act, instead decided to instruct the bailiff Trudel to seize the immovable and the bailiff de Repentigny to sell it in a judicial sale. In asking a bailiff to act for him, the sheriff is alleged to have usurped a power of delegation which is conferred on sheriffs by Quebec law but which they do not possess when acting as officers of the Federal Court under the Rules of this Court. Thus, the seizure and judicial sale are alleged to have been carried out by a bailiff to whom the writ was not directed and who was not authorized under federal law to carry out a seizure and judicial sale.

In my opinion, the Motions Judge was on the wrong track in his interpretation of the facts, the applicable provisions and the intent underlying those provisions.

It can be seen from a joint reading of subsections 13(1) and (2) of the Act[7] that if no sheriff of the Federal Court has been appointed by the Governor in Council for the district of Beauharnois"which is the case"the sheriff appointed by the provincial authorities in the said district becomes ex officio the sheriff of the Court.[8] Thus, in the case at bar, the responsibilities of a sheriff of the Court were conferred on the sheriff Forest in addition to those already incumbent on him under provincial law.

One of the responsibilities he inherited in his capacity as sheriff of the Court is that, provided for in subsection 55(4),[9] of executing the process of the Court that is directed to him.

According to subsection 56(3),[10] unless otherwise provided by the Rules, the sheriff is to execute all writs of execution "as nearly as possible in the same manner as similar writs or process, issued out of the superior courts of the province in which the property to be seized is situated, are, by the law of that province, required to be executed."

Article 660 of Quebec Code of Civil Procedure provides that a writ of seizure of immovables "is executed by the sheriff himself or by one of his officers". Furthermore, section 2 of the Sheriffs' Act[11] confers on every sheriff "the selection of the bailiffs to be employed by and to act for him in the several districts of Québec," and section 1 of the Bailiffs Act[12] provides that a bailiff is an officer "empowered to serve written proceedings issuing out of any court, carry out judicial decisions that are executory and perform any other duty devolving upon him by law."

It unquestionably follows that "provincial" sheriffs who act as sheriffs of the Federal Court may, unless otherwise provided by the Rules of this Court, execute writs of execution in the same manner as the writs they execute in performing their usual duties.

It has been established in the instant case that the writ was directed to the sheriff of the district of Beauharnois. It was adduced in evidence that the sheriff executed the writ in the same manner as he executes any writ directed to him, that is, by asking a bailiff to act for him. In my view, that constitutes both execution of the writ by the sheriff to whom it was directed within the meaning of subsection 55(4) of the Act and execution in the manner permitted by subsection 56(3), that is, in the same manner as similar writs are required to be executed by the law of Quebec. Thus, the Motions Judge committed his first error in concluding that the sheriff lacked the power to act through bailiffs. That error led to a second, which we will now discuss.

Once subsection 55(4) comes into play, subsection 55(5) and its complement, Rule 360, are no longer applicable. Those two provisions concern cases in which the writ cannot be directed to a sheriff or where the sheriff is unwilling to act. Since that is not the case here, the Motions Judge could not rely on subsection 55(5) and Rule 360 to find that the sheriff lacked the power to act in the circumstances.

If there were any doubt, and in my view there is none, it would still be necessary to interpret the word "execute" in subsection 55(4) in a manner that reflects the acknowledged intention of the federal authorities. The clear purpose of subsections 13(2) and 56(3) of the Act and Rule 5[13] is to ensure that the federal and provincial schemes of execution are complementary and to fill any possible gaps by resorting where necessary to the provincial schemes. These provisions are all invitations to the Court to refrain from inflexibility and adopt the interpretation that best facilitates the integration of the two schemes.

The reasons for this are easy to explain. The Federal Court is in a way a court of exception that was grafted onto the existing network of superior courts. Its judgments have significant civil implications and it is essential, if they are to be understandable to litigants and if these implications are to be at all uniform, for execution procedures to be as similar as possible to those of the superior courts. This is all the more essential in that the Court as a general rule uses officers of the court appointed, and the seizure and judicial sale machinery established by, provincial authorities. Thus, reasons of administrative convenience as much as of certainty in civil rights matters have led the federal authorities to rely for all practical purposes on provincial practices.

The arguments revolved, wrongly in my view, around the concept of implied delegation of power. There was strictly speaking no such delegation in the case at bar. According to subsection 13(2) of the Act, the provincial sheriff is a sheriff of the Court. According to the very words of section 2 of the Sheriffs' Act, the bailiff acts for the sheriff and not in his or her place. The seizure was made by the bailiff Trudel in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. The sale was carried out by the bailiff de Repentigny in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. In both cases, the power exercised was that of the sheriff even though it was exercised by the bailiff.

Finally, the solution adopted by the Motions Judge, which was proposed by the respondents, is impracticable. It places obligations"those of personally seizing everything and selling everything in a judicial sale"on Quebec sheriffs, the very persons to whom subsection 13(2) of the Act entrusts the task of executing such writs, obligations that they do not perform in the course of their everyday duties. At the same time, it places constraints on the machinery established by provincial authorities, which the federal authorities are employing, that the provincial authorities cannot be assumed to have intended to apply thereto. I cannot adopt an interpretation that might paralyze the system. Thus, I consider the following comments by Monnin J.A., which Dickson J. (as he then was) adopted in Motor Transport Board of Manitoba v. Purolator Courier Ltd. ,[14] to be relevant even though made in a different context:

I must assume that this federal legislation which was purely a delegation of federal powers to the various provincial transport boards, expects these boards to operate in their usual manner and no more. If such were not the case, it would lead to ridiculous situations and I am not prepared to find that Parliament of necessity desired ridiculous situations.

I accordingly conclude that in the case at bar the provincial law and federal law are complementary rather than inconsistent and that the Motions Judge erred in holding that a judicial sale carried out by the sheriff in conformity with the requirements of Quebec law and federal law was invalid.

This argument of the respondents was accordingly unfounded.

Question 2: Where an immovable is the subject of a proposal after being seized, must a judicial sale thereof to a purchaser in good faith be vacated?

The respondents relied on both the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure and the Bankruptcy Act ("the Act" in this second part). They submitted, in short, that the sheriff had been informed of the settlement in progress or of the settlement between the parties, that the parties had reached an agreement and the debt had been extinguished at the time of the judicial sale and that, however that may be, the filing of a proposal resulted automatically in a stay of the execution proceedings, and they argued that these were all grounds for vacating the sheriff's sale.

Les intimés se fondent à la fois sur le Code de procédure civile du Québec et sur la Loi sur la faillite ("la Loi" dans cette deuxième partie). Ils soutiennent grosso modo que le shérif avait été informé du règlement en cours ou du règlement intervenu entre les parties, qu'il y avait entente entre les parties et extinction de la dette au moment de la vente en justice, et que, quoi qu'il en soit, le dépôt d'une proposition concordataire amenait d'office l'arrêt des procédures d'exécution, autant de motifs, selon eux, d'annulation du décret.The seizure was made on November 11, 1991 by the sheriff Forest acting through the bailiff Trudel. On December 3, 1991 Laurentian registered at the Vaudreuil registry office [translation] "a notice of default and declaration of payment due which have the effect of rendering all securities created under the deed of trust enforceable" in respect of the immovable under seizure. On December 4, 1991 Laurentian filed in the Registry of this Court in Montréal a "motion for a stay of execution by writ of fieri facias" and an "opposition to seizure in execution", which were to be presented on December 9, 1991.

On December 6, 1991 SDM made a proposal to its creditors under Part III of the Bankruptcy Act and appointed Caron et associés trustee therefor. That same day, the trustee served a "notice of stay of proceedings" pursuant to section 69 of the Bankruptcy Act on counsel for SDM, the Registry of the Federal Court and the bailiff Trudel.

On December 9, 1991 Laurentian withdrew its motion to stay and opposition in view of the filing of SDM's proposal.

On January 20, 1992 SDM filed an amended proposal, which was duly accepted by the creditors that same day on the condition, inter alia, that SDM and Hancor enter into an agreement and that Hancor [translation] "release all seizures of SDM's assets". Hancor and Laurentian were represented at that meeting.

As agreed on January 20, 1992, Hancor and SDM discharged each other on February 26, 1992 in respect of all past, present or future claims resulting from the events related in the record of the Court and Hancor released all its seizures of SDM's assets. On February 28, 1992 the Superior Court of the district of Beauharnois approved the amended proposal of January 20, 1992.

Then, on March 10, 1992 the sheriff sold the immovable in a judicial sale.

(a) Knowledge of the agreement by the sheriff

It is clear from the evidence, and the finding of fact by the Motions Judge in this respect is unassailable, that neither the sheriff nor the purchasers

were told before the sale of the existence of a proposal, that a notice to stay was sent to them or even that an agreement signed by all the parties had been definitely concluded ending the matter.[15]

It can of course be seen from the evidence that the corporation's president, Mr. Kohen, had contacted the sheriff's office on February 3, 1992 to complain about the notice of sale; however, Mr. Kohen did not mention the existence of a proposal but merely asked that the sale be halted on the ground that [translation] "everything had been settled". The sheriff's deputy with whom he spoke simply said that she [translation] "had nothing in the file indicating that it was settled" and asked him to [translation] "contact his lawyers to have them send us a release, or else the sale would take place".

Similarly, one of Hancor's counsel testified that he too had telephoned Ms. Veillette in early February 1992 to inform her of the proposal, but Ms. Veillette denied taking part in any conversation whatsoever with counsel concerned. The finding by the Motions Judge that the sheriff had not been informed of the existence of a proposal suggests that the Judge did not accept counsel's testimony.

In view of the evidence, which I must say is overwhelming, that the trustee and the counsel for SDM, Hancor and Laurentian quite simply, due to a misunderstanding, failed to tell the sheriff what was going on and in particular to serve any document whatsoever on him, the respondents fell back in desperation on the fact that the notice of stay of December 6, 1991 had been served on the seizing bailiff Trudel.

If, they submitted at the hearing, the Court were to conclude (which it did in the first part) that the bailiff Trudel had seized the immovable in his capacity as a sheriff's officer, it would follow that the service on that officer of the notice of stay on December 6, 1991 was equivalent to service on the sheriff himself.

I do not find this argument convincing. It is the sheriff who is responsible for executing the writ and the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure provides that any notice concerning its execution must be sent to the sheriff himself. A party may not confer on a bailiff a mandate to represent the sheriff that only the sheriff himself may confer. Furthermore, in the case at bar the bailiff Trudel had been authorized by the sheriff to act for him only in respect of the seizure (moreover, Hancor's counsel had asked the bailiff only to seize the immovable). Once the seizure had been completed, he ceased to be a sheriff's officer. At any rate, he was definitely not a sheriff's officer for the purposes of the judicial sale.

Furthermore, that is what Hancor, SDM and the trustee themselves understood to be the case. It was to the office of the sheriff that the president of SDM complained by fax and telephone on February 3, 1992. It was from the sheriff's office that Hancor's counsel received the notice of sale and it was that office that he claims to have telephoned. Another of Hancor's counsel attributes the publication of the notice to [translation] "a clerical error by the sheriff". SDM's Montréal counsel was also aware of this, since the draft release he prepared on January 24, 1992 contained a notice to the sheriff of Beauharnois.[16]

The trustee was also aware of this since, even though it had served the notice of stay on the bailiff Trudel, it can be seen from the testimony of its administrator, Ms. Vincent, that the notice of stay had intentionally not been given to the sheriff for two reasons: the first was that the proposal did not confer possession of the seized assets on the trustee, which was merely an intermediary between SDM and its creditors, and the second was that [translation] "[Hancor's] counsel had already been told to halt the proceedings and it had in fact been agreed that [counsel concerned] would terminate those proceedings".

In short, nobody ever thought that the notice of stay had been served on the sheriff and that the sale had accordingly been suspended. On the contrary, it can be seen without a shadow of a doubt from the evidence that everyone was aware that the sheriff was preparing to hold the sale and that it was he who had to be contacted to prevent it. No such action was taken and the sheriff was never told.

(b) The agreement between the parties and vacating of the sale

The Supreme Court of Canada recently noted that:[17]

. . . while it remains possible, it is only exceptionally that the vacating of sales at law will be permitted and then, only on limited and enumerated grounds. Those exceptions are found in arts. 698 and 699 C.C.P.

This rule suffers few exceptions. A sale based upon a judgment or a seizure which is null may be vacated . . . . Similarly, a sale made super non domino, that is, of property which does not belong to the debtor but to a third party, may be vacated . . . .

In summary, then, once a sheriff's sale has taken place, it is only exceptionally and on very limited grounds that it can be set aside.

A comparison of the grounds for opposition, annulment and vacation in respect of seizures in execution of immovable property is especially revealing of the National Assembly's intention: there are more grounds for annulling a seizure than there are for vacating a sale. Moreover, the further one gets from the seizure and the closer to the sale, the fewer the possibilities of stopping the process and the smaller the number of persons who may do so.

Thus, a judgment debtor and a third party with a sufficient interest may oppose and ask for the annulment of the seizure of an immovable on the following grounds:[18]

1. on the ground of an irregularity in the seizure, which causes him a serious prejudice . . . ;
2. on the ground of the property being exempt from seizure;
3. on the ground of the extinction of the debt;
4. on any other ground of a nature to affect the judgment sought to be executed.

However, and in my view this is a decisive indication of the National Assembly's intention, such an opposition must be served at least ten days before the date fixed for the sale or else it cannot stop the sale "except upon the order of the prothonotary . . . for sufficient cause."[19]

A sheriff's sale may be vacated at the instance of any interested person:[20]

698. . . .

(1) If, with the knowledge of the purchaser, fraud was employed to keep persons from bidding;

(2) If the essential conditions and formalities prescribed for the sale have not been observed; but the seizing creditor cannot vacate the sale for any irregularity attributable to himself or his attorney.

Thus, where the grounds for annulment are known prior to the sale and are unrelated to the sale as such, the lateness of the opposing parties may be fatal to them: if they fail to come forward at least ten days before the sale they are taking a great risk; if they come forward after the sale, it is generally too late. Furthermore L'Heureux-Dubé J. stated the following in Garcia:[21]

The requirement that the party who opposes a sale must do so before the sale takes place is very well established in Quebec . . .

She also made an impressive inventory of judgments in which opposing parties had lost their rights by failing to act and repeated the following comment by Taschereau J. in McGregor v. Canada Investment and Agency Co.:[22]

Assuming that he had rights to this property the appellant has lost them by the sheriff's sale. Vigilantibus non dormientibus subvenit lex.

The respondents asked this Court to follow, as a "trend in the case law", certain Quebec court judgments that allowed motions to vacate a sheriff's sale on the ground that there was an agreement between the parties at the time of the sale and that the debt was extinguished. The judgments to which they referred the Court are: Rossie c. Gosselin , [1979] C.S. 273; Blanchette c. Vertu, unreported, St-François Sup. Ct., No. 450-05-000562-815, January 13, 1983, SOQUIJ No. 83-217; Stebenne c. Banque de commerce canadienne impériale, [1982] C.S. 884; and Sauvegarde (La), Cie d'assurance sur la vie c. Tapis Laberge Inc., [1983] C.S. 835.

I note at the outset that none of them were mentioned by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Garcia as examples of exceptional cases on the vacating of sheriff's sales. I am not sure, therefore, that they constitute a "trend in the case law" with precedential value. However that may be, the circumstances of those cases are not really comparable to those of the case at bar.

In Rossie and Stebenne, the sale was suspended by the sheriff at the request of the parties, but the judgment creditor then unilaterally ordered the sheriff to continue the execution proceedings. In Blanchette, the purchaser knew about the agreement between the parties. In La Sauvegarde, the sheriff held the sale after announcing that it was being vacated.

In the case at bar, however, various avenues were open to the respondents well before the sale.

Thus, the parties to the seizure, namely Hancor and SDM, could under article 673 C.C.P. have consented to the suspension of the sale. While it is true that they wanted to do so, they did not do what was necessary to give effect to their consent. As the Motions Judge held, it is not enough that the parties consent, as the sheriff still has to be informed of their consent, and it can be seen from the evidence that he was not. It must not be forgotten that the sheriff is ordered by the Court to sell the immovable ("[t]he writ . . . orders the sheriff" (C.C.P., art. 660)). I cannot conceive that article 673 C.C.P. provides for the automatic suspension of a sale where the parties consent without the sheriff's knowledge. A party could probably ask for a sheriff's sale to be vacated on the ground that the sheriff wrongly refused to suspend the sale,[23] but I do not see how a sheriff could wrongly refuse to suspend if the parties have not asked him to do so. Article 673 C.C.P. does not require that the sheriff take the initiative to suspend a sale he or she is required to hold by Court order: quite the contrary.

Similarly, SDM and its creditors could on the strength of a duly approved proposal have opposed the sale ten days before it took place or, with leave, within a shorter period before it took place. They did not do so.

I make no secret of the fact that it would be tempting from the point of view of equity to give one more chance to parties each of whom believed in good faith that the sale would not take place because there was no longer any reason for it and who failed, as a result of confusion and blundering, to take the necessary action to stop it. But the law is there, and it seeks to protect a person, the purchaser, who also acted in good faith and, above and beyond the interests of the parties to the case, to preserve what Pigeon J., in Anjou (Town of) v. C.A.C. Realty Ltd. et al.,[24] called the "principle of the inviolability of judicial sales".

I do not think that this is an exceptional case of the type to which L'Heureux-Dubé J. alluded in Garcia. The seizure was valid. The judgment pursuant to which the seizure was made was valid. The immovable sold by judicial authority belonged to the judgment debtor. Furthermore, the purchaser acted in good faith, the sheriff's conduct was beyond reproach and the alleged irregularity, if it is an irregularity, existed long before the date fixed for the sale and was due solely to the misunderstanding that arose between the judgment creditor, the secured creditor, the judgment debtor and the trustee. I note that, where the judgment creditor is concerned, I could not have allowed its motion even if I had found that there was an irregularity, as article 698 C.C.P. bars it from availing itself of an irregularity attributable to itself.

This second argument must fail in so far as it is based on the provisions of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure. The respondents have only one other chance: the Bankruptcy Act.

(c) The stay of proceedings and section 69 of the Bankruptcy Act

Subsection 69(1) of the Bankruptcy Act reads as follows:

69. (1) On the filing of a proposal made by an insolvent person or on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the debtor or his property or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the trustee has been discharged or until the proposal has been refused, unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

The respondents argued that a proposal results in an automatic stay of proceedings, that this stay bars a judgment creditor from having property belonging to the debtor sold in a judicial sale and that any judicial sale of such property is null regardless of whether or not the sheriff has been told about the proposal.

The purchaser countered this by arguing that subsection 69(1) does not provide for an automatic stay or that at the very least the stay cannot be set up against a purchaser. It added on the basis of subsection 66(1)[25] of the Act that the protection granted by section 73[26] to purchasers in good faith in respect of a bankruptcy should also be granted to them in respect of a proposal.

Thus, the resolution of a case in which a judicial sale takes place in respect not of a bankruptcy but of a proposal depends on the interpretation of subsections 66(1), 69(1) and section 73 of the Act.

The substance of the debate is quite simple.

Subsection 69(1) applies, by its very wording, to both a proposal and a bankruptcy. The generality of the stay of proceedings under this subsection is established; the courts do not allow a creditor, by enforcing an individual remedy, to frustrate the Bankruptcy Act and for his or her own benefit unjustly reduce a debtor's estate by continuing execution proceedings without leave of the court.[27]

Digitized by Google

Section 73, which according to its wording applies only to bankruptcy, moderates substantially the scope of the stay under subsection 69(1). If, in spite of the prohibition imposed on him or her by subsection 69(1), a creditor nevertheless proceeds to execute the judgment and if the officiating sheriff has not at the time of the sale received a copy of the assignment certified by the trustee as a true copy thereof, the judicial sale will nevertheless be valid, the purchaser in good faith will retain his or her title and the sheriff may only, to the detriment of the judgment creditor, deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee.[28]

It was in my view quite unnecessary for certain courts to expatiate upon the absolute or relative nature of the stay of proceedings under subsection 69(1). The question is fine in theory but is in practice resolved less by quashing execution proceedings unlawfully undertaken by a creditor than by delivering the proceeds of those proceedings to the trustee or the general body of creditors.[29]

In view of section 73, it should be pointed out that: (1) it is not the fact of bankruptcy that bars the sheriff from holding the sale or, if the sale has been held, requires him or her to deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee, but the notice the sheriff receives; as long as the sheriff is not notified in the prescribed manner, he or she is not only under no obligation to suspend the sale but has no right to do so;[30] (2) it is not necessary that the trustee give the prescribed notice personally, as subsection 73(2) merely requires that a copy of the assignment certified by the trustee as a true copy thereof be sent to the sheriff without specifying who must send it; and (3) the only obligation imposed by subsections 73(2) and (3) is the requirement that the sheriff deliver the property to the trustee if he or she receives the notice before the sale or deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee if the notice is received after the sale.[31]

Since section 73, unlike section 69, refers only to "property of the bankrupt" and "an act of bankruptcy", it remains to be determined whether the scheme of subsection 66(1) protects the rights of a purchaser in good faith where, unknown to the sheriff, a proposal is filed before the sale in the same way as if there were a bankruptcy and assignment of the property to the trustee.

The wording of subsection 66(1) has rightly been criticized by Professor Albert Bohémier in Faillite et Insolvabilité.[32] Parliament should, in so far as is possible, indicate in a statute what provisions apply to a given situation. By leaving it up to the courts to decide what provisions of the Bankruptcy Act apply in the case not of a bankruptcy but of a proposal, Parliament opened the door to uncertainties inconsistent with the economic stability that the Bankruptcy Act is nevertheless intended to promote.

According to a common interpretation discussed by Professor Bohémier, it is necessary to start from the idea that the fundamental distinction between a bankruptcy and a proposal lies in the fact that the debtor loses possession of his or her property in a bankruptcy but generally retains it in the case of a proposal, and accordingly to interpret subsection 66(1) to mean that only those provisions of the Act that may apply regardless of whether or not the debtor loses possession are applicable mutatis mutandis to a proposal.

However, this approach causes a problem in the case of section 73. As Professor Bohémier noted:

[translation] There are cases involving a composition, which are clearly debatable, in which the courts have refused to apply sections 70 and 73 B.A. mutatis mutandis to a proposal other than a proposal-assignment expressly authorizing the trustee to act. To circumvent this problem, it is advisable to appoint an interim receiver (s. 47 B.A.) and to confer on him or her the right to take possession of the seized property.[33]

It is enough to note that a proposal leads directly to a bankruptcy in the event of a refusal by the creditors (subsection 57(1) of the Act), a default in performance (paragraph 42(1)(i) of the Act) or an annulment (subsection 63(4)) to wonder about the fate of a judicial sale that takes place before the refusal, default or annulment or is itself the cause of the default or annulment. Would the purchaser's title be valid in the case of a bankruptcy, invalid in the case of a proposal and valid in the case of a proposal that has become a bankruptcy? Such a result would to say the least be inconsistent.

Digitized by Google

It is in my view possible to avoid such inconsistency by giving subsection 66(1) an interpretation that is more liberal than the one proposed in the past and that corresponds more closely to the particularly general wording of that subsection.

The words used by Parliament are significant: "All the provisions", "in so far as they are applicable" and "with such modifications as the circumstances require". Parliament was aware of the theoretical and practical differences between the scheme of bankruptcy and that of proposals. Whether due to indolence or economy, it did not consider it necessary for the provisions it had passed in respect of bankruptcy to be repeated in or adapted to the case of proposals. At the same time, however, it was very careful to say"at least that is how I understand the words it used"that all the provisions of the Act apply to proposals in so far as they can be applied. In other words, it wanted the courts to find a way, above and beyond their obvious differences, to harmonize the rules applicable to bankruptcy with those applicable to proposals in so far as is possible. It did not say that this must be done at any price: there are cases in which it will not be possible. However, it did say that an attempt must be made to do so on a case-by-case basis and that those involved in this harmonization effort must not hesitate to use their imaginations. Parliament has invited the courts to participate in a process of intelligent harmonization and adaptation, not one of blindly literal application.

The adoption of this approach sheds considerable light on the situation. In section 69, Parliament was concerned solely with the interests of creditors and debtors. In section 73 (and in section 75,[34] which is irrelevant here), it was concerned primarily with the interests of purchasers in good faith, while at the same time conferring on creditors, debtors and trustees the right to block the seizure and sale. Parliament clearly intended to protect purchasers where, unknown to themselves and to the sheriff, they venture into the minefield of bankruptcy and insolvency.

I see nothing in this protection accorded to the purchaser in good faith that depends on whether the debtor or the trustee was in possession of the property sold. In other words, the debtor not being in possession of the property does not change the fact that the intention was to protect the purchaser's title. Indeed, it would be surprising if the judicial sale were valid where the debtor is not in possession of the property sold and invalid where he or she is in possession. It is true that, since this section was drafted in terms of bankruptcy, the obligations it imposes on the sheriff are expressed in a context in which it is a trustee who is in lawful possession of the bankrupt's property and the proceeds of the sale must be delivered to the trustee. However, that is the very challenge faced by the courts under subsection 66(1): is it possible to disregard these concepts proper to a bankruptcy and adapt them to a proposal?

I am all the more comfortable in believing that there is no objection in theory to applying section 73 to a proposal in that the Act itself, in subsection 63(2) on the annulment of a proposal, confirms the validity of a sale made in pursuance of the proposal.

Furthermore, this interest displayed by Parliament in purchasers in good faith is very much in line with its policy, as defined in subsection 72(1) of the Act, not to:

. . . abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act . . . .

It can be seen from my analysis in the preceding section that my decision to apply section 73 to proposals also ensures compliance with the principle of the inviolability of judicial sales that is so profoundly rooted in Quebec civil law.

In my view, it is entirely possible to adapt section 73 to proposals, as subsection 66(1) permits and encourages us to do. It is enough to conclude, by making "such modifications as the circumstances require", that the filing of a proposal, even one accepted by the creditors and approved by the court, does not strip a purchaser in good faith of his or her title in an immovable purchased in a judicial sale if nobody notified the sheriff of the proposal, composition or approval before the sale by sending him or her a certified true copy of the proposal, composition or judgment of approval. Such notice could, as in a case of bankruptcy, have been sent to the sheriff by the debtor personally, by one of the creditors or by the trustee.

To whom, therefore, must the sheriff deliver the proceeds of the judicial sale, as he or she is required to do by subsection 73(3)? Maybe to the trustee for distribution or delivery to whomsoever is entitled thereto, since subsection 60(2) of the Act provides that all moneys payable under the proposal are to be paid to the trustee and section 63 provides that the trustee is not functus where a proposal is annulled due to a default in performance. I do not need to answer this question for the purposes of the case at bar.

It is possible that upholding the validity of the judicial sale will result in annulment of the proposal due to the debtor's failure to respect its undertaking to obtain the release of the seizure. However, I do not have to concern myself with the possible ramifications of the Court's decision in this respect. Parliament laid down the consequences of a default in performance in section 63 and paragraph 42(1)(i)[35] and it does not matter whether this default results from an intentional act or from a simple mistake made in good faith. Parliament chose to respect the rights of a purchaser in good faith and the debtor, its creditors and the trustee have only themselves to blame if a mistake made by one or more of them made it impossible to perform the proposal.

This third argument must be rejected.

DISPOSITION

I would allow the appeals, reverse the decision of the Motions Judge and dismiss the three motions to vacate the sheriff's sale.

The appellant purchasers shall have their costs at trial and on appeal against each of the respondents in file No. A-1259-92; the appellant sheriff shall have his costs at trial and on appeal against each of the respondents in file No. A-1221-92.

Hugessen J.A.: I agree.

Chevalier D.J.: I agree.

[1] In this respect, I adopt the following comments of the Motions Judge (reflex, (1993), 56 F.T.R. 82, at p. 84):

There is no question that as the issue in this case has been resolved between the parties as part of a proposal, the forced sale proceeding on this real property should never have been completed. The confusion resulted from an obvious lack of communication between the parties, their counsel and the officers of the Court responsible for the sale. Many persons were to blame, but it is not for this court in hearing the applications at bar to distribute blame or identify those responsible, except to ascertain that the procedure for the court sale was followed and that the essential conditions and requirements for the sale were observed.

Stay of proceedings — Division I proposals - Sec. 69.1

69.1 (1) Subject to subsections (2) to (6) and sections 69.4, 69.5 and 69.6, on the filing of a proposal under subsection 62(1) in respect of an insolvent person,

(a) no creditor has any remedy against the insolvent person or the insolvent person's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy, until the trustee has been discharged or the insolvent person becomes bankrupt;

(b) no provision of a security agreement between the insolvent person and a secured creditor that provides, in substance, that on

(i) the insolvent person's insolvency,

(ii) the default by the insolvent person of an obligation under the security agreement, or

(iii) the filing of a notice of intention under section 50.4 or of a proposal under subsection 62(1) in respect of the insolvent person,

the insolvent person ceases to have such rights to use or deal with assets secured under the agreement as the insolvent person would otherwise have, has any force or effect until the trustee has been discharged or the insolvent person becomes bankrupt;

(c) Her Majesty in right of Canada may not exercise Her rights under subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act or any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, in respect of the insolvent person where the insolvent person is a tax debtor under that subsection or provision, until

(i) the trustee has been discharged,

(ii) six months have elapsed following court approval of the proposal, or

(iii) the insolvent person becomes bankrupt; and

(d) Her Majesty in right of a province may not exercise Her rights under any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum

(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

(ii) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in

(iv) six months have elapsed following court approval of the proposal, or
(v) the insolvent person becomes bankrupt.

Limitation - Sec. 69.1(2)
(2) The stays provided by subsection (1) do not apply
(a) to prevent a secured creditor who took possession of secured assets of the insolvent person for the purpose of realization before the proposal was filed from dealing with those assets;
(b) unless the secured creditor otherwise agrees, to prevent a secured creditor who gave notice of intention under subsection 244(1) to enforce that creditor's security against the insolvent person more than ten days before
(i) a notice of intention was filed in respect of the insolvent person under section 50.4, or
(ii) the proposal was filed, if no notice of intention under section 50.4 was filed from enforcing that security;
(c) to prevent a secured creditor who gave notice of intention under subsection 244(1) to enforce that creditor's security from enforcing the security if the insolvent person has, under subsection 244(2), consented to the enforcement action; or

[1] January 24, 1994. FARLEY J.: – Skyview International Finance Corporation ("Skyview") brought this motion for a declaration that the stay provisions (ss. 69 and 69.1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 as amended ("BIA") no longer operate in respect of Skyview taking steps to enforce its security (including accounts receivable and inventory) given by Cumberland Trading Inc. ("Cumberland") which it has been financing for the last 9 years. In addition Skyview moved for a declaration that the 30 day period to file a proposal mentioned in s. 50.4(8) BIA was terminated. Thirdly, Skyview was asking for an order removing Doane Raymond Limited ("Doane") which was Cumberland's choice as trustee and substituting A. Farber Associates ("Farber") as trustee under the Notice of Intention to File a Proposal of Cumberland. In the alternative to the relief awarded in the last two aspects, Skyview wished to have an order appointing Farber as interim receiver.

[2] On January 5, 1994 Skyview demanded payment in full of its operating financing loan to Cumberland and gave a s. 244 BIA notice of its intention to enforce its security in ten days. The affidavit filed on behalf of Skyview indicated that Cumberland was not cooperating with it in providing appropriate financial information for the last half year. This was disputed in the affidavit filed by Cumberland. Suffice it to say that there has been a falling out between the two. Skyview asserted that it was owed $966,478 and that there was an exposure to it under a guarantee given on Cumberland's behalf to a potential of approximately $200,000 U.S. Skyview's deadline for repayment was January 16th. On January 14th Cumberland filed with the Official Receiver a Notice of Intention to make a Proposal (s. 50.4(1) BIA) and pursuant to s. 69 BIA there would be a stay of proceedings upon this filing.

[3] Skyview's president swore that:

> 21. In light of the unpleasant and frustrating experience Skyview has had to endure over the preceding 3 to 4 months with Cumberland, including specifically the persistent refusal by Cumberland to account for its sales from the Retail Business, the misrepresentation of Cumberland's pre-sold orders referred to above and particularly its secretive purported "termination" of its direction to accord to pay sums to Skyview in reduction of Cumberland's indebtedness, Skyview's faith and confidence in the management of Cumberland has been irreparably damaged such that Skyview would not be prepared to vote in terms of any proposal which Cumberland may make.

and further that

> 24. The continued operation of a stay of proceedings preventing Skyview from enforcing its security will be materially prejudicial to the rights of Skyview. The assets of Skyview consist primarily of inventory and receivables (both from the Distribution Business and the Retail Business). With each day that passes Cumberland is converting its inventory (financed by Skyview) into cash (primarily in the Retail Business) and receivables (primarily in the Distribution Business) and it is Skyview's fear that those sums will be used by Cumberland to pay its other creditors and to fund the professional costs which it inevitably must incur in formulating and implementing a proposal. This fear is especially heightened insofar as the receivables generated from the Retail Business are concerned as they are under the direct and immediate control of Cumberland and are not collected by Accord.

[4] Cumberland's Notice of Intention to File a Proposal acknowledges that Skyview is owed $750,000. On that basis Skyview has 95% in value of Cumberland's admitted secured creditors' claims and 67% of all creditors' claims of whatever nature. No matter what, Skyview's claim is so large that Skyview cannot be swamped in any class in which it could be put. Clearly Skyview would have a veto on any vote as to a proposal, at least so far as the secured class, assuming the secureds are treated as a separate class. This leaves the interesting aspect that under the BIA regime one could have a proposal turned down by the secured creditor class but approved by the unsecured creditor class and effective vis-à-vis this latter class, but with the secured class being able to enforce their security. One may question the practicality a proposal affecting only unsecured creditors becoming effective in similar circumstances to this situation.

[5] Cumberland's essential position is that it must have some time under BIA to see about reorganizing itself. While I am mindful that both BIA and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA") should be classified as debtor friendly legislation since they both provide for the possibility of reorganization (as contrasted with the absence of creditor friendly legislation which would allow, say, creditors to move for an increase in interest rates if inflation became rampant), these acts do not allow debtors absolute immunity and impunity from their creditors. I would also observe that all too frequently debtors wait until virtually the last moment, the last moment or, in some cases, beyond the last moment before even beginning to think about reorganization (and the attendant support that any successful reorganization requires from the creditors). I noted the lamentable tendency of debtors to deal with these situations as "last gasp" desperation moves in Re Inducon Development Corp. (1992), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 308 (Ont. Gen. Div.). To deal with matters on this basis minimizes the chances of success, even if "success" may have been available with earlier spadework. It is true that under BIA an insolvent person can get an automatic stay by merely filing a Notice of Intention to File a Proposal – as opposed to the necessity under CCAA of convincing the court of the appropriateness of granting a stay (and the nature of the stay). However BIA does not guarantee the insolvent person a stay without review for any set period of time. To keep the playing field level and dry so that it remains in play, a creditor or creditors can apply to the court to cut short the otherwise automatic (or extended) stay; in this case Skyview is utilizing s. 50.4(11) to do so.

[6] Cumberland relies upon Re N.T.W. Management Group Ltd. reflex, (1993), 19 C.B.R. (3d) 162 (Ont. Bktcy.), a decision of Chadwick J. Skyview asserts that N.T.W. is distinguishable or incorrectly decided and secondly that the philosophy of my decision in Re Triangle Drugs Inc. reflex, (1993), 16 C.B.R. (3d) 1 (Ont. Bktcy.) should prevail. In Triangle Drugs I allowed the veto holding group of unsecured creditors to in effect vote at an advance poll in a situation where there appeared to be a gap in the legislation. The key section of BIA is s. 50.4(11) which provides:

> The court may, on application by the trustee, the interim receiver, if any, appointed under section 47.1, or a creditor, declare terminated, before its actual expiration, the thirty day period mentioned in subsection (8) or any extension thereof granted under subsection (9) if the court is satisfied that
> > (a) the insolvent person has not acted, or is not acting, in good faith and with due diligence,
> > (b) the insolvent person will not likely be able to make a viable > > proposal before the expiration of the period in question,
> > (c) the insolvent person will not likely be able to make a proposal, before the expiration of the period in question, that will be accepted by the creditors, or
> > (d) the creditors as a whole would be materially prejudiced were the application under this subsection rejected,
> and where the court declares the period in question terminated, paragraphs (8)(a) to (c) thereupon apply as if that period had expired.

It does not seem to me that there is any gap in this sector of the legislation.

[7] As the headnote in N.T.W. stated, Chadwick J. viewed a situation similar to this one as requiring that the debtor must have an opportunity to put forth its proposal when he stated at p. 163:

> The bank had stated that it would not accept any proposal. However, since the companies had not yet had the opportunity to put forth their proposal, it was impossible to make a final determination under s. 50.4(11)(c). The companies should have the opportunity to formulate and make their proposal.

However I note that in this instance Cumberland has filed its Notice of Intention to File a Proposal the day before Skyview's s. 244 notice would have allowed it to take control of the security. Cumberland's president swore that:

> 2. The efforts which Cumberland is currently undertaking represent a bona fide effort, made in good faith, to restructure its finances in order to preserve the business of the company for the benefit of all of the creditors of the company, including Skyview. It is my belief that the proposal process will represent a significantly better treatment of all such creditors then would be available through either an enforcement by Skyview of its security against the assets of Cumberland, a bankruptcy of Cumberland or other processes available in the circumstances.

and further that:

> I intend to submit a proposal, pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, which represents the most advantageous treatment available, in my view, to all of the creditors of Cumberland and which allows for the continued viability of the business of Cumberland. This proposal is being prepared, and will be presented, in complete good faith. In the course of reviewing and preparing this proposal material with Mr. Godbold, I have determined that the legitimate claim of Skyview does not, in fact, represent in excess of 66-2/3 of all of the claims against Cumberland. At this time, Doane Raymond Limited is already in the position of Trustee under the proposal, in accordance with the provisions of the > Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. In addition, as noted above, I am prepared to consent to the appointment of Doane Raymond Limited as interim receiver of Cumberland. In the circumstances, I respectfully submit that the stay in favour of Cumberland pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act should not be lifted.

No explanation was given as to the lower share indicated for Skyview but in any event there was no assertion that Skyview lost its veto.

[8] However we do not have any indication of what this proposal proposes to be – notwithstanding that 10 days have now passed since Cumberland filed its Notice of Intention to File a Proposal and five days since Skyview served Cumberland with this motion. In a practical sense one would expect, given Skyview's veto power and its announced position, that Cumberland would have to present "something" to get Skyview to change its mind – e.g. an injection of fresh equity or a take out of Skyview's loan position. However there was not even a germ of a plan revealed – but merely a bald assertion that the proposal being worked on would be a better result for everyone including Skyview. This is akin to trying to box with a ghost. While I agree with the logic of Chadwick J. when he said at p. 168 of N.T.W. that:

> C.I.B.C. the major secured creditor has indicated they will not accept any proposal put forth, other than complete discharge of the C.I.B.C. indebtedness. Other substantial creditors have taken the same position. There is no doubt that the insolvent companies have a substantial obstacle to overcome. As the insolvent companies have not had > the opportunity to put forth this proposal, it is impossible to make the final determination. In Triangle Drugs Inc. Farley J. had the proposal. Well over one-half of the secured [sic; in reality unsecured] creditors indicated they would not vote for the proposal. As such, he then terminated the proposal. We have not reached that stage in this case. The insolvent companies should have the opportunity of putting forth the proposal.

[emphasis added]

[9] However this analysis does not seem to address the test involved. With respect I do not see this logical aspect as coming into play in s. 50.4(11)(c) which reads:

> The court may, on application by... a creditor, declare terminated, before its actual expiration, the thirty day period mentioned in subsection (8)... if the court is satisfied that
> (c) the insolvent person will not likely be able to make a proposal, before the expiration of the period in question, that will be accepted by the creditors, or
> and where the court declares the period in question terminated, paragraphs (8)(a) to (c) thereupon apply as if that period had expired.

It seems to me that clause (c) above deals specifically with the situation where there has been no proposal tabled. It provides that there is no absolute requirement that the creditors have to wait to see what the proposal is before they can indicate they will vote it down. I do not see anything in BIA which would affect a creditor (or group of creditors) with a veto position from reaching the conclusion that nothing the insolvent debtor does will persuade the creditor to vote in favour of whatever proposal may be forthcoming. I think that this view is strengthened when one considers that the court need only be satisfied that "the insolvent person will not likely be able to make a proposal, before the expiration of the period in question, that will be accepted by the creditors..." (emphasis added). This implies that there need not be a certainty of turndown. The act of making the proposal is one that is still yet to come. I am of the view that Skyview's position as indicated above is satisfactory proof that Cumberland will not likely be able to make a proposal that will be accepted by the creditors of Cumberland.

[10] Skyview of course also has the option of proceeding under s. 69.4 BIA which provides:

> A creditor who is affected by the operation of sections 69 to 69.3 may apply to the court for a declaration that those sections no longer operate in respect of that creditor, and the court may make such a declaration, subject to any qualifications that the court considers proper, if it is satisfied
> (a) that the creditor is likely to be materially prejudiced by the continued operation of those sections; or
> (b) that it is equitable on other grounds to make such a declaration.

[11] Is Skyview entitled to the benefit of s. 69.4(a) BIA? I am of the view that the material prejudice referred to therein is an objective prejudice as opposed to a subjective one – i.e., it refers to the degree of the prejudice suffered vis-à-vis the indebtedness and the attendant security and not to the extent that such prejudice may affect the creditor qua person, organization or entity. If it were otherwise then a "big creditor" may be so financially strong that it could never have the benefit of this clause. In this situation Skyview's prejudice appears to be that the only continuing financing available to Cumberland is that generated by turning Chamberland's accounts receivable and inventory (pledged to Skyview) into cash to pay operating expenses during the period leading up to a vote on a potential proposal, which process will erode the security of Skyview, without any replenishment. However Skyview does not go the additional step and make any quantitative (or possibly qualitative) analysis as to the extent of such prejudice so that the court has an idea of the magnitude of materiality. In other words, Skyview presently estimates that it would be fortunate to realize $450,000 on Cumberland's accounts receivables and inventory, but it does not go on to give any foundation for a conclusion that in the course of the next month $x of this security would be eaten up or alternatively that the erosion would likely be in the neighbourhood of $y per day of future operations. The comparison would be between the "foundation" of a maximum of $450,000 and what would happen as to deterioration therefrom if the stay is not lifted. I note there was no suggestion by Cumberland that there would be no erosion of Skyview's position by, say, getting a cash injection or by improving margins by increasing revenues or decreasing expenses. Skyview's request for its first relief request is dismissed since in my view Skyview did not engage in the correct comparison of material prejudice.

[12] I note that Cumberland does not oppose Skyview's request for an interim receiver. But for my conclusion that Skyview succeeds in its second relief request (to have the 30 day period in which to file a proposal terminated) and the ancillary third relief request of substitution of Farber for Doane as trustee, I would have granted the fourth relief request of appointing Farber as interim receiver. I would also award Skyview costs of $600 payable out of the estate of Cumberland from the proceeds first realized.

Order accordingly.

Limitation - Sec. 69.1(3)

(3) A stay provided by paragraph (1)(c) or (d) does not apply, or terminates, in respect of Her Majesty in right of Canada and every province if

(a) the insolvent person defaults on payment of any amount that becomes due to Her Majesty after the filing of the proposal and could be subject to a demand under

(i) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act,

(ii) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, or

(iii) any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum

(A) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

(B) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection; or

(b) any other creditor is or becomes entitled to realize a security on any property that could be claimed by Her Majesty in exercising Her rights under

(i) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act,

(ii) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, or

(iii) any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum

(A) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

(B) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection.

Limitation - Sec. 69.1(4)

(4) If, by virtue of subsection 69(3), the stay provided by paragraph 69(1)(c) or (d) does not apply or terminates, the stay provided by paragraph (1)(c) or (d) of this section does not apply.

Stay of proceedings — consumer proposals - Sec. 69.2
69.2 (1) Subject to subsections (2) to (4) and sections 69.4 and 69.5, on the filing of a consumer proposal under subsection 66.13(2) or of an amendment to a consumer proposal under subsection 66.37(1) in respect of a consumer debtor, no creditor has any remedy against the debtor or the debtor's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until

(a) the consumer proposal or the amended consumer proposal, as the case may be, has been withdrawn, refused, annulled or deemed annulled; or
(b) the administrator has been discharged.

Exception - Sec. 69.2(2)
(2) Subsection (1) does not apply where the consumer proposal, other than an amendment to a consumer proposal referred to in section 66.37, is filed within six months after the filing of a previous consumer proposal in respect of the same debtor.

Idem - Sec. 69.2(3)
(3) Subsection (1) does not apply where an amendment to a consumer proposal is filed within six months after the filing of a previous amendment to the same consumer proposal.

FREEDMAN J.A.
OVERVIEW

1 This appeal involves a contest between a trustee in bankruptcy, two secured creditors of the now deceased bankrupt, and the executrix (the Executrix) of his legal estate. The subject matter of the contest is money in the possession of the Trustee in Bankruptcy, paid to it pursuant to the Canadian Agricultural Income Stabilization Program (CAIS), a federal government assistance program designed to help farmers.

Digitized by Google

FACTS

2 Robert Glenn Ronald (Ronald) farmed in south central Manitoba. In July 2002, he executed a security agreement pursuant to which he granted to Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC) a security interest in all his present and after-acquired undertaking and personal property, including receivables (defined to include all debts, claims and choses in action), intangibles and money. In April 2004, he executed a similar security agreement with Cargill Limited (Cargill), pursuant to which he granted Cargill a similar interest in similar property. Each of CIBC and Cargill (the Creditors) duly perfected its respective security interests under The Personal Property Security Act, C.C.S.M., c. P35.

3 Ronald made an assignment in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (the Act) in December 2004. He designated Meyers Norris Penny Limited (the Trustee) as his trustee in bankruptcy. At some time afterwards, according to the evidence of the Trustee, he told the Trustee that "he was participating in the CAIS Program, but that he had not completed an application package for 2004." In May 2005, the Trustee made an application under CAIS.

4 Ronald had been ill and died in August 2005. In October 2005, CAIS advised the Trustee that its application had been accepted and that a payment (the CAIS Money) of over $159,000 would be made. Such a payment was, in fact, soon made by cheque to the Trustee. It appears to be undisputed that the payment was entirely from federal government funds, and did not include any return of moneys that might have been paid into the program by Ronald. The Creditors, acting together, advanced a claim to the CAIS Money, claiming priority under their security agreements. The Trustee rejected their claims.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

5 The matter came before the Registrar in Bankruptcy. He decided that the CAIS Money did not constitute "property" under the Act. Since it was not "property" under the Act, the Trustee had no claim to it. For the same reason, the security interests of the Creditors did not attach to it. That left the legal estate of the bankrupt (which had not been represented at the hearing before the Registrar) as the entity entitled to the CAIS Money. Both the Trustee and the Creditors appealed the Registrar's decision to that effect.

6 The appeal was heard by a Queen's Bench judge. The Executrix of the legal estate of the bankrupt was an intervener, and was represented by counsel, as were the Trustee and the Creditors. In a lengthy decision, the judge allowed the appeal in most respects. His conclusions may be set out in three categories. The first is findings regarding which there is no appeal by the Trustee or the Creditors, although the Executrix, also granted intervener status in this court, raises an issue about such findings. The second is findings which the Trustee appeals. The third is findings which the Creditors appeal.

7 The judge's conclusions which neither the Trustee nor the Creditors appeal are:

1. contrary to the decision of the Registrar, the CAIS Money was "property" under the Act. The Executrix argues this issue was wrongly decided by the judge; and
2. the CAIS Money was, therefore, part of Ronald's "total income" for the purposes of s. 68 of the Act. The Executrix says that before anything from this source is paid to creditors, the needs of Ronald's family must be taken into account. This issue is related to two that follow, set out in Nos. 8 and 9 below.

8 The findings appealed by the Trustee are:

3. the two security agreements held by the Creditors constituted valid equitable assignments in their favour;
4. once the CAIS Money was paid to the Trustee, the Creditors were entitled to enforce their rights under the security agreements against the Trustee;
5. such enforcement would be in priority to the unsecured creditors of the bankrupt regarding the balance of the CAIS Money; and
6. the CAIS Handbook does not have the authority of a statutory enactment.

9 The Creditors appeal the judge's findings that:

7. the Creditors are precluded by s. 67 of the Financial Administration Act (the FAA) from having a security interest that attaches to the CAIS Money;
8. the Creditors' security interests do not attach to the CAIS Money until after the application of s. 68 of the Act; and
9. the Creditors' security interests attach only to the "surplus income" component of the CAIS Money after the application of s. 68 of the Act.

10 Rather than now setting out a summary of the judge's reasons, with which, for the most part, I agree, it will be preferable to refer to the reasons at appropriate places in this judgment.

THE LEGISLATION

11 Several statutes were referred to in the written and oral arguments. Of those, the only ones that are necessary to refer to in this decision are the Act, the FAA and the Farm Income Protection Act (the FIPA).

12 The provisions of those three statutes, as they were at the date of bankruptcy, that will be referred to below are:

(1) The Act:

Definitions

2. In this Act,

. . . . .

"property" means any type of property, whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, as well as obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;

. . . . .

Property of bankrupt

67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under any laws applicable in the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides, or

. . . . .

but it shall comprise

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

Directives re standard of living factors

68. (1) The Superintendent shall, by directive, establish in respect of the provinces or one or more bankruptcy districts or parts of bankruptcy districts, the standards for determining the portion of the total income of an individual bankrupt that exceeds that which is necessary to enable the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

Interpretation

(2) For the purposes of this section,

(a) "total income" referred to in subsection (1) includes, notwithstanding paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1), all revenues of a bankrupt of whatever nature or source; and

(b) a requirement that a bankrupt pay an amount to the estate of the bankrupt is enforceable against all property of the bankrupt, other than property referred to in paragraphs 67(1)(b) and (b.1).

Trustee to fix amount to be paid

(3) The trustee shall

(a) having regard to the applicable standards established under subsection (1), and to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt, fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay to the estate of the bankrupt;

(b) inform the official receiver in writing of the amount fixed under paragraph (a); and

(c) take reasonable measures to ensure that the bankrupt complies with the requirement to pay.

Assignment of wages

68.1 (1) An assignment of existing or future wages made by a debtor before the debtor became bankrupt is of no effect in respect of wages earned after the bankruptcy.

Assignment of book debts

(2) An assignment of existing or future amounts receivable as payment for or commission or professional fees in respect of services rendered made by a debtor who is a natural person before the debtor became bankrupt is of no effect in respect of such amounts earned or generated after the bankruptcy.

Secured creditors

(2) Subject to sections 79 and 127 to 135 and subsection 248(1), the bankruptcy of a debtor does not prevent a secured creditor from realizing or otherwise dealing with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed, unless the court otherwise orders, ...

Vesting of property in trustee

71. On a bankruptcy order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with their property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, immediately pass to and vest in the trustee named in the bankruptcy order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any assignment or transfer.

(3) The FIPA:

Definitions

2. In this Act,

. . . . .

"net income stabilization account program" means a program under which

(a) a participating producer elects to contribute to an account established pursuant to an agreement and to which Canada and the provinces that are parties to the agreement contribute, and

(b) that enables payments to be made to that producer from that account on terms and conditions set out in the agreement;

. . . . .

Governor in Council authorization

4. (1) The Governor in Council may, by order, authorize the Minister to enter into an agreement with one or more provinces to provide for the establishment of any of the following programs:

(a) a net income stabilization account program;

. . . . .

Elements to be contained in all agreements

5. (1) An agreement shall provide for the required elements of each program to be established under the agreement, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, any elements that may be prescribed and the following required elements:

. . . . .

(e) the circumstances in which and the conditions under which a payment will be made to a producer or group of producers, the method of determining the amount of a payment, and the manner in which the payment will be made;

CAIS

13 Over the years there have been many government programs, both federal and provincial, designed to aid and assist farmers. CAIS was the current incarnation at the material times (it has since been replaced by another program). It was intended to supplement shortfalls in farmers' incomes. There was no specific legislation establishing CAIS; rather, it was created under the aegis of the FIPA. The province had enacted parallel enabling legislation (The Farm Income Assurance Plans Act, C.C.S.M., c. F30) and the necessary agreements were entered into for the establishment of CAIS, which was administered by the federal government in this province.

14 CAIS was a "net income stabilization account program," as defined in s. 2 of the FIPA. A very detailed "Program Handbook" (the Handbook) was created and published to facilitate the delivery of services under CAIS. Among its provisions are the following:

3.2.4 BANKRUPTCY

An individual or entity that is in the state of bankruptcy in the program year may participate through the trustee in bankruptcy. ....

5.4 TREATMENT OF CAIS PROGRAM PAYMENTS

Based on CRA tax guidelines:

Digitized by Google

- o Withdrawals from your CAIS program account are not taxable;
- o Government contributions paid to you are taxable in the year the cheque is dated;
- o Payment of government contributions must be reported as farming income for tax purposes;
- o The CAIS Program Administration will issue an AGR-1 Supplementary – Statement of Farm Support Payments tax information slip for taxable benefits over $100.

The government contributions received from the CAIS program cannot be assigned, deferred (for income tax purposes), or otherwise encumbered.

7.4 NO LEGAL EXEMPTIONS

Accounts will be subject to the operation of laws relating to estates, bankruptcies, separations, and divorces.

ISSUES ON APPEAL

15 The parties raised a number of issues on appeal. They may be conveniently grouped, and analyzed, in much the same manner as was done by the judge, and in the course of the analysis all the issues of relevance will be addressed. The matters for consideration are:

1. Is the CAIS Money "property" under the Act?;

2. What is the relevance, if any, of the provisions of the FAA, and in particular s. 67, restricting assignments of Crown debts?; and

3. How does s. 68 of the Act, relating to the "total income" of a bankrupt, apply in this case, and who is entitled to the CAIS Money?

DECISION

1. Is the CAIS Money "property" under the Act?

16 The judge's decision on this issue that the CAIS Money did constitute "property" under the Act reflected the position argued before him by both the Trustee and the Creditors. It is challenged before us only by the Executrix. She relies mainly on the reasoning in the Registrar's decision, and on the decision of this court in Collins (Keith G.) Ltd. (Trustee In Bankruptcy Of Stocks Estate) v. Director, Veterans' Land Act and Stocks (Bankrupt) reflex, (1987), 46 Man.R. (2d) 96.

17 The Registrar had found that the CAIS Money was not "property," and the result was that neither the Trustee nor the Creditors could claim an interest in it. He based his conclusion on several factors 2006 MBQB 262 (CanLII), (2006 MBQB 262, 210 Man.R. (2d) 93 at para. 62). In rejecting the Registrar's analysis, the judge said that one of the considerations that appeared to have influenced the Registrar was that there was no contractual relationship between Ronald and CAIS and that Ronald had no right to compel payment of the CAIS Money 2007 MBQB 102 (CanLII), (2007 MBQB 102, 216 Man.R. (2d) 138 at para. 13). The judge also referred to the Registrar's findings of a lack of certainty, inherent in the CAIS program, about whether an application would actually be approved and funds paid.

18 The definition of "property" in s. 2 of the Act (see para. 12 (1) above) is extremely broad (see Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765 at 783), although it will not capture every interest. For example, as the Creditors pointed out in their factum:

> ... [T]here are some specific causes of action which are so personal to the bankrupt that they do not constitute "property" which would otherwise flow to the Trustee .... In particular, damage claims for mental distress, loss of reputation and punitive damages: see Holley v. Gifford Smith (1986), 59 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17 (Ont. C.A.) ....

19 Nevertheless, unless there is some governing provision to the contrary in the CAIS program, or some provision in the Act pointing in a different direction, the breadth of the statutory definition is in my view clearly sufficient to capture the right of Ronald to participate in that program, and equally to capture the CAIS Money once paid to the Trustee.

20 The Registrar relied on the decision of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in Saulnier (Receiver of) v. Saulnier, 2006 NSCA 91 (CanLII), 2006 NSCA 91, 22 C.B.R. (5th) 38 (leave to appeal to S.C.C. granted, [2006] S.C.C.A. No. 351 (QL)), a case concerning fishing licences. As was argued before us by the Creditors, that decision is more supportive of their position (and the Trustee's) on this issue than the Executrix's. The court found (see paras. 36 and 55) that while fishing licences were, by statute, property of the Crown and did not vest in the trustee in bankruptcy, the licensee had a right to apply for a renewal and resist an arbitrary denial of a renewal, and that right was "property" passing to the trustee.

21 I agree with the judge that while a farmer might not be able to compel payment under CAIS (not at issue here), nevertheless the undisputed right of a farmer to participate in CAIS constitutes a "property" interest. In Marzetti, Iacobucci J. for the Supreme Court said that even if a taxpayer who overpays his taxes has no right to compel a refund prior to filing a tax return, he has "a future and contingent interest" (at p. 783) in the refund. In my opinion, that phrase describes the nature of Ronald's right, prior to his assignment in bankruptcy, in any payments that might be made under CAIS pursuant to an application that he (or the Trustee) might make in the future. That right to receive payment, should any be made, vested in the Trustee on the assignment. That right was a "property" interest.

22 In this respect, I find useful the analysis of Barkman J. in Portage Credit Union Ltd. v. 62031 Manitoba Ltd. et al. (No. 2) reflex, (1989), 59 Man.R. (2d) 315 (Q.B.). He was dealing with a farm assistance program where a receiver and manager had become involved. He concluded that a security agreement with similar charging provisions was broad enough in scope to attach ex gratia government payments. He said (at para. 9):

> .... The program specified who would be eligible producers and that payments will be made only to actual producers. It is clear from the evidence that some of the defendants qualified as eligible producers and therefore became entitled to a proportionate share of the one billion dollar grant. I am satisfied that some of the defendants became so entitled. Whether they could sue the federal government for their entitlement under the program or not, to my mind is of no consequence in deciding whether the payments are a gift. Because they became entitled to payment under the said program they acquired an interest in the said fund. This interest in the said fund, after the defendants qualified or became eligible under the program became part of "the debtor's undertaking and all its business, property and assets of whatever nature and kind, both present and future ..." (Exhibit C affidavit of Richard W.J. Schmuelgen sworn January 20, 1989). These payments then are a future asset referred to in the security agreement. The initial payments were paid to the solicitor for the defendants in accordance with the assignment submitted to the Department of Agriculture. The final payment is retained pending a final judicial decision as to who is entitled to these funds.

23 In Kallenberger v. Beck (Trustee of), 2005 ABQB 895 (CanLII), 2005 ABQB 895, 18 C.B.R. (5th) 113, LoVecchio J. found that "[t]here is little doubt that the CAIS payment from the Federal Government received by Mr. Beck is 'money' so it must be seen as comprising property of Mr. Beck after its receipt by him" (at para. 14). Beck and Pettersen, Re, 2006 ABQB 792 (CanLII), 2006 ABQB 792, 26 C.B.R. (5th) 129, appear to be the only reported bankruptcy decisions involving the CAIS program, apart from the one under appeal. Neither Beck nor Pettersen dealt with the rights of secured creditors, and they are of little help here.

24 This court's decision in Stocks does not alter the conclusion that the CAIS Money is "property." That decision involved an agreement of sale under the Veterans' Land Act. The bankrupt had not yet fully paid for the land and until then he was a tenant on the land. The court found on the basis of the applicable legislation that any assignment of any rights of any kind that he might have in the land was completely prohibited, and that this extended to an assignment in bankruptcy. Whatever rights he might have did not constitute "property" within the meaning of the Act (as it then was) since he had no interest in the land before full payment for it was made, and that had not happened. The decision rests, as the court was at pains to point out, on the unique provisions of the legislation. The case has no bearing here.

25 The Executrix argued that the FIPA is "long on language" to enable the federal government to devise measures to assist agricultural producers, but "short on the specific details" of those measures. Thus, she said, the Handbook, which, among other matters, states that contributions received from CAIS cannot be assigned, should be given considerable weight. In my view, the appropriate characterization of the Handbook was well described by the Federal Court of Appeal in Sander Holdings Ltd. et al. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FCA 9 (CanLII), 2005 FCA 9, 329 N.R. 214, when assessing the nature of guidelines under NISA (Net Income Stabilization Account Program), one of the predecessors of CAIS, also established pursuant to the FIPA. The court said (at para. 46):

> .... [T]his argument implies the guidelines have the status of legal norm, which they do not. They are not more than guidance, for officers, with the intent of seeking a reasonable measure of consistency in the exercise of discretion. That does not establish the guidelines as equivalent to law; ....

26 The judge here correctly found (at para. 25) that the CAIS Handbook cannot restrict the rights of the Creditors in this instance, as the Handbook does not have the force of law.

27 As is explained clearly by C.R.B. Dunlop, Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, 2d ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1995) at 84ff, exemptions against execution are primarily creatures of statute. I agree with counsel for the Creditors when he argued that "the proceeds of [the CAIS program] will be exempt or incapable of being the subject of a security interest only where ... legislation expressly states it to be so." See Beer (Bankrupt), Re reflex, (1988), 53

Man.R. (2d) 200 at paras. 29-30 (Q.B.). There is nothing in the FIPA that suggests any limitation on the assignability, whether by bankruptcy or otherwise, of the right to participate in the CAIS program.

28 The judge concluded on this point as follows (at para. 28):

> I have come to the conclusion that proceeds paid to a farmer pursuant to the CAIS program do constitute property within the definition of [the Act]. The right to participate in the CAIS program is incidental to the bankrupt's business and undertaking as a farmer. As such there exists the right to make application for payment under the CAIS program in any year in which the bankrupt qualifies. The right to participate in the program represents a future contingent interest in CAIS program funding. The Trustee's right to participate in the CAIS program is a power in respect of property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt on his own behalf. As such any payments made under the program fall within the definition of property under [the Act].

29 I fully agree, and find no basis to sustain the argument of the Executrix. The CAIS Money is "property" under the Act.

2. The FAA, and s. 67

30 The Trustee argued that s. 67 of the FAA (see para. 12(2) above), which provides that "a Crown debt is not assignable," meant that the Creditors' security agreements could not effectively create a security interest in the CAIS Money. In support of this position it relied on Marzetti. In that case, the bankrupt had executed an "Agreement Letter" in favour of his bankruptcy trustee authorizing tax refunds to be sent to the trustee for distribution to creditors.

31 Iacobucci J. for the Supreme Court said (at pp. 802-3):

> ... [T]he Agreement Letter is rendered ineffective by s. 67 of the Financial Administration Act. Section 67 provides, in part, that "[e]xcept as provided in this Act or any other Act of Parliament ... a Crown debt is not assignable". The expression "Crown debt" is defined in s. 66 to include not only existing debts, but also future debts "due or becoming due". Marzetti did not obtain an accrued legal debt in respect of his post-bankruptcy income tax refund until his income tax return was filed, as I have already mentioned. But his interest in that return can legitimately be described as an interest in a future Crown debt becoming due.
> This Crown-debt characterization means that the Financial Administration Act operates to prohibit assignment of an income tax refund, due or becoming due from the Crown, unless assignment is permitted by that Act or another "Act of Parliament". There is no question that the Financial Administration Act fails to permit such assignment, and no express authorization appears in any other federal statute.

Moreover, Iacobucci J. said (at p. 805):

> .... In my view, s. 67(b) amplifies the broad prohibition apparent in s. 67(a), so that a purported assignment of a Crown debt is rendered absolutely ineffective, as between debtor and creditor, and as between assignor and assignee.

32 There are important distinctions between the facts in Marzetti and this case. One such distinguishing characteristic is that in Marzetti, at a point in time in the tax refund process, the taxpayer would have a legal and enforceable right to his tax refund. There would exist a "Crown debt," as referred to in s. 67 of the FAA. In the present situation, the right to apply for funds and to participate in the CAIS program does not automatically confer a legal and enforceable right to any funds. Even if a farmer's application is approved, it is by no means clear that such approval results in a right to compel payment of what is essentially a discretionary grant.

33 Section 67 only extends to a "Crown debt," a term defined in s. 66 as "any existing or future debt ... and any other chose in action in respect of which there is a right of recovery enforceable by action against the Crown." I think the Creditors have accurately captured the essence of the CAIS program when they describe funds paid under the program as being "in the nature of a gift or subsidy." This was also the expressed view of the Registrar, with whom on this point I agree. He said (at para. 66) that there was no right of action against the Crown for the benefit of a CAIS participant.

34 On this view of the matter, s. 67, which only applies to debts, has no application at all. But, even if it could apply in some manner, and even if the assignment by Ronald of any property interest in the CAIS program was ineffective against not only the Crown but also the Trustee (a result supported by the dicta of Iacobucci J. at pp. 802-3 of Marzetti (see para. 31 above)), any such ineffectiveness, which would necessarily depend upon the interest in question being a "Crown debt," would cease once such debt was paid and the CAIS Money was received by the Trustee. On the most generous view of the situation, once the CAIS Money was paid and received, there could no longer be an extant debt. Since the CAIS Money when received was "property" in the hands of the Trustee, it was then (if not before) captured by the security agreements.

Digitized by Google

35 Section 67 does not nullify the security agreements in question, nor, in my view, does it purport to do so. They are still valid and subsisting instruments, creating rights and responsibilities in the parties to them. See also the comments of McLellan J. in Rendamax/G.P. Industries Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re reflex, (1994), 119 Sask.R. 121 at para. 19 (Q.B.) and of Brenner C.J.S.C. in Fontaine v. AG Canada, 2007 BCSC 1841 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 1841, [2008] 4 W.W.R. 724 at para. 31.

36 As well, s. 70 of the FAA states, in effect, that s. 67 does not apply to any negotiable instrument, a term defined in s. 2 of the FAA to include "cheque." Section 2 also defines "money" to include "negotiable instruments." Taken together, these provisions are consistent with my conclusion that once the CAIS Money was paid to the Trustee, any possible FAA-imposed suspension of the enforcement rights of the Creditors regarding those funds had been lifted.

3. Section 68 of the Act, the "total income" of a bankrupt and entitlement to the CAIS Money

37 The judge found that the CAIS Money was "a replacement or substitute for income" (at para. 44) for Ronald. That conclusion has ample support in the authorities (see, e.g., North 40 Farms (Bankrupt), Re, 2002 MBQB 138 (CanLII), 2002 MBQB 138, 164 Man.R. (2d) 44, Beatch, Re, 2005 SKQB 3 (CanLII), 2005 SKQB 3, 7 C.B.R. (5th) 41 and Beck) and it is not challenged by the Trustee or the Creditors. He found that the CAIS Money was part of the "total income" of the bankrupt under s. 68 of the Act (see para. 12(1) above), and that s. 68 was the governing provision relating to entitlement to the CAIS Money. It is those findings that are attacked by the Creditors on appeal.

38 The judge said that Marzetti was the guiding case on s. 68. The Supreme Court had said (at p. 794):

> To summarize briefly, it is my opinion that the language of s. 68, the inferred purpose of that provision, and the decision of this Court in Vachon, [1985 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 417], all support the conclusion that s. 68 is a substantive provision, one which is intended to operate as a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages, or other remuneration. These forms of property cannot fall within s. 67(c) of the Bankruptcy Act as a bankrupt's after-acquired "property", and they cannot be considered "property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors" for the purposes of s. 67. They do not vest in the trustee through the simple operation of law.

39 The relevant provisions of the Act have been amended since Marzetti, but it has been held by the Ontario Court of Appeal that the effect is unchanged (see Landry, Re, 2000 CanLII 16846 (ON CA), (2000), 21 C.B.R. (4th) 58 at para. 30).

40 Against this background the judge held that "it is only after the requirements of s. 68 of [the Act] have been met that the equitable assignment of Cargill and CIBC can attach the CAIS proceeds" (at para. 54). This meant that the CAIS Money was only available to creditors of the bankrupt to the extent that the CAIS Money exceeded what was necessary for the bankrupt to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

41 In making this finding, it is my view, with respect, that the judge erred. It is important to keep in mind that, as argued here by the Creditors, "the rights of secured creditors are dealt with outside the confines" of the Act, except if there is specific statutory language to the contrary. This is effectively explained in The Honourable L. W. Houlden, The Honourable Geoffrey B. Morawetz& Dr. Janis P. Sarra, The 2008 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Toronto: Carswell, 2007) at 630: "Where a debtor has made an assignment ... the policy of the Act is not to interfere with secured creditors except insofar as may be necessary to protect the estate as to any surplus in the assets covered by the security: ...." Once the CAIS Money was in the hands of the Trustee, it was presumptively captured by the security agreements, unless some statutory or other governing provision clearly negated that result.

42 Section 68 is intended to assist the trustee in accessing the bankrupt's wages for the benefit of the estate's creditors; aside from s. 68.1, there is no indication in the legislation that s. 68 was intended to alter the position of secured creditors vis-à-vis the bankrupt. Section 69.3(2) states that the position of secured creditors is not altered by the bankruptcy of the debtor and ss. 71 and 136(1) confirm the priority granted to secured creditors by the bankruptcy regime. It is notable that s. 68.1 is limited in its application to assignments of existing or future wages, commissions or professional fees. It was not argued here that s. 68.1 could be applicable.

43 Marzetti did not involve the rights of a secured creditor. None of the other cases cited in relation to this issue involved the rights of secured creditors. Section 68 of the Act does not limit or restrict a secured creditor's interest in a bankrupt's assets which, by that section, are characterized as "total income." The Trustee is, of course, limited and restricted by the provisions of s. 68, and it must apply distributable funds in accordance with that section, but funds in the Trustee's hands to which a secured creditor has a supervening right cannot fall within that category.

Digitized by Google

44 In my opinion, the law is clear that, unless otherwise expressly provided in the Act or another governing provision, to quote again from Houlden, Morawetz & Sarra, "secured creditors may ignore the bankruptcy and deal with their security in the usual manner" (at p. 630) (Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061). This is so even though the monies in question have been realized through the efforts of the Trustee.

45 The general scheme of distribution under the Act (s. 136(1)) is stated to be "[s]ubject to the rights of secured creditors." Moreover, while there are a few sections in the Act which provide that particular provisions apply to secured creditors (see, e.g., s. 69.3(2), among others), none have been identified here that could defeat the present claims of the Creditors.

46 I will add that, in my opinion, Menzies J. went a little too far in Lintott v. Bank of Montreal, 2004 MBQB 214 (CanLII), 2004 MBQB 214, 188 Man.R. (2d) 228, when he said that "[s]ection 68 is a complete code for determining what if any portion of a bankrupt's 'total income' will be made available for distribution among creditors whether secured or not" (at para. 25). As indicated, the rights of secured creditors are not impaired by bankruptcy unless expressly so provided in legislation, and s. 68 does not so provide.

47 To summarize, nothing has been pointed out, in the Act or elsewhere, that could adversely affect and limit the rights of the Creditors to claim the CAIS Money under their admittedly valid and perfected security agreements. Absent explicit legislative provisions, such as are found in s. 68.1, the interests of secured creditors prevail over those of a bankruptcy trustee, even with respect to the income of the bankrupt. Since the case at bar does not involve an assignment of wages and is not otherwise affected by s. 68.1, it follows that the Creditors prevail over the Trustee, as s. 68 has no application to them. This is not to say that payments from CAIS may not form part of a bankrupt's "total income" for the purposes of s. 68, but that question does not arise in this case, as s. 68 has no application to the Creditors here.

48 Accordingly, I would hold that the rights and interests of the Creditors by virtue of their security agreements apply to the CAIS Money without reduction as a result of the application of s. 68 of the Act, and in this respect I would allow the cross-appeal.

CONCLUSION

49 I would dismiss the appeal of the Trustee, would allow the cross-appeal of the Creditors and would order that the security interests of the Creditors in the CAIS Money under their security agreements have priority over the rights and interests of the Executrix and the Trustee. Before us, all counsel agreed that costs of all parties should be paid out of the CAIS Money, and I would so order.

[1] The appellant argues that when considering an application to lift a stay under s. 69.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, the applicant is required to establish a prima facie case for the proposed action. Bowles v. Barber (1985), 60 C.B.R. 311 (Man. C.A.) is cited in support of this proposition. It is argued that to the extent Ontario cases such as Arrojo Investments v. Cardamone 1995 CanLII 7376 (ON SC), (1995), 33 C.B.R. (3d) 46 (Ont. Gen. Div.) apply a more lenient standard, they are inconsistent with decisions from other provinces.

[2] In our view there is no requirement to establish a prima facie case and no inconsistency in the case law. We do not agree that Bowles v. Barber imposes a prima facie case requirement. More importantly, that requirement is not imposed by the statute. Under s. 69.4 the court may make a declaration lifting the automatic stay if it is satisfied (a) that the creditor is "likely to be materially prejudiced by [its] continued operation" or (b) "that it is equitable on other grounds to make such a declaration." The approach to be taken on s. 69.4 application was considered by Adams J. in Re Francisco 1995 CanLII 7371 (ON SC), (1995), 32 C.B.R. (3d) 29 at 29-30 (Ont. Gen. Div.), a decision affirmed by this court 1996 CanLII 10233 (ON CA), (1996), 40 C.B.R. (3d) 77 (Ont. C.A.):

> In considering an application for leave, the function of a bankruptcy court is not to inquire into the merits of the action sought to be commenced or continued. Instead, the role is one of ensuring that sound reasons, consistent with the scheme of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, exist for relieving against the otherwise automatic stay of proceedings.

[3] As this passage makes clear, lifting the automatic stay is far from a routine matter. There is an onus on the applicant to establish a basis for the order within the meaning of s. 69.4. As stated in Re Francisco, the role of the court is to ensure that there are "sound reasons, consistent with the scheme of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act" to relieve against the automatic stay. While the test is not whether there is a prima facie case, that does not, in our view, preclude any consideration of the merits of the proposed action where relevant to the issue of whether there are "sound reasons" for lifting the stay. For example, if it were apparent that the proposed action had little prospect of success, it would be difficult to find that there were sound reasons for lifting the stay.

[4] In the case before us, Justice Lane found that the Deputy Registrar was correct in finding that the applicant would suffer sufficient prejudice to justify an order lifting the stay. This finding accords with s. 69.4 and is supported by the record. We see no basis for interfering with his conclusion. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

No stay, etc., in certain cases - Sec. 69.42

69.42 Despite anything in this Act, no provision of this Act shall have the effect of staying or restraining, and no order may be made under this Act staying or restraining,

(a) the exercise by the Minister of Finance or the Superintendent of Financial Institutions of any power, duty or function assigned to them by the Bank Act, the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, the Insurance Companies Act or the Trust and Loan Companies Act;

(b) the exercise by the Governor in Council, the Minister of Finance or the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation of any power, duty or function assigned to them by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act; or

(c) the exercise by the Attorney General of Canada of any power, assigned to him or her by the Winding-up and Restructuring Act.

Provincial legislation - Sec. 69.5

69.5 Except for paragraphs 69(1)(c) and (d) and 69.1(1)(c) and (d), sections 69 to 69.3 do not affect the operation of any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum

(a) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

and for the purpose of this section, the provision is, despite any Act of Canada or of a province or any other law, deemed to have the same effect and scope against any creditor, however secured, as subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act in respect of a sum referred to in paragraph (a), or as subsection 23(2) of the Canada Pension Plan in respect of a sum referred to in paragraph (b), and in respect of any related interest, penalties or other amounts.

Meaning of "regulatory body" - Sec. 69.6

69.6 (1) In this section, "regulatory body" means a person or body that has powers, duties or functions relating to the enforcement or administration of an Act of Parliament or of the legislature of a province and includes a person or body that is prescribed to be a regulatory body for the purpose of this Act.

Regulatory bodies — sections 69 and 69.1 - Sec. 69.6(2)

(2) Subject to subsection (3), no stay provided by section 69 or 69.1 affects a regulatory body's investigation in respect of an insolvent person or an action, suit or proceeding that is taken in respect of the insolvent person by or before the regulatory body, other than the enforcement of a payment ordered by the regulatory body or the court.

Exception - Sec. 69.6(3)
(3) On application by the insolvent person and on notice to the regulatory body and to the persons who are likely to be affected by the order, the court may order that subsection (2) not apply in respect of one or more of the actions, suits or proceedings taken by or before the regulatory body if in the court's opinion

(a) a viable proposal could not be made in respect of the insolvent person if that subsection were to apply; and

(b) it is not contrary to the public interest that the regulatory body be affected by the stay provided by section 69 or 69.1.

Declaration — enforcement of a payment - Sec. 69.6(4)
(4) If there is a dispute as to whether a regulatory body is seeking to enforce its rights as a creditor, the court may, on application by the insolvent person and on notice to the regulatory body, make an order declaring both that the regulatory body is seeking to enforce its rights as a creditor and that the enforcement of those rights is stayed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR THE PROVINCE OF MANITOBA.

Bankruptcy—Garnishment—Monies paid into Court—Rights of garnishor and trustee in bankruptcy—Whether garnishor a "secured creditor"— The Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, ss. 2(r), 41(1), 42(2), 43(2), 86, 95(2).

Section 41(2) of the Bankruptcy Act provides that every receiving order and every assignment "takes precedence over all ... garnishments ... except such as have been completely executed by payments to the creditor or his agent, and except also the rights of a secured creditor".

The plaintiff caused to be served a garnishing order upon the garnishee who paid the money into court. The defendant subsequently made a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy, and the trustee in bankruptcy and the plaintiff each claimed the money which was still in court. The trustee's claim was dismissed by a local judge in chambers whose decision was affirmed by a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench. This judgment was in turn affirmed by a majority in the Court of Appeal, which held that the plaintiff was a "secured creditor". The trustee appealed to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and payment out of the monies in court should be made to the trustee. The plaintiff did not fall within either of the exceptions to s. 41(1) of the Bankruptcy Act.

Per Locke J.: The meaning to be assigned to s. 41, as it applies to the present case, is plain. In the clearest terms, it is provided that the assignment shall take precedence over a garnishment, except where such has been completely executed by payment to the creditor or his agent. Here, no such payment was made. If the service of a garnishing order creates an equitable charge upon the debt in favour of the garnishing creditor, and if such a charge falls within the definition of a secured creditor in s. 2(r) of the Act, it must be taken that since the rights of garnishing creditors have already been dealt with they are not included in the expression "the rights of a secured creditor" in the concluding words of s. 41(1). Galbraith v. Grimshaw, [1910] 1 K.B. 343.

Per Cartwright, Fauteux, Martland and Judson JJ.: The provisions of s. 41(1) are clear, and even a literal interpretation does not lead to the conclusion reached by the majority in the Court of Appeal. The compelling inference is that whoever the secured creditor may be whose rights are excepted from the operation of the section, he is not the attaching or garnisheeing creditor whose position has already been fully dealt with. The intention is to ensure the distribution of the debtor's property in accordance with the Act and not according to the execution procedures mentioned in the section, all of which are brought to an end when bankruptcy supervenes unless they have been completed by payment. It must be concluded, therefore, that judgment creditors who have made use of the execution procedures set out in s. 41(1) are subject to the provisions of the Act unless they have been paid, that they do not come within the class of secured creditors mentioned in the exception, and that they are not secured creditors under the Act as defined in s. 2(r).

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba1, affirming a judgment of Monnin J. Appeal allowed.

J. S. Lamont, Q.C., and N. H. Layton, for the defendant, appellant.

No one appeared for the plaintiff, respondent.

LOCKE J.:—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba2, pursuant to leave granted by that Court from its judgment dismissing the appeal taken by the present appellant from an order of Monnin J. by which an appeal from an order of His Honour Judge Buckingham, local judge for the Western Judicial District, was dismissed. The Chief Justice of Manitoba, with whom Schultz J.A. agreed, dissented and would have allowed the appeal.

The facts to be considered in dealing with the matter are as follows:—On November 5, 1956, the respondent commenced an action against T. L. Cleary Drilling Co. Ltd. for the recovery of the sum of $2,282.50 and caused to be served a garnishing order upon the California Standard Company, a debtor of the Cleary company. On February 9, 1957, the garnishee paid into the Court of Queen's Bench at Brandon the sum of $2,282.50. On May 13, 1957, default judgment was signed in the action against the Cleary company for the amount claimed and taxed costs. On June 18, 1957, that company made a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy, in the statutory form, to the Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd.

On November 18, 1957, the trustee applied for payment out of the amount so paid by the garnishee and which was then in court and, contemporaneously, the present respondent made an application for payment out to it and both motions were by consent heard together by the local judge. By an order dated December 16, 1957, the application by the trustee was dismissed and it was ordered that the amount in court be paid out to the Beaver Trucking Co. Ltd.

Proceedings were stayed on this order, pending an appeal to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench by the present appellant and, as stated, that appeal was dismissed by Monnin J. on February 28, 1958, in a considered judgment. The reasons for judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal were delivered by Tritschler J.A.

Section 41 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C 1952, c. 14, so far as it is relevant to the present appeal, reads:

> Every receiving order and every assignment made in pursuance of this Act takes precedence over all judicial or other attachments, garnishments, certificates having the effect of judgments, judgments, certificates of judgment,

Digitized by Google

> judgments operating as hypothecs, executions or other process against the property of a bankrupt, except such as have been completely executed by payment to the creditor or his agent, and except also the rights of a secured creditor.
> (2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), one solicitor's bill of costs, including sheriff's fees and land registration fees, shall be payable to the creditor who has first attached by way of garnishment or lodged with the sheriff an attachment, execution or other process against the property of the bankrupt.

It is in reliance upon the first of these subsections that the trustee claims that the moneys in court should be paid to it for distribution among the creditors. The position taken by the garnishing creditor is that, by reason of the service of the garnishing order upon the California Standard Company in advance of the assignment in bankruptcy, it is a secured creditor within the meaning of that expression in s. 41 and, as such, has priority over the trustee's claim.

The expression "secured creditor" is defined in s. 2(r) of the Act to mean:

> a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt due or accruing due to him from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based upon, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and upon which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable.

By Rule 526 of the Queen's Bench Rules, the Court is empowered in the matter of a claim such as that of the present respondent to make an order that all debts, obligations and liabilities owing, payable or accruing due from any person who is indebted or liable to the debtor shall be attached. A form of the order which may be made appears as form 74 in the Appendix to the Rules. The nature of the order, in so far as it might concern the present matter, does not differ from the orders nisi authorized by Order 45, Rule 1 of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883 in England. That rule authorizes the making of an order that all debts owing or accruing due from a third person to the debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment or order.

I refer to these rules since in certain of the cases decided in Manitoba it has been held that a garnishing creditor is, by virtue of the service of a garnishing order, a secured creditor within the meaning of s. 41(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, In re Doyle, (a bankrupt)3, and on appeal4, though, as pointed out by Adamson C.J.M., the decision did not turn upon that point.

While, in my opinion, it is unnecessary to decide this question in dealing with the present appeal, I think it should be noted that *Ex parte Joselyne*5, relied upon in coming to the above conclusion, dealt with a bankruptcy matter under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, (Imp.). It was there decided that a judgment creditor who before the filing of the bankruptcy petition had obtained a garnishee order nisi attaching debts due to the debtor was a secured creditor within the meaning of ss. 12 and 15 of that Act. Neither in the sections referred to nor elsewhere in the Act of 1869 is there any provision such as that portion of s. 41 which expressly states that an assignment takes precedence over all judicial or other attachments and garnishments and, with great respect, I think the decision does not affect the question to be decided here.

In my opinion, the meaning to be assigned to s. 41, as it applies to the present case, is plain. In the clearest terms it is provided that the assignment shall take precedence over a garnishment, except where such has been completely executed by payment to the creditor or his agent. Here, no such payment was made. The moneys were paid into court to the credit of the cause and remain there.

If, as is stated by Farwell L.J. in *Galbraith v. Grimshaw*6, the service of a garnishing order creates an equitable charge upon the debt in favour of the garnishing creditor and, if such a charge falls within the definition of a secured creditor in the Bankruptcy Act, it must be taken that, since the rights of garnishing creditors have already been dealt with, they are not included in the expression "the rights of a secured creditor" in the concluding words of the subsection.

If there were ambiguity in the language of the first subsection of s. 41, and I think there is none, it would be necessary for us to construe it in the manner directed by s. 15 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 158, and to give to it such interpretation as will best ensure the attainment of the object of the Act according to its true intent, meaning and spirit. The purpose of the Bankruptcy Act and of all bankruptcy legislation in Canada and in England is to assure that, in the case of insolvent debtors, their assets shall be divided fairly among their creditors, having due regard to the position of persons such as mortgagees who, having advanced moneys upon the security of assets of the debtor, are to be afforded the rights of secured creditors, and to those claims which are by statute entitled to preference.

Section 86 and those sections immediately following it declare the position of secured creditors and define the extent to which they are entitled to priority. Subject to such rights and to preferences to which other claims such as those of the Crown may be declared to be entitled and the costs and expenses of the trustee, it is the purpose of the Act that the creditors shall rank pari passu upon the estate. The construction of the Act contended for by the respondent in the present matter would mean that a creditor sufficiently alert to bring an action and attach moneys owing to a debtor on the brink of insolvency may thereby obtain preference over other creditors who refrain from bringing actions, for the amount of his claim in full and not merely for his costs, as provided by s. 41(2). This, in my opinion, is directly contrary to the intent and purpose of the Bankruptcy Act, and any such contention should be rejected unless the language of the Act should require it in the clearest terms.

I would allow this appeal with costs against the respondent in the proceedings before the local judge and before Monnin J. and the Court of Appeal. In the circumstances, the trustee's costs of this appeal should be paid out of the moneys paid into court by the garnishee and no order for costs be made against the respondent. The balance remaining in court should be paid to the appellant.

The judgment of Cartwright, Fauteux, Martland and Judson JJ. was delivered by JUDSON J.:—A judgment creditor and the trustee in bankruptcy of the judgment debtor are in competition here for monies in court paid in pursuant to a garnishee order issued by the judgment creditor. When the bankruptcy occurred the plaintiff already had a default judgment, the money had been paid into court by the garnishee but no move had been made for payment out. When the plaintiff moved after the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor, it was met with a counter-motion by the trustee, who claimed that the bankruptcy had precedence over the attachment under the terms of s. 41 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, subs. (1) of which reads:

> Every receiving order and every assignment made in pursuance of this Act takes precedence over all judicial or other attachments, garnishments, certificates having the effect of judgments, judgments, certificates of judgment, judgments operating as hypothecs, executions or other process against the property of a bankrupt, except such as have been completely executed by payment to the creditor or his agent, and except also the rights of a secured creditor.

The trustee in bankruptcy is the appellant before this Court from a judgment awarding the money to the judgment creditor. Until the concluding phrase of the section "and except also the rights of a secured creditor", words could not be plainer. The claim of the trustee prevails over that of the judgment creditor under any of the execution procedures mentioned unless there has been payment to the creditor or his agent. It is not sufficient that the fund may have been stopped in the hands of the garnishee or that it may be in court subject to further order or even subject to payment-out on an order already issued. Nor does it matter when the money was attached or paid into court or what the status of the action may have been when bankruptcy supervened. The only question is—has the execution procedure been completed by payment to the creditor or his agent?

In the judgment under appeal, the Court of Appeal7 has held that the section has no such operation because a judgment creditor who has caused a garnishee order to be served is a secured creditor. After specific and clear directions concerning the rights of the garnisheeing creditor and the trustee in bankruptcy, it is held that the section has said nothing because the creditor whose position and rights are defined and limited in the first part of the section is the same creditor who is removed from its scope and put within the exception.

Only the plainest language could compel an interpretation which produces this conclusion and I do not think that this compulsion exists in the present case. With all respect to the majority opinion in the Court of Appeal, I agree with the dissenting opinion expressed by Adamson C.J., that the provisions of the section are clear and that even a literal interpretation does not lead to the conclusion reached by the majority. To me the compelling inference is that whoever the secured creditor may be whose rights are excepted from the operation of the section, he is not the attaching or garnisheeing creditor, whose position has already been fully dealt with. The intention that I find plainly expressed is to ensure the distribution of the debtor's property in accordance with the Bankruptcy Act and not according to the execution procedures mentioned in the section, all of which are brought to an end when bankruptcy supervenes unless they have been completed by payment.

There are subsequent sections which carry out this intention and reinforce my conclusion. These sections, also, would be without meaning if the judgment under appeal is correct. Although under s. 41(1) the execution creditor must give way to the trustee in bankruptcy, by the next subsection the one who has first attached by way of garnishment or lodged a writ of execution with the sheriff gets his solicitor's bill of costs paid and this is done in accordance with the priorities established in s. 95(g). Next there is provision in s. 42(2) for delivery to the trustee of any property of the bankrupt under execution or attachment, and finally, by s. 43(2), the trustee is enabled to have himself registered as the owner of any land "free of all the encumbrances or charges mentioned in s. 41(1)".

My conclusion, therefore, is that judgment creditors who have made use of the execution procedures set out in s. 41(1) are subject to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act unless they have been paid, that they do not come within the class of secured creditors mentioned in the exception, and that they are not secured creditors under the Bankruptcy Act as defined in s. 2(r).

The same conclusion is involved in *Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue*8, which held, affirming a judgment of this Court9, that a judicial hypothec upon the real property of the bankrupt was postponed to an authorized assignment under the Bankruptcy Act. When Larue was decided, the exception which has given rise to difficulty in the present litigation had already come into the Act, having been enacted by 1921, 11-12 Geo. V., c. 17, s. 10. I cannot find any distinction between the present s. 41(1) and the legislation upon which the decision in Larue was founded, which would in any way impair the authority of that case. There was no suggestion either in the judgment of this Court or in the reasons of the Privy Council that the exception took the Bank as holder of a judicial hypothec outside the scope of the first part of the section. The result was that the priority of the trustee in bankruptcy, established by the section, attached for all purposes, including distribution of the proceeds according to the priorities established by the Bankruptcy Act. The recent decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Re Sklar and Sklar (Bankrupt)10 upon the present s. 41(1) is to the same effect. These two judgments had to do with the position of a judgment creditor who had issued execution against land but under the terms of the section, there is, in my opinion, no possible distinction between the result that must follow from this procedure and procedure by way of attachment or garnishment of debts.

I am also in respectful agreement with Adamson C.J. that there was no authority in the Province of Manitoba which bound the Court of Appeal to hold that a judgment creditor who had served a garnishee order was a secured creditor under the Bankruptcy Act. This finding is based upon the judgment in *Kare v. North West Packers Limited et al*11, which was not a bankruptcy case and involved no determination of rights under s. 41(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. The contest there was between a garnisheeing creditor and a receiver appointed by a group of bondholders, seeking to enforce a floating charge. The judgment of the Court of Appeal awarded the money to the garnisheeing creditor on the ground that he was a secured creditor under the Queen's Bench rules at the time when the floating charge crystallized.

The next case was *McCurdy Supply Company Limited v. Doyle*12, affirmed without reasons13, which gave priority to a judgment creditor who had garnisheed a mortgage debt over a subsequent assignee of the mortgage. Again, no question concerning the effect of s. 41(1) of the Bankruptcy Act was involved but this matter did come up when Doyle went into bankruptcy a short time later. There were then three parties competing for the money, the garnisheeing creditor, the assignee of the mortgage and the trustee in bankruptcy of Doyle; *Re Doyle (A bankrupt): McCurdy Supply Company Ltd.*14 and on appeal15. The mortgage had been assigned for full value prior to bankruptcy and no attack was made on the propriety of that transaction. Therefore, whatever the position of the garnisheeing creditor may have been, whether that of secured creditor or not, there was a much more serious obstacle in the way of the trustee in bankruptcy. There was no property to pass to him because the bankrupt had made a complete assignment of the mortgage prior to bankruptcy. As pointed out by Adamson C.J. in his reasons in the present case, anything said about the position of the garnisheeing creditor was obiter and unnecessary to the decision, and the prior assignment of the mortgage was a complete answer to the trustee's claim.

In litigation concerned solely with the position of the garnisheeing creditor under s. 41(1) of the Bankruptcy Act it is unnecessary to enquire further into the authority of Kare v. North West Packers Limited as a determination of rights between such a creditor and the holder of a floating charge seeking to enforce his security, and although I express no opinion on this matter, these reasons should not be taken as an indirect affirmation of the principle of that decision.

The appeal should be allowed and an order made directing payment out of the monies in court to the trustee in bankruptcy. In the circumstances, the trustee's costs of this appeal should be paid out of the fund and there should be no order for costs against the respondent. In the Courts below the trustee is entitled to an order for costs against the respondent.

Appeal allowed.

On appeal from the order of Justice Peter B. Hockin of the Superior Court of Justice dated September 25, 2003.

LANG J.A.:

[1] Deloitte & Touche LLP, the trustee in bankruptcy, appeals the dismissal of its motion for possession and directions for the sale of the Marino home and the distribution of the sale proceeds to the Marinos' creditors. This relief was sought almost five years after the Marinos first went bankrupt. Since declaring bankruptcy, the Marinos, relying on the trustee's assurances, continued to live in the home and expend funds on its upkeep and improvement. When faced with the trustee's motion, the Marinos brought a cross-motion seeking an order vesting the home in their names.

Issues

1. What is the standard of review?
2. Was the trustee precluded from moving to sell Mrs. Marino's interest in the home by reason of its discharge as her trustee?
3. Did the motions judge err in the application of s. 40?
4. Is the trustee estopped, or otherwise prohibited in equity, from realizing its interest in the home?

Relevant Statutory Provisions

[2] The provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("the Act") are relevant in the following order, with emphasis added:

> 71.(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.
> 74.(2) Where a bankrupt is the registered owner of any land or charge, the trustee, on registration of the documents referred to in subsection (1), is entitled to be registered as owner of the land or charge free of all encumbrances or charges mentioned in subsection 70(1).
> 40.(1) With the permission of the inspectors, any property of a bankrupt found incapable of realization shall be returned to the bankrupt prior to the trustee's application for discharge.
> (2) Where a trustee is unable to dispose of any property as provided in this section, the court may make such order as it may consider necessary.
> 41.(10) Notwithstanding his discharge, the trustee remains the trustee of the estate for the performance of such duties as may be incidental to the full administration of the estate.
> 37. Where the bankrupt or any of the creditors or any other person is aggrieved by any act or decision of the trustee, he may apply to the court and the court may confirm, reverse or modify the act or decision complained of and make such order in the premises as it thinks just.
> 41.(11) The court, on being satisfied that there are assets that have not been realized or distributed, may, on the application of any interested person, appoint a trustee to complete the administration of the estate of the bankrupt, and the trustee shall be governed by the provisions of this Act, in so far as they are applicable.

Background

[3] When the Marinos declared bankruptcy in April 1997, Deloitte & Touche LLP ("Deloitte & Touche") became their trustees in bankruptcy. Over the course of the ensuing years, several different employees of Deloitte & Touche worked with the Marinos as the trustee's representative: Mr. Shaw, Mr. Allen, Mr. Sholdice, Mr. Crocker and Mr. Bell. It was the frequent changes in representative, and the change in the representative's position, that led to this litigation about the property.

[4] Upon the Marinos' bankruptcy, pursuant to s. 71(2) of the Act, their home automatically vested in the trustee. At that time, the Marinos valued their home at $499,000, less outstanding mortgages and tax arrears of about $427,000. No issue is taken with those values. The trustee's first report said that there "may be equity" in the home and, indeed, the inspectors instructed the trustee to register its interest on title, although it did not then proceed to do so.

[5] The Marinos expected that they would lose their home and began looking for rental accommodation. Two months after their bankruptcy, in June 1997, Deloitte & Touche (through Mr. Allen) told the Marinos that they could remain in the home and that the trustee would make no claim against the home, as the trustee did not feel it worthwhile to realize on the home.

[6] In January, 1998, when the Marinos received their absolute discharges, which appeared to discharge them from all debt, Mr. Marino called the trustee (then Mr. Crocker) to confirm the status of the home. He was assured by Mr. Crocker that the trustee was claiming no interest. Mr. Crocker suggested that, to be sure, the Marinos should retain a lawyer, specifically Mr. Crocker's sister, to search the property's title. If that search revealed that the trustee had registered against the property, Mr. Crocker undertook to quitclaim the house back to the Marinos.

[7] In the summer of 1998, the trustee sent Mrs. Marino its Final Statement of Receipts and Disbursements ("Final Statement"). That document stated that there was no equity in the home available for the creditors: this confirmed the Marinos' belief that there was no claim against their home. That year, in reliance on the trustee's statements, the Marinos planned to pay all outstanding mortgage arrears and planned home renovations.

[8] In furtherance of those plans, and after the trustee was automatically discharged with respect to Mrs. Marino in October 1998, the Marinos retained Mr. Crocker's sister, who, after conducting a title search, confirmed that the trustee had not registered against the property. The lawyer told the Marinos that the property was registered in their names so it was unnecessary to prepare a transfer back from Deloitte & Touche.

[9] In June 1999, twenty-six months after the Marinos' bankruptcy, sixteen months after their discharge, and eight months after the trustee's discharge as Mrs. Marino's trustee, the trustee finally registered against the home, pursuant to s.74(2) of the Act. The trustee did not tell the Marinos it had done so. When the trustee applied for its discharge with respect to Mr. Marino on September 2, 1999, it sent a Final Statement that contained a footnote about the registration, but Mr. Marino did not notice that change in the trustee's position, and the trustee did nothing to bring that change in position to his attention.

[10] In mid-2000, another representative of the trustee (Mr. Sholdice) wrote the Marinos asking for information about the house. While acknowledging an apparent lack of equity in the home, Mr. Sholdice cautioned the Marinos that the trustee "would not release the property until we can satisfactorily settle our concerns".

[11] After a further exchange of correspondence, the Marinos heard nothing further until February 2002, when the trustee's then representative (Mr. Bell) initiated correspondence and discussions about the Marinos' purchase of the equity in their home. The Marinos contend that this is when they first became aware that the trustee had registered an interest in the home. Mr. Bell said he was "trying to get the file closed" because he was leaving Deloitte & Touche. This litigation eventually resulted.

[12] It was common ground that, upon the Marinos' bankruptcy, the home vested and remained vested in the trustee (s. 71(2) of the Act). The trustee maintains that this vesting continued after the discharge of both Marinos and after the trustee's discharge with respect to Mrs. Marino, despite the trustee's representation to the Marinos that it was not pursuing any interest in the equity. Any delay by the trustee, it argues, was irrelevant, because the property was vested and remained with the trustee throughout. Had the Marinos taken exception to this, argues the trustee, they had the option of applying to the court for a vesting order under s. 37 of the Act. They did not do so.

[13] The Marinos, on the other hand, take the position that they had relied upon the trustee's representations and, but for those representations, they would not have paid arrears or principal on the mortgages, nor have undertaken the substantial improvements they made to the home.

Reasons of the Motions Judge

[14] The motions judge found as a fact that the trustee had always known there was equity in the property and that, in fairness, "too much time" had passed for the trustee to now advance a claim against that equity (para. 15). The equities, found the trial judge, flowed "in the direction of the Marinos" (para. 18); the trustee's late effort to realize against the house was inconsistent with the Act's philosophy of providing bankrupts with a "fresh start". The judge was of the view that had the trustee intended to proceed against the equity, it should have opposed the Marinos' discharges from bankruptcy. In the result, the motions judge concluded that the home was "incapable of realization" within the meaning of s. 40(1) of the Act and ordered the property vested in the Marinos.

The Statutory Scheme

[15] Upon their bankruptcies, when the Marinos' interests vested and remained vested in the trustee, the Marinos were not entitled to the property unless it was released to them by the trustee, or if it was re-vested by court order under either s. 40 or s. 37 of the Act. In other words, some positive act was required to return the property. If that positive act was not forced by the bankrupt, the trustee was required to consider it at the time of application for its discharge.

[16] The requirement to consider the property is set out in s. 40(1); where property is "incapable of realization", the trustee is required to return it to the bankrupt before the trustee applies for discharge: Thompson v. Coulombe, [1984] Q.J. No. 11 (C.A.), Re Zemlak and Deloitte, Haskins& Sells Ltd. reflex, (1987), 42 D.L.R. (4th) 395 (Sask. C.A.). Alternatively, under s. 40(2), where the trustee is unable to dispose of property the court "may make such order as it may consider necessary". If the trustee takes no action, an "aggrieved" bankrupt has the option of applying to a court and "the court may confirm, reverse or modify the act or decision complained of and make such order in the premises as it thinks just" (s. 37).

[17] The Marinos were in different positions on this motion, however, because Deloitte & Touche had been discharged as Mrs. Marino's trustee in October 1998, but remained undischarged with respect to Mr. Marino.

Analysis

1. Standard of Review

[18] A judge must be correct in his or her determination of the law. Findings of fact, however, are subject to a less onerous standard of review. Whether made from oral or documentary evidence, findings of fact and inferences drawn from them cannot be overturned absent "palpable and overriding error". Findings of mixed fact and law are also accorded significant deference and, absent legal error or palpable and overriding factual error, are not to be disturbed on appeal: see Waxman v. Waxman, [2004] O.J. No. 1765 (C.A.) and Housen v. Nikolaisen, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 235.

2. Did the trustee's discharge as Mrs. Marino's trustee preclude it from moving to sell her interest in the home?

[19] When the trustee was discharged in October 1998, it took no action with respect to Mrs. Marino's interest in the property. It did nothing to contradict its earlier assurance given to Mrs. Marino that it was making no claim against the home and even confirmed that assurance by way of its Final Statement. Accordingly, at the time the trustee applied for discharge from Mrs. Marino's bankruptcy, and at the time it was discharged, it considered her interest to be "incapable of realization". It did not, however, return to her her interest in the property.

[20] After discharge as Mrs. Marino's trustee, Deloitte & Touche continued in its position only for "such duties as may be incidental to the full administration of the estate" (s. 41(10)). If realization of the property was more than "incidental" to the administration of this estate, or if a court was satisfied that assets of the bankrupt remained unrealized or undistributed, the trustee could seek re-appointment as a trustee to complete the estate's administration (s. 41(11)). No such relief was or has been requested.

[21] Absent any application for re-appointment, and even though the property vested in the trustee, the trustee had no authority to deal with it unless such dealing was "incidental" to the administration of Mrs. Marino's estate.

[22] The sale of Mrs. Marino's interest in the home was not, however, merely incidental to the administration of her estate. On the facts, Mrs. Marino's interest in the home was her only asset of any significance: it was her estate. Accordingly, the trustee had no authority to make a claim against Mrs. Marino's interest in the home.

[23] In addition, the principles of estoppel discussed later in these reasons apply equally to Mrs. Marino's interest in the home as I find they do to Mr. Marino's interest.

3. With respect to Mr. Marino's interest, did the motions judge err in the application of s. 40?

[24] The trustee's claim against Mr. Marino's interest is different from its claim against Mrs. Marino's interest because the trustee had not been discharged with respect to Mr. Marino's bankruptcy, although it had applied for discharge. Accordingly, with respect to Mr. Marino's estate, the trustee was not restricted to "incidental" duties, as it was with respect to Mrs. Marino's estate (s. 41(10)).

[25] The issue therefore arises as to whether the motions judge erred in his conclusion that the property was now "incapable of realization" and, for that reason, ordering its re-vesting under s. 40(2).

[26] The plain wording of s. 40(1) addresses realization at the time of the trustee's application for discharge. In June 1997, January 1998, and July 1998, the trustee repeatedly represented to the Marinos that the property was not capable of realization. Subject to the question of promissory estoppel, the trustee is entitled to change its mind as was evident from its 1999 registration against title, its 1999 Final Statement to Mr. Marino, its 2000 correspondence and its 2002 position. The property was not "incapable of realization" in the sense of an absence of palpable equity, in the trustee's view, at the time the trustee applied for its discharge in respect of Mr. Marino's estate.

[27] This is consistent with this court's decision in Re Shelson, [2004] O.J. No. 850 (C.A.), which was brought to our attention by counsel subsequent to the hearing of this matter. That case involved a trustee's entitlement to the bankrupt's interest in a civil proceeding ("the asset") that the bankrupt had started prior to his bankruptcy. At the time of the bankruptcy, the trustee undertook to return the asset to the bankrupt upon the bankrupt's discharge provided the creditors did not, in the meantime, require its realization. The trustee, however, did nothing about the asset prior to the bankrupt's discharge or prior to its own application for discharge. The bankrupt continued to pursue the action for some five years subsequent to his discharge, at which time the trustee purported to realize upon the asset.

[28] This court expressed its concern with the breadth of the proposition stated in Zemlak, supra, that when a trustee applies for its discharge, if it fails to elect to realize an asset, or to return it to the bankrupt, then the trustee holds that asset as trustee for the bankrupt and must return it to the bankrupt. Catzman J.A. said at para. 30:

> In my view, the proposition cannot be framed as a "bright-line" rule that admits of no exceptions. Even the court in Zemlak qualified its statement of the proposition by the introductory phrase "[I]n the circumstances of this case".... This court distinguished Zemlak and permitted a trustee in bankruptcy, following his discharge and that of the bankrupts, to take proceedings to pursue two properties, the values of which had been misrepresented by the bankrupts in their statements of affairs: Rocher v. H. & M. Diamond& Associates 2003 CanLII 29646 (ON CA), (2003), 43 C.B.R. (4th) 134. Even in instances short of misrepresentation or other misconduct by the bankrupt, it is not difficult to think of examples where an exception to the proposition would be appropriate. One is where an asset previously unknown to the trustee is discovered within a reasonable time of his application for discharge. Another is where the trustee learns within a reasonable time of his application for discharge that an asset previously considered to be unrealizable in fact had realizable value. In both examples, assuming that the asset is one which should, in the interests of the creditors of the estate, be realized, the court must retain some discretion to decide whether the proposition does or does not apply.... Failure to imbue the rule with some measure of flexibility renders a trustee's application for discharge a trap for the unwary [footnotes omitted].

[29] I agree. On the facts of this case, including the fact that the trustee was not discharged and that the trustee's Final Statement to Mr. Marino stated its newfound view that there was equity in the property, the trustee cannot be said to have determined that the asset was "incapable of realization" so as to found the basis for a s. 40(2) vesting order.

[30] Indeed, the motions judge appreciated that this property may have had realizable equity at the time of the trustee's application for discharge. The essence of his reasons addressed whether the trustee was precluded by its delay in realizing on that equity.

4. Is the trustee estopped, or otherwise prohibited in equity, from realizing its interest in the home?

[31] Mr. Marino argues that even if Deloitte & Touche had legal entitlement to realize upon the equity in the home, it is estopped from doing so.

[32] To rely on promissory estoppel Mr. Marino must establish:

(a) Deloitte & Touche, by words or conduct, made a promise or assurance which was intended to affect its legal relationship with Mr. Marino and intended Mr. Marino to act upon it; and

(b) Mr. Marino, relying on the representation, acted on it or in some way changed his position.

See Maracle v . Travellers Indemnity Co. of Canada, 1991 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 50 at 57.

[33] Where appropriate, the principles of promissory estoppel have been considered both for and against a trustee in bankruptcy: Rocher v. H & M Diamond & Associates, [2003] O.J. No. 1049 (C.A.); Re Country Kitchen Donuts Ltd., [1980] O.J. No. 171 at para. 21 (H.C.J.).

[34] In this case, the motions judge found that the trustee had, through its representatives, until at least 2000, given assurances to the Marinos that it would make no claim against the equity in the property. The trustee did not tell them of its 1999 registration on title. Even though the trustee did raise the possibility in 2000 of requiring further information about the property's equity, it took no further action until 2002.

[35] Not only did the trustee give assurances to the Marinos, but the Marinos also did not engage in any conduct that would have misled the trustee. The trial judge found as a fact that the Marinos acted honestly.

[36] After the Marinos, and specifically Mr. Marino, received the trustee's 1997 assurance that the trustee would not proceed against the property, the Marinos acted upon that assurance. They continued to reside in the home, satisfied the outstanding mortgage arrears on the property and proceeded with upgrades to the property. But for the trustee's assurance, the Marinos could have earlier begun the "fresh start" contemplated by the Act, abandoned the premises to the trustee, and begun the process of building an equity in another property.

[37] In all those circumstances, the motions judge made no error in deciding that the equities favoured the Marinos.

[38] Accordingly, the representations and conduct of the trustee and the Marinos' actions in reliance on them, estops the trustee from now realizing upon its registered interest in the property.

Conclusion

[39] I would dismiss the appeal.

Costs

[40] We have received and considered the parties' written submissions on costs. In the circumstances, the Marinos are entitled to their costs, which we award on a partial indemnity basis fixed in the amount of $10,000, inclusive of disbursements and G.S.T.

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal concerns the claim of a trustee in bankruptcy to the non-exempt portion of a bankrupt's home. The central issue is whether a trustee in bankruptcy can unilaterally transmit to itself an undivided interest in the non-exempt portion of a bankrupt's home in an attempt to claim a portion of the future proceeds of sale. On an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, Wimmer J. concluded that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot transmit a bankrupt's land in such circumstances (see: 2009 SKQB 201 (CanLII), 2009 SKQB 201, 334 Sask. R. 133). With that, the trustee appealed to this Court.

[2] We agree substantially with the reasons of Wimmer J. As a matter of bankruptcy law, which adopts the exemptions law of the Province, a trustee cannot realize on the non-exempt equity in the home of a bankrupt in this jurisdiction, until the latter voluntarily sells it. As a matter of the law of real property, a trustee in bankruptcy cannot unilaterally convert a potential, future claim to a portion of the sale proceeds of the home into an undivided interest in the land and transmit that interest to itself. In the result, the appeal is dismissed.

II. Overview of the Evidence

[3] This case begins in the 1990's. A corporation, of which Veronica Armbruster was the sole shareholder, borrowed money from Saskatchewan Trust Company ("SaskTrust") on the partial security of a guarantee from Ms. Armbruster. When the corporation defaulted on its payments, the balance of the security was insufficient to cover the loan amount. SaskTrust subsequently encountered its own difficulties and folded. Deloitte & Touche Inc. became SaskTrust's liquidator. Deloitte & Touche then pursued Ms. Armbruster for the balance owing under her corporation's loan, and obtained a judgment against her. When Ms. Armbruster was unable to satisfy the judgment, Deloitte & Touche petitioned her into bankruptcy, effective June 8, 1995. The receiving order appointed Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. (now KPMG Inc.) as the trustee in bankruptcy (the "Trustee") of Ms. Armbruster. Her two principal creditors were Deloitte & Touche, as the liquidator of SaskTrust, and Revenue Canada, and they claimed the following amounts:

• Deloitte & Touche Inc., liquidator of SaskTrust	$290,357.56
• Revenue Canada	$ 57,431.06
Total:	$347,788.62

[4] On February 8, 1996, Peat Marwick gave "Notice of Impending Automatic Discharge of First-Time Bankrupt" to the creditors. The Notice advised that: (i) Ms. Armbruster had insufficient earnings to warrant a conditional order (see Statement of P.M. Tomney on behalf of Peat Marwick Thorne Inc., dated February 8, 1996); and (ii) effective March 8, 1996, Ms. Armbruster would be automatically discharged from bankruptcy, subject to receiving any notice of objection. The "Report of Trustee on Bankrupt's Application for Discharge" indicated that Ms. Armbruster was working as a receptionist earning $1,173 per month and that her only asset was her home. Her home was listed as having an approximate value of $200,000, subject to a mortgage of $25,000 and builders' liens in the amount of $12,500, leaving an approximate net equity of $162,500. The Trustee also indicated that it was in the process of "transmitting an 82% interest" in Ms. Armbruster's home into its own name.

[5] On the same day that the Trustee gave notice regarding Ms. Armbruster's discharge, it filed an application to have an 82/100 interest in Ms. Armbruster's land transmitted to it. The Land Titles Office issued a new title in February 1996 in the name of "Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. being Trustee in Bankruptcy of Veronica Leay Armbruster" for "an undivided 82% interest" in the land. Ms. Armbruster's title for the balance was endorsed to reflect this transmission having taken place.

[6] No one filed a notice of objection to Ms. Armbruster's discharge. As a result, on March 8, 1996, the Trustee gave Ms. Armbruster a "Certificate of Discharge" advising her that she was "discharged and released from all debts except those matters referred to in subsection 178(1) of the BIA" (Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3). Since s. 178(1) of the BIA is not applicable, Ms. Armbruster was automatically, and unconditionally, discharged as of that date. The Trustee, however, did not move to obtain its own discharge.

[7] On April 15, 1996, Ms. Armbruster's husband filed a caveat against the Trustee's title, claiming a "homestead" right therein. Mr. and Mrs. Armbruster had been living in the home for approximately 13 years at the time of the bankruptcy, but they did not hold title as joint tenants. Ms. Armbruster had been the sole registered owner, prior to the Trustee's application for transmission.

[8] In 2003, an issue arose in relation to the insurance on the home. Up until 2003, the Trustee had been insuring the home under an "Insolvency Insurance Program." According to Ms. Laura Ryback, a vice-president with KPMG, its insurance was cancelled effective October 31, 2003 as the maximum time period for coverage of certain assets remaining in an estate in bankruptcy had expired (See: Affidavit of Laura Ryback sworn November 6, 2003). As a result of the pending cancellation of this insurance, the Trustee asked Ms. Armbruster for confirmation that the home was being properly insured, and for copies of her insurance policies. In an apparent attempt to force a resolution of the ongoing conflict, Ms. Armbruster refused KPMG access to her records.

[9] Following Ms. Armbruster's refusal, the Trustee applied in the Court of Queen's Bench for an order directing that Ms. Armbruster (i) permit an inspection of her home by the Trustee or any appraiser or potential insurer; and (ii) provide copies of all current insurance policies and renewal certificates, as well as details of any and all claims made pursuant to such policies in the past three years. The order was granted, and not appealed. As a result of this order, KPMG engaged the services of River City Insurance Services to enter the home and conduct an appraisal, which they did. Based on this appraisal, KPMG began insuring the premises on its own behalf.

[10] In June, 2005, the parties entered into discussions regarding a possible settlement. Ms. Armbruster wrote to Ms. Ryback making an offer to settle all issues between her and the Trustee in the amount of $10,000:

> In reply to your letter of June 9, 2005 regarding the property at 1540 Crerar Drive in Saskatoon. My offer of settlement is $10,000.00 (ten thousand dollars) for a full and final settlement of all claims relating to myself and KPMG. KPMG would discharge any registrations relating to this matter and provide a Final Release to me.
> The position of the Trustee is in question based on legal precedent and I am not willing to expend a large sum of money to challenge that position. Based on my life expectancy of approximately thirty years it will be many years before this issue is concluded if a settlement is not agreed to.

The Trustee rejected this offer, saying that it would entertain an offer "for an amount more reflective of 82% of the current market value" (see: the affidavit of Tim Reid, Senior Vice President of KPMG, dated May 8, 2009).

[11] In April 2009, Ms. Armbruster applied to the Court of Queen's Bench, invoking the Court's authority under ss. 37 and 40 of the BIA and s. 109 of The Land Titles Act, 2000, S.S. 2000, c. L-5.1. She sought an order declaring that the Trustee's interest in her home is incapable of realization and, as a result of the Trustee's actions in transmitting part of her home into its own name in 1996, she has been aggrieved since that time. By way of remedy, she asked for an order directing that the Registrar of Titles cancel the Trustee's title and issue a new title constituting her as the sole registered owner, subject only to the two pre-existing easements and the two builders' liens.

[12] In addition to the evidence referred to above, the affidavit evidence presented to the Chambers judge showed that:

- Ms. Armbruster had discharged the mortgage on the property at some point earlier;
- according to the City of Saskatoon's records, the fair market value of the home is $332,700 as of February 2009;
- the Trustee has incurred insurance costs of approximately $2,000 annually since 2003; and
- the Trustee remains undischarged to the present day.

III. Decision of Wimmer J.

[13] Wimmer J. allowed Ms. Armbruster's application and ordered that the title to the home be restored to her free of the Trustee's interest. In doing so, Wimmer J. relied on this Court's decision in Re Zemlak and Deloitte, Haskins & Sells Ltd. reflex, (1988), 42 D.L.R. (4th) 395. Based on Zemlak, he found that it was not appropriate for the Trustee to delay its discharge and await a future accumulation of equity:

> [9] Counsel for the trustee says the Zemlak, supra judgment is distinguishable from this case on the facts because the trustee there was discharged whereas here the trustee is not. That argument supposes that it is appropriate in summary bankruptcy administration proceedings for a trustee to withhold a timely application for discharge and await a market enhancement of the value of non-exempt equity in homestead property. I do not take Zemlak to stand for such a proposition. On the contrary, I take it to mean that only the value of non-exempt homestead equity existing at the time of the bankrupt's application for discharge can be attached by the trustee.
> [10] I will make the order applied for by the applicant including the order for costs. In so doing, I do not say that the trustee may not realize upon the value of her non-exempt equity in the homestead, but as at what date and to what extent remain open questions which can be addressed upon an application by the trustee for a discharge.

[14] Wimmer J. granted the order in the form that Ms. Armbruster requested. In substance, the order: (i) declares that the equity in the home above the exempted amount is incapable of realization; and (ii) directs that the Trustee's title be cancelled and the land be registered in Ms. Armbruster's name alone:

> 1. Pursuant to Section 37 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, the Applicant, Veronica Leay Armbruster, has been aggrieved by the act or decision of the Respondent, KPMG INC., trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Veronica Leay Armbruster, when the Respondent transmitted an 82% interest in the Applicant's personal residence, ... to the Respondent, said transmission dated February 8, 1996, and registered effective February 19, 1996 (the "Trustee's Interest");
> 2. Pursuant to Section 40 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, the Trustee's Interest is incapable of realization and the Respondent is unable to realize on the Trustee's Interest;
> 3. Pursuant to Section 37 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, the act or decision of the Respondent to transmit the Trustee's Interest to the Respondent is reversed and the Trustee's Interest shall be returned to the Applicant;
> 4. Pursuant to Section 109 of The Land Titles Act, S.S. 2000, c. L-5.1, the Registrar of Titles of the Saskatchewan Land Titles Registry is directed to: [cancel the existing title, and issue a new title subject to specific encumbrances, which make no reference to a claim by the Trustee].

IV. Submissions of the Parties

[15] In broad compass, the Trustee submits that the Chambers judge misconstrued Zemlak. According to the Trustee, the procedure it followed is an acceptable alternative to that established in Zemlak and, further, its undischarged status should have been considered a distinguishing feature between its position and that of the trustee in Zemlak. The Trustee also submits that the order taken out by Ms. Armbruster is inconsistent with the judgment. The latter contemplated that the Trustee would be able to raise the issue of the non-exempt equity at its own discharge. Ms. Armbruster relies on the reasons articulated by Wimmer J. to counter each of these arguments. In relation to whether the Trustee can raise the question of the non-exempt equity when it applies for its discharge, she submits that this issue is incapable of resolution on such an application, which means that, from her point of view, the Trustee is without any further remedy to pursue its claim.

V. Analysis

[16] Before embarking on the specific analysis required in this case, it is necessary to review Zemlak. A brief review of the facts in Zemlak will place the ratio of that decision in context:

- the bankrupt made an assignment in bankruptcy on June 5, 1984;
- the trustee filed a caveat against the bankrupt's home on June 29, 1984 pursuant to the BIA;
- the bankrupt was absolutely discharged on January 7, 1985;
- the trustee was discharged on January 7, 1985; and
- the bankrupt served a notice to lapse the trustee's caveat in August 1985.

The trustee's report did not mention the possibility of a non-exempt equity in the bankrupt's home or the trustee's intention to file a caveat against the home (see p. 400 of Zemlak). Indeed, on the date of the assignment in bankruptcy, the bankrupt's home was mortgaged, leaving little equity in the home over and above the $32,000 exemption (see p. 401 of Zemlak). Tallis J.A., writing for the Court in Zemlak, carefully articulated the issue arising out of those facts (at p. 396):

> ...whether a discharged trustee in summary administration proceedings in bankruptcy is entitled to maintain a caveat under s. 52(3) of the Bankruptcy Act (now s. 74(3) of the BIA) against the appellant's "homestead" after she has received an absolute discharge and in circumstances where the trustee has taken no part in the administration, control or management of the property and did not raise the issue of maintaining such caveat in the application for discharge of the bankrupt and trustee before the Registrar in Bankruptcy. [Footnote omitted.]

The Court held that the trustee was not entitled to maintain a caveat in those circumstances and directed that it be removed.

[17] In addition to resolving the particular case before it, the Court in Zemlak provided "minimal requirements" for a trustee which plans to maintain a claim against the non-exempt equity in a personal residence. In summary, a trustee must set forth the value of the non-exempt equity, indicate its intention to file a caveat and take specific steps to inform the creditors and the bankrupt of its intention to do so:

This case raises a troublesome issue particularly in summary administration proceedings, which on their face only involve estates where the "realized" assets of the bankrupt, after deducting the claims of secured creditors, will not exceed $500. Without articulating specific rules to guide a trustee, we suggest that the following minimal requirements be met when dealing with a non-exempt equity in the bankrupt's homestead:

1. The report of the trustee on the bankrupt's application for discharge should set forth the value of any non-exempt equity asserted in the "homestead" if the trustee intends to attach it for future realization. In this way the Registrar in Bankruptcy will be alerted to a potential trap for the unwary and may give suitable directions.
2. The notice to creditors, a copy of which is served on the bankrupt, should also indicate clearly that the trustee proposes to maintain a caveat after discharge of the bankrupt.
3. When the trustee intends to maintain a caveat or other encumbrance against the home of the bankrupt, it is important for the bankrupt to have independent legal advice on this point. Since a bankrupt often looks upon the trustee as handling the matter for him (the bankrupt) — particularly in summary administration proceedings — the trustee should advise the bankrupt to retain counsel on the application for discharge (see p. 404).

[18] From a review of the facts in the case before us, it is evident that the Trustee did not follow the procedure in Zemlak regarding how and when a caveat authorized by the BIA should be filed. For its part, the Trustee tried to distinguish Zemlak on the basis that the law permits a trustee to transmit part of a bankrupt's home into its own name, and that this procedure should have the equivalent value to the filing of a caveat pursuant to the BIA. This argument requires the Court to consider whether a trustee in bankruptcy has the authority to do what the Trustee did in this case, i.e., transmit to itself an "undivided interest" in the bankrupt's home on the basis of a potential, future claim to a portion of the sale proceeds.

[19] This central issue can be examined either from the perspective of bankruptcy law or real property law. Both areas of law support the conclusion that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot do what KPMG did in this case.

[20] The pertinent provisions of s. 71(2) and s. 74 of the BIA provide for the vesting of the bankrupt's property in the trustee, the mechanics for the registration of the bankruptcy assignment, the effect of the registration and the circumstances in which a trustee may become the registered owner of a bankrupt's land:

> 71(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.
> 74(1) Every receiving order, or a true copy thereof certified by the registrar or other officer of the court that made it, and every assignment, or a true copy thereof certified by the official receiver, may be registered by or on behalf of the trustee in respect of the whole or any part of any real property that the bankrupt owns or in which he has any interest or estate in the proper office in every district, county and territory wherein, according to the law of the province in which the real property is situated, deeds or transfers of title and other documents relating to lands or any interest therein may be registered.
> (2) Where a bankrupt is the registered owner of any land or charge, the trustee, on registration of the documents referred to in subsection (1), is entitled to be registered as owner of the land or charge free of all encumbrances or charges mentioned in subsection 70(1). [1] [Emphasis added.]

[21] These provisions find their parallel in s. 175(1) of The Land Titles Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. L-5, which describes when a trustee may become the owner of the bankrupt's land:

> 175(1) Upon an assignment being made for the general benefit of his creditors by the owner of land for which a certificate of title has been granted or by the owner of a mortgage, or upon the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy of the property of any such owner, and upon an assignment, receiving order or caution being registered or filed in the land titles office, the trustee may apply to be registered as owner of the land or mortgage, and the registrar may, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act (Canada) transmit the land or mortgage to the trustee who shall thereupon become owner thereof. [Emphasis added.]

[22] Thus, ss. 71 and 74 of the BIA and s. 175 of The Land Titles Act establish the rules for when and how the property of a bankrupt vests in the trustee, but they do not address what happens in relation to exempt property. Section 67(1)(b) of the BIA is the operative provision regarding exemptions:

> . . .
> (b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides; [Emphasis added.]

As the Supreme Court of Canada stated in Royal Bank of Canada v. North American Life Assurance Company, 1996 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 325 at para. 49, "where the asset is exempt under s. 67(1)(b), then the trustee is prohibited from exercising his or her distribution powers because the asset is not subject to division among creditors."

[23] In Saskatchewan, the right to claim an exemption in one's home is found in s. 2(1)11 of The Exemptions Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. E-14:

> 2(1) 11 The following real and personal property of an execution debtor and his family is hereby declared free from seizure by virtue of writs of execution, namely:
> . . .

Digitized by Google

> 11 the house and buildings occupied by the execution debtor and also the lot or lots on which they are situated according to the registered plan thereof to the extent of $32,000;

This is known as a "limited exemption," in that the land is exempt from seizure, but only up to a certain value. Limited exemptions raise questions about whether, and when and how, a creditor can gain access to the equity over and above the exempt amount.

[24] The question whether the non-exempt equity in a home can be seized by virtue of a writ of execution has long since been settled in this jurisdiction. The first case to consider the issue at length is In re Hayes, reflex, [1931] 1 W.W.R. 301 (Sask. K.B.). In Hayes, the trustee submitted that the Court should interpret The Exemptions Act [R.S.S. 1920, c. 51] so as to provide the trustee or a court official with a power of sale. Knowles J. noted that other jurisdictions specifically compel the sale of the personal residence to allow the trustee access to the non-exempt equity, but that Saskatchewan did not do so. In refusing to provide for such a mechanism by judicial fiat, Knowles J. said (at p. 302):

> ... In my opinion there is no machinery by which the surplus over the $3,000 value may be converted into money. It would seem to me that the sheriff having his writ in his hand is stopped on the very threshold of his functioning by the fact that there is a statutory prohibition against his seizing that home to the extent of a certain sum. He cannot seize the surplus or excess, or, to put it in positive language—before the sheriff can effect a sale he must seize the home, not part of it, but all of it. If I were to authorize him to seize all of it for the purpose of a sale I would be authorizing him to do something which the law-makers have said he must not do for the clearl have, saidpthat he, must not seize all of that home because a substantial part of it, or fraction of it, is exempt, and that being so the sheriff is, in my opinion, helpless as far as proceeding to a sale is concerned. If he cannot proceed to a sale of 100 per cent of the home he has no alternative but to stop altogether. I think that to say that the Legislature meant that the home might be seized in its entirety notwithstanding its prohibition that it must not be seized to the extent of $3,000 is a presumption, and to so adjudicate would be beyond the function or the jurisdiction of this Court. The Legislature could, if it had wished, have added a clause to the effect that notwithstanding the prohibition a home might be seized in its entirety, sold, and $3,000 given to the debtor, but they did not so legislate.... [Emphasis added.]

Knowles J. also recognized that, without a mechanism to seize and sell the whole of the land, the limited nature of the exemption confers little benefit on a creditor:

> I am not unimpressed by the fact that this interpretation of the statute results in almost making a nullity of the statute's words which limit the prohibition on the sheriff to the extent of $3,000, but even if that were so I would take the view that it is less serious or unwarrantable to regard certain words as unnecessary or even ineffective than to declare positively a power which the Legislature has deliberately withheld.... The result will therefore be that the trustee is directed that so long as the bankrupt uses the property as her home it is not comprised in the assets of the estate (at p. 303, emphasis added).

In Re Touche Ross Ltd. and Neuls reflex, (1985), 17 D.L.R. (4th) 554 (Sask. C.A.) at p. 559, this Court held that Hayes remains good law. Since then, this Court has affirmed Neuls in Zemlak at pp. 402-03 and in Monteith (Trustee of) v. Monteith, 2004 SKCA 63 (CanLII), 2004 SKCA 63, 240 D.L.R. (4th) 506 at para. 31.

[25] In short, s. 67(1)(b) of the BIA adopts the exemption laws of the jurisdiction where the bankrupt resides. The Exemptions Act of Saskatchewan declares certain land to be exempt to a certain value, but does not provide a mechanism to allow an execution creditor to seize and sell the excess above the exempt value. A trustee in bankruptcy has no greater power than an execution creditor in that regard. Only when the bankrupt sells the home voluntarily is a creditor or a trustee able to make a claim for the difference (see: Neuls at pp. 559-60 referring to Re McNabb reflex, (1979), 112 D.L.R. (3d) 407 (Sask. C.A.)). It is only the proceeds of a voluntary sale above the stipulated amount that are realizable.

[26] Applying this law to the facts of this case, Wimmer J. was correct when he declared that the non-exempt land of Ms. Armbruster is incapable of realization (see: Hayes, Neuls, Zemlak and Monteith). The non-exempt equity represented by the proceeds of the sale of the property is realizable, but the land as such is not. In the case before the Court, the Trustee developed its own procedure and, thereby, effected a form of realization that is not contemplated either by the legislation or prior case law.

[27] Instead of a voluntary transfer from the bankrupt, the Trustee "transmitted" to itself an 82/100 interest in the land that it created, and thereby became the "registered owner" of that interest. The Trustee is thus a tenant in common with Ms. Armbruster. The fact that the Trustee acquired its undivided interest by transmission does not confer upon it some lesser interest than that of Ms. Armbruster. A transmission is simply the means by which someone becomes the registered owner of land, when the actual owner is unwilling, or unable, to execute a transfer, and the person effecting the transmission has some right by law to obtain a conveyance of the land.

[28] The law of real property, however, does not permit a trustee in bankruptcy to create an undivided interest where one did not exist before, without the agreement of the bankrupt. A trustee in bankruptcy can transmit to itself an undivided interest in land that the bankrupt already holds as an undivided interest, or it can receive a voluntary transfer from the bankrupt of such an interest, but a trustee cannot speculate as to what the future sale price of land will be, subtract the value of any encumbrances and the amount of the exemption, and then say that the remaining dollar value gives it "an undivided interest" as a tenant in common in the whole of the land. The interest in land that this Trustee is entitled to hold, according to Hayes, Neuls and Zemlak, is a right to "proceeds," which is a future, contingent interest that will only arise if the bankrupt voluntarily sells the land. That interest cannot unilaterally be converted to an undivided interest in the land. "Land" is transmitted, not a "monetary equivalent" to a part of the land.

[29] Further, the Trustee purported to effect a realization of an undivided interest in the non-exempt land and the exempt land. While the Trustee did not hang a "for sale" sign on the bankrupt's lawn, it nonetheless holds an interest in the whole of the land. Tenants in common each "hold the whole and nothing separately, their occupation being undivided" (see: Anne Warner La Forest, Anger & Honsberger: Law of Real Property, looseleaf, 3rd ed., vol. 1 (Aurora: Canada Law Book, 2009) at §14:30.70). Thus, not only is the Trustee an 82/100 owner of what it considers the non-exempt property, it is also an 82/100 owner of the exempt property—all contrary to the exemptions law and jurisprudence of this Province.

[30] Allowing a trustee in bankruptcy to claim an undivided interest in these circumstances would raise several complex questions, if it were permitted. First, there is the question of the value of the interest. The Trustee arrived at its 82/100 interest according to these calculations (see Affidavit of Laura Ryback):

Potential sale price	$215,000.00
Less encumbrances (rounded)	(37,500.00)
Total equity:	$177,500.00
Respondent's exemption interest ($32,000.00/$177,500.00)	18%
Trustee's interest ($145,500.00/$177,500.00)	82%

The amount of the sale price, whether it should be a present or future value, and whether it should take into account selling costs, are difficult questions that admit of no clear solution. For example, the Trustee's report in this case shows two other values for the land as of 1995, and makes no adjustment for selling costs. Second, as the registered owner of an undivided interest in the property, the Trustee argues that it "owns" any increase in the value of the land, including any increase in the sale equity no matter what the origin of the increase might be, which is contrary to Zemlak. The bankrupt has satisfied her obligations under the mortgage on the property and the property has also increased substantially in value. Third, on appeal to this Court, the Trustee submitted that at some point there would have to be a settlement regarding the payment of "occupancy rent" as the bankrupt has been exclusively occupying the land of which it has been a part owner for 14 years. References were made to other expenses incurred by the Trustee, including its insurance costs. These comments may have been made as part of the negotiating process, but they nonetheless raise real issues. All of these questions arise at the intersection of the law of real property and the law of bankruptcy, and are largely questions of first instance. Their very existence demonstrates the practical difficulty of the Trustee's approach and supports the legal conclusions in Zemlak and this case.

[31] I recognize that Wedge J., on an application for a conditional discharge in Nelson (Trustee of) v. Nelson, 1995 CanLII 5917 (SK QB), [1995] 8 W.W.R. 249 (Sask. Q.B.), permitted the trustee to maintain an undivided interest in the bankrupt's home, until such time as he paid a specific sum of money. The bankrupt did not appeal Nelson to this Court. With this decision, however, Nelson can no longer be taken as authority for the proposition that a trustee in bankruptcy, without the bankrupt's agreement, is entitled to be a tenant in common with respect to a portion of the future proceeds of a possible, voluntary sale of the bankrupt's home. It is, however, noteworthy that the Court in Nelson could have followed the procedure in Zemlak and made the same type of conditional discharge order based on the filing of a caveat, and achieved the same result, i.e., an enhanced payment to the creditors based on the satisfaction of a partial claim to the non-exempt equity.

[32] Zemlak provided a procedure to alert a subsequent claimant in the property that, if the bankrupt's home is sold, the trustee has a prior claim to the proceeds of a future voluntary sale. As part of that procedure, Zemlak contemplated that the question of the extent to which the creditors can share in the non-exempt equity would be dealt with early in the process, so that all options for an equitable resolution could be explored, including a hearing before the Registrar in Bankruptcy or the Court of Queen's Bench, or a proper consent to the terms of a discharge order. In developing the procedure for a trustee in bankruptcy to claim non-exempt equity, Tallis J.A. in Zemlak pointed out that in Neuls: (i) the bankrupt had a substantial non-exempt equity in the property; and (ii) the bankrupt was conditionally discharged to allow the trustee to realize upon that non-exempt equity. This is one type of resolution that can be considered at the time of the bankrupt's discharge. There are no doubt other possible solutions. Given that a trustee has no means to compel the sale of partially exempt land, the resolution of any given case may require more than simply calculating the value of the home, subtracting the amount of the exemption and declaring that the difference is the amount that a bankrupt can be expected to pay. Other factors may have to be taken into account, including such matters as the bankrupt's immediate limited ability to raise additional funds by virtue of his or her status as a bankrupt, the nature of the bankruptcy, the conduct of the bankrupt, the costs to all parties and the time value of money pending a future sale. Beyond this, little guidance can be provided by this Court without a specific appeal before it.

[33] The Court in Zemlak recognized that the question of the exigibility of a bankrupt's non-exempt equity can be a troublesome issue, but, nonetheless, the Court did not want to establish specific rules, opting instead to establish minimal requirements. This Court is in the same position. While bright lines are desirable, the administration of bankrupt estates confers significant discretion on trustees in bankruptcy. Speaking in general terms, trustees must keep in mind certain key principles including the need to allow bankrupts to make a fresh start, as well as maximizing returns for creditors and preserving the overall integrity of the bankruptcy system. The Registrar in Bankruptcy and the Court of Queen's Bench supervise this process and thereby provide the flexibility to meet the multiple goals of the bankruptcy system.

[34] That brings us to the question whether anything should be done at this stage to permit the Trustee to file a caveat to preserve any sort of claim in relation to the non-exempt equity in the future proceeds of sale. Wimmer J. concluded his judgment by leaving the impression that the Trustee would still be able to realize upon the "value" of the non-exempt equity:

> [10] ... I do not say that the trustee may not realize upon the value of her non-exempt equity in the homestead, but as at what date and to what extent remain open questions which can be addressed upon an application by the trustee for a discharge.

There is, however, no mechanism to address such an issue upon the Trustee's application for a discharge.

[35] I have considered whether this Court should expressly permit the Trustee to file a caveat at this time for, perhaps, a reduced claim, before the Trustee's title is cancelled and issued free and clear of any interests other than those listed by Wimmer J. I have decided against making such an order for these reasons. As the Court in Zemlak said, a trustee must not convert an absolute discharge into a conditional discharge. The same comment could be made in this case with even greater strength. Ms. Armbruster did not make an assignment in bankruptcy; she was petitioned into bankruptcy by one creditor. From all accounts, she was a model bankrupt, and complied fully with all aspects of the process. She has done nothing wrong. All she has done is rely upon what the laws of the Province permit her to do: remain in her own home. Nonetheless, she has been in conflict with the Trustee for over 14 years. The Trustee still has not moved to be discharged and, before this application was made, the Trustee gave every indication of continuing in its undischarged state indefinitely. Further, Ms. Armbruster has incurred significant costs in relation to the Trustee's insistence regarding insurance, and in relation to this application and appeal. All of this could have been avoided, if the Trustee had followed Zemlak.

[36] There is one final matter. The Trustee argued that Wimmer J. erred in not holding that Ms. Armbruster was estopped from making an application under s. 37 of the BIA because she had not applied earlier. Given all that has transpired, it is difficult to see how the Trustee can make this argument. Indeed, the issue of grievance is a continuing one, and as each year passes, Ms. Armbruster can legitimately consider herself to be more aggrieved. Ms. Armbruster indicated that she wanted to bring an application, challenging the Trustee's decision to acquire title to part of her home, from the beginning of this process, but that she lacked the financial wherewithal to do so until recently (see her affidavit dated March 18, 2009)—a completely acceptable statement given that she had been petitioned into bankruptcy. Thus, I have given no credence at all to the Trustee's estoppel argument.

VI. Conclusion

[37] The appeal is dismissed. Ms. Armbruster will have her costs on column 2. I would like to thank both counsel for the clarity with which they have placed the issues before the Court.

Alberta Court of Queen's Bench
Rahall v. McLennan
Date: 1996-10-18

W. Paul Sharek and Susan L. Bercov, for applicant.
Monier Rahall in person.

(Edmonton 9603-13942, 9603-17829)
October 18, 1996.

Part I. The Applications:

[1] BELZIL J.:– On June 28, 1996, Monier M. Rahall (hereinafter referred to as Rahall) filed a Statement of Claim on behalf of himself and 23 corporations as Plaintiffs, with Roderick Graham McLennan and Roderick Alexander McLennan named as Defendants. This action (hereinafter referred to as the McLennan action) essentially involves a claim by the Plaintiffs that the Defendants, who are lawyers, improperly petitioned Rahall into bankruptcy and interfered with the bankruptcy proceedings. There is also an allegation that the Defendant Roderick Graham McLennan defamed Rahall.

[2] On August 26, 1996, Rahall filed a Statement of Claim on behalf of himself and the same 23 corporations, naming the Law Society of Alberta as a Defendant. This action (hereinafter referred to as the Law Society action) essentially involves allegations that the Law Society of Alberta has improperly failed to investigate complaints made to the Law Society by Rahall respecting a number of members of the Law Society of Alberta.

[3] I was appointed case management Justice on September 6, 1996.

[4] Counsel for the Defendants in both actions filed Notices of Motion returnable before me on September 11, 1996.

Digitized by Google

[5] In the McLennan action, the Defendants seek an Order striking out the Statement of Claim, or, alternatively, striking out one or more Plaintiffs from the style of cause and an Order staying the action until the corporate Plaintiffs are properly represented.

[6] The grounds of the application are that Rahall is an undischarged bankrupt who has no status to bring the McLennan action, and that the action was brought by Rahall, who is not an active member of the Law Society of Alberta, on behalf of a number of corporate Plaintiffs in contravention of s. 103(1)(c) of the Legal Profession Act.

[7] In the Law Society action, the Defendant seeks an Order striking out the Statement of Claim, or, alternatively, an Order striking out one or more of the Plaintiffs from the style of cause and an Order staying the action until the corporate Plaintiffs are properly represented.

[8] The grounds raised in support of the application by the Law Society are the same as those raised in the McLennan action.

[9] In the Notice of Motion filed in the Law Society action the Defendant stated that should the Statement of Claim not be struck out, it wishes to bring further applications prior to filing a Statement of Defence including an application for further and better particulars and an application to strike out certain paragraphs of the Statement of Claim as disclosing no cause of action. Furthermore, it is stated that an application may be brought alleging that the Statement of Claim is, in effect, a request for judicial review and should have been brought by way of Originating Notice of Motion.

[10] As of this date, the Defendants have not filed any pleadings in either action.

[11] The applications were argued originally on September 11, 1996, with Rahall representing himself and the corporate Plaintiffs.

[12] Rahall, after presenting initial argument, requested an adjournment to present further argument. The adjournment request was granted, with the matters being put over to September 26, 1996.

[13] Prior to September 26, 1996, Rahall requested a further adjournment to October 3, 1996, which adjournment request was granted.

[14] On October 3, 1996, Rahall and counsel for the Defendants presented further oral argument and, as well, Rahall submitted written briefs in both actions, together with some case law.

[15] On October 3, 1996, at the conclusion of oral argument, Rahall requested leave to present further written argument if he wished to do so. Leave was granted to file further written material provided that the further written material was filed by October 10, 1996. No such further material was provided.

Part II. M. Rahall Bankruptcy:

[16] On October 3, 1995, Wilson, J., sitting in Bankruptcy, upon the petition of Alberta Treasury Branches ordered that Rahall be adjudged Bankrupt and issued a Receiving Order against him.

[17] No appeal was filed from the Order of Wilson, J.

[18] On July 9, 1996, Lefsrud, J., sitting in Bankruptcy, ordered that the application of Rahall to be discharged from bankruptcy be put over and adjourned for one year to July 9, 1997.

[19] On July 17, 1996, Rahall filed a Notice of Appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal from the Order of Lefsrud, J.

[20] As of this date, the appeal from the Order of Lefsrud, J. has not been heard.

Part III. Position of the Applicants (Defendants):

[21] In support of its position, the Applicants rely on the Affidavit of David Turner, Deputy Secretary of the Law Society of Alberta, who deposes that Rahall is not a member of the Law Society of Alberta.

[22] The Applicants also rely on Rules 129, 186 and 548, as well as s. 103 of the Legal Profession Act, s. 71 (2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, as well as the Orders of Wilson and Lefsrud, JJ.

[23] Dealing with the bankruptcy issue, the Applicants argue that as Rahall is an undischarged bankrupt, s. 71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act applies, and that therefore Rahall lacks the status to bring any actions except personal actions.

[24] The Applicants state that with the exception of paragraph 8 of the McLennan action, which is a claim in defamation, all other allegations in the two actions are barred by the provisions of s. 71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[25] Furthermore, the Applicants rely on the decision of Marceau, J. in Whissell v. Bennett Jones Verchere 1996 CanLII 10399 (AB QB), (1996), 40 Alta. L.R. (3d) 147 (Q.B.), wherein Marceau, J. held that it would be a condition precedent for an undischarged bankrupt alleging impropriety in the bankruptcy proceedings to have the bankruptcy Order set aside. In this case, of course, the bankruptcy Order of Wilson, J. has not been appealed.

[26] The Applicants argue that while Rahall can represent himself, he cannot purport to act on behalf of the 23 corporations named as Plaintiffs in both actions. The Applicants rely on the decision of O'Leary, J. (as he then was) in the case of Professional Sign Crofters (1988) Ltd. v. Wedekind 1994 CanLII 9245 (AB QB), (1994), 19 Alta. L.R. (3d) 53 (Q.B.).

[27] The Defendants argue that the claims of the corporate Plaintiffs should be stayed pending the appointment of counsel to represent the corporate Plaintiffs.

Part IV. Position of Rahall:

[28] In the written materials supplied to me, Rahall submitted two Affidavits which outline his position in response to the two applications.

[29] In the McLennan action, the Affidavit is as follows:

1. Mr. Graham McLennan, hereinafter referred to as the Co-defendant admitted to my solicitor at the time, Mr. Roy Henning and myself on more than one occasion that the purpose of the Alberta Treasury Branches and the Co-Defendant petitioning me into bankruptcy was to deprive me of the resources necessary to pursue my litigation against the Alberta Treasury Branches by asking for security for costs after I had been petitioned into bankruptcy.
2. This intention was confirmed by Mr. Mark Gunderson, a colleague of the Co-defendant at the law firm McLennan Ross who attempted to intimidate me by continually reminding me that if I was not cooperative I would be petitioned into bankruptcy which eventually became the case.
3. The Co-defendant used the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act maliciously as an instrument to prevent me from pursuing the litigation I had initiated against the Alberta Treasury Branches and in addition, to control all my actions through a Trustee who is being funded by the Alberta Treasury Branches.
4. In an action the Plaintiff brought against the Law Society of Alberta, the Counsel for the Law Society of Alberta has attempted to prevent me from pursuing the action based on my status of a bankrupt, thereby validating my cause of action.
5. By the use of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Co-defendant's motives were to deprive me of my rights under the Canadian Bill of Rights and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
6. The petition in bankruptcy resulted in the destruction of the Plaintiff's credibility and reputation.
7. The Plaintiffs disputed the appraisals obtained by the Alberta Treasury Branches as being far too low. The Presiding Master then directed a three (3) month stay for the Plaintiffs to expose the properties to the market and establish an accurate value therefore, said stay to expire March 31, 1996.
8. On February 28, 1996 I wrote to the Co-defendant, the Solicitor for the Alberta Treasury Branches, advising that I had parties interested in the properties, and requested he advise whether I should present offers to the Court on his office. No reply was received, and on March 22, 1996, I wrote the learned Master directly.
9. The sales of these properties would have eliminated or greatly reduced, the amount owing to the Alberta Treasury Branches, and were in excess of the amounts suggested by the appraisals of the Alberta Treasury Branches.
10. The Learned Master suggested that I bring a Notice of Motion in Chambers, before him, which I did on March 29, 1996. On the morning of the hearing of this mater. Mr. McLennan presented a copy of an Affidavit, executed by his secretary, enclosing a letter received from the Solicitor who was acting on behalf of the proposed Purchaser, withdrawing the offers.
11. The proposed Purchaser had placed $25,000.00 in trust with Mr. J. Cox Counsel for the Purchaser, and had full disclosure with respect to the proceedings. The Purchaser indicated that his Counsel had been approached by Roderick Alexander McLennan, a senior partner in the Codefendant's firm.
12. It has been confirmed by the Purchaser that Mr. McLennan advised and influenced Mr. Cox that unless he and his client withdrew the offers, then both he and his client would be blackballed in the business and legal community.
13. I believe that had the offers been accepted, there would be little or no shortfall, as a result of which the Co-defendant the Solicitor for the Alberta Treasury Branches would no doubt have some difficulty with his client, and would have validated my earlier contentions that McLennan Ross have been systematically maliciously conspiring with the Alberta Treasury Branches to circumvent due process, and to utilize the legal process to harass and discredit the Plaintiffs.

[30] In the Law Society action, the Affidavit is as follows:

1. I am an officer of the Plaintiff corporations and as such have personal knowledge of the matters herein deposed to, except where stated to be on information and belief.
2. The Defendant is using as a defence, my cause of action in another brought against Roderick Graham McLennan and Roderick Alexander McLennan. The Defendant is relying on my status as a bankrupt in order to deny my ability to bring the action against the Defendant.
3. The Defendant notwithstanding its own published information to deal with a complaint within six weeks, has not dealt with my complaint since October of 1995.

Digitized by Google

4. The Defendant has continued to insist that I resubmit my complaint in various written formats notwithstanding its own Rules of the Law Society, Part 3. Rule 85(2)(a) wherein the form of the complaint does not necessarily have to be written.

5. The Plaintiff claims the ability to bring this action pursuant to - Sec. 103(2) (h)(i)(j) of the Legal Profession Act.

6. The Defendant through its negligence and inaction has allowed certain of its members to continue to deprive me of my rights under the Canadian Bill of Rights - Sec. 2(e) and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Rahall admits that he is not a lawyer, and is not and has never been a member of the Law Society of Alberta.

Part V. Discussion:

I. Bankruptcy Issue:

[31] Section 71 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, reads as follows:

71. (1) A bankruptcy shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at the time of the filing of, the petition on which a receiving order is made or of the filing of an assignment with the official receiver.

(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

[32] As noted above, Rahall is an undischarged Bankrupt and no appeal has been taken from the Order of Wilson, J. which adjudged Rahall bankrupt.

[33] There is substantial case authority in Canada dealing with the effect of an Order under s. 71 and its predecessor in previous bankruptcy statutes.

[34] In the 1956 case of Eggen v. Grayson (1956), 36 C.B.R. 72, Mc-Bride, J. of the Alberta Supreme Court, sitting in Bankruptcy, stated as follows:

From the authorities the principle appears clear that the right of action for damages for injury to a bankrupt's property which lessened the value of his assets vests in and passes to his trustee and any such damages awarded go for the benefit of his creditors, but on the other hand, any right of action for injury to his character and reputation remains vested in the bankrupt and does not pass to the trustee; the bankrupt may sue for damages for such injury in his own name, and if an award is made, it is purely personal to him and he keeps the amount awarded and the trustee cannot intercept it.

[35] Several years later, Riley, J. of the Alberta Supreme Court, sitting in Bankruptcy, in the case of Re Ritenburg (1961), 3 C.B.R. (N.S.) 294, in dealing with a similar issue, quoted with approval the decision of Rogers v. Spence (1844), 13 M. & W. 571, 153 E.R. 239 (Ex. Ch.), wherein it was stated:

> ... As the object of the law is manifestly to benefit creditors, by making all the pecuniary means and property of the bankrupt available to their payment, it has, in furtherance of this object, been construed largely, so to pass, not only what in strictness may be called the property and debts of the bankrupt, but also those rights of action to which he was entitled for the purposes of recovering, in specie, real or personal property, or damages in respect of that which has been unlawfully diminished in value, withheld, or taken from him; but causes of action not falling within this description but arising out of a wrong personal to the bankrupt, for which he would be entitled to remedy whether his property were diminished or impaired or not, are clearly not within the letter, and have never been held to be within the sprit, of the enactments, even in cases where injuries of this kind have been accompanied or followed by loss of property.

[36] In the case of Cherry v. Ivey (1982), 43 C.B.R. (N.S.) 174, the Ontario Supreme Court stated the following at p. 176:

> There is no question on the authorities that the cause of action to recover damages for embarrassment, anxiety and emotional trauma, humiliation, mental distress and physical upset is clearly a personal matter that remains with the debtor, notwithstanding his bankruptcy. It is also clear from the cases, in my view, that the unlawful destruction of the credit and repute of a person, if actionable, is, generally speaking, actionable by the undischarged bankrupt personally.

[37] A similar issue was dealt with by the Ontario Court of Appeal in the decision of Holley v. Gifford Smith Ltd. (1986), 59 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17, wherein the Court, after citing the decisions of Eggen v. Grayson and Cherry v. Ivey, stated the following:

> It is clear that where the damages for which the bankrupt asserts a claim are personal in nature, whether it be for physical suffering resulting from physical injuries sustained as a result of the negligence of another person or mental suffering resulting from a libel or slander perpetrated upon him, such cause of action does not become the property of his trustee in bankruptcy because it is not the policy of the law to convert into money for the creditors the mental or physical anguish of the debtor.

[38] Marceau, J. dealt with a similar issue in the case of Whissell v. Bennett Jones, supra, at which time Marceau, J. accepted the following statement as a correct statement of the law:

> These authorities establish, with reasonable clarity, that the dividing line is to be placed between actions which are brought with respect to damages or loss relating to the bankrupt's property or assets and actions for damages to his person or reputation. An undischarged bankrupt has no status to bring the former because the damage was to his assets or estate which passes to the trustee to be used to satisfy his creditors. However, the bankrupt does have status to bring action in respect of an unlawful conduct which cause personal injury or harm and therefore has not diminished the estate which passes to the trustee.

[39] The issue then arises as to whether or not any of the allegations in the two actions are "personal" as defined by the case law.

1. The McLennan Action:

[40] The allegations in the McLennan action are as follows:

1. The Plaintiff, Monier M. Rahall, is a resident of the Province of Alberta.
2. The Plaintiff Corporations are corporations incorporated under the laws of the Province of Alberta, and carried on business in the Province of Alberta.
3. The Defendant, Roderick Graham McLennan, is a solicitor of the firm McLennan Ross and, as far as the Plaintiff is aware a resident of the Province of Alberta. The Defendant, Roderick Alexander McLennan, is a solicitor and founding partner of the firm McLennan Ross and as far as the Plaintiff is aware, a resident of the Province of Alberta.
4. The Plaintiff and his corporations were damaged by the actions of the Defendants.
5. The Plaintiff had confidential information propagated by the Defendant violating conflict of interest guidelines.
6. Roderick Graham McLennan represented the Alberta Treasury Branches at the same time that other members of his firm represented other lenders and the receivers, all in conflict of interest. The Defendant not only condoned this behaviour, he promoted it.
7. Roderick Graham McLennan conspired to take away the Plaintiff's rights to due process by petitioning the Plaintiff into bankruptcy and using the Bankruptcy Act as an abusive instrument also as a method of avoiding litigation. His actions were reckless and with little regard to other financial matters.
8. Roderick Graham McLennan defamed the Plaintiff to several members of the professional community in Edmonton and propagated confidential information knowingly damaging the Plaintiff's integrity and reputation with the counsel of other financial institutions.
9. Roderick Graham McLennan violated the rules of court in order to harass the Plaintiff under the guise of legal proceedings and deprive the Plaintiff of his rights to due process. The Defendant brought motions of civil contempt that violated the rules of court.
10. In order to get favourable rulings against the Plaintiff. Roderick Graham McLennan contrived to bring motions before one particular Justice even though another had been appointed as case management judge, once again knowingly abusing the process to the detriment of the Plaintiff and the courts.
11. Roderick Graham McLennan prepared orders that allowed Coopers& Lybrand who had worked for the Plaintiff as debtor to then work for the creditor, all the while knowing that such orders put Coopers & Lybrand into a serious conflict of interest with respect to the Plaintiff. The conflict of interest was pre-meditated and promoted by the Defendant who prepared the orders knowingly.
12. Roderick Graham McLennan continually was derelict in his duties by not responding to written correspondence and caused the Plaintiff damages.
13. The Defendants conspired to withdraw and tamper with the submission of offers for sale of properties to ensure that the Plaintiff was kept in bankruptcy longer. They intentionally induced breach of contract.
14. Roderick Graham McLennan controlled and interfered with the actions of a court-appointed officer, the Trustee, on several occasions to the detriment of the Plaintiff.
15. Roderick Graham McLennan continually violated the rules of court to the detriment of the Plaintiff.
16. The Defendants contacted other lenders, ex-employees, relatives, accountants and business associates of the Plaintiff with the intention of being to the Plaintiff's detriment. These individuals were induced to work against the Plaintiff's interests in return for access to the disposal of the Plaintiff's assets. These offers of inducement are now occurring.

Digitized by Google

17. Roderick Graham McLennan prepared an order that allowed an unsecured creditor to rank ahead of secured creditors. The Defendant continually conspired to undermine any restructuring or viable proposals as a method of undermining the Plaintiff.
18. The Defendant, Roderick Alexander McLennan, conspired with the co-Defendant to interfere and otherwise tamper with bona fide offers that were to be presented to the Court for the sale of various properties resulting in the withdrawal of those offers to the financial detriment of the Plaintiff's estate knowingly making it more difficult for the Plaintiff to be discharged from bankruptcy.

[41] It is clear from the case law that actions by an undischarged bankrupt are barred unless the actions are "personal." Accordingly, unless it is made clear in a pleading that the action is personal, the action is barred.

[42] To bring oneself within the exception, the cause of action must be clearly drafted to reflect an allegation of injury to a person and/or his credit or reputation.

[43] In my view, the only allegation which is personal in the McLennan action is paragraph 8, which refers to an injury to the Plaintiff Rahall's reputation and integrity.

[44] All other allegations in the McLennan action relate to allegations of damage to the bankrupt's property.

[45] Rahall argues that the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act has been used to undermine the Canadian Bill of Rights, specifically paragraph 2(e).

[46] Paragraph 2(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights, 8-9 Eliz. II, c. 44 (Canada) [R.S.C. 1985, App. III], reads as follows:

> 2. Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to ...
> (e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations.

[47] Rahall alleges that improper use has been made of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, and argues that his rights have been violated. These arguments were open for Rahall to raise before Wilson, J. and it is significant to note that Rahall has not seen fit to appeal the Order of Wilson, J. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act does provide for a mechanism for a fair hearing which involves due process of a law. All persons are treated equally before the Court, and all persons are afforded the same rights of appeal under the statute.

[48] Rahall argues that the cost of filing a Notice of Appeal limits the right of appeal and limits rights to due process, and argues that his rights under the Bill of Rights have been undermined.

[49] No evidence has been presented before me that the cost of appeal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act is in any way discriminatory. The fact is that Rahall has only seen fit to appeal the Order of Lefsrud, J. and not the Order of Wilson, J.

[50] As was pointed out in the decision of Whissell v. Bennett Jones Verchere (supra) by Marceau, J., it is a condition precedent to any action attacking a bankruptcy Order that the bankruptcy Order should be set aside. In this case, the issue of Rahall's bankruptcy has been determined against him and no appeal has been filed, and accordingly, the Order stands.

[51] With the exception of paragraph 8 in the McLennan action, all of the other allegations relate to the bankruptcy proceedings.

[52] Rahall cannot relitigate the issues which were before Wilson, J. unless and until an appellate court sets aside the Order of Wilson, J.

[53] Legal consequences flow from the Order of Wilson, J. and Rahall cannot circumvent a valid Court Order under the guise of these proceedings.

II. Law Society Action:

[54] The Law Society action reads as follows:

1. The Plaintiff, Monier M. Rahall, is a resident of the Province of Alberta.
2. The Plaintiff Corporations are corporations incorporated under the laws of the Province of Alberta, and carried on business in the Province of Alberta.
3. The Defendant, The Law Society of Alberta, is a self-governing association of all practising lawyers in the Province of Alberta.
4. The Plaintiff, and the Plaintiff corporations were damaged by the negligence of the Defendant.
5. The Defendant acted negligently by violating its own rules governing the operation of the Law Society of Alberta.

Digitized by Google

6. By letters dated October 4, 11, December 15, 1995, February 27, 29, 1996, March 26, 1996, April 4, 17, 19, 1996, and August 6, 1996 the Plaintiffs filed complaints against David Mark Gunderson, Q.C., Roderick Alexander McLennan, Q.C., Charles Paul Russell, Roderick Graham McLennan, Douglas Neil Tkachuk, Katherine L. Hurlburt. The Law Society of Alberta has maliciously and in bad faith for improper reasons refused to investigate those complaints.
7. The Defendant was negligent by not acting on complaints in a timely manner as prescribed in the Rules of the Law Society of Alberta thereby exposing the Plaintiffs to further damages.
8. The Defendant's negligence allowed certain of its members to escalate their moral turpitude because of its lack of disciplinary action in conjunction with the complaints set forth in Paragraph 6.
9. The Defendant, by not addressing conflicts of interest with regard to certain of its members named in Paragraph 6, has created a breeding ground for additional conflicts of interest by not acting on the complaints set forth in Paragraph 6.
10. The Defendant, by not addressing the accountability of certain of its members named in Paragraph 6, has allowed future actions to fall victim to some dishonest, unethical, and incompetent conduct.
11. The Defendant was negligent in its duty to protect the public interest.
12. The Defendant has been deliberately evasive in dealing with the Plaintiff's complaint hoping a Judicial decision will mitigate the complaint. Complaints were repeatedly stalled by the Defendant to wait for a judicial decision in hope that it would absolve them of their responsibility. The Defendant's inaction has had and will have effect on the outcome of such a decision because the lawyers involved are allowed to continue their moral turpitude and unethical practices.

[55] As noted above, the issues of whether or not this is a proper case for judicial review and whether or not a cause of action exists in favour of an individual Plaintiff have not been argued, and I express no opinion on these issues at this time.

[56] Ignoring for the moment the issues of whether or not the Statement of Claim is drafted even creates a cause of action in an individual, the question that arises as to whether or not the Statement of Claim is one in which it is alleged that a "personal" injury to reputation or credit has occurred.

[57] No such allegations have been pleaded, nor have any facts been pleaded which would found "personal" claims as defined by the case law.

II. Legal Profession Act Issue:

[58] There is no issue that Rahall can act for himself. Rahall admits he is not a lawyer and is not a member of the Law Society of Alberta.

[59] O'Leary, J., in the case of Professional Sign Crafters (1988) Ltd. v. Wedekind (supra), discussed the effect of s. 103 of the Legal Profession Act in the context of a situation wherein a sole director and officer of corporate plaintiffs prepared and issued a statement of claim.

[60] O'Leary, J. also discussed the provisions of Rules 5.2, 5.3 and 5.4 of the Alberta Rules of Court.

[61] In this particular situation, Rahall has filed Statements of Claim on behalf of 23 corporations in which Rahall is an officer.

[62] The Legal Profession Act, S.A. 1990, c. L-9.1, regulates the practice of law in the Province of Alberta. The relevant parts of s. 103 of the Legal Profession Act are as follows:

103(1) No person shall, unless he is an active member of the Society.
(a) practise as a barrister or as a solicitor,
(b) act as a barrister or as a solicitor in any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction,
(c) commence, carry on or defend any action or proceeding before a court or judge on behalf of any other person, or
(d) settle or negotiate in any way for the settlement of any claim for loss or damage founded in tort.
(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to the following:
(h) a person who acts on his own behalf in an action, matter or proceeding to which he is a party:
(j) an officer or employee of a corporation, partnership or unincorporated body in respect of the preparation of a document for the use of the corporation, partnership or unincorporated body or to which it is a party;
(1) a person permitted by statute to appear as the agent of another person before a justice of the peace, the Provincial Court or a provincial judge in respect of services provided by that person as an agent:

[63] In his decision, O'Leary, J. stated the following at p. 57 and following:

(8) In order to place the issues in perspective it is important to distinguish between the inherent discretion of a superior Court to permit a non-lawyer to appear physically in Court or before a judge as the representative or advocate of another person (the "right of audience"). and the right of an individual to represent another person in respect of legal matters generally, that is, the right to practice law.

9 Unless clearly taken away or modified by statute, the Court of Queen's Bench, as a superior Court, has, by virtue of its inherent jurisdiction to control its own procedure, a discretion to permit an individual other than a member of the Law Society of Alberta to appear in Court as an agent or advocate on behalf of another person: Collier v. Hicks (1831), 2 B. & Ad. 663, 109 E.R. 1290: Abse v. Smith, [1986] Q.B. 536 (C.A.).

10 Rule 5.4 is a recognition and confirmation of the Court's inherent discretion. It manifests an intention on the part of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench to retain the right to control who may appear in Court on behalf of parties to litigation. It is one of three Rules promulgated in 1992 as Pt. 1.1 of the Rules of Court under the heading "Audience Before the Court" (Alta. Reg. 87/92). It is preceded by R. 5.2 and 5.3:

"5.2 Subject to this Part, a person shall only be represented before the Court by a Solicitor.

"5.3 An individual may represent himself before the Court."

11 The Court's inherent discretion may, of course, be modified or taken away completely by statute. If the Act affects the Court's inherent jurisdiction, then the discretion must give way to the extent that it is inconsistent with the legislation. The wording of s. 103(1)(c) must be examined since, at first glance, it appears to remove the discretion by prohibiting anyone but a lawyer from representing another person "before a court or judge":

"(1) No person shall, unless he is an active member of the Society.

"(c) Commence, carry on or defend any action or proceeding before a court or judge on behalf of any other person."

12 To effectively take away or modify the Court's inherent jurisdiction the legislature must do so in clear and unequivocal terms: Cook v. Ip 1985 CanLII 163 (ON CA), (1985), 22 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (Ont. C.A.). Jahnke v. Wylie 1993 CanLII 7155 (AB QB), (1993), 13 Alta. L.R. (3d) 31 (Q.B.).

13 In my opinion, s. 103(1)(c), properly construed, does not remove or diminish the Court's inherent discretion to decide who it will permit to address it and is not in conflict with R. 5.4. The Legislature could not have used the word "before" in the sense of a physical presence in a courtroom in front of a judge. Subsection (1)(c) would not make sense if that were the case. One does not "commence" an action or proceeding in a courtroom or in the presence of a judge. The words "carry on or defend any action or proceeding" are equivocal. They may refer to physical attendances in Court in the course of civil or criminal litigation, or to steps in an action or proceeding taken entirely outside a courtroom and away from the presence of a judge.

14 A secondary meaning must be given to the words "before a court or judge". The expression "before the court" is commonly used interchangeably with "in court" where the word "court" refers to the institution rather than the place. For example, "before" and "in" appear to have the same meaning in s. 19 of the Judicature Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. J-1, and neither word refers to a physical presence in a courtroom or otherwise in front of a judge. Section 19(1) provides that no proceeding "pending in the Court" may be restrained by prohibition or injunction. Subsection (2) then says:

"(2) Nothing in subsection (1) disables the Court from directing, if it thinks fit, a stay of proceedings in a proceeding pending before it, and any person, whether a party or not to any proceeding at any time pending in the Court ..." [emphasis added]

15 In my view, the expression "before a court or judge" in s. 103(1)(c) means "in a court" in the institutional rather than the physical sense. Subsection (1)(c) therefore means that a non-lawyer cannot act for or represent another person in respect of litigation, that is, in respect of matters "in" or "before a Court." The prohibition is general and extends to all aspects of acting for or representing another person in connection with litigation. In my opinion, more precise language than that used in subs. (1)(c) would be required in order to displace the inherent and fundamental jurisdiction of a superior Court to control its own procedure. The purpose of the provision is to regulate the practice of law for the benefit of the public and not to restrict the right of audience. The continued existence of the Court's inherent discretion does not conflict with this purpose. My interpretation of s. 103(1)(c) leaves intact the inherent jurisdiction of the Court to control the right of audience as expressed in R. 5.4. A corporation may, therefore, be represented in Court by any individual to whom the Court grants permission in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction.

16 An individual has the right to commence and conduct litigation on his own behalf. Section 103(2)(h) recognizes that right by excluding "a person who sues on his own behalf in an action, matter or proceeding to which he is a party" from the restrictions contained in s. 103(1). The Courts have traditionally accorded the right of audience to an individual appearing on his own behalf. Rule 5.3 confirms that practice and complements s. 103(2)(h).

17 The Court's discretion should be exercised with care. There are valid policy reasons for restricting the right of audience to qualified members of the Law Society of Alberta. In Maclab Enterprises Inc. (Midwest Property Management) v. Rawdah 1983 CanLII 1064 (AB QB), (1983), 27 Alta. L.R. (2d) 164 (Q.B.), Veit, J. held that a corporation had the capacity to appear in a courtroom "in person" by a senior officer, and thus came within the exception now contained in s. 103(2)(h). She questioned, however, whether the right of audience should be extended to a corporation appearing in that manner. At p. 169 she alluded to some policy reasons for requiring that corporations be represented by members of the Bar:

"Limitations could be placed upon corporations for legitimate reasons of public policy and for reasons of professional policy ...

"In my view, it might be decided in Alberta as it has been elsewhere, notably in England, that in order to enhance the efficiency of the courts, maintain the control of the judiciary over those who appear in the courts, and preserve the existence of lawyers as a learned and reputable profession, specific rules or statutes should be enacted so as to take away from corporations the right which they have to appear in our courts in person."

As I have already indicated, it is my view that the Court has a discretion to permit a corporation to be represented in Court by an appropriate individual. That discretion existed when Maclab was decided and was acknowledged by Veit J. With respect, I do not believe it was necessary for her to base her decision on the exemption now contained in s. 103(1)(h).

18 Similar policy concerns were expressed by May L.J. in Abse v. Smith, supra, at p. 555:

"First, I have no doubt that it is essential for the proper administration of justice in the courts of this country and the maintenance of the rule of law throughout the land that every court must retain the untrammelled power of regulating its own proceedings at least in all cases where these are not already regulated by ancient usage or statute.

"Secondly, from the accumulated wisdom of the courts, as exemplified in the authorities ... as well as from my own experience both as advocate and judge, I think that it is essential that those who act as advocates in our courts, particularly in the higher courts ... should be members of a profession or professions subject to a strict code of discipline and etiquette and who have been thoroughly trained and practiced in the skills of advocacy, in the proper and expeditious conduct of litigation and in the law. One of the most important factors tending not only to the just, but also to the swift, determination of litigation, which is so desirable, is that those who act as advocates for the litigants concerned have been thoroughly trained and are indeed adequately experienced to do so."

21 The Defendants submit that in preparing, issuing and serving the Statement of Claim, Stanley commenced the action on behalf of the Plaintiffs and was therefore in breach of s. 103(1)(c). The Plaintiffs argue that s. 103 does not bar a closely-held corporation from commencing an action through the individual who controls it. A corporation is a legal person and the Plaintiffs say they are each exempted from the prohibition contained in subs. (1)(c) by subs. (2)(h) as "a person who acts on his own behalf in an action ... to which he is a party".

22 The Plaintiffs rely on Maclab Enterprises Inc. v. Rawdah, supra, where Veit J. held that a corporation has the capacity and the right to appear "in person" in the Court of Queen's Bench by a senior officer. Maclab was concerned with the right of audience and did not specifically consider the propriety of a controlling individual commencing an action on behalf of the corporation. Since Veit J. found that a corporation was equivalent to a natural person and therefore within the exemption now expressed in s. 103(2)(h), it is implicit in her judgment that she considered a corporation acting through a senior officer to be excluded from all of the restrictions of s. 103(1).

23 I do not propose to adopt the approach taken by Veit J. in Maclab. In my view the conclusion that a corporation can act "in person" within the meaning of s. 103(2)(h) of the Act was obiter and unnecessary for the disposition of the case. Further, the statute then in force has since been repealed and replaced and the new version, although containing some precise exemptions for corporate representation, does not expressly or impliedly treat corporations in the same manner as natural persons and covered by the "in person'" exemption.

24 Veit J. did not have to find that a corporation fails within the "in person" exemption now set out in s. 103(2)(h). The issue in Maclab was the right of a senior officer to appear in Court as agent for a corporation, that is, the right of audience. The Court had a discretion to permit or forbid the individual to appear as agent. The matter could have been resolved by simply granting the individual permission to appear pursuant to the Court's inherent discretion.

25 The statute then in effect, the Legal Profession Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. L-9, has since been repealed and replaced: S.A. 1990, c. L-9.1. The current version refers to corporate representation in several exempting subsections of s. 103(2). A new provision, subs. (2)(j), exempts an officer or employee of a corporation in respect of the preparation of legal documents to which the corporation is a party and for its own use. This does not refer to pleadings. I believe it is significant that the Legislature, which apparently considered the question of corporate representation in legal matters in some detail, made specific allowance for the preparation of legal documents by officers and employees of corporations but said nothing about the right of officers and employees to act as agents in the preparation of pleadings and the commencement and prosecution of legal proceedings free of the restraint of s. 103(1).

26 The Plaintiffs cite two other authorities in support of their contention that a one-person corporation can commence and carry on legal proceedings through the individual who controls it.

27 In Venrose Holdings Ltd. v. Pacific Press Ltd. 1978 CanLII 378 (BC CA), (1978), 7 B.C.L.R. 298, 88 D.L.R. (3d) 523, the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that a corporation could commence an action by issuing a Writ of Summons signed on its behalf by a senior officer. A provision of the Rules of Court required that a Writ be signed by the Plaintiff or by his solicitor and this was interpreted as authorizing a corporation to issue a Writ without the intervention of a lawyer. The statute regulating the practice of law did not expressly state that an action could only be commenced on behalf of another person by a lawyer. That distinguishes the decision from the case at Bar. Here, the Act says in clear terms that only a member of the Law Society can commence an action as agent for another person.

28 In Northern Homes Ltd. v. Steel-Space Industries Ltd. (1975), 57 D.L.R. (3d) 309, 23 B.L.R. 297 [reflex, [1975] 5 W.W.R. 115] (N.W.T.S.C.). Morrow J. held that a corporation could commence proceedings through its President and, further, that the same individual was entitled to appear before the Court on behalf of the corporation in connection with the proceedings. Morrow J. interpreted a provision of the rules of practice permitting a party to issue pleadings in person or through a solicitor as sufficiently broad to authorize a corporation to commence an action by Statement of Claim without the necessity of employing a lawyer. Unlike the situation here, there was apparently no legislation specifying that only a lawyer could commence proceedings on behalf of another.

29 Section 103(1)(c) clearly forbids anyone but a member of the Law Society from commencing and carrying on an action or proceeding on behalf of another person. Unless Stanley can bring himself within an exception in subs. (2) his conduct in preparing and issuing the Statement of Claim as agent of the plaintiffs was a violation of s. 103(1)(c). In my view, it cannot be said that the Plaintiffs were acting "in person" through Stanley so as to bring them within subs. (2)(h) as persons acting on their own behalf in an action or matter to which they are parties. A corporation is a legal entity separate from its shareholders and directors. It is incapable of doing anything except through the acts of individuals acting as its agents. Those are fundamental concepts of corporate law. They have not changed in substance since the decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta in R. v. Cook, [1932] 1 D.L.R. 88, [1931] 3 W.W.R. 707, 26 Alta. L.R. 156 (C.A.), where MacGillivray J.A. said at p. 94 D.L.R.:

"The corporation although a legal entity included in the definition of 'person' is none the less not a visible person: it is without physical existence: it 'has neither body parts nor passions' and so in my view is quite incapable of doing anything required to be done 'in person.'

"Where an act is done on behalf of a corporation by an agent or attorney it may be said that it is the act of the corporation but it cannot be said that it is the act of the corporation 'in person:' it is the agent or attorney who is acting 'in person.' Wood v. Swann (1880), 25 Sol. Jo. 134; Holmsted, p. 326."

In my opinion those words are as apt today as they were when first written.

30 Section 103(1) of the Act forbids the commencement of an action in the Court of Queen's Bench by an individual who is not a member of the Law Society. Subsection (2) exempts certain individuals and circumstances from that prohibition. A corporation cannot act "in person" within subs. (2)(h) and no other exemption applies. A corporation is a legal entity separate from its shareholders, directors, officers and employees and none of them can commence an action on behalf of the corporation without contravening s. 103. I agree with the Master's conclusion that Stanley violated the Act when he prepared, issued and served the Statement of Claim on behalf of the Plaintiffs.

31 The Defendants argue that since the action was commenced through the agency of an unqualified individual in breach of s. 103 of the Act, the proceedings are a nullity and void ab initio. They say that this is not a case of incomplete, improper or non-compliance with a rule of practice which might constitute a curable irregularity, but, rather, a failure to comply with a mandatory statutory prerequisite for the valid commencement of proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench. The Master accepted this submission and found the action to be a nullity.

32 In my view it is unnecessary to consider the distinction between acts or omissions which give rise to curable irregularities and those which result in nullities.

33 The purpose of the Act is to protect the public by preventing unqualified individuals from practicing law. Those who contravene the Act are subject to penalties. There is nothing express or implied in the statute imposing any sanctions on those for whom unqualified individuals purport to act. In many cases the "clients" will be ignorant of the lack of qualifications and it would be harsh to strike out their actions as nullities. I cannot imagine a valid reason for doing so.

34 It was Stanley who contravened the Act, not the Plaintiffs, and it is he who should answer for his conduct. He may be prosecuted for contravening the Act. I have treated the Plaintiffs as entities separate from Stanley for the purpose of interpreting subs. (2)(h) of the Act and it would be inconsistent to now ignore that principle and punish them for Stanley's misconduct.

35 In my opinion, there is no justification in principle or practice for declaring the action a nullity. The Court has jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter. It is not suggested that the Statement of Claim is defective in form or that it does not disclose a cause of action. The Defendants have suffered no prejudice which cannot be remedied in costs. There is no policy reason for declaring the action a nullity. The provisions of the Act can be enforced against those who contravene its terms without the necessity of striking out the underlying proceedings.

36 In my opinion the proper disposition of this application is to direct a stay of the action until such time as the Plaintiffs are represented on the record by a qualified agent as required by the Act and the Rules of Court.

[64] In my view, the issue facing me dealing with Rahall's attempt to commence legal action on behalf of 23 corporations is identical to the issue which O'Leary, J. dealt with in the Professional Sign Crafters case.

[65] While it is accepted that Rahall is an officer of the subject corporations, the fact remains that the corporations are separate legal entities.

[66] Rahall violated the Legal Profession Act when he prepared, issued and served the two Statements of Claim on behalf of the corporate Plaintiffs.

[67] In the Professional Sign Crafters case, O'Leary, J. discussed the consequences which flow from the fact that corporate actions were commenced by an unqualified individual.

[68] Counsel for the Applicants did not argue that the corporate actions are a nullity, but rather urged upon me that the actions by the corporate Plaintiffs be stayed pending the appointment of counsel authorized to practice law in the Province of Alberta pursuant to the Legal Profession Act.

[69] Counsel also submitted that a deadline should be imposed for the corporate Plaintiffs to appoint counsel.

[70] While I accept that the actions by the corporate Plaintiffs must be stayed pending the appointment of counsel. I do not accept that any deadline should be imposed on the corporate Plaintiffs to do so. Needless to say, the corporate Plaintiffs are subject, like all litigants, to Part 24 of the Alberta Rules of Court, and in particular. Rules 244 and 244.1.

Part VI. Conclusions:

1. McLennan Action:

(a) With the exception of paragraph 8, the claims of Rahall are struck out on the basis that Rahall is an undischarged bankrupt and prohibited by s. 71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act from advancing the claims.

(b) The claims by the corporate plaintiffs are stayed pending the appointment of counsel who is a member of the Law Society of Alberta.

2. The Law Society Action:

(a) The claim of Rahall is struck out on the basis that Rahall is an undischarged bankrupt and prohibited by s. 71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act from advancing the claims.

(b) The claims by the corporate plaintiffs are stayed pending the appointment of counsel who is a member of the Law Society of Alberta.

Part VII. Costs:

These were appeals from an order to vacate the sale of a seized immovable. After obtaining judgment in the Federal Court against Les systèmes de drainage modernes Inc., Hancor Inc. and United Extrusions Ltd. obtained a writ of fieri facias. On the instructions of the sheriff of the District of Beauharnois (Forest), bailiff Trudel seized the immovable. After the seizure, SDM lodged a proposal with its creditors and appointed a trustee. The creditors accepted the proposal, which was approved by the Superior Court of Quebec. The Trustee served a "notice of stay of proceedings" pursuant to Bankruptcy Act , section 69 on the Registry and bailiff Trudel. On the sheriff's instructions another bailiff, de Repentigny, sold the immovable in a judicial sale. The Motions Judge relied on Federal Court Act, subsection 55(5) and Federal Court Rules, Rule 360 in concluding that although the writ was directed to the sheriff, he asked bailiffs to act for him thus usurping a power of delegation which is conferred on sheriffs by Quebec law, but which they do not possess when acting as officers of the Federal Court under the Federal Court Rules. Federal Court Act, subsection 55(5) provides that where a sheriff is unable or unwilling to act, the process of the Court shall be directed to a deputy sheriff. Federal Court Rules, paragraph 360(1)(b) provides that where the sheriff or marshal in Quebec is unable or unwilling to act, any process may be issued to a bailiff duly authorized to act as such for the purposes of the Code of Civil Procedure.
The issues were: (1) whether the seizure and judicial sale of the immovable were carried out by a person with the authority to do so under the Federal Court Act and Federal Court Rules; (2) where an immovable is the subject of a proposal after seizure, must a judicial sale thereof to a purchaser in good faith be vacated?
Held, the appeal should be allowed.
(1) The Motions Judge erred in concluding that the sheriff lacked the power to act through bailiffs. "Provincial" sheriffs who act as sheriffs of the Federal Court may, unless otherwise provided by the Rules, execute writs of execution in the same manner as the writs they execute in performing their usual duties. The writ was directed to the sheriff of the District of Beauharnois. He executed the writ in the same manner as he executes any writ directed to him, by asking a bailiff to act for him. That constituted both execution of the writ by the sheriff to whom it was directed within the meaning of subsection 55(4) of the Act (requiring a sheriff to execute the process of the Court that is directed to him), and execution in the manner permitted by subsection 56(3), i.e., in the same manner as similar writs are required to be executed by the law of Quebec.

The Motions Judge could not rely on subsection 55(5) and Rule 360 to find that the sheriff lacked the power to act in the circumstances since those provisions concern cases in which the writ cannot be directed to a sheriff or where the sheriff is unwilling to act, which was not the case herein. Once subsection 55(4) applies, subsection 55(5) and Rule 360 no longer apply.
The purpose of Federal Court Act, subsections 13(2) and 56(3) and Rule 5 is to ensure that federal and provincial schemes of execution are complementary and fill any possible gaps by resorting, where necessary, to the provincial schemes. The Court must adopt the interpretation that best facilitates the integration of the two schemes. Reasons of administrative convenience as much as of certainty in civil rights matters have led the federal authorities to rely for all practical purposes on provincial practices.
There was no implied delegation of power. According to subsection 13(2), the provincial sheriff is a sheriff of the Court. According to the Sheriffs' Act, section 2, the bailiff acts for the sheriff and not in his place. The seizure was made by bailiff Trudel in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. The sale was carried out by bailiff de Repentigny in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. In both cases, the power exercised was that of the sheriff even though it was exercised by a bailiff.
(2) (a) Neither the sheriff nor the purchasers were told before the sale of the existence of a proposal. Although notice of stay had been served on the seizing bailiff Trudel, the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure provides that any notice concerning execution of a writ must be sent to the sheriff himself. Furthermore, bailiff Trudel was authorized to act for the sheriff only in respect of the seizure. Once the seizure was completed, he ceased to be a sheriff's officer. He was not a sheriff's officer for the purposes of the judicial sale.
(b) Once a sheriff's sale has taken place, it is only exceptionally and on very limited grounds that it can be set aside. This was not an exceptional case. The seizure and the judgment pursuant to which it was made were valid. The immovable sold by judicial authority belonged to the judgment debtor. The purchaser acted in good faith, the sheriff's conduct was beyond reproach and the alleged irregularity existed long before the date fixed for the sale and was due solely to the misunderstanding that arose between the judgment creditor, the secured creditor, the judgment debtor and the trustee.
(c) Bankruptcy Act, subsection 69(1) provides that on the filing of a proposal, no creditor shall continue execution for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the proposal has been refused. Subsection 69(1) applies to both a proposal and a bankruptcy. Section 73, which applies only to bankruptcy, moderates substantially the scope of the stay under subsection 69(1). If in spite of the prohibition imposed by subsection 69(1), a creditor nevertheless proceeds to execute the judgment and if the officiating sheriff has not at the time of the sale received a certified true copy of the assignment, the judicial sale will be valid, the purchaser in good faith will retain title and the sheriff may only, to the detriment of the judgment creditor, deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee. Subsection 66(1) provides that "All the provisions of this Act in so far as they are applicable, apply with such modifications as the circumstances require to proposals". In order to avoid inconsistencies concerning when a purchaser's title would be valid, subsection 66(1) should be given a more liberal interpretation than that proposed in the past. It is possible to adapt section 73 to proposals. The filing of a proposal, even one accepted by the creditors and approved by the Court, does not strip a purchaser in good faith of title in an immovable purchased in a judicial sale if nobody notified the sheriff of the proposal before the sale by sending him a certified true copy thereof. Such notice could, as in the case of bankruptcy, have been sent to the sheriff by the debtor personally, by one of the creditors or by the trustee.

The following is the English version of the reasons for judgment rendered by Décary J.A.: What, according to the Federal Court Act [R.S.C., 1985, c. F-7] and Federal Court Rules [C.R.C., c. 663], are the powers of a sheriff appointed by the Quebec authorities when seizing and selling an immovable by judicial authority in his or her capacity as sheriff of the Federal Court? Where an immovable is the subject of a proposal after being seized, must a judicial sale thereof be vacated to the detriment of a purchaser in good faith even though no notice of stay appears to have been served on the sheriff before the sale? These are the basic questions raised by these two appeals from the decision of a motions judge reported at reflex, (1993), 56 F.T.R. 82.
Background
On the strength of a favourable judgment of the Federal Court (the Court) in a patent case against Les systèmes de drainage modernes Inc. (SDM), Hancor Inc. and United Extrusions Ltd. (Hancor) obtained a writ of fieri facias (the writ) from the Court and seized an immovable belonging to SDM.
After the seizure, SDM lodged a proposal with the trustee Caron Bélanger Ernst & Young Inc. (the trustee) and the said proposal was accepted by the creditors, including the judgment creditor Hancor and the secured creditors Laurentian Bank of Canada and Laurentian Trust of Canada (Laurentian), and approved by the Superior Court of Quebec.
Due to a host of errors and misunderstandings that are outside the scope of the case before the Court,[1] the immovable under seizure was subsequently sold by the sheriff Gilbert Forest (the sheriff) in a judicial sale and awarded to purchasers, namely 118353 Canada Ltd. and 167899 Canada Inc./Ltd. (purchasers), whose good faith was not challenged in this Court.

Essentially on the basis that the judicial sale had been conducted in a manner contrary to the Bankruptcy Act[2] as it read prior to the 1992 amendments[3] and in contravention of the essential conditions and formalities prescribed by the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure [R.S.Q. 1977, c. C-25], three motions to vacate the sheriff's sale were filed, one by SDM and the trustee, a second by Hancor and a third by Laurentian. The Motions Judge allowed the three motions, not on the grounds alleged therein, which he dismissed, but on the ground, raised for the first time at the hearing, that the method chosen by the sheriff to carry out the seizure and sale, which is recognized under Quebec law, is not authorized by the Federal Court Act[4] and Federal Court Rules. The sheriff and the purchasers each appealed the decision and the two appeals were joined for the purposes of hearing and judgment.

The argument in this Court was limited to the two questions I asked at the outset of these reasons and to questions incidental thereto.

Question 1: Were the seizure and judicial sale of the immovable carried out by a person with the authority to do so under the Federal Court Act and Federal Court Rules?

The facts relevant to this part of the case are not in dispute. On October 10, 1991, at Hancor's request, a writ of fieri facias was issued by the Court in Toronto to the "Sheriff of the District of Beauharnois". On November 7, 1991 Hancor's Montréal counsel sent a copy of the writ to his usual bailiffs, Villeneuve et associés, to have them seize the immovable. On November 11, 1991 the bailiff Sylvain Trudel, a member of Villeneuve et associés, visited the sheriff of the district of Beauharnois, Gilbert Forest, and gave him the writ. The sheriff then instructed the bailiff Trudel to seize the immovable, writing the following words on the back of the writ:

[translation] Valleyfield, November 11, 1991
Instructions to bailiff Sylvain Trudel
To seize and sell
(signed) Gilbert Forest, Sheriff
[N.B.: the words "and sell" on this standard form were crossed out by hand.]

On November 14, 1991 the bailiff Trudel seized the immovable.

On January 11, 1992 the sheriff inserted a notice of public sale in the Gazette officielle du Québec. On January 27, 1992 he sent the said notice to the Vaudreuil registry office. On February 2, 1992 he inserted the notice in a local newspaper.

On March 10, 1992 the sheriff instructed another bailiff, Jacques de Repentigny, to sell the immovable in a judicial sale, which he did that very day. After the sale, the bailiff gave the sheriff the minutes of the sale, his report and the cheque issued by the purchasers. On March 30, 1992 the sheriff completed his own report, in which he certified that he had seized the immovable and that on March 10, 1992 he had offered it for sale by auction and awarded it to the two purchasers jointly and severally.

According to the evidence, this procedure (with the probable exception of the delay in preparing the sheriff's report) is that ordinarily followed by counsel, bailiffs and the sheriff in the district of Beauharnois and is in all ways consistent with the requirements of Quebec law.

The trustee and Laurentian argued before the Motions Judge that the said procedure was contrary to the requirements of the Federal Court Act ("the Act" in this first part) and Federal Court Rules (the Rules). The Motions Judge agreed with them.

The Motions Judge relied basically on subsection 55(5)[5] of the Act and Rule 360[6] [as enacted by SOR/79-58 , s. 2] in concluding that although the writ had been directed to the sheriff of the district of Beauharnois, the said sheriff, though there was no evidence that he was unwilling to act, instead decided to instruct the bailiff Trudel to seize the immovable and the bailiff de Repentigny to sell it in a judicial sale. In asking a bailiff to act for him, the sheriff is alleged to have usurped a power of delegation which is conferred on sheriffs by Quebec law but which they do not possess when acting as officers of the Federal Court under the Rules of this Court. Thus, the seizure and judicial sale are alleged to have been carried out by a bailiff to whom the writ was not directed and who was not authorized under federal law to carry out a seizure and judicial sale.

In my opinion, the Motions Judge was on the wrong track in his interpretation of the facts, the applicable provisions and the intent underlying those provisions.

It can be seen from a joint reading of subsections 13(1) and (2) of the Act[7] that if no sheriff of the Federal Court has been appointed by the Governor in Council for the district of Beauharnois"which is the case"the sheriff appointed by the provincial authorities in the said district becomes ex officio the sheriff of the Court.[8] Thus, in the case at bar, the responsibilities of a sheriff of the Court were conferred on the sheriff Forest in addition to those already incumbent on him under provincial law.

One of the responsibilities he inherited in his capacity as sheriff of the Court is that, provided for in subsection 55(4),[9] of executing the process of the Court that is directed to him.

According to subsection 56(3),[10] unless otherwise provided by the Rules, the sheriff is to execute all writs of execution "as nearly as possible in the same manner as similar writs or process, issued out of the superior courts of the province in which the property to be seized is situated, are, by the law of that province, required to be executed."

Article 660 of Quebec Code of Civil Procedure provides that a writ of seizure of immovables "is executed by the sheriff himself or by one of his officers". Furthermore, section 2 of the Sheriffs' Act[11] confers on every sheriff "the selection of the bailiffs to be employed by and to act for him in the several districts of Québec," and section 1 of the Bailiffs Act[12] provides that a bailiff is an officer "empowered to serve written proceedings issuing out of any court, carry out judicial decisions that are executory and perform any other duty devolving upon him by law."

It unquestionably follows that "provincial" sheriffs who act as sheriffs of the Federal Court may, unless otherwise provided by the Rules of this Court, execute writs of execution in the same manner as the writs they execute in performing their usual duties.

It has been established in the instant case that the writ was directed to the sheriff of the district of Beauharnois. It was adduced in evidence that the sheriff executed the writ in the same manner as he executes any writ directed to him, that is, by asking a bailiff to act for him. In my view, that constitutes both execution of the writ by the sheriff to whom it was directed within the meaning of subsection 55(4) of the Act and execution in the manner permitted by subsection 56(3), that is, in the same manner as similar writs are required to be executed by the law of Quebec. Thus, the Motions Judge committed his first error in concluding that the sheriff lacked the power to act through bailiffs. That error led to a second, which we will now discuss.

Once subsection 55(4) comes into play, subsection 55(5) and its complement, Rule 360, are no longer applicable. Those two provisions concern cases in which the writ cannot be directed to a sheriff or where the sheriff is unwilling to act. Since that is not the case here, the Motions Judge could not rely on subsection 55(5) and Rule 360 to find that the sheriff lacked the power to act in the circumstances.

If there were any doubt, and in my view there is none, it would still be necessary to interpret the word "execute" in subsection 55(4) in a manner that reflects the acknowledged intention of the federal authorities. The clear purpose of subsections 13(2) and 56(3) of the Act and Rule 5[13] is to ensure that the federal and provincial schemes of execution are complementary and to fill any possible gaps by resorting where necessary to the provincial schemes. These provisions are all invitations to the Court to refrain from inflexibility and adopt the interpretation that best facilitates the integration of the two schemes.

The reasons for this are easy to explain. The Federal Court is in a way a court of exception that was grafted onto the existing network of superior courts. Its judgments have significant civil implications and it is essential, if they are to be understandable to litigants and if these implications are to be at all uniform, for execution procedures to be as similar as possible to those of the superior courts. This is all the more essential in that the Court as a general rule uses officers of the court appointed, and the seizure and judicial sale machinery established by, provincial authorities. Thus, reasons of administrative convenience as much as of certainty in civil rights matters have led the federal authorities to rely for all practical purposes on provincial practices.

The arguments revolved, wrongly in my view, around the concept of implied delegation of power. There was strictly speaking no such delegation in the case at bar. According to subsection 13(2) of the Act, the provincial sheriff is a sheriff of the Court. According to the very words of section 2 of the Sheriffs' Act, the bailiff acts for the sheriff and not in his or her place. The seizure was made by the bailiff Trudel in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. The sale was carried out by the bailiff de Repentigny in his capacity as an officer of the sheriff. In both cases, the power exercised was that of the sheriff even though it was exercised by the bailiff.

Finally, the solution adopted by the Motions Judge, which was proposed by the respondents, is impracticable. It places obligations"those of personally seizing everything and selling everything in a judicial sale"on Quebec sheriffs, the very persons to whom subsection 13(2) of the Act entrusts the task of executing such writs, obligations that they do not perform in the course of their everyday duties. At the same time, it places constraints on the machinery established by provincial authorities, which the federal authorities are employing, that the provincial authorities cannot be assumed to have intended to apply thereto. I cannot adopt an interpretation that might paralyze the system. Thus, I consider the following comments by Monnin J.A., which Dickson J. (as he then was) adopted in Motor Transport Board of Manitoba v. Purolator Courier Ltd. ,[14] to be relevant even though made in a different context:

I must assume that this federal legislation which was purely a delegation of federal powers to the various provincial transport boards, expects these boards to operate in their usual manner and no more. If such were not the case, it would lead to ridiculous situations and I am not prepared to find that Parliament of necessity desired ridiculous situations.

I accordingly conclude that in the case at bar the provincial law and federal law are complementary rather than inconsistent and that the Motions Judge erred in holding that a judicial sale carried out by the sheriff in conformity with the requirements of Quebec law and federal law was invalid.

This argument of the respondents was accordingly unfounded.

Question 2: Where an immovable is the subject of a proposal after being seized, must a judicial sale thereof to a purchaser in good faith be vacated?

The respondents relied on both the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure and the Bankruptcy Act ("the Act" in this second part). They submitted, in short, that the sheriff had been informed of the settlement in progress or of the settlement between the parties, that the parties had reached an agreement and the debt had been extinguished at the time of the judicial sale and that, however that may be, the filing of a proposal resulted automatically in a stay of the execution proceedings, and they argued that these were all grounds for vacating the sheriff's sale.

Les intimés se fondent à la fois sur le Code de procédure civile du Québec et sur la Loi sur la faillite ("la Loi" dans cette deuxième partie). Ils soutiennent grosso modo que le shérif avait été informé du règlement en cours ou du règlement intervenu entre les parties, qu'il y avait entente entre les parties et extinction de la dette au moment de la vente en justice, et que, quoi qu'il en soit, le dépôt d'une proposition concordataire amenait d'office l'arrêt des procédures d'exécution, autant de motifs, selon eux, d'annulation du décret.The seizure was made on November 11, 1991 by the sheriff Forest acting through the bailiff Trudel. On December 3, 1991 Laurentian registered at the Vaudreuil registry office [translation] "a notice of default and declaration of payment due which have the effect of rendering all securities created under the deed of trust enforceable" in respect of the immovable under seizure. On December 4, 1991 Laurentian filed in the Registry of this Court in Montréal a "motion for a stay of execution by writ of fieri facias" and an "opposition to seizure in execution", which were to be presented on December 9, 1991.

On December 6, 1991 SDM made a proposal to its creditors under Part III of the Bankruptcy Act and appointed Caron et associés trustee therefor. That same day, the trustee served a "notice of stay of proceedings" pursuant to section 69 of the Bankruptcy Act on counsel for SDM, the Registry of the Federal Court and the bailiff Trudel.

On December 9, 1991 Laurentian withdrew its motion to stay and opposition in view of the filing of SDM's proposal.

On January 20, 1992 SDM filed an amended proposal, which was duly accepted by the creditors that same day on the condition, inter alia, that SDM and Hancor enter into an agreement and that Hancor [translation] "release all seizures of SDM's assets". Hancor and Laurentian were represented at that meeting.

As agreed on January 20, 1992, Hancor and SDM discharged each other on February 26, 1992 in respect of all past, present or future claims resulting from the events related in the record of the Court and Hancor released all its seizures of SDM's assets. On February 28, 1992 the Superior Court of the district of Beauharnois approved the amended proposal of January 20, 1992.

Then, on March 10, 1992 the sheriff sold the immovable in a judicial sale.

(a) Knowledge of the agreement by the sheriff

It is clear from the evidence, and the finding of fact by the Motions Judge in this respect is unassailable, that neither the sheriff nor the purchasers were told before the sale of the existence of a proposal, that a notice to stay was sent to them or even that an agreement signed by all the parties had been definitely concluded ending the matter.[15]

It can of course be seen from the evidence that the corporation's president, Mr. Kohen, had contacted the sheriff's office on February 3, 1992 to complain about the notice of sale; however, Mr. Kohen did not mention the existence of a proposal but merely asked that the sale be halted on the ground that [translation] "everything had been settled". The sheriff's deputy with whom he spoke simply said that she [translation] "had nothing in the file indicating that it was settled" and asked him to [translation] "contact his lawyers to have them send us a release, or else the sale would take place".

Similarly, one of Hancor's counsel testified that he too had telephoned Ms. Veillette in early February 1992 to inform her of the proposal, but Ms. Veillette denied taking part in any conversation whatsoever with counsel concerned. The finding by the Motions Judge that the sheriff had not been informed of the existence of a proposal suggests that the Judge did not accept counsel's testimony.

In view of the evidence, which I must say is overwhelming, that the trustee and the counsel for SDM, Hancor and Laurentian quite simply, due to a misunderstanding, failed to tell the sheriff what was going on and in particular to serve any document whatsoever on him, the respondents fell back in desperation on the fact that the notice of stay of December 6, 1991 had been served on the seizing bailiff Trudel.

If, they submitted at the hearing, the Court were to conclude (which it did in the first part) that the bailiff Trudel had seized the immovable in his capacity as a sheriff's officer, it would follow that the service on that officer of the notice of stay on December 6, 1991 was equivalent to service on the sheriff himself.

Digitized by Google

I do not find this argument convincing. It is the sheriff who is responsible for executing the writ and the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure provides that any notice concerning its execution must be sent to the sheriff himself. A party may not confer on a bailiff a mandate to represent the sheriff that only the sheriff himself may confer. Furthermore, in the case at bar the bailiff Trudel had been authorized by the sheriff to act for him only in respect of the seizure (moreover, Hancor's counsel had asked the bailiff only to seize the immovable). Once the seizure had been completed, he ceased to be a sheriff's officer. At any rate, he was definitely not a sheriff's officer for the purposes of the judicial sale.

Furthermore, that is what Hancor, SDM and the trustee themselves understood to be the case. It was to the office of the sheriff that the president of SDM complained by fax and telephone on February 3, 1992. It was from the sheriff's office that Hancor's counsel received the notice of sale and it was that office that he claims to have telephoned. Another of Hancor's counsel attributes the publication of the notice to [translation] "a clerical error by the sheriff". SDM's Montréal counsel was also aware of this, since the draft release he prepared on January 24, 1992 contained a notice to the sheriff of Beauharnois.[16]

The trustee was also aware of this since, even though it had served the notice of stay on the bailiff Trudel, it can be seen from the testimony of its administrator, Ms. Vincent, that the notice of stay had intentionally not been given to the sheriff for two reasons: the first was that the proposal did not confer possession of the seized assets on the trustee, which was merely an intermediary between SDM and its creditors, and the second was that [translation] "[Hancor's] counsel had already been told to halt the proceedings and it had in fact been agreed that [counsel concerned] would terminate those proceedings".

In short, nobody ever thought that the notice of stay had been served on the sheriff and that the sale had accordingly been suspended. On the contrary, it can be seen without a shadow of a doubt from the evidence that everyone was aware that the sheriff was preparing to hold the sale and that it was he who had to be contacted to prevent it. No such action was taken and the sheriff was never told.

(b) The agreement between the parties and vacating of the sale

The Supreme Court of Canada recently noted that:[17]

. . . while it remains possible, it is only exceptionally that the vacating of sales at law will be permitted and then, only on limited and enumerated grounds. Those exceptions are found in arts. 698 and 699 C.C.P.

This rule suffers few exceptions. A sale based upon a judgment or a seizure which is null may be vacated . . . . Similarly, a sale made super non domino, that is, of property which does not belong to the debtor but to a third party, may be vacated . . . .

In summary, then, once a sheriff's sale has taken place, it is only exceptionally and on very limited grounds that it can be set aside.

A comparison of the grounds for opposition, annulment and vacation in respect of seizures in execution of immovable property is especially revealing of the National Assembly's intention: there are more grounds for annulling a seizure than there are for vacating a sale. Moreover, the further one gets from the seizure and the closer to the sale, the fewer the possibilities of stopping the process and the smaller the number of persons who may do so.

Thus, a judgment debtor and a third party with a sufficient interest may oppose and ask for the annulment of the seizure of an immovable on the following grounds:[18]

1. on the ground of an irregularity in the seizure, which causes him a serious prejudice . . . ;
2. on the ground of the property being exempt from seizure;
3. on the ground of the extinction of the debt;
4. on any other ground of a nature to affect the judgment sought to be executed.

However, and in my view this is a decisive indication of the National Assembly's intention, such an opposition must be served at least ten days before the date fixed for the sale or else it cannot stop the sale "except upon the order of the prothonotary . . . for sufficient cause."[19]

A sheriff's sale may be vacated at the instance of any interested person:[20]

698. . . .

(1) If, with the knowledge of the purchaser, fraud was employed to keep persons from bidding;

(2) If the essential conditions and formalities prescribed for the sale have not been observed; but the seizing creditor cannot vacate the sale for any irregularity attributable to himself or his attorney.

Thus, where the grounds for annulment are known prior to the sale and are unrelated to the sale as such, the lateness of the opposing parties may be fatal to them: if they fail to come forward at least ten days before the sale they are taking a great risk; if they come forward after the sale, it is generally too late. Furthermore L'Heureux-Dubé J. stated the following in Garcia:[21]

Digitized by Google

The requirement that the party who opposes a sale must do so before the sale takes place is very well established in Quebec . . .

She also made an impressive inventory of judgments in which opposing parties had lost their rights by failing to act and repeated the following comment by Taschereau J. in McGregor v. Canada Investment and Agency Co.:[22]

Assuming that he had rights to this property the appellant has lost them by the sheriff's sale. Vigilantibus non dormientibus subvenit lex.

The respondents asked this Court to follow, as a "trend in the case law", certain Quebec court judgments that allowed motions to vacate a sheriff's sale on the ground that there was an agreement between the parties at the time of the sale and that the debt was extinguished. The judgments to which they referred the Court are: Rossie c. Gosselin , [1979] C.S. 273; Blanchette c. Vertu, unreported, St-François Sup. Ct., No. 450-05-000562-815, January 13, 1983, SOQUIJ No. 83-217; Stebenne c. Banque de commerce canadienne impériale, [1982] C.S. 884; and Sauvegarde (La), Cie d'assurance sur la vie c. Tapis Laberge Inc., [1983] C.S. 835.

I note at the outset that none of them were mentioned by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Garcia as examples of exceptional cases on the vacating of sheriff's sales. I am not sure, therefore, that they constitute a "trend in the case law" with precedential value. However that may be, the circumstances of those cases are not really comparable to those of the case at bar.

In Rossie and Stebenne, the sale was suspended by the sheriff at the request of the parties, but the judgment creditor then unilaterally ordered the sheriff to continue the execution proceedings. In Blanchette, the purchaser knew about the agreement between the parties. In La Sauvegarde, the sheriff held the sale after announcing that it was being vacated.

In the case at bar, however, various avenues were open to the respondents well before the sale.

Thus, the parties to the seizure, namely Hancor and SDM, could under article 673 C.C.P. have consented to the suspension of the sale. While it is true that they wanted to do so, they did not do what was necessary to give effect to their consent. As the Motions Judge held, it is not enough that the parties consent, as the sheriff still has to be informed of their consent, and it can be seen from the evidence that he was not. It must not be forgotten that the sheriff is ordered by the Court to sell the immovable ("[t]he writ . . . orders the sheriff" (C.C.P., art. 660)). I cannot conceive that article 673 C.C.P. provides for the automatic suspension of a sale where the parties consent without the sheriff's knowledge. A party could probably ask for a sheriff's sale to be vacated on the ground that the sheriff wrongly refused to suspend the sale,[23] but I do not see how a sheriff could wrongly refuse to suspend if the parties have not asked him to do so. Article 673 C.C.P. does not require that the sheriff take the initiative to suspend a sale he or she is required to hold by Court order: quite the contrary.

Similarly, SDM and its creditors could on the strength of a duly approved proposal have opposed the sale ten days before it took place or, with leave, within a shorter period before it took place. They did not do so.

I make no secret of the fact that it would be tempting from the point of view of equity to give one more chance to parties each of whom believed in good faith that the sale would not take place because there was no longer any reason for it and who failed, as a result of confusion and blundering, to take the necessary action to stop it. But the law is there, and it seeks to protect a person, the purchaser, who also acted in good faith and, above and beyond the interests of the parties to the case, to preserve what Pigeon J., in Anjou (Town of) v. C.A.C. Realty Ltd. et al.,[24] called the "principle of the inviolability of judicial sales".

I do not think that this is an exceptional case of the type to which L'Heureux-Dubé J. alluded in Garcia. The seizure was valid. The judgment pursuant to which the seizure was made was valid. The immovable sold by judicial authority belonged to the judgment debtor. Furthermore, the purchaser acted in good faith, the sheriff's conduct was beyond reproach and the alleged irregularity, if it is an irregularity, existed long before the date fixed for the sale and was due solely to the misunderstanding that arose between the judgment creditor, the secured creditor, the judgment debtor and the trustee. I note that, where the judgment creditor is concerned, I could not have allowed its motion even if I had found that there was an irregularity, as article 698 C.C.P. bars it from availing itself of an irregularity attributable to itself.

This second argument must fail in so far as it is based on the provisions of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure. The respondents have only one other chance: the Bankruptcy Act.

(c) The stay of proceedings and section 69 of the Bankruptcy Act

Subsection 69(1) of the Bankruptcy Act reads as follows:

69. (1) On the filing of a proposal made by an insolvent person or on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the debtor or his property or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the trustee has been discharged or until the proposal has been refused, unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

The respondents argued that a proposal results in an automatic stay of proceedings, that this stay bars a judgment creditor from having property belonging to the debtor sold in a judicial sale and that any judicial sale of such property is null regardless of whether or not the sheriff has been told about the proposal.

The purchaser countered this by arguing that subsection 69(1) does not provide for an automatic stay or that at the very least the stay cannot be set up against a purchaser. It added on the basis of subsection 66(1)[25] of the Act that the protection granted by section 73[26] to purchasers in good faith in respect of a bankruptcy should also be granted to them in respect of a proposal.

Thus, the resolution of a case in which a judicial sale takes place in respect not of a bankruptcy but of a proposal depends on the interpretation of subsections 66(1), 69(1) and section 73 of the Act.

The substance of the debate is quite simple.

Subsection 69(1) applies, by its very wording, to both a proposal and a bankruptcy. The generality of the stay of proceedings under this subsection is established; the courts do not allow a creditor, by enforcing an individual remedy, to frustrate the Bankruptcy Act and for his or her own benefit unjustly reduce a debtor's estate by continuing execution proceedings without leave of the court.[27]

Section 73, which according to its wording applies only to bankruptcy, moderates substantially the scope of the stay under subsection 69(1). If, in spite of the prohibition imposed on him or her by subsection 69(1), a creditor nevertheless proceeds to execute the judgment and if the officiating sheriff has not at the time of the sale received a copy of the assignment certified by the trustee as a true copy thereof, the judicial sale will nevertheless be valid, the purchaser in good faith will retain his or her title and the sheriff may only, to the detriment of the judgment creditor, deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee.[28]

It was in my view quite unnecessary for certain courts to expatiate upon the absolute or relative nature of the stay of proceedings under subsection 69(1). The question is fine in theory but is in practice resolved less by quashing execution proceedings unlawfully undertaken by a creditor than by delivering the proceeds of those proceedings to the trustee or the general body of creditors.[29]

In view of section 73, it should be pointed out that: (1) it is not the fact of bankruptcy that bars the sheriff from holding the sale or, if the sale has been held, requires him or her to deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee, but the notice the sheriff receives; as long as the sheriff is not notified in the prescribed manner, he or she is not only under no obligation to suspend the sale but has no right to do so;[30] (2) it is not necessary that the trustee give the prescribed notice personally, as subsection 73(2) merely requires that a copy of the assignment certified by the trustee as a true copy thereof be sent to the sheriff without specifying who must send it; and (3) the only obligation imposed by subsections 73(2) and (3) is the requirement that the sheriff deliver the property to the trustee if he or she receives the notice before the sale or deliver the proceeds of the sale to the trustee if the notice is received after the sale.[31]

Since section 73, unlike section 69, refers only to "property of the bankrupt" and "an act of bankruptcy", it remains to be determined whether the scheme of subsection 66(1) protects the rights of a purchaser in good faith where, unknown to the sheriff, a proposal is filed before the sale in the same way as if there were a bankruptcy and assignment of the property to the trustee.

The wording of subsection 66(1) has rightly been criticized by Professor Albert Bohémier in Faillite et Insolvabilité.[32] Parliament should, in so far as is possible, indicate in a statute what provisions apply to a given situation. By leaving it up to the courts to decide what provisions of the Bankruptcy Act apply in the case not of a bankruptcy but of a proposal, Parliament opened the door to uncertainties inconsistent with the economic stability that the Bankruptcy Act is nevertheless intended to promote.

According to a common interpretation discussed by Professor Bohémier, it is necessary to start from the idea that the fundamental distinction between a bankruptcy and a proposal lies in the fact that the debtor loses possession of his or her property in a bankruptcy but generally retains it in the case of a proposal, and accordingly to interpret subsection 66(1) to mean that only those provisions of the Act that may apply regardless of whether or not the debtor loses possession are applicable mutatis mutandis to a proposal.

However, this approach causes a problem in the case of section 73. As Professor Bohémier noted:

[translation] There are cases involving a composition, which are clearly debatable, in which the courts have refused to apply sections 70 and 73 B.A. mutatis mutandis to a proposal other than a proposal-assignment expressly authorizing the trustee to act. To circumvent this problem, it is advisable to appoint an interim receiver (s. 47 B.A.) and to confer on him or her the right to take possession of the seized property.[33]

It is enough to note that a proposal leads directly to a bankruptcy in the event of a refusal by the creditors (subsection 57(1) of the Act), a default in performance (paragraph 42(1)(i) of the Act) or an annulment (subsection 63(4)) to wonder about the fate of a judicial sale that takes place before the refusal, default or annulment or is itself the cause of the default or annulment. Would the purchaser's title be valid in the case of a bankruptcy, invalid in the case of a proposal and valid in the case of a proposal that has become a bankruptcy? Such a result would to say the least be inconsistent.

It is in my view possible to avoid such inconsistency by giving subsection 66(1) an interpretation that is more liberal than the one proposed in the past and that corresponds more closely to the particularly general wording of that subsection.

The words used by Parliament are significant: "All the provisions", "in so far as they are applicable" and "with such modifications as the circumstances require". Parliament was aware of the theoretical and practical differences between the scheme of bankruptcy and that of proposals. Whether due to indolence or economy, it did not consider it necessary for the provisions it had passed in respect of bankruptcy to be repeated in or adapted to the case of proposals. At the same time, however, it was very careful to say"at least that is how I understand the words it used"that all the provisions of the Act apply to proposals in so far as they can be applied. In other words, it wanted the courts to find a way, above and beyond their obvious differences, to harmonize the rules applicable to bankruptcy with those applicable to proposals in so far as is possible. It did not say that this must be done at any price: there are cases in which it will not be possible. However, it did say that an attempt must be made to do so on a case-by-case basis and that those involved in this harmonization effort must not hesitate to use their imaginations. Parliament has invited the courts to participate in a process of intelligent harmonization and adaptation, not one of blindly literal application.

The adoption of this approach sheds considerable light on the situation. In section 69, Parliament was concerned solely with the interests of creditors and debtors. In section 73 (and in section 75,[34] which is irrelevant here), it was concerned primarily with the interests of purchasers in good faith, while at the same time conferring on creditors, debtors and trustees the right to block the seizure and sale. Parliament clearly intended to protect purchasers where, unknown to themselves and to the sheriff, they venture into the minefield of bankruptcy and insolvency.

I see nothing in this protection accorded to the purchaser in good faith that depends on whether the debtor or the trustee was in possession of the property sold. In other words, the debtor not being in possession of the property does not change the fact that the intention was to protect the purchaser's title. Indeed, it would be surprising if the judicial sale were valid where the debtor is not in possession of the property sold and invalid where he or she is in possession. It is true that, since this section was drafted in terms of bankruptcy, the obligations it imposes on the sheriff are expressed in a context in which it is a trustee who is in lawful possession of the bankrupt's property and the proceeds of the sale must be delivered to the trustee. However, that is the very challenge faced by the courts under subsection 66(1): is it possible to disregard these concepts proper to a bankruptcy and adapt them to a proposal?

I am all the more comfortable in believing that there is no objection in theory to applying section 73 to a proposal in that the Act itself, in subsection 63(2) on the annulment of a proposal, confirms the validity of a sale made in pursuance of the proposal.

Furthermore, this interest displayed by Parliament in purchasers in good faith is very much in line with its policy, as defined in subsection 72(1) of the Act, not to:

. . . abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act . . . .

It can be seen from my analysis in the preceding section that my decision to apply section 73 to proposals also ensures compliance with the principle of the inviolability of judicial sales that is so profoundly rooted in Quebec civil law.

In my view, it is entirely possible to adapt section 73 to proposals, as subsection 66(1) permits and encourages us to do. It is enough to conclude, by making "such modifications as the circumstances require", that the filing of a proposal, even one accepted by the creditors and approved by the court, does not strip a purchaser in good faith of his or her title in an immovable purchased in a judicial sale if nobody notified the sheriff of the proposal, composition or approval before the sale by sending him or her a certified true copy of the proposal, composition or judgment of approval. Such notice could, as in a case of bankruptcy, have been sent to the sheriff by the debtor personally, by one of the creditors or by the trustee.

To whom, therefore, must the sheriff deliver the proceeds of the judicial sale, as he or she is required to do by subsection 73(3)? Maybe to the trustee for distribution or delivery to whomsoever is entitled thereto, since subsection 60(2) of the Act provides that all moneys payable under the proposal are to be paid to the trustee and section 63 provides that the trustee is not functus where a proposal is annulled due to a default in performance. I do not need to answer this question for the purposes of the case at bar.

It is possible that upholding the validity of the judicial sale will result in annulment of the proposal due to the debtor's failure to respect its undertaking to obtain the release of the seizure. However, I do not have to concern myself with the possible ramifications of the Court's decision in this respect. Parliament laid down the consequences of a default in performance in section 63 and paragraph 42(1)(i)[35] and it does not matter whether this default results from an intentional act or from a simple mistake made in good faith. Parliament chose to respect the rights of a purchaser in good faith and the debtor, its creditors and the trustee have only themselves to blame if a mistake made by one or more of them made it impossible to perform the proposal.

This third argument must be rejected.

DISPOSITION

I would allow the appeals, reverse the decision of the Motions Judge and dismiss the three motions to vacate the sheriff's sale.

The appellant purchasers shall have their costs at trial and on appeal against each of the respondents in file No. A-1259-92; the appellant sheriff shall have his costs at trial and on appeal against each of the respondents in file No. A-1221-92.

Hugessen J.A.: I agree.

Chevalier D.J.: I agree.

[1] In this respect, I adopt the following comments of the Motions Judge (reflex, (1993), 56 F.T.R. 82, at p. 84):

There is no question that as the issue in this case has been resolved between the parties as part of a proposal, the forced sale proceeding on this real property should never have been completed. The confusion resulted from an obvious lack of communication between the parties, their counsel and the officers of the Court responsible for the sale. Many persons were to blame, but it is not for this court in hearing the applications at bar to distribute blame or identify those responsible, except to ascertain that the procedure for the court sale was followed and that the essential conditions and requirements for the sale were observed.

(2) The amount that the contributory is liable to contribute under subsection (1) shall be deemed an asset of the corporation and a debt payable to the trustee forthwith on the bankruptcy of the corporation.
R.S., 1985, c. B-3, s. 77;
1999, c. 31, s. 22(F).

Bank must notify trustee - Sec. 78
78. Where a banker has ascertained that a person having an account with the banker is an undischarged bankrupt, it is his duty forthwith to inform the trustee of the existence of the account, and thereafter the banker shall not make any payments out of the account, except under an order of the court or in accordance with instructions from the trustee, unless on the expiration of one month from the date of giving the information no instructions have been received from the trustee.
R.S., c. B-3, s. 56.

Inspection of property held in pledge - Sec. 79
79. Where property of a bankrupt is held as a pledge, hypothec, pawn or other security, the trustee may give notice in writing of the trustee's intention to inspect the property, and the person so notified is not thereafter entitled to realize the security until the person has given the trustee a reasonable opportunity of inspecting the property and of exercising the trustee's right of redemption.
R.S., 1985, c. B-3, s. 79;
1997, c. 12, s. 71.

Protection of trustee - Sec. 80
80. If the trustee has seized or disposed of property in the possession or on the premises of a bankrupt without notice of any claim in respect of the property and after the seizure or disposal it is made to appear that the property, at the date of the bankruptcy, was not the property of the bankrupt or was subject to an unregistered security or charge, the trustee is not personally liable for any loss or damage arising from the seizure or disposal sustained by any person claiming the property, interest in property or, in the Province of Quebec, a right in property, or for the costs of proceedings taken to establish a claim to that property, interest or right, unless the court is of opinion that the trustee has been negligent with respect to the trustee's duties in relation to the property.
R.S., 1985, c. B-3, s. 80;
1997, c. 12, s. 71;
2004, c. 25, s. 48.

Persons claiming property in possession of bankrupt - Sec. 81
81. (1) Where a person claims any property, or interest therein, in the possession of a bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy, he shall file with the trustee a proof of claim verified by affidavit giving the grounds on which the claim is based and sufficient particulars to enable the property to be identified.

How claim disposed of - Sec. 81(2)
(2) The trustee with whom a proof of claim is filed under subsection (1) shall within 15 days after the filing of the claim or within 15 days after the first meeting of creditors, whichever is the later, either admit the claim and deliver possession of the property to the claimant or send notice in the prescribed manner to the claimant that the claim is disputed, with the trustee's reasons for disputing it, and, unless the claimant appeals the trustee' decision to the court within 15 days after the sending of the notice of dispute, the claimant is deemed to have abandoned or relinquished all his or her right to or interest in the property to the trustee who may then sell or dispose of the property free of any right, title or interest of the claimant.

Onus on claimant - Sec. 81(3)
(3) The onus of establishing a claim to or in property under this section is on the claimant.

Require proof of claim - Sec. 81(4)
(4) The trustee may send notice in the prescribed manner to any person to prove his or her claim to or in property under this section, and, unless that person files with the trustee a proof of claim, in the prescribed form, within 15 days after the sending of the notice, the trustee may then, with the leave of the court, sell or dispose of the property free of any right, title or interest of that person.

No other proceeding to be instituted - Sec. 81(5)
(5) No proceedings shall be instituted to establish a claim to, or to recover any right or interest in, any property in the possession of a bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy, except as provided in this section.

Rights of others not extended - Sec. 81(6)
(6) Nothing in this section shall be construed as extending the rights of any person other than the trustee.

SAUNDERS, .I.

BACKGROUND TO PROCEEDINGS

The hearing conducted in Special Chambers on November 13, 1996 comprised two separate appeals from the decision of the Registrar in Bankruptcy dated June 18, 1996.

Barrington and Vokey Limited (B & V) was a mechanical subcontractor with its head office in Sydney. Evidently the business had prospered for many years. In 1994 the bankrupt decided to expand its business and moved its central office to Halifax. It started work on a number of large projects spread throughout Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Within a year the bankrupt ran out of money and voluntarily declared bankruptcy on March 17, 1995. On that date B & V had a number of construction jobs with JonelJim Concrete Construction (1994) Limited; Dineen Construction (Atlantic) Incorporated and Maxim Construction Inc.. B & V had delivered certain of its inventories to each job site for the purpose of installation in the various projects. They had not been installed or paid for as of the date of bankruptcy.

Each of the general contractors took the position that they were entitled to use the inventories in order to complete the projects. A general outline of the contracts and projects is contained at pp. 2 - 4 of the decision of the Registrar. Maxim Construction Inc. and the Guaranty Company of North America did not participate in the appeals, as the dispute with those parties was settled.

Two separate appeals were heard together. The appeal filed by JonelJim Concrete Construction (1994) Limited ("JonelJim") is dated October 28,1996. No objection was taken to the late filing of this appeal document. Mr. Clarke, solicitor for the Trustee of the Estate of B & V took the position that the appeal filed by JonelJim was within time.

The second Notice of Appeal filed by Dineen Construction (Atlantic) Incorporated ("Dineen") is dated August 6, 1996.

The decision of A. Martin Smith, Q.C., Registrar in Bankruptcy is dated June 18, 1996. In summary, he concluded as follows:

(1) He had jurisdiction to deal with the matters set out in the Amended Notice of Motion dated February 15, 1996;

(2) He dismissed the defence of setoff;

(3) The contracts in question were contracts for work and materials and the property did not pass to the general contractors as of the date of bankruptcy;

(4) Neither Dineen nor JonelJim had properly appealed the disallowance of the Proof of Claim by the Trustee and had therefore lost any rights to the assets which they might have had.

In a series of correspondence subsequent to his decision, the Registrar held that the dollar value of the claim would be equal to the invoice value of the goods and further held that JonelJim was obliged to pay a rental payment to the Estate in the amount of $1,926.00.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

Having considered the submissions of counsel and the authorities to which I was referred, I conclude that the arguments advanced by Mr. Clarke for the Trustee are sound, and that the appeals of Dineen and JonelJim ought to be dismissed, with costs payable to the Estate, here and below.

I will adopt and apply much of the same analysis employed by Mr. Clarke in his submission when addressing each of the issues raised by the appellants in their grounds of appeal.

I will deal first with the appeal by JonelJim and follow that with a consideration of the appeal by Dineen.

APPEAL BY JONELJIM

I will use the same paragraph numbers set out in the Notice of Motion dated October 28, 1996.

1. JonelJim states that the Registrar erred in finding that the Proof of Claim of JonelJim constituted a valid claim against the inventory without first hearing the appeal of the Disallowance filed by JonelJim dated June 16,1995.

As a preliminary observation I note that this ground of appeal is factually incorrect. The Registrar never found that the Proof of Claim of Jonefrn constituted a valid claim against the inventory.

In argument, Mr. Corsano, counsel for JonelJim argued that the appeal of the Disallowance which they filed in June, 1995 should have been heard prior to the motion of the Trustee in Bankruptcy. However, the record indicates that this matter was never raised as an objection before the Registrar. JonelJim had the opportunity to set their appeal of disallowance down for hearing and never did so. In any event, the same issues would have been determined. JonelJim had every right to argue, and did in fact argue, the issues relating to their appeal of the disallowance during the Trustee's application.

2. That the Registrar erred in finding that the Appeal of the Disallowance dated June 16, 1995 by JonelJim had not been perfected because it was not set down for hearing.

The Appeal of the Disallowance is governed by s. 81(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Any appeal by a creditor from the trustee's decision is to be made to the Bankruptcy Court in accordance with the General Rules.

Digitized by Google

Rule 97 directs that appeals from a disallowance of proof of claim shall be by motion "of the Court" (sic). Rules 12 through 14 set out the procedures to be followed on a motion to the Court. These provisions indicate that a motion must not only be filed but must be set for hearing on a date certain. Form 45 found in Houlden and Morawetz contains the form of Notice of Appeal. The Form requires that a date certain be inserted in the appeal document prior to being filed.
In argument during the appeal, while conceding that the forms designed by Houlden and Morawetz are customarily used in general practice, Mr. Corsano argued that they are not legislative enactments and that simply because the form prescribes a date for hearing is not determinative of the issue. He suggested it would be a "denial of natural justice to disallow JonelJim's right to be heard" and that at the very least JonelJim "should have been told of its obligation to set its claim down for hearing or be at risk of having it struck out".

With respect, there is no merit to either argument. JonelJim was not prejudiced. Its position was advanced and considered during the Trustee's application before the Registrar.
There is ample support for the determination made by the Registrar that a notice of appeal is not perfected unless it is filed in accordance with the Rules, with a date certain. Otherwise, a notice may simply be filed by a creditor and the matter never pursued or concluded. That is in fact what happened in this particular case. I am satisfied that if the Estate had not filed its application, the matter never would have come before the Court.
I accept the submission made by Mr. Clarke that the proper test on an appeal from a decision of the Registrar should be that applied by Justice K. Peter Richard in Re Dr. Siraj Husain B17658 (unreported, oral decision delivered January 6, 1994, released March 16, 1994). In that case, Richard, J. approved and applied the observations of Justice Anderson in Re Barukory Investments Ltd. (Ont.) (1979), 32 CBR 185 at p. 186:

> " . . . Save in extraordinary circumstances, I do not think the differing opinion of the judge, if he entertains one, should be substituted for that of the registrar. Putting it in a slightly different fashion, unless there is demonstrated on the part of the registrar some error in principle, some failure to take into account a proper factor or some taking into account of an improper factor, which demonstrably led to a wrong conclusion. I think that his disposition in the matter should stand."

I accept that as a proper statement of the law. There is no authority referred to me which is contrary to the decision of the Registrar. I find that his decision is a reasonable one taking into account the provisions of the Bankruptcy Rules and the forms annexed thereto.

3. That the Registrar erred by finding that the ownership in the inventory had not transferred to JonelJim under s. 7(c) of the JonelJim Purchase Order or s. 5.5(a) of the Canadian Standard Construction Subcontract.

The Registrar determined that the construction contract between the parties was a contract for labour and materials. It was not a contract for the sale of particular chattels. That finding was not the subject of challenge or comment on the appeal.
I am satisfied that the Registrar's determination is in accordance with the Registrar's previous decision involving Emco Supply in this same bankruptcy, and is also consistent with such Nova Scotia cases as McNeil v. Ja Ron Construction Company Limited and Loughran (1979), 35 N.S.R. (2d) 150 (NSSC,TD); and Newell Fisheries Limited v. Gough et al (1983), 22 BLR 179 (NSSC,TD). In such cases the title of goods to be used in the construction does not pass to the general contractor or the owner until they are incorporated into the project or affixed to the real estate. The mere fact that they are delivered to a construction site is insufficient to pass title.
In support of their respective claims and appeals each of JonelJim and Dineen rely upon Article 5.5 of the Canadian Standard Construction Subcontract (CSCS) which provides:

> If the contractor terminates the subcontract under the conditions set out in 5.1 and 5.4, he is entitled to:
> a) take possession of the subcontractor's products and utilize the subcontractor's construction machinery and equipment, the whole subject to the rights of third parties, and to finish the subcontract work by whatever method he may deem expedient but without undue delay or expense;
> b) withhold any further payments to the subcontractor until the subcontract work is finished;
> c) upon total performance of the subcontract work, charge the subcontractor the amount by which the full cost of finishing the subcontract work together with a reasonable allowance to cover the cost of any corrections required by the warranties for which the subcontractor is liable exceeds the unpaid balance of the subcontract price; or if such cost of finishing the work is less than the unpaid balance of the subcontract price, pay the subcontractor the difference; and

d) on expiry of such warranty period as may exist, charge the subcontractor the amount by which the cost of corrections under warranty exceeds the allowance provided for such corrections, or if the costs of such correction is less than the allowance, pay the subcontractor the difference.

JonelJim had no such provision in its contract with B & V. The $1.5 Million contract between B & V and JonelJim consists of a single, double-sided page (purchase order) wherein (see Term and Condition No. 6, for example) the risk of assets was clearly that of B & V. While it is true that Term and Condition No. 7(c) gave JonelJim an election to convert its contract with B& V to a CSCS, there is no evidence it ever did so. There is absolutely no merit to JonelJim's submission that the unsigned pages of the CSCS became or "ought to be incorporated" in the one page purchase order/contract it signed with B & V.

The Registrar was in a perfect position to decide this issue, and did so. I will not interfere.

4. JonelJim states that the Registrar erred in finding that the Trustee had ownership of the inventory.

In an affidavit sworn January 31, 1996 by Derek G. Cramm, CMA, CIP, licensed Trustee for the Trustee of the Estate, claim is made to ownership of the inventories. It was never contested before the Registrar that these inventories were not the assets of B & V as of the date of bankruptcy, March 17, 1995. The assets vest in the Estate pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

5. JonelJim submits that the Registrar erred in failing to find that JonelJim had a legitimate claim against the Trustee for services of Mr. Peach and Mr. Brown during the inventory count in April of 1995 for the sum of $1,926.00.

It is evident from the record that JonelJim and the Trustee, both directly and through their respective solicitors, negotiated a rental for a piece of equipment. JonelJim agreed to pay the Estate the sum of $1,926.00.

It is equally apparent that when the Estate tried to collect the agreed upon rental amount, JonelJim "created" an off-setting invoice. Mr. Cramm's affidavit (Clause 14) and evidence while testifying before the Registrar on February 28, 1996 (Dineen's Appeal Book, Tab 8) make it clear that the Estate never requested any services from those persons nor was any invoice issued by JonelJim or discussed between JonelJim and the Estate prior to its issuance on September 15, 1995. An affidavit sworn by Mr. Knickle which might have been used in an effort to buttress JonelJim's claim, was struck by the Registrar because Mr. Knickle did not make himself available for cross-examination. As a result, the only evidence before the Court was the evidence of Mr. Cramm, which was accepted. I am satisfied the Registrar made no error of law in that respect.

6 (a) JonelJim wishes to have removed from the provisions of the Order certain assets which JonelJim either purchased from the Trustee or purchased from third parties with valid property claims.

It was accepted at the time of the hearing that items which fall into this category were not being claimed by the Estate. It therefore does not constitute a ground of appeal. It was understood between the parties that these matters were excluded.

6 (b) JonelJim submits that it was an error for the Registrar not to require the Trustee to take possession of any items still in the possession of JonelJim which had not been incorporated into the project.

There was no evidence before the Registrar that there were any assets which met this description. As a result, it would not have been possible for the Registrar to have dealt with this issue.

6 (c) JonelJim submits that the Registrar erred in determining that the valuation of the inventory should be based on their full invoice value, rather than an auction value.

There is no rule or principle of law which dictates a single method of valuation. The Registrar chose invoice value as the appropriate method. It should be remembered that in this case Dineen seized the inventory and incorporated the inventory in the project. What the goods would have sold for on the open market is unknown. What is clear is that they were of considerable value on the date of bankruptcy to the General Contractor, who required them in order to complete the work. Consequently, it is a very different situation than, for example, the sale of scrap at auction.

I am satisfied that the Registrar's determination of inventory value was a reasonable one. There was no error in principle, no failure to take into account a proper factor and no application of improper considerations. The Registrar's conclusion is not demonstrably wrong. Applying the test in Re Dr. Siraj Husain, supra, his determination with respect to valuation of the inventory should not be disturbed.

6 (d) Setoff

While both JonelJim and Dineen raised the issue of setoff, Mr. Corsano, in argument, adopted and relied upon the detailed submissions made by Mr. Aske. Therefore I propose to deal with the analysis of this ground of appeal in the section relating to Dineen.

APPEAL BY DINEEN

Digitized by Google

Dineen's appeal was limited to three issues:

(1) Whether the Registrar had jurisdiction;
(2) Whether the affidavit of Alfred F. Frizzle sworn February 27, 1996 and filed on behalf of Dineen (Dineen's Appeal Book, Tab 4) was properly filed; and
(3) Whether Dineen has a right of setoff.

On appeal before me Dineen abandoned its jurisdictional challenge and the Trustee conceded that the affidavit deposed to by Mr. Frizzle was properly before the Court. Consequently the primary thrust of Dineen's appeal related to the issue of setoff. In its Notice of Motion filed August 6, 1996, Dineen seeks a variation of the Registrar's decision to recognize:

> " . . . that the Trustee's claim to the property of the Bankrupt at the Project Site is subject to Dineen's right to set-off the amount by which the cost to complete the work required by Barrington and Vokey's subcontract have exceeded the unpaid balance of the subcontract price."

Setoff

The thrust of Mr. Aske's argument is that pursuant to the provisions of Article 5.5 Dineen had the right to make use of B & V's inventory and that the Trustee cannot ignore the terms of a contract entered into in good faith by the bankrupt. This was a bona fide contract negotiated between the parties which established their rights and remedies when involved in this multimillion dollar project. When B & V walked off the site, Dineen was, according to Mr. Aske, "left high and dry". Article 5.5 is a customary provision in a standard contract designed to protect general contractors and provide the means to complete the project with the least interruption. Mr. Aske argues that on March 17, 1995 the Trustee assumed no higher a position and acquired no higher rights than B & V had on that date.

In his factum Mr. Aske frames the argument concisely and urges that the particular circumstances be kept in context.

> "Barrington and Vokey went bankrupt and abandoned its work. Dineen incurred substantial costs, in excess of Subcontract monies available, to complete their work. The Trustee is seeking payment for inventory supplied by Barrington and Vokey pursuant to its Subcontract. But both the Subcontract and the Bankruptcy and insolvency Act recognize that Dineen can set off its costs against payments to Barrington and Vokey, and the Trustee. To ignore this right of set-off would permit Barrington and Vokey to be paid more than it is owed under the terms of its Subcontract. We are aware of no provisions in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act which require such an unjust result." (Dineen's factum, p. 12)

Thus Dineen relies upon its contractual rights with the bankrupt in order to defeat or modify the Trustee's claim.

Despite the able submissions of Mr. Aske I cannot agree. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act recognizes two types of claims to property; secured claims or trust claims. Dineen was not a valid, secured creditor. There is no suggestion of trust in the record before me and neither appellant is suggesting that such a classification applies here.

In the result both Dineen and JonelJim are unsecured creditors. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act does not acknowledge the existence of a contractual right to seize the property of a bankrupt unless it is a valid, secured or trust claim. In this sense it is too simplistic to say that the Trustee stands in the shoes of a bankrupt. By virtue of the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act, a trustee in bankruptcy, representing the creditors of a bankrupt, is conferred certain specific powers which are in addition to any rights which the bankrupt itself had. Furthermore, a trustee in bankruptcy has conferred upon it certain powers with respect to fraudulent preferences which are not powers available to the bankrupt. (See for example Re Frechette (1982), 42 CBR 50). There, a shareholders' agreement which allowed a purchase of shares at a discount was null and void as being contrary to public policy. Although such a provision may be enforceable as between the shareholders, in the event of a bankruptcy the trustee had the right to set that provision aside either for public policy reasons or because it constituted a reviewable transaction under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

I accept that Articles 5.1 and 5.5 are contractual provisions negotiated and executed by the parties, entitling the contractor to take possession and use the "products" of the subcontractor should it choose to exercise that option. It permits the contractor to finish the project expeditiously in situations where (bankruptcy, for example) the subcontractor is unable to complete its work, thus triggering termination of the contract by the contractor pursuant to the application, in tandem, of Articles 5.1 and 5.5. but this contractual entitlement does not pass title in the inventory to the contractor. Neither does it work to defeat or modify the trustee's entitlement to the bankrupt's assets which vested in the trustee immediately on the date of bankruptcy.

On the date of this bankruptcy, March 17, 1995, all of the assets of B & V vested in the Trustee for the benefit of the general body of creditors by virtue of the operation of s. 67 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The Trustee became obligated and empowered to take possession of the property of the bankrupt under s. 16 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("the Act"), the intention being that all creditors would receive the distribution to which they were entitled.

Digitized by Google

As of the date of bankruptcy, Dineen had a cause of action against the Estate for losses sustained as a result of B & V's breach of contract. A stay of proceedings was in effect by virtue of s. 69.3 whereby Dineen was prohibited from exercising any remedy against B & V or its property unless a cessation of the stay were obtained. That option was open to it. Dineen made a conscious decision not to seek an exempting declaration pursuant to s. 69.4, or at least chose to seize the inventories and use them for its own purposes in completing this project.

The right or defence of setoff involves two competing claims in existence as of the date of bankruptcy. Setoff requires mutuality of parties and existence of mutual cross obligations. The rights of the parties are to be determined as of the date of bankruptcy. A right of setoff does not arise where one of the claims relates to an obligation arising after the date of bankruptcy or one entered into or incurred by the trustee in bankruptcy on behalf of the estate.

I think the following illustrations proffered by Mr. Clarke show that the thesis advanced by Dineen is untenable. For example:

a) A trustee in bankruptcy could sell assets of the estate to someone who is a creditor of the estate. That creditor could purchase the assets and take delivery of them but then refuse to pay for them, raising set off as the defence. Re Coburg Felt Company (1925) 5 CBR 622 (Ont) considered a similar case and held that the attempt to exercise a right of set off in such a situation would be "a fraud on the bankruptcy laws";

b) A disgruntled creditor could seize assets of the bankrupt before a trustee could take possession of them and could refuse to return them or pay for them based upon a defence of set off;

c) A trustee in bankruptcy could continue to operate the business of the bankrupt and could order goods from a supplier and then raise set off as a reason not to pay the supplier.

I believe these examples advanced on behalf of the Trustee support the view that a claim to setoff is limited to situations where both claims exist as at the date of bankruptcy and are rights as between the bankrupt and a third party.

The following extracts from Houlden and Morawetz also illustrate this same point:

a) A bankrupt's estate includes only the net amount of a debt owing to the bankrupt after proper allowance for the recognized common law right of set off (page 4-91);

b) The debts could arise from transactions of a different nature, provided they could be ascertained with certainty at the relevant date (page 4-92);

c) Mutual debts are debts due from either party to the other for liquidated sums or money demands which can be ascertained with certainty at the date of bankruptcy. Each party must have the right to enforce its claim at the date of bankruptcy, and if one party cannot do so, there is no right of legal set off (page 4-92);

d) In order for there to be a right of set off, the mutuality of debts must exist at the date of bankruptcy (page 4-92);

e) A right of set off not existing at the date of bankruptcy cannot be acquired afterwards (page 4-93);

f) If the bankrupt was indebted to a creditor prior to bankruptcy for goods supplied, and the same creditor became indebted to the trustee for work done after bankruptcy pursuant to a contract entered into before bankruptcy, there can be no set off as they are not mutual debts. (page 4-93);

g) Although equitable set off does not require symmetry of remedies or accounts, the creditor asserting a claim to equitable set off must at the date of bankruptcy have an entitlement to a remedy in its own right. (page 4-98).

Further support for the position taken by the Trustee may be found in s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act which provides:

> "The law of set off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt and also to all actions instituted by the trustee for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt in the same manner and to the same extent as if the bankrupt were a plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, except in so far as any claim for set off is affected by the provisions of the Act respecting frauds or fraudulent preferences."

Thus it is clear from the legislation that the law of setoff is retained to the extent to which it relates to actions instituted by the Trustee for the "recovery of debts due to the bankrupt". In this case, the Trustee is not attempting to collect an accounts receivable owing to the bankrupt as of the date of the bankruptcy. The Trustee is attempting to liquidate assets which had vested in the Estate on March 17, 1995.

Mr. Aske, for the appellant Dineen cites Telford v. Holt 1987 CanLII 18 (SCC), (1987), 41 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (S.C.C..) and Husky Oil Operations v. MNR 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), (1995), 128 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (S.C.C.) in support of his submissions. With respect, I do not think either case is helpful to the appellant.

In both cases the discussion of setoff was of a general nature and in a different context. In Telford, supra, there was no bankruptcy involved and no seizure by a creditor of assets of the bankrupt after bankruptcy.

In Husky Oil, supra, a bankruptcy was involved but there the Court was asked to consider whether the Workers' Compensation Act (Saskatchewan) had the right to create a setoff where to do so would be contrary to the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The Court (in a 5:4 decision) held that the provincial legislation was inapplicable in bankruptcy by reason of there being a conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. The Court was not asked to consider setoff in the context of this particular case. I note in particular, that Justice Gonthier, writing for the majority, introduced his discussion of the setoff component of the Saskatchewan legislation with these observations:

> "But the right to set-off is triggered - and thus the security interest created - by the Board when it decides to create a deemed debt and impose liability on the principal for the contractor's liability." (at p. 24)

On the facts of the case the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Board "decided to create a deemed debt" and impose liability on Husky Oil by serving its notice of assessment on Metal Fab, dated March 2, 1992 claiming that $208,850.00 was due and payable to the Board. The assessment predated the bankruptcy by 17 days as Metal Fab made its assignment in bankruptcy on March 19, 1992. I conclude that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Husky Oil, supra contemplates that both debts would be in existence as outstanding claims as of the date of bankruptcy. That is not what happened here. In the result I conclude that set off has no application in the present circumstances and that neither JonelJim nor Dineen had the right to take assets away from the Trustee in Bankruptcy without paying for them.

CONCLUSION

The appeals brought by JonelJim and Dineen are each dismissed, with costs payable to the Estate, here and below.

If counsel cannot agree on costs I will be pleased to hear them at their convenience.

Right of unpaid supplier to repossess goods - Sec. 81.1

81.1 (1) Subject to this section, if a person (in this section referred to as the "supplier") has sold to another person (in this section referred to as the "purchaser") goods for use in relation to the purchaser's business and delivered the goods to the purchaser or to the purchaser's agent or mandatary, and the purchaser has not fully paid for the goods, the supplier may have access to and repossess the goods at the supplier's own expense, and the purchaser, trustee or receiver, or the purchaser's agent or mandatary, as the case may be, shall release the goods, if

(a) the supplier presents a written demand for repossession to the purchaser, trustee or receiver, in the prescribed form and containing the details of the transaction, within a period of 15 days after the day on which the purchaser became bankrupt or became a person who is subject to a receivership;

(b) the goods were delivered within 30 days before the day on which the purchaser became bankrupt or became a person who is subject to a receivership;

(c) at the time when the demand referred to in paragraph (a) is presented, the goods

(i) are in the possession of the purchaser, trustee or receiver,

(ii) are identifiable as the goods delivered by the supplier and not fully paid for,

(iii) are in the same state as they were on delivery,

(iv) have not been resold at arms' length, and

(v) are not subject to any agreement for sale at arms' length; and

(d) the purchaser, trustee or receiver does not, forthwith after the demand referred to in paragraph (a) is presented, pay to the supplier the entire balance owing.

October 14, 1996. Endorsement.

[1] FARLEY J.: – This endorsement applies to the (i) Evenflo and (ii) Thomson et al applications. I am also advised that Timex, Teledyne and Sunbeam have withdrawn from the Thomson et al application.

[2] The functionality of s. 81.1 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended ("BIA") has been otherwise questioned; one wonders if it presents an illusory hope to suppliers.

[3] One as well wonders if the peculiar fact circumstances of the subject case would have been considered as a "mainstream" case by those drafting s. 81.1, as a "sidestream" case or as one which had not received much thought, if any.

[4] The way that s. 81.1 is set up appears to be consider that a supplier is to be dealing with a purchaser, trustee or receiver with respect to repossessing the subject goods. It does not appear to consider explicitly a situation in which the supplier has to deal with some other person with respect to this repossession.

[5] On September 6, 1996 Consumers was adjudged bankrupt and KPMG Inc. was appointed bankruptcy trustee. That same day Coopers& Lybrand Ltd. ("Coopers") was appointed as receiver and manager of Consumers pursuant to security held by various banks; it was a private receiver. The s. 81.1 rights of unpaid suppliers had been maintained through the period of the CCAA relief (July 29-September 6, 1996) by virtue of Houlden J.A.'s order of July 29, 1996. Thus the 30 day period stretched back to June 29, 1996 from July 29, 1996. The 30 day period is a moving date depending on the date on which notice is given on or after September 6, 1996 (i.e. if s. 81.1 notice were not given until September 16, 1996, then the goods subject to repossession would have been those sold and delivered in the period July 9-29, 1996).

[6] Tibbett & Britten Group Canada Inc. ("T&B") assert that the applicants' claims should fail for the following reasons:

> (a) the goods were not in the possession of the "purchaser, trustee or receiver" at the time the applicants demanded their return as required by s.81.1(1)(c)(i);

Digitized by Google

(b) on true construction of the scheme established by s. 81.1 as a whole, the term "possession" must mean actual physical possession for the other subsections to make sense and for there to be sufficient certainty for the entire system to be workable; and

(c) the applicants have not provided any evidence whatsoever to attempt to meet their onus under the remaining provisions of s. 81.1 to prove that the goods which they sold to Consumers are in T&B's warehouse and are properly identifiable and in the same state as when delivered.

It would seem to me that arguments (a) and (b) are clearly connected.

[7] Section 81.1 provides an exception to the general policy of the BIA (a pari passu sharing amongst unsecured creditors) by giving a right to reclaim property to certain unsecured creditors (suppliers) of a bankrupt which is not available to the general body of unsecured creditors. Thus the court is required to narrowly construe such an exception to the fundamental policy of the BIA; see Crabtree (Succession de) c. Barrette, (sub nom. Barrette v. Crabtree Estate) 1993 CanLII 127 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 1027; Langille v. Toronto Dominion Bank (1981), 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 35 (N.S. C.A.), affirmed 1982 CanLII 154 (SCC), (1982), 131 D.L.R. (3d) 571 (S.C.C.). I also agree that it is an established canon of statutory interpretation that when legislation confers a right or benefit on persons which they would not have had at common law, the conditions which the legislation prescribes for the acquisition of that right or benefit are mandatory: see John Goodison Thresher Co. v. McNab (1908), 19 O.L.R. 188 (C.A.), at p. 214, affirmed 1910 CanLII 10 (SCC), (1910), 44 S.C.R. 187; Czerwonka v. Paslawski (1989), 8 R.P.R. (2d) 73 (Sask. C.A.); Bennion, F. Statutory Interpretation, (Butterworths, London 2nd ed. 1992) at p. 32. Thus the applicants are required to prove that at the time their demands were presented, the goods were in the possession of the purchaser (Consumers), trustee or receiver: s. 81.1(1)(c)(i).

[8] However, the goods are in the physical possession of T&B, (not Consumers, the trustee or receiver) at the time of the demand. T&B is not the purchaser; it is not a trustee in bankruptcy; it is not a receiver within the meaning of s. 243(2) BIA as it does not possess "all or substantially all" of the inventory of Consumers, nor was it appointed as receiver. T&B came into physical possession of the goods pursuant to its contractual arrangements with Consumers. Most importantly it has held that possession adverse to Consumers under the CCAA order (see para 9 thereof) and it has physically excluded Coopers as receiver from taking the goods.

[9] Section 81.1 talks of the supplier not only selling the goods – but delivering them. If the supplier is successful under s. 81.1, then the purchaser, trustee or receiver is required to release the goods. See also the reasons expressed in Hawker Siddeley Canada Ltd. v. Sigurdson (1974), 19 C.B.R. (N.S.) 240 (B.C. C.A.). I think it telling that in addition to these elements of physical possession internal to s. 81.1, if one looks at s. 243(2), a section introduced in 1992 at the same time as s. 81.1., it talks of a receiver being defined as a person appointed to take "possession or control". It would appear that BIA uses broader terms such as "control" or "power" when Parliament wishes to extend beyond physical possession. See for example s. 163(1 "in his possession or power" or s. 17(1) "in his possession or power". One may find it interesting to check through the Insolvency Institute database for possible other examples. There would be a problem interpreting s. 243(2) and s. 81.1 otherwise in the case of a receiver caught under s. 243(2). Section 81.1(1)(c)(i) would be meaningless as a receiver pursuant to s. 243(2) is by definition in possession or control If possession for s. 81.1 included both possession and control, then s. 81.1(1)(c)(i) would be satisfied automatically.

[10] It should be recognized that City Fur Manufacturing Co. v. Fureenbond (Brokers) London Ltd., [1937] 1 All E.R. 799 (K.B.), was dealing with the notion of possession pursuant to another Act – namely the UK Sale of Goods Act 1893 and there at p. 802 Branson J. stated:

> Possession by an agent, possession by a warehouseman or mercantile agent, is a perfectly well known form of possession in the business world, and I can see no reason for confining the meaning of it to personal possession or actual possession of the person who has sold the goods.

However, in the subject case, there appears good reason for so confining it. I also note that it would appear that 30 day goods was a live issue right from the start of the CCAA proceedings - such that Houlden JA specifically preserved those rights (in suspension) during the period of the CCAA proceedings; however no one took advantage of the comeback clause to submit that T&B was gaining an advantage which was not otherwise previously noticed.

[11] Other persons claiming a priority (eg: Revenue Canada, Employment Standards) do not have possession. Whilst I have sympathy for the unpaid suppliers, it appears to me that on the facts of this case, they cannot show that the purchaser, trustee or receiver is in possession of the subject goods. The application falls on that basis. T&B had a legitimate possession of the goods adverse to Consumers, the trustees or the receiver even if one were to look at any deviation from actual physical possession.

[12] I would also note the other aspect of the applicants not having satisfied that the goods said to be 30 day goods are, in fact, same. In this regard see Re Stokes Building Supplies Ltd. reflex, (1994), 30 C.B.R (3d) 36(Nfld. T.D.),at p.37:

> Clearly, the onus is on the applicant, Window Land, to establish on the balance of probabilities that the goods are so identifiable. In considering this matter, I accept that identification under s. 81.1 need not be apparent on the face of the goods. In other words one need not have serial numbers or other distinctive stamps on the face of the goods, although that obviously would be sufficient. Identification can come from records such as invoices, purchase orders and from the evidence of representatives of suppliers and purchasers. To use an example if evidence established that Window Land had supplied Stokes goods only within the preceding thirty days that would be identification although the goods might not be stamped, marked or otherwise distinctive.

[13] Thus I would agree that if the applicants were shown to have supplied goods in the 30 day period and at the start of that period I was shown that there was a zero inventory of those goods, that would be sufficient identification. However once one gets beyond that one is into very boggy ground. Essentially what the applicants are relying on is the testing by the receiver Coopers – but it was acknowledged by Mr. Holmes of Coopers that he was operating from a logical but wrong premise. It was claimed by Mr. Johnston of T&B that T&B storage methodology in practice did not accord under the assumptions and logic of Coopers. It is unfortunate that neither Mr. Holmes nor Mr. Johnston had any direct involvement with the applicants "goods" in the period June 29-July 29, 1996. Their information is thus second hand. We are therefore left with the unresolved aspect of Johnston claiming that there was significant movement of goods within the warehouse which would not show up on the computer or be obvious from an inspection – eg. whether the boxes on the pallet (which pallet was tagged) had been used up and the pallet strength replenished from the overstock area. However it was apparently the view of personnel speaking to Coopers personnel that such movement was not significant. However, it appears that the computer system was designed to track numbers of goods rather than to track the specific goods – thus gets into a question of identifying what should be there rather than what is there and is a variation of the "book count" problems.

[14] Unfortunately, for the applicants' case, in addition it appears that a number of the invoices of the applicants show delivery to warehouses other than T&B Cambridge. As well many of the delivery slips are dated more than 30 days prior to delivery of demand kicking in. Further it would seem that there is a problem with linking invoices with specific goods said to be delivered to the warehouse. It would seem that this compounds the problem of proof – the onus of which is on the applicants. A difficulty is shown by example in the Evenflo situation where the demand kick in would only catch goods sold and delivered from July 6-July 29, 1996; however, Evenflo was not precise enough and has claimed for goods said to be sold and delivered in the June 29-July 5 period. See also the difficulty of Spencer's unprecise affidavit as to paras. 21-22 and the reference as well to Ex N (ie. p. 122). Spencer says she identified the goods but does not say how.

[15] It would not seem to me that the state of the goods was changed by their being removed from bulk shrink wrap. This would seem to be packing or packaging of the goods – and not a change to the goods themselves. They apparently would be sold in their intended state as sold by the supplier – ie: in their original form (including perhaps individual boxing). Certainly there has been no transformation of the goods (or incorporation into other goods).

[16] Acceptance of the goods as being 30 day goods by the Receiver in these circumstances would not be binding in these circumstances upon T&B. It would also seem to me that the applicants have not sufficiently overcome the hurdle of showing that they meet the requirements of s. 81.1(1)(c) and so they would not meet the onus, except where they have demonstrated that there was a zero inventory where the period began to run.

[17] Thus it would appear that on the basis of worst case against T&B that T&B had legitimate possession of the goods (adverse to Consumers (as purchaser), the trustee in bankruptcy or the receiver (that is, Consumers, trustee and receiver or their agents did not have physical possession for legitimate reasons) that the application fails as the applicants have not shown that they fit within the conditions of s. 81.1(1)(c)(i). In addition, it is an onus not met by the applicants in all but the situations where the period starts off with a zero inventory of the subject goods as to the question of the identity and matching of the 30 day goods as such.

[18] The applications are therefore dismissed. The applicants are to pay T&B $20,000 for their costs. (I understand that the applicants will sort out the amount to be borne by each amongst themselves in this joint and several liability for costs).

Application dismissed.

Where goods have been partly paid for - Sec. 81.1(2)

(2) Where, at the time when the demand referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is presented, the goods have been partly paid for, the supplier's right to repossess under subsection (1) shall be read as a right

(a) to repossess a portion of the goods proportional to the unpaid amount; or

(b) to repossess all of the goods on paying to the purchaser, trustee or receiver an amount equal to the partial payment previously made to the supplier.

(3) [Repealed, 1999, c. 31, s. 23]

If notice of intention or proposal was filed - Sec. 81.1(4)
(4) If a notice of intention under section 50.4 or a proposal was filed in respect of the purchaser after the delivery of the goods to the purchaser and before the purchaser became bankrupt or became a person who is subject to a receivership, the 30-day period referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is the 30-day period before the filing of the notice of intention or, if there was no notice of intention, the filing of the proposal.

Expiry of supplier's right - Sec. 81.1(5)
(5) A supplier's right to repossess goods under this section expires if not exercised within the 15-day period referred to in paragraph (1)(a), unless the period is extended before its expiry by the trustee or receiver, or by the court.

Ranks above other claims - Sec. 81.1(6)
(6) Notwithstanding any other federal or provincial Act or law, a supplier's right to repossess goods pursuant to this section ranks above every other claim or right against the purchaser in respect of those goods, other than the right of a bona fide subsequent purchaser of the goods for value without notice that the supplier had demanded repossession of the goods.

Application to court for directions - Sec. 81.1(7)
(7) The purchaser, trustee or receiver may apply to the court for directions in relation to any matter relating to this section, and the court shall give, in writing, such directions, if any, as it considers proper in the circumstances.

Supplier may appeal to court - Sec. 81.1(8)
(8) Where a supplier is aggrieved by any act, omission or decision of the purchaser, trustee or receiver, the supplier may apply to the court and the court may make such order as it considers proper in the circumstances.

Other rights saved - Sec. 81.1(9)
(9) Nothing in subsection (7) or (8) precludes a person from exercising any right that the person may have under subsection 34(1) or section 37.

No payment - Sec. 81.1(10)
(10) A supplier who repossesses goods pursuant to this section is not entitled to be paid for those goods.

Provincial rights saved - Sec. 81.1(11)
(11) Nothing in this section precludes a supplier from exercising any right that the supplier may have under the law of a province.

Definitions - Sec. 81.1(12)
(12) The following definitions apply in this section.

"person who is subject to a receivership"

Special right for farmers, fishermen and aquaculturists - Sec. 81.2
81.2 (1) Where

(a) a farmer has sold and delivered products of agriculture, a fisherman has sold and delivered products of the sea, lakes and rivers, or an aquaculturist has sold and delivered products of aquaculture, to another person (in this section referred to as the "purchaser") for use in relation to the purchaser's business,
(b) the products were delivered to the purchaser within the fifteen day period preceding
(i) the day on which the purchaser became bankrupt, or
(ii) the first day on which there was a receiver, within the meaning of subsection 243(2), in relation to the purchaser,
(c) as of the day referred to in subparagraph (b)(i) or (ii), the farmer, fisherman or aquaculturist has not been fully paid for the products, and
(d) the farmer, fisherman or aquaculturist files a proof of claim in the prescribed form in respect of the unpaid amount with the trustee or receiver, as the case may be, within thirty days after the day referred to in subparagraph (b)(i) or (ii), the claim of the farmer, fisherman or aquaculturist for the unpaid amount in respect of the products is secured by security on all the inventory of or held by the purchaser as of the day referred to in subparagraph (b)(i) or (ii), and the security ranks above every other claim, right, charge or security against that inventory, regardless of when that other claim, right, charge or security arose, except a supplier's right, under section 81.1, to repossess goods, despite any other federal or provincial Act or law; and if the trustee or receiver, as the case may be, takes possession or in any way disposes of inventory covered by the security, the trustee or receiver is liable for the claim of the farmer, fisherman or aquaculturist to the extent of the net amount realized on the disposition of that inventory, after deducting the cost of realization, and is subrogated in and to all rights of the farmer, fisherman or aquaculturist to the extent of the amounts paid to them by the trustee or receiver.

"products of the sea, lakes and rivers" includes fish of all kinds, marine and freshwater organic and inorganic life and any substances extracted or derived from any water, but does not include products of aquaculture.

Interpretation — products and by-products - Sec. 81.2(3)
(3) For the purposes of this section, each thing included in the following terms as defined in subsection (2), namely,

(a) "products of agriculture",
(b) "products of aquaculture", and
(c) "products of the sea, lakes and rivers", comprises that thing in any form or state and any part thereof and any product or by-product thereof or derived therefrom.

Section 81.1 applies - Sec. 81.2(4)
(4) For greater certainty, "goods" in section 81.1 includes products of agriculture, products of the sea, lakes and rivers, and products of aquaculture.

Other rights saved - Sec. 81.2(5)
(5) Nothing in this section precludes a farmer, fisherman or aquaculturist from exercising

(a) the right that that person may have under section 81.1 to repossess products of agriculture, products of the sea, lakes and rivers, or products of aquaculture; or
(b) any right that that person may have under the law of a province.

Security for unpaid wages, etc. — bankruptcy - Sec. 81.3
81.3 (1) The claim of a clerk, servant, travelling salesperson, labourer or worker who is owed wages, salaries, commissions or compensation by a bankrupt for services rendered during the period beginning on the day that is six months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy is secured, as of the date of the bankruptcy, to the extent of $2,000 — less any amount paid for those services by the trustee or by a receiver — by security on the bankrupt's current assets on the date of the bankruptcy.

Commissions - Sec. 81.3(2)
(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), commissions payable when goods are shipped, delivered or paid for, if shipped, delivered or paid for during the period referred to in that subsection, are deemed to have been earned in that period.

Security for disbursements - Sec. 81.3(3)
(3) The claim of a travelling salesperson who is owed money by a bankrupt for disbursements properly incurred in and about the bankrupt's business during the period referred to in subsection (1) is secured, as of the date of the bankruptcy, to the extent of $1,000 — less any amount paid for those disbursements by the trustee or by a receiver — by security on the bankrupt's current assets on that date.

Rank of security - Sec. 81.3(4)
(4) A security under this section ranks above every other claim, right, charge or security against the bankrupt's current assets — regardless of when that other claim, right, charge or security arose — except rights under sections 81.1 and 81.2 and amounts referred to in subsection 67(3) that have been deemed to be held in trust.

Liability of trustee - Sec. 81.3(5)
(5) If the trustee disposes of current assets covered by the security, the trustee is liable for the claim of the clerk, servant, travelling salesperson, labourer or worker to the extent of the amount realized on the disposition of the current assets and is subrogated in and to all rights of the clerk, servant, travelling salesperson, labourer or worker in respect of the amounts paid to that person by the trustee.

Claims of officers and directors - Sec. 81.3(6)
(6) No officer or director of the bankrupt is entitled to have a claim secured under this section.

Non-arm's length - Sec. 81.3(7)
(7) A person who, in respect of a transaction, was not dealing at arm's length with the bankrupt is not entitled to have a claim arising from that transaction secured by this section unless, in the opinion of the trustee, having regard to the circumstances — including the remuneration for, the terms and conditions of and the duration, nature and importance of the services rendered — it is reasonable to conclude that they would have entered into a substantially similar transaction if they had been dealing with each other at arm's length.

Proof by delivery - Sec. 81.3(8)
(8) A claim referred to in this section is proved by delivering to the trustee a proof of claim in the prescribed form.

Definitions - Sec. 81.3(9)
(9) The following definitions apply in this section.

"compensation"
« rémunération »
"compensation" includes vacation pay but does not include termination or severance pay.

"receiver"

rendered during the six months before the first day on which there was a receiver in relation to the person is secured, as of that day, to the extent of $2,000 — less any amount paid for those services by a receiver or trustee — by security on the person's current assets that are in the possession or under the control of the receiver.

Commissions - Sec. 81.4(2)
(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), commissions payable when goods are shipped, delivered or paid for, if shipped, delivered or paid for during the six-month period referred to in that subsection, are deemed to have been earned in those six months.

Security for disbursements - Sec. 81.4(3)
(3) The claim of a travelling salesperson who is owed money by a person who is subject to a receivership for disbursements properly incurred in and about the person's business during the six months before the first day on which there was a receiver in relation to the person is secured, as of that day, to the extent of $1,000 — less any amount paid for those disbursements by a receiver or trustee — by security on the person's current assets that are in the possession or under the control of the receiver.

Rank of security - Sec. 81.4(4)
(4) A security under this section ranks above every other claim, right, charge or security against the person's current assets — regardless of when that other claim, right, charge or security arose — except rights under sections 81.1 and 81.2.

Liability of receiver - Sec. 81.4(5)
(5) If the receiver takes possession or in any way disposes of current assets covered by the security, the receiver is liable for the claim of the clerk, servant, travelling salesperson, labourer or worker to the extent of the amount realized on the disposition of the current assets and is subrogated in and to all rights of the clerk, servant, travelling salesperson, labourer or worker in respect of the amounts paid to that person by the receiver.

Claims of officers and directors - Sec. 81.4(6)
(6) No officer or director of the person who is subject to a receivership is entitled to have a claim secured under this section.

Non-arm's length - Sec. 81.4(7)
(7) A person who, in respect of a transaction, was not dealing at arm's length with a person who is subject to a receivership is not entitled to have a claim arising from that transaction secured by this section unless, in the opinion of the receiver, having regard to the circumstances — including the remuneration for, the terms and conditions of and the duration, nature and importance of the services rendered — it is reasonable to conclude that they would have entered into a substantially similar transaction if they had been dealing with each other at arm's length.

Proof by delivery - Sec. 81.4(8)
(8) A claim referred to in this section is proved by delivering to the receiver a proof of claim in the prescribed form.

Security for unpaid amounts re prescribed pensions plan — bankruptcy - Sec. 81.5
81.5 (1) If the bankrupt is an employer who participated or participates in a prescribed pension plan for the benefit of the bankrupt's employees, the following amounts that are unpaid on the date of bankruptcy to the fund established for the purpose of the pension plan are secured by security on all the assets of the bankrupt:

(a) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were deducted from the employees' remuneration for payment to the fund;

(b) if the prescribed pension plan is regulated by an Act of Parliament,

(i) an amount equal to the normal cost, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Regulations, 1985, that was required to be paid by the employer to the fund, and

(ii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were required to be paid by the employer to the fund under a defined contribution provision, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985,

(iii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were required to be paid by the employer to the administrator of a pooled registered pension plan, as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Pooled Registered Pension Plans Act; and

(c) in the case of any other prescribed pension plan,

(i) an amount equal to the amount that would be the normal cost, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Regulations, 1985, that the employer would be required to pay to the fund if the prescribed plan were regulated by an Act of Parliament,

(ii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that would have been required to be paid by the employer to the fund under a defined contribution provision, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, if the prescribed plan were regulated by an Act of Parliament, and

(iii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that would have been required to be paid by the employer in respect of a prescribed plan, if it were regulated by the Pooled Registered Pension Plans Act.

Rank of security - Sec. 81.5(2)
(2) A security under this section ranks above every other claim, right, charge or security against the bankrupt's assets, regardless of when that other claim, right, charge or security arose, except

(a) rights under sections 81.1 and 81.2;
(b) amounts referred to in subsection 67(3) that have been deemed to be held in trust; and
(c) securities under sections 81.3 and 81.4.

Liability of trustee - Sec. 81.5(3)
(3) If the trustee disposes of assets covered by the security, the trustee is liable for the amounts referred to in subsection (1) to the extent of the amount realized on the disposition of the assets, and is subrogated in and to all rights of the fund established for the purpose of the pension plan in respect of those amounts.

Security for unpaid amounts re prescribed pensions plan — receivership - Sec. 81.6
81.6 (1) If a person who is subject to a receivership is an employer who participated or participates in a prescribed pension plan for the benefit of the person's employees, the following amounts that are unpaid immediately before the first day on which there was a receiver in relation to the person are secured by security on all the person's assets:

(a) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were deducted from the employees' remuneration for payment to the fund;
(b) if the prescribed pension plan is regulated by an Act of Parliament,
(i) an amount equal to the normal cost, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Regulations, 1985, that was required to be paid by the employer to the fund, and
(ii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were required to be paid by the employer to the fund under a defined contribution provision, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985,
(iii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were required to be paid by the employer to the administrator of a pooled registered pension plan, as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Pooled Registered Pension Plans Act; and
(c) in the case of any other prescribed pension plan,
(i) an amount equal to the amount that would be the normal cost, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Regulations, 1985, that the employer would be required to pay to the fund if the prescribed plan were regulated by an Act of Parliament,
(ii) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that would have been required to be paid by the employer to the fund under a defined contribution provision, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, if the prescribed plan were regulated by an Act of Parliament, and

Copyright and manuscript to revert to author - Sec. 83

83. (1) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or in any other statute, the author's manuscripts and any copyright or any interest in a copyright in whole or in part assigned to a publisher, printer, firm or person becoming bankrupt shall,

(a) if the work covered by the copyright has not been published and put on the market at the time of the bankruptcy and no expense has been incurred in connection with that work, revert and be delivered to the author or their heirs, and any contract or agreement between the author or their heirs and the bankrupt shall then terminate and be void or, in the Province of Quebec, null;

(b) if the work covered by the copyright has in whole or in part been put into type and expenses have been incurred by the bankrupt, revert and be delivered to the author on payment of the expenses so incurred and the product of those expenses shall also be delivered to the author or their heirs and any contract or agreement between the author or their heirs and the bankrupt shall then terminate and be void or, in the Province of Quebec, null, but if the author does not exercise their rights under this paragraph within six months after the date of the bankruptcy, the trustee may carry out the original contract; or

(c) if the trustee at the end of the six-month period from the date of the bankruptcy decides not to carry out the contract, revert without expense to the author and any contract or agreement between the author or their heirs and the bankrupt shall then terminate and be void or, in the Province of Quebec, null.

If copies of the work are on the market - Sec. 83(2)

(2) Where, at the time of the bankruptcy referred to in subsection (1), the work was published and put on the market, the trustee is entitled to sell, or authorize the sale or reproduction of, any copies of the published work, or to perform or authorize the performance of the work, but

(a) there shall be paid to the author or his heirs such sums by way of royalties or share of the profits as would have been payable by the bankrupt;

(b) the trustee is not, without the written consent of the author or his heirs, entitled to assign the copyright or transfer the interest or to grant any interest therein by licence or otherwise, except on terms that will guarantee to the author or his heirs payment by way of royalties or share of the profits at a rate not less than the rate the bankrupt was liable to pay; and

(c) any contract or agreement between the author or their heirs and the bankrupt shall then terminate and be void or, in the Province of Quebec, null, except with respect to the disposal, under this subsection, of copies of the work published and put on the market before the bankruptcy.

Marketable copies to be first offered for sale to the author - Sec. 83(3)

(3) The trustee shall offer in writing to the author or his heirs the right to purchase the manufactured or marketable copies of the copyright work comprised in the estate of the bankrupt at such price and on such terms and conditions as the trustee may deem fair and proper before disposing of the manufactured and marketable copies in the manner prescribed in this section.

Assignment of agreements - Sec. 84.1
84.1 (1) On application by a trustee and on notice to every party to an agreement, a court may make an order assigning the rights and obligations of a bankrupt under the agreement to any person who is specified by the court and agrees to the assignment.

Individuals - Sec. 84.1(2)
(2) In the case of an individual,
(a) they may not make an application under subsection (1) unless they are carrying on a business; and
(b) only rights and obligations in relation to the business may be assigned.

Exceptions - Sec. 84.1(3)
(3) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of rights and obligations that are not assignable by reason of their nature or that arise under
(a) an agreement entered into on or after the date of the bankruptcy;
(b) an eligible financial contract; or
(c) a collective agreement.

Factors to be considered - Sec. 84.1(4)
(4) In deciding whether to make the order, the court is to consider, among other things,
(a) whether the person to whom the rights and obligations are to be assigned is able to perform the obligations; and
(b) whether it is appropriate to assign the rights and obligations to that person.

Restriction - Sec. 84.1(5)
(5) The court may not make the order unless it is satisfied that all monetary defaults in relation to the agreement — other than those arising by reason only of the person's bankruptcy, insolvency or failure to perform a non-monetary obligation — will be remedied on or before the day fixed by the court.

Copy of order - Sec. 84.1(6)
(6) The applicant is to send a copy of the order to every party to the agreement.

Lease - Sec. 84.2(2)
(2) If the agreement referred to in subsection (1) is a lease, the lessor may not terminate or amend, or claim an accelerated payment or forfeiture of the term under, the lease by reason only of the bankruptcy or insolvency or of the fact that the bankrupt has not paid rent in respect of any period before the time of the bankruptcy.

Public utilities - Sec. 84.2(3)
(3) No public utility may discontinue service to a bankrupt individual by reason only of the individual's bankruptcy or insolvency or of the fact that the bankrupt individual has not paid for services rendered or material provided before the time of the bankruptcy.

Certain acts not prevented - Sec. 84.2(4)
(4) Nothing in this section is to be construed as

(a) prohibiting a person from requiring payments to be made in cash for goods, services, use of leased property or other valuable consideration provided after the time of the bankruptcy; or

(b) requiring the further advance of money or credit.

Provisions of section override agreement - Sec. 84.2(5)
(5) Any provision in an agreement that has the effect of providing for, or permitting, anything that, in substance, is contrary to this section is of no force or effect.

Powers of court - Sec. 84.2(6)
(6) On application by a party to an agreement or by a public utility, the court may declare that this section does not apply — or applies only to the extent declared by the court — if the applicant satisfies the court that the operation of this section would likely cause the applicant significant financial hardship.

Eligible financial contracts - Sec. 84.2(7)
(7) Subsection (1) does not apply

(a) in respect of an eligible financial contract; or

(b) to prevent a member of the Canadian Payments Association from ceasing to act as a clearing agent or group clearer for an insolvent person in accordance with the Canadian Payments Act and the by-laws and rules of that Association.

Permitted actions - Sec. 84.2(8)
(8) Despite section 69.3, the following actions are permitted in respect of an eligible financial contract that is entered into before the time of the bankruptcy, and is terminated on or after that time, but only in accordance with the provisions of that contract:

(a) the netting or setting off or compensation of obligations between the individual bankrupt and the other parties to the eligible financial contract; and

(b) any dealing with financial collateral including

(i) the sale or foreclosure or, in the Province of Quebec, the surrender of financial collateral, and

(ii) the setting off or compensation of financial collateral or the application of the proceeds or value of financial collateral.

2007, c. 29, s. 98;
2009, c. 31, s. 64.

PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY

Application to limited partnerships - Sec. 85
85. (1) This Act applies to limited partnerships in like manner as if limited partnerships were ordinary partnerships, and, on all the general partners of a limited partnership becoming bankrupt, the property of the limited partnership vests in the trustee.

Actions by trustee and bankrupt's partner - Sec. 85(2)
(2) If a member of a partnership becomes bankrupt, the court may authorize the trustee to commence and prosecute any action in the names of the trustee and of the bankrupt's partner, and any release by the partner of the debt or demand to which the action relates is void or, in the Province of Quebec, null.

Notice to partner - Sec. 85(3)
(3) Notice of the application for authority to commence an action under subsection (2) shall be given to the bankrupt's partner, who may show cause against it, and on his application the court may, if it thinks fit, direct that he shall receive his proper share of the proceeds of the action, and, if he does not claim any benefit therefrom, he shall be indemnified against costs in respect thereof as the court directs.

on appeal from the court of appeal for alberta

Constitutional law -- Bankruptcy -- Assessments owed provincial board given secured status by provincial statute -- Lesser status and priority accorded under Bankruptcy Act -- Whether or not conflict -- Whether or not provincial provision inoperative -- Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, ss. 50(6), 107(1)(h) -- The Workers' Compensation Act, 1973 (Alta.), c. 87, s. 78(4).

Respondent Board claimed unpaid assessments owing under The Workers' Compensation Act from an employer and filed a proof of claim as secured creditor following the employer's declaration in bankruptcy. Appellant, which was the trustee in bankruptcy, sold the assets, settled a bank claim and applied the balance to its own fees rather than to the Board's claim. Both lower court's accepted the Board's argument that the Board was a secured creditor, with a higher priority than a trustee's fees, because of the operation of the provincial statute which created a charge on the employer's property to the extent of the moneys owed. The trustee contended that, notwithstanding the provincial statute, the Board should be accorded the status of preferred creditor pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act and therefore have a lower priority than the fees of a trustee in bankruptcy. The constitutional question before this Court was whether or not s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act conflicted with s. 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act, such as to render inoperative s. 78(4).

Held (Estey J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Digitized by Google

Per Dickson, Beetz and Chouinard JJ.: Section 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act is valid legislation that can stand alone and have its own legitimate spheres of influence independent of that of s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act.

In the case of bankruptcy s. 107(1)(h) disposes of the matter.

The constitutional question must be answered in the affirmative: s. 78(4) is inoperative in a bankruptcy situation.

Per McIntyre, Lamer and Wilson JJ.: A claimant in bankruptcy cannot claim by virtue of a provincial Act to be a secured creditor within the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and thereby avoid the priority accorded by s. 107(1). A contrary interpretation of s. 107(1) would effectively allow the provinces to determine priorities on bankruptcy--a matter within exclusive federal jurisdiction. Since the provincial legislation does not purport to deal with a bankruptcy situation it can and should be construed in accordance with the presumption of constitutionality as inapplicable to such a situation. The paramountcy doctrine only applies if there is direct conflict between the federal and provincial laws. When properly construed s. 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act does not conflict with s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act. Absent such direct conflict both provisions can stand and have their own proper spheres of influence.

Per Estey J. dissenting: The distribution scheme of a debtor's estate, as adopted by Parliament, did not affect the legal consequences and status of the secured charge created by provincial legislation. A claimant is excepted from the distribution of s. 107 of the Bankruptcy Act by the opening words in subs. (1) if the provincial legislation creates a charge which falls within the definition of s. 2 and if the appropriate paragraph under s. 107(1) does not reduce the status of secured creditor to that of preferred creditor. Parliament, while it has the exclusive authority to determine priorities in the event of bankruptcy and while it can relegate a secured creditor to a lesser status if it chooses to do so, has not reduced respondent's status in these circumstances. Respondent therefore ranks as a secured creditor.

The judgment of Dickson, Beetz and Chouinard JJ. was delivered by

1. Chouinard J.--I agree with Madame Justice Wilson that s. 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act [1973 (Alta.), c. 87] and s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act [R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3] can stand and have their own legitimate spheres of operation.

2. That section 78(4) is perfectly valid legislation is, in my view, beyond dispute.

3. There is nothing in the Act however to suggest that s. 78(4) would not apply in a bankruptcy situation. Were it not for the Bankruptcy Act it would undoubtedly apply. It is not because of anything inherent in s. 78(4) that it has no application in a bankruptcy but because of s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act which disposes of the matter.

4. In the result I am of the view, with respect, that the constitutional question must be answered in the affirmative: s. 78(4) is inoperative in a bankruptcy situation.

5. I would otherwise dispose of the appeal in the manner proposed by Madame Justice Wilson.

The following are the reasons delivered by

6. Estey J. (dissenting)--As the judgment of my colleague Wilson J. has set out the facts and the relevant provisions in the provincial and federal legislation, it is not necessary to repeat those matters here. The following constitutional question was stated by order of the Chief Justice of Canada dated May 19, 1983:

Does s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3 conflict with s. 78(4) of the L'écoute Compensation Act, 1973 (Alta) c. 87, such as to render inoperative s. 78(4)?

I would dismiss the appeal on the basis of interpretation of the bankruptcy statute and therefore find it unnecessary to answer the constitutional question or indeed to inquire into the constitutional basis under either the Bankruptcy Act, supra, or The L'écoute Compensation Act, supra. The issue is not whether the Parliament of Canada could regulate the effect in law of the Alberta statute for the purposes of bankruptcy procedures but rather, has the Parliament of Canada done so with reference to a charge arising under the provincial compensation statute. The result of course amounts to the same thing as answering the constitutional question in the negative.

7. The provincial Act, s. 78(4)(a) clearly and validly establishes a charge against the property of a delinquent employer. The section in part states:

78. ...
(4) ... the amount due to the Board by an employer upon any assessment made under this Act...
(a) is a charge upon the property or proceeds of property of the employer....

The reach of that charge in law is further elaborated on in para. (b) of this section where it is given priority over all "... liens, charges, mortgages or other encumbrances whatsoever ...." The nature of this charge having been clearly established in the law, the second and determinative question is: how is this charge treated by the Parliament of Canada in the Bankruptcy Act, supra, as regards the distribution of the estate of a bankrupt? Section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act defines a secured creditor as follows:

"secured creditor" means a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt due or accruing due to him from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based upon, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and upon which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable;

It is to be noted at once that in defining a secured creditor Parliament has not made any exception for charges or other security established by provincial statute either generally or specifically with reference to those statutes of the provinces which are named in s. 107 of the Act.

8. In section 107 Parliament has established a "Scheme of Distribution" for the assets of the estate of a bankrupt. The detailed scheme is introduced as follows:

107. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

(Emphasis added.)

The scheme of distribution is entirely predicated upon the prior rights of secured creditors. There is nothing in the use of the term "secured creditors" in the opening of this plan of distribution of a bankrupt's assets to indicate that Parliament did not intend to incorporate into s. 107 the statutory definition of that term.

9. The priorities of claimants other than secured creditors is then established by paras. (a) to (j) of s. 107(1). We are here concerned with para. (h) which provides as follows:

(h) all indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act, under any Unemployment Insurance Act, under any provision of the Income Tax Act or the Income War Tax Act creating an obligation to pay to Her Majesty amounts that have been deducted or withheld, pari passu;

It will be noted again that this paragraph does not refer to charges created under The L'écoute Compensation Act, nor does the paragraph make any reference such as "notwithstanding any secured claim arising thereunder". Nor does Parliament refer back to the exception of secured creditors in the opening of the subsection or to the definition of "secured creditor" in s. 2, supra. The issue, in my respectful view, is not whether the Workers' Compensation Board of a province can create the status of secured creditor which can be recognized in bankruptcy proceedings, but whether the bankruptcy procedures as laid out by the Parliament of Canada recognize a secured creditor status as created under The L'écoute Compensation Act of Alberta. The natural sequence, in my view, is that the provincial statute is examined to determine the character of the status of the claim in provincial law. The federal Act is then examined to determine whether the provincial claim so established will be recognized as a secured claim or otherwise in the bankruptcy scheme adopted by Parliament.

10. The Alberta Court of Appeal some time ago in Workmen's Compensation Board v. Provincial Treasurer of Alberta reflex, (1967), 59 W.W.R. 298, concluded that the then equivalent of s. 78(4) of the Alberta statute established a floating charge covering all of the employers' property which crystallized into a fixed charge upon perfection pursuant to the terms of the statute. Such a fixed charge created by valid legislation is clearly included in s. 2, supra. Here the Board did indeed perfect its secured claim by placing a Distress Warrant in the hands of the appropriate Sheriff, and further by registration in the Land Titles Office in Edmonton, prior to the assignment in bankruptcy under which the appellant has been appointed as trustee.

11. It is not surprising to find a statement by Parliament in the Bankruptcy Act which recognizes the continued existence of substantive provisions in other law. I refer to s. 50(6):

> (6) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by such law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

The reference to the entitlement of the trustee to avail himself of such other laws cannot be read as an indirect directive from Parliament that creditors may not do likewise.

12. It is said that this Court in Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville (Re Bourgault), 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35, has so construed s. 107 as to reduce the respondent's charge to a preferred claim. With respect I do not believe such to be the case. The Court was there concerned with s. 107(1)(j) which read as follows:

> (j) claims of the Crown not previously mentioned in this section, in right of Canada or of any province, pari passu notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary.

Parliament was there concerned with claims of the Crown not previously mentioned. The claim of the Board here was, of course, mentioned in para. (h) ranking in priority to para. (j). The principal distinguishing feature between these two paragraphs is, however, the rider at the end of para. (j) which expressly mandates that distribution shall be "pari passu notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary". There is, of course, no such directive, express or implicit, in para. (h) with reference to indebtedness under any workmen's compensation legislation. Pigeon J., writing for the majority in Re Bourgault, explicitly stated, at p. 44, that " the case turns upon the interpretation of para. 107(1)(j)". Later in the judgment His Lordship stated, at pp. 44-45:

There is of course a contradiction between the reservation at the outset of the rights of secured creditors which include privileges and "notwithstanding any statutory preference ..." However, it is certainly clear that the reservation is a general rule and the "notwithstanding" an exception which takes precedence wherever applicable.

There may be comments in the majority judgment which can be extended to refer to a broader base for the disposition there made by the Court but, in my view, those comments are unnecessary to the decision of the case and are clearly disavowed by Pigeon J. in his several references to the precise and unique wording of para. (j). For example, at p. 44:

It is abundantly clear that this was intended to put on an equal footing all claims by Her Majesty in right of Canada or of a province except in cases where it was provided otherwise, namely, para. (c), the levy, and para. (h), workmen's compensation or unemployment insurance assessments and withholdings for income tax.

and at p. 43:

Digitized by Google

Due to the "notwithstanding", I find it even clearer in para. 107(1)(j) that the federal Parliament intended to deal with the preferential rights of the federal and provincial tax collectors, just as it intended in para. 107(1)(e) and (f) to define those of municipal corporations and of lessors.

13. Paragraph (h) was before the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re Clemenshaw; L'écoute Compensation Board v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd. (1963), 4 C.B.R. (N.S.) 238. Wilson J.A., speaking for a unanimous court, held at p. 244:

The argument is that this allocation by Parliament to the Workmen's Compensation Board of the status of a preferred creditor of the eighth class deprives it of the position given it by provincial law as the holder of the senior charge on the property involved. I cannot accept this as correct. The rights stated in s. 95 are expressly made subject to the primary rights of secured creditors. If Parliament had intended to deprive the Workmen's Compensation Board of the position of secured creditor which is given it by s. 2(r) of the Bankruptcy Act, Parliament would have said so in explicit language. No member of any of the classes of persons listed in the scheme of distribution in s. 95 is to be taken, by reason of his being named in that section, as deprived of the benefit of any security he may hold.

In Re Bourgault, supra, Pigeon J. commented on that case by noting that the British Columbia court made no reference to an earlier case of this Court (Produits Caoutchouc Marquis Inc. v. Trottier (Re Gingras Automobile Ltée), 1962 CanLII 79 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R. 676, dealing with a landlord's privilege under the Quebec Civil Code), and then added: "... and the wording of the paragraph [para. (h)] is also quite different", that is from para. (j) then before the Court. It should be noted in passing that Re Gingras Automobile Ltée, supra, was concerned with the status of a claim by a landlord for arrears of rent under the secured creditor definition in the Bankruptcy Act. The Court came to the conclusion that the landlord's claim under the Quebec Civil Code was not a secured interest which fell within the definition of secured creditor in the Bankruptcy Act. This, of course, is very different from the nature of the charge held by the respondent in these proceedings.

14. The Nova Scotia courts in Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. (1981), 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 176, (on appeal Director of Labour Standards of Nova Scotia and L'écoute Compensation Board of Nova Scotia v. Trustee in Bankruptcy (1981), 38 C.B.R. (N.S.) 253) concluded that a charge under the L'écoute Compensation Act of Nova Scotia did not qualify under s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act as a secured claim. With reference to that decision, I respectfully adopt the comments of Lieberman J. in the court below in the case at bar:

In my view Re Bourgault and Re Black Forest are distinguishable from the case at bar and are not authority for the proposition that a claimant whose claim falls within s. 107 cannot be a "secured creditor" even if the claim satisfies the requirements of s. 2. The L'écoute Compensation Act of Nova Scotia provides that the claim of the Board establishes a lien against the assets of the employer without the Board having to perform an overt act, whereas in the Alberta legislation (s. 78(4)) a floating charge is created which becomes a proprietary interest only after the Board has performed overt acts of filing the certificate and initiating distress proceedings. The Board in this case has performed those overt acts and in my view it has caused a floating charge to be crystallized in accordance with s. 78(4) of the L'écoute Compensation Act. The claim thus comes within the definition of "secured creditor" in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act.

15. The Nova Scotia case and the comments upon it in the court below further illustrate the proper interrelationship between the provincial and the federal legislation where bankruptcy takes place. It is not a case where provincial legislation, by creating a secured and fixed charge, defeats a scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act. It is quite the reverse. The relevant question is whether the scheme of distribution of a debtor's estate as adopted by Parliament affects the legal consequences and status of a secured charge created by provincial legislation. If the provincial legislation creates a charge which falls within the definition of s. 2, and if the appropriate paragraph under s. 107(1) does not reduce the status of the secured creditor to that of a preferred creditor, then the claimant is excepted from the distribution of s. 107 by the opening words in subs. (1). It is not because the provincial legislature has defeated or subverted the federal statutory scheme. It is because the federal scheme recognizes the provincially legislated charge which gives the claimant the status of a secured creditor. It is, in my view, quite contrary to law to translate this interrelationship between the provincial and the federal statutes as elevating the provinces to the position where they may determine priorities in the event of a bankruptcy. This is undoubtedly the exclusive domain of the Parliament of Canada. Parliament can, as it did in para. (j), relegate a secured creditor to a lesser status if it chooses so to do. It has not chosen to do so in para. (h) and until Parliament does so, persons claiming, in the circumstances of the respondent, in my view, rank as secured creditors.

16. Accordingly I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The reasons of McIntyre, Lamer and Wilson JJ. were delivered by

17. Wilson J.--The issue on this appeal is the interaction of s. 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act, 1973 (Alta.), c. 87, and s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3.

18. Section 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act provides:

Digitized by Google

78. ...

(4) Notwithstanding anything in any other Act, the amount due to the Board by an employer upon any assessment made under this Act or in respect of any amount that the employer is required to pay to the Board under any of its provisions or upon any judgment for that assessment or amount,

(a) is a charge upon the property or proceeds of property of the employer, including moneys payable to, for or on account of the employer, within Alberta, and

(b) has priority over all assignments by way of security, debts, liens, charges, mortgages or other encumbrances whatsoever, whenever created or to be created, except wages due to workers by their employer in cases where the exercise of the priority would deprive the workers of their wages.

(Emphasis added.)

19. Section 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act provides:

107. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

...

(h) all indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act, under any Unemployment Insurance Act, under any provision of the Income Tax Act or the Income War Tax Act creating an obligation to pay to Her Majesty amounts that have been deducted or withheld, pari passu;

(Emphasis added.)

20. The question arising under these two provisions is whether the charge created by s. 78(4) makes the respondent Board a secured creditor of the bankrupt employer for purposes of the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act or whether the respondent Board's claim falls under para. (h) of the subsection and is postponed to the claims listed in paras. (a) to (g). The appeal proceeded upon an agreed statement of fact as follows:

1. At all material times to this action Jacs Jackets & Crests Ltd. was an employer in an industry within the scope of The L'écoute Compensation Act, c. 87, S.A. 1973, and amendments thereto and was liable to pay assessments to the Board.

2. On or about January 9, 1980 the Board placed a Distress Warrant in the hands of the Sheriff of the Judicial District of Edmonton claiming unpaid assessments by Jacs Jackets & Crests Ltd. in the amount of $3,646.18 under the provisions of The L'écoute Compensation Act.

3. On January 15, 1980 the Board also registered a Certified Statement at the Land Titles Office at Edmonton in the amount of $3,648.68 under the provisions of The L'écoute Compensation Board [sic].

4. On January 28, 1980 Jacs Jackets & Crests Ltd. made an assignment into bankruptcy and Deloitte Haskins and Sells Limited was appointed Trustee of the Estate.

5. On February 6, 1980 the Board filed a Proof of Claim in the sum of $3,657.08 as a secured creditor of Jacs Jackets & Crests Ltd. under the provisions of Section 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act.

6. The Trustee admittedly made a search of the Bankrupt's creditors under the name of "Jack's" rather than the proper name of "Jacs", both at the Land Titles Office and at the Sheriff's Office Edmonton, which revealed no creditors.

7. The Trustee then sold the assets of the Bankrupt in the amount of $11,700.00 and settled a claim of the Bank of British Columbia under a Chattel Mortgage in the amount of $8,950.00, the balance being applied to the Trustee's fees.

8. The Board filed an Objection to the final Statement of Receipts and Disbursements and the discharge of the Trustee alleging the monies received by the Trustee were distributed contrary to law and established practice.

9. The Trustee had refused or declined to pay the Board's claim and the Board applied to The Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta for Direction of Judgment in this matter.

10. There are sufficient funds available for distribution so that the question of priorities between the Board and the claimant Bank will not arise if the Judgment of the Chambers Judge is affirmed.

21. The learned Chambers judge who heard the application held that the Board was a secured creditor within the definition of s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act. That section reads as follows:

2. In this Act

"secured creditor" means a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt due or accruing due to him from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based upon, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and upon which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable;

Accordingly, the Board had priority over the claims of the trustee in bankruptcy. The Court of Appeal agreed. The trustee was granted leave to appeal to this Court.

22. By order of the Chief Justice of Canada dated May 19, 1983 a constitutional question was stated as follows:

Does s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3 conflict with s. 78(4) of the L'écoute Compensation Act, 1973 (Alta) c. 87, such as to render inoperative s. 78(4)?

Digitized by Google

The Attorney General of Canada and the other interveners were granted leave to intervene on the appeal.

23. The main ground of appeal is that the Court of Appeal was wrong in according the Board secured, as opposed to preferred, status in bankruptcy. Although s. 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act gave the Board the status of a secured creditor in a non-bankruptcy situation, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act had to be looked to for its status in bankruptcy. Section 107(1) of that Act, a provision establishing priorities among non-secured creditors, specifically included claims such as the claim of the Board in para. (h). In face of that specific reference, how can it be argued that such claims are secured and covered by the opening words of s. 107(1)? Counsel submits that para. (h) is conclusive evidence of Parliament's intention to treat such claims as unsecured. If effect is given to s. 78(4) in a bankruptcy context it will change the priority given to workers' compensation claims from priority (h) to a first priority as secured claims.

24. Counsel for the trustee submits that the Court of Appeal fell into error because it approached the problem of the interaction of the federal and provincial legislation in the wrong way. The federal statute, he submits, must be looked at first because it discloses Parliament's intention with respect to priorities in a bankruptcy context. If the provincial legislation is looked at first in order to establish the nature of the claim, then the policy of the Bankruptcy Act with respect to priorities could be completely defeated. Moreover, there would be no guarantee of consistency in the treatment of claims arising in different provinces. Their ranking for bankruptcy purposes would be controlled by the provincial legislatures instead of by the federal Parliament to which exclusive legislative jurisdiction in relation to "Bankruptcy and Insolvency" was given under s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867. There are two valid laws, counsel submits, one federal and one provincial and they are in operational conflict. In such circumstances the rule is that the federal law must prevail.

25. Counsel for the Board responds that the Alberta legislature, acting within its constitutional authority in relation to "Property and Civil Rights in the Province", has conferred on the Board in s. 78(4) a first charge on the property of the employer. In Workmen's Compensation Board v. Provincial Treasurer of Alberta reflex, (1967), 59 W.W.R. 298, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that the Board's charge under s. 78(4) is a floating charge on all the employer's property which, upon registration, crystallizes into a fixed legal charge. Accordingly, the Board, if it has perfected its security by registration prior to the bankruptcy, has a secured claim. If it has not perfected its security in time, then it has a preferred claim under s. 107(1)(h): see Davis v. L'écoute Compensation Board, 1979 CanLII 1192 (AB QB), [1980] 2 W.W.R. 349.

26. Counsel for the Board relies further on s. 50(6) of the Bankruptcy Act which provides:

> (6) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by such law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

Counsel submits that this provision clearly recognizes the application and effect of provincial statutes relating to property and civil rights. The Bankruptcy Act, he says, merely defines secured creditors, it does not create them, the latter being the constitutional prerogative of the provinces.

27. Some assistance on the interaction of the federal and provincial legislation is to be derived from the authorities. The seminal case is the decision of the Privy Council in Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue, [1928] A.C. 187. In that case the Privy Council held that the exclusive legislative jurisdiction conferred on the federal legislature in relation to Bankruptcy and Insolvency enabled it to legislate the relative priorities of creditors on a bankruptcy. Although it was competent to a provincial legislature under the head of Property and Civil Rights to secure certain debts on property of the debtor, as soon as such provincial legislation came into conflict with federal bankruptcy legislation, the federal bankruptcy legislation prevailed. Quoting from the judgment of Viscount Cave L.C., at p. 197:

> In Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada ([1894] A.C. 189, 200), Lord Herschell observed that a system of bankruptcy legislation might frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of the Act from being defeated, and added: "It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effect of executions and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the Provincial Legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the Provincial Legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament." Taking these observations as affording assistance in the construction of s. 91, head 21, of the Act of 1867, their Lordships are of opinion that the exclusive authority thereby given to the Dominion Parliament to deal with all matters arising within the domain of bankruptcy and insolvency enables that Parliament to determine by legislation the relative priorities of creditors under a bankruptcy or an authorized assignment.

28. In Produits Caoutchouc Marquis Inc. v. Trottier (Re Gingras Automobile Ltée), 1962 CanLII 79 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R. 676, Abbott J. followed Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue, supra. He said, at p. 678:

The present Act, like its predecessor acts, provides that subject to the Act all debts proved in bankruptcy shall be paid pari passu. To that rule of absolute equality, certain exceptions are made including those provided for by s. 95. The exclusive authority given to Parliament by s. 91(21) of the British North America Act to deal with all matters arising within the domain of bankruptcy and insolvency, enables Parliament to determine the relative priorities of creditors under a bankruptcy: Royal Bank v. Larue. To the extent that such priorities may be in conflict with provincial law, the federal statute must prevail.

29. In Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville (Re Bourgault), 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35, this Court had to consider the interaction of s. 30 of the Retail Sales Tax Act, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 71, and s. 107(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 30 of the Quebec statute made any sums due to the Crown under the Act "a privileged debt" ranking immediately after law costs. Section 107(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act provided:

107. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

(j) claims of the Crown not previously mentioned in this section, in right of Canada or of any province, pari passu notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary.

30. The Deputy Minister alleged that he was a "secured creditor" within the definition of s. 2 of the Act and therefore did not fall within the purview of para. (j). Pigeon J., writing for the majority, found otherwise. He said, at p. 44:

Accordingly, I find that the case turns upon the interpretation of para. 107(1)(j). When s. 95 (now 107) of the 1949 Bankruptcy Act is compared with s. 51 of the 1919 Bankruptcy Act, it is apparent that by the new Act, Parliament has established a much more elaborate "Scheme of Distribution". Its power to legislate concerning the provincial as well as federal Crown privilege, in the case of bankruptcy, having been established by In re Silver Brothers Ltd. ([1932] A.C. 514), the provision clearly indicates its intention to do so and the only question remaining is as to the scope of the provision. It is abundantly clear that this was intended to put on an equal footing all claims by Her Majesty in right of Canada or of a province except in cases where it was provided otherwise, namely, para. (c), the levy, and para. (h), workmen's compensation or unemployment insurance assessments and withholdings for income tax. Paragraph (j) ends with the following words "notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary". The purpose of this part of the provision is obvious. Parliament intended to put all debts to a government on an equal footing; it therefore cannot have intended to allow provincial statutes to confer any higher priority. In my opinion, this is precisely what is being contended for when it is argued that, because the Quebec statute creates a privilege on immovable property effective from the date of registration, the Crown thereby becomes a "secured creditor" and thus escapes the effect of the provision which gives it only a lower priority.

31. Estey J. dissented in Re Bourgault on the basis that the Deputy Minister was a secured creditor by virtue of the provincial legislation and s. 107 of the Bankruptcy Act elevated his claim over the preferred claims listed in the scheme of distribution in s. 107. Although he does not refer to the case in his reasons, the approach taken by Estey J. is similar to that taken by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re Clemenshaw; L'écoute Compensation Board v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd. (1963), 4 C.B.R. (N.S.) 238, and adopted in Re R. A. Nelson Construction Ltd. (1966), 8 C.B.R. (N.S.) 221 (B.C.S.C.), in Re Trinel Office Products Ltd.; L'écoute Compensation Board of Alberta v. Davis (1971), 14 C.B.R. (N.S.) 248 (Alta. S.C.), and Davis v. L'écoute Compensation Board (Alberta) (1979), 33 C.B.R. (N.S.) 146 (Alta. Q.B.)

32. Counsel for the appellant submits that Re Bourgault is a judgment of this Court directly in its favour. Counsel for the Board distinguishes Re Bourgault on the basis it was dealing with a claim under para. (j) of s. 107(1) as opposed to para. (h) and para. (j) ends with the phrase "notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary". This, he submits, makes it clear that the provincial legislation yields to the scheme of distribution under s. 107(1) as far as claims under para. (j) are concerned. No such overriding language appears in para. (h).

33. With respect, it seems to me that the "notwithstanding" language in para. (j) was a second string to the Court's bow in Re Bourgault. I think this is the significance of Pigeon J.'s comment at p. 43 of his reasons:

Due to the "notwithstanding", I find it even clearer in para. 107(1)(j) that the federal Parliament intended to deal with the preferential rights of the federal and provincial tax collectors, just as it intended in para. 107(1)(e) and (f) to define those of municipal corporations and of lessors.

(Emphasis added.)

The "notwithstanding" language reinforced the principle in Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue and Re Gingras Automobile Ltée, that provincial legislation yields to federal in the event of bankruptcy. I do not think the majority reasons in Re Bourgault can be divorced from the wider principle and made to rest solely on the "notwithstanding" provision. I am supported in this view by the judgment of Cowan C.J. in Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. (1981), 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 176. The Chief Justice said at p. 191:

Digitized by Google

The claim of the Worker's Compensation Board is specifically referred to in s. 107(1)(h) and is not removed from the scope of that paragraph by the opening words of s. 107(1) preserving the rights of secured creditors. It is entitled to the priority provided for by s. 107(1)(h) and is not entitled to the statutory security or priority which s. 125 of the Workers' Compensation Act purports to create, and which would be valid and effective in the absence of bankruptcy of the employer.

And at p. 192:

The result, in my opinion, is that so long as there is no bankruptcy, full effect must be given to statutory provisions such as those contained in the Labour Standards Code of this province and in the Workers' Compensation Act of this province, which create liens and charges on property ranking ahead of pre-existing interests such as those created by mortgages or assignments of book debts, affecting the property said to be subject to the statutory liens and charges. However, when bankruptcy occurs, the provisions of s. 107 of the Bankruptcy Act take effect and the scheme of distribution of the property of the bankrupt coming into the hands of the trustee must be followed. The statutory liens and charges, to the extent to which they are affected by the provisions of s. 107, cease to be of any force and effect. The rights of secured creditors, whose security arises apart from such statutes, are preserved and may be enforced against the property charged by way of security. The creditors for whose benefit the statutory liens and charges were created are no longer entitled to enforce those statutory liens and charges, except to the extent permitted by s. 107, and their claims are dealt with in the priority set out in s. 107.

34. The Chief Justice was affirmed in the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal sub nom. Director of Labour Standards of Nova Scotia and L'écoute Compensation Board of Nova Scotia v. Trustee in Bankruptcy (1981), 38 C.B.R. (N.S.) 253. Jones J. speaking for the court said, at p. 260:

In view of these remarks I fail to see how it can be argued that Re Clemenshaw can still be considered a valid interpretation of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. Mr. Justice Pigeon made it abundantly clear that priorities of provincial claims must be determined in accordance with s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary. Debts under the Workers' Compensation Act fall under s. 107(1)(h) of the Act. Claims for wages are governed by s. 107(1)(d). With deference, it is not open to the province to provide any higher or more extensive priority for wages in view of the express provisions contained in that clause. It is clear from Rainville that the provincial Crown cannot claim as a secured creditor under the Bankruptcy Act, notwithstanding the form of the provincial legislation, where the claim is governed by s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. In my view, the claims in the present case fall under s. 107(1) and accordingly the appeals must be dismissed with costs.

35. The Court of Appeal of British Columbia, sitting as a panel of five, followed Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. in L'écoute Compensation Board v. Kinross Mortgage Corporation, reflex, [1982] 1 W.W.R. 87, and agreed with the Nova Scotia courts that its own earlier decision in Re Clemenshaw must be taken to have been overruled by this Court in Re Bourgault.

36. I believe that these authorities are determinative of the issue before us on this appeal and that the basis on which the Alberta Court of Appeal sought to distinguish them is an untenable one. I refer to the following excerpt from the reasons of Lieberman J.:

In my view Re Bourgault and Re Black Forest are distinguishable from the case at bar and are not authority for the proposition that a claimant whose claim falls within s. 107 cannot be a "secured creditor" even if the claim satisfies the requirements of s. 2. The L'écoute Compensation Act of Nova Scotia provides that the claim of the Board establishes a lien against the assets of the employer without the Board having to perform an overt act, whereas in the Alberta legislation (s. 78(4)) a floating charge is created which becomes a proprietary interest only after the Board has performed overt acts of filing the certificate and initiating distress proceedings. The Board in this case has performed those overt acts and in my view it has caused a floating charge to be crystallized in accordance with s. 78(4) of the L'écoute Compensation Act. The claim thus comes within the definition of "secured creditor" in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act.

37. With respect, the issue in Re Bourgault and Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. was not whether a proprietary interest has been created under the relevant provincial legislation. It was whether provincial legislation, even if it did create a proprietary interest, could defeat the scheme of distribution under s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. These cases held that it could not, that while the provincial legislation could validly secure debts on the property of the debtor in a non-bankruptcy situation, once bankruptcy occurred s. 107(1) determined the status and priority of the claims specifically dealt with in the section. It was not open to the claimant in bankruptcy to say: By virtue of the applicable provincial legislation I am a secured creditor within the meaning of the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and therefore the priority accorded my claim under the relevant paragraph of s. 107(1) does not apply to me. In effect, this is the position adopted by the Court of Appeal and advanced before us by the respondent. It cannot be supported as a matter of statutory interpretation of s. 107(1) since, if the section were to be read in this way, it would have the effect of permitting the provinces to determine priorities on a bankruptcy, a matter within exclusive federal jurisdiction.

38. How then should the constitutional question stated by the Chief Justice be answered? Does s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act conflict with s. 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act so as to render the latter provision inoperable? I do not believe so. Section 78(4) does not purport to deal with a bankruptcy situation and, by virtue of the presumption of constitutionality, the provincial legislature is presumed to be legislating within its competence rather than outside it. Faced with the choice of construing the provincial legislation in a way which would cause it to invade the federal sphere, thereby attracting the doctrine of paramountcy, or construing it in accordance with the presumption of constitutionality, I prefer the latter course. I believe also that it accords better with the more recent authorities on the scope of the paramountcy doctrine.

39. In Smith v. The Queen, 1960 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1960] S.C.R. 776, Martland J. expressed the view at p. 800 that the doctrine of paramountcy only applies so as to render provincial legislation inoperative when "compliance with one law involves breach of the other". This approach was continued in Construction Montcalm Inc. v. Minimum Wage Commission, 1978 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 754, where Beetz J. stated at p. 780 that "it was incumbent upon Montcalm to establish that it could not comply with provincial law without committing a breach of the federal Act" and that "Montcalm had to prove that federal and provincial law were in actual conflict for the purposes of this case". In Beetz J.'s view a person challenging provincial legislation on the basis of the paramountcy doctrine must establish an inevitable conflict between the two pieces of legislation in the particular situation: it was not enough that the two provisions might on one reading conflict.

40. This approach has most recently been re-affirmed by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161. He states, at p. 191:

In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other.

I do not believe that this is the case here. I think rather that the applicable principle is the one stated by Laskin C.J. in Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., 1976 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054, at p. 1065, to the effect that "if the provincial legislation is of general application, it will be construed so as not to apply to such enterprises", i.e., those within federal competence.

41. As Professor Hogg points out in his text Constitutional Law of Canada, the narrower the definition of conflict, the broader the scope within which valid provincial legislation can operate: the broader the definition of conflict, the greater the impact of the paramountcy doctrine to cut it down. He states, at p. 103:

When are two laws deemed to be inconsistent (or conflicting) so as to attract the doctrine of paramountcy? The question has profound implications for the scope of judicial review and for the balance of power in the federal system. Given the overriding force of federal law, a wide definition of inconsistency will result in the defeat of provincial laws in "fields" which are "covered" by federal law; a narrow definition, on the other hand, will allow provincial laws to survive so long as they do not "expressly contradict" federal law. The wide definition is the course of judicial activism in favour of central power; the narrow definition is the course of judicial restraint, leaving all but the irreconcilable conflicts to be resolved in the political arena.

42. I believe that the trend of the more recent authorities favours a restrictive approach to the concept of "conflict" and a construction of impugned provincial legislation, where this is possible, so as to avoid operational conflict with valid federal legislation. Where this is done both provisions can stand and have their own legitimate spheres of operation. In this sense I find no conflict between s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and s. 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act. I would accordingly answer the question as framed by stating that s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act applies to determine priorities on a bankruptcy and s. 78(4) of The L'écoute Compensation Act has no application in such a situation.

43. I would allow the appeal and grant the appellant its costs throughout to be taxed on the appropriate scale.

Exceptions - Sec. 86(2)

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply

(a) to claims that are secured by a security or charge of a kind that can be obtained by persons other than Her Majesty or a workers' compensation body

(i) pursuant to any law, or

(ii) pursuant to provisions of federal or provincial legislation, where those provisions do not have as their sole or principal purpose the establishment of a means of securing claims of Her Majesty or of a workers' compensation body; and

(b) to the extent provided in subsection 87(2), to claims that are secured by a security referred to in subsection 87(1), if the security is registered in accordance with that subsection.

Exceptions - Sec. 86(3)

(3) Subsection (1) does not affect the operation of

(a) subsections 224(1.2) and (1.3) of the Income Tax Act;

(b) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts; or

(c) any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum

(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

(ii) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection,

and for the purpose of paragraph (c), the provision of provincial legislation is, despite any Act of Canada or of a province or any other law, deemed to have the same effect and scope against any creditor, however secured, as subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act in respect of a sum referred to in subparagraph (c)(i), or as subsection 23(2) of the Canada Pension Plan in respect of a sum referred to in subparagraph (c)(ii), and in respect of any related interest, penalties or other amounts.

Supreme Court of Canada
Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., [1978] 1 S.C.R. 753
Date: 1977-01-25
Donald A. Robinson, Trustee in Bankruptcy of Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. (Plaintiff) Appellant;
and
Countrywide Factors Ltd. (Defendant) Respondent.
1976: February 17, 18; 1977: January 25.
Present: Laskin C.J. and Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Spence, Pigeon, Dickson, Beetz and de Grandpré JJ.
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN
Bankruptcy—Debtor and creditor—Fraudulent preferences—Whether The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397, ultra vires provincial Legislature—Alternatively whether ss. 3 and 4 of Act, while being within legislative competence of provincial Legislature, in conflict with valid federal legislation—Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, ss. 50(6), 73.

The appellant was trustee in bankruptcy of K Co. pursuant to a receiving order of November 19, 1968. On November 19, 1966, K Co. entered into a transaction with a pressing creditor, the respondent, whereby it sold certain stock-in-trade to a third person (payment being made to the respondent which reduced the indebtedness of K Co. accordingly) and also agreed to give the respondent a debenture on its stock-in-trade for its remaining indebtedness. The debenture was executed in March 1967 and duly registered. After the receiving order against K Co. was made, proceedings were taken by the appellant to set aside the transaction of November 19, 1966, as constituting a fraudulent preference under ss. 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397, and to recover the money paid to the respondent and to annul the debenture.

The trial judge found that K Co. was insolvent at the time of the transaction of November 19, 1966, that there was a concurrent intention of K Co. and the respondent to give and receive a preference, and that, consequently, both the payment made to the respondent and the debenture constituted fraudulent preferences under The Fraudulent Preferences Act and were hence impeachable. On appeal, this judgment was set aside on the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal that the appellant had failed to prove that K Co. was insolvent on November 19, 1966.

Upon the trustee in bankruptcy obtaining leave to appeal to this Court, the respondent, in accordance with the Rules of this Court, and in view of the fact that it wished to argue the ultra vires character of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, applied for directions and this Court ordered that notice be served on the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorneys General of the Provinces of the following questions: 1. Whether The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397, is ultra vires of the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan. 2. Alternatively, whether ss. 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, while being within the legislative competence of the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan, are in conflict with valid legislation of the Parliament of Canada relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, namely, the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3.

Held (Laskin C.J. and Martland, Dickson and de Grandpré JJ. dissenting on the constitutional issue): The appeal should be allowed and the judgment at trial restored.

Per Judson, Ritchie, Spence, Pigeon and Beetz JJ.: The Fraudulent Preferences Act is not ultra vires and ss. 3 and 4 of the Act are not in conflict with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

On a consideration of the main cases on the subject, the better view is to confine the effect of s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act to providing for the invalidity of transactions within its exact scope, i.e. transactions within the three-month period provided for in the section. To that extent, the Parliament of Canada, by valid legislation upon "bankruptcy" and "insolvency", has covered the field but has refrained from completely covering the whole field of transactions avoided by provincial legislation. The enactment in 1949 of the provisions now found in s. 50(6) of the Bankruptcy Act is a plain indication that Parliament recognized that provisions in provincial statutes dealing with preferential transactions were still valid provincial enactments in reference to "property" and "civil rights" and were valuable aids to trustees in bankruptcy in attacking the validity of such transactions and should be available to the said trustees in bankruptcy.

The appellant trustee had produced a prima facie case to show that the debtor was unable to pay his debts in full by realization of his assets in November 1966, and, accordingly, s. 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act applied to avoid the transaction in question.

Per Pigeon and Beetz JJ.: When the exclusive power to make laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency was bestowed upon Parliament, it was not intended to remove from the general legal systems which regulated property and civil rights a cardinal concept essential to the coherence of those systems, namely the concept of insolvency in the non-statutory sense. The main purpose was to give to Parliament exclusive jurisdiction over the establishment by statute of a particular system regulating the distribution of a debtor's assets. However, given the nature of general legal systems, the primary jurisdiction of Parliament cannot easily be exercised together with its incidental powers without some degree of overlap in which case federal law prevails. On the other hand, provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights should not be measured by the ultimate reach of federal power over bankruptcy and insolvency any more than provincial competence in relation to the administration of justice can be determined by every conceivable and potential use of the criminal law power.

Laws provincial in their purpose, object and nature cannot be rendered ultra vires because of virtual federal paramountcy: they can only become inoperative in case of actual repugnancy with valid federal laws. Section 50(6) of the Bankruptcy Act provides a clear indication that Parliament, far from intending to depart from the rule of operational conflict, did in fact aim at the highest possible degree of legal integration of federal and provincial laws: attacks upon transactions within the three-month period provided by s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act constitute a minimum but the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to avail himself of all other rights and remedies provided by provincial law "as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by" the Bankruptcy Act.

Per Laskin C.J. and Martland, Dickson and de Grandpré JJ., dissenting on the constitutional issue: Provincial legislation which purports to provide for impeachment of preferences to creditors given by a person who is then insolvent, where insolvency is the sine qua non of impeachability, is invalid as a direct invasion of exclusive federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. Hence, ss. 3 and 4 of the Saskatchewan Fraudulent Preferences Act are ultra vires. Moreover, in so far as these sections prescribe an impeachment period which enables a creditor to set aside a preference made beyond the period fixed by the Bankruptcy Act, and hence not impeachable under that Act, it interferes with the operation of the Bankruptcy Act and is, indeed, repugnant to it. It must be remembered that where, as in the present case, there has been a receiving order, the intrusion of provincial legislation relating to transactions entered into by an insolvent, must interfere with the rateable distribution of the bankrupt's property according to the scheme of distribution prescribed by the Bankruptcy Act. Whether that scheme is faulty in the view of a Court is immaterial; the correction must come from the responsible Legislature. No more under bankruptcy and insolvency law than under the criminal law can a Province make unlawful what is lawful under valid federal legislation, nor make lawful what is unlawful under valid federal legislation.

The judgment of Laskin C.J. and Martland, Dickson and de Grandpré JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting)—There are two issues in this appeal which is here by leave of this Court. The first is whether a certain transaction and, in particular, a certain debenture, granted on a debtor's stock-in-trade in pursuance of the transaction between the debtor and the respondent creditor, was a fraudulent preference that was impeachable under ss. 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397; and the second is whether, if it was so impeachable, those provisions of the provincial Act were ultra vires as an invasion of exclusive federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency or, alternatively, were inoperative in the face of the preference provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3.

The appellant is trustee in bankruptcy of Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. pursuant to a receiving order of November 19, 1968. On November 19, 1966, Kozan entered into a transaction with a pressing creditor, the respondent, whereby it sold certain stock-in-trade to a third person (payment being made to the respondent which reduced Kozan's indebtedness accordingly) and also agreed to give the respondent a debenture on its stock-in-trade for its remaining indebtedness. The debenture was executed on or about March 20, 1967, and duly registered. After the receiving order against Kozan was made, proceedings were taken by the appellant trustee in bankruptcy to set aside the transaction of November 19, 1966, as constituting a fraudulent preference under the provincial Fraudulent Preferences Act and to recover the money paid to the respondent and to annul the debenture.

MacPherson J. found that Kozan was insolvent at the time of the transaction of November 19, 1966, that there was a concurrent intention of Kozan and the respondent to give and receive a preference, and that, consequently, both the payment made to the respondent and the debenture constituted fraudulent preferences under the provincial statute and were hence impeachable. On appeal, this judgment was set aside on the view of the majority of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal that the appellant had failed to prove that Kozan was insolvent on November 19, 1966. The trial judge was not called upon to deal with any constitutional issue, and the majority of the Court of Appeal did not have to do so in view of its finding on insolvency. Hall J.A. who dissented supported the trial judge's finding of insolvency, and in a one sentence assertion, in reliance upon Re Panfab Corp. Ltd.[2], he rejected the contention that The Fraudulent Preferences Act was ultra vires.

I would not interfere with the findings of the judge of first instance that Kozan was insolvent at the material time and that Kozan intended to give and the respondent intended to receive a preference. This is the view of my brother Spence who, in exhaustive reasons, also concluded that The Fraudulent Preferences Act as a whole was not ultra vires nor was either s. 3 or s. 4 inoperative in the face of the Bankruptcy Act. I have a different opinion on the constitutional issue in this case, as appears from what now follows. That issue does not invite this Court to pronounce on the validity of provincial legislation dealing with fraudulent conveyances or with fraudulent transactions in general. Thus, to take as an example the Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 182, nothing said in these reasons is to be taken as impugning the validity of that or similar enactments. They do not, ex facie, depend on proof of insolvency or on bankruptcy. In so far as any of the case law, some of it canvassed by my brother Spence, relates to such legislation and carries it into a consideration of the validity of provincial preference legislation which depends, as do ss. 3 and 4 of the Saskatchewan Fraudulent Preferences Act, on a condition of insolvency, I find it inapt for the determination of the constitutional question in this appeal.

Sections 3 and 4 aforesaid are in the following terms:

> 3. Subject to sections 8, 9, 10 and 11 every gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer, delivery over or payment of goods, chattels or effects or of bills, bonds, notes or securities or of shares, dividends, premiums or bonus in a bank, company or corporation, or of any other property real or personal, made by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency, with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice his creditors or any one or more of them, is void as against the creditor or creditors injured, delayed or prejudiced.

4. Subject to sections 8, 9, 10 and 11 every gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer, delivery over or payment of goods, chattels or effects or of bills, bonds, notes or securities or of shares, dividends, premiums or bonus in a bank, company or corporation, or of any other property real or personal, made by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency to or for a creditor, with intent to give that creditor preference over his other creditors or over any one or more of them, is void as against the creditor or creditors injured, delayed, prejudiced or postponed.

Sections 8, 9, 10 and 11, to which each of the foregoing provisions is subject, do not affect the constitutional issue, being concerned with bona fide sales or payments to innocent purchasers, to valid sales for consideration and to protection of security given up by a creditor. The present cases does not involve ss. 8 to 11.

I approach the question of validity on principle and on authority. So far as principle is concerned, the starting point is in relevant words of the British North America Act, namely s. 91(21), "bankruptcy and insolvency", as they relate to s. 92(13), "property and civil rights in the Province". The elucidation of the meaning and scope of s. 91(21), as of the meaning and scope of any other heads of legislative power, can hardly ever be a purely abstract exercise, even where an attempt is made at neutral definition; but I see no reason why judicial pronouncements, especially at the appellate level where they are those of the Court, should not be considered as throwing light upon the integrity of the head of power in the scheme of the British North America Act as a whole.

Four things stand out. First, s. 91(21) is an exclusive federal power; second, it is a power confided to the Parliament of Canada notwithstanding anything else in the Act; third, it is a power, like the criminal law power, whose ambit, did not and does not lie frozen under conceptions held of bankruptcy and insolvency in 1867: see the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act reference, Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney General for Canada[3], at pp. 402-403; and, fourth, the term "insolvency" in s. 91(21) has as much an independent operation in the reservation of an exclusive area of legislative competence to the Parliament of Canada as the term "bankruptcy"; see Canadian Bankers Association v. Attorney-General of Saskatchewan[4], per Rand J., at p. 46.

The view taken by the Privy Council and by this Court as to the meaning of "insolvency", as well after as before the abolition of Privy Council appeals, has been a uniform one. Lord Thankerton, speaking for the Privy Council in the Farmers Creditors Arrangement Act reference, supra, at p. 402, expressed it as follows:

> In a general sense, insolvency means inability to meet one's debts or obligations; in a technical sense, it means the condition or standard of inability to meet debts or obligations, upon the occurrence of which the statutory law enables a creditor to intervene with the assistance of a Court, to stop individual action by creditors and to secure administration of the debtor's assets in the general interest of creditors; the law also generally allows the debtor to apply for the same administration.

This definition was referred to with approval in the majority judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada delivered by Kerwin C.J.C. in Reference re Validity of the Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alta.)[5], at p. 576. Earlier in Reference re Alberta Debt Adjustment Act[6], at p. 40, Duff C.J.C. speaking for all but one of the members of the Court took as an additional ground for invalidating the challenged provincial legislation in that case that the powers of the provincial statutory tribunal set up under that legislation would normally "come into operation when a state of insolvency exists"; and he continued: "It is not too much to say that it is for the purpose of dealing with the affairs of debtors who are pressed and unable to pay their debts as they fall due that these powers and duties are created." If it is for Parliament alone to deal with insolvency, indeed to define it where it chooses to do so and to leave it otherwise to judicial definition, there can be no argument about unlawful invasion of provincial power in relation to property and civil rights. A limitation upon such power necessarily inheres in the federal catalogue of powers in s. 91, and it was recognized as early as 1880 in Cushing v. Dupuy[7], at p. 415, in respect of the federal bankruptcy and insolvency power.

I refer to two other propositions before turning to what I consider to be the relevant cases. First, there is the well-recognized proposition that federal abstinence from legislation in relation to an exclusive head of legislative power does not leave that legislative area open to provincial action: see Union Colliery Co. v. Bryden[8], at p. 588. The principle of our Constitution as it relates to legislative power is not one of simple concurrency of authority subject only to a variable doctrine of paramountcy. Exclusiveness is central to the scheme of distribution, save as to a specified number of concurrent powers, such as those in s. 95. It is only under the umbrella of the doctrine of exclusiveness that the relative scope of federal and provincial authority is assessed, the assessment being carried forward to determine whether there is preclusion or supersession where both federal and provincial legislation are in competition. This brings me to the second point. I take the same view here that was taken by Duff C.J.C. in the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act reference and I adopt his words at p. 40, namely that although the motives of a provincial Legislature may be laudable ones, it is precluded from seeking to realize its object by entering into a field not open to it.

Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada[9], generally known as the Voluntary Assignments case, stands as the general support for provincial legislation of the kind or allied to the kind of legislation that is challenged in the present case. It concerned only one section, s. 9, of the Ontario Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1887, c. 124, first enacted in 1885 by 1885 (Can.), c. 26. That section was as follows:

> An assignment for the general benefit of creditors under this Act shall take precedence of all judgments and of all executions not completely executed by payment, subject to the lien, if any, of an execution creditor for his costs, where there is but one execution in the sherrif's hands, or to the lien, if any, of the creditor for his costs, who has the first execution in the sherriff's hands.

This Act replaced the earlier pre-Confederation legislation found in C.S.U.C. 1859, c. 26, under the title The Indigent Debtors Act, which was continued in the post-Confederation legislation of Ontario as An Act respecting The Fraudulent Preference of Creditors by persons in insolvent circumstances, and included in R.S.O. 1877, c. 118. What is significant in this earlier legislation is that (as set out in s. 2 of R.S.O. 1877, c. 118) it dealt with "any person being at the time in insolvent circumstances or unable to pay his debts in full, or knowing himself to be on the eve of insolvency". The substituted Act of 1885 continued the reference to insolvency in respect of preferences, but it also introduced new provisions respecting assignments for the benefit of creditors and these provisions, as was noted in the Voluntary Assignments case, were not predicated on insolvency and, indeed, were to a large degree separated from the preference provisions of the Act, as is reflected in s. 3 of R.S.O. 1887, c. 124.

Certainly, as the Privy Council noted, the challenged provision, s. 9, had to be taken in the context of the entire Act. There is no doubt, as well, that the issue of validity was recognized as arising at a time when there was no federal bankruptcy or insolvency legislation in force, the only such legislation, the Insolvency Act of 1875 having been repealed in 1880 by 1880 (Can.), c. 1. The majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal, to which the question of the validity of s. 9 had been referred, found that it was ultra vires as invading exclusive federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency; see Re Assignments and Preferences Act, Section 9[10]. The reversal of this judgment by the Privy Council was accompanied by an acknowledgement of the broad scope of federal power under s. 91(21) when affirmatively exercised but it was held that this power was not invaded by an enactment relating to an assignment that was purely voluntary.

The explanation for this result is found in two passages of the Privy Council's reasons. First, "it is to be observed that an assignment for the general benefit of creditors has long been known to the jurisprudence of this country and also of Canada, and has its force and effect at common law quite independently of any system of bankruptcy or insolvency, or any legislation relating thereto" (at p. 198). Second, "the operation of an assignment for the benefit of creditors was precisely the same, whether the assignor was or was not insolvent... The validity of the assignment and its effect would in no way depend on the insolvency of the assignor, and their Lordships think it clear that the 9th section would equally apply whether the assignor was or was not insolvent" (at p. 199). What is evident, therefore, from that case is that, unlike the situation here, the operation of the provincial enactment did not depend on insolvency and the Privy Council was willing to treat s. 9 as having an object that was independent of it. This may even be a supportable view today, albeit there is a range of existing federal legislation dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency. I should note, however, that in the majority judgment of this Court in Reference re the Validity of the Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alta.)[11], at pp. 576-577, Kerwin C.J.C. referring to the Voluntary Assignments reference, said "it is doubtful whether in view of later pronouncements of the Judicial Committee it would at this date be decided in the same sense, even in the absence of Dominion legislation upon the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency".

The later pronouncements of the Privy Council include its judgment in the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act reference[12], as well as in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act reference, supra. Equally important is the judgment of this Court in Canadian Bankers Association v. Attorney-General of Saskatchewan[13], dealing with the validity of provincial moratorium legislation. It was in line with the decision in the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act reference in finding an invasion of federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. I think it enough, for present purposes, to refer to what Locke J., speaking for the majority of the Court, said, at p. 42:

> Power to declare a moratorium for the relief of the residents of a Province generally in some great emergency, such as existed in 1914 and in the days of the lengthy depression in the thirties is one thing, but power to intervene between insolvent debtors and their creditors irrespective of the reasons which have rendered the debtor unable to meet his liabilities is something entirely different.

Although judgments of the Privy Council and of this Court (and I add to those already cited Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue[14]) have recognized the broad power of Parliament to embrace in its legislation in relation to bankruptcy or insolvency provisions which might otherwise fall within provincial competence, I know of no case in those Courts, other than Ladore v. Bennett[15], where provincial legislation has been sustained, either in the absence of or in the face of federal legislation, when such provincial legislation depends for its operation only upon insolvency. Ladore v. Bennett can best be explained as involving municipal reorganization and hence as being concerned with the amalgamation and financial restructuring of units of local government for which the provincial Legislature has a direct responsibility, albeit some of the municipalities involved in the legislatively-directed reorganization were insolvent. It is, indeed, a special case of a piece of special legislation enacted in pursuance of the power conferred by s. 92(8) of the British North America Act, and I do not regard it as offering any lead to continuing legislation relating to private debtors and their creditors.

It is plain to me that if provincial legislation avowedly directed to insolvency, and to transactions between debtor and creditor consummated in a situation of insolvency, can be sustained as validly enacted, unless overborne by competent federal legislation, there is a serious breach of the principle of exclusiveness which embraces insolvency under s. 91(21). This Court so held in a series of cases where the encroachment on the federal bankruptcy and insolvency power was less obvious than that exhibited here. I refer, of course, to the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act reference, supra, to the Canadian Bankers' Association case, supra, and to the Orderly Payment of Debts Act 1959 (Alta.) reference, supra. It would be a curious reversal of the proposition, enunciated in Madden v. Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Co.[16], namely, that you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly, to hold that the Province can do directly what it cannot do indirectly.

The case put forward by the appellant and by the intervening Provinces which supported him goes even farther. It is contended that notwithstanding the existence of federal bankruptcy legislation dealing with preferences, the challenged provincial legislation can still operate in respect of a particular preference which is given outside of the time limits within which the federal control operates, so long at least as the provincial provision is not more stringent.

I do not follow this line of reasoning, especially on the submission of greater or lesser stringency.

The relevant federal provision is s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act which reads as follows:

> 73. (1) Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor or of any person in trust for any creditor with a view to giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors shall, if the person making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same becomes bankrupt within three months after the date of making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same, be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.
> (2) Where any such conveyance, transfer, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, or over any one or more of them, it shall be presumed prima facie to have been made, incurred, taken, paid or suffered with a view to giving such creditor a preference over other creditors, whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be receivable or avail to support such transaction.
> (3) For the purposes of this section, the expression "creditor" includes a surety or guarantor for the debt due to such creditor.

This provision cannot be taken in isolation. The Bankruptcy Act is a code on the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency, defining what is an act of bankruptcy, who is an insolvent person, prescribing what are vulnerable settlements as well as what are vulnerable preferences, declaring what is comprised in a bankrupt's estate, providing for priorities in distribution and for rateable distribution. It provides also, as in the present s. 31(1), for the making of an assignment by an insolvent person for the benefit of creditors as well as providing by s. 24(1)(a) that it is an act of bankruptcy to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors whether the assignment is or is not authorized by the Bankruptcy Act. In short, apart from the question whether provincial legislation predicated on insolvency is ipso facto invalid, I see no room for any assertion that such provincial legislation can continue to have operative effect in the face of the scope of the Bankruptcy Act embracing both bankruptcy and insolvency in its provisions.

It is worth a reminder that there is no common law of bankruptcy and insolvency, and hence it cannot be said that there was an existing common law course of decision which was being embraced by provincial legislation. The common law did not distinguish the fraudulent from the insolvent debtor; it was through legislation that such a distinction was made. If a provincial Legislature wishes to proscribe fraudulent transactions, it is compelled by the British North America Act to ensure that its legislation dealing with such transactions does not focus on insolvency.

Of the many cases cited in argument before this Court, I can put to one side Re Davison[17] and Re Panfab Corp. Ltd.[18], both of which, decisions of single judges, dealt largely with the Ontario Fraudulent Conveyances Act which, as I have already said, does not depend for its activation either on insolvency or on bankruptcy nor on any question of preference such as that presented here. Similarly, I put to one side Allison& Burnham Concrete Ltd. v. Mountain View Construction Ltd.[19], a judgment of Ruttan J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court, in so far as it was concerned with the British Columbia Fraudulent Conveyances Act, akin to the Ontario Act of the same name.

Chronologically, the first of the cited cases that calls for consideration here is Hoffar Ltd. v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd.[20]; leave to appeal refused[21]. It was a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal involving the question whether s. 3 of the provincial Fraudulent Preferences Act (similar to ss. 3 and 4 of the Saskatchewan Act in the present case) was in conflict with the then preference provision, s. 64, of the federal Bankruptcy Act.

It is important to note, as stated by British Columbia Chief Justice Macdonald, that no argument was raised in the Hoffar case as to the validity of either the provincial Fraudulent Preferences Act or the Bankruptcy Act. A second significant aspect of the decision is that the Court felt it was immaterial that the federal Act prescribed a three-month period for invalidation of a transaction while the provincial Act prescribed a 60-day period. In fact, the transaction sought to be impugned was made less than 60 days before an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, and there was a finding that the debtor was insolvent at the time of the transaction. The judge of first instance found that although the transaction had the effect of giving a preference it was not made with a view thereto. Under the Bankruptcy Act, there was a rebuttable presumption in such a case that the transaction was concluded with a view to a preference and it was found that there was rebutting evidence. However the provincial Act made the transaction void irrespective of rebutting evidence, and the judge at first instance applied this Act.

The British Columbia Court of Appeal reversed this decision holding that the provincial provisions were inoperative because they were in conflict with the federal Act. A fortiori, the provincial provisions would be inoperative, in my view, if a transaction was made with a view to giving a preference. Leave to appeal was refused by Mignault J. in the Supreme Court of Canada on the ground that the decision sought to be appealed was plainly right; and he added a reference to a passage in the reasons in the Voluntary Assignments case where the Privy Council spoke of the preclusion of the provincial Legislature from interfering with federal bankruptcy legislation.

This preclusive principle of non-interference is as applicable in connection with the federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency as it is in the field of criminal law. In that connection, I point to the words of the late Justice Rand in Johnson v. Attorney General of Alberta[22], at p. 138, and adapt them here to say that "any local legislation of a supplementary nature that would tend to weaken or confuse [the] enforcement [of the Bankruptcy Act] would be an interference with the exclusive power of Parliament".

It is worth adding that in his reasons in the British Columbia Court of Appeal in the Hoffar case M.A. Macdonald J.A. indicated that provincial fraudulent conveyances legislation could be invoked where the Bankruptcy Act did not apply on the facts, even if provincial fraudulent preference legislation could not be.

The next case for consideration is Re Pommier[23], a judgment of Fisher J.A. sitting in bankruptcy. I accept one of its premises, namely, that the Bankruptcy Act did not oust all provincial legislation respecting fraudulent transactions, as for example, the Ontario Fraudulent Conveyances Act. This was the same point taken in the Hoffar case. However, unlike the result in the Hoffar case (which was cited but not followed) the Court in Re Pommier held that in the case of a preferential transaction which took place more than three months before an assignment in bankruptcy (and therefore outside the preference period under the federal Act), resort could be had to the provincial Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1927, c. 162 to impeach it. The learned judge invoked a so-called doctrine of overlapping, which he distinguished from a situation of conflict, in holding the provincial Act to be available. In my opinion, he misconceived its purport as it was enunciated in Grand Trunk Railway Co. v. Attorney General of Canada[24], at p. 68. The proposition there related to a situation where "the field is clear" to one Legislature or the other. The Privy Council noted that "if the field is not clear and in such a domain the two legislations meet, then the Dominion legislation must prevail".

It is only necessary to add that Re Pommier was overruled by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Trenwith[25], where Masten J.A. said at p. 333 (after referring to the Voluntary Assignments case, to Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue and to the Hoffar case):

> ...it seems clear to me that the common field of legislation respecting the distribution of the estates of insolvents having now become occupied by the Dominion Bankruptcy Act, the provisions of the Assignments and Preferences Act respecting the preference of one creditor over another have been thereby superseded and have ceased to have any operation. If I am right in this conclusion, the effect is to overrule... Re Pommier.

Davis J.A. who dissented on other grounds was also of the opinion that "since the enactment of bankruptcy legislation by the Dominion Parliament this provincial statute cannot be invoked" (at p. 343).

To the same effect was the opinion of this Court expressed by Duff C.J.C. in In re Bozanich[26], at p. 136, that "the provisions of R.S.O. 1927, c. 162 in relation to preferences are superseded by s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the authority of the Ontario Legislature to enact such legislation is, in consequence of the enactment of s. 64, suspended in view of the concluding clause of s. 91 [of the British North America Act]".

Three judgments at first instance may be mentioned before I go on to consider the unanimous judgment of the Alberta Appellate Division, sitting as a Bench of five, in Attorney-General of Alberta v. Nash and Guelph Engineering Co.[27] The three cases are Crown Coal Co. Ltd. v. Swanson Lumber Co. Ltd.[28]; Gard v. Yates[29]; and Totem Radio Supply Co. Ltd. v. Stone[30]. All three of these cases concerned issues of alleged conflict between provincial and federal legislation respecting rights of creditors of a person who has made an authorized assignment or was insolvent at a material time. The Crown Coal Co. Ltd. case, an Alberta judgment, did not turn on a constitutional issue and, at any rate, it cannot stand in the face of the Nash and Guelph Engineering Co. case. I am, similarly, unable to appreciate how either Gard v. Yates or the Totem Supply case, both British Columbia decisions, can stand against the reasoning in Nash and Guelph Engineering, the views expressed in Re Trenwith and those expressed by Duff C.J.C. in In re Bozanich. The first represents a decision overtaken by later authority, and the second cites no authorities at all, but on the point of alleged conflict between the respective provincial and federal preference provisions is content to say simply that there is no conflict where the preference is given outside the three-month period fixed by the federal Bankruptcy Act when the provincial Act fixes a larger period for impeachment. Reliance was placed on the then s. 41(6), now s. 50(6) of the Bankruptcy Act to which I will return later in these reasons. I should add that in another later British Columbia case, the Allison & Burnham Concrete Ltd. case, already mentioned, also a judgment of a single judge, Ruttan J. did canvass later authorities but decided to rest on earlier decisions, such as Gard v. Yates, to justify a construction that avoided any constitutional infirmity if the provincial Act gave a longer impeachment period than the federal Act. In effect, his view was to leave the constitutional issue to a higher Court. That is where it now is.

Attorney-General of Alberta v. Nash and Guelph Engineering Co. came before Milvain J., as he then was, through a proceeding by a trustee in bankruptcy to set aside payments made by the bankrupt company to its creditors within one year prior to bankruptcy but, save as to one payment, beyond the three-month period under the then s. 64, now s. 73, of the Bankruptcy Act. The trustee relied on s. 4 of the Alberta Fraudulent Preferences Act which, like the Saskatchewan provisions in issue here, is predicated for its operation on insolvency. It fixes a one-year period within which a transaction having the effect of giving a preference may be impeached as being utterly void. Milvain J. held that the Alberta Act was ultra vires as being in pith and substance insolvency legislation.

In the Alberta Appellate Division, Johnson J.A., speaking for a unanimous Court of five, was content to consider the Alberta Fraudulent Preferences Act, first enacted in 1922, and, in particular, s. 4 (with a 60-day impeachment period, enlarged in 1931 to one year) from the standpoint of its preclusion by the prior enactment of the federal Bankruptcy Act and its preference provisions. After a canvass of the authorities to date, he said this (at pp. 160-161):

> There can, I think, be no doubt that the impugned Act was ultra vires of the legislature when it was passed. Whatever can be said for similar legislation that was passed before the Bankruptcy Act become [sic] operative, this legislation, viewed in the light of sec. 64, becomes an attempt to cover the same ground that section covers. The enlargement of the time from 60 days to one year must be viewed as an attempt to strengthen the remedy which sec. 64 gives to creditors. Sec. 4 cannot be looked upon as legislation which was intended to deal with contracts and which only incidentally and as part of a larger scheme dealt with matters which were within the scope of one or more of the subjects mentioned in sec. 91. This section is what it purports to be. Legislation intended to prevent a person "at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency" (4 [a]), from disposing of his property in such a manner as to prefer one creditor over another. It is exactly what sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act was passed to prevent. If it is not in pith and substance insolvency legislation under the earlier cases, it has become so under the enlarged definition [of later cases] and also by virtue of sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act.
> Viewing sec. 64 as being ancillary to bankruptcy and insolvency legislation, there can be no doubt of the conflict between that section and this section of The Fraudulent Preferences Act. Sec. 64 fixes three months as the time within which proceedings must be taken to avoid preferential dealings. Transactions beyond that period cannot be attacked under that section and are, therefore, legal. To enlarge that period to one year is to render void payments and transfers of property which were valid under sec. 64. The exclusions from the operation of the two sections, while similar, exhibit a differing approach and there can be little doubt that sec. 64 gives a wider exemption than sec. 7 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act.

In coming to the conclusion that s. 4 of the Alberta Act was in conflict with the then s. 64 of the Federal Act, the learned judge in the Nash and Guelph Engineering case took into consideration s. 41(6) of the Bankruptcy Act, now s. 50(6), which reads as follows:

> (6) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by such law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

In my opinion, this provision is not designed to enlarge provincial authority, and Johnson J.A. rightly held that because of conflict it had no application. The provision aforesaid does not provide for the effacement of federal legislation to allow provincial legislation to operate but relates to provincial provisions which satisfy two conditions: first, they must be provisions which are independently valid; and, second, they must be provisions which do not conflict with the application and operation of federal provisions. I do not see how provincial legislation whose operation is predicated on insolvency can be anything but insolvency legislation, nor do I see how a provincial statute can validly provide that what a federal statute says is not impeachable can nonetheless be impeached. There is no difference, in my view, between the situation where a Province seeks to narrow the period of impeachability of a transaction and the situation where it seeks to enlarge it, especially when in either case it is doing this from the standpoint of insolvency as the triggering factor. This is a different thing from legislation dealing only with fraudulent preferences apart from or unrelated to insolvency. Here, although such legislation may be valid in the absence of federal legislation, there may nonetheless be operative incompatibility in particular cases but no general supersession or preclusion.

I wish now to address myself to an issue which, I think, has influenced the approach by single judges to the constitutional question in this case, and wrongly so. That issue is the undesirability of interfering with what appeared to be a practical way of reaching as many alleged preferences in fraud of creditors as possible, to use provincial legislation where federal legislation did not reach far enough, and to use provincial insolvency legislation if nothing else was available. Hence, the approach by way of construction, albeit a dip into a constitutional area was inevitable, avoiding a direct constitutional confrontation. There are cases even in this Court and on this very subject which have proceeded on a straight construction basis to examine whether operative effect can be given to provincial legislation in the face of a federal enactment. Two examples are Traders Finance Corp. Ltd. v. Levesque[31], and Produits de Caoutchouc Marquis Inc. v. Trottier[32]. I do not regard either of these cases as requiring a decision on constitutional grounds. The Traders Finance case concerned a largely procedural matter, namely, whether the failure of a trustee in bankruptcy to impeach a preference illegal under the Bankruptcy Act, precluded a suit by a creditor to that end. The Trottier case dealt with the effect of the Bankruptcy Act on the extent of a landlord's claim to rank as a preferred creditor.

There are numerous illustrations in other branches of the law where practices carried on for some time without objection on constitutional grounds were brought to an end when the constitutional question was raised directly. Perhaps the most celebrated instance was that considered by the Privy Council in Nadan v. The King[33], where a federal enactment of 1888 purporting to exclude appeals to the Privy Council in criminal matters was invalidated almost forty years later. Equally significant, because the issue was well known to the Ontario Bar which seems to have agreed to live with it as a matter of convenience, was the constitutional propriety of provincial legislation vesting jurisdiction in the Master to try mechanics' lien actions in the County of York. Once the constitutional issue was squarely raised the Courts did not back away from it and held that s. 96 of the British North America Act was offended: see Attorney-General for Ontario and Display Service Co. Ltd. v. Victoria Medical Building Ltd.[34]

There have been a number of recent cases where this Court has proceeded on a construction basis rather than on a constitutional basis in respect of the operation of both federal and provincial legislation, although aware that a constitutional question was involved but unwilling to deal with it unless raised by a party so that necessary notice could be given to the Attorneys-General, federal and provincial. One example is Les Immeubles Fournier Inc. v. Construction St-Hilaire Ltée[35], involving s. 8 of the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-18. Another is Canada Labour Relations Board v. Canadian National Railway Co.[36], which concerned the scope of s. 53(g) of the federal Industrial Relations and Dispute Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 152 (now s. 108, Part V of the Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-1) and whether it embraced (validity not put in issue) a hotel operated by the respondent railway.

Finally, on this phase of the case, I refer to Gingras v. General Motors Products of Canada Ltd.[37], which involved a question of prescription in respect of an action by a trustee in bankruptcy to set aside an illegal preference under the Bankruptcy Act. No constitutional question was directly involved, and the majority judgment held that a certain prescriptive provision of the Civil Code of Quebec did not apply so as to limit the trustee's right of action.

I conclude, therefore, as follows. Provincial legislation which purports to provide for impeachment of preferences to creditors given by a person who is then insolvent, where insolvency is the sine qua non of impeachability, is invalid as a direct invasion of exclusive federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. Hence, ss. 3 and 4 of Saskatchewan Fraudulent Preferences Act are ultra vires. Moreover, in so far as these sections prescribe an impeachment period which enables a creditor to set aside a preference made beyond the period fixed by the Bankruptcy Act, and hence not impeachable under that Act, it interferes with the operation of the Bankruptcy Act and is, indeed, repugnant to it. It must be remembered that where, as in the present case, there has been a receiving order, the intrusion of provincial legislation relating to transactions entered into by an insolvent, must interfere with the rateable distribution of the bankrupt's property according to the scheme of distribution prescribed by the Bankruptcy Act. Whether that scheme is faulty in the view of a Court is immaterial; the correction must come from the responsible Legislature. No more under bankruptcy and insolvency law than under the criminal law can a Province make unlawful what is lawful under valid federal legislation, nor make lawful what is unlawful under valid federal legislation.

In the result, I would answer the two questions in issue here in the affirmative. The judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal should be varied so as to restore the finding of insolvency by the trial judge but the appeal should otherwise be dismissed in view of the affirmative answers aforesaid. Leave is also given for a reference to determine the amount due under the debenture if the parties are unable to agree thereon. The respondent should have its costs in this Court but there should be no order as to costs to or against any of the intervenors.

Judson, Ritchie and Pigeon JJ. concurred with the judgment delivered by SPENCE J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan pronounced on March 14, 1974. By that judgment, the Court of Appeal allowed an appeal from the judgment of MacPherson J. pronounced on June 16, 1971. By the latter judgment, MacPherson J. had declared that the payment of the sum of $9,152.31 to the respondent was void as a preference under An Act respecting Fraudulent or Preferential Transfers, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397, and had given judgment in favour of the appellant against the respondent for that amount.

The issue determined by MacPherson J., in so far as may be adjudged from a perusal of the reasons for judgment delivered by the learned trial judge, was simply whether the transaction was or was not a preferential one voided by the provisions of that statute.

On the appeal to the Court of Appeal, the present respondent not only dealt with that issue but with the issue of whether the provincial statute was available to the appellant in this Court, there respondent, in an attack on the transaction.

Maguire J.A., in giving reasons for the majority of the Court of Appeal, held that the transaction was not a preferential one within the meaning of the section in the provincial Act respecting Fraudulent or Preferential Transfers and, therefore, was not called upon to determine whether that statute was available in whole or in part to the trustee in bankruptcy. Hall J.A., giving a dissenting judgment, found that the transaction was a preferential one within The Fraudulent Preferences Act and was, therefore, called upon to deal with the issue as to the validity and applicability of the provisions of The Fraudulent Preferences Act. Perhaps realizing that his reasons were dissenting, he did so in a very short paragraph, which I quote:

> The appellant contends that The Fraudulent Preferences Act, supra, is ultra vires of the legislation of the Province. For the reasons given in Re Panfab Corp. Ltd. [1971] 2 O.R. 202, with which I agree, this contention must be rejected.

Upon the trustee in bankruptcy obtaining leave to appeal to this Court, the respondent Countrywide Factors Ltd., in accordance with the Rules of this Court, and in view of the fact that it wished to argue the ultra vires character of the provincial Fraudulent Preferences Act, applied to this Court for directions and this Court ordered that notice of two questions be served on the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorneys General of the Provinces. The two questions were:

> 2. Alternatively, whether sections 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, Chapter 397, while being within the legislative competence of the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan, are in conflict with valid legislation of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, namely, the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, Chapter B-3.

As will be demonstrated hereafter, the transaction attacked by the trustee in bankruptcy occurred on November 19, 1966, or, at any rate, not later than March 20, 1967.

Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. was the subject of a receiving order in bankruptcy on November 19, 1968. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Act provisions as to preferential transactions contained in s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, which provides:

> 73. (1) Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor or of any person in trust for any creditor with a view to giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors shall, if the person making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same becomes bankrupt within three months after the date of making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same, be deemed fraudulent and void, as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.
> (2) Where any such conveyance, transfer, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, or over any one or more of them, it shall be presumed prima facie to have been made, incurred, taken, paid or suffered with a view to giving such creditor a preference over other creditors, whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be receivable or avail to support such transaction.
> (3) For the purposes of this section, the expression "creditor" includes a surety or guarantor for the debt due to such creditor.

has no application nor has s. 5 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397. In the Bankruptcy Act, the interval between the transaction and the declaration of bankruptcy is limited to three months and in The Fraudulent Preferences Act, s. 7 only applies if the attack is made within 60 days after the transaction. Therefore, in order to succeed, the appellant must have available to him the provisions of ss. 3 and 4 of the said Fraudulent Preferences Act. It is the submission of the respondent that either of those sections, or indeed the whole statute, is ultra vires of the Province of Saskatchewan or that ss. 3 and 4, while being within the legislative competence of the Legislature of the Province, are in conflict with the legislation of the Parliament of Canada relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. That problem is one which has plagued the Courts from 1894 on.

The Bankruptcy Act was only enacted in the year 1919 but in Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada[38], the Judicial Committee dealt with the problem of whether s. 9 of an Ontario statute, the then counterpart of the present Ontario Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 34, was intra vires of the Province of Ontario. It is to be remembered that s. 91, subheading 21, of the British North America Act granted exclusive legislative jurisdiction to the Parliament of Canada on subjects entitled "Bankruptcy and Insolvency". Section 9 of the Ontario statute read as follows:

> An assignment for the general benefit of creditors under this Act shall take precedence of all judgments and of all executions not completely executed by payment, subject to the lien, if any, of an execution creditor for his costs, where there is but one execution in the sheriffs hands, or to the lien, if any, of the creditor for his costs, who has the first execution in the sheriffs hands.

The Judicial Committee held that such a provision was within the constitutional powers of the Province as granted in s. 92, heading 13, of the British North America Act, i.e., "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". The Lord Chancellor said at pp. 198-9:

> But it is argued that inasmuch as this assignment contemplates the insolvency of the debtor, and would only be made if he were insolvent, such a provision purports to deal with insolvency, and therefore is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. Now it is to be observed that an assignment for the general benefit of creditors has long been known to the jurisprudence of this country and also of Canada, and has its force and effect at common law quite independently of any system of bankruptcy or insolvency, or any legislation relating thereto. So far from being regarded as an essential part of the bankruptcy law, such an assignment was made an act of bankruptcy on which an adjudication might be founded, and by the law of the Province of Canada which prevailed at the time when the Dominion Act was passed, it was one of the grounds for an adjudication of insolvency.
> It is to be observed that the word "bankruptcy" was apparently not used in Canadian legislation, but the insolvency law of the Province of Canada was precisely analogous to what was known in England as the bankruptcy law.
> Moreover, the operation of an assignment for the benefit of creditors was precisely the same, whether the assignor was or was not in fact insolvent. It was open to any debtor who might deem his solvency doubtful, and who desired in that case that his creditors should be equitably dealt with, to make an assignment for their benefit. The validity of the assignment and its effect would in no way depend on the insolvency of the assignor, and their Lordships think it clear that the 9th section would equally apply whether the assignor was or was not insolvent.

> It is not necessary in their Lordships' opinion, nor would it be expedient to attempt to define, what is covered by the words "bankruptcy" and "insolvency" in sect. 91 of the British North America Act. But it will be seen that it is a feature common to all the systems of bankruptcy and insolvency to which reference has been made, that the enactments are designed to secure that in the case of an insolvent person his assets shall be rateably distributed amongst his creditors whether he is willing that they shall be so distributed or not. Although provision may be made for a voluntary assignment as an alternative, it is only as an alternative. In reply to a question put by their Lordships the learned counsel for the respondent were unable to point to any scheme of bankruptcy or insolvency legislation which did not involve some power of compulsion by process of law to secure to the creditors the distribution amongst them of the insolvent debtor's estate.
> In their Lordships' opinion these considerations must be borne in mind when interpreting the words "bankruptcy" and "insolvency" in the British North America Act. It appears to their Lordships that such provisions as are found in the enactment in question, relating as they do to assignments purely voluntary, do not infringe on the exclusive legislative power conferred upon the Dominion Parliament. They would observe that a system of bankruptcy legislation may frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of the Act from being defeated. It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effect of executions and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the provincial legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament. But it does not follow that such subjects, as might properly be treated as ancillary to such a law and therefore within the powers of the Dominion Parliament, > are excluded from the legislative authority of the provincial legislature when there is no bankruptcy or insolvency legislation of the Dominion Parliament in existence.

It will be seen, therefore, that the Judicial Committee in this decision only determined that a system providing for voluntary assignments enacted in a province prior to the enactment of any federal Bankruptcy Act was intra vires but acknowledged that a subsequently enacted Bankruptcy Act by the federal Parliament might well overcome the provisions of the provincial statute. It would seem that the decision is quite silent as to the effect of provisions in a provincial Assignments and Preferences Act other than one permitting a voluntary assignment of debts except that one might well argue that by implication provisions in the provincial statute dealing with fraudulent preferences would be equally within the purview of the province under "property" and "civil rights" unless and until overcome by federal legislation ancillary to its power in bankruptcy and insolvency.

In 1922, Orde J. gave a decision in Re Davison[39], in a matter where a mortgage was being attacked by a trustee in bankruptcy as void under The Fraudulent Conveyances Act and also The Assignments and Preferences Act. The mortgagee submitted that if the transaction could not be avoided under s. 31 [now s. 73] of the Bankruptcy Act, it could not be set aside at all. In other words, that the provincial statutes aforesaid were no longer applicable in the province when bankruptcy occurs, having been superseded by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. At p. 245, the learned justice said:

> This is a startling suggestion, and, if sound, would turn back the clock for three centuries and enable a debtor to commit a deliberate fraud upon his creditors, and by holding off his bankruptcy for three months to validate the transaction. There is nothing in sec. 31 or in any other part of the Bankruptcy Act which either expressly or impliedly abrogates the existing law of each Province as to the invalidity of fraudulent transactions. On the contrary, in the enumeration of the different kinds of acts of bankruptcy in sec. 3, para. (b), it is clearly intended to include cases of fraudulent conveyances which are fraudulent quite independently of the Bankruptcy Act, those which are fraudulent under the Act being mentioned in para. (c). Rule 120 clearly contemplates other laws than the Bankruptcy Act itself, under which a transaction may be declared invalid, though, if the effect of the Act is as Mr. White contends, the Rules cannot nullify that effect.

Orde J. was the first judge dealing with bankruptcy matters in Ontario after the enactment of the statute. The report books for the years following the enactment of the statute are filled with his wise decisions in reference to bankruptcy and, in my view, he firmly established the course of bankuptcy law in Ontario and largely affected the course of the law throughout Canada in the early years of bankruptcy administration. I am of the view that his observation which I have cited is a very sound one and is still applicable today. I might even go further: it is not only possible for a debtor to hold off his bankruptcy for three months in order to validate the transaction but it is quite possible for a creditor, improperly and fraudulently preferred, to support a debtor and enable him to postpone the date of his eventual declaration of bankruptcy beyond the three months.

The view expressed by Orde J. seems to have prevailed for a considerable length of time.

In Hoffar Ltd. v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd.[40], the Court of Appeal for British Columbia had considered a situation where a transfer had been made by a debtor less than 60 days before the debtor's assignment under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. The transaction was attacked under two grounds: firstly, that it was avoided by the provisions of s. 64 [now s. 73] of the Bankruptcy Act, and, secondly, that it was utterly void as against the trustee under the provisions of s. 3(2) of the Fraudulent Preferences Act of British Columbia. It was found, at trial, and not contested on appeal, that s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act could not apply because it had not been proved that the transaction was made with a view to prefer one creditor over another and, in the Court of Appeal, it was also held that s. 3 of the provincial statute had been rendered inoperative by the enactment of s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act. M.A. Macdonald J.A. said:

> The Dominion statute adds however subsec. (2) quoted ante, stating when the view or intent to prefer shall be presumed. If it has the effect of giving a preference it is prima facie proof that it was made with that intent. That is a presumption and evidence may be adduced to rebut it. That right is given by the Dominion Act on a state of facts common to both Acts. The provincial statute denies that right. Given the insolvency as in the Dominion Act and the intent as in the Dominion Act ("with a view of") the transfer is utterly void under sec. 3(1) without any right to offer evidence to rebut it. And under sec. 3, subsec. (2), if action is taken within 60 days or if an assignment follows within 60 days the transfer is void.
> The provincial Act is not dealing with a new situation; the variation in words and figures does not affect the subject-matter. But the result is different. Under the provincial Act the transfer is void; under the Dominion Act it is deemed void with however the right to rebut. If this is given by Dominion legislation a provincial Act destroying it is ultra vires to the extent of the conflict. Under the Dominion Act the assignor has the benefit of that right. Under the provincial Act invalidity is an irrebuttable presumption. That is the conflict.

M.A. Macdonald J.A. added the very important comment:

> This is not to say that the trustee cannot resort to a provincial Act to impeach a transaction. Provincial legislation respecting fraudulent conveyances may be resorted to. The Bankruptcy Act does not abrogate provincial Acts simply because they deal with preferential transactions. But obviously both Parliaments cannot enact that one result shall follow in one case and a different result in the other. Counsel for respondent submitted that the section in the provincial Act deals with a topic not dealt with by the Dominion Act. I cannot agree. He also urged that there is no conflict where the Dominion Act voids a transaction on one ground and a provincial Act avoids it on other and additional grounds; in other words, the Dominion Act does not say that transactions of another kind shall be lawful. That is not this case. We are dealing with legislative results following the same transaction and the results differ. That result in case of conflict must be determined by the Dominion Act. The test is, can both sections be enforced?

So, in Hoffar, the Court of Appeal for British Columbia acknowledged that, of course, valid federal legislation on the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency would overcome provincial legislation on the subject of property and civil rights but only to the extent of the conflict. In that case, the Court found a conflict but foresaw cases where there would be no conflict and where, therefore, the provincial legislation would still be in full force and effect. Leave to appeal to this Court in the Hoffar case was refused by Mignault J.[41]

In Re Pommier[42], Fisher J.A. considered an application to set aside as preferential a transaction between the bankrupt and the creditor which took place more than three months before the making of the authorized assignment and which, therefore, was not within the prohibition in s. 64 [now s. 73] of the Bankruptcy Act. At pp. 419-20, the learned justice said:

> After careful consideration of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, the Assignments and Preferences Act, and the decisions to which I shall make reference, I am unable to give effect to Mr. Hellmuth's contentions.
> I frankly admit that conflict is to be found when sec. 64 is read in connection with sec. 5 of the Assignments and Preferences Act and the following sections, except possibly sec. 12, and that, the Bankruptcy Act being Dominion legislation, as to this conflict the Dominion Act prevails; but, in my opinion, sec. 64 does not attempt to interfere directly with provincial legislation dealing with the same subject-matter, because it is quite clear that subsecs. (3) and (4) of sec. 4 of the Assignments and Preferences Act cover transactions not covered by the Bankruptcy Act, and in those respects are not in conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, and that these subsections are still operative; but, even if it could be said that these subsections do deal with the same subject-matter, it is not one of conflict but of "overlapping".

And at p. 422, said:

> It appears to me, and I am of opinion, that the combined effect of Rule 142, sec. 64, and the other sections of the Acts to which I have referred, is to give to a trustee in bankruptcy, without special enabling words, power to impeach all fraudulent or preferential transactions which may by the Bankruptcy Act or provincial law be avoided; that neither the Assignments and Preferences Act nor the Fraudulent Conveyances Act has been abrogated, and that these Acts, apart from the conflicting sections mentioned, are still running concurrently with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and may be resorted to by a trustee under that Act, if it is found that relief cannot be obtained thereunder, or, to adopt the words of Macdonald, J.A., in the Hoffar case:—
> > Unless on the same state of facts we find a different result arising, resort may be had to the provisions of whichever legislation fits the case.

So, therefore, another most eminent and experienced judge in bankruptcy matters came to the like conclusion that the provincial statute in so far as it was not overcome by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act was still available to the trustee in bankruptcy.

However, the Court of Appeal for Ontario in Re Trenwith[43], again considered a transaction allegedly preferential which had occurred much more than three months prior to the petition which resulted in the receiving order. Kerwin J., as he then was, had at trial set aside the impugned transaction using the provisions of The Assignments and Preferences Act being of the opinion that he was so required by the decision in Re Pommier, supra. But upon appeal Masten J.A. said at p. 332:

> The question is therefore open for adjudication by this court, and on a consideration of the cases of Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1894] A.C. 189, at p. 200; Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue, [1928] A.C. 187, 8 C.B.R. 579, and Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd. v. Hoffar Ltd., 1929 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1929] S.C.R. 180, 10 C.B.R. 374, it seems clear to me that the common field of legislation respecting the distribution of the estates of insolvents having now become occupied by the Dominion Bankruptcy Act, the provisions of The Assignments and Preferences Act respecting the preference of one creditor over another have been thereby superseded and have ceased to have any operation. If I am right in this conclusion, the effect is to overrule the view expressed by Fisher J. in Re Pommier (1930), 65 O.L.R. 415, 11 C.B.R. 449.

The Court of Appeal for Ontario, therefore, came to exactly the opposite conclusion, not to the actual decision in Hoffar but to the reservation made by M.A. Macdonald J.A. and which I have cited above and to a conclusion opposite to that reached by Fisher J.A. in Re Pommier. The conclusion, however, may well be considered obiter because Masten J.A. follows the statement which I have quoted above with a holding that although the transaction could not be attacked under either s. 64 of the then Bankruptcy Act or under The Assignments and Preferences Act of the Province it could be attacked as a settlement under the then s. 60 [now s. 69] of the Bankruptcy Act.

The statement which I have quoted above, however, is plainly that by enacting the then s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act the federal Parliament enacting valid legislation on the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency has covered the field and, therefore, cannot be reconciled with decisions to which I have referred which reduce the deleterious effect of the federal legislation to points of actual conflict only. The decision, however, has some support in this Court and in the Courts of Appeal of the Provinces. In Re Bozanich, A.H. Boulton Co. Ltd. v. Trusts & Guarantee Co. Ltd.[44], this Court considered whether a chattel mortgage was or was not a settlement within the meaning of the then s. 60 of the Bankruptcy Act and held it was not such a settlement. There seems to have been no allegation whatsoever that the transaction could be subject to attack under the provisions of the Ontario Assignments and Preferences Act or the Ontario Fraudulent Conveyances Act, but Duff C.J. said at p. 136:

> I may add that, in my opinion the provisions of R.S.O. 1927, Chap. 162, in relation to preferences are superseded by section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the authority of the Ontario Legislature to enact such legislation is, in consequence of the enactment of section 64, suspended in virtue of the concluding paragraph of section 91.

The statement is, of course, plainly obiter and it is not reflected in the reasons for judgment of Rinfret J. who came to the same result as did the Chief Justice.

In 1949, the Parliament of Canada enacted an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act which now appears as s. 50, subs. (6) of the statute and which provides:

> (6) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by such law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

In Totem Radio Supply Co. Ltd. v. Stone et al.[45], Whittaker J., sitting in single judge court, held that the Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.B.C. 1948, c. 132, was not in conflict with s. 64 [now s. 73] of the Bankruptcy Act, and at p. 553, said:

> Prior to 1949 there were conflicting decisions as to whether or not the dominion legislation entirely superseded provincial Acts dealing with preferences, but this matter is now resolved by sec. 41(6) of the Bankruptcy Act of 1949:

Other cases in the various provincial Courts went either way but the next case which I shall consider is Attorney-General of Alberta v. Nash and Guelph Engineering Company[46]. There the Appellate Division of the Province of Alberta held, confirming Milvain J., that The Fraudulent Preferences Act of Alberta was ultra vires. Johnson J.A. said at pp. 160-1:

> There can, I think, be no doubt that the impugned Act was ultra vires of the legislature when it was passed. Whatever can be said for similar legislation that was passed before the Bankruptcy Act became operative, this legislation, viewed in the light of s. 64, becomes an attempt to cover the same ground that section covers. The enlargement of the time from 60 days to one year must be viewed as an attempt to strengthen the remedy which sec. 64 gives to creditors. Sec. 4 cannot be looked upon as legislation which was intended to deal with contracts and which only incidentally and as part of a larger scheme dealt with matters which were within the scope of one or more of the subjects mentioned in sec. 91. This section is what it purports to be. Legislation intended to prevent a person "at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency" (4 [a]), from disposing of his property in such a manner as to prefer one creditor over another. It is exactly what sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act was passed to prevent. If it is not in pith and substance insolvency legislation under the earlier cases, it has become so under the enlarged definition and also by virtue of sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Johnson J.A. cited s. 41(6) [now s. 50(6)] of the Bankruptcy Act and then continued:

> Whittaker J. of the British Columbia supreme court considered this amendment in Totem Radio Supply v. Stone reflex, (1959) 29 WWR 552, and as he could find no conflict between sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act and the section of the Fraudulent Preferences Act, RSBC, 1948, ch. 132 (similar to our Act), set aside a mortgage which had been given more than three months before the company became bankrupt. With respect, I must disagree with his conclusion. Having concluded, as previously stated, that there is a conflict between the two sections, it would follow that the section in the provincial Act is unaffected by the amendment.

> The Court of Appeal of Ontario again considered the Assignments and Preferences Act, RSO, 1960, ch. 25, in Re Shelly Films Ltd.; Clarkson Co. v. Overland Finance Corpn. [1963] 1 OR 431, 4 CBR (NS) 186, reversing [1961] OWN 371, 3 CBR (NS) 94, and held that sec. 12(1) of that Act was abrogated by sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act. Because no mention was made of the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act in that case, we are asked to assume that it had been overlooked and was not considered by that court. Judicial comity would make one hesitate to impute to the court of another province such an oversight. The case does point out the conflicts in the two Acts and it is much more reasonable to assume that the amendment was in fact considered by the court.
> It may be that certain sections of the Fraudulent Preferences Act are continued effective by the amendment to sec. 41 of the Bankruptcy Act, but because of the conflict between the section we are considering and sec. 64, sec. 4 is not one of them.

It would seem that Johnson J.A.'s judgment, although he commences with the statement that the Act is ultra vires, ends with the conclusion that only the section under attack in that particular decision was ultra vires. The particular section was s. 4 which avoided preferential transactions where an action had been brought within one year thereafter. The statute under consideration in this appeal, the Saskatchewan Fraudulent Preferences Act, in ss. 3 and 4 makes no reference whatsoever to any time limit. The section which does make such reference and which creates a presumption is s. 5 and it is not advanced by the trustee.

In Re Panfab Corp. Ltd.[47], Houlden J. considered an appeal from a registrar to whom an issue had been directed as to the validity of a security given by an individual to a corporation and held that s. 64A [now s. 74] did not apply. He continued at p. 206:

> The next issue is whether the transaction, not being a fraudulent preference because it does not come within s. 64A, can be attacked as a fraudulent conveyance. Counsel for the appellants gave notice to the Attorney-General for Canada and the Attorney-General for Ontario pursuant to s. 33 of the Judicature Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 197, that he proposed to argue that the Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 154, was ultra vires the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, or ineffective in that it is legislation relating to either bankruptcy or insolvency which by s. 91, para. 21 of the B.N.A. Act, 1867, is under the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

And at p. 207, he expressed the view that The Fraudulent Conveyances Act in Ontario was not in pith and substance bankruptcy legislation but was valid legislation as in reference to property and civil rights within s. 92, para. 13 of the British North America Act. He continued:

> The Fraudulent Conveyances Act is used constantly to attack transactions which have no connection with bankruptcy. It is an important part of the weapons available to creditors in recovering assets that have been fraudulently transferred by debtors. In my opinion, there is no conflict between the provisions of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act and the Bankruptcy Act. Section 41(6) of the Bankruptcy Act recognizes that provincial legislation such as the Fraudulent Conveyances Act exists and provides that the trustee is entitled to make use of such legislation in addition to the rights and remedies provided by the Bankruptcy Act.

Houlden J.'s decision is obiter, however, in that he found that the transaction was not within The Fraudulent Conveyances Act because it was bona fide. It is to be noted also that Houlden J.'s concern was with The Fraudulent Conveyances Act while this appeal is concerned with the exact provisions of ss. 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act of Saskatchewan. Perhaps it should also be noted that Houlden J., in the Panfab case had inclined to the opposite conclusion in reference to this problem which he found, in his article reported in 38 C.B.R. 114, to be one of great importance, and where he found the decision in Re Trenwith had been a block to trustees. Houlden J. does not mention Re Trenwith in his reasons for judgment in Panfab. It is to be remembered that Re Panfab Corporation was not appealed to the Court of Appeal and we, therefore, have not an opportunity to determine whether that Court had recanted from its view taken thirty-five years before in Re Trenwith.

In Traders Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Levesque[48], the Court considered a transaction, allegedly preferential, occurring within three months before the declaration of bankruptcy. The attack upon the transaction, however, was not made until more than a year after the bankruptcy when the creditor, the trustee having refused to take the action, obtained the leave of the Court to proceed under the provisions of s. 16 of the Bankruptcy Act [now s. 20]. The provisions of art. 1040 of the Civil Code purported to place a limitation period of one year upon such attack. This Court, confirming the Court of Appeal of Quebec, by a majority judgment, held that art. 1040 of the Civil Code would not apply because the action was taken within a year of the creditors' obtaining knowledge of the payment as the said article provides. Locke J. did consider art. 1040 of the Civil Code and held that it had no application whatever to proceedings under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, saying at p. 90:

> It may be said that provisions similar to those contained in the articles of the Civil Code to which I have referred are to be found in statutes of most of the provinces of Canada. They are to be found in British Columbia in the > Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.B.C. 1948, c. 132, in Alberta in the Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.A. 1955, c. 120, in Saskatchewan in the Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1953, c. 362, in Manitoba in the Assignments Act, R.S.M. 1954, c. 11, and in Ontario in the Assignment and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1950, c. 26. All of these statutes deal with the rights of creditors to set aside conveyances made by persons in insolvent circumstances, which have the effect of giving a creditor a preference over the others and all of them provide that, in the event of action being brought within a certain period of the date of the conveyance, it is to be held null and void. The remedies thus given are quite distinct from those given to the trustee in bankruptcy under c. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act. The right to enforce such claims by creditors does not depend upon the fact that the person making the transfer has been declared bankrupt and these rights may be enforced under the provincial statutes unless bankruptcy has intervened. This has been held in a number of cases in various provinces, which are to be found collected in the 3rd ed. of Bradford and Greenberg on the Bankruptcy Act, at p. 158 et seq. In Quebec the limitation provided by art. 1040 only refers to proceedings under the articles mentioned.

One might infer from Locke J.'s words that once bankruptcy has intervened then the provincial statutes have no application even to a transaction occurring before the period covered by the present s. 73. Ï am not of the view that that is a proper implication from Locke J.'s words. I am assisted in coming to that conclusion by the decision of this Court in Gingras v. General Motors Products of Canada Ltd.[49], a judgment pronounced on November 27, 1974, and as yet unreported. There, the Court of Appeal of Quebec had confirmed a decision of the Superior Court which had dismissed a "motion to cancel preferential payments" instituted by the trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee had in such motion attacked a transaction which had occurred less than three months before the declaration of the bankruptcy but had not instituted the action within one year of his appointment as provided in art. 1040 of the Civil Code.

The defendant filed an exception relying on the said art. 1040 of the Civil Code and such exception was successful in both Courts below. However, this Court, by a majority judgment, held that the trustee, in taking action under s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act to attack a transaction as a preference occurring within three months before the bankruptcy, was not affected by art. 1040 of the Civil Code and was controlled alone by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. De Grandpré J., dissenting, was of the opinion that in proceeding in the Superior Court the trustee was governed by the procedural provisions of the Civil Code and that, therefore, art. 1040 would apply to bar the action.

It is noted that Pigeon J. giving reasons, concurred in by Martland and Dickson JJ., said at p. 8 of the English version of his reasons:

> Ï would therefore allow the appeal and dismiss the exception to dismiss submitted by respondent. This does not mean that the latter will not be entitled to rely on Art. 1040 in answer to a claim based on the goods taken back, if the trustee should contend that his petition allows him to go beyond the three months preceding the bankruptcy, and base a claim not only on the Bankruptcy Act but also on Arts. 1032 to 1040 C.C.

In my view, Pigeon J., therefore, expressed the view that in the attack upon transactions not within the three month period provided by s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act the trustee was free to use the provisions of the Civil Code as to preferential transactions.

De Grandpré J., in his dissenting reasons, at p. 4 of the English version said:

> In my view, the Bankruptcy Act overrides the Paulian action only to the limited extent that it deals with acts in defraud of the debtor; all aspects of fraudulent action falling outside the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act may be considered in the light of the principles of the Civil Code.

Again, a plain statement that any reference to transactions outside of the narrow limits of the provisions of what is now s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act, the Civil Code remained in full force and available to the trustee in bankruptcy.

I have dealt with what, in my view, are the main cases upon the subject in Canada. Upon considering them all, as well as the decision of the Judicial Committee in A.G. of Ontario v. A.G. for Canada, supra, I have come to the conclusion that the better view is to confine the effect of what is now s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act to providing for the invalidity of transactions within its exact scope. To that extent, the Parliament of Canada, by valid legislation upon "bankruptcy" and "insolvency", has covered the field but has refrained from completely covering the whole field of transactions avoided by provincial legislation. I am of the opinion that the enactment in 1949 of the provisions now found in s. 50(6) of the Bankruptcy Act is a plain indication that Parliament recognized that provisions in provincial statutes dealing with preferential transactions were still valid provincial enactments in reference to "property" and "civil rights" and were valuable aids to trustees in bankruptcy in attacking the validity of such transactions and should be available to the said trustees in bankruptcy.

I am assisted in coming to this conclusion by the view which I believe was behind the Lord Chancellor's reasons in A.G. of Ontario v. A.G. for Canada, supra, that the words "bankruptcy" and "insolvency" in s. 91, para. 21, of the British North America Act were aimed at legislative schemes which had the purpose of governing the distribution of a debtor's property amongst his creditors. There may well be, and there are, provisions in such legislative schemes, i.e., the Bankruptcy Act, dealing with "property" and "civil rights". Such provisions are properly ancillary to the bankruptcy and insolvency legislation, and to the extent to which they go overcome existing valid provincial legislation and bar future provincial legislation contra thereto but do not purport to extend beyond that point to invalidate other valid provincial legislation upon "property" and "civil rights".

I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the provisions of ss. 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act of Saskatchewan are valid and subsisting provincial legislation available to the trustee in his attack upon the transactions with which this appeal is concerned. In my view, s. 3 of that statute dealing with transactions taken with the intent to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice creditors is not as relevant as s. 4 which provides:

> 4. Subject to sections 8, 9, 10 and 11 every gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer, delivery over or payment of goods, chattels or effects or of bills, bonds, notes or securities or of shares, dividends, premiums or bonus in a bank, company or corporation, or of any other property real or personal, made by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency to or for a creditor, with intent to give that creditor preference over his other creditors or over any one or more of them, is void as against the creditor or creditors injured, delayed, prejudiced or postponed.

and is concerned with transactions taken with the intent to give one creditor preference over other creditors.

In order to determine whether that section applies to avoid the transaction in question in this appeal, a detailed analysis of the circumstances is necessary.

Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. had carried on business for a period of years in Saskatchewan. Part of that business was the sale of floor coverings, paints, draperies, interior decorating material, etc. The supplier of those items was Kennedy Flooring Limited of Winnipeg, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Gaultco Limited of Winnipeg. Another wholly-owned subsidiary of the said Gaultco was Countrywide Factors Limited. By some mysterious and unspecified arrangement, Countrywide Factors Limited became the accounting firm and the billing agent for Kennedy Flooring.

The three corporations, Gaultco Limited, Kennedy Flooring Limited and Countrywide Factors Limited, were all controlled by the same officers, and we are not concerned with the arrangements between the three companies.

As early as 1965, Countrywide Factors Limited was unsatisfied with the payments being received from Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited on its open account and placed Kozan Furniture (York-ton) Limited on a "C.O.D." basis. The learned trial judge found, and it was confirmed by the majority on appeal, that by the spring of 1966 Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited was not paying the accounts as they became due. One Tony Ollinger was the manager of the floor covering department in Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited and he arranged with Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited and its controlling shareholder George E. Kozan to purchase the floor covering inventory for the sum of $10,300. Of course, it was of crucial interest to Ollinger that he should continue to have Kennedy Flooring Limited supply him with stock. On November 19, 1966, two officers of Countrywide Factors went from Winnipeg to Yorkton, Saskatchewan, and conferred with George E. Kozan and Tony Ollinger. The two officers were Mr. David Albert Bowles, a director of Countrywide and also its solicitor, and Mr. Philip Douglas Medhurst, its credit manager. As a result of that conference, a document was drawn up and executed which read as follows:

> I, Tony Ollinger, agree to pay Countrywide Factors Ltd. $10,300.00 (more or less) representing sale of inventory of floor coverings, paint & Drapery as determined by stocktaking of Sept. 21/66; payment as follows:
> (a) Before Nov. 26/66 $7,000.00
> (b) Before Jan. 31/67, the balance & int. at 7%
> (If substantially paid—say within $300.00—this will be adequate compliance & any unpaid balance will be paid by the last day of Feb. 1967.)
> Countrywide will agree to the sale of said inventory on such compliance & will reduce the account of Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. now at $25,000.00 (more or less) by the amount of said inventory price.
> George Kozan guarantees repayment of the account of Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. as set out in his letter of Oct. 1/66& attached. He & Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. will give a debenture on the stock in the form attached, an assignment of book debts in Countrywide's form & a collateral mortgage on 76 and 80 Circlebrook Drive.
> Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Ltd. Countrywide Factors Ltd.
> Per: "George E. Kozan" Per: "D.A. Bowles"
> "Tony Ollinger"

At the same time and place, George E. Kozan executed a personal guarantee of the debt to Countrywide and, in accordance with the agreement set out above, in February of 1967 Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited granted to Countrywide Factors Limited a debenture in the sum of $35,512 covering all of its remaining assets. The floor coverings which under the transaction had been transferred from Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited to Tony and Rudolph Ollinger were conveyed by a bill of sale which was, however, only executed on February 15, 1967. Again, a mysterious company appears. That transfer was not made by Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited, the owner of the inventory, but purportedly by a corporation entitled Kozan Interiors Limited and purportedly for a consideration of $10,300. The actual inventory of the material covered in the bill of sale had only amounted to $9,152.31 and that was the exact amount of the money paid by Ollinger to Countrywide under the provisions of the agreement of November 19, 1966, which I have set out in full above.

Kozan Interiors Limited was unknown to Kennedy Flooring Limited and, in fact, the learned trial judge refers to that corporation in the words "...if ever incorporated (which is unlikely) never carried on business and never owned the assets which were the subject of D22" (the bill of sale of February 17, 1967). George E. Kozan attempted to explain the interjection of this corporate name. The learned trial judge referred to that explanation in the following words:

> Mr. Kozan weakly suggested that he made the mistake when he instructed Mr. Wentzell, the solicitor who drew D 22. I suppose it is the type of error made by a businessman who is in the troes [sic] of insolvency.

Another light may be thrown on the topic by a document produced at trial and marked as Ex. P-10, which reads as follows:

> IN THE MATTER OF A CERTAIN SALE MADE UNDER THE BULK SALES ACT FOR THE PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN.
> BETWEEN:
> KOZAN INTERIORS LTD., > of Yorkton, in the Province > of Saskatchewan,
> —and—
> ANTHONY OLLINGER and RUDOLPH OLLINGER, > both of Yorkton, in the Province of Saskatchewan,
> KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS that Country Wide Factors Ltd., the undersigned does for the purpose of Section 6 of the Bulk Sales Act for the Province of Saskatchewan, HEREBY RENOUNCE AND WAIVE any right which the said Country Wide Factors Ltd., has under the said Act against Anthony Ollinger and Rudolph Ollinger and against any right or claim to any of the goods, draperies, paints, floorings and materials covered in the sale agreement dated the 7th day of February, A.D. 1967.
> IN WITNESS WHEREOF Country Wide Factors Ltd., has hereunto set their hands and affixed their corporate seal on its behalf this 13th day of April A.D. 1967.
> COUNTRY WIDE FACTORS LTD.
> Secty-Treasurer.

Certainly the transaction between Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited and Ollinger whereby the title to the floor coverings was transferred from one to the other but the sale price was paid to Countrywide Factors was one within the provisions of The Bulk Sales Act, but if the vendor had, in truth, been Kozan Interiors Limited, then that company had no creditors and The Bulk Sales Act provisions would not have applied. It is, I think, significant in dealing with the bona fides of the transaction. After that transfer of the inventory of floor coverings, etc., Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited was said to have paid to Countrywide Factors the following sums:

1966	November	$1,000.00
1967	February	1,000.00
	March	6,000.00
	April	2,152.31
	June	1,000.00
	September	500.00

As a matter of fact, the payments in March, April and June were payments by Ollinger totalling $9,152.31, the amount of the inventory, and the amount which he had agreed to pay to Countrywide Factors by the agreement of November 19, 1966.

Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited continued doing business, after a fashion, until November 19, 1968, when a receiving order in bankruptcy was made out against the company.

On July 10, 1969, the trustee in bankruptcy moved for an order that the proceeds of the sale be declared a fraudulent preference contra to the provisions of ss. 3 to 6 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act and for an order directing the respondent to pay the sum of $10,300 to the said trustee. MacPherson J. directed a trial of that issue and then himself conducted the trial. MacPherson J., in written and detailed reasons, found that the transaction was a preference and directed that the trustee recover from Countrywide the sum of $9,152.31 and that the debenture given by Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited to Countrywide Factors Limited be declared void. The majority of the Court of Appeal, Maguire J.A. giving reasons which were concurred in by Woods J.A., reversed that judgment holding that the trustee had failed to establish that Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited, on November 19, 1966, the date of the agreement aforesaid or in March 1967, the date when the payments under that agreement to Countrywide Factors Limited commenced, was insolvent, unable to pay its debts in full or on the eve of bankruptcy. Hall J.A. dissented being of the opinion that Kozan Furniture (Yorkton) Limited was, on either of those dates and throughout, insolvent. Hall J.A. expressed the view that The Fraudulent Preferences Act was intra vires and applicable.

Digitized by Google

It would appear, from a perusal of the reasons given by Maguire J.A. for the majority, that he was of the opinion that in order to bring himself within the benefit of the section the trustee had to prove that the debtor was not only in insolvent circumstances but was also unable to pay his debts in full and knew that he was on the eve of insolvency. A reading of the section would seem to make it quite clear that those three are alternatives and not conjunctives and that all the trustee had to prove was that the debtor was insolvent or that he was unable to meet his debts in full or that he knew he was on the eve of insolvency. I am not concerned particularly with the last-named alternative as that is quite subjective and I do not find it necessary to pierce the mind of George E. Kozan.

I am in agreement with the view expressed by Hall J.A. that although the burden is on the trustee to prove the insolvency of the debtor at the time of the transaction, as the burden is always upon the plaintiff to prove his case, the trustee may adduce such a prima facie case which will call upon the defendant to adduce evidence to rebut that prima facie evidence. It must be remembered that a trustee is often faced with a situation, which faced this trustee when he was not appointed until November 1968, where he had to go back into the past and establish an insolvency which he alleged had existed in November 1966. The trustee in such a situation must deal with records which are, in many cases, fragmentary and may well be intentionally deceptive. He has no means of checking the actual stock-in-trade which existed at that date, and sometimes can place little dependence upon the evidence of the debtor. In the particular case, I am of the opinion, as was Hall J.A. and MacPherson J., that the trustee as plaintiff, here appellant, had certainly shown such a prima facie case.

Maguire J.A. giving reasons for the majority of the Court of Appeal, said:

> It is established that Kozan as early at least as spring of 1966 was not paying all accounts as they became due.

In Ladore v. Bennett[50], Lord Atkin said at p. 480:

> Insolvency is the inability to pay debts in the ordinary course as they become due; and there appears to be no doubt that this was the condition of these corporations.

I am of the opinion that the statement by Maguire J.A. which I have quoted above would have been sufficient to have disposed of the issue and justify a holding that the debtor was in insolvent circumstances within the words of s. 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act at the time of the transaction. However, there is no need to put the decision on that single ground for I have come to the conclusion that the debtor was unable to pay his debts in full at the date of the transaction.

The Court of Appeal, as I have said, seemed to be of the opinion that the difficulty facing the trustee was that he could not prove that the debtor was unable to pay his debts in full or, to use the words appearing in Walter v. Adolph Lumber Co. et al.[51], that "he had not the means of paying his creditors in full out of the assets which could be realized upon the sale for cash or its equivalent" because the trustee could not prove the extent of the inventory possessed by the debtor on November 19, 1966. It is true that the debtor had no inventory which could be produced and to which a dollar and cents value could be attached. Mr. Medhurst, credit manager of the respondent, however, had given some evidence where he, in a very casual manner, estimated the value of that inventory at that time at about $75,000, admitting, however, he was no expert on furniture valuations. Since Mr. Medhurst was anxious to uphold the transaction and, therefore, to see that the debtor had assets sufficient to cover his liabilities, he certainly would not have underestimated the value of the inventory. Therefore, even if we take that valuation of $75,000, we have this situation, and I am quoting here figures adopted by Maguire J.A. and appearing in his majority reasons for the Court of Appeal:

Trade accounts and liabilities to bank	$ 111,199.16
Shareholders' loan	22,702.62
Total liabilities		$ 133,901.78
Accounts receivable	$ 44,099.62
Value of truck—subsequently sold by trustee	1,000.00
Total of those two assets		$ 45,099.62

Even adopting those figures, the other assets in inventory, that is, stock-in-trade and store fixtures, would have had to amount to $88,802.16; yet, two full years later, those remaining assets were sold for only $31,200 which sum was subject to a landlord's lien for $3,200 leaving a net amount in the trustee's hands of only $28,000 not $88,000. In addition, the accounts receivable shown in Maguire J.A.'s figures at $44,099.62 were reduced in December 1966 on the instructions of the debtor's auditor to $23,598.51 so that to establish that the debtor could have paid all his debts by realization of his assets would have required an increase in the value of the stock-in-trade and fixtures of another $20,600, requiring the valuation of that stock-in-trade and fixtures at over $100,000, an amount for which there has been no scintilla of evidence.

I agree with Hall J.A. when he said:

Digitized by Google

> There was in my opinion evidence from which the trial judge could infer the value of the stock-in-trade was nowhere near $100,000.

Under the circumstances, I am of the opinion that the trustee had produced a prima facie case to show that the debtor was unable to pay his debts in full by realization of his assets in November 1966. As MacPherson J. remarked:

> Two years is a long time to continue in a state of insolvency, that is true, but the evidence indicates that that is what happened. There was no time in that period when it was not insolvent. Perhaps its affairs were worse, perhaps better, from time to time, but there was a continued state of insolvency.

For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed, the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan quashed and the judgment at trial restored. As I have already said, the questions upon which leave was given to the various intervenors should be answered as follows:

Question 1: No.

Question 2: Sections 3 and 4 of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1965, c. 397, are not in conflict with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

The appellant should have his costs against the respondent in the Court of Appeal and in this Court. There will be no costs to intervenors.

Pigeon J. concurred with the judgment delivered by BEETZ J.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of the Chief Justice and of Mr. Justice Spence. I agree with Mr. Justice Spence. To his reasons for judgment I would however like to add some of my own.

The power to repress fraud by avoiding fraudulent conveyances and preferences is an indisputable part of provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights. The risk of fraud is increased when a debtor finds himself in a situation of impending or actual insolvency and, in my view, provincial laws can, without undergoing a change in nature, focus upon that situation as upon a proper occasion to attain their object. Given their purpose, they do not cease to be laws in relation to property and civil rights simply because they are timely and effective or because Parliament could enact similar laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency.

Insolvency has been defined by Lord Thankerton in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act reference, Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada[52], at p. 402:

> In a general sense, insolvency means inability to meet one's debts or obligations; in a technical sense, it means the condition or standard of inability to meet debts or obligations, upon the occurrence of which the statutory law enables a creditor to intervene, with the assistance of a Court, to stop individual action by creditors and to secure administration of the debtor's assets in the general interest of creditors; the law also generally allows the debtor to apply for the same administration.

The primary meaning of "insolvency" in s. 91.21 of the Constitution is insolvency in the technical sense, not in the general sense. This Lord Thankerton made clear just a few lines after the passage quoted above: with respect to the jurisdiction of Parliament under s. 91.21, he referred to "...the statutory conditions of insolvency which enabled a creditor or the debtor to invoke the aid of the bankruptcy laws...".

There is no common law of bankruptcy and insolvency in the technical sense, but the disruptions resulting from insolvency in the general sense had of necessity to be taken into account by general legal systems such as the common law and the civil law. Insolvency lies at the core of those parts of the common law and of the civil law which relate to such matters as mortgage, pledge, pawning, suretyship and the securing of debts generally which are implicitly or explicitly predicated on the risk of insolvency and which produce their full effect when the risk has been converted into reality; so it is with the rules which determine the rank of privileges and hypothecs or which ordain that an insolvent or bankrupt debtor shall lose the benefit of the term (art. 1092 of the Quebec Civil Code). Some of the most fundamental principles of the civil law are expressed in arts. 1980, 1981 and 1982 of the Quebec Civil Code:

> Art. 1980. Whoever incurs a personal obligation, renders liable for its fulfilment all his property, moveable and immoveable, present and future, except such property as is specially declared to be exempt from seizure.
> Art. 1981. The property of a debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, and where they claim together they share its price rateably, unless there are amongst them legal causes of preference.
> Art. 1982. The legal causes of preference are privileges and hypothecs.

Although not expressly referred to, insolvency forms the web of these articles; there would be little need for them, particularly the last two, were it not for insolvency. But I cannot be persuaded that they are not laws relating to property and civil rights.

When the exclusive power to make laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency was bestowed upon Parliament, it was not intended to remove from the general legal systems which regulated property and civil rights a cardinal concept essential to the coherence of those systems. The main purpose was to give to Parliament exclusive jurisdiction over the establishment by statute of a particular system regulating the distribution of a debtor's assets. However, given the nature of general legal systems, the primary jurisdiction of Parliament cannot easily be exercised together with its incidental powers without some degree of overlap in which case federal law prevails. On the other hand, provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights should not be measured by the ultimate reach of federal power over bankruptcy and insolvency any more than provincial competence in relation to the administration of justice can be determined by every conceivable and potential use of the criminal law power. This, I believe, is the general import of the Voluntary Assignments case, Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorneys-General for Canada[53]. The Judicial Committee declared that the validity of the provision it had to consider and of the assignments made under the authority of that provision did not depend on the insolvency of the assignor: an assignment was also open "to any debtor who might deem his insolvency doubtful...". All that one can say is that legislation of the type considered in the Voluntary Assignments case presents little interest for prosperous persons; it is of concern chiefly to debtors in strained circumstances whose solvency is, at best, uncertain. It should be noted that the impugned voluntary assignments enactment did not only deal with assignments: it also provided that an assignment for the general benefit of creditors should take precedence of all judgments and of all executions not completely executed by payment.

I am reinforced in those views by a consideration of the Civil Code of Lower Canada, 1866, in light of An Act Respecting Insolvency, 1864 (Can.), c. 17. Both were enacted at a time when Confederation was being discussed. The French title of The Insolvent Act of 1864, was "l'Acte concernant la faillite, 1864", the word "faillite" being the one now currently used to translate the word "bankruptcy". In spite of its English title, the Act was in fact a bankruptcy act. It applied to all persons in Upper Canada and to traders only in Lower Canada and it contained detailed provisions relating to fraudulent conveyances and preferences. Nevertheless, the Civil Code comprised a section of nine articles, (arts. 1032 to 1040 incl.) entitled "Of the Avoidance of Contracts and Payments made in Fraud of Creditors", applicable to traders and to non-traders alike except where The Insolvent Act was to prevail. The legislative history of those articles was set forth by Mr. Justice Pigeon in Gingras v. General Motors Products of Canada Ltd.[54] Some have been amended. It will suffice to quote a few of them as they then read:

> 1034. A gratuitous contract is deemed to be made with intent to defraud, if the debtor be insolvent at the time of making it.
> 1035. An onerous contract made by an insolvent debtor with a person who knows him to be insolvent is deemed to be made with intent to defraud.
> 1036. Every payment by an insolvent debtor to a creditor knowing his insolvency, is deemed to be made with intent to defraud, and the creditor may be compelled to restore the amount or thing received or the value thereof, for the benefit of the creditors according to their respective rights.
> 1037. Further provisions concerning the presumption of fraud and the nullity of acts done in contemplation of insolvency are contained in The Insolvent Act of 1864.

Article 17.23 of the Code defines "bankruptcy" ("faillite") as meaning "the condition of a trader who has discontinued his payments"; insolvency was left undefined, the word being clearly used by the Code in the general sense. Even though articles 1034, 1035 and 1036 are predicated on insolvency, the Commissioners appointed for codifying the laws of Lower Canada in civil matters would have been astonished had they been told that those articles formed no part of the civil law: except perhaps for art. 1036 which appears to be an improvement of relatively modern origin (although it was not considered new law), such provisions were derived from a division of Roman law called Paulian law and, from time immemorial, had constituted a pivot of the civil law system. Other provisions of the Code are of the same nature and also depend on insolvency, such as art. 803 (revocation of a gift made by an insolvent debtor), and art. 2023 (hypothec consented to by an insolvent debtor). Other provisions still, although not expressly predicated on insolvency are related to insolvency and to the protection of creditors, for instance, art. 655 (the creditors of an heir who renounces a succession to their prejudice can have the renunciation rescinded and accept the succession in his stead).

The constitutional validity of such provisions is not in issue: they antedate Confederation and were continued by s. 129 of the Constitution. The only issue which could arise with respect to them is whether they are in conflict with federal law. But the content and integrity of the Civil Code are indicative of the extent of provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights: Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons[55], at pp. 110 and 111. The fact that there existed a statutory scheme of bankruptcy and insolvency to which the Code explicitly referred as to a distinct and specific body of law, without curtailing for that reason its own normal ambit, illustrates how the respective domains of property and civil rights and of bankruptcy and insolvency were viewed during the very period when the federal union was being discussed; it also reveals how it was intended that the distribution of powers should operate with respect to those domains.

In the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act reference[56], in Canadian Bankers Association v. Attorney-General of Saskatchewan[57], and in Reference re Validity of the Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959[58] (Alta.), the various provincial laws found ultra vires were predicated upon insolvency. But they went further and set up elaborate statutory schemes involving one or more of the following features: the denial of creditors' access to courts or the restriction of their right to enforce their claims, the establishment of administrative boards, mediation, composition, arrangements, moratoriums, consolidation orders, staying of proceedings and the relief of debtors from liability to pay their debts. No such features are to be found in the presently impugned Saskatchewan statute where all that is at stake is the avoidance of fraudulent acts for the better enforcement of civil obligations. Some doubt was expressed in the Orderly Payment of Debts Act, (1959) (Alta.) reference at pp. 576 and 577 as to whether the Voluntary Assignments case would have been decided in the same way at a later date even in the absence of federal legislation on the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency. But even if this doubt was not expressed in an obiter dictum, I would regard it as questioning not the general principles enunciated in the Voluntary Assignments case, but their application in that particular instance. Accordingly, I do not think that those previous decisions of the Judicial Committee and of this Court preclude my abiding by my conclusions: laws provincial in their purpose, object and nature as those under attack cannot be rendered ultra vires because of virtual federal paramountcy: they can only become inoperative in case of actual repugnancy with valid federal laws.

On this latter point, I believe the test of repugnancy to be applied in this case should not differ from the one which was admitted in Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan[59]; O'Grady v. Sparling[60], and Ross v. The Registrar of Motor Vehicles et al.[61]: provincial law gives way to federal law in case of operational conflict. Even if the test be one of conflict of legislative policies entailing no operational inconsistency and depending solely "upon the intention of the paramount Legislature" as was said by Dixon J., in a passage of Ex p. McLean[62], at p. 483, quoted by Mr. Justice Pigeon in the Ross case (at p. 15), I am of the view that s. 50, subs. (6) of the Bankruptcy Act provides a clear indication that Parliament, far from intending to depart from the rule of operational conflict, did in fact aim at the highest possible degree of legal integration of federal and provincial laws: attacks upon transactions within the three-month period provided by s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act constitute a minimum but the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to avail himself of all other rights and remedies provided by provincial law "as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by" the Bankruptcy Act.

I would dispose of this appeal as is proposed by Mr. Justice Spence.

Appeal allowed with costs, LASKIN C.J. and MARTLAND, DICKSON and DE GRANDPRÉ JJ. dissenting.

Blaine L. Hudson, The Trustee of the Estate of G.S. & D. Construction Ltd., a Bankrupt Appellant;
and
John Alexander Benallack and Lillian M. Benallack Respondents.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF ALBERTA, APPELLATE DIVISION

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent preference—Whether concurrent intent on part of both insolvent debtor and creditor required—The Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, s. 73.

A company assigned to the respondents its interest as purchaser, in an agreement for sale of certain lands. The consideration for the assignment was stated to be $15,250. At the time the assignor company was indebted to the assignees in the amount of $15,000 with interest and this indebtedness was used to offset the purchase price of the assignor's interest in the agreement of sale. All of the issued shares of the company were owned by the son and daughter-in-law of the respondents. The company made an assignment in bankruptcy within the 12-month period mentioned in s. 74 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, and the appellant was named as trustee. Subsequently, an application to have the assignment declared void as against the trustee was granted. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta reversed, whereupon the trustee appealed to this Court. The question at issue was whether the words "with a view to giving such creditor a preference" contained in s. 73(1) of the Bankruptcy Act require only an intention on the part of the insolvent debtor to prefer or a concurrent intent on the part of both debtor and creditor.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

A finding of concurrent intent is not necessary in order to set aside a payment as a fraudulent preference under s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act. The cognizance of the creditor or its absence is not relevant. Although one can sympathize with the rationale of concurrent intent, which is the desire to protect an innocent creditor who accepts payment of a debt in good faith, this point of view cannot be reconciled with the language of the statute, with the history of bankruptcy legislation, or with the right of other innocent creditors to equal protection.

Benallack v. Bank of British North America 1905 CanLII 18 (SCC), (1905), 36 S.C.R. 120, distinguished.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta, Appellate Division[1], allowing an appeal from a judgment of Cullen J. Appeal allowed.

J.L. MacPherson, Q.C., for the appellant.

G.C. Hawco, for the respondents.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.—

I

This appeal raises a question of statutory construction which, one should think, would not cause difficulty, but which has indeed given rise to an abundance of conflicting legal opinion and a thoroughly obfuscated state of the law. The question is whether the words "with a view to giving such creditor a preference" contained in s. 73(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, require only an intention on the part of the insolvent debtor to prefer or a concurrent intent on the part of both debtor and creditor. Sections 73 and 74 of the Act read as follows:

> 73. (1) Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor or of any person in trust for any creditor with a view to giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors shall, if the person making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same becomes bankrupt within three months after the date of making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same, be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.
> (2) Where any such conveyance, transfer, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, or over any one or more of them, it shall be presumed prima facie to have been made, incurred, taken, paid or suffered with a view to giving such creditor a preference over other creditors, whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be receivable or avail to support such transaction.
> (3) For the purposes of this section, the expression "creditor" includes a surety or guarantor for the debt due to such creditor.
> 74. Where the conveyance, transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding mentioned in section 73 is in favour of a person related to the insolvent person, the period limited in subsection 73(1) shall be twelve months instead of three months.

Any conveyance or transfer of property or payment made by an insolvent person in favour of any creditor with a view to giving such creditor a preference over other creditors is deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in bankruptcy if the insolvent person becomes bankrupt within three months thereafter or within twelve months where the insolvent person and the preferred creditor are related persons.

II

In the present case the transaction impugned is the assignment on March 1, 1972, by G.S. & D. Construction Ltd. to the respondents, John Alexander Benallack and Lillian M. Benallack, of the assignor's interest, as purchaser, in an agreement for sale of certain lands in the City of Calgary. The consideration for the assignment was stated to be $15,250. At the time the assignor company was indebted to the assignees in the amount of $15,000 with interest and this indebtedness was used to offset the purchase price of the assignor's interest in the agreement of sale. All of the issued shares of G.S. & D. Construction Ltd. were owned by George Bayard Benallack and Shirley Edna May Benallack, the son and daughter-in-law respectively of the respondents. G.S. & D. Construction Ltd. made an assignment in bankruptcy on June 27, 1972, within the 12-month period mentioned in s. 74 of the Act, and the appellant Hudson was named as trustee. The learned Chambers Judge, Cullen J., made a number of findings, of which the following are of moment:

1. On March 1, 1972, the date of the assignment, the bankrupt company was an insolvent person within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act;
2. The bankrupt and the respondents were related persons within the meaning of the Act and s. 74 applied;
3. The respondents received a preference over other creditors as a result of the assignment;
4. The bankrupt intended to give the respondents a preference over its other creditors.

Cullen J. held against the need for concurrent intent and declared the assignment to be void as against the trustee in bankruptcy. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta reversed. Mr. Justice McDermid, with whom Mr. Justice Prowse concurred, considered the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Benallack v. The Bank of British North America[2] to be binding, although Mr. Justice McDermid was of the opinion that if he had been originally considering the proper interpretation of s. 73, he would not have read into the section the secondary meaning that the creditor as well as the debtor must have the view of giving the creditor a preference over other creditors. Mr. Justice Clement concurred in judgment of McDermid J.A., but he did not share the opinion of Mr. Justice McDermid as to the proper construction of s. 73.

III

On the question whether proof of concurrent intent on the part of the debtor and creditor must be shown before the transaction can be set aside, there is, as I have indicated, a wide divergence of opinion. There are many decisions in which it has been held that concurrent intent must be proved; others in which it has been held that the Court is concerned only with the intent of the debtor; and still others in which the point has been left unresolved.

In the jurisprudence of British Columbia one finds such cases as Re Blenkarn Planer Ltd.[3], in which Mr. Justice Ruttan held, obiter, that the view of the debtor alone is to be considered. In Re Totem Painting Co. Ltd.[4], Mr. Justice Wilson apparently was of the opinion that the intention of the creditor was of importance. In Re B.C. Boat Sales Ltd.[5], two of the judges held the evidence established a double intent and it was therefore unnecessary to decide whether s. 64 (now s. 73) of the Act called for consideration of the creditor's intent. Norris J.A. strongly supported the position that the intent of the person receiving the benefit is irrelevant. Wilson C.J.S.C. reached the same conclusion in Re Pacific Belting Co. Ltd.[6], followed in Re Lock Enterprises Ltd.[7] The British Columbia Court of Appeal in the recent case of Flor-Lay Services Ltd. v. Stewart[8], reviewed many of the authorities and concluded that the principle enunciated in Benallack v. Bank of British North America was not applicable to s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act and that the Court need have regard only to the intent or view of the debtor. McIntyre J.A. (Robertson and Taggart JJ.A. concurring) made this observation in the course of his reasons for judgment (at p. 465):

> It would then seem that the law on this subject is well settled. However, one cannot review the many cases decided on this point without sensing that the judges in Canada, including appellate judges, have grown restive under the need to apply the concurrence of intent principle from the Benallack case to the construction of s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act.

When one examines the decisions in the Province of Alberta one also finds diversity of opinion: compare Beck J.A., in In re Cohen and Mahlin[9], and Riley J. in Re McIntosh-Marshall Equipment Ltd.[10]

In an early Manitoba Court of Appeal decision, In re Bell[11], frequently referred to, two members of the Court, Perdue C.J.M. and Dennistoun J.A., held that the 1905 Benallack case should be followed and, therefore, a common or concurrent intent must be found in order to constitute a preference under s. 31 (now s. 73) of the Bankruptcy Act. Cameron J.A. dissented in a carefully researched and persuasive judgment.

In Ontario one finds frequent reference to the case of In re Webb[12], in which Orde J. held that there must be a concurrence of intent on the one side to give and on the other side to accept a preference over other creditors. The year after the decision in In re Webb Sir William Mulock C.J. Ex., in Burns v. Royal Bank of Canada[13], reached the opposite conclusion, holding that to constitute a fraudulent preference there must be present two circumstances: a preference in fact and an intention on the part of the debtor to prefer. An appeal from the judgment of Mulock C.J. Ex. was dismissed without written reasons by the Appellate Division[14]. Oddly, the very next year the Appellate Division, differently constituted, relying on In re Bell, supra, and on the judgment of Orde J. in In re Webb, supra, made a finding of common intention in Briscoe v. Standard Bank of Canada[15]. Then in 1928 Orde J.A., delivering the judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in Canadian Credit Mens Association v. Jenkins[16], appears to have adopted the judgment of Mulock C.J. Ex. in the Burns case. After quoting the following words of Duff J., as he then was, in Salter& Arnold, Ltd. v. Dominion Bank[17], at p.625:

> "It is settled law that the intention to give a preference envisaged by sec. 3.1 is an intention in fact, and whatever else may be said about it, it must be an intention entertained by the debtor:"

Orde J.A. added (at p. 80):

> See also to the same effect, Mulock C.J. in Burns v. Royal Bank of Canada (1922) 2 C.B.R. 241, at p. 253, 51 O.L.R. 564, at p. 572; Ex parte Taylor; In re Goldsmid (1886), 18 Q.B.D. 295, 56 L.J.Q.B. 195.

Two more recent Ontario cases might be mentioned in which it was held that the concurrent intent of both debtor and creditor are not necessary to show a fraudulent intent: Re Echlin Press Ltd.[18], and Re Suta[19].

Cases from the Province of Quebec reflect the different points of view: In re La Corporation des Obligations Municipales Ltée[20] (appeal dismissed[21]) and Gavsie v. Goldberg[22]. See also In re Piette et Frère[23].

The cases from the Province of Nova Scotia of In re Star Grocery Co.[24], and In re George E. Boak & Son Ltd.[25], apply a concurrent intent test. The only other judgment which I would add to those of this illustrative, but by no means exhaustive, list is In re Mills and Mills[26] in which Winter J. came to the conclusion that the doctrine of concurrent intent appeared "wrongly conceived and bad in law."

IV

Although the Courts of the country appear divided, more or less evenly, on the need for a concurrent intent before invalidating a transaction, the textbook writers and commentators do not evidence such divergence of opinion. The editors of Duncan & Honsberger, Bankruptcy in Canada, 3rd ed., p. 485, point out that s. 64 (now s. 73) makes no reference to the view of the creditor and that the cases in England and in the other Dominions on corresponding sections in Bankruptcy Acts contain no references to the view of the creditor, the view of the debtor alone being considered. The editors of Houlden & Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law of Canada, Cumulative Supplement, 1974, p. 83, say:

> In view of the plain meaning of Sec. 73, the concurrent intent of both debtor and creditor is not necessary to show a fraudulent preference. The intention of the debtor alone is to be considered.

and in Bradford & Greenberg's Canadian Bankruptcy Act, 3rd ed., p. 163, the authors cite "an intention on the part of the debtor to prefer" as one of the two circumstances constituting a fraudulent preference. See also 2 C.E.D. (Ont. 3d) 15-334: "The intention of the debtor alone is to be considered" and Comment in (1958-59), 37 C.B.R. 153, and Notes on Section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act by Professor Réginald Savoie in (1967), 9 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1.

If this Court is free to decide the issue of concurrent intent untrammelled by earlier decisions, there would seem to be at least three reasons why we should not engraft upon s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act an additional concept, that of concurrent intent: first, the policy of the Bankruptcy Act; second, the history of the Act; third, the language of s. 73.

The object of the bankruptcy law is to ensure the division of the property of the debtor rateably among all his creditors in the event of his bankruptcy. Section 112 of the Act provides that, subject to the Act, all claims proved in the bankruptcy shall be paid pari passu. The Act is intended to put all creditors upon an equal footing. Generally, until a debtor is insolvent or has an act of bankruptcy in contemplation, he is quite free to deal with his property as he wills and he may prefer one creditor over another but, upon becoming insolvent, he can no longer do any act out of the ordinary course of business which has the effect of preferring a particular creditor over other creditors. If one creditor receives a preference over other creditors as a result of the debtor acting intentionally and in fraud of the law, this defeats the equality of the bankruptcy laws.

The cognizance of the creditor or its absence should be irrelevant. One can sympathize with the rationale of concurrent intent, which is the desire to protect an innocent creditor who accepts payment of a debt in good faith, but it is hard to reconcile this point of view with the language of the statute, with the history of bankruptcy legislation, and with the right of other innocent creditors to equal protection.

VI

Section 73(1) of the present Bankruptcy Act had its counterpart in s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1919 (Can.), c. 36, as amended by 1920 (Can.), c. 34, which was the first Canadian bankruptcy Act (although not the first Canadian Act related to insolvency). The section is derived from s. 44 of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (U.K.), c. 59, which in turn derived from the earlier Acts of 1869 and 1883. Therefore the English jurisprudence arising from the interpretation of those statutes may help in understanding our own Act.

It is interesting to note that even before those enactments and as early as 1777 Lord Mansfield in Rust v. Cooper[27] held that where a transaction is carried out to defeat the equality of the bankruptcy laws, the fact the defendant was a meritorious creditor would not warrant the transaction. In Bills v. Smith[28], Cockburn C.J. referred to the intention of the party making the payment, to defeat the law, as the "cardinal point on which the whole question turned". The Act of 1869 was under consideration in Ex parte Blackburn; In re Cheesebrough[29]. There Sir James Bacon C.J., referring to the phrase "in favour of any creditor with a view of giving such creditor a preference over other creditors" said, p. 364: "The act of the debtor is alone to be considered—the object and purpose for which the payment is made can alone be enquired into...". This statement of the law was approved in Ex parte Topham; In re Walker[30]. Another case to which one might refer is Butcher v. Stead[31]. Section 92 of the 1869 Act, 32 & 33 Vict., c. 71, which governed that case, was in terms almost identical to s. 73(1) of our present Act but the English Act of that time contained a provision reading:

> ...but this section shall not affect the rights of a purchaser, payee, or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration.

Such a proviso introduced the question of the good faith of the payee or creditor and in Butcher v. Stead it saved the transaction. But a proviso in these words was not carried forward into the later English Bankruptcy Act of 1883 and such a proviso has never formed part of the Canadian Bankruptcy Act. According to Williams on Bankruptcy, 18th ed., p. 382: "...the introduction of the concluding words in the 1883 Act restored the common law rule, with the result that the bona fides of the preferred creditor is today immaterial."

The English attitude is reflected in the following words of Lord Esher, quoted with approval by the Earl of Halsbury L.C. in Sharp v. Jackson[32], p. 421:

> "The question whether there has been a fraudulent preference depends, not upon the mere fact that there had been a preference, but also on the state of mind of the person who made it. It must be shewn not only that he has preferred a creditor, but that he has fraudulently done so. It depends upon what was in his mind. Whether it is called "intention" or "view" or "object" does not appear to me to matter much. The question is whether in fact he had the intention to prefer certain creditors."

VII

I come now to consider the decision of this Court in Benallack v. Bank of British North America. The case has stood on the books for seventy years. Many judges have considered it controlling on the question of concurrent purpose as applied to s. 73(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. I approach the case, therefore, with the respect to which those considerations entitle it, but I must at once observe that the case was decided in 1905, some fourteen years before the enactment of the Canadian Bankruptcy Act in 1919. It concerned a Yukon Ordinance having to do with preferential assignments, c. 38 of the Consolidated Ordinances of the Yukon Territory 1902. To permit comparison with s. 73(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, I will give the Ordinance in its entirety:

> An Ordinance respecting Preferential Assignments.
> 1. Every gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer, delivery over or payment of goods, chattels or effects or of bonds, bills, notes, securities or of shares, dividends, premiums or bonus in any bank, company or corporation made by any person at any time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency with intent to defeat or delay or prejudice his creditors or to give to any one or more of them a preference over his other creditors or over any one or more of them or which has such effect shall as against them be utterly void.
> 2. Every such gift, conveyance, assignment, transfer, delivery over or payment whether made owing to pressure or partly owing to pressure or not, which has the effect of defeating, delaying or prejudicing creditors or giving one or more of them a preference shall as against the other creditors of such debtor be utterly void.
> 3. Nothing in this Ordinance shall apply to any deed of assignment made and executed by a debtor for the purpose of paying and satisfying rateably and proportionately and without preference or priority all the creditors of such debtor their just debts or any bona fide sale of goods or payment made in the ordinary course of trade or calling, to innocent purchasers or parties.

The wording of the Ordinance differs from that of s. 73(1) of the Bankruptcy Act; in particular s. 3 introduces concepts of bona fides and "innocent purchasers or parties" not found in s. 73(1).

The action in the 1905 Benallack case was brought to set aside several instruments, consisting of a chattel mortgage, land transfer and book debt assignments, in favour of a bank, as being void against creditors under the Ordinance. The bank was ignorant of the true financial condition of the debtor. Idington J., who delivered the unanimous judgment of a five-man Court, after referring to the cases of Stephens v. McArthur[33], and Gibbons v. McDonald[34], said:

> And if a fraudulent preference to whom is the having such a purpose to be attributed?

Digitized by Google

> Is it enough to shew that the assignor may have had such an intent?
> Must not the assignee as well as the assignor be a party to the fraudulent intent?
> Such would seem to be the result of a long line of decisions upon which the commercial world as had a right to act for a long time past. And though there may not have been any express decision on the point upon this legislation in this Court the late Chief Justice, Sir William Ritchie, in Gibbons v. McDonald, at page 589 indicates that in his view there must be > "a concurrence of intent on the one side to give and on the other to accept a preference over other creditors."
> Counsel for the appellants properly conceded that the evidence here did not show knowledge on the part of the bank such as would enable us to find this concurrence of purpose.
> Until the legislature obliterates the element of intent in such legislation and clearly declares that, quite independently of intent, the preferential result or effect of the transaction impeached is to govern, it will be exceedingly difficult to arrive at any other conclusion in cases of this kind. The results that might flow from such legislation ought not to be brought about without such purpose being most clearly expressed by the legislature.

The case is unsatisfactory, if I may, with respect, say so, in that none of the "long line of decisions" upon which Idington J. relies is identified and no reasons are given for concluding that the intent to which the Ordinance refers must be entertained by the creditor as well as the debtor. In the later case of Salter & Arnold, Ltd. v. Dominion Bank, supra, as I have already mentioned, Duff J. observed that whatever else may be said about the intention to give a preference envisaged by s. 31 (now s. 73) "it must be an intention entertained by the debtor". These words have been interpreted by some judges to mean that the intention with which one is concerned is only that of the debtor. I think, however, that we must give effect to the words of Duff J. "whatever else may be said about it". What Duff J. intended, in my opinion, was merely to leave the matter open, just as Cartwright J., as he then was, did in the penultimate paragraph of his judgment in Velensky v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Limited[35], (reported in 38 C.B.R. 162 as In re Bernard Motors Ltd.). The paragraph in question, for some reason, was not printed in the report of the case in the Supreme Court Reports but is contained in the 38 Canadian Bankruptcy Reports, p. 167 and reads:

Before parting with the matter, I wish to observe that Bridges J. suggests a doubt as to whether if he were untrammelled by authority he would hold that, on the true construction of s. 64, to render void a preference in fact it is necessary that there be an intention on the part of the creditor to be preferred as well as an intention on the part of the debtor to prefer. In In re Blenkarn Planer Ltd. reflex, (1958), 37 C.B.R 147, 26 W.W.R. 168, 14 D.L.R. (2d) 719, 1958 Can. Abr. 55, Ruttan J. examines a number of decisions and expresses the opinion that the view of the debtor alone has to be considered. I mention this for the purpose of making it clear that in the case before us this point does not require decision and I express no opinion upon it.

I have concluded that a finding of concurrent intent is not necessary in order to set aside a payment as a fraudulent preference under s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act. I do not believe that the decision of this Court in Benallack v. Bank of British North America is authoritative in interpreting s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act. However similar may be the wording, I do not think that a phrase in a provincial or territorial Ordinance of three paragraphs dealing with preferential assignments and having a particular legislative history and jurisprudence should govern the language of a federal Act of some 213 sections dealing with bankruptcy and having an entirely different legislative history and jurisprudence.

One must recall that fraudulent preference statutes and fraudulent conveyance statutes outside of the bankruptcy laws have generally contained a section exempting from the application of the statute any assignment or payment or bona fide sale of goods made in the ordinary course of trade to innocent purchasers. Such saving provisions are contained in our provincial fraudulent preference statutes and in each of the cases relied on in the 1905 Benallack judgment a similar statute was under consideration. These statutes required consideration of the knowledge or bona fides of the creditor. Under the law relating to bankruptcy the rule has been different, as the English authorities cited earlier in these reasons will confirm.

I am further of the view that s. 3 of the Yukon Ordinance plays the same role in the interpretation of the Ordinance as the proviso to s. 92 of the English Act of 1869 played in Butcher v. Stead, requiring consideration of the knowledge and intent and privity of the creditor; but there is no counterpart of s. 3 of the Ordinance to be found in s. 73(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 75(1) of the Act, which protects certain transactions, is the only section in which the bona fides of the creditor emerges. Section 75(1) is very limited in scope. It is expressly made "Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act... with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences..." and only comes into operation when s. 73(1) does not apply. Section 75(1) in express terms calls for double intent whereas s. 73(1) does not.

Our duty is to construe the language of s. 73 of the Bankruptcy Act within the ambit and policy of that Act; if we go to the words of the statute we find that what is to be considered as fraudulent and void is:

Digitized by Google

"Every conveyance… of property" (i.e., the assignment in favour of respondents) "… made by any insolvent person" (i.e., G.S. & D. Construction Ltd.) "in favour of any creditor" (i.e. the respondents) "…with a view to giving such creditor a preference…"

It seems to me plain from the quoted words that the view, the only view, with which s. 73(1) of the Act is concerned is that of the insolvent person making the conveyance and we should not be diverted to any other conclusion by reliance upon a case in which a different statute in different language was construed. Whether or not a conveyance or payment is a fraudulent preference depends entirely on the intention of the debtor. The trial judge has found against the respondents on this point.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Appeal Division and restore the judgment of Cullen J. with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUÉBEC

Bankruptcy—Preferential payments—Five-year prescription—Suspension of the prescription—Date of bankruptcy—Effect of the composition proposal—Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, ss. 16, 34(6), 38(1), 41(4), 64—Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C 1970, c. B-3, ss. 39(1), 41(10), 43(4), 44—Civil Code, arts. 1040 and 2232.

In 1957-58, Lewis Brothers Asphalt Paving Ltd., a company which subsequently went bankrupt, had made some payments to respondent, which was one of its creditors at the time. Appellant, also claiming to be a creditor of Lewis Brothers, brought an action in 1965 to request the annulment of these payments, because in its opinion they were preferential payments. In September 1957, Lewis Brothers undertook to perform certain work for C.N. under contract; under a contract of guarantee, appellant became jointly responsible with Lewis Brothers for the performance of the contract. On February 6, 1958, a petition in bankruptcy, which is still pending, was brought against Lewis Brothers, and on February 20, 1958, Lewis Brothers submitted a composition proposal to its creditors that was accepted by them in March 1958. However, since Lewis Brothers was insolvent, C.N. would no longer deal with the company; as a result appellant had to pay a substantial sum to complete the contract. Finally, in October 1961, Lewis Brothers made an assignment of its property since it could no longer meet its obligations as stated in the composition proposal.

The Superior Court and the Court of Appeal allowed the plea of prescription submitted by respondent, and the action was dismissed in these two courts without further comment on the other aspects of the case.

Held: The appeal should be allowed in part.

On the basis of the law at the time, the Court of Appeal, like the Superior Court, had to allow the plea of prescription and dismiss the action, making no distinction between the Paulian and bankruptcy aspects. However, Gingras v. General Motors Products of Canada Ltd., 1974 CanLII 215 (SCC), [1976] 1 S.C.R. 426, has since modified the position of the parties by holding that, under the Bankruptcy Act, the prescription is for five years in commercial matters. Moreover, for purposes of this prescription, it must be considered that it was "absolutely impossible for" the creditor "to act", as long as the circumstances have not created suspicion. Consequently, in the case at bar, the prescription was suspended: the five-year prescription did not come into effect until October 6, 1961—which was less than five years before the proceedings were instituted—since until that date Lewis Brothers had complied with its obligations. Nevertheless, the payments challenged cannot be annulled, because they were not made within three months of the bankruptcy, which occurred on the same date as the assignment, namely October 6, 1961. The bankruptcy cannot be moved back to February 6, 1958, the date of the petition in bankruptcy, because the petition filed at that time was not followed by a receiving order. Nor can the bankruptcy be moved back to February 20, 1958, the date of the composition proposal, since under the Bankruptcy Act of 1952 such a proposal does not constitute an act of bankruptcy.

However, since, under the composition proposal, respondent received dividends to which it was not entitled, it must pay appellant the amounts in question, which were paid to it either directly or indirectly through its assignee.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal of Quebec dismissing an appeal against a judgment of Tellier J. of the Superior Court. Appeal allowed in part.

David Wood, for the appellant.

Carol Laramée and Raymond Hébert, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DE GRANDPRE J.—Appellant, claiming to be a creditor of Lewis Brothers Asphalt Paving Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as Lewis Brothers), a bankrupt company, brought an action against respondent because the latter had received preferential payments in 1957 and 1958, thus giving rise to a Paulian action and an action under the Bankruptcy Act then in effect, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14. These proceedings could clearly have been instituted by the trustees, but they refused to do so, and on November 9, 1965 appellant obtained from the Court the necessary authorizations under the Bankruptcy Act, followed some days later by the transfer of the trustees' rights (s. 16). It should be noted that the action under s. 16 is personal to appellant and is conferred on it by the Act (Traders Finance Corporation Limited v. Lévesque[1]).

The relevant facts are as follows:

(a) on September 27, 1957, Lewis Brothers obtained a contract from C.N. covering certain work at the Côte de Liesse railway yard in Montreal;

(b) on October 1, 1957, appellant issued a guarantee of performance in favour of C.N., under which it became jointly responsible with Lewis Brothers for the performance of the contract;

(c) on February 6, 1958, a petition in bankruptcy was brought against Lewis Brothers; during the hearing, this petition was still outstanding;

(d) on February 20, 1958, Lewis Brothers submitted a proposal to its creditors offering them a payment of thirty-five cents on the dollar over a period of four years, which was accepted by the creditors on March 28 and ratified by the Court on April 25, 1958;

Digitized by Google

(e) in the intervening period, that is on March 6, 1958, C.N. refused to deal any longer with Lewis Brothers with respect to the contract of September 1957, since Lewis Brothers was insolvent, with the result that appellant had to pay the sum of $169,247.55 to complete the contract;
(f) on October 6, 1961, Lewis Brothers, having paid three of the dividends promised in the proposal and having been unable to pay the fourth, made an assignment of its property, which was followed by various proceedings, in particular a judgment of March 20, 1962, recognizing the validity of the claim of $167,247.55 filed by appellant; however, no judgment was made annulling the proposal.
The preferential payments allegedly received by respondent were:

$ 5,000	on December 12, 1957
$ 5,000	on December 19, 1957
$10,576.61	on December 9, 1958

They resulted from the sale of petroleum products by respondent to Lewis Brothers in 1957. Appellant requested that these payments be declared void and that respondent be condemned to pay the sum of $17,070.26, that is, the difference between the preferential amounts mentioned above and the dividends to which respondent was entitled under the proposal and the assignment, with interest, of course.
To this action, respondent pleaded that the amounts it had received were not preferential payments, and that, moreover, the petroleum products had not been sold to Lewis Brothers but to Pavage Richelieu Limitée. Respondent added that in any case the claim is prescribed, whether the action is considered as a Paulian action or as a case under ss. 64 et seq. of the Bankruptcy Act of 1952.
The Superior Court and the Court of Appeal did not consider the facts except for determining whether the plea of prescription had any merit. Having found in the affirmative on this point, the Quebec courts went no further in their study of the record, and this Court does not have the benefit of their views on the other aspects of the case.
A preliminary question arises: does appellant have the status of a creditor which would permit it to challenge the payments made in 1957 and 1958, when it had certainly not paid out anything before the two payments of 1957, and it had probably not spent a penny before the payment of December 1958? In my opinion, this status should be admitted. Once the guarantee of performance was signed, appellant became a debtor of C.N. It is true that this obligation was coupled with a suspensive condition and could only take complete effect on default by Lewis Brothers. When this default occurred in March 1958, the condition disappeared and appellant's obligation became complete, retroactively to the date of the guarantee of performance. It remained only to determine the amount of appellant's debt to C.N.
I have already noted that the Quebec courts accepted the plea of prescription. They held unanimously that appellant was aware of the payments and their grave appearance of fraud more than a year before the institution of proceedings in December 1965. The trial judge said as much:

> [TRANSLATION] ...it is clear that this decision by plaintiff to bring an action followed facts of which it had been aware since at least 1963, through its accountant Whalen, who, according to the evidence, made a "final" report in May 1964.

Bélanger J.A. affirmed this in the Court of Appeal:

> [TRANSLATION] More than a year before the action, through its counsel and investigating accountant, it was aware of the payments which it challenged, of the insolvency of L.B.A.P. at that time, and of other circumstances which, according to its allegations, rendered these payments fraudulent.

Appellant did not succeed in establishing that these consistent findings were contrary to the evidence, and I have no hesitation in accepting them.
With respect to the Paulian aspect of the action, the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal were correct in finding that in law, knowledge of the facts by appellant involved application of the one-year prescription against it. I cannot accept its contention that it did not have to act while its file was not in fact complete. Like the Quebec courts, I believe that the beginning of the prescription cannot be deferred until such time as almost all aspects of the evidence have been assembled.
Having found in the record evidence that more than twelve months had elapsed between the appellant acquiring knowledge of the relevant facts and the institution of proceedings, the judgment rendered, like that of the Superior Court, in accordance with the law at the time, had to apply art. 1040 of the Code and dismiss the action, making no distinction between the Paulian and bankruptcy aspects. Since then, however, the decision of this Court in Gingras v. General Motors Products of Canada Ltd.[2], has held that prescription under the Bankruptcy Act is for five years in commercial matters, as in the case at bar.
The question presented is whether this five-year prescription ran from the date of the preferential payments of 1957 and 1958, or whether this is a case of suspension, it having been "absolutely impossible for them to act" (art. 2232, Civil Code) before the end of 1960, that is, five years before service of the proceedings. The exact scope of this article has given rise to differing conclusions. This may be seen in the following decisions, inter alia: Joy Oil Limited v. McColl Frontenac Oil Co. Limited[3]; Gagnon v. Lesage[4]; Lussier v. Marquis[5], set aside on another point[6]; and Jean-Paul Alain v. Fonds d'indemnisation des victimes d'accidents d'automobile[7]. For the limited purposes of this case, I shall note the following:

(1) the old law recognized that prescription must not run against someone who found it impossible to act;
(2) the Code Napoléon (art. 2251) did not repeat this rule in its text;
(3) French cases, notwithstanding the silence of the text, have held that factual obstacles, arising from circumstances external to the creditor which make it impossible to act, retain their suspensive value;
(4) many French authors criticize this line of authority, but there is no unanimity of opinion;
(5) in their third report (1865), the Commissioners wrote, with respect to the maxim contra non valentem (at p. 424):

> It is remarkable that it is not textually inserted in the French code, although it is the basis of all its particular provisions, and has an extensive application to many other cases which do not result from the natural or legal state of the parties concerned.

This reason for suspension must be understood. In the case at bar, I do not believe that a creditor, presented with a petition in bankruptcy by another creditor or having received a proposal from the debtor, must immediately act as though the debtor had contravened the Act and made preferential payments. On the contrary, it seems to me that the presumption is the opposite, and that it must be considered that it was "absolutely impossible for" the creditor "to act", as long as the circumstances have not created suspicion. In the case at bar, as long as the proposal was complied with, that is until October 1961, the creditor was perfectly justified in not moving; it was only later that the questions arose. In other words, the evidence established to my satisfaction that the rule of suspension applies in the case at bar, since appellant had no opportunity to act before certain facts came to its attention, and this did not occur more than five years before proceedings were instituted. The plea of prescription could therefore not be maintained against the action, considered from the point of view of the Bankruptcy Act.
The plea of prescription having been rejected, the real question is as follows: is it possible, although the assignment of property dates from October 1961, to go back in time to the autumn of 1957, since s. 64 limits the action to cases in which a person guilty of preference "becomes bankrupt within three months" after the date the preference is given? In seeking an answer, I of course assume that the payments were in fact preferential, a point which it will be necessary to study if I come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances of this case, the month of October 1961 immediately followed the autumn of 1957. It must be remembered that the difficulties of the bankrupt were divided into three periods:
(1) a petition in bankruptcy in February 1958, which was never followed by a judgment;
(2) a proposal in March 1958, which remained in effect until the autumn of 1961, after being accepted and ratified, and resulted in various dividend payments; this proposal was never annulled by judgment;
(3) an assignment in October 1961, which was followed by all the usual proceedings.
Appellant asks this Court to relate the assignment of October 1961 either to the petition in bankruptcy of February 1958 or to the proposal of March 1958, so that the first two preferential payments would have been made within the three months mentioned in s. 64. In order to do this, appellant relied on In re Legault[8]. The facts in that case should be summarized:
—March 8, 1955: hypothec giving a preference;
—April 5, 1955: receiving order;
—May 28, 1955: proposal approved by the Court, whose judgment annulled the receiving order;
—November 3, 1955: annulment of the proposal and receiving order.
On subsequent application by the trustees challenging the hypothecary transaction of March 8 and demanding that it be cancelled, Montpetit J. related the bankruptcy back to either the first receiving order (April 5) or the date the proposal was approved (May 28). On the first point, he stated (at p. 169):

> [TRANSLATION] What is the meaning of the expression "becoming bankrupt"? In my opinion, it is concerned with the case of the person against whom a receiving order is made. This was the situation for the bankrupt on April 5.

After dismissing the objection that the proposal had annulled the first receiving order, the learned judge continued (at p. 169):

> [TRANSLATION] Moreover, this aspect is of secondary importance, since the proposal was approved on May 28. In fact, is it not legitimate and reasonable to say, using s. 38(1) which states that all provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, to the extent to which they are applicable, apply mutatis mutandis to proposals, that s. 64 may be relied on in a case in which the person who effected the challenged transfer has a proposal approved within a three-month period after the said transfer? It appears to me that this is to apply to proposals, mutatis mutandis, what the Act provides for bankruptcy.

The facts of the case before this Court are different: it is sufficient to note that here, the petition in bankruptcy of February 1958 was not followed by a judicial decision, and that the proposal which followed it several days later was never annulled by a judgment. Moreover, In re Legault has not met with complete approval, as shown by the criticism found in L.W. Houlden's article, "The first ten years of the 1949 Bankruptcy Act", 1 C.B.R. (N.S.), at p. 97:

> It is submitted that this decision is not correct and is not justified on the wording of the Bankruptcy Act.

It is therefore, quite properly, necessary to reread the Act.

Is it possible in the case at bar, notwithstanding the proposal duly approved by the Court, to relate the bankruptcy back to the filing of the petition in February 1958 by relying on s. 41(4)? The text of s. 41(4) is as follows:

> The bankruptcy shall be deemed to have relation back to and to commence at the time of the filing of the petition on which a receiving order is made or of the filing of an assignment with the official receiver.

It is clear that this section relates only to the petition on which a receiving order is made, which is not the case here, since the petition was never followed by an order. Failing an order, the date of filing of the assignment is conclusive. It would perhaps be otherwise—but the Court is not asked to decide this—if an order had been made annulling the proposal and stating what the Court could consider "proper in the circumstances" (s. 36(1)). I do not see how it could be possible to relate the bankruptcy back to the petition of February 1958.

Can it be related back to the proposal of March 1958? The relevant Act being that of 1952, it is not possible for me to rely on the 1966 Act, where the beginning of a solution may perhaps be found in ss. 39(1), 41(10), 43(4) and 44. In my opinion, under the former Act, the question posed at the beginning of this paragraph must be answered in the negative. The proposal is a contract between the debtor and his creditors. When it is made in accordance with certain formalities prescribed in the Act this contract, which binds all the creditors, even the dissenting minority, is not an act of bankruptcy, and the situation which results from it is not a situation of bankruptcy. This is what Kelly J., speaking for the Court of Appeal of Ontario, held in Amanda Designs Boutique Limited v. Charisma Fashions Limited[9]. Although written in another context, the following sentence expresses the situation well (at p. 20):

> Accordingly, when filed the proposal has the potentiality of bankruptcy which does not crystallize until the proposal is refused and never crystallizes if the proposal be approved.

However, we must go further: even in the case of a proposal by an already bankrupt person, approval of the proposal by the Court—and here this approval was given—"operates to annul the bankruptcy" (s. 34(6)). The provisions of the Act thus leave to the debtor the entire administration of his property if the proposal is the first stage in the solution of his difficulties, and returns it to him if the proposal was preceded by bankruptcy. Except in extraordinary circumstances which do not exist in this case, the trustee has only one function, that is the distribution of the amounts which the debtor has undertaken to pay to the creditors.

This finding should not be ignored because s. 38(1) provides that all provisions of the Act apply mutatis mutandis to proposals. In view of the clear words of s. 41(4) and the provisions of the Act as a whole, it is not possible for me to state that in cases where a proposal is followed by an assignment, the date of the bankruptcy should be related back to the date of the proposal.

Moreover, I do not see how it can be said that the proposal survived the assignment because it was not expressly annulled. When, as in the case at bar, the assignment was accepted by all the creditors who had accepted the proposal at the outset, the latter disappeared without any order to that effect being necessary. Although the point was not discussed in Perras v. Boulet[10], it seems to me that acceptance of it was necessary to the unanimous finding of the Court.

One conclusion necessarily results from all this: the date of the assignment, that is October 1961, is the only relevant date. It follows that the payments received by respondent, assuming that they were preferential, cannot be ignored, since they dated from 1957 and 1958.

Appellant submitted as an alternative argument that the appeal should be allowed in part, since respondent recognized in its pleadings that it had no right to a dividend under the terms of the proposal, and as a result, it was prepared to return the dividend of $561.22 which it received on July 28, 1958. The Court of Appeal gave effect to this offer and ordered respondent to pay that amount, with interest, to appellant, and the latter submitted that it should also have received two other dividends of $1,122.44 each, paid not directly to respondent but to its assignee, Jeanne LeSieur, on May 10, 1960 and May 15, 1961. There is no doubt that the evidence disclosed the payment of these two dividends totalling $2,244.88, as well as receipt of these amounts by Jeanne LeSieur and the fact that she had no personal claim to put forward, but was simply the assignee of respondent. As a result, I agree with appellant's arguments on this point. Respondent raised the objection that, in the absence of Jeanne LeSieur from the record, it was impossible for the Court to rule on the point. I cannot accept this proposition, since the Court is not ruling on the validity of the transfer between respondent and Jeanne LeSieur, but simply on the fact that respondent had no right to receive the above-mentioned sums, either directly or indirectly.

I would therefore allow the appeal in part, amend the judgment appealed from, and condemn respondent to pay to appellant the sum of $2,806.10, with interest at the legal rate from the date of notice of the action, and the costs of an action of this type in all courts.

LANE J.A.

The issue before us is whether a judgment in a matrimonial property action consented to by a party who subsequently becomes bankrupt, can be attacked through the summary proceedings of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c.B-3 ("B.I.A.") as a settlement or a fraudulent conveyance.

The facts are not in dispute: On December 5, 1991 the appellant, Rose Ostapowich, commenced an action against her husband, Anthony Ostapowich ("bankrupt") out of the Unified Family Court of Saskatoon claiming a division of matrimonial property. In April of 1993, after several adjournments, Rose Ostapowich made an application for the matrimonial property division. Anthony Ostapowich executed a consent form and Carter J. issued the judgment in the form filed. The terms were amended by consent on May 10, 1993 and June 4, 1993 and Carter J. granted an Amended Consent Judgment in the terms requested.

On June 23, 1993 Anthony Ostapowich made an assignment in bankruptcy.

On November 23, 1993, the respondent ("Bank"), representing itself and other creditors, made an application for an order pursuant to s. 38 of the B.I.A. to take action on behalf of the creditors as the Trustee refused to act. Hrabinsky J. made the following order:

1. Pursuant to s. 38 of The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Bank of Montreal is hereby authorized to take any proceeding that in its opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of the bankrupt, Anthony Ostapowich with respect to the Consent Judgment in favour of Rose Ostapowich dated June 4, 1993;

2. Notice of this Order shall be given to all creditors as have filed a proof of claim with the Trustee in Bankruptcy of Anthony Ostapowich, and it is hereby specified that they shall advise whether they will be participating in the said proceedings within ten days of the date of service upon them of this Order, in writing to the solicitors for the Applicant, Bank of Montreal;
3. Since Rose Ostapowich has not yet been served with these proceedings, all other matters are adjourned sine die to be brought forward on four days notice.

On November 25, 1993, acting under this authority, the Bank brought an application by way of Notice of Motion to the Court of Queen's Bench asking for the following relief:

1. setting aside the vesting order made and the other portions of a Consent Judgment in a matrimonial property proceeding between Rose Ostapowich and Anthony Ostapowich;
2. an order directing that all monies which already have been paid to Rose Ostapowich as a result be immediately paid into Court to the credit of the proceedings or the applicant ("Bank") on behalf of the Estate of Anthony Ostapowich as the said Judgment and Order being void as at the assignment in bankruptcy.

Its application was in the following form:

> AND FURTHER TAKE NOTICE that this application is brought by Bank of Montreal following an Order pursuant to s. 28 of the said Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and an assignment by the Trustee in Bankruptcy of Anthony Ostapowich, vesting all rights of the said Trustee to pursue the said consent matrimonial property judgment dated June 4, 1993 as a settlement, fraudulent preference or otherwise being void against the Estate of Anthony Ostapowich in Bankruptcy.
> AND FURTHER TAKE NOTICE that the said Consent Order dated June 4, 1993 is a settlement within the meaning of s. 91 of the said Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and is therefore voidable as at the date of bankruptcy. Alternatively, the said Order is a frivolous and vexatious abuse of process, and is a fraudulent preference or fraudulent conveyance pursuant to The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. f-21.

On December 14, 1993 Maurice J. made the following order:

> IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the following issue be determined by a trial, such issue being whether the amended consent judgment referred to herein and dated June 4, 1993 is voidable pursuant to s. 91 of The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act as a settlement of property or is a fraudulent conveyance and/or preference within the meaning of The Fraudulent Conveyances Act and should be set aside;

AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the parties will have the right to Examinations for Discovery and production of documents. The matter shall be set down for trial in the usual manner. Bank of Montreal, on its own behalf and as representative of other creditors participating in these proceedings shall be the Plaintiff, and Rose Ostapowich and Anthony Ostapowich shall be the Defendants;

AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that pending determination of the issues stated above, all monies due and owing under the mortgages given by Mark Ostapowich or under the Judgment given by Anthony Ostapowich which are payable to Rose Ostapowich, will be paid into court by the said Rose Ostapowich, including the payment of any monies due under the mortgages as at December 1, 1993 whether paid prior to this date or otherwise.

AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the costs of and incidental to this application shall be reserved for the Trial Judge.

Rose Ostapowich, named a defendant by the order of Maurice J., appeals the order.

ARGUMENT

The appellants contend the application by the Bank was in substance a collateral attack on a valid judgment of the Court. They argue the B.I.A. does not change the common law and as a consent judgment is a judgment of the Court and not a mere agreement between the parties, there are only three ways such a judgment can be attacked:

(1) through an application to the Court to vary its judgment;

(2) through an appeal of the judgment;

(3) by a separate action to set aside the judgment on the basis it was obtained by fraud or deceit upon the Court.

None of the above avenues were pursued by the respondent in this case.

The respondent Bank contends it is not attacking the judgment, which it submits is still valid, but is rather attacking the underlying arrangement made between the parties. The Bank argues the summary proceedings of the B.I.A. are the appropriate procedures to follow once the trustee is appointed, because the transaction then falls within the scope of the B.I.A. and ss. 95 and 96 of the B.I.A. and Rule 89 allow the trustee to attack any proceeding. It contends the consent judgment is merely an agreement which can be properly attacked through the summary procedures of the B.I.A.

In the Bank's submission the judgment is a "settlement" within the definition of settlement in the B.I.A. or, in the alternative, if not a settlement it is a fraudulent conveyance. The bank contends this is the fundamental issue which must be decided by the Court. The issue of whether or not there was a fraud against the Court involves different considerations which in its submission is not relevant in these circumstances.

RELEVANT SECTIONS AND RULES OF THE B.I.A.:

2. "settlement" includes a contract, covenant, transfer, gift and designation of beneficiary in an insurance contract, to the extent that the contract, covenant, transfer, gift or designation is gratuitous or made for merely nominal consideration;

91. (1) Any settlement of property, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within one year after the date of the settlement, is void against the trustee.

(2) Any settlement of property, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within five years after the date of the settlement, is void against the trustee if the trustee can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, unable to pay all his debts with the aid of the property comprised in the settlement or that the interest of the settlor in the property did not pass on the execution thereof.

(3) This section does not extend to any settlement made

(a) before and in consideration of marriage;

(b) in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration; or

(c) on or for the spouse or children of the settlor of property that has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of the settlor's spouse or children.

95. (1) Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor or of any person in trust for any creditor with a view to giving that creditor a preference over the other creditors shall, if the person making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering it becomes bankrupt within three months after the date of making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering it, be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.

(2) Where any conveyance, transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding mentioned in subsection (1) has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, or over any one or more of them, it shall be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been made, incurred, taken, paid or suffered with a view to giving the creditor a preference over other creditors, whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be admissible to support the transaction.

(3) For the purposes of this section, the expression "creditor" includes a surety or guarantor for the debt due to the creditor.

96. Where the conveyance, transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding mentioned in section 95 is in favour of a person related to the insolvent person, the period limited in subsection 95(1) shall be twelve months instead of three months.

Rule 89:

89. Where a trustee or any other person applies to the court to set aside or avoid any settlement, conveyance, charge, obligation, proceeding, transfer, security or payment, or for a declaration for or against the title of the trustee to any property, the court may

(a) proceed in a summary manner to try the question or issue in the case;
(b) adjourn the hearing;
(c) direct or settle any question or issue to be tried;
(d) give directions for the preparation and filing of pleadings and for the trial of the question or issue; or
(e) make such further order as the court considers necessary or desirable.

DECISION

The argument of the respondent appears to be predicated on the premise a consent judgment is merely a decision of the parties which is then approved or rubber-stamped by the Court. This is simply not the case. A judgment is a final determination by the Court of the rights and obligations of the parties. A consent judgment, even if it is in the terms consented to by the parties, is not a decision of the parties but is a decision of the Court. The fact the judgment was consented to makes it no less a valid and subsisting judgment. See: The Hardy Lumber Co. v. The Pickerel River Improvement Co. [1899] 29 S.C.R. 211; City of Toronto v. Toronto R.W. Co. [1917] 39 O.L.R. 310 at p. 313. Any agreement between the parties must receive the independent sanction of the Court before it can become a judgment. This Court has held if an issue is consented to by the parties a judge is not obligated to follow it. See Peterson v. Bishop et al., [1923] 3 W.W.R. 25; Hope Hardware et al. v. Fields Stores Ltd. et al. 1978 CanLII 254 (BC SC), (1978), 7 B.C.L.R. 321. In a matrimonial property application, if the parties come to an agreement the judge must still decide whether the agreement is just and equitable before making the order and thus has a power of review over any agreement and is not bound by the parties' agreement. The Court must decide, based on the facts and the law, and that decision may ultimately reflect the agreement made by the parties but it is still the Court's decision, not that of the parties.

No matter from what perspective one views the application by the bank it is in substance an attack on a valid subsisting judgment of the Court and thus the appellant is correct such judgment can only be attacked in one of the three aforementioned ways:

1. By an application to the Court to vary its judgment;
2. By appeal;
3. By a separate action to set aside the judgment on the basis it was obtained by fraud. See: R. v. Wilson, 1983 CanLII 35 (SCC), [1984] 1 W.W.R. 481.

Simply put, if the respondent were to be successful in this appeal its effect would be to render the consent judgment nugatory. The respondent, therefore, has not chosen the correct procedure to attack the judgment.

The second issue is whether the judgment is a settlement under the B.I.A. In my opinion, a judgment cannot be a settlement. A settlement involves an action specified in s. 91 of the B.I.A. by the settlor, whereas a judgment is a decision of the Court and not the settlor.

The respondent's argument ss. 95 and 96 of the B.I.A. allow the trustee to challenge the judicial proceeding must fail as it is acknowledged the appellant is not a creditor of the bankrupt and such transaction was not therefore in "favour of any creditor".

As to the respondent's contention there is authorization for the action in Rule 89, it must be noted the rules cannot extend the jurisdiction of the Court (See Re Loxtave Buildings of Canada, Limited (1943), 25 C.B.R. 22 and Re Jenny Lind Candy Shops (1942), 23 C.B.R. 316). Here, the Bankruptcy Court does not have the jurisdiction to decide the challenge to the consent judgment.

The respondent relies on C.I.B.C. v. Shapiro (1985), 54 C.B.R. 134 which in my opinion can be distinguished. In that case, a bankrupt was, prior to the assignment, granted a decree for divorce. The order included a disposition of the matrimonial home in accordance with the minutes of settlement which provided the husband's interest in the matrimonial home should vest in the wife's consideration of her release of any and all claims to support and maintenance. The Ontario Supreme Court determined the transaction "was a compromise, or resolution of certain claims exerted against him (the bankrupt) in the course of the matrimonial litigation which compromise or resolution was arrived at in good faith and for valuable consideration. The wife was held to be a purchaser and the transaction was held not to be a settlement. The Court went on to find the disposition was not a fraudulent one and not done with a view to giving preference over other creditors. However, the issue of whether or not the action was a collateral attack on a valid subsisting judgment was not considered and therefore, in my view, the case is of no persuasive value in the circumstances.

The appeal is therefore allowed. The order of Maurice J. is set aside with costs on double Column V.

DATED at the City of Regina, in the Province of Saskatchewan this 4th day of July A.D. 1996.

Preference presumed - Sec. 95(2)
(2) If the transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding referred to in paragraph (1)(a) has the effect of giving the creditor a preference, it is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, presumed to have been made, incurred, taken or suffered with a view to giving the creditor the preference — even if it was made, incurred, taken or suffered, as the case may be, under pressure — and evidence of pressure is not admissible to support the transaction.

Exception - Sec. 95(2.1)
(2.1) Subsection (2) does not apply, and the parties are deemed to be dealing with each other at arm's length, in respect of the following:

(a) a margin deposit made by a clearing member with a clearing house; or

Transfer at undervalue - Sec. 96
96. (1) On application by the trustee, a court may declare that a transfer at undervalue is void as against, or, in Quebec, may not be set up against, the trustee — or order that a party to the transfer or any other person who is privy to the transfer, or all of those persons, pay to the estate the difference between the value of the consideration received by the debtor and the value of the consideration given by the debtor — if

(a) the party was dealing at arm's length with the debtor and

(i) the transfer occurred during the period that begins on the day that is one year before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and that ends on the date of the bankruptcy,

(ii) the debtor was insolvent at the time of the transfer or was rendered insolvent by it, and

(iii) the debtor intended to defraud, defeat or delay a creditor; or

(b) the party was not dealing at arm's length with the debtor and

(i) the transfer occurred during the period that begins on the day that is one year before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ends on the date of the bankruptcy, or

(ii) the transfer occurred during the period that begins on the day that is five years before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ends on the day before the day on which the period referred to in subparagraph (i) begins and

(A) the debtor was insolvent at the time of the transfer or was rendered insolvent by it, or

(B) the debtor intended to defraud, defeat or delay a creditor.

Supreme Court of Canada
Gingras v. General Motors Products of Canada Ltd., [1976] 1 S.C.R. 426
Date: 1974-11-27

Paul Gingras Appellant;
and
General Motors Products of Canada Ltd. Respondent.

1974: March 22; 1974: November 27.

Present: Martland, Pigeon, Dickson, Beetz and de Grandpré JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, APPEAL SIDE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Bankruptcy—Preferential payments—Petition by trustee to set aside—Time limit under Civil Code for Paulian actions not applicable—Repeal of federal act, consequence—Long line of cases—Interpretation Act—Civil Code, art. 1040—Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, s. 64—Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-23, s. 37.4.

Appellant, the trustee in bankruptcy of Boulevard G.M.C. (1964) Inc., filed a petition alleging that respondent had received from the debtor preferential payments contrary to s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, and also taken back goods, which constituted a fraudulent payment. This petition was served more than one year after the appointment of the trustee and was dismissed by the lower courts on the ground that the prescription or time limit of one year specified in Art. 1040 C.C. for Paulian actions was applicable to the remedy of a trustee under s. 64. Hence the appeal to this Court.

Held (de Grandpré J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per Martland, Pigeon and Dickson JJ.: Article 1040, as it stands, does not apply to the remedy created by the Bankruptcy Act for the purpose of having preferential payments declared void. It cannot be supposed that in enacting art. 1040, the Legislature intended that this prescription period or time limit of one year should apply not only to the remedy based on anything contained in that section of the code, but to the wider provisions contained in the Insolvent Act of 1864 as well. The Legislature did not intend in any way to affect what had been enacted some years earlier in that act which was a statute applicable to Upper Canada also. Whatever may have been the effect of the repeal by Parliament in 1880 of all legislation on insolvency, its result certainly could not have been that when a new Bankruptcy Act was introduced in 1919, art. 1040 became applicable to the provisions of that Act concerning preferential payments, when it had never been so applicable to analogous provisions in prior bankruptcy statutes. The special remedy provided, in the case of bankruptcy, for having preferential payments declared void, has always been legislatively distinct from the Paulian action since the first insolvency statute was adopted in 1864. There is thus no reason not to give a literal interpretation to art. 1040.

These are not here circumstances comparable to those which sometimes led this Court to regard provincial precedents as decisive. This case deals with the application of provincial law to proceedings instituted under a federal statute. Section 37(4) of the Interpretation Act prevents its reenactment being regarded as an adoption of such judicial construction.

Per Beetz J.: At the outset, Art. 1037 C.C. may have had the effect to incorporate for certain purposes within Section VI of the Civil Code the "further provisions concerning the presumption of fraud and the nullity of acts done in contemplation of insolvency ... contained in the Insolvent Act of 1864". Such incorporation, if any, ceased to exist with the repeal of legislation on insolvency in 1880 and the repeal of Art. 1037 C.C. and the final words of Art. 1039 C.C. in 1886, and, in view of the wording of Art. 1040 C.C., it could not subsequently revive in the absence of some clear provision which only Parliament was empowered to enact; the Act respecting Bankruptcy of 1919 and amendments contain no such provision. Accordingly, it is the limitation periods of general application, of thirty or five years, as the case may be, which must be applied to the remedy provided by s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Per de Grandpré J., dissenting: Constitutional theory requires that in a field such as that of bankruptcy, the federal legislator has priority only in the portion occupied by him. Consequently, federal and provincial legislation may exist side by side in the field of preferential payments, since the Bankruptcy Act overrides the Paulian action only to the limited extent that it deals with acts in defraud of the debtor; all aspects of fraudulent action falling outside the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act may be considered in the light of the principles of the Civil Code. In view of the silence of the Bankruptcy Act on prescription of the trustee's remedies, therefore, these remedies can be made subject to prescription under the Civil Code, whether for thirty years, five years or one year. Since the remedy in the Bankruptcy Act and that in the Paulian remedy are the same in substance, the best prescription to apply is that of Art. 1040 of the Civil Code. The pre-Confederation legislator intended at that time prescription of the trustee's remedies in cases of preferential payments to be subject to the rule of Art. 1040. Nothing since then has altered this position, and the remedy in s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act remains subject to annual prescription.

APPEAL from the Court of Queen's Bench, Appeal Side, Province of Quebec, affirming a bankruptcy judgment of the Superior Court. Appeal allowed, de Grandpré J. dissenting.

M. Hickson, for the appellant.

J. Turgeon, for the respondent.

The judgment of Martland, Pigeon and Dickson JJ. was delivered by PIGEON J.—This appeal is against a decision of the Court of Appeal of Quebec, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court, bankruptcy side, dismissing the petition of appellant, the trustee in bankruptcy of Boulevard G.M.C. (1964) Inc. That petition alleged that respondent has received from the debtor within the three months preceding its bankruptcy preferential payments amounting to $27,000, contrary to s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act. It also alleged that, within the few months prior to the bankruptcy, respondent took back goods valued at $98,862.74, which constituted a fraudulent preferential payment.

The only ground raised in respondent's exception to dismiss was that appellant was appointed trustee on May 25, 1967, and his petition was served on respondent on February 18, 1970. This exception was allowed for the reason that the prescription or time limit of one year specified in Art. 1040 of the Civil Code of Quebec was held to be applicable to the remedy of a trustee under s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act (R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, now R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, s. 73). This decision is in accordance with earlier judgments of the Court of Appeal of Quebec: Cie de Construction de Charlesbourg v. Demers[1]; Grobstein v. Bank Canadian National[2], Bissonnette v. Bank of Nova Scotia[3]; Mercure v. Vary[4].

However, a contrary view was expressed in this Court by Locke J. in Traders Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Lévesque[5]. In that case, as in the others, the trustee did not act within a year from his appointment; however, the action was instituted not by him but by a creditor authorized to do so under s. 16 of the Bankruptcy Act (now s. 20), under which "the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his rights". This creditor had only learned of the fraudulent payment less than a year before his action was instituted, and for this reason the Quebec courts held[6] that the prescription or time limit affecting the remedy of the trustee was not applicable to him. However, Choquette J.A. took the view that Art. 1040 C.C. was wholly inapplicable (at pp. 274-275):

> [TRANSLATION] 1. The payment impugned by respondent is in fact one considered by s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act to be "fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy". The court relied on that section in declaring this payment void:
> > Whereas respondent (the appellant) has not rebutted the presumption created by s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act.
> Now, Art. 1040 C.C. applies exclusively to the Paulian action of the Civil Code, Arts. 1032 to 1039 C.C., which are grouped under the title: "Of the avoidance of contracts and payments made in fraud of creditors".
> Indeed, the text of Art. 1040 C.C. could not possibly be more explicit.
> I do not see how we could apply a provision of such a limited nature to a remedy which it does not cover, particularly to the remedies based on ss. 60-67 of the Bankruptcy Act, which exist independently of Arts. 1032-1040 of the Civil Code. The position is not altered in any way by the new s. 41(6), which leaves unchanged provisions concerning property and civil rights not in conflict with federal law. That section only confers on the trustee all civil remedies which are "supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act"; it does not incorporate in ss. 60-67 a time limit applicable exclusively to a remedy peculiar to the Civil Code.
> That is why I would only apply Cie de Construction Charlesbourg Inc.: Lefaivre et al v. Demers [1948] Que. Q.B. 745 to contracts and payments made more than three months before the bankruptcy, and not covered by ss. 60-67 of the Bankruptcy Act; as such contracts and payments were not contemplated by the aforementioned sections, the law governing them must be applied to them. We were referred to Lefebvre v. Cartierville Lumber Co. and Perras [1955] Que. Q.B. 474 and Trahan v. Lamarre and Roy and Custeau [1956] Que. Q.B. 1, but in those cases the payment or contract impugned was made more than three months prior to the bankruptcy.
> I conclude that Art. 1040 C.C. does not bar respondent's petition.

The majority decision in this Court did not deal with the point, Fauteux J. saying (at p. 87 as translated in 26 D.L.R. (2d) 390):

> Consequently it is unnecessary to decide whether the loss of rights, specifically established in art. 1040 of the Civil Code for remedies which, while related to those authorized by s. 16, differ from them, may be applied in the case in question. But assuming, without deciding it, that such were the case, I would say, in agreement with Justices Pratte and Choquette, that the starting point of the loss of rights provided for by this article varies according to whether the action is instituted by the creditor or the Trustee. It would follow, then, that the respondent having sued within the year in which knowledge of the fraudulent payment was acquired, his action could not be considered late within the terms of this section.

However, Locke J. said (at pp. 90-91):

> The limitation in art. 1040 is that no payment can be avoided "by reason of anything contained in this section" and it is not by reason of anything contained in section 6, being art. 1032 to 1036 and 1038 to 1040 both inclusive, that the respondent sought to recover and did recover. The article, therefore, in my opinion does not affect the matter.
> It may be said that provisions similar to those contained in the articles of the Civil Code to which I have referred are to be found in statutes of most of the provinces of Canada.
> The remedies thus given are quite distinct from those given to the trustee in bankruptcy under c. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act. The right to enforce such claims by creditors does not depend upon the fact that the person making the transfer has been declared bankrupt and these rights may be enforced under the provincial statutes unless bankruptcy has intervened. This has been held in a number of cases in various provinces, which are to be found collected in the 3rd ed. of Bradford and Greenberg on the Bankruptcy Act, at p. 158 et seq. In Quebec the limitation provided by art. 1040 only refers to proceedings under the articles mentioned.
> If it were otherwise and art. 1040 on its face applied to the cause of action referred to in s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, when asserted either by the trustee or under s. 16 by a creditor claiming by virtue of an assignment, it would be necessary to consider whether the article was intra vires the Legislature of Quebec. The right of action is one given by a Dominion statute and the right of the trustee and his assignee to resort to the courts is a substantive right. Article 1040, if it applied, would deprive those entitled to assert that right after a defined period. It would be necessary to consider then the effect of the decision of this Court in Attorney General of Alberta and Winstanley v. Atlas Lumber Co. Ltd. 1940 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1941] S.C.R. 87, 1 D.L.R. 625.

At the hearing counsel for the respondent put considerable emphasis on the argument that, as the Quebec Civil Code predates Confederation, the provisions it then contained, such as Art. 1040, cannot be unconstitutional. But, this does not prevent such provisions from becoming inoperative if the federal Parliament occupies the field. The fact that, to be strictly correct, the issue should have been stated in those terms, in no way detracts from the value of the opinion of Locke J., which like that of Choquette J.A. was based on the unequivocal wording of Art. 1040 C.C.

The question is not whether the prescription periods fixed by provincial law apply to bankruptcy cases in the absence of any contrary provision. What has to be decided here is whether Art. 1040 C.C., as it stands, applies to the remedy created by the Bankruptcy Act for the purpose of having preferential payments declared void. This article is not under the heading of prescription. It is not a general provision fixing the time required for prescription to have effect, as are Arts. 2240-2270. It is the final article in Section VI of the chapter Of Contracts. When the Code was adopted by the Legislature, that section read as follows:

> Of the Avoidance of Contracts and Payments made in Fraud of Creditors
> 1032. Creditors may in their own name impeach the acts of their debtors in fraud of their rights, according to the rules provided in this section.
> 1033. A contract cannot be avoided unless it is made by the debtor with intent to defraud, and will have the effect of injuring the creditor.
> 1034. A gratuitous contract is deemed to be made with intent to defraud, if the debtor be insolvent at the time of making it.
> 1035. An onerous contract made by an insolvent debtor with a person who knows him to be insolvent is deemed to be made with intent to defraud.
> 1036. Every payment made by an insolvent debtor to a creditor knowing his insolvency, is deemed to be made with intent to defraud, and the creditor may be compelled to restore the amount or thing received or the value thereof, for the benefit of the creditors according to their respective rights.
> 1037. Further provisions concerning the presumption of fraud and the nullity of acts done in contemplation of insolvency are contained in The Insolvent Act of 1864.
> 1038. An onerous contract made with intent to defraud on the part of the debtor, but in good faith on the part of the person with whom he contracts is not voidable; saving the special provisions applicable in case of insolvency of traders.

Digitized by Google

> 1039. No contract or payment can be avoided, by reason of anything contained in this section, at the suit of a subsequent creditor, unless he is subrogated in the rights of an anterior creditor; saving however the exception contained in The Insolvent Act of 1864.
> 1040. [No contract or payment can be avoided by reason of anything contained in this section, at the suit of any individual creditor, unless such suit is brought within one year from the time of his obtaining a knowledge thereof.
> If the suit be by assignees or other representatives of the creditors collectively, it must be brought within a year from the time of their appointment]

Can it be supposed, even for a moment, that in thus enacting Art. 1040—a provision embodying new law as indicated by the square brackets,—the Legislature intended that this prescription period or time limit of one year should apply not only to the remedy based on anything contained in this section, but to the further provisions ... contained in The Insolvent Act of 1864 as well? That Insolvent Act, it must be noted, contained at the outset the following provision:

> 1. This Act shall apply in Lower Canada to traders only, and in Upper Canada to all persons whether traders or non-traders.

Under the heading "Of fraud and fraudulent preferences" there was a lengthy section, of which I shall quote the first subsection only:

> 8. All gratuitous contracts or conveyances, or contracts or conveyances without consideration, or with a merely nominal consideration, made by a debtor afterwards becoming an involvent, with or to any person whomsoever, within three months next preceding the date of the assignment or of the issue of the writ of attachment in compulsory liquidation; and all contracts by which creditors are injured, obstructed or delayed, made by a debtor unable to meet his engagements, and afterwards becoming an insolvent, with a person knowing such inability or having probable cause for believing such inability to exist, or after such inability is public and notorious, are presumed to be made with intent to defraud his creditors.

In my view it is clear that, in enacting as it did Section VI of the chapter Of Contracts, the Legislature did not intend in any way to affect what had been enacted some years earlier in the Act respecting Insolvency, which was a statute applicable to Upper Canada also. This intent was indicated, not only by Art. 1037, but also by the following words added to Arts. 1038 and 1039 respectively:

> ... saving the special provisions applicable in case of insolvency of traders.
> ... saving however the exception contained in the Insolvent Act of 1864.

It is no doubt proper to note that, in the draft submitted with the First Report of the codifiers, on October 12, 1861, Section VI consisted of ten articles. The first five, Arts. 51 to 55, became Arts. 1032 to 1036 practically without change. Arts. 57 and 58 became 1038 and 1039, with the above-noted additions, and Art. 60 became Art. 1040. As to Arts. 56 and 59, which were provisions embodying new law suggested in amendment, the Legislature replaced them by Art. 1037. These two articles read as follows:

> (Additional article suggested in amendment.)
> 56. (61) If any contract or payment designated in the three last preceding articles be made by a merchant or trader within ten days previous to his bankruptcy, his insolvency and intent to defraud, and the knowledge thereof by the creditor or the party with whom he contracted, are presumed.
> (Additional article suggested in amendment.)
> 59. (64) Contracts and payments made by a merchant or trader within ten days previous to his bankruptcy may be avoided for the causes assigned in this section, at the suit of any creditor, although posterior thereto.

Clearly, if the Legislature had enacted the Code with these provisions in the section, Art. 1040 would have applied thereto, but due to the adoption of an insolvency act in the meantime, it deleted them. It thus clearly indicated that it intended to leave the insolvency act intact, whereas it would have introduced an important change by enacting a short period of prescription or time limit applicable thereto which did not exist previously. In this regard I should point out that, Art. 1040 aside, the prescription period of thirty years provided in Art. 2242 is not necessarily the only period applicable. Under Art. 2260(4) the five-year prescription period applies to any claim of a commercial nature.

It now remains to be seen how Art. 1037, and the final clause added to Art. 1039, disappeared. For this, it must first be noted that, after enacting two new statutes on insolvency in 1869 (32-33 Vict., c. 16) and in 1875 (38 Vict., c. 16) to replace the act of 1864, the federal Parliament completely repealed all legislation on insolvency in 1880 (43 Vict., c. 1). When the revision of 1886 was undertaken, there was therefore no longer an insolvency statute in existence. It was in view of this situation that, in Schedule A of the Revised Statutes of 1886, reference was made, inter alia, to Art. 1037 of the Civil Code and the last clause of Art. 1039, as being among the "Acts and parts of Acts repealed, from the date of the coming into force of the Revised Statutes of Canada, so far as the said Acts and parts of Acts relate to matters within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada". Subsequently, in the Revised Statutes of Quebec, 1888, under the heading "Federal amendments to Civil Code", the following sections were inserted:

Digitized by Google

6233. Article 1037 is repealed by the Federal act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada. 49 V., C, c. 4, s. 5, schedule A.

6234. Article 1039 should read as follows:

> "1039. No contract or payment can be avoided, by reason of anything contained in this section, at the suit of a subsequent creditor, unless he is subrogated in the rights of an anterior creditor". C.C., 1039; 43 V., C., c. 1; 49 V., C., c. 4, s. 5, schedule A.

In all previous cases on the construction of Art. 1040, I have found only a single opinion which refers to Art. 1037. It is that of Taschereau J.A. in Mercure v. Vary[7]. He said (at p. 482):

> [TRANSLATION] Regarding the contention of the trustee that Art. 1040 C.C. is unconstitutional, it should be borne in mind that it was enacted not by the Quebec legislature, but before Confederation by an Act of the Parliament of United Canada (1865, 29 Vict., c. 41), when only one jurisdiction existed. Laws enacted during this period have full force and effect unless repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada, as provided by s. 129 of the British North America Act, which is worded as follows:
> > Except as otherwise provided by this Act, all Laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick at the Union, and all Courts of Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction, and all legal Commissions, Powers, and Authorities, and all Officers, Judicial, Administrative, and Ministerial, existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made; subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,) to be repealed, abolished, or altered by the Parliament of Canada, or by the Legislature of the respective Province, according to the authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act.
> Accordingly, the federal Parliament relied on this Act in repealing Art. 1237 C.C. in 1888, when the statutes were revised (Art. 6833), while leaving intact Art. 1040 C.C., dealing with the avoidance of contracts and payments made in fraud of creditors. That article is therefore constitutional, and must be implemented.

With respect, I have to point out that in that case the point was not fully considered. The Parliament of Canada definitely had no power to amend Art. 1040 C.C. The scope of that provision is limited to the remedies provided in the section which it includes. However, Parliament unquestionably had the right to repeal its own bankruptcy statute. That repeal undoubtedly made entirely useless and redundant any provisions referring to an Act which had been replaced by the Bankruptcy Act. Whatever may have been the effect of the repeal, its result certainly could not be that when a new Bankruptcy Act was introduced in 1919 (9-10 Geo. V., c. 36), Art. 1040 C.C. became applicable to the provisions of that Act concerning preferential payments, when it had never been so applicable to analogous provisions in prior bankruptcy statutes. If it could be shown that, in the case of bankruptcy, these provisions on preferential payments replace those in the Civil Code regarding the Paulian action, it might be logical, though not in keeping with the text, to apply the prescription period for the Paulian action thereto. However, that is not so. The special remedy provided, in the case of bankruptcy, for having preferential payments declared void, has always been legislatively distinct from the Paulian action since the first insolvency statute was adopted in 1864. There is thus no reason not to give a literal interpretation to Art. 1040 C.C.

There do not appear to be here circumstances comparable to those which led this Court to regard provincial precedents as decisive in Ace Holdings Corporation v. Montreal Catholic School Commission[8] and Village de la Malbaie v. Boulianne[9]. Those decisions concerned provisions retained without significant change when a new Code was drafted. They dealt with a strictly provincial matter, not with the application of a provision of provincial law to proceedings instituted under a federal statute. Although this statute was re-enacted by Parliament after the 1948 decision, s. 37(4) of the Interpretation Act (1967-68, c. 7, now R.S.C. c. I-23) prevents its being regarded as an adoption of this judicial construction. It may be noted that the Quebec Interpretation Act (R.S.Q. 1964, c. 1) contains no similar provision. In addition, it may be that the dissenting opinion of Locke J., coupled with that of Choquette J.A., expressed in a case in which it did not conflict with the majority view is enough to make it impossible to say that the case law has adopted a uniform approach.

I would therefore allow the appeal and dismiss the exception to dismiss submitted by respondent. This does not mean that the latter will not be entitled to rely on Art. 1040 in answer to a claim based on the goods taken back, if the trustee should contend that his petition allows him to go beyond the three months preceding the bankruptcy, and base a claim not only on the Bankruptcy Act but also on Arts. 1032 to 1040 C.C.

I conclude that the appeal should be allowed, the judgments of the Court of Appeal and of the Superior Court reversed, and the exception to dismiss made by respondent dismissed with costs in all courts.

Having read the opinion of Beetz J., I must say that I would agree with him as to the consequences of the repeal of Art. 1037, if that provision was to be regarded as incorporating into Section VI, for certain purposes, some provisions of the 1864 Act respecting Insolvency.

BEETZ J.—I have had the considerable advantage of reading the opinion of Mr. Justice Pigeon and that of Mr. Justice de Grandpré.

At the outset Art. 1037 C.C. may not have been simply a cross-referencing provision. It may have had the effect to incorporate for certain purposes, within Section VI the "further provisions concerning the presumption of fraud and the nullity of acts done in contemplation of insolvency .. contained in the Insolvent Act of 1864." Art. 1037, which referred to the further provisions in the 1864 Act, was unquestionably a provision "contained in this section", in the words of Art. 1040. As the Act respecting Insolvency of 1864 specified no time limit within which the remedy of a Paulian nature it provided, should be exercised, it is not inconceivable that the Legislature, which then had jurisdiction over insolvency as well as over property and civil rights, and was reviewing these two areas of law at the same period, intended to make the limitation period of Art. 1040 applicable to the remedy provided by the Act respecting Insolvency, 1864, in preference to the limitation periods of general application. Support is lent to this hypothesis by the fact that, in their Supplementary Report, the Codifiers suggested adding to the end of the article which was to become Art. 1040 the words "saving the special provisions, relating to the insolvency of traders", but their suggestion was not taken up by the Legislature.

At all events, by repealing all legislation on insolvency in 1880, and then, in 1886, by repealing Art. 1037 C.C. and the final words of Art. 1039 C.C., the federal Parliament terminated such an incorporation, if ever it had existed; in view of the wording of Art. 1040, such incorporation could not subsequently revive in the absence of some clear provision, which only the Parliament of Canada was authorized to enact. Neither the Act respecting Bankruptcy of 1919, 9-10 Geo. V., c. 36, nor its subsequent amendments, contain any provision to this effect.

Accordingly, I conclude that it is the limitation periods of general application, of thirty or five years as the case may be, which must be applied to the remedy provided by s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, and I would dispose of the appeal in the manner proposed by Mr. Justice Pigeon.

DE GRANDPRE J. (dissenting)—Appellant asks this Court to quash a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of the Superior Court, bankruptcy side.

In general, the matter before the Court is the inter-relation of the articles of the Civil Code dealing with the Paulian action (1032 to 1040 C.C.) and the sections of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14 (now R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3), dealing with preferential payments made in the three months preceding the bankruptcy. In particular, appellant submits that the prescription or avoidance of Art. 1040 C.C. does not apply to the remedy conferred on the trustee by s. 64 (now s. 73 as amended) of the Bankruptcy Act.

The argument derives from a "motion to cancel preferential payments" made in February 1970 by appellant, in his capacity as trustee in bankruptcy of Boulevard G.M.C. (1964) Inc. The latter company was one of respondent's distributors, and at the relevant times respondent held a claim against the debtor for a considerable sum. The motion alleges:

—an assignment of property on April 24, 1967; —payments by cheque of a total of $27,000 in the three months preceding the bankruptcy;
—payments in the form of automobile parts of the sum of $93,862.74 in the months preceding the bankruptcy;
—respondent's awareness of the debtor's state of insolvency;

and, contending that this was a "preferential payment made to defraud other creditors of their rights", it prays the courts to declare these payments "void and unlawful as against the creditors", and order respondent to make repayment.

In reply to this motion respondent moved to dismiss on the basis of Art. 1040 C.C.; as more than a year elapsed between the time appellant was appointed and the start of his action, it was alleged that the latter should be dismissed. The Superior Court allowed this motion to dismiss and its judgment was unanimously affirmed. I quote from the short opinion of Lajoie J. the paragraph which sums up the views of the courts of Quebec:

> [TRANSLATION] There is abundant authority in this Court for the proposition that the prescription period enacted by the second paragraph of Art. 1040 C.C. applies to the remedy of a trustee under s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act.

There is no question that the Court of Appeal of Quebec has always held to this effect:

Cie de Construction Charlesbourg Inc.: Lefaivre et al. v. Demers[10];
Garage Causapscal Limitée: Traders Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Lévesque et al.[11];
Grobstein v. Bank Canadian National et al.[12]
Bissonnette v. Bank of Nova Scotia et al.[13]
Rainville v. Plouffe et al[14].

Digitized by Google

In re Monette: Mercure v. Vary et al.[15]
Donat Delisle et Fils Limitée v. de Coster et al.[16]
Biais v. Shaw et al.[17].

The only disagreement was by Choquette J. in the aforementioned case of Traders Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Lévesque; the context of that decision suggests that his remarks were made obiter.

The Superior court has shown the same near-unanimity. As examples I refer to the following decisions:

In re Modern Hat Manufacturing Ltd[18]. (Boyer J.);
In re Roger Fortier[19] (Boyer J.);
In re Chabot, Rouleau et Frères Inc.[20] (Marier J.);
In re Gervais[21] (M. Archambault J.).

The consistency of these judicial authorities may not be an answer to appellant's arguments, but it requires us to use particular caution. Such unanimity compels respect, if not agreement.

This is the first time this Court has been called on to decide the point. In Traders Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Emilien Lévesque[22], four of the five judges expressly refused to do so; only Locke J. expressed the opinion that Art. 1040 C.C. cannot be pleaded against a motion by a trustee under s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act. It may be noted in passing that the problem apparently does not arise in the other provinces, as the periods of prescription in the laws of those provinces are not as short as those in the Civil Code.

I

The first question that arises is: Does the fact of bankruptcy limit the recourse of creditors prejudiced by a preferential payment to proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act, and defeat their right to reply on the provisions of the Civil Code regarding the Paulian action? In other words, does a partial occupation of the field of preferential payments by the Bankruptcy Act (partial because limited in general to payments made in the three months preceding the bankruptcy) suspend the right of the Civil Code to occupy the part of the field not occupied by the Bankruptcy Act? If the foregoing must be answered in the affirmative, it necessarily follows that Art. 1040 C.C. cannot be pleaded against appellant.

The only reference to the point by this Court is a paragraph from the reasons of Duff C.J., speaking for himself and two of his colleagues, in In re Bozanich—The A.H. Boulton Company Limited v. The Trusts and Guarantee Company Limited[23], at p. 136:

> I may add that, in my opinion, the provisions of R.S.O. 1927, Chap. 162, in relation to preferences are superseded by section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the authority of the Ontario Legislature to enact such legislation is, in consequence of the enactment of section 64, suspended in virtue of the concluding paragraph of section 91.

The two other judges, Rinfret and Crocket JJ., did not address themselves to the point. This paragraph has been regarded by some as holding that the entire field of preferential payments is outside provincial jurisdiction, as it is partially occupied by the Bankruptcy Act. I see nothing in the statement to support such a broad conclusion. Even if that were the case, suffice it to say the statement is not a binding authority on this Court, since it was made obiter. The only question indeed to be decided was whether a settlement was at issue, within the meaning of s. 60 (now s. 69) of the Bankruptcy Act. Reference to s. 64 of that Act was only necessary to determine the meaning of the preceding sections. Furthermore, as may be seen from the factums of the parties recourse to the Ontario statute was only had in this Court; as the provisions of the Ontario statute could only apply, because certain time limits had expired, on evidence of "intent to defeat... or prejudice" creditors, and as there was no finding "as to good faith and valuable consideration", this new argument by the respondent could not be accepted; it could be dismissed merely by reference to the foregoing.

If in fact Duff C.J. intended to give a broad scope to his proposition, I am unable to agree. Constitutional theory requires that in a field such as that in question, where both legislators are entitled to be present, the federal legislator has priority only in the portion occupied by him. Attorney General of Ontario v. Attorney General of Canada[24], at p. 200:

> In their Lordships' opinion these considerations must be borne in mind when interpreting the words "bankruptcy" and "insolvency" in the British North America Act. It appears to their Lordships that such provisions as are found in the enactment in question, relating as they do to assignments purely voluntary, do not infringe on the exclusive legislative power conferred upon the Dominion Parliament. They would observe that a system of bankruptcy legislation may frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of the Act from being defeated. It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effect of executions and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the provincial legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament. But it does not follow that such subjects, as might properly be treated as ancillary to such a law and therefore within the powers of the Dominion Parliament, are excluded from the legislative authority of the provincial legislature when there is no bankruptcy or insolvency legislation of the Dominion Parliament in existence.

In my view, the Bankruptcy Act overrides the Paulian action only to the limited extent that it deals with acts in defraud of the debtor; all aspects of fraudulent action falling outside the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act may be considered in the light of the principles of the Civil Code.

In my view this is also the way we should read the judgment of Mignault J. in Canadian Credit Mens Trust Association Ltd. v. Hoffar Limited[25], when, sitting in chambers, he denied the leave to appeal requested. Before citing that judgment reference may be made to the finding and the principal passages of the judgment of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia which this Court was asked to consider. The extracts which follow are taken from reflex, [1929] 1 W.W.R. 557. First, the finding:

> While the Bankruptcy Act does not abrogate a provincial Act merely because the latter deals with preferential transactions, yet with respect to such transactions a provincial statute cannot be enforced if it provides that a certain result shall follow from circumstances which under the Dominion statute are followed by a different result.

Then, Macdonald C.J., at p. 558:

> The only question involved in this appeal is one of conflict between a provincial and a Dominion statute.
> The facts are not in dispute. The neat question is as to whether or not sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1927, ch. 11, is repugnant to sec. 3 of the Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.B.C., 1924, ch. 97. The learned Judge held that it was not.
> No question of the validity of either statute was raised in argument.
> For many years there was no Bankruptcy Act in Canada, and during that period of time this and other provinces enacted legislation pari materia with 13 Eliz., and 27 Eliz., with some amendments. After the enactment of the Bankruptcy Act the provincial Fraudulent Preferences Act was retained on the statute book. It professes to deal with preferences given by a debtor to one creditor to the prejudice of others. Shortly, sec. 3 renders void an assignment such as the one attacked in this action, if attacked within a specified time, which this one was.
> Sec. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act makes preferential assignments and transfers made with a view to prefer one creditor over another void under conditions admitted to exist here, but subsec. (2) of sec. 64 declares that such assignments which "have the effect" of giving such preference "shall be presumed prima facie" to have been made with a view to giving such preference. The distinction between the two sections is found in this, that the presumption of the invalidity under sec. 3 is irrebuttable, while under sec. 64, subsec. (2), it may be rebutted. In this case the Judge has found as a fact that that presumption had been rebutted and the finding is accepted by both parties.
> Assuming then that the provincial Act is intra vires, sec. 3 has, in my opinion, been rendered inoperative by the overriding enactment of sec. 64. It would, I think, be difficult to find a clearer case of repugnancy. I would allow the appeal.

Reference may now be made to Mignault J., at p. 184:

> The difference between the two statutory enactments, both of which deal with fraudulent preferences, is that subsection 2 of section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, when the transfer, made within three months of the assignment in bankruptcy, has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, creates merely a prima facie presumption that the transfer was made with a view to give the creditor such a preference; whereas section 3 of the provincial statute renders the transfer, having the effect to give a creditor preference over other creditors, utterly void as against the assignee or any creditor authorized to take proceedings when it was made within sixty days before an assignment by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors. Under the former statute the presumption of a fraudulent intent can be rebutted, under the latter it cannot.
> The learned trial judge, upon consideration of section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, found that the presumption of a fraudulent intent had been successfully rebutted, but he annulled the transfer under section 3 of the provincial statute, which he held established an irrebuttable presumption of fraudulent intent from the mere fact that the transfer, made less than sixty days before the assignment in bankruptcy, had the effect of giving the creditor a preference over the other creditors.
> The Court of Appeal, reflex, [1929] 1 W.W.R. 557, set aside this judgment for the reason that there was here a clear conflict between Dominion and Provincial legislation, and that the Dominion enactment should prevail. Inasmuch, therefore, as the fraudulent intent had been rebutted, the court held that the transfer could not be attacked.
> The petitioner now seeks leave to appeal from this judgment. In my opinion, the decision of the Court of Appeal is clearly right.

In my opinion, federal and provincial legislation may exist side by side in the field of preferential payments, the latter yielding to the former only within the narrow limits I have indicated.

II

The second question is: In view of the silence of the Bankruptcy Act on prescription of the trustee's remedies, can such remedies be made subject to prescription under the Civil Code, whether for thirty years, five years or one year? In this Court appellant put forward the proposition that the Civil Code has a role to play, and he suggested applying the thirty-year prescription, but at the same time he referred the Court to the following extract from the reasons of Locke J. in Lévesque, cited above, at p. 90:

> If it were otherwise and art. 1040 on its face applied to the cause of action referred to in s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, when asserted either by the trustee or under s. 16 by a creditor claiming by virtue of an assignment, it would be necessary to consider whether the article was intra vires the Legislature of Quebec. The right of action is one given by a Dominion statute and the right of the trustee and his assignee to resort to the courts is a substantive right. Article 1040, if it applied, would deprive those entitled to assert that right after a defined period. It would be necessary to consider then the effect of the decision of this Court in Attorney General of Alberta and Winstanley v. Atlas Lumber Co. Ltd. 1940 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1941] S.C.R. 87. There, a statute of the Province of Alberta which deprived the holder of a promissory note of his right of access to the court without permission of the Debt Adjustment Board, constituted under the Debt Adjustment Act, 1937, of Alberta, was held to be ultra vires. This aspect of the matter was not raised before the courts of Quebec nor argued before us and I accordingly do no more than draw attention to the fact that, in my opinion, that question would arise if art. 1040 applied to the facts of this case.

Whatever the length of the prescription, its effect is to void the remedy after a given period. This, then, is the question before the Court.

With respect, I cannot share the first reaction of Locke J. that no provincial statute concerning prescription can be pleaded against a claimant on whom a right of action is conferred by a federal statute, when the latter contains no provision regulating this subject-matter. Accordingly, the right of action conferred by the Bills of Exchange Act (then R.S.C. 1906, c. 119, now R.S.C. 1970, c. B-5) was held subject to the five-year prescription of the Civil Code in Dame O. Catellier v. Dame A. Bélanger[26]. That decision indicates the path to be taken where, as here, the provincial legislation dates from before Confederation.

III

A Civil Code prescription period may thus be pleaded against the trustee; the question is which period, that of 1040 C.C. or that of the title "Of prescription"? It is this which we must now consider. To aid us in resolving it appellant submits, first, that there is a very clear distinction between the remedy provided by the Bankruptcy Act and the Paulian action. He summarizes his argument in the following paragraph from his factum:

> [TRANSLATION] The articles of the Civil Code list certain rules designed to protect and safeguard the debtor's inheritance, which serves as a common surety for creditors; however, the specific purpose of the Bankruptcy Act is to ensure that the property of an insolvent debtor is distributed between creditors, which in certain cases requires securing cancellation of preferential payments in order to reconstitute the mass for distribution.

I readily concede that such differences exist; however, those differences do not affect the very nature of the remedy: on the contrary. This was the view of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia in Hoffar (supra) concerning the situation in that province; the reasons of M.A. Macdonald J., at p. 561 of [1929] 1 W.W.R., are especially relevant. Comparison of the Bankruptcy Act and the Civil Code leads to the same conclusion. Furthermore, it is precisely because in substance the two remedies are identical that pro tanto the provincial legislation is suspended by the federal. We must refer at this point to the observations of Duff C.J. in Bozanich (supra), at p. 135:

> I pass now to section 64 which deals with transactions between an insolvent person and his creditor. The history of the law relating to such transactions is familiar. At common law there is nothing to prevent a debtor preferring one creditor to another. The Statute, 13 Elizabeth, Chap. 5, did not prohibit such transactions. This common law privilege is obviously opposed to the fundamental principle of bankruptcy law—the equitable distribution of assets among all entitled to share; and the law of fraudulent preference was originally developed by the courts on the basis of the principles of the Bankruptcy Acts. The principle of section 64 was first formulated by statute in section 92 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. In Canada in most of the provinces there were, prior to the Bankruptcy Act, statutory enactments making voidable transfers of property by an insolvent made with the intention of giving a particular creditor an "unjust preference".

Though this extract does not refer to the Civil Code, and in form is limited to English law, I feel its substance applies to the case at bar.

Digitized by Google

Even in the observations of Locke J. in Lévesque (supra) I find a confirmation of this identity, though his decision appears to negate it. Speaking of s. 64 he says, at p. 89:

> The right of action conferred by the section is to obtain a declaration that the conveyance is null and void and to recover the property conveyed, and that right is given. alone to the trustee.

Moreover, discussing the provincial statutes, in particular the Civil Code, he states at p. 90:

> All of these statutes deal with the rights of creditors to set aside conveyances made by persons in insolvent circumstances, which have the effect of giving a creditor a preference over the others and all of them provide that, in the event of action being brought within a certain period of the date of the conveyance, it is to be held null and void.

It is true that Locke J. goes on to state that the remedies are different, but in my view this distinction between the remedies does not necessarily imply a difference in the substance of the action.

It must be borne in mind that, according to the decision of this Court in Siméon Lamothe v. Adolphe Daveluy[27] the Paulian action is not simply for the benefit of the creditor who starts proceedings, it is for the benefit of all concerned. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick C.J., speaking for the Court, says at p. 81:

> It is quite true that the plaintiff in such an action brought under the Quebec Code represents not only himself, but all the other creditors of the fraudulent debtor prejudicially affected by the sale (art. 1036 C.C.).

And subsequently, at p. 83, the learned Chief Justice reiterates:

> The Quebec Code differs from the French Code in this respect; by art. 1036 the defendant creditor is compelled to restore the thing received or the value thereof for the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent debtor according to their respective rights, and not exclusively as in France, for the benefit of the plaintiff in the action.

It is a fact that sixteen years earlier, in John Ira Fiait et al. v. F.F. Ferland et al.[28], the Court, without giving reasons, appears to have arrived at a different conclusion. It is also true that in Alfred Fortier v. Wilfrid Poulin and Ovila Poulin[29], this Court declined to admit jurisdiction on the ground that the amount at issue in the action instituted by the Paulian plaintiff was not sufficient in itself. On that occasion Rand J., speaking for the Court, said at p. 182:

> It is a settled rule that in these circumstances the benefit of a judgment recovered in an action paulienne enures solely to the creditor who is a party to it: Dalloz J.G. (1925) R.P. prem. partie, p. 223, notes 1, 2 and 3. On the other hand, treating the two conveyances as constituting a transfer from the husband to the wife and therefore void, the interest of the appellant is obviously limited to the judgment which he seeks to realize.

With respect, I feel the latter solution is not correct; I feel we must return to the rule laid down in Lamothe v. Daveluy. The Fortier decision rests on the authority of French jurists, in an area governed by rules which are peculiarly our own. In my opinion, the correct rule is to be found in the 19G8 Lamothe decision.

This substantive identity emerges clearly if we look again at the relevant parts of s. 64, and then of Art. 1036 C.C.:

> 64. (1) ... every payment made ... by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor ... with a view to giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors shall ... be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.

I omit the parts which, while describing the remedy, do not change its nature.

> Art. 1036. Every payment by an insolvent debtor to a creditor knowing his insolvency, is deemed to be made with intent to defraud, and the creditor may be compelled to restore the amount or thing received or the value thereof, for the benefit of the creditors according to their respective rights.

Even the form of the February 1970 motion confirms this identity. Apart from the statement that it is made on the basis of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the payments were made within three months of the bankruptcy, it could be used without changing a single word to apply for the remedy provided by Section VI of Chapter I of the title "Of Obligations" of the Civil Code.

I am therefore unable to accept the argument of appellant regarding the substantive difference between the Civil Code remedy and that of the Bankruptcy Act. Appellant also maintains, however, that the actual wording of Art. 1040 C.C. is a bar to its application here, since it is limited to the avoidance of contracts "by reason of anything contained in this section". This was what Locke J. noted in Lévesque, at p. 90:

> The limitation in art. 1040 is that no payment can be avoided "by reason of anything contained in this section" and it is not by reason of anything contained in section 6, being art. 1032 to 1036 and 1038 to 1040 both inclusive, that the respondent sought to recover and did recover. The article, therefore, in my opinion does not affect the matter.

Is this in fact a limitation? If the two remedies are the same in substance, and if also a Civil Code prescription or avoidance must be applied to the remedy provided by the Bankruptcy Act (two points which I think may be assumed), what better prescription to apply to the case at bar than that of 1040 C.C.? In this closely defined area of the preferential payment made by an insolvent debtor, the Civil Code makes only one reference to the length of time available to the creditor for instituting proceedings in avoidance, and this is the appropriate place to look for the relevant provision as to time.

It may be assumed that this was the course taken by the Parliament of the province of Canada at the time of passage of the Act respecting the Civil Code of Lower Canada in 1865 (29 Vict., c. 41). It accepted the recommendation of the codifying commissioners to create new law by adding to the end of the chapter on the Paulian action what is now Art. 1040 of the Civil Code, which may be cited at this point.

> Art. 1040. No contract or payment can be avoided by reason of anything contained in this section, at the suit of any individual creditor, unless such suit is brought within one year from the time of his obtaining a knowledge thereof.
> If the suit be by assignees or other representatives of the creditors collectively, it must be brought within a year from the time of their appointment.

It may be noted at once that —when the commissioners made their recommendation in 1.861, it is reasonable to assume that they were aware of 7 Vict., c. 10, which, in reference to bankruptcy, had enacted for a period of just over two years provisions concerning preferential payments, giving certain rights to the syndic (in English the "assignee"); it is not necessary here to consider the effect of 24 Vict., c. 5, s. 2, which provided for "continuing" for certain purposes 7 Vict., c. 10 and some others referred to by the section;

—when the Parliament of the province of Canada passed the Civil Code in 1865, it had before it its own law on bankruptcy, passed in 1864 (27-28 Vict., c. 17), which contained provisions relating to the syndic (in English the "assignee") and to preferential payments, but no provision concerning the prescription of remedies.

This is the background against which we must re-read Art. 1040 and the preceding articles, noting that

(1) Art. 1037, which disappeared in 1888, stated that broader provisions on the presumption of fraud and avoidance of acts done with a view to bankruptcy were to be found elsewhere;

(2) Art. 1038, in reference to onerous contracts made in good faith by third parties, lays down one rule for the case of faillite (in English, "insolvency of traders") and another for ordinary cases;

(3) Art. 1040 refers to two classes of plaintiffs, the creditors individually and their representatives, and for the latter class it uses the word syndic (in English "assignee"), which is especially characteristic of bankruptcy.

It seems to me the conclusion is obvious. The pre-Confederation legislator, having complete control over all matters now under consideration, intended at that time prescription of the trustee's remedies in cases of preferential payments to be subject to the rule of Art. 1040 C.C. Nothing since then has altered this position, and the remedy in s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act remains subject to annual prescription.

On the whole, I would affirm the judgment a quo with costs in all courts.

SHERSTOBITOFF J.A.

This appeal is by a bankrupt from that part of a judgment, reported at 1994 CanLII 4872 (SK QB), [1994] 8 W.W.R. 250, which set aside, under the authority of s. 91(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, certain conveyances of land made by him to his wife prior to his bankruptcy as having been made when he was unable to pay all his debts without the aid of the property conveyed.

There is also a cross appeal by the trustee in bankruptcy from that part of the same judgment which declared one quarter-section of the same land to be the homestead of the bankrupt within the meaning of s. 2(1)(h) of The Saskatchewan Farm Security Act, S.S. 1988-89, c. 17.1. A homestead was exempt from seizure under s. 66(k) of The Saskatchewan Farm Security Act, and as such, was not property divisible amongst the creditors of the bankrupt under s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy Act which provided as follows:

> . . .
> (b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the bankrupt resides,

The bankrupt appeals on two grounds. The first is that the trustee failed to prove that the bankrupt was insolvent at the date of the impugned conveyance. The second is that, in respect of the conveyance of the homestead, s. 91(2) of the Bankruptcy Act should have no application since the property in question, being exempt from seizure, would not have been divisible amongst the creditors in any event, and, accordingly, the creditors suffered no loss, prejudice, injury or delay.

The trustee cross-appeals on the ground that the homestead property, having been previously conveyed by the bankrupt to his wife, had lost its character as a homestead as of the date of the assignment in bankruptcy. Since s. 91(2) made the conveyance void against the trustee, rather than void ab initio, the order setting aside the transaction could not affect the status of the land at the time of the assignment. Accordingly, at the time of the assignment the property was not a homestead, was not exempt from seizure, and was therefore divisible amongst the creditors.

The trial judge also considered the validity of the conveyances in question under the provisions of The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. F-21, and the Statute of Elizabeth, 1571 (U.K.), 13 Eliz. I, c. 5. Since consideration of these statutes is not necessary for the determination of this appeal, we express no opinion with respect to their application to this case or the judge's reasons based upon them.

The wife of the bankrupt sought, on the argument of the appeal, to raise some claims against the property in question grounded in constructive trust and under The Matrimonial Property Act, S.S. 1979, c. M-6.1. Since these claims had not been raised in the court below, and since there was not a sufficient factual base on which to deal with them, the court did not entertain them.

The bankrupt's first ground of appeal is that the trustee had not proven that the bankrupt was insolvent at the date of the conveyance. However, s. 91(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, under which the application was made, provides as follows, with the emphasized portion specifying the criterion to determine whether the conveyance should be set aside:

> 91. (2) Any settlement of property, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within five years after the date of the settlement, is void against the trustee if the trustee can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, unable to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement or that the interest of the settlor in the property did not pass on the execution thereof. [emphasis added]

The trial judge found the value of the bankrupt's assets at the date of the conveyance to be $252,167.00 including the lands conveyed, but only $68,517.00 without them. The amount of his debts at the same date were found to be $241,262.00. The judge concluded as follows, at p. 266:

> For the limited purpose of demonstrating Mr. Goertz's inability to pay all of his bills without the aid of the Claimed Lands, I have used the values sworn to by Mr. Goertz, notwithstanding that I believe them to be low. However, regardless of which of the three alternative values is used (or even if the average of the three values is used), the Trustee has proven to my satisfaction that Mr. Goertz was unable to pay all of his debts at the time of the Impeached Transaction without the benefit of the Claimed Lands.

There was evidence to support the findings of the trial judge as to the amounts of assets and debts, and it is apparent that he used the criterion provided by s. 91(2) to determine whether the transaction should be set aside. This ground of appeal must fail.

The bankrupt's second ground of appeal is that the homestead quarter, being exempt from seizure under provincial law, and thus not divisible amongst the creditors of a bankrupt under s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy Act, does not fall within the purview of s. 91(2) (or any other part) of the Bankruptcy Act. It seems to be common ground that the bankrupt and his wife remained in possession of the property at all material times, so that if the bankrupt had still owned it at the date of the assignment in bankruptcy, it would still have been a homestead. If, at both the time of the impugned conveyance and at the time of the assignment in bankruptcy, this property was exempt from seizure and thus not divisible amongst the creditors of a bankrupt, what was wrong with the transaction, and why should it be set aside? The bankrupt argues that the answer to this question is that there was nothing wrong with the transaction and hence it should not be set aside.

Digitized by Google

While the argument on its face is an appealing one, it does not conform with the plain meaning of s. 91(2) and other provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 91(2) refers to property of the bankrupt, not to exigible property or property divisible amongst creditors. To accept the argument of the bankrupt would require reading into s. 91(2) qualifications of the word property which are simply not there. Furthermore, the question of whether property of a bankrupt is divisible or non-divisible amongst creditors under s. 67(1)(b) depending on its exigibility under provincial law must be determined at the date of bankruptcy (see Re Neuls and Neuls; Touche Ross Limited v. First City Trust Company et al. (1985), 56 C.B.R. (N.S.) 132; 37 Sask. R. 60 at 64 (C.A.)), not at the date of settlement, and the situation as to exigibility may be different on the two dates. For the purpose of s. 67(1)(b), whether the property was exigible or not at the date of the conveyance is simply irrelevant. This ground of appeal must fail as well.

That brings us to the trustee's cross appeal. The trial judge found that upon the conveyance being declared void against the trustee, the homestead reverted to the bankrupt along with his right to exemption from seizure under provincial law, and the consequent exemption from divisibility amongst creditors under s. 67(1)(b) of the Bankruptcy Act. He relied largely on Holthuysen (Trustee of) v. Holthuysen, reflex, [1987] 2 W.W.R. 304, as support for this proposition. In that decision, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that improperly transferred land remains the property of the bankrupt:

> In our view, property conveyed by a bankrupt to defeat his creditors, the conveyance of which can be voided by the trustee, never ceases to be "property of an execution debtor" within the meaning of the Exemptions Act. For this view, it does not matter whether s. 69 [now s. 91 of The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act] declares the conveyance to be voidable or void ab initio. Any other interpretation of the Exemptions Act would produce an absurd result because it would permit this bankrupt to profit from his misdeeds, or alternatively permit an exemption to arise after a bankruptcy. [at 307]

The last sentence refers to the fact that the bankrupt in that case was arguing that his exemption arose later, in order that he might take advantage of a change in the legislation which provided a considerably more generous exemption.

The trial judge erred in applying Holthuysen which is distinguishable from this case. In Holthuysen, the court took care to say that it made no difference to its decision whether a declaration under the present s. 91(2) of the Bankruptcy Act made a transaction voidable or void ab initio. It chose instead to base its decision on its interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Alberta Exemptions Act.

The issue in this case is the meaning to ascribe to the words "void as against the trustee" found in s. 91(2) of the Act. The emphasized words suggest that a disposition amounting to a settlement is only void on the happening of the event of bankruptcy. This position is implicit in Walker J.'s obiter remarks in Camgoz (Trustee of) v. Sun Life Assur. Co. of Can. (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 131 at 135 (Sask. Q.B.),(affirmed on other grounds, (1988) 72 C.B.R. (N.S.) 319 (Sask. CA)):

> If there is a "settlement", Camgoz cannot go back and take an "exemption" for, theoretically speaking, the exemption would be the exemption of the trustee in bankruptcy, since if "settlement" is found it is void against the trustee under s. 69(1) [now s. 91(1) of The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act] of the Bankruptcy Act, and s. 47 [now s. 67] of the Bankruptcy Act deals with property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors not comprising certain property.

The principle that a settlement is void from the time the trustee acquires title only, that is, from the time of the assignment in bankruptcy, and not void ab initio, has been adopted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Buckham v. Holythuysen et al. (1986), 61 C.B.R. (N.S.) 300; 1 B.C.L.R. (2d) 202. It has also been, unequivocally, the law of England since In re Carter and Kenderdine's Contract, [1897] 1 Ch. 776, which was reaffirmed recently in In re Dent (a Bankrupt), [1994] 1 W.L.R. 956 (Div. Ct.). The English legislation in question was virtually identical to s. 91(2).

We agree with the concise summary of the principle in L.W. Houlden and C.H. Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, (3d ed.), v. 1 (Scarborough: Carswell, 1995) at 4-3:

> A settlement, which falls within s. 91, is not void but only voidable. It only becomes void when bankruptcy occurs. It is not void as of the date of the making of the conveyance or the date when the court makes the order declaring it to be a settlement; it is the bankruptcy which is the triggering event: Buckham v. Holythuysen (1986), 61 C.B.R. (N.S.) 300, 1 B.C.L.R. (2d) 202 (C.A.). See Camgoz (Trustee of) v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Can. (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 131, 70 Sask. R. 70, affirmed 72 C.B.R. (N.S.) 319 (Sask. C.A.).

If the settlement is only void at the moment of bankruptcy, then from the time of the impeached transfer to the assignment in bankruptcy, the bankrupt had no interest in the lands.

A bankrupt may claim an exemption at any time prior to discharge: Re Kreutzweiser (1966), 10 C.B.R. (N.S.) 217 (Ont. S.C.). However, that claim is determined as of the time of the assignment: Re Neuls and Neuls; Touche Ross Limited v. First City Trust Company et al., supra. In this case, the bankrupt had no interest in the land in question at the time of the assignment. Accordingly, it could not be his homestead, was not exempt from seizure, and was property divisible amongst his creditors. The joint tenancy was revived and then converted into a tenancy-in-common with the event of assignment.

The cross appeal of the trustee must therefore be allowed. There will be an order authorizing judicial sale of NW 9-35-5-W3, with one half of the proceeds to be paid to the trustee. In all other respects, the appeal and cross appeal are dismissed.

The trustee shall have its costs of this appeal under double Column V.

[1] Pricewaterhouse Coopers Inc. ("PwC") in its capacity as Trustee of the Estate of Hartland Pipeline Services Ltd. ("Hartland"), a bankrupt, has brought an application for an Order setting aside as void a payment of three million dollars by Hartland to Bennett Jones on November 19, 1999 and setting aside as void a transfer of one million dollars by Hartland to Bennett Jones on November 23, 1999 on the basis that the transfer of monies into the account constitutes settlements within the provisions of sections 91 and 93 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3 ("the B.I.A.") or fraudulent preferences within the provisions of section 95 of the B.I.A. or alternatively within the provisions of the Fraudulent Preferences Act R.S.A, 1980, c. F-18 and the Statute of Elizabeth 13 Eliz. c. 5, 1571.

[2] An Affidavit was filed by Mr. Stapon, the former Chairman of the Board of Directors of Hartland, in opposition to the above application on May 1, 2000. The Trustee has cross-examined on that Affidavit and has indicated to the court no further requirement to cross-examine.

[3] The secured lenders bring an application pursuant to section 163(2) of the B.I.A. for an order directing that Mr. Stapon appear for cross-examination on his Affidavit.

[4] Section 163(2) provides:

> On the application to the court by the Superintendent, any creditor or other interested person and on sufficient cause being shown an order may be made for the examination under oath, before the registrar or other authorized person, of the trustee, the bankrupt, an inspector or a creditor, or any other person named in the order, for the purpose of investigating the administration of the estate of any bankrupt, and the court may further order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in the person's possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, the trustee or any creditor, the costs of the examination and investigation to be in the discretion of the court.

[5] The section requires that the applicant be the Superintendent, any creditor, or other interested person and that the applicant show sufficient cause for an examination. As well, the examination under section 163(2) is for the general benefit of creditors and must relate to the general administration of the bankrupt estate. It cannot be used by a creditor to pursue a private remedy. In that regard, see Re Assaf (1976), 23 C.B.R. (N.S.) 14 (Ont. S.C) and Re Witkowski (1987), 63 C.B.R. (N.S.) 271 (Ont. S.C.).

[6] The Applicants submit that they are creditors within the context of the Act and that the allegations of fraudulent preference are sufficient cause to be entitled to examine. Essentially, they argue that the nature of the allegations, coupled with statements made by Mr. Stapon in his Affidavit relating to the lenders, is sufficient to bring them within the parameters of section 163(2). They submit that the lenders were front and centre in discussions that predate the bankruptcy, that the tenor of the Affidavit suggests bad faith on the part of the lenders and as such, they have an interest such as to entitle them to cross-examine.

[7] Counsel for Mr. Stapon submits that pursuant to the rules of court and section 163(2) of the Act, the secured lenders are not parties. Further, they submit, that section 163(2) can be utilized only in circumstances where the trustee is unable to perform the function as provided for in section 163(1). They argue that the secured lenders in these circumstances do not have an independent right to cross-examine.

[8] The secured lenders properly fit within the description of any creditor or other interested person insofar as standing under this section is concerned. Further, I am satisfied that Mr. Stapon, as a former Director and C.E.O. of the bankrupt, is a person who may be examined pursuant to section 163(2). The issue before me is whether sufficient cause has been shown to permit the cross-examination.

[9] In Re Nablo (1964), 7 C.B.R. (N.S.) 149 (Ont. S.C.), in considering what was then sections 121(1) and (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, (now sections 163(1) and (2) of the B.I.A), the court held that, once an order to examine is granted under section 121(2), the examination may be as extensive as a trustee's examination under section 121(1). If it is shown that an examination of certain named witnesses is justified and may be done by the trustee without an order, but which the trustee, because of a lack of funds or otherwise, does not undertake, a creditor or other interested person may apply to the court for an order to conduct such examination.

[10] It is submitted by counsel for Mr. Stapon that the court's discretion to order such an examination should be confined to circumstances where the trustee has not undertaken the necessary examination. Further, it is argued that the Trustee has done so and has already indicated to the court that in the Trustee's opinion no further examination is required.

[11] I have considered the following authorities with respect to what is meant by "sufficient cause" under section 163(2) of the B.I.A.: Re NsC Diesel Power Inc. 1997 CanLII 1533 (NS SC), (1997), 49 C.B.R. (3d) 213 (N.S.S.C.) and 1998 CanLII 2241 (NS CA), (1998), 6 C.B.R. (4th) 96 (C.A.); Black* v. *Ernst & Young Inc. 1997 CanLII 15001 (NS CA), (1997), 47 C.B.R. (3d) 129 (N.S.C.A); Re R.L. [12] In Re NsC Diesel Power Inc. (N.S.S.C.), Hood J. stated at p. 218:

> Examinations under Section 163(2) are only ordered when sufficient cause is shown and that sufficient cause must be directly related to the person sought to be examined. To say there is cause for questions to be asked and, as Mr. Blackrepeated in his oral submission, "I must start somewhere" is not what Section 163(2) requires. There must be some demonstrated connection between the evidence, if any, of something being amiss and the ability of the named person to shed some light on it as it relates to the administration of the Estate.

In Re NsC Diesel Power Inc. (N.S.C.A), Hallet J.A., for the majority, held at p. 108:

> The wording of s. 163(2) of the Act that requires an applicant to show sufficient cause to warrant the order being granted requires that the applicant put forth factual information in affidavit form or in sworn testimony that would disclose something more than a desire to go on a fishing expedition. The scheme of the Act and its proper functioning requires that trustees act with integrity and, in effect, assumes they will so act. Otherwise the purposes and objectives of the Act would be frustrated. If a trustee's actions are being questioned, as in this case, the Act properly requires that sufficient cause be shown to warrant an order for examination. This requires that evidence be put forward on the application that would indicate a problem existed with respect to the trustee's administration of the estate and that the person sought to be examined would likely have evidence relevant to the issue.

[13] In Black* v. *Ernst& Young Inc., the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal at p. 138 suggested that orders for section 163(2) examinations issue almost as a matter of course. However, the court also emphasized the importance of reviewing the affidavits submitted in support of the application to determine whether or not the applicant is on a "fishing expedition". In order to exercise its discretion under section 163(2) judicially, the court is required to carefully review the evidence put before it in support of the application.

[14] Unlike the facts of this case, in Re Coolsaet of Canada Ltd., the application for examination under section 163(2) was made after the Trustee had determined that the transactions in question were valid and no other action was necessary. Registrar Ferron held that a creditor is not bound by an opinion given to a trustee and should be able to make reasonable supplementary inquiries to be satisfied that the conclusions reached in those opinions are correct. However, he also emphasized the importance of preventing frivolous or potentially oppressive examinations. The Registrar held that the failure of the applicant to name specific persons he wished to examine prevented the court from determining within a broad range the object of the examination requested. Therefore, Registrar Ferron dismissed the motion.

[15] In most cases involving section 163(2), an examination has been granted on the basis that either the trustee has decided not to pursue an action despite the existence of evidence of irregularities in the administration of the bankrupt's estate (see Parcell Steel Co.* v. Ough; Re Coolsaet of Canada Ltd.) or the trustee has not had the funds to properly investigate the matter (see Saskatchewan Economic Development Corp. v. Kolody; Millan v. *Specialty Foods Corp.).

[16] The facts of the present case are unique in that the Trustee has already made an application to have the transactions in question set aside. The Trustee has also utilized its examination powers to cross-examine on an Affidavit that addresses the circumstances surrounding the transactions that are the subject matter of the complaint.

[17] A review of the authorities satisfies me that section 163(2) permits examinations even when the trustee has already utilized its examination powers. However, the onus remains on the Applicant to satisfy the court that there is sufficient cause for additional examination. While the threshold for demonstrating sufficient cause is fairly low, an applicant must provide some evidence, usually in affidavit form, in support of a section 163(2) application. The evidence ought to demonstrate that the additional examination is neither frivolous nor oppressive, is for the general benefit of the creditors, and involves the general administration of the bankrupt's estate.

[18] In most applications under section 163(2), affidavit material is submitted in order to demonstrate sufficient cause (see Millan* v. Specialty Foods Corp; Parcell Steel Co. v. Ough, Re Cadillac Explorations Ltd. (No. 1); Black v. *Ernst & Young Inc.). Unfortunately, no affidavit material was filed with the court in support of this application. While it was suggested that the nature of the Motion before the court, coupled with the references to the role of the lenders in setting up the trust, raise, on its face, sufficient cause to grant the order. I disagree.

[19] In order to determine the object of the Applicant's proposed examination and whether it is for the general benefit of all creditors, the Applicant ought to provide the court with affidavit material in support of its application. While the relationship and conversations between Hartland and its lenders may be relevant to the ultimate determination of the court, if the Trustee has already adequately cross-examined Mr. Stapon, the additional examination by the secured lenders would be superfluous. The fact that the Trustee has presumably cross-examined Mr. Stapon with respect to the very issue with which the secured lenders seem to be concerned, that of fraudulent preference, heightens the need for an explanation of why additional examination is necessary.

[20] As such, I am dismissing the application with leave to reapply on further evidence.

HEARD on the 25th day of May, 2000.

DATED at Calgary, Alberta this 12th day of June, 2000.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Levine:

Introduction

[1] In this appeal, the appellant makes the novel claim that the principles of the assessment of damages for the tort of conversion should apply to the division between co-owners of the proceeds of the sale of land. The chambers judge correctly, in my view, rejected the appellant's arguments, as those arguments proceed from a misunderstanding of the legal nature of the remedy available to the appellant.

[2] Susan Barnes, the appellant and respondent in the cross-appeal, became the owner of the property as a tenant-in-common with Carolyn Kostiuk, the respondent and appellant in the cross-appeal, after the transfer by Lawrence Steve Kostiuk, a bankrupt, of his one-half interest in the property to Ms. Kostiuk, his wife, was declared void. Ms. Barnes obtained an order that the property be sold, and after the sale, brought an application for a determination of the division of the proceeds. This appeal and cross-appeal are from that determination.

[3] The reasons for judgment of the chambers judge are reported at 2001 BCSC 1002 (CanLII), (2001), 27 C.B.R. (4th) 67 (B.C.S.C.) and may be found at [2001] B.C.J. No. 1453 (S.C.)(QL) and 2001 BCSC 1002 (CanLII), 2001 BCSC 1002.

Background

[4] The issues raised on the appeal are more easily considered in the context of a chronology of relevant events.

[5] Mr. Kostiuk and Ms. Kostiuk owned the property, their family residence in West Vancouver, for many years as tenants in common.

[6] In 1992, Mr. Kostiuk mortgaged his one-half interest in the property for $300,000, to secure a personal line of credit.

[7] Between 1990 and 1995, Mr. Kostiuk was the chairman and chief executive officer of Evergreen International Technology Ltd.

[8] In 1993, Ms. Barnes, who had been employed by Evergreen, sued Mr. Kostiuk to recover shares and warrants of Evergreen she claimed had been issued to her in lieu of salary.

[9] On April 7, 1995, Mr. Kostiuk transferred his one-half interest in the property to Ms. Kostiuk for "$1.00 and natural love and affection". The existing mortgage for $300,000, registered against Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the property, was replaced by a new mortgage in the same amount, registered against Ms. Kostiuk's title to the whole property. On July 27, 1995, Ms. Kostiuk granted a further mortgage to the same bank for $150,000 and on October 18, 1995 granted a further mortgage to another creditor for $100,000.

[10] In March 1996, Ms. Barnes commenced an action against Mr. Kostiuk, claiming that the transfer of his one-half interest in the property to Ms. Kostiuk was a fraudulent conveyance, contrary to s. 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 163. She registered a certificate of pending litigation against the property.

[11] On March 21, 1997, R.D. Wilson J. awarded Ms. Barnes $1,758,109 in damages against Mr. Kostiuk for detinue of the shares and warrants of Evergreen.

[12] Effective May 7, 1997, Evergreen petitioned Mr. Kostiuk into bankruptcy. The bankruptcy stayed Ms. Barnes' fraudulent conveyance action.

[13] On October 10, 1997, Ms. Barnes obtained leave under s. 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S. 1985, c. B-3, to take proceedings in her own name to set aside the conveyance of the property to Ms. Kostiuk. The order required the trustee in bankruptcy to "execute an assignment assigning all his right, title and interest in the subject matter of the proceedings" and provided:

> ...such assignment shall vest in Susan Barnes and such other creditors as may join in these proceedings all the right, title and interest which the said trustee has, had or shall have in the subject matter of the proceedings by virtue of his office as trustee.

There is no copy of the assignment in the appeal books, but there is no dispute that an assignment as required by the order was executed by the trustee and that no other creditors joined in the proceedings with Ms. Barnes.

[14] On September 30, 1998, Sigurdson J. declared that the transfer of Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the property to Ms. Kostiuk was "null and void" as a settlement under s. 91 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. In supplementary reasons issued March 9, 1999, Sigurdson J. ruled that the transfer was also void as a fraudulent conveyance. His order, entered May 12, 1999, provided with respect to the property:

> THIS COURT DECLARES that the transfers by the Bankrupt, to the respondent Carolyn Kostiuk of his one-half interests in:
> ...(the "Home") [the West Vancouver property];
> are void under section 91 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and also under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 163;

Digitized by Google

> THIS COURT ORDERS that upon the filing in the Vancouver Land Title Offices of a certified copy of this Order, the registrar of the Vancouver Land Title Office shall register the transfer of an undivided one-half interest in the House to the applicant Susan Barnes;...
> THIS COURT FURTHER DECLARES that the applicant Susan Barnes is and has, since October 22, 1997, been, a tenant in common of the House...with the Respondent Carolyn Kostiuk, owning an undivided one-half interest in the House...;
> . . .

[15] In September 1998, after the bank foreclosed on the mortgages on the property, the mortgages were refinanced by Ms. Kostiuk with Ms. Barnes' consent.

[16] On January 5, 1999, Ms. Barnes commenced proceedings under the Partition of Property Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 347, for an order for sale of the property. On March 8, 1999, Vickers J. ordered the property sold.

[17] On February 25, 2000, the property was sold for $1,700,000. The net sale proceeds of $737,998 were deposited in Ms. Barnes' solicitor's trust account. Ms. Kostiuk and Mr. Kostiuk continued to occupy the property until it was sold.

[18] Ms. Barnes brought an application in the bankruptcy proceedings for an order dividing the net proceeds of the sale. On July 12, 2001, Hunter J. ordered the proceeds divided, with the following adjustments:

(a) Ms. Kostiuk will bear one-half of the burden of the $300,000 mortgage originally registered on Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the property, because she benefited from the proceeds;

(b) Ms. Kostiuk will bear the burden of the taxable costs of the refinancing of the three original mortgages and the increased interest rate under the refinanced mortgage.

Ms. Barnes' claim for occupational rent was rejected.

[19] The total amount awarded to Ms. Barnes was $632,061. Hunter J. awarded costs to Ms. Kostiuk.

[20] The property declined in value from the date of the fraudulent conveyance until the date of sale. Three appraisals of the property in evidence provided the following opinions as to value:

(a) as at April 7, 1995 (the date of the fraudulent conveyance): $2,100,000.

(b) as at May 7, 1997 (the date of the bankruptcy): $1,900,000.

(c) as at July 22, 1998: $1,800,000.

[21] The sales proceeds were $1,700,000.

Issues on Appeal

[22] Ms. Barnes appeals on the following grounds:

(a) The chambers judge erred in failing to award Ms. Barnes the value of the fraudulently conveyed interest in the property as of the date of the fraudulent conveyance, or alternatively, the date of the bankruptcy, in each case with interest. According to Ms. Barnes' calculations, under the first alternative, she would be entitled to all of the money held in her solicitor's trust account plus judgment against the respondent for the balance owing of $177,018.75, and under the second alternative, to 97.97% of the money held in trust.

(b) The trial judge erred in failing to award Ms. Barnes compensation for "ouster", calculated at $2,500 per month from the date of bankruptcy (May 7, 1997) to the date of sale (February 25, 2000) plus interest. According to Ms. Barnes' calculations, she would be entitled to 97.24% of the money held in trust.

[23] On the cross-appeal, Ms. Kostiuk claims the chambers judge erred in finding that she was to bear half of the burden of the $300,000 mortgage registered at the time Mr. Kostiuk conveyed his interest in the property to her.

[24] At the hearing, Ms. Kostiuk's counsel advised the Court that Ms. Kostiuk claimed that any occupational rent allowed to Ms. Barnes should be offset by expenses incurred by Ms. Kostiuk in maintaining the property while it was owned by Ms. Kostiuk and Ms. Barnes and occupied by Ms. Kostiuk and her family. That claim was not addressed in the notice of cross-appeal or in either of the factums. Both parties provided written submissions on this issue following the hearing.

[25] These grounds of appeal and cross-appeal raise the following issues:

(a) Do the principles of the assessment of damages for conversion apply to the determination of Ms. Barnes' share of the proceeds from the sale of the property?

(b) Is Ms. Barnes entitled to be compensated for being ousted from possession of the property?

(c) Is Ms. Kostiuk liable for half of the mortgage charging Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the property at the time she acquired it from him?

Division of Net Proceeds: the "Conversion" versus the "Joint Ownership" Approach

[26] In chambers and on this appeal, Ms. Barnes' counsel argued that the principles applicable to the assessment of damages for the tort of conversion should be applied in determining Ms. Barnes' share of the proceeds of the sale of the property.

Digitized by Google

[27] Hunter J. rejected Ms. Barnes' arguments on the grounds that conversion does not apply to land and Ms. Barnes had not pleaded conversion. He also rejected her argument based on s. 98(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. I agree with Hunter J.'s reasons for rejecting Ms. Barnes' arguments, but to meet counsel's arguments on the appeal, find it necessary to discuss in more general terms why the principles of the assessment of damages for conversion that counsel seeks to apply have no application in this case.

[28] Ms. Barnes' arguments are based on the principle that in an action for conversion, damages are assessed as the value of the property at the date of the wrong (John G. Fleming, The Law of Torts, 9th ed. (Ontario: Carswell, 1998) at p. 76). Thus, where, as here, the value of the property declines between the date of the wrong and the date of judgment, a successful plaintiff does not bear the burden of that decline.

[29] Ms. Barnes' counsel cited numerous authorities to support his submission that courts have applied this principle of valuation in determining the entitlement of a creditor or trustee in bankruptcy who has sued to recover the value of property fraudulently conveyed by an insolvent debtor or bankrupt, whether or not the action is framed in conversion. None of the authorities, however, deal with a fraudulent conveyance or settlement of land. Indeed, it is clear in law, and not a matter of dispute in this appeal, that the tort of conversion does not apply to land. The authors of Prosser and Keeton on The Law of Torts, 5th ed. (St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1984) explain why (at pp. 90-1):

> What property may be the subject of an action for conversion was at first determined on the basis of the fiction of losing and finding. Any tangible chattel could be lost and found, and so could be converted. Land, on the other hand, was obviously incapable of getting lost, and therefore, trover would not lie for the dispossession or withholding of real property.

[30] As I understand counsel's argument, he does not claim that Ms. Barnes is legally entitled to maintain an action for conversion. Rather, he says that there is no reason not to apply the same principles that govern the assessment of damages for conversion of goods to the wrongful taking of land by a fraudulent conveyance or void settlement. If those principles were applied, he says, Ms. Barnes' share of the net proceeds of the sale of the property would be valued at the date the wrongful conveyance took place, or alternatively, at the date of the bankruptcy, and she would not suffer the loss of value of the property between either of those dates and the date of sale. Counsel argues that as between the fraudulent transferee (Ms. Kostiuk) and the trustee in bankruptcy (or his assignee, Ms. Barnes), the fraudulent transferee should bear the burden of the loss of value. Counsel submits further that Ms. Barnes' claim should not fail due to a technicality of law or pleading.

[31] The short answer to this argument is that, with respect, it is based on a wrong premise. Ms. Barnes' claim is misconceived, not only because the subject-matter of the transfer was land (although that would bar an action for conversion), nor because of a mere technicality of law or formality of pleading.

[32] Ms. Barnes's claim to a share of the proceeds of the sale of the property derives from her proprietary interest in the property. She acquired that interest in the statutory proceedings she pursued to have the transfer of the property by Mr. Kostiuk set aside, so that she could execute against the property to satisfy her judgment against him. She has no claim for damages or compensation with respect to the transfer of the property by Mr. Kostiuk to his wife. Having been awarded title to a one-half interest in the property, she is entitled to that share of the property or the proceeds of its sale. The value of the property at the date of the transfer or bankruptcy is irrelevant to her claim to a share of the net proceeds.

[33] In his text, The Law of Damages, (Aurora, Ontario: Canada Law Book Inc., 2001), Prof. S.M. Waddams discusses the difference between a proprietary remedy and compensation for property wrongfully taken (at p. 9-7):

> Whenever the plaintiff can assert an ownership interest in specific property, the effect will be to enable the plaintiff to capture any increase in value of the property in the defendant's hands [or suffer any loss where the value of the property declines]. This question was discussed in Chapter 1 in connection with the date for the assessment of damages. The questions of the right and the remedy, as is often the case, are intertwined. If property is wrongly taken from the plaintiff but the plaintiff is only allowed to recover its value at the date of the wrong, this amounts to saying that the plaintiff has lost proprietary interest, for if the law will not assist the plaintiff to regain possession of the property, one of the chief incidents of ownership is denied to the plaintiff. On the other hand, if the starting point is that the plaintiff remains, in the full sense, owner of the property, it follows that the plaintiff cannot be limited to compensation measured by its value at the date of the wrong, because the plaintiff will – for such are the incidents of ownership – be entitled to use self-help to recapture the property and to the legal remedies of replevin and detinue [in respect of chattels], and probably to injunctive and declaratory relief as well.

[34] Even if the principles of the assessment of damages were applicable to determine Ms. Barnes' share of the net proceeds of sale of the property (which they are not), the principles applicable to conversion, where damages are assessed based on the value of goods at the date of the wrongful taking, would not likely apply in any event. Because Ms. Barnes' claim is to specific property, any damages would likely be assessed as the value at the date of judgment or trial, as in an action for detinue or for damages in lieu of specific performance. That is because where the plaintiff's claim is to property which cannot be replaced or to specific property, the plaintiff's interest in the property continues until judgment.

[35] In an action for detinue of goods, the wrong is the failure or refusal to deliver up goods when demand is made. In assessing damages, the goods are valued at the date of trial: see R.F. Fry & Associates (Pacific) Ltd. v. Peter Reimer & Deacon Barclays De Zoete Wedd Ltd. 1993 CanLII 300 (BC CA), (1993), 83 B.C.L.R. (2d) 199 (C.A.) at para. 23, and Steiman v. Steiman et al. reflex, (1982), 143 D.L.R. (3d) 396 at 407 (Man.C.A.) where O'Sullivan J.A. for the majority, explained the difference between conversion and detinue:

> A person who finds his goods taken may continue to regard the goods as his own and sue in detinue for their return but if he elects to claim damages for conversion his damages must be based on the supposition that he has replaced the missing goods at market prices.
> The victim who replaces converted goods will not lose any appreciation in value by reason of a rising market. If the victim were permitted to recover damages as of the date of trial for goods which he has in fact replaced by purchase, he would gain twice from appreciation – once on the goods converted and once on the goods purchased.
> It is true that where there is a wrongful taking the victim may have the alternative of claiming in detinue, where the unsuccessful defendant must replace the goods or pay the value at the time of trial. But the plaintiff then runs the risk of a falling market and of depreciation in value; the defendant's option to restore the goods continues to judgment and maybe even to execution.

[36] Prof. Waddams draws an analogy between the assessment of damages in detinue and for damages in lieu of specific performance (at p. 1-49):

> ...if the plaintiff brings an action in detinue, the court has jurisdiction to order specific delivery of the chattel claimed. Such an order has the effect of giving the plaintiff the benefit of any increase in the value of the chattel between the date of the wrong and the date of judgment. Just as in the case of damages in lieu of specific performance, it seems to follow that on refusal of specific delivery the plaintiff must be entitled to damages representing the value of the chattel at the date of judgment. The analogy was drawn in Malhotra v. Choudhury [[1980] 1 Ch. 52 at 78 (C.A.)]:
> > The equitable remedy of specific performance has features markedly different from damages at common law for breach of contract. But there is an analogy at common law to the equitable remedy of specific performance. This is to be found in the action in detinue...the action in detinue partakes of the nature of an action in rem in which the plaintiff seeks specific restitution of his chattel. In this action where an order for a writ of specific delivery can be made, the plaintiff has always been entitled instead to claim its value in money assessed at the date of judgment.

[37] Thus, there is no support in law for the argument that Ms. Barnes' proprietary interest in the property should be valued at a date other than the date of sale. Nor, with respect, is there any other reason that she should be compensated for the decline in value between the date of transfer or the date of bankruptcy, and the sale. Ms. Barnes had no proprietary interest in the property at either the date of the transfer or the date of bankruptcy that was affected by the transfer. At the date of the transfer of the property from Mr. Kostiuk to Ms. Kostiuk, Ms. Barnes was a plaintiff in a lawsuit against the transferor, Mr. Kostiuk, and at the time of the bankruptcy, she was a judgment creditor of Mr. Kostiuk. Ms. Barnes acquired her interest in the property only when title was awarded to her by Sigurdson J.

[38] I am of the opinion, therefore, that the chambers judge was correct in rejecting Ms. Barnes' claim that her share of the net proceeds should be determined applying principles applicable to conversion.

Ouster, Occupational Rent and Expenses

[39] Ms. Barnes claims that Ms. Kostiuk deprived her of possession and enjoyment of her interest in the property and she is entitled to be compensated by the payment of occupational rent. Ms. Barnes claims compensation from the date of bankruptcy, on the basis that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to possession of Mr. Kostiuk's former interest in the property as of that date, and Ms. Barnes stepped into the shoes of the trustee by the assignment.

[40] The chambers judge rejected Ms. Barnes' claim for occupational rent on the ground that she was not ousted within the definition stated in M. v. H. 1994 CanLII 7224 (ON SC), (1994), 17 O.R. (3d) 118 at 133 (Gen.Div): "...the act of wrongfully putting one out of rightful possession of his or her property".

[41] The concept of ouster and the circumstances in which occupation rent will be ordered is explained more fully in Dennis v. MacDonald, [1981] 1 W.L.R. 810 at 816-7 (Fam.D.), affirmed [1981] 2 W.L.R. 275 (C.A.):

> Mr. Walker submitted, I think correctly, that when one looks at the judgment in M'Mahon v. Burchell, 2 Ph. 127 together with the extract from the judgment of Stirling J. in Hill v. Hickin [1897] 2 Ch. 579 the true > position under the old authorities was that the Court of Chancery and Chancery Division would always be ready to inquire into the position as between co-owners being tenants in common either at law or in equity to see whether a tenant in common in occupation of the premises was doing so to the exclusion of one or more of the other tenants in common for whatever purpose or whatever means. If this was found to be the case, then if in order to do equity between the parties an occupation rent should be paid, this would be declared and the appropriate inquiry ordered. Only in cases where the tenants in common not in occupation were in a position to enjoy their right to occupy but chose not to do so voluntarily, and were not excluded by any relevant factor, would the tenant in common in occupation be entitled to do so free of liability to pay an occupation rent.

[42] Most of the cases in which these matters are considered concern co-owners who have, at one time, shared possession of the property, and one co-owner subsequently either leaves or is excluded. Many arise in cases of matrimonial disputes. There are few cases where, as here, the co-owners are strangers and one co-owner has never been in possession.

[43] The fact that a co-owner had sole possession does not prove ouster because one co-owner is entitled to be in possession of the entirety, but if possession is demanded and refused, on the grounds that the co-owner in possession claims the whole property as his own, "such possession is adverse and ouster enough" (Doe v. Prosser (1774), 1 Cowp. 217, 98 E.R. 1052). The co-owner alleging ouster must prove that the other co-owner is in possession with the intention of ousting her (Allison v. Smith (1877), 17 N.B.R. 199 (C.A.)).

[44] In this case, Ms. Kostiuk denied Ms. Barnes' claim during the litigation to set aside the transfer. In my view, that denial of title does not amount to ouster. Ms. Kostiuk was entitled to mount a defence to Ms. Barnes' claims.

[45] In January 1999, after Sigurdson J. declared the transfer void as a settlement, Ms. Barnes, through her counsel, demanded access to the property and was refused. On March 30, 1999, after Vickers J. made his order for sale, she attended at the property with a solicitor and demanded access, which was refused. She argues that these events are evidence of Ms. Kostiuk's intention to exclude Ms. Barnes from possession and amount to ouster.

[46] In my view, Ms. Barnes has failed to prove ouster. She had no proprietary claim to the house at the date of bankruptcy. It cannot be said that during the litigation to set aside the transfer Ms. Kostiuk was in possession with the intention of ousting either the trustee or Ms. Barnes. That Sigurdson J.'s order nullifying the transfer granted ownership to Ms. Barnes as of October 22, 1997, the date of the assignment of the trustee's claims to her, does not change the facts as they existed up to the date the order was granted.

[47] When Ms. Barnes demanded possession of the property in January 1999, she had already brought her application for an order for sale under the Partition of Property Act. That indicates that she was not seriously demanding possession of the property, but was only attempting to create evidence to support a claim for occupational rent.

[48] In my view, the chambers judge made no error in denying the claim of ouster and for occupational rent.

[49] Related to Ms. Barnes' claim for occupational rent is Ms. Kostiuk's claim for expenses; however, it is not clear whether Ms. Kostiuk claims expenses independently or only in setoff of any occupational rent that may be awarded to Ms. Barnes.

[50] If Ms. Kostiuk's claim is that she is entitled to claim expenses in setoff of occupational rent, the denial of occupational rent to Ms. Barnes forecloses that claim.

[51] If Ms. Kostiuk is claiming entitlement to contribution for expenses independently of Ms. Barnes' claim for occupational rent, Ms. Kostiuk's claim is subject to an allowance for use and occupation or will be allowed only to the extent that she made improvements that have increased the value of the property (see Mastron v. Cotton, [1926] 1 D.L.R. 767 (Ont. S.C.-App. Div.), and cases cited therein, including Pascoe v. Swan (1859), 27 Beav. 508, 54 E.R. 201 and Leigh v. Dickeson (1884), 15 Q.B.D. 60 (C.A.)).

[52] In her affidavit prepared for the hearing before Hunter J., Ms. Kostiuk claimed that she paid:

> ...all of the utilities, repair and upkeep costs and other expenses associated with ownership of the house. These expenses (which included hydro, landscaping fees, pool maintenance costs and other charges) averaged roughly $1,500 per month.

There is no evidence that any of these expenditures contributed in any lasting way to the value of the property.

[53] In all of these circumstances, I would make no allowance to Ms. Kostiuk for maintenance expenses incurred by her with respect to the property.

The Burden of the $300,000 Mortgage

[54] The chambers judge concluded that Ms. Kostiuk should share half of the burden of the $300,000 mortgage on Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the property at the time it was transferred to her, because she had benefited from it. Ms. Kostiuk does not dispute the finding of fact that she benefited from the proceeds of the mortgage, but says that fact gives Ms. Barnes, standing in the shoes of the trustee in bankruptcy, and derivatively, Mr. Kostiuk, no claim against her for half of Mr. Kostiuk's mortgage debt.

[55] Ms. Barnes' position is that if the proceeds of sale of the property are divided in accordance with the "joint ownership" approach, the charges on the property on the date of sale are presumptively divided equally and it is up to Ms. Kostiuk to prove that in equity she is entitled to shift the burden to Ms. Barnes.

[56] In my view, it is consistent with the approach to be taken to the division of the net proceeds to find that, subject to adjustments made on legal or equitable grounds, Ms. Kostiuk bears half the burden of the mortgages registered against both her interest and that of Ms. Barnes at the date of sale. (The parties agreed to the manner in which they would share the burden of the mortgages other than the original $300,000 mortgage.) The onus is on Ms. Kostiuk to show that she should be relieved of her share of the burden.

[57] The argument made by Ms. Kostiuk before Hunter J. was that she was entitled to the benefit of the principle of "equitable exoneration". That principle is summarized in Re Pittortou, [1985] 1 All E.R. 285 at 287 (Ch.):

> As a general proposition, if there is found a charge on property jointly owned to secure the debts of one only of the joint owners, the other joint owner, being in the position of a surety, is entitled as between the two joint owners to have the secured indebtedness discharged so far as possible out of the equitable interest of the debtor. The principle is expressed in 22 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) paras 1071-1076, under the general heading "Equity of Exoneration'. Paragraph 1071 begins:
> > 'If the property of a married woman is mortgaged or charged in order to raise money for the payment of her husband's debts, or otherwise for his benefit, it is presumed, in the absence of evidence showing an intention to the contrary, that she meant to charge her property merely by way of security, and in such case she in is the position of surety and is entitled to be indemnified by her husband, and to throw the debt primarily on his estate to the exoneration of her own...'
> However, the equity of exoneration is a principle of equity which depends on the presumed intention of the parties. If the circumstances of the particular case do not justify the inference, that it was the joint intention of the joint mortgagors that the burden of the secured indebtedness should fall primarily on the share of that of them who was the debtor, then that consequence will not follow.
