[58] The principle of "equitable exoneration", as it applies to property dealings involving husbands and wives, is derived from cases that were decided more than one hundred years ago: see Paget v. Paget, [1898] 1 Ch. 470 (C.A.). The laws and social customs governing those dealings have little application today. Nonetheless, the principle is applied, in the proper case, taking into account modern marriage relationships: see Re Pittortou at pp. 288-9 and Slan v. Blumenfeld 1997 CanLII 12259 (ON SC), (1997), 34 O.R. (3d) 713 at 719 and 725 (Ont. Ct.-Gen. Div.). The question is the intention of the parties as to who should bear the burden of the indebtedness and whether the spouse who claims the benefit of the doctrine benefited from the debt: see, in addition to Re Pittortou and Slan, Re Berry, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 373 (C.A.); Farrugia v. Official Receiver (1982), 43 A.L.R. 700 (Fed. Ct.); 317363 Canada Inc. v. Doctor 1997 CanLII 12418 (ON SC), (1997), 50 C.B.R. (3d) 264 (Ont. Ct.-Gen . Div.); McCoy v. Hucker, [1998] O.J. No. 2831 (Ont. Ct.-Gen. Div.)(QL).

[59] The chambers judge found that Ms. Kostiuk benefited from the mortgage and had agreed with Mr. Kostiuk that she would repay it. On those facts, the principle of equitable exoneration would not apply to shift the burden of the $300,000 mortgage to Mr. Kostiuk or on to his previous interest in the property. Although Ms. Kostiuk's counsel advised that she does not rely on the principle of equitable exoneration on this appeal, he made no alternate argument to satisfy the onus on her to show that her share of the mortgage should be borne by Ms. Barnes.

[60] I conclude that the chambers judge made no error in concluding that Ms. Kostiuk is not entitled to be relieved of the burden of half the $300,000 mortgage.

Conclusion

[61] Since writing these reasons for judgment, I have had the privilege of reading those of my colleague, Mr. Justice Smith, and agree with his elucidation of the issues raised in this appeal.

[62] I would dismiss the appeal and the cross-appeal.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Smith:

[63] I have had the privilege of reading the reasons for judgment of my colleague Madam Justice Levine in draft form and I agree with her proposed disposition of this appeal. I agree generally, as well, with her reasons but I wish to state in my own words my reasons in respect of the issue concerning the proper division of the proceeds of sale of the property.

[64] As my colleague has set out the facts fully, I will not mention them save as is necessary to make my points.

[65] In my opinion, Ms. Barnes has conflated the remedial aspects of a personal, common-law cause of action with the statutory rights of which she has availed herself as a judgment creditor of Mr. Kostiuk.

[66] Conversion, a proprietary cause of action at common law, lies only in respect of chattels. The action may be brought by anyone who was in actual possession of the chattels, or anyone who was entitled to their immediate possession, at the time of the conversion. The usual remedy is an order that the defendant pay the value of the chattel at the time that it was wrongfully taken together with any consequential loss. The nature and historical development of this cause of action are discussed in many learned treatises: see, for example, J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History, 2d ed. (London: Butterworths, 1979) at 328-335; John G. Fleming, The Law of Torts, 9th ed. (Ontario: Carswell, 1998) at 60-82.

[67] Neither the cause of action in conversion nor its remedies have anything to do with Ms. Barnes' rights in this proceeding. The subject matter of this proceeding is not a chattel and, until the order of Sigurdson J. vested title to Mr. Kostiuk's former interest in her name, Ms. Barnes had no ownership or possessory interest in the lands.

[68] Rather, Ms. Barnes' rights are purely statutory. They arose, initially, out of her status as a judgment creditor of Mr. Kostiuk. As such she had a statutory right to bring action under s. 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 163. Success in the action would have entitled her to a declaration that the conveyance by Mr. Kostiuk was fraudulent and void as against her and as against Mr. Kostiuk's other creditors and to a direction that Mrs. Kostiuk do whatever should be necessary to make Mr. Kostiuk's interest available for execution. The usual order is described in H.W. May, The Law of Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances, 3rd ed. (London: Stevens and Haynes, 1908) at 316:

> Where a deed is declared void against creditors, and the settlor is not a bankrupt, the Court will not order it to be delivered up to be cancelled, if any property passed by it, but will direct the trustees or grantees under it to do, and concur in, all acts necessary for making the property therein comprised available for creditors. The reason of this is, that the grantees are entitled, subject to the rights of creditors, and there might be a surplus after paying all the creditors. And where a deed is set aside by creditors, before all the assets are got in, the Court will consider the assets, when realised, as still subject to the settlement, if there be any surplus after meeting all the settlor's liabilities.
> Where, however, no property passes, or is intended to pass, by the deed, or the grantor is a bankrupt, the Court will order it to be delivered up to be cancelled, and has full jurisdiction to do so. [citations omitted]

[69] In that passage, the author was discussing orders made pursuant to the Statute of Elizabeth, 1571 (13 Eliz. 1, c. 5), which is the model for our Fraudulent Conveyance Act: see Ramgotra (Trustee of) v. North American Life Insurance Co., 1996 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 325 at paras. 61-63.

[70] As examples of cases where such orders have been made pursuant to fraudulent-conveyance legislation, see: Fuhr v. Fuhr, reflex, [1936] 2 W.W.R. 237, 50 B.C.R. 438 (B.C.S.C.); Mackey v. Mackey, reflex, [1930] 1 W.W.R. 604, 42 B.C.R. 440, [1930] 3 D.L.R. 497 (B.C.S.C.); Union Bank of Canada v. Johnson (1910), 3 Alta. L.R. 207, 13 W.L.R. 519 (Alta. S.C. (Trial)); Adams v. Adams reflex, (1961), 38 W.W.R. 54 (Sask. Q.B.); Jaston & Co. v. McCarthy 1998 CanLII 6455 (BC CA), (1998), 8 C.B.R. (4th) 25, [1999] 7 W.W.R. 243, 59 B.C.L.R. (3d) 168, 168 D.L.R. (4th) 415 at para. 70 (B.C.C.A.); Vern-View Investments Inc. v. Hale 1991 CanLII 1776 (BC CA), (1991), 58 B.C.L.R. (2d) 322 at para. 22 (C.A.).

[71] Thus, success by Ms. Barnes in her action under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act would not have entitled her to the value of Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the lands at an earlier date; it would have entitled her only to have the interest conveyed by Mr. Kostiuk made available for execution to satisfy her judgment. Ms. Barnes had no other interest in the property: see Taylor v. Cummings (1897), 27 S.C.R. 589, which involved an action brought under the Statute of Elizabeth in which the grantees had disposed of the property fraudulently conveyed in good faith and without notice of the grantor's fraud. At p. 592 of that decision, Sedgewick J. said:

> We are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed, not only for the reasons stated by the learned judges below, but because in our view the action itself was baseless except in so far as it sought to set aside the deed in question and thereby render the property covered by it available for execution or garnishment at the instance of judgment creditors.
> The claim of the plaintiff for an account against [the defendants], with a view of making them pay over to the creditors the moneys received by them under the deed on account of the assignor's > indebtedness to them, is absolutely untenable under English law, in an action to declare a deed void under the statute of Elizabeth. No decree has ever yet been made ordering restitution of property parted with by the assignor of the deed or person claiming under him. That statute avoids the deed, nothing more – it leaves the creditor defeated to his ordinary remedies, execution, garnishment. No English case has been shown where, in a suit of this kind, a personal liability for property disposed of has been cast upon persons taking under the deed, and the reason is obvious. A creditor as such has no claim either at law or in equity to his debtor's property. He must first obtain his judgment and charge it by way of execution.

[72] Sedgewick J. went on to indicate that the result might have been otherwise in that case had the grantor and the grantee deliberately combined and conspired to dispose of the property in fraud of the creditors. There is nothing of that sort here, as Mrs. Kostiuk did not dispose of the interest fraudulently conveyed to her by her husband. The interest remained vested in her and, therefore, amenable to an order under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act.

[73] However, as my colleague has noted, Mr. Kostiuk's bankruptcy stayed the action before Ms. Barnes could proceed to judgment and, as a consequence, she obtained an order, pursuant to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S. 1985, c. B-3, to take proceedings in her own name to set aside the conveyance of the property by Mr. Kostiuk. This, too, is a purely statutory right: see Jaston& Co. v. McCarthy, supra, at paras. 27-28, 34.

[74] Section 38 provides, so far as is relevant:

> 38. (1) Where a creditor requests a trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk, on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding, and on such other terms and conditions as the court may direct.
> (2) On an order under subsection (1) being made the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject matter of the proceeding, including any document in support thereof.
> (3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.

[75] In Ramgotra, supra, the Court observed that the general scheme of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act involves two distinct phases: the "property-gathering" stage and the "estate-administration" stage [paras. 44-46, and 49]. In the property-gathering stage, all of the bankrupt's property passes to and vests in the trustee by operation of s. 71(2) and the trustee is obliged, by s. 16(3), to "take possession of the deeds, books, records and documents and all property of the bankrupt and make an inventory. ..." [paras. 44]. Paragraph 46 of the decision describes actions that the trustee may take during the property-gathering stage to set aside transactions that have reduced the bankrupt's estate. Pursuant to s. 91, the trustee may set aside certain settlements. Similarly, the trustee may set aside certain assignments of book accounts, pursuant to s. 94, and certain transactions with creditors that are deemed to be fraudulent, pursuant to s. 95. As well, by s. 98(1), the trustee may take possession of the proceeds of sale of settled property to a third party where the original settlement is void. The fruits of such actions revert to the bankrupt's estate and fall into the possession of the trustee in bankruptcy.

[76] A trustee in bankruptcy may also take advantage of provincial legislation to attack fraudulent conveyances and preferences: Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., 1977 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 753. Unlike a creditor suing under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, who may only have the property made available for execution, a trustee in bankruptcy may have the conveyance set aside and the property returned to the estate. Thus, by operation of s. 38(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, any surplus remaining after satisfying the judgment creditor's claim vests in the estate for the benefit of all creditors.

[77] Here, Ms. Barnes did not commence a new proceeding on behalf of the trustee pursuant to the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. Rather, she sought and obtained judgment in the bankruptcy proceeding on the pleadings filed and evidence taken in the fraudulent-conveyance action that she had earlier commenced. By consent of the parties, Sigurdson J. treated the motion in the bankruptcy proceeding as if it were a summary trial in the fraudulent-conveyance action conducted pursuant to Rule 18A of the Rules of Court. The benefit of the action – the judgment – fell exclusively to Ms. Barnes to the extent of her judgment against Mr. Kostiuk and costs by operation of s. 38(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[78] No cases were cited to us in which, in an action under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, the plaintiff, whether judgment creditor or trustee in bankruptcy, has been awarded the value of land fraudulently conveyed to and retained by the grantee. That is not surprising as, it seems to me, such an award would be contrary to principle as established by venerable authority.

[79] In any event, whether the value of Mr. Kostiuk's interest in the lands was available to the trustee in bankruptcy or to Ms. Barnes' suing in the trustee's name under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act is not an issue in this case. The proper time for the submissions that were made to us by Ms. Barnes was when the appropriate form of judgment consequent on the reasons for judgment of Sigurdson J. was before him for decision. The judgment that he granted did not order that Mrs. Kostiuk pay to Ms. Barnes the value of the interest that she received from Mr. Kostiuk nor that she make the one-half interest available for execution by Ms. Barnes on her judgment against Mr. Kostiuk. Rather, he ordered that title to the one-half interest be registered in Ms. Barnes' name. The benefit obtained by Ms. Barnes pursuant to s. 38(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act was, therefore, the property itself.

[80] Next, as my colleague has also set out, Ms. Barnes applied for an order for sale of the property pursuant to the Partition of Property Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 347, and was granted an order in that proceeding by Vickers J. on March 8, 1999. In his reasons for judgment, Vickers J. said:

> There will be an order pursuant to the provisions of s. 6 of the Act that the West Vancouver Property and the Whistler Property be sold, the petitioner to have exclusive conduct of the sale and be at liberty to list both properties for sale. The sale of the property will require approval of the court and the net proceeds of sale are to be paid into court pending a determination of the respective interests of the parties.

[81] Section 6 of the Partition of Property Act provides:

> 6. In a proceeding for partition where, if this Act had not been passed, an order for partition might have been made, and if the party or parties interested, individually or collectively, to the extent of ½ or upwards in the property involved request the court to direct a sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds instead of a division of the property, the court must, unless it sees good reason to the contrary, order a sale of the property and may give directions.

[82] Again, it must be noted that Ms. Barnes was asserting a statutory right, that is, to a sale of the property and to a distribution of the proceeds of sale.

[83] Sections 11 to 15 of the Partition of Property Act provide for the disbursement of the proceeds of sale of the property. The general principle upon which distribution of the sale proceeds should be made is described in Mastron v. Cotton, [1926] 1 D.L.R. 767 at 768 (Ont.S.C., App. Div.):

> ... when a joint tenancy is terminated by a Court order for partition or sale, the Court may in such proceedings make all just allowances and should give such directions as will do complete equity between the parties: Gage v. Mulholland (1869), 16 Gr. 145; Rogers v. Mackenzie (1799), 4 Ves. 752, 31 E.R. 389; 33 Corp. Jur., p. 909; Taylor's Equity, p. 1666, para. 376.
> What is just and equitable depends on the circumstances of each case....

[84] In my opinion, Ms. Barnes had no legal or equitable interest in the proceeds of sale of the property beyond her right to have the proceeds distributed equitably in relation to her interest as a tenant-in-common. I agree with Madam Justice Levine that no error has been shown in the manner in which the chambers judge dealt with this matter.

B-3, ss. 97(3), 136 to 147.

Constitutional law — Division of powers — Bankruptcy — Scheme of distribution — Provincial statutes requiring employer who retains services of contractor to pay amounts due from contractor to provincial bodies — Statutes entitling employer to be reimbursed by contractor or to retain amount paid out of sums employer owes contractor — Whether provincial statutes inapplicable or inoperative by reason of being in conflict with scheme of distribution established by federal bankruptcy legislation — Constitution Act, 1867, s. 91(21) — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. A-3.001, s. 316 — Act respecting labour relations, vocational training and manpower management in the construction industry, R.S.Q., c. R-20, s. 54.

The Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail ("CSST") established an assessment in respect of the activities of a contractor. The contractor did not pay the assessment and the CSST required three employers that had awarded contracts to the contractor to pay the assessment pursuant to s. 316 of the Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases ("AIAOD"). The Commission de la construction du Québec ("CCQ") also demanded that the same employers pay unpaid wages owed by the contractor, pursuant to s. 54 of the Act respecting labour relations, vocational training and manpower management in the construction industry ("ALRCI"). One employer paid the CCQ before the contractor went bankrupt. After the bankruptcy, the trustee demanded that the three employers pay all amounts owing for work performed by the contractor. Two of the employers contested the claim, citing the demands for payment made by the CSST and the CCQ. The trustee applied to the Superior Court for a declaration that s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI do not apply in bankruptcy. The Superior Court dismissed the motion, but the Court of Appeal set aside that judgment.

Held: The appeal should be allowed. Section 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI do not alter the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA").

In light of art. 1656(3) C.C.Q., a payment made in performance of the obligation imposed by the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD allows the employer to be substituted for the CSST in order to claim the amount of the assessment from the contractor. The right to retain referred to in the third paragraph of s. 316 adds nothing to the rights arising out of the subrogatory payment. That paragraph eliminates any doubt as to the employer's right to be reimbursed for the amount paid on the contractor's behalf and, where applicable, to effect compensation between the amount the employer owes the contractor and the amount the contractor owes the employer. [27] [30-31]

The compensation mechanism authorized by s. 316 AIAOD does not go beyond the framework of s. 97(3) BIA, which expressly recognizes certain cases of compensation. If the employer pays the CSST before the bankruptcy, and if the mutual debts of the employer and the contractor are certain, liquid and exigible, legal compensation is effected by operation of law and the debts are extinguished up to the amount of the lesser debt (arts. 1672 and 1673 C.C.Q.). Since the bankruptcy has not yet occurred when legal compensation is effected, the scheme of distribution under the BIA is not affected, because the claim against the employer is not part of the property vested in the trustee. If the employer's payment is made before the bankruptcy but the claim is not liquid at the time of the bankruptcy, the employer may, once the claim has been appraised, rely on s. 97(3) BIA, which dispenses with the trustee's status as a third party for the purposes of compensation and allows compensation to be set up as if the bankrupt were the plaintiff. The right to compensation thus has its basis in the BIA, not the civil law, which is more restrictive. If the payment is made after the bankruptcy, this subrogatory payment cannot give rise to compensation. Since s. 97(3) is an exception to the rule of equality between creditors, it must be interpreted narrowly. It must therefore be read in conjunction with ss. 121, 136(3) and 141 BIA as implicitly requiring that the mutual debts come into existence before the bankruptcy. The BIA does not depart from the rules established by arts. 1651 and 1681 C.C.Q., which provide that subrogation does not give the subrogated person any more rights than the subrogating creditor and that compensation may not be effected to the prejudice of third persons. The employer may nevertheless file a proof of claim to avail him or herself of subrogation to be reimbursed as an ordinary creditor for the amount paid to the CSST (s. 121 BIA). [43-45] [49] [54-57] [72]

Section 316 AIAOD does not subvert the scheme of distribution under the BIA. First, the right to be reimbursed is compatible with the BIA and, second, the right to retain can be exercised only in the circumstances provided for in the BIA, which is more open to compensation than Quebec civil law. Furthermore, from the perspective of Husky Oil, the s. 316 mechanism is compatible with the BIA. This is not a case involving a deemed payment or an employer acting as a mere agent. The claim accrues to the employer at the time of payment, and not by reason of the fact that the employer might be liable to pay should the contractor fail to do so. No right is granted to the CSST, as a third party, to the detriment of the body of creditors. Only an employer who has paid may exercise the right to retain, and the CSST is not affected by the employer's right to collect. Finally, because s. 97(3) BIA must be applied in Quebec on the basis of civil law and not common law rules, equitable set-off is inapplicable in bankruptcy in Quebec. [58] [62-64]

Nor does s. 54 ALRCI subvert the scheme of distribution under the BIA. In the case of s. 54, the wages due from a contractor constitute a solidary obligation between the contractor and the employer. The employer who pays the wages may demand to be reimbursed by the contractor pursuant to art. 1536 C.C.Q. or may rely on legal subrogation pursuant to art. 1656(3) C.C.Q. The principles stated in relation to s. 316 AIAOD also apply to s. 54. [66-73]

DESCHAMPS J. —

1. Introduction

1 The issue raised in the case at bar is whether the rights provided for in s. 316 of the Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases, R.S.Q., c. A-3.001 ("AIAOD"), and s. 54 of the Act respecting labour relations, vocational training and manpower management in the construction industry, R.S.Q., c. R-20 ("ALRCI"), subvert the scheme of distribution provided for in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA").

2 Under s. 316 AIAOD, the Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail ("CSST") may, where a contractor's services are retained by an employer to whom the AIAOD applies, require the employer to pay an assessment due from the contractor. The same section provides that once the employer has paid the assessment, the employer is entitled to be reimbursed by the contractor and may retain the amount paid to the CSST out of any sums he or she owes the contractor. Section 54 ALRCI establishes a mechanism that, although based on solidarity, has the same effect; it permits the Commission de la construction du Québec ("CCQ") to bring claims against employers for unpaid wages owed by contractors with whom they have contracted.

3 On November 4, 1998, the CSST established an assessment in respect of the activities of D.I.M.S. Construction inc. ("DIMS"), a contractor. DIMS did not pay the assessment. The CSST then demanded that three employers that had awarded contracts to DIMS pay the assessment in the proportion provided for in

s. 316 AIAOD. It claimed amounts from the Ministère des Transports du Québec ("MTQ") on November 26, 1998, Pavage Chenail inc. ("Chenail") on November 30, 1998, and Compagnie de pavage d'asphalte Beaver ("Beaver"), a division of Groupe Devesco ltée, on February 10, 1999. According to the evidence in the record, none of the employers had paid the CSST when DIMS went bankrupt on April 1, 1999, after its creditors refused a proposal.

4 The CCQ demanded that the same employers pay unpaid wages owed by DIMS in respect of contracts performed for those employers. The exact dates these demands were made do not appear in the record, except in the case of Beaver, to which one was sent on February 12, 1999. According to one document in the record, Chenail paid the CCQ before DIMS went bankrupt.

5 On April 23 and 29, 1999, Raymond Chabot inc., the trustee in the bankruptcy of DIMS, demanded that the three employers pay all amounts owing for work performed by DIMS. Chenail paid the trustee subject to a special indemnification agreement. The MTQ and Beaver contested the trustee's claim, citing the demands for payment made by the CSST and the CCQ. The trustee applied to the Superior Court for a declaration that s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI do not apply in bankruptcy. The trustee relied on Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, in which it was held that the withholding mechanism available to employers under Saskatchewan's Workers' Compensation Act, 1979 had the effect of creating a priority that subverted the scheme of distribution under the BIA.

6 The Superior Court dismissed the trustee's case on the ground that Quebec's scheme differed from Saskatchewan's scheme: [2000] R.J.Q. 3056. The Court of Appeal came to the opposite conclusion, finding that s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI violated the principles stated in Husky Oil: 2003 CanLII 5967 (QC CA), [2003] R.J.Q. 1104. The Attorney General of Quebec, the CSST and the CCQ appealed, contending that the provision authorizing the CSST and the CCQ to demand that employers pay contractors' unpaid assessments was valid. They raised no arguments concerning the right of employers to be reimbursed or to set up compensation. Even though the employers are not parties to the case, both the right of the CSST and the CCQ to collect and the right to reimbursement are in issue here, because the trustee impugns s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI in their entirety. However, no specific arguments based on the contracts between the employers and the contractor are in issue, nor are the rights of any third parties, such as financial institutions or surety companies, that have rights in the amounts owed by the bankrupt under its contracts.

7 The constitutional questions stated by this Court reflect the questions submitted to the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal:

1. Is s. 54 of An Act respecting labour relations, vocational training and manpower management in the construction industry, R.S.Q., c. R-20, inapplicable or inoperable in whole or in part, by reason of being in conflict with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, and in particular s. 136 thereof?
2. Is s. 316 of An Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases, R.S.Q., c. A-3.001, inapplicable or inoperable in whole or in part, by reason of being in conflict with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, and in particular s. 136 thereof?

8 The appellants contest the Court of Appeal's decision, arguing that Quebec's scheme can be distinguished from Saskatchewan's scheme. They submit that the first and third paragraphs of s. 316 AIAOD set up two successive, distinct and independent steps: one establishing an obligation to pay, and the other setting out the rights of an employer who pays a contractor's assessment. The appellants point out that it was the right to withhold payment in respect of a deemed debt that led the Court to conclude in Husky Oil that the debt was indivisible, and that no such right exists in Quebec law. They contend that neither the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD nor the civil law mechanisms upon which s. 54 ALRCI is based subvert the scheme of distribution under the BIA.

9 The trustee argues that the mechanisms set out in the Quebec provisions are essentially identical to the one provided for in Saskatchewan's legislation. The trustee adds that it would not be enough to declare that the third paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD is inapplicable, since the rules of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 ("C.C.Q."), give the first paragraph of this section the same effect as the third and make it inapplicable in bankruptcy. To show that such a declaration would be insufficient, the trustee also submits that equitable set-off would enable an employer who has paid the CSST or the CCQ to refuse to pay the trustee.

10 For the reasons that follow, I am of the view that s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI do not subvert the scheme of distribution established by s. 136 BIA. I would allow the appeal and restore the judgment of the Superior Court.

2. Analysis

11 Section 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867, gives Parliament jurisdiction over bankruptcy and insolvency. Parliament has exercised this jurisdiction to establish a scheme for distributing the property of bankrupts (ss. 136 to 147 BIA).

12 This Court has on many occasions ruled on conflicts between the BIA's order of priority and the orders resulting from various provincial statutes: see, inter alia, Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35; Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 785; Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061; British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24; and Husky Oil. Those decisions established that statutory provisions enacted by the provinces, although valid in the context of provincial law, are inapplicable in bankruptcy if they conflict with the BIA. It is well established that the BIA will prevail regardless of a province's intention. Given these principles, it is necessary to determine the effect of s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI. Since there are differences between the two mechanisms, I will consider them separately.

13 I will begin by analysing the mechanism of s. 316 AIAOD, which is based on legal subrogation and compensation. The first step will be to review these concepts. Next, I will discuss the interaction between the right to retain under s. 316 AIAOD and the scheme of distribution under the BIA, and will distinguish the instant case from Husky Oil. I will also consider the application of equitable set-off in the case at bar. Lastly, I will discuss the mechanism of s. 54 ALRCI, which incorporates solidarity.

2.1 The Mechanism of Section 316 AIAOD

14 Only the first and third paragraphs of s. 316 AIAOD are relevant to the proceeding before the Court. The second paragraph merely sets out the method for calculating the amount owed by the employer. The section reads as follows:

> 316. The Commission may demand payment of the assessment due by a contractor from the employer who retains his services.
> In the case of the first paragraph, the Commission may establish the amount of the assessment according to the proportion of the price agreed upon for the work corresponding to the cost of labour, rather than the wages indicated in the statement made according to section 292.
> The employer who has paid the amount of the assessment is entitled to be reimbursed by the contractor concerned and the employer may retain the amount due out of the sums that he owes the contractor.

15 The first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD gives the CSST a recourse against an employer for an assessment due from a contractor whose services the employer has retained. The condition that must be met for the CSST to exercise this right is that the assessment be due from the contractor. For an assessment to be due, the CSST must establish the assessment (s. 306 AIAOD) and send the notice (s. 315 AIAOD). Under the AIAOD, the employer is the warrantor of the assessment due from the contractor to the CSST.

16 The parties disagree as to the real scope of the first paragraph. The trustee submits that the third paragraph adds nothing to the rights arising out of the employer's payment of the contractor's debt in accordance with the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD. The appellants contend that the two paragraphs have different functions: the first deals with the right to collect and could survive even if the third paragraph, which grants a right to be reimbursed and to retain, were to be found inapplicable. Does this last right arise automatically out of the payment of the assessment, as the trustee claims? To answer this question, it will be necessary to review the scope of the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD. After doing this, I will consider whether the right to retain subverts the scheme of distribution under the BIA and will conclude by explaining the differences between the provisions at issue in Husky Oil and s. 316 AIAOD, and the reasons why equitable set-off does not apply in Quebec.

2.1.1 Scope of the First Paragraph of Section 316 AIAOD

17 While the purpose of the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD is to give the CSST a recourse against employers, the consequences of exercising this recourse cannot be disregarded. The employer's payment has consequences not only for the CSST, but also for the employer and the contractor. As a result of art. 1671 C.C.Q., paying the assessment has the effect of extinguishing the contractor's obligation to the CSST. Subrogation to the rights of the paid creditor is incidental to the payment and accordingly extinguishes the subrogating creditor's rights as regards the debtor. Under the general rules of civil law, those rights are then transferred to the person who made the payment. Article 1651 C.C.Q. reads as follows:

> 1651. A person who pays in the place of a debtor may be subrogated to the rights of the creditor.
> He does not have more rights than the subrogating creditor.

Digitized by Google

18 The first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD appears to make the application of subrogation possible, since the employer is obliged to pay when the assessment is due from the contractor. In this context, the employer is required to pay in the place of the original debtor and should be able to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor.

19 The C.C.Q. provides for two types of subrogation: conventional subrogation and legal subrogation (art. 1652 C.C.Q.). The case at bar does not involve conventional subrogation. The only possibility is legal subrogation. Article 1656 C.C.Q. provides that subrogation takes place by operation of law in the following five situations:

> 1656. Subrogation takes place by operation of law
> (1) in favour of a creditor who pays another creditor whose claim is preferred to his because of a prior claim or a hypothec;
> (2) in favour of the acquirer of a property who pays a creditor whose claim is secured by a hypothec on the property;
> (3) in favour of a person who pays a debt to which he is bound with others or for others and which he has an interest in paying;
> (4) in favour of an heir who pays with his own funds a debt of the succession for which he was not bound;
> (5) in any other case provided by law.

20 The legislature has explicitly spelled out the right to subrogation in a number of statutes, sometimes departing from the conditions set out in the Civil Code, sometimes not: see, inter alia, the Act to promote good citizenship, R.S.Q., c. C-20, s. 11; the Health Insurance Act, R.S.Q., c. A-29, s. 18(1); the Act respecting financial assistance for education expenses, R.S.Q., c. A-13.3, s. 29; the Building Act, R.S.Q., c. B-1.1, s. 79.2. Because the express right to subrogation is not dealt with consistently, I conclude that the failure to mention subrogation explicitly in the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD does not mean that legal subrogation is unavailable under it. Of the five cases mentioned in art. 1656 C.C.Q., the third might apply.

21 While acknowledging the general scope of para. (3) of art. 1656 C.C.Q., Quebec commentators link this paragraph in particular to solidary or in solidum debts and to debts secured by suretyship: J.-L. Baudouin and P.-G. Jobin, Les obligations (5th ed. 1998), Nos. 916 to 918; J. Pineau, D. Burman and S. Gaudet, Théorie des obligations (4th ed. 2001), at p. 603, No. 336. In the case at bar, solidarity is not mentioned in s. 316 AIAOD and cannot be presumed (art. 1525 C.C.Q.). Nor can the employer's obligation be characterized as being in solidum with the contractor, since the instant case does not involve two concurrent debts having the same object: Prévost-Masson v. General Trust of Canada, 2001 SCC 87 (CanLII), [2001] 3 S.C.R. 882, 2001 SCC 87, at para. 27. The contractor must first be obliged to pay. It might be thought that this is a legal suretyship under art. 2334 C.C.Q., but the suretyship referred to in that article is one that a debtor must furnish when obliged to do so by the legislature: Traité de droit civil du Québec, vol. 13, by H. Roch and R. Paré, 1952, at p. 594; Droit civil québécois (loose-leaf), vol. 6, by D.-C. Lamontagne et al., § 2334 500, at p. 1256 602; J. Deslauriers, Précis de droit des sûretés (1990), at p. 23; P. Ciotola, Droit des sûretés (3rd ed. 1999), at p. 21. In the case of s. 316 AIAOD, the obligation is imposed directly on the warrantor, not on the debtor. This cannot be a true case of suretyship, since a warrantor under the AIAOD has no choice in taking on the obligation, whereas consent is an essential aspect of suretyship, which is by definition a contract (art. 2333 C.C.Q.). The Superior Court judge's statement of the law to the effect that s. 316 AIAOD establishes a legal suretyship is therefore wrong.

22 To conclude that the employer's payment to the CSST confers the benefit of legal subrogation, it would be necessary to rely on the generality of the words "bound . . . for others" used in para. (3) of art. 1656 C.C.Q. In Salama v. Placements Triar inc., [2002] Q.J. No. 3372 (QL), the Quebec Court of Appeal, citing a passage from the work of Baudouin and Jobin, raised the possibility of giving para. (3) of art. 1656 C.C.Q. a broad scope (see also M. Tancelin, Des obligations: actes et responsabilités (6th ed. 1997), No. 1235). The historical evolution of this provision persuades me that such an interpretation is justified.

23 The wording of para. (3) of art. 1656 C.C.Q. is derived from art. 1156 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada, which was itself based on art. 1251 of the Code Napoléon. The Code Napoléon restated a principle of old French law to the effect that marine underwriters were subrogated to the rights of the insured: J. Mestre, La subrogation personnelle (1979), at p. 277, No. 240. It was only after a century of equivocation that French courts finally conceded that subrogation could operate in cases in which the person making the payment was bound to make payment owing to a distinct source of obligation. It was in the context of the law of damage insurance that the French case law evolved. At first, in an 1829 decision, the Cour de cassation refused to recognize an insurer's right to legal subrogation: Civ., March 2, 1829, D.1829.I.163 (Assurances v. Lanquetin).

24 Despite ruling out legal subrogation, the French courts did, however, allow insurers of damage to sue persons who caused damage, on the basis that they had committed a delictual fault causing damage to the insurer. The Cour de cassation came full circle nearly a hundred years later, noting that subrogation in favour of insurers was accepted in maritime law: Civ., January 10, 1923, S.1924.I.257 (Chem. de fer du Midi v. Comp. d'assur. marit. l'Alborada). This evolution caused one French commentator to remark that the French courts had in so doing [TRANSLATION] "embarked on a creative tack, not hesitating to gradually break away from an overly ossified analysis of the Civil Code": Mestre, at p. 280, No. 245.

25 In Quebec insurance law, the issue remained contentious until the 1974 reform, which explicitly granted the right to subrogation (Act respecting insurance, S.Q. 1974, c. 70 (which came into force on October 20, 1976), incorporated into the Civil Code of Lower Canada, art. 2576, now art. 2474 C.C.Q.): D. Lluelles, Précis des assurances terrestres (3rd ed. 1999), at p. 337; Sherwin-Williams Co. of Canada Ltd. v. Boiler Inspection and Insurance Co. of Canada, [1949] S.C.R. 187, at p. 191; Trépanier v. Plamondon, [1985] C.A. 242; contra: J.-G. Bergeron, Les contrats d'assurance (terrestre) (1989), vol. 1, at p. 423; C.-A. Bertrand, "Effets des subrogations et des transports aux assureurs" (1953), 13 R. du B. 285; Agricultural Insurance Co. v. Cité de Montréal, [1943] R.L. 151 (Sup. Ct.); Compagnie d'Assurance du Québec v. Dufour, [1973] C.S. 840.

26 It must be recognized that the wording of para. (3) of art. 1656 C.C.Q. does not limit the paragraph's scope to obligations arising out of solidary or in solidum debts or debts secured by suretyship. To exclude statute-based obligations from its ambit is justified neither by the wording of the C.C.Q. nor by the historical evolution of the scope of the analogous provision in French law. Consequently, employers who pay a contractor's debt under s. 316 AIAOD may be subrogated to the rights of the CSST. As a result of subrogation, the CSST's right against the contractor is transferred to the employer. On making the payment, the employer takes the place of the CSST: Forage Mercier inc. v. Société de Construction Maritime Voyageurs ltée, [1998] Q.J. No. 2190 (QL) (C.A.). The employer acquires the claim from the time of payment, up to the amount paid: Pineau, Burman and Gaudet, at p. 604, No. 337, and at p. 606, No. 338. Thus, the employer may demand that the contractor pay the amount of the assessment paid to the CSST.

27 But if the payment made in performance of the obligation imposed by the first paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD allows the employer to be substituted for the CSST in order to claim the amount of the assessment from the contractor, what does the third paragraph of the same section add? It enunciates the right to be reimbursed and to retain. The right to be reimbursed is nothing more than the right to demand payment. Thus, the right to reimbursement does not add to the claim accruing to the employer by reason of legal subrogation. What about the right to retain? It requires a more nuanced analysis.

28 The Quebec legislature has used the right to retain in ways that are disparate. In some situations, it may be a right granted to a body to set off an amount owing to a person against an amount owed by that person without actually mentioning the right to compensation: Crop Insurance Act, R.S.Q., c. A-30, s. 78.1. In other cases, the provision establishing the right to retain clearly states that the right is based on compensation: Act respecting financial services cooperatives, R.S.Q., c. C-67.3, s. 69. At times, the right to retain is a means of collecting an assessment out of the wages owed to an employee: s. 82(c)(4) ALRCI. In still other cases, a body is authorized to retain an amount until an obligation to do something has been performed: Education Act for Cree, Inuit and Naskapi Native Persons, R.S.Q., c. I-14, s. 13. Context is therefore essential to determining the legal nature of the right to retain granted by a given statutory provision in Quebec.

29 The right described in the third paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD is not a general right allowing an employer to refuse to pay a debt or retain an amount until a condition imposed on another person is met. The paragraph specifies that the right held by the employer is to retain "out of the sums that he owes the contractor" an amount equal to the amount paid by the employer to the CSST. This right presupposes a mutual creditor-debtor relationship between the employer and the contractor. It also presupposes pecuniary obligations on the parts of both the employer and the contractor. When exercising the right to retain, the employer indicates that the debt owed to him or her by the contractor is being deducted from the amount the employer owes the contractor. In this way, the employer pays him or herself with the sums he or she owes. The two debts are discharged. The right to retain therefore corresponds to the right to compensation provided for in art. 1672 C.C.Q.:

> 1672. Where two persons are reciprocally debtor and creditor of each other, the debts for which they are liable are extinguished by compensation, up to the amount of the lesser debt.
> Compensation may not be claimed from the State, but the State may claim it.

30 The right to retain referred to in the third paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD is thus merely a reiteration of the right to compensation arising out of the fact that the employer and the contractor have become both creditor and debtor to one another as a result of the subrogatory payment to the CSST.

31 This analysis leads necessarily to the conclusion, which means the trustee was correct on this point, that dividing up s. 316 AIAOD and retaining only the first paragraph is not a basis for distinguishing the Quebec scheme from Saskatchewan's scheme. If Husky Oil is to be distinguished in this case, it is not because the rights resulting from the first and third paragraphs are distinct from and independent of one another, as the appellants contend. What the third paragraph does is to eliminate any doubt as to the employer's right to be reimbursed for the amount paid on the contractor's behalf and, where applicable, to effect compensation between the amount the employer owes the contractor and the amount the contractor owes the employer.

32 Having completed this part of the analysis, I must now determine whether the right to retain subverts the scheme of distribution under the BIA.

2.1.2 Does the Right to Retain Subvert the Scheme of Distribution Under the BIA?

33 The trustee submits that the right to retain effectively guarantees the payment of amounts owed and in so doing subverts the scheme of distribution under the BIA. The syllogism put forward by the trustee is misleading. The scheme of distribution does not operate in a vacuum. If the BIA recognizes the right of creditors or debtors to avail themselves of mechanisms other than the one provided for in s. 136 BIA, which sets out the scheme of distribution, a provincial statute implementing such an alternative mechanism cannot be found to be inapplicable, because it would be perfectly compatible with the BIA. In discussing the scope of the first paragraph, we concluded that the right to retain is in fact a right to compensation. Since the BIA expressly recognizes certain cases of compensation, the real issue is whether the compensation mechanism authorized by the C.C.Q. and sanctioned by s. 316 AIAOD confers rights going beyond the framework of s. 97(3) BIA, which reads as follows:

> (3) The law of set-off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt and also to all actions instituted by the trustee for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt in the same manner and to the same extent as if the bankrupt were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, except in so far as any claim for set-off is affected by the provisions of this Act respecting frauds or fraudulent preferences.

34 The BIA thus incorporates, although without defining it, a compensation mechanism. To delimit this mechanism, it is necessary to refer not only to the BIA itself, but also to provincial law. Since the enactment of the Federal Law–Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1, S.C. 2001, c. 4, it has been clear that in the province of Quebec, the civil law of Quebec is the suppletive law in bankruptcy matters. This means that in respect of aspects not governed by the BIA, the civil law rules of compensation apply. What are those rules?

35 Article 1672 C.C.Q. has already been quoted. Mutual debts are extinguished up to the amount of the lesser debt. Article 1673 C.C.Q. adds that when debts are certain, liquid and exigible, their mutual extinction takes place by operation of law. The article reads as follows:

> 1673. Compensation is effected by operation of law upon the coexistence of debts that are certain, liquid and exigible and the object of both of which is a sum of money or a certain quantity of fungible property identical in kind.
> A party may apply for judicial liquidation of a debt in order to set it up for compensation.

36 There is another rule that is essential to understanding compensation in the context of insolvency. A debt owed to a party is an asset that is part of his or her patrimony. Since compensation has the effect of extinguishing mutual debts, the creditors of one or the other of the mutually indebted parties may be affected by the reduction or liquidation of the asset. Under Quebec civil law, compensation cannot be effected to the prejudice of a third person. Article 1681 C.C.Q. reads as follows:

> 1681. Compensation may neither be effected nor be renounced to the prejudice of the acquired rights of a third person.

If third persons have acquired rights before the right to compensation arises, art. 1681 C.C.Q. prohibits the application of compensation. The debt cannot be extinguished by compensation to the prejudice of the acquired rights of a third person. Without this rule, the asset would be reserved for one creditor — in this case, the employer — to the detriment of the principle of the equality of creditors (art. 2644 C.C.Q.), as in the case of a security: A. Bélanger, Essai d'une théorie juridique de la compensation en droit civil québécois (2004), at p. 144; G. Duboc, La compensation et les droits des tiers (1989), at p. 8, No. 4. In civil law, therefore, it may or may not be possible to exercise the right to retain, depending on whether or not the rights of third persons are affected. How does this apply in bankruptcy?

37 In the context of bankruptcy, trustees have a dual function: they represent both the bankrupt and the creditors. This dual role was considered recently in Lefebvre (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 63 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 326, 2004 SCC 63. Some duties are consistent with a specific characterization of the trustee as the bankrupt's representative, so the trustee cannot be considered a third person in performing them. In most situations, however, as de Grandpré J. remarked in Mercure v. Marquette & Fils, 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547, at p. 555, the trustee's dual function must be borne in mind in assessing the rights and obligations of the trustee and the creditors.

38 At the time of bankruptcy, the contractor's claim against the employer constitutes property that is part of the patrimony that is divisible among the creditors within the meaning of s. 67 BIA:

> 67. (1) [Property of bankrupt] The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise
> . . .
> but it shall comprise
> (c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and
> (d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

Section 71(2) BIA adds that the property vested in the trustee can no longer be alienated by the bankrupt from the date of bankruptcy:

> (2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

39 For the purposes of ss. 67(1) and 71(2) BIA, the trustee is consequently not only the bankrupt's successor, but also the representative of the creditors, on behalf of whom the trustee manages and liquidates the property vested in him or her. In this context, therefore, the trustee can be characterized primarily as a third person in relation to the bankrupt. If only these sections were taken into consideration, compensation could not be effected after bankruptcy, because bankrupts would no longer be in a position to use their property to pay their debts. Bankrupts would not be able to make payments or discharge debtors because they would no longer have the capacity to do so. They would therefore be unable to effect compensation, which is a mechanism for extinguishing debts, because they would no longer be the holders of their patrimonies. However, s. 97(3) BIA sets up a special scheme. Two aspects of this provision are relevant to our analysis of the right to retain under s. 316 AIAOD.

40 First, s. 97(3) BIA specifies that compensation applies to claims against the bankrupt's estate. Creditors must therefore meet the conditions set out in s. 121(1) BIA, the relevant portion of which reads as follows:

> 121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

Thus, a creditor who wishes to effect compensation must be able to prove the bankrupt was subject to a debt by reason of an obligation incurred before the bankruptcy.

41 Second, s. 97(3) BIA provides that compensation is effected in the same manner as if the bankrupt were a plaintiff or a defendant. Compensation is effected as if the bankrupt's patrimony had not vested in the trustee as a result of the bankruptcy. According to this provision, the mechanism established by s. 71(2) BIA does not apply in cases involving compensation. This rule sets aside the trustee's status as representative of the creditors. The argument that the trustee is a third person and that the bankrupt may no longer make payments as a result of the bankruptcy cannot be used to prevent a creditor who wishes to effect compensation from doing so.

42 Bearing in mind these particular features of s. 97(3) BIA and the civil law rules that supplement them, three possible scenarios can be envisaged in the context of s. 316 AIAOD. In the first, the payment is made to the CSST before the bankruptcy, and the mutual debts are certain, liquid and exigible before the bankruptcy. In the second hypothetical situation, the payment is made before the bankruptcy, the employer is in debt to the contractor, but one of the conditions for legal compensation is not met. In the third scenario, the payment is made after the bankruptcy.

2.1.2.1 Payment Is Made Before the Bankruptcy, and the Mutual Debts Are Certain, Liquid and Exigible Before the Bankruptcy

43 From the moment when the employer pays the CSST, the employer's claim becomes certain, liquid and exigible. As a result of subrogation, the CSST's claim is transferred to the employer. Since the employer's right against the contractor arises out of the payment to the CSST, the existence of the employer's claim is from that moment recognized, or certain. Furthermore, since the CSST's assessment is for a specific amount, the claim is liquid. The claim is also exigible, since the CSST was entitled to demand payment from the employer. If the employer is also in debt to the contractor, and if that debt is liquid and exigible, legal compensation is effected by operation of law in accordance with art. 1673 C.C.Q., which is reproduced above, and the debts are extinguished up to the amount of the lesser debt.

44 In this context, by the operation of the rules of the C.C.Q., the employer asserts not a right to retain, but the extinction of his or her debt to the contractor. The employer may avail him or herself of this mechanism at any time. He or she relies on the fact that the extinction of the debt occurred at the moment the mutual debts met the conditions for legal compensation. Since the trustee takes possession of the bankrupt's property as it exists at the time of vesting (s. 71(2) BIA), the trustee will find that the bankrupt's patrimony includes no claim against the employer.

45 Since in this scenario the bankruptcy has not yet occurred when legal compensation is effected, the scheme of distribution is not affected, because the claim against the employer is not part of the property vested in the trustee.

2.1.2.2 Payment Is Made Before the Bankruptcy, the Employer Is in Debt to the Contractor, but One of the Conditions for Legal Compensation Is Not Met

46 In the second scenario, the employer pays the amount of the contractor's unpaid assessment to the CSST before the bankruptcy. The employer's claim, which results from subrogation, is thus certain, liquid and exigible at the time of the bankruptcy. If one of the conditions for legal compensation is not met, it is necessarily related to the contractor's claim against the employer.

47 There are a number of grounds that may be available to the employer to defend against a claim by the trustee. The employer could, for example, assert that the claim is not certain or is not exigible. In such a case, the employer would not be relying on the right to retain, but would be asserting that the claim does not exist or is not due. If the contractor's claim is certain and exigible but not liquid, the contractor may, if he or she is not bankrupt, apply to a court to liquidate the debt. In this case, the employer would be applying for judicial compensation pursuant to the second paragraph of art. 1673 C.C.Q.

48 In civil law, however, compensation may not be effected if the rights of third persons are affected (art. 1681 C.C.Q.). To allow compensation would be to permit a creditor to be paid in full for a claim out of his or her debt to the debtor. If third persons have acquired rights before compensation is effected, compensation is consequently not available.

49 In bankruptcy, the claim against the employer is an asset vested in the trustee within the meaning of s. 71(2) BIA. If this claim is not liquid, the trustee can have it appraised and, if there is a dispute, institute legal proceedings (s. 30(1)(d) BIA). The employer may also rely on the special provision in s. 97(3) BIA, which dispenses with the trustee's status as a third party for the purposes of compensation and allows compensation to be set up as if the bankrupt were the plaintiff. The employer's right to compensation thus has its basis in the BIA, not the civil law, which because of art. 1681 C.C.Q. is more restrictive. In these circumstances, the right to retain under s. 316 AIAOD is not incompatible with the BIA, as it is merely an application of the BIA's provisions.

50 Quebec courts have on many occasions recognized the possibility of setting up compensation in bankruptcy matters: In re Hil-A-Don Ltd.: Bank of Montreal v. Kwiat, [1975] C.A. 157; In re Le syndicat d'épargne des épiciers du Québec: Laviolette v. Mercure, [1975] C.A. 599; Goldstein v. Auerbach (1991), 51 Q.A.C. 292. When the payment is made before the bankruptcy, the rights arising out of the subrogatory payment thus do not subvert the scheme of distribution under s. 136 BIA, because they can be implemented by means of a mechanism provided for in the BIA itself, in s. 97(3).

2.1.2.3 The Employer's Payment Is Made After the Bankruptcy

51 When the employer's payment is made after the bankruptcy, the question is whether the employer can exercise the right to retain or the right to compensation in the same manner as if the payment were made before the bankruptcy. In answering this question, it is helpful to refer to the legal relationship created by s. 316 AIAOD, which can be distinguished from the classic cases of conflicts between third persons and assignees. This is not a case, as provided for in art. 1680 C.C.Q., in which the debtor of an assigned claim seeks to set up against the creditor/assignee the same defence that would have been set up against the original creditor. Rather, this case concerns defences that the employer, the new creditor, wishes to set up against the contractor, the original debtor, at the time the contractor went bankrupt. The CSST owed the contractor nothing and could not therefore set up compensation. Following this line of reasoning, the employer was not a creditor of the contractor before the bankruptcy. The employer did not become a creditor until the subrogatory payment was made, that is, after the bankruptcy. The dual status of creditor and debtor did not arise until after the bankruptcy.

52 In the civil law of Quebec, a person who pays in the place of a debtor has no more rights than the subrogating creditor (art. 1651 C.C.Q.) on the one hand, while on the other hand, compensation cannot be effected to the prejudice of third persons (art. 1681 C.C.Q.). While it is difficult to liken the compensation mechanism to an additional right when considered from the standpoint of the debtor, the same cannot be said when the rights of third persons are taken into account. There is no question that third persons would be affected by compensation should it come into play. The effect of substituting creditors subsequent to the bankruptcy is such that the trustee must now deal with a creditor who is also a debtor of the bankruptcy, whereas the original creditor was not and would not therefore have been able to set up compensation. The employer's claim would, in a way, be secured by the amounts owed by the employer to the bankrupt, whereas the CSST's claim was not. In the civil law of Quebec, if third persons are affected, the employer cannot exercise the right to retain under s. 316 AIAOD, as this is prevented by arts. 1651 and 1681 C.C.Q.

53 It is nevertheless helpful to again consider whether the BIA includes provisions that have the effect of allowing employers to exercise their right to retain. We have already seen that s. 97(3) BIA has two features that are relevant here: (1) the claims must be provable by means of a proof of claim, in accordance with s. 121 BIA, and (2) compensation may be effected as if the bankrupt were the plaintiff.

54 As a result of subrogation, an employer who pays after a bankruptcy is subrogated to the rights of the CSST and may assert a claim against the bankrupt as if the bankrupt were the defendant. Pursuant to s. 121 BIA, the employer may assert a claim to which the bankrupt is subject by reason of an obligation incurred before the bankruptcy. Similarly, under s. 97(3) BIA, the trustee may assert a claim against the employer for payment of a debt owed to the bankrupt as if the bankrupt were the plaintiff. Thus, at first glance, these features of the BIA appear to allow compensation. As can be seen from a more thorough review, however, a subrogatory payment cannot give rise to compensation if it is made after the bankruptcy.

55 Few commentators have shown an interest in the effects of subrogation in bankruptcy matters, and the principles of Canadian bijuralism do not permit the importation of common law rules. The commentaries of authors from outside Quebec are nonetheless of interest for the purpose of reviewing the principles specific to the BIA (R. J. Wood, "Turning Lead into Gold: The Uncertain Alchemy of 'All Obligations' Clauses" (2003), 41 Alta. L. Rev. 801). Section 121 BIA allows the employer to exercise the rights that accrue to him or her by reason of the subrogatory payment. He or she holds no rights in addition to the rights conferred by the civil law. The employer has only those rights which the CSST could exercise. Just as the CSST could not set up compensation, neither can the employer if third persons are affected. Section 97(3) BIA does not provide that a claim may be transferred from one creditor to another so as to permit compensation where it could not otherwise be set up. Since s. 97(3) BIA is an exception to the rule of equality between creditors, it must be interpreted narrowly. It must therefore be read in conjunction with ss. 121, 136(3) and 141 BIA as implicitly requiring that the mutual debts come into existence before the bankruptcy.

56 What distinguishes a pre-bankruptcy payment from a post-bankruptcy payment is that, in the former case, the substitution of creditors takes place before the moment when the trustee acquires the bankrupt's property. In the case of a post-bankruptcy payment, the substitution occurs after the bankruptcy, and the trustee can object to it. The general principles of the BIA preclude any transaction that would have the effect of granting a security that did not exist before the bankruptcy. To sum up, where subrogation is concerned, the BIA contains no provisions that depart from the civil law and can serve as a basis for extending the scope of application of compensation.

57 Because of the constraints inherent in the civil law, an employer may not retain the amounts paid to the CSST from the sums owed to a contractor if, when the payment was made, third parties had acquired rights. A payment made pursuant to s. 316 AIAOD does, however, entitle an employer to avail him or herself of subrogation to be reimbursed as an ordinary creditor for the amount paid. The right to reimbursement may be exercised in a manner respectful of the rights of third persons. The employer may file a proof of claim, just as the CSST could have done. This right is consistent with arts. 1651 and 1681 C.C.Q. and with s. 136 BIA. Furthermore, in Husky Oil, the Court recognized the validity of the right to make a simple claim to the trustee to be reimbursed (p. 503).

58 The trustee's argument that s. 316 AIAOD subverts the scheme of distribution under the BIA cannot therefore be accepted. First, the right to reimbursement is compatible with the BIA and, second, if the right to retain cannot be exercised by an employer, it is because of the inherent constraints of the civil law rules governing subrogation and compensation. The right to retain is not in conflict with the BIA, because the only circumstances in which the right can be exercised are those provided for in the BIA, which is more open to compensation than Quebec civil law.

2.1.3 Distinction Between Quebec's Scheme and Saskatchewan's Scheme

59 In accepting the trustee's arguments, the Court of Appeal saw in s. 316 AIAOD a right similar to the one considered by this Court in Husky Oil. The comparison is, in my view, inappropriate. In Husky Oil, the Court considered s. 133 of the Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, which established a deemed debt mechanism and allowed sums owed to a contractor to be withheld even before the employer's claim against the contractor arose. Sections 133(1) and 133(3) read as follows:

> 133—(1) Where a person, whether carrying on an industry included under this Act or not, in this section referred to as the principal, contracts with any other person, in this section referred to as the contractor, for the execution by or under the contractor of the whole or any part of any work for the principal, it is the duty of the principal to ensure that any sum that the contractor or any subcontractor is liable to contribute to the fund is paid and, where the principal fails to do so and the sum is not paid, he is personally liable to pay that sum to the board.
> (3) Where the principal is liable to make payment to the board under subsection (1), he is entitled to be indemnified by any person who should have made the payment and is entitled to withhold, out of any indebtedness due to that person, a sufficient amount in respect of that indemnity.

60 The right to withhold granted to employers under the Workers' Compensation Act, 1979 arose at the time when the employer was liable to pay, that is, before the payment was even made. According to the Court's interpretation, under that Act, employers did not impair their own capital. They acted as collection agents: "it is [their] duty . . . to ensure that any sum that the contractor or any subcontractor is liable to contribute to the fund is paid . . .". The Court concluded from this that the Act established a deemed debt — as opposed to a real one — owed by the employer personally that, when combined with the right to withhold, constituted a security device that was incompatible with the BIA:

> [I]t is clear that when s. 133(1) operates in combination with s. 133(3), the effect is to secure the claim of the Board against assets of the contractor. This is accomplished through the combined operation of the statutory deemed debt imposed on the principal in the event of the contractor's default and the right of the principal to withhold and be indemnified from monies owing to the contractor. Thus, the combined effect of the deemed debt in s. 133(1) and set-off in s. 133(3) secures the Board's claim against the contractor's assets.
> To repeat, it is the combined effect of the statutory deemed debt and the right to withhold (and then set off against) property of the bankrupt which secures the Board's claim against property of the bankrupt. It is for this reason that examining the constitutional validity of s. 133(1) separately from s. 133(3) fundamentally obscures the nature of the legal interest created. Such an approach misses that this is nothing but a straightforward security device triggered by the province for securing the Board's claim against the estate, in exactly the same way that breaking a contract of pledge into debt and bailment and examining the validity of these legal interests separately would obscure the essential character of pledge as a security device. [Emphasis in original; paras. 53 and 77.]

61 The Court did not reject all set-off mechanisms. Such an interpretation would obviously be inconsistent with the clear wording of s. 97(3) BIA and with the reasons for the Court's decision:

> Differently put, in the bankruptcy context, the law of set-off simply allows a debtor of a bankrupt who is also a creditor of the bankrupt to refrain from paying the full debt owing to the estate, since it may be that the estate will only fulfil a portion, if that, of the bankrupt's debt. Set-off is simply a defence to the payment of a debt, not a basis for validating statutory security devices which have the effect of securing the claims of third parties against the estate. . . . [Emphasis in original; para. 73.]

62 Section 316 AIAOD is consistent with the conditions placed on the application of compensation in Husky Oil. Only an employer who has paid may exercise the right to retain. This is not a case like Husky Oil involving a deemed payment or an employer acting as a mere agent. Nor does this case involve, as the trustee argues, a right to retain under a suspensive condition. The right resulting from the subrogatory payment comes into existence only when the payment is made. Mestre says that this rule is [TRANSLATION] "obvious, and results from the very spirit of the institution, created for the benefit of those who pay the debts of others" (p. 374, No. 321). Subject to the right under the BIA to make a contingent claim (s. 135 BIA), a warrantor cannot file a proof of claim before payment: Trib. corr. Auxerre, February 24, 1953, Rev. gén. ass. terr. 1953.190 (Mayet et Destoumieux v. Faillot). The employer/warrantor may not exercise any right against the contractor/debtor before he or she has paid the CSST, the original creditor. In civil law terms, subrogatory rights cannot be conferred under a suspensive condition: Mestre, at p. 375, No. 322. The claim accrues to the employer at the time of payment, and not by reason of the fact that the employer might be liable to pay should the contractor fail to do so. Moreover, no right is granted to the CSST, as a third party, to the detriment of the body of creditors. The CSST is not affected by the employer's right to collect. From the perspective of Husky Oil, the mechanism of s. 316 AIAOD is compatible with the BIA.

2.1.4 Equitable Set-off

63 The trustee also argues that equitable set-off applies in bankruptcy in Quebec and leads to the same conflict as in Husky Oil. The trustee points out that the Court of Appeal has incorporated equitable set-off into Quebec civil law: Structal (1982) inc. v. Fernand Gilbert ltée, 1998 CanLII 13101 (QC CA), [1998] R.J.Q. 2686.

64 The applicability of equitable set-off was questionable even before the Federal Law–Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1: Bélanger, at p. 153; A. Bélanger, "L'application en droit civil québécois de l'inapplicable equitable set-off de common law" (1999), 78 Can. Bar Rev. 486; M. Lemieux, "La compensation dans un contexte de proposition et de faillite" (1999), 59 R. du B. 321. Since that Act came into force, however, it has been clear that s. 97(3) BIA must be applied in Quebec on the basis of civil law and not common law rules. Equitable set-off cannot make up for the non-application of civil law compensation and cannot be introduced into Quebec law by s. 97(3) BIA. In Quebec, the suppletive law is Quebec civil law and, more specifically in this case, the rules governing compensation under the C.C.Q.

65 In short, the third paragraph of s. 316 AIAOD does nothing more than confirm the employer's right to be reimbursed, be it by filing a proof of claim under s. 121 BIA or by setting up compensation in accordance with s. 97(3) BIA. These two means are provided for in the BIA. Section 316 AIAOD grants no more rights than are permitted under the BIA. In no case is the scheme of distribution subverted.

2.2 The Mechanism of Section 54 ALRCI

66 The trustee also seeks to have s. 54 ALRCI declared inapplicable. This provision reads as follows:

> 54. The wages due by a sub-contractor constitute a solidary obligation between the sub-contractor and the contractor with whom he has contracted, and between the sub-contractor, the sub-contractor with whom he has contracted, the contractor and every intermediary sub-contractor.
> Where the employer holds the appropriate licence issued under the Building Act (chapter B-1.1), such solidary obligation is extinguished six months after the end of the work carried out by the employer, unless the employee concerned filed a complaint with the Commission concerning his wages, a civil action was brought, or a claim was sent by the Commission pursuant to the third paragraph of subsection 1 of section 122 before the expiry of the six-month period.
> Such solidary obligation extends to the client having contracted, directly or through an intermediary, with a contractor who does not hold the appropriate licence issued under the Building Act, in respect of the wages due by the contractor and each of his sub-contractors.

Digitized by Google

67 Unlike the AIAOD, which grants a right to reimbursement and a right to retain without actually referring to the mechanism under the Civil Code, the ALRCI, by using the expression "solidary obligation", characterizes the obligation in terms that explicitly incorporate the rights and obligations provided for in the C.C.Q.'s provisions on solidarity.

68 The CCQ's solidary remedy entitles it to claim the amount of the wages from either the employer or the contractor, as it chooses. This is the effect of art. 1523 C.C.Q.:

> 1523. An obligation is solidary between the debtors where they are obligated to the creditor for the same thing in such a way that each of them may be compelled separately to perform the whole obligation and where performance by a single debtor releases the others towards the creditor.

69 An employer who pays the wages of a contractor's employees may demand to be reimbursed by the contractor pursuant to art. 1536 C.C.Q.:

> 1536. A solidary debtor who has performed the obligation may not recover from his co-debtors more than their respective shares, although he is subrogated to the rights of the creditor.

With regard to the employer's liability under s. 54 ALRCI, it is clear that the contractor remains ultimately liable for the entire debt. The employer may therefore recover the total amount paid to the CCQ from the contractor. Moreover, an employer who pays the CCQ may also, as is the case for payments to the CSST, rely on legal subrogation pursuant to para. (3) of art. 1656 C.C.Q.:

> . . .
> (3) in favour of a person who pays a debt to which he is bound with others or for others and which he has an interest in paying;

70 By virtue of the solidary obligation imposed by s. 54 ALRCI, together with the recursory action and subrogation, the employer may claim the amount paid to the CCQ from the contractor.

71 If the payment is made before the bankruptcy, the above reasoning concerning the right to retain under s. 316 AIAOD applies. Where an employer is in debt to the contractor and the debt meets the conditions for legal compensation, the mutual debts are extinguished by operation of law up to the amount of the lesser debt (arts. 1672 and 1673 C.C.Q.). In such a case, the patrimony vested in the trustee at the time of bankruptcy does not include the bankrupt's claim, which has been extinguished by legal compensation. Where the payment is made before the bankruptcy but the contractor's claim is not liquid, employers may avail themselves of s. 97(3) BIA to effect compensation between the amounts they owe and the amounts owed to them.

72 In the case of a post-bankruptcy payment to the CCQ, the employer will have to prove his or her claim against the estate in accordance with the rules of s. 121 BIA. Even if the employer is in debt to the bankrupt, the BIA does not allow the claim to be transferred to the detriment of the creditors. The BIA does not depart from the rules established by arts. 1651 and 1681 C.C.Q., which provide that subrogation does not give the subrogated person any more rights than the subrogating creditor and that compensation may not be effected to the prejudice of third persons. The employer is thus limited to proving the claim without being able to set up compensation for payments made after the bankruptcy.

73 The rules of the C.C.Q. with respect to subrogation add no new security and create no additional debts as regards the bankrupt. The impugned provisions violate neither the letter nor the spirit of Husky Oil. It should be noted that in that case, what was at issue was a mechanism by which employers could withhold amounts owed to debtors before being held personally liable for paying the assessments. In a way, the employer acted as a collection agent for the Workers' Compensation Board. The same is not true in the case of the ALRCI, which provides that employers are personally liable for wages not paid by their contractors.

3. Conclusion

74 This case was submitted to the Superior Court as a motion for directions in which a ruling was sought on the legal effect of s. 316 AIAOD and s. 54 ALRCI in the context of the BIA. The relevant questions of law have been addressed above. As mentioned in the facts related at the beginning of these reasons, the payments made by the employers, with the exception of Chenail's payment to the CCQ, were not made before the bankruptcy. The principles stated above will apply in determining the employers' rights, and there is no need to consider the specific facts of each case, especially since the employers have chosen not to take part in the debate.

75 For these reasons, I would allow the appeal, answer the two constitutional questions in the negative, restore the judgment of the Superior Court and dismiss the trustee's motion, with costs against the estate.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN

Bankruptcy -- Priorities -- Set-off -- Provincial law allowing Board to seek payments of monies owed by bankrupts from the bankrupt's creditors and the creditors entitled to set off that amount from any payment made to trustee in bankruptcy -- Whether or not conflict with priorities established by Bankruptcy Act -- The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1, s. 133(1), (3) -- Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, ss. 97(3), 136.

Constitutional law -- Division of powers -- Paramountcy -- Conflict between provincial and federal law -- Provincial law allowing Board to seek payments of monies owed by bankrupts from the bankrupt's creditors and the creditors entitled to set off that amount from any payment made to trustee in bankruptcy -- Whether or not conflict with priorities established by Bankruptcy Act.

Husky Oil Operations Ltd. (Husky) owed Metal Fabricating & Construction Ltd. (Metal Fab), a firm which, after being formally notified of its arrears to the Workers' Compensation Board (the Board) and after making a general assignment of its book debts to the Bank of Montreal, made an assignment in bankruptcy and ceased operations. The Board, when it learned that Metal Fab had ceased operations, looked to Husky for payment under s. 133(1) of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979. Section 133(1) of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, permitted the Board to obtain amounts owing its Injury Fund from a principal of a defaulting contractor. Husky in turn would be able to recover the amount paid on the Metal Fab's behalf by setting off that amount, pursuant to s. 133(3), from the amount it would otherwise pay Metal Fab. Husky and Metal Fab's creditors maintained that the operation of s. 133 conflicted with s. 136 of the federal Bankruptcy Act, which sets out the priorities of creditors on bankruptcy, in that the Board was able to obtain full payment to the detriment of the creditors who had a higher priority under the Bankruptcy Act. On a non-suit application made by Husky, The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, was found to be inapplicable in a bankruptcy scenario and the Court of Appeal upheld this finding. The constitutional questions queried whether, in situations where the contractor is bankrupt, these provisions are constitutionally non-operational because of conflict with the Bankruptcy Act and whether they applied in the circumstances of this case.

Held (Sopinka, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed. Section 133 is inapplicable in bankruptcy when s. 133(1) of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, operates in tandem with s. 133(3). Section 133 was inapplicable when the contractor entered bankruptcy.

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ.: The gravamen of this appeal was the alleged conflict between s. 133 of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, and s. 136(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act which set the priorities for recovery. The question, however, was not whether the provisions in s. 133 were independently valid, but rather, whether when combined they had the effect of reordering priorities in bankruptcy. The combined effect of the statutory deemed debt and the right to set off against property of the bankrupt, when s. 133(1) is read with s. 133(3), is to secure the Board's claim against the bankrupt's estate. In so doing, s. 133 read as a whole conflicts with Parliament's intention to accord the Board's claim the priority established in s. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act.

The first goal of ensuring an equitable distribution of a debtor's assets is to be pursued in accordance with the federal system of bankruptcy priorities. The quartet (Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35; Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 785; Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061; British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24) does not stand for the sole proposition that the provinces cannot "jump the queue" but rather embodies a consistent and general philosophy as to the purposes of the federal system of bankruptcy and its relation to provincial property arrangements. The following propositions can be distilled from the quartet:

(1)provinces cannot create priorities between creditors or change the scheme of distribution on bankruptcy under s. 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act;

(2)while provincial legislation may validly affect priorities in a non-bankruptcy situation, once bankruptcy has occurred s. 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act determines the status and priority of the claims specifically dealt with in that section;

(3)if the provinces could create their own priorities or affect priorities under the Bankruptcy Act this would invite a different scheme of distribution on bankruptcy from province to province, an unacceptable situation;

(4)the definition of terms such as "secured creditor", if defined under the Bankruptcy Act, must be interpreted in bankruptcy cases as defined by the federal Parliament, not the provincial legislatures. Provinces cannot affect how such terms are defined for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act;

(5)in determining the relationship between provincial legislation and the Bankruptcy Act, the form of the provincial interest created must not be allowed to triumph over its substance. The provinces are not entitled to do indirectly what they are prohibited from doing directly; and

(6)there need not be any provincial intention to intrude into the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy and to conflict with the order of priorities of the Bankruptcy Act in order to render the provincial law inapplicable. It is sufficient that the effect of provincial legislation is to do so.

The fifth and sixth propositions bear a close resemblance to the doctrine of colourability, but with two fundamental differences. First, the doctrine of colourability is a concept which only applies in assessing the pith and substance of the impugned legislation whereas propositions 5 and 6 continue to apply after the validity of the impugned provincial law has been determined. None of the quartet cases was concerned with colourable provincial legislation. Second, a legislative intention to intrude into an exclusive federal sphere is neither necessary nor sufficient to scrutinize the applicability of provincial law. The intrusion, and not the intention to intrude, is determinative for division of powers purposes.

When ss. 133(1) and (3) operate in tandem, the contractor discharges its own liability to the Board, mediated through the legally compelled agency of the principal. This is not a scheme of joint and several liability, since the principal and the contractor are not joint co-debtors at the outset and since the Board does not have an unfettered choice as to which party to sue for recovery for outstanding fund payments. This provision, rather, is more accurately characterized as creating a form of involuntary, statutory suretyship.

While the contractor is potentially liable for two debts (the debt to the Board for the unpaid assessment and the potential debt to the principal if the principal pays the contractor's assessment) in a formal way, these in reality are one and the same as against the contractor. The contractor cannot be liable for both cumulatively. There is thus an inseparable nexus between the Board's claim against the contractor and the principal's potential claim against the contractor.

When s. 133(1) operates in combination with s. 133(3), the effect is to secure the claim of the Board against assets of the contractor. This is accomplished through the combined operation of the statutorily deemed debt imposed on the principal in the event of the contractor's default and the right of the principal to withhold and be indemnified from monies owing to the contractor. Thus, the combined effect of the deemed debt in s. 133(1) and set-off in s. 133(3) secures the Board's claim against the contractor's assets.

Parliament has recognized that the "law of set-off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt" (s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act). In the bankruptcy context, the law of set-off allows a debtor of a bankrupt who is also a creditor of the bankrupt to refrain from paying the full debt owing to the estate, since it may be that the estate will only fulfil a portion, if that, of the bankrupt's debt. But there is an inherent limit to this deference to the provincial law of set-off. While the operation of set-off is permitted to allow for the party claiming set-off to recover from the estate ahead of the stipulated order of his claim under the Bankruptcy Act, it most emphatically is not permitted to allow for the operation of provincial legislation to reorder the priorities of third parties against the estate.

The operation of s. 133 has the effect of reordering federal priorities with respect to the claims of any third parties against the estate. Prior to bankruptcy, the security device created by s. 133(3) and triggered by s. 133(1) is within the province's jurisdiction. However, if applicable in the event of bankruptcy, it would enter into conflict with the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act. Parliament has expressly indicated in s. 136(1)(h) that "all indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act" is to rank eighth in the list of preferred claims and is to be distributed after the claims of secured creditors. By contrast, the combined effect of ss. 133(1) and (3) of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, is to secure the Board's claim against the bankrupt's estate ahead of its priority under the Bankruptcy Act. The two laws in their operation give rise to different and inconsistent orders of priority and are thereby in conflict.

Section 133(4), which states that "[a]ll questions as to the right to and the amount of such indemnity shall be determined by the board", also has the effect of intruding into the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy. If allowed to apply in bankruptcy, this provision would have the effect of empowering a creditor of the estate (here the Board) to determine unilaterally the extent of its claim against the estate. As a result, the Board would be empowered to decide the size of the estate which is to remain available for the other secured, preferred and ordinary creditors. A province cannot empower a creditor of a bankrupt to determine the extent of a bankrupt's estate which is to be available for distribution. Thus, while otherwise perfectly valid provincial law, s. 133(4) is also inapplicable in the event of bankruptcy.

Section 133 is inapplicable, rather than inoperable, in bankruptcy for intruding into an exclusive federal sphere because bankruptcy is an exclusive federal domain within which provincial legislation does not apply, as distinguished from areas of joint or overlapping jurisdiction where federal legislation will prevail, rendering provincial legislation inoperable to the extent of any conflict. As bankruptcy is carved out from the domain of property and civil rights of which it is conceptually a part, valid provincial legislation of general application continues to apply in bankruptcy until Parliament legislates pursuant to its exclusive jurisdiction in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. At that point, provincial legislation which conflicts with federal law must yield to the extent of the conflict and it becomes inapplicable to that extent. Consistent with the presumption of constitutionality -- that the enacting body is presumed to have intended to enact provisions which do not transgress the limits of its constitutional powers -- the provincial law should be interpreted so as not to apply to the matter that is outside the jurisdiction of the enacting body.

Where federal and provincial legislation potentially conflict, it must be first determined whether the laws are respectively valid federal or provincial legislation. If so, the actual operation of the laws must be examined to determine whether they are in operational conflict, and if so, the federal legislation prevails and the provincial legislation is without effect to the extent of this conflict. If the operational conflict is in a field of exclusive federal jurisdiction, the provincial legislation will be inapplicable as being ultra vires to that extent. If the conflict is in an area of concurrent or overlapping jurisdictions, the provincial legislation will remain intra vires but be inoperative. To the extent that there is operational conflict, there is no room for an incidental or ancillary effect of provincial legislation. If, on the other hand, there is no operational conflict, then both laws continue to operate and both continue to have effect to the extent that operational conflict does not arise. Short of operational conflict, provincial law may validly have an effect on bankruptcy. A clear operational conflict existed here in that ss. 133(1) and (3) in their operation together entailed a reordering or subverting of the federal order of priorities under the Bankruptcy Act. Such an intrusion into an exclusive federal sphere necessarily goes far beyond an incidental and ancillary effect.

Since as outlined s. 133 has no application in the event of bankruptcy, a number of threshold factual questions need not be addressed.

Per Sopinka, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ. (dissenting): Sections 133(1) and (3) of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, are severable and should be considered separately. Both are valid even where the contractor is or becomes bankrupt.

The doctrine of paramountcy, which arises where there is clear operational conflict between valid federal and provincial legislation, requires that the provincial legislation be declared inoperational to the extent of the conflict. Conflict for purposes of paramountcy analysis is found when compliance with the enactment of one level of government entails defiance with that of the other. Courts in applying the paramountcy doctrine should be restrained and look for co-existence rather than conflict.

A review of the legislative history and purpose of workers' compensation statutes did not give any indication that s. 133 was enacted for the purpose of improving the ranking of the Board in a bankruptcy.

The quartet of cases dealing with the paramountcy of the Bankruptcy Act over provincial enactments which directly interfered with the scheme of priorities established by s. 136 of the Act (Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35; Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 785; Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061; British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24) should be given a narrow interpretation. The quartet stands for the position that only those provincial laws which directly improve the priority of a claim upon the actual property of the bankrupt over that accorded by the Bankruptcy Act are inoperative. The broader approach, which would find a province to be improperly attempting to alter the priorities of distribution any time provincial law affected the final result of a bankruptcy, would produce unacceptable results because it risks nullifying the broad array of provincial legislation underpinning the Bankruptcy Act.

Provincial law plays a critical role in defining both the number and type of participants in the bankruptcy process and the size of the bankrupt's estate. A bankruptcy priority is a category and its precise content can and does vary to some extent from one province to the next. Because the federal legislation already contemplates that provincial law will impact upon the bankruptcy process, the respondents must do more than simply show that s. 133 has an effect on a particular bankruptcy. They must demonstrate that s. 133 actually reorders the federally established priority scheme with regard to the property of the bankrupt by directly creating interests in that property.

Section 133(1) has nothing to do with the property of the bankrupt. It creates a strict in personam obligation from the principal owing to the Board. The property of the principal is in no way subject to the Bankruptcy Act. The bankrupt is not even involved. The provision simply creates a third-party guarantee by the principal that the contractor will pay its debts to the board. Section 133(1) only alters the Board's recovery by permitting it to recover from a non-bankrupt third-party. No direct conflict within the meaning of the quartet or of paramountcy doctrine more generally exists between s. 133(1) and the Bankruptcy Act. Nothing in the Bankruptcy Act precludes any creditor, even if specifically mentioned in s. 136, from pursuing its remedies against a third-party as well as or instead of proving a claim in bankruptcy. Section 133(1) does not involve property that is related to or part of the estate of the bankrupt and it is consequently not in operational conflict with the bankruptcy scheme. Section 136 encompasses a claim against the property of the bankrupt. The Board claim under s. 133(1) targets a solvent principal. The two provisions are co-extensive and complementary, not mutually exclusive.

Section 133(3) engages a more direct interference with the bankruptcy scheme than subs. (1) because, since it is the actual property of the bankrupt that is involved in the restitutionary claim launched by the principal, it constitutes the only linkage between the property of the principal and the estate of the bankrupt contractor.

Section 133(3) is merely declaratory of two different remedies existing at equity, set-off and indemnification. Set-off is the more intrusive of the two since it permits the principal to stand first in the priority scheme by taking away the property of the bankrupt before it enters the estate. A claim for indemnification would have only an ancillary effect on the bankrupt's estate since it only permits the principal to join the ranks of the unsecured creditors. Neither remedy is invalid as s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides that the law of set-off is to persist in bankruptcy, reconciles the priority scheme of the Act with the common law of set-off (and implicity, of indemnification), and the claims embodied in s. 133(3) are merely reflective of those common law causes of action. Absent s. 133(3), such a claim would exist according to the law of restitution or the law of contract. In terms of restitution, it is settled that a person may claim for recoupment or reimbursement of monies expended by that person under compulsion of law if the effect of such a payment is to discharge the liability of another.

Set-off, independent of s. 133(3), also arises from the contractual relationship. The contracts oblige the contractor to "comply with all laws" and indemnify the principal from any expense arising from the "negligent performance, purported performance or non-performance of the contract" by the contractors.

The fact that the property of the bankrupt has been assigned to the Bank and, thus, that the debt is no longer technically owed to Metal Fab but to the Bank of Montreal, does not militate against a finding that the law of set-off applies. Equitable set-off (unlike legal set-off) can operate within the context of an assignment. The only pre-requisite to set-off against the assignee is that the claim against the assignee is to arise out of the same contract or series of events which gave rise to the original claim or be closely connected with that contract or series of events.

Although s. 133 renders the principal and the contractor jointly and severally liable to the Board, as between the principal and contractor, the primary liability lies with the contractor and, consequently, the solicitation of contribution for payments made on behalf of that contractor by the principal is consonant with commercial fairness.

Section 133(1) is still fully applicable in cases where there is either no indebtedness between the principal and the contractor or insufficient indebtedness to cover the full liability involved. To this end, not only does s. 133(1) operate in isolation of the bankruptcy, it also operates independently from s. 133(3). Subsection (1) is the key feature of s. 133 as a whole. It aims at preserving the integrity of the Injury Fund. Section 133(3) is clearly secondary in this regard and s. 133(1) accordingly was not intended to operate solely in conjunction with s. 133(3). While s. 133(3) and the equitable rights it codifies might not be able to operate independently from s. 133(1), s. 133(1) can operate independently from s. 133(3).

1 GONTHIER J. -- I have had the benefit of the reasons of my colleague Justice Iacobucci. I respectfully disagree with his conclusion that s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1, is applicable in bankruptcy, and that provincial legislation can, through the operation of set-off in this manner, effectively reorder the priorities otherwise provided in the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3.

2 In my opinion, the combined effect of the deemed debt in s. 133(1) and set-off against property of the bankrupt in s. 133(3) is to secure the Workers' Compensation Board's (the Board) claim against the estate of the bankrupt. When ss. 133(1) and (3) operate in tandem as intended by the Legislature, the effect is that the Board's claim is satisfied with property of the bankrupt in the form of the monies withheld by the principal. The principal becomes nothing more than a conduit for transferring to the Board monies which form property of the bankrupt's estate. The end result is that the bankrupt's estate is diminished to the extent of the contractor's liability to the Board, and the Board is correspondingly enriched by an identical amount, thereby recovering its claim in full. On the other hand, the principal's estate or patrimony remains entirely unaffected. The Board's claim is thus secured against the bankrupt's estate, mediated through the legally compelled agency of the principal. In this way, the Board recovers against the estate ahead of the priority mandated by Parliament in s. 136(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act, creating an operational conflict.

3 Recourse to s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act, which incorporates by reference the provincial law of set-off, does not provide much assistance to the Board in this case. It is true that set-off itself may give rise to a reordering of priorities in bankruptcy in the limited sense that the party claiming set-off will secure his or her claim against the estate rather than recover under the priority otherwise provided by the Bankruptcy Act. This much is acknowledged by Parliament in enacting s. 97(3). However, the real question is the extent to which Parliament has deferred to the relevant provincial law. Here, Parliament has deferred to the extent of allowing the party claiming set-off to recover exceptionally ahead of his priority. But Parliament has not deferred to the extent of allowing third parties the same benefit as a result of the operation of provincial legislation. Set-off, in other words, is simply a defence to the payment of a debt, not a basis for validating statutory security devices which have the effect of securing the claims of third parties against the estate ahead of the priority stipulated by Parliament. The question is thus not whether the province has created a proprietary interest, but rather, it is whether that interest can have the effect of defeating the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act. Here, s. 133 not only gives a priority to the principal claiming set-off, which is permissible under s. 97(3), it also has the effect of securing the Board's claim against the estate, which most assuredly is impermissible. As a result, if s. 133 were applicable in bankruptcy, it would enter into conflict with the order of priorities required by the Bankruptcy Act. Consistent with the presumption of constitutionality, it is my opinion that s. 133 should be read down to the extent of the conflict; that is, s. 133 is inapplicable in bankruptcy. I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs throughout.

I. Background Facts, Relevant Legislation and the Courts Below

4 Since my colleague Iacobucci J. has helpfully summarized the relevant factual and legislative background together with the judgments of the courts below, I need not repeat that discussion. However, for reasons that will become apparent, it is important to reproduce the impugned provision, s. 133 of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, in its entirety:

133.—(1) Where a person, whether carrying on an industry included under this Act or not, in this section referred to as the principal, contracts with any other person, in this section referred to as the contractor, for the execution by or under the contractor of the whole or any part of any work for the principal, it is the duty of the principal to ensure that any sum that the contractor or any subcontractor is liable to contribute to the fund is paid and, where the principal fails to do so and the sum is not paid, he is personally liable to pay that sum to the board.

(2) The board shall have the same powers and be entitled to the same remedies for enforcing payment under subsection (1) that it possesses in respect of an assessment under this Act.

(3) Where the principal is liable to make payment to the board under subsection (1), he is entitled to be indemnified by any person who should have made the payment and is entitled to withhold, out of any indebtedness due to that person, a sufficient amount in respect of that indemnity.

(4) All questions as to the right to and the amount of such indemnity shall be determined by the board.

II. Issues on Appeal

5 The constitutional questions raised by this appeal were stated by the Chief Justice on September 14, 1994 as follows:

1 Where a contractor as referred to in s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1, is in bankruptcy and but for the bankruptcy, the principal as referred to in s. 133 would be liable to pay the assessment due by the contractor under the Act, is s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in whole or in part, by reason of being in conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, and in particular ss. 17(1), 67, 95, 136(1)(h), 148, 158(a) and 198(a) thereof?

2 Was s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in the circumstances of this case?

6 I agree with my colleague Iacobucci J. that the parties before this Court focused their arguments on the alleged conflict between s. 133 of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, and s. 136(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act. Certainly, that is the gravamen of this appeal. However, I respectfully disagree with Iacobucci J.'s restatement of the issues in the constitutional questions posed by the Chief Justice. Iacobucci J.'s reasons adopt the appellant's reformulation of the issues and examine the constitutional validity of ss. 133(1) and (3) separately. As will become apparent, in my view this manner of proceeding obscures the response to the constitutional questions. The question is not whether these provisions are independently valid, but rather, it is whether when combined they have the effect of reordering priorities in bankruptcy. When s. 133(1) is read together with s. 133(3), it is clear that the combined effect of the statutory deemed debt and the right to set-off against property of the bankrupt is to secure the Board's claim against the bankrupt's estate. In so doing, s. 133 read as a whole conflicts with Parliament's intention to accord the Board's claim the priority established in s. 136(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act.

III. Analysis

A. The Purposes of Federal Bankruptcy Legislation

7 At the outset, it is useful to remember that our bankruptcy system serves two distinct goals. The first is to ensure the equitable distribution of a bankrupt debtor's assets among the estate's creditors inter se. As one commentator has noted (Aleck Dadson, "Comment" (1986), 64 Can. Bar Rev. 755, at p. 755):

> Bankruptcy serves this goal by replacing a regime of individual action with a regime of collective action. While the pre-bankruptcy regime of individual action allows creditors to pursue their separate and competing claims to the debtor's assets, bankruptcy's regime of collective action sorts out those diverse claims and deals with the debtor's assets in a way which brings benefits to creditors as a group (reduced costs, increased recovery)....
> The collectivization of insolvency proceedings can only be achieved by denying to creditors the use of pre-bankruptcy remedies.

See also Peter W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), vol. 1, at p. 25-3. The second goal of the bankruptcy system is the financial rehabilitation of insolvent individuals (Dadson, supra, at p. 755). This goal is furthered through the opportunity for an insolvent individual's discharge from outstanding debts.

8 It has long been accepted that the first goal of ensuring an equitable distribution of a debtor's assets is to be pursued in accordance with the federal system of bankruptcy priorities. In the seminal case of Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue, [1928] A.C. 187, affirming 1926 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1926] S.C.R. 218, Viscount Cave L.C. confirmed that the exclusive federal power over bankruptcy and insolvency in s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867 enables Parliament to provide for the ranking of creditors in bankruptcy. He observed at p. 197:

In Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1894] A.C. 189, 200, Lord Herschell observed that a system of bankruptcy legislation might frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of the Act from being defeated, and added: "It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effect of executions and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the Provincial Legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the Provincial Legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament." Taking these observations as affording assistance in the construction of s. 91, head 21, of the Act of 1867, their Lordships are of the opinion that the exclusive authority thereby given to the Dominion Parliament to deal with all matters arising within the domain of bankruptcy and insolvency enables that Parliament to determine by legislation the relative priorities of creditors under a bankruptcy or an authorized assignment. [Emphasis added.]

9 The power to determine the priorities of distribution of the bankrupt's assets thus confirmed, Parliament has created an equitable distribution wherein the general rule is that creditors are to rank equally, with claims provable in bankruptcy being paid rateably (Bankruptcy Act, s. 141). The rule of creditor equality is subject to 10 classes of debt which are accorded priority in a stated order, the so-called list of "preferred" creditors (s. 136). Included in these classes of exceptions is "all indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act" in s. 136(1)(h), ranked eighth in the list. Lastly, the entire scheme of distribution is "[s]ubject to the rights of secured creditors" (s. 136) which, as Professor Hogg has noted, "enables secured creditors to realize their security as if there were no bankruptcy" (Hogg, supra, at p. 25-9).

B. The "Quartet" of Supreme Court Bankruptcy Decisions

10 In recent years, the constitutional relationship between the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act and various branches of provincial law governing property has received heightened scrutiny in the so-called "quartet" of decisions of this Court. Since my interpretation of the quartet differs from Iacobucci J.'s, I hope that I will be forgiven for re-canvassing that familiar terrain in order to explain the basis of my position.

(i) Overview of the Quartet

11 First, in Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35 (hereinafter Re Bourgault), the trustee in bankruptcy sought to cancel a privilege registered by the Quebec Deputy Minister of Revenue on the bankrupt's immovable property under the provincial Retail Sales Tax Act, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 71. The Quebec Deputy Minister of Revenue argued that the province was a "secured creditor" under s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, since the Quebec Retail Sales Tax Act provided that sums due to the Crown under the Act were "a privileged debt ranking immediately after law costs".

12 Writing for the majority, Pigeon J. rejected the priority claimed by the province. In so doing, he offered the following remarks on the interpretation of s. 107(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act (now s. 136(1)(j)) (at p. 44):

Accordingly, I find that the case turns upon the interpretation of para. 107(1)(j).... It is abundantly clear that this was intended to put on an equal footing all claims by Her Majesty in right of Canada or of a province except in cases where it was provided otherwise, namely, para. (c), the levy, and para. (h), workmen's compensation or unemployment insurance assessments and withholdings for income tax. Paragraph (j) ends with the following words, "notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary". The purpose of this part of the provision is obvious. Parliament intended to put all debts to a government on an equal footing; it therefore cannot have intended to allow provincial statutes to confer any higher priority. In my opinion, this is precisely what is being contended for when it is argued that, because the Quebec statute creates a privilege on immovable property effective from the date of registration, the Crown thereby becomes a "secured creditor" and thus escapes the effect of the provision which gives it only a lower priority. [Emphasis in original.]

Pigeon J. later concluded at p. 46:

If the contention of the Deputy Minister of Revenue in the case at bar was upheld, it would mean that the Quebec tax collector, provided his privilege was registered before the bankruptcy, would obtain a special preference on the proceeds of the sale of the immovable property in question, instead of having only the pari passu priority contemplated in the scheme of distribution established by the Bankruptcy Act. In my opinion, such result would be contrary to the intent of Parliament and no imperfection in drafting could justify it.

13 This Court confirmed and extended this approach to the relationship between the Bankruptcy Act and provincial law in Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 785. Section 78(4)(a) of the Alberta Workers' Compensation Act, S.A. 1973, c. 87, provided that the provincial Workers' Compensation Board retained a "charge upon the property or proceeds of property of the employer" for unpaid assessments under the Act. The question before the Court was whether this provision rendered the Board a secured creditor of the bankrupt employer for the purposes of the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act which subjected the list of preferred claims "to the rights of secured creditors", or whether the Board's claim was postponed to s. 107(1)(h) which expressly addressed "all indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act".

14 A majority of the Court ruled that the Board was not a secured creditor and could only recover under s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act. Speaking for the majority on this point, Wilson J. cited approvingly (at pp. 804-5) the following remarks of Jones J.A. in Director of Labour Standards of Nova Scotia and Workers' Compensation Board of Nova Scotia v. Trustee in Bankruptcy (1981), 38 C.B.R. (N.S.) 253 (N.S.C.A.), at p. 260, on the ratio of the Re Bourgault decision:

Mr. Justice Pigeon made it abundantly clear that priorities of provincial claims must be determined in accordance with s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary. Debts under the Workers' Compensation Act fall under s. 107(1)(h) of the Act. Claims for wages are governed by s. 107(1)(d). With deference, it is not open to the province to provide any higher or more extensive priority for wages in view of the express provisions contained in that clause. It is clear from [Re Bourgault] that the provincial Crown cannot claim as a secured creditor under the Bankruptcy Act, notwithstanding the form of the provincial legislation, where the claim is governed by s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. [Emphasis added.]

15 In the same vein, Wilson J. later added the following important comments at p. 806:

With respect, the issue in Re Bourgault and Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. was not whether a proprietary interest has been created under the relevant provincial legislation. It was whether provincial legislation, even if it did create a proprietary interest, could defeat the scheme of distribution under s. 107(1) [now s. 136(1)] of the Bankruptcy Act. These cases held that it could not, that while the provincial legislation could validly secure debts on the property of the debtor in a non-bankruptcy situation, once bankruptcy occurred s. 107(1) determined the status and priority of the claims specifically dealt with in the section. It was not open to the claimant in bankruptcy to say: By virtue of the applicable provincial legislation I am a secured creditor within the meaning of the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and therefore the priority accorded my claim under the relevant paragraph of s. 107(1) does not apply to me.... [This position] cannot be supported as a matter of statutory interpretation of s. 107(1) since, if the section were to be read in this way, it would have the effect of permitting the provinces to determine priorities on a bankruptcy, a matter within exclusive federal jurisdiction.

16 Having concluded that the case was governed by Re Bourgault, the majority of the Court considered the question of the appropriate response to the constitutional question: Was the provincial legislation inapplicable or inoperative? Wilson J. (McIntyre J. and Lamer J. (as he then was) concurring) noted that by virtue of the presumption of constitutionality, a province should be presumed to be legislating within its competence rather than outside it. As a result, she concluded that there was no conflict between s. 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act and s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act since the former should be construed or read down as simply having no application in the event of bankruptcy (p. 808). By contrast, Chouinard J. (Dickson J. (as he then was) and Beetz J. concurring) agreed with the body of Wilson J.'s reasons but ruled that s. 78(4) was inoperative in the event of bankruptcy since it conflicted with s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act (pp. 788-89).

17 This Court's decision in Deloitte Haskins is thus "significant because it confirms that any statutory lien conferred by a province on creditors listed in [s. 136] will nonetheless be inoperative [or inapplicable] in bankruptcy proceedings" (Dadson, supra, at p. 758).

18 The third decision in the bankruptcy quartet is Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061 (FBDB). Subject to certain restrictions, s. 49(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3 (now s. 69(2)), entitled a secured creditor to "realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed". The question before the Court was whether federal or provincial law determined the order of priorities of distribution when a secured creditor availed himself of s. 49(2) to liquidate his security outside of the bankruptcy proceedings. Interestingly, the provincial security interest was a privilege registered on the debtor's immovable property by the Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail under s. 110(1) of the Quebec Workmen's Compensation Act, R.S.Q. 1977, c. A-3, which ranked its privilege as a claim "ranking immediately after law costs without registration".

19 Speaking for the Court, Lamer J. noted at p. 1066 that this provincial legislation was in direct conflict with the Bankruptcy Act:

If the provincial law rules prevail, respondent is a secured creditor and its debt ranks before that of the trustee. If on the other hand the Bankruptcy Act has priority, the scheme of distribution set out in s. 107 of the Act determines the priority ranking. According to the decision of this Court in Deloitte, supra, respondent would then lose the benefit of its privilege and become merely a preferred creditor, since its claim is dealt with by s. 107(1)(h)....

20 After concluding that the immovable property remained "property of the bankrupt" within the meaning of s. 47 (now s. 67) of the Bankruptcy Act notwithstanding its seizure by the bankrupt's trustee and mandatary (p. 1068), Lamer J. stated at p. 1069:

The issue then is to determine what legislation, provincial or federal, applies here. A problem of the same type came before this Court in Re Bourgault and Deloitte, supra. In Re Bourgault, this Court held that in a bankruptcy matter s. 107(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act determines the priority of any claim covered by that provision. A provincial statute cannot override the scheme of distribution set out in s. 107 of the Act. To borrow the words of Pigeon J. (at p. 44), "Parliament intended to put all debts to a government on an equal footing; it therefore cannot have intended to allow provincial statutes to confer any higher priority". Similarly, the majority of the Court in Deloitte held that a creditor who holds a privilege under a provincial statute cannot claim the status of a secured creditor within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act so as to avoid the order of distribution of s. 107 of the Act. In the event of bankruptcy, priorities are exclusively a matter for federal jurisdiction. [Emphasis added.]

21 It is important to stress that the respondent in FBDB sought to distinguish the Court's earlier decisions of Re Bourgault and Deloitte Haskins. Lamer J. stated the respondent's argument thus (at p. 1070):

... respondent is arguing that, as the hypothecated property was liquidated outside the bankruptcy proceeding, without involvement by the trustee in bankruptcy, the solution must be sought not in federal but in Quebec law. Respondent added that, as the trustee chose to realize his security himself outside the bankruptcy, he must bear the consequences of that choice and accept the order of collocation determined by provincial statutes.

But the Court rejected this attempt to circumvent the order of priorities required by the Bankruptcy Act. Lamer J. ruled at p. 1071:

... I feel that the decisions in Re Bourgault and Deloitte are conclusive as to the fate of the appeal. These cases stand for the following proposition: in a bankruptcy matter, it is the Bankruptcy Act which must be applied. If a bankruptcy occurs, the order of priority is determined by the ranking in s. 107 of the Act, and any debt mentioned in that provision must therefore be given the specified priority. [Emphasis added.]

22 As a result, Lamer J. classified the respondent as a preferred creditor in s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act. He accepted, at p. 1072, that this result might encourage secured creditors "to bring about the bankruptcy of their debtor in order to improve their title". Nevertheless, he was mindful that "this solution has obvious advantages". As he explained at p. 1072:

As soon as the bankruptcy occurs the Bankruptcy Act will be applied: the mere fact that a creditor is mentioned in s. 107 of the Act suffices for such creditor to be ranked as a preferred creditor and in the position indicated in that provision. As provincial statutes cannot affect the priorities created by the federal statute, consistency in the order of priority in bankruptcy situations is ensured from one province to another. [Emphasis added.]

23 Finally, in British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24, at issue was whether the deemed statutory trust created by s. 18 of the British Columbia Social Service Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 388, in favour of the province for provincial sales tax collected was a valid trust within the meaning of s. 47(a) (now s. 67(a)) of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 47(a) exempted "property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person" from "[t]he property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors". A majority of the Court ruled that this deemed statutory trust was not a valid trust. Instead, the province's claim for the monies collected under the purported trust was really a Crown preferred claim under s. 107(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act, which covered "claims of the Crown ... in right of Canada or of any province".

24 Speaking for the majority, McLachlin J. noted at p. 30 that the impugned deemed statutory trust lacked the essential attributes of a trust under general principles of trust law, namely the possibility of being identified and traced. She stated at p. 33:

To interpret s. 47(a) as applying not only to trusts as defined by the general law, but to statutory trusts created by the provinces lacking the common law attributes of trusts, would be to permit the provinces to create their own priorities under the Bankruptcy Act and to invite a differential scheme of distribution on bankruptcy from province to province.

25 Significantly, McLachlin J. also stated, at pp. 33-34, the Court's preference for an interpretation of s. 47(a) consistent with "the clear intention of Parliament, in enacting the Bankruptcy Act, of setting up a clear and orderly scheme for the distribution of the bankrupt's assets".

26 Moving to the nature of the legal interests created by s. 18 of the Social Service Tax Act, McLachlin J. noted at p. 34 that at the moment of collection the "trust property is identifiable and the trust meets the requirements for a trust under the principles of trust law". However, she was cautious to note that the trust monies are soon mingled with other money in the hands of the merchant and converted to other property, and as a result they could not be traced. She observed at p. 34:

... as the presence of the deeming provision tacitly acknowledges, the reality is that after conversion the statutory trust bears little resemblance to a true trust. There is no property which can be regarded as being impressed with a trust.

Because of this, s. 18(2) goes on to provide that the unpaid tax forms a lien and charge on the entire assets of the collector, an interest in the nature of a secured debt. [Emphasis added.]

McLachlin J. was thus at pains to stress that the reality of the property interest created by the province ought to govern over the form, and as a result the province's claim necessarily failed.

27 McLachlin J. also addressed the province's contention that it remained sovereign over the definition of what constitutes a trust. She made the following important observations at p. 35:

The province ... argues that it is open to it to define "trust" however it pleases, property and civil rights being matters within provincial competence. The short answer to this submission is that the definition of "trust" which is operative for purposes of exemption under the Bankruptcy Act must be that of the federal Parliament, not the provincial legislatures. The provinces may define "trust" as they choose for matters within their own legislative competence, but they cannot dictate to Parliament how it should be defined for purposes of the Bankruptcy Act: Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board. [Emphasis added.]

28 As a result, McLachlin J. ruled that the provincial legislation was inapplicable in bankruptcy and that the province's claim was governed by s. 107(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act.

(ii) The Principles and Philosophy Embodied in the Quartet

29 What principles should be distilled from the quartet? The intervener Attorney General for Saskatchewan suggested that there are two possible interpretations of these decisions: what it called a broader "bottom line" approach which posits that "any time provincial law affects the final result of a bankruptcy, the province is improperly attempting to alter the priorities of distribution"; and a narrower "jump the queue" approach to the effect that "the province cannot attempt to alter the position of a person within the scheme of distribution created by Parliament, vis à vis the other creditors who are claiming from the bankrupt's estate".

30 My colleague Iacobucci J. properly rejects the broader "bottom line" approach since, as he indicates, such an approach "risks nullifying the broad array of provincial legislation underpinning the Bankruptcy Act" (para. 142). It is trite to observe that the Bankruptcy Act is contingent on the provincial law of property for its operation. The Act is superimposed on those provincial schemes when a debtor declares bankruptcy. As a result, provincial law necessarily affects the "bottom line", but this is contemplated by the Bankruptcy Act itself. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that there is no "bottom line" without provincial law. The "bottom line" approach is therefore not the appropriate characterization of the quartet.

31 However, even rejecting the simplistic "bottom line" approach, I do not agree that the quartet stands for the sole proposition that the provinces cannot "jump the queue". In my opinion, the quartet embodies a consistent and general philosophy as to the purposes of the federal system of bankruptcy and its relation to provincial property arrangements. That philosophy cannot be captured in the pithy but limited proposition that the provinces cannot "jump the queue".

32 The quartet is better stated, in my view, as standing for a number of related propositions which are themselves part of a consistent philosophy. In their lucid and thorough study of the quartet, "The Conflict Between Canadian Provincial Personal Property Security Acts and the Federal Bankruptcy Act: The War is Over" (1992), 71 Can. Bar Rev. 77, at pp. 78-79, Andrew J. Roman and M. Jasmine Sweatman state that the quartet stands for the following four propositions:

(1)provinces cannot create priorities between creditors or change the scheme of distribution on bankruptcy under s. 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act;

(2)while provincial legislation may validly affect priorities in a non-bankruptcy situation, once bankruptcy has occurred section 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act determines the status and priority of the claims specifically dealt with in that section;

(3)if the provinces could create their own priorities or affect priorities under the Bankruptcy Act this would invite a different scheme of distribution on bankruptcy from province to province, an unacceptable situation; and

(4)the definition of terms such as "secured creditor", if defined under the Bankruptcy Act, must be interpreted in bankruptcy cases as defined by the federal Parliament, not the provincial legislatures. Provinces cannot affect how such terms are defined for purposes of the Bankruptcy Act.

33 See also for concurrence with Roman and Sweatman's general conclusions drawn from the quartet, Jacob S. Ziegel, "Personal Property Security and Bankruptcy: There is no War! -- A Reply to Roman and Sweatman" (1993), 72 Can. Bar Rev. 44, at p. 45.

34 My colleague Iacobucci J. states at para. 141 that the quartet "stands for the position that only those provincial laws which directly improve the priority of a claim upon the actual property of the bankrupt over that accorded by the Bankruptcy Act are inoperative" (emphasis added). This statement falls within Roman and Sweatman's proposition 1. However, as my summary of those cases has hopefully indicated, the quartet is clearly not limited to provincial "laws which directly improve the priority of a claim". To quote Roman and Sweatman, supra, at p. 78:

... the reasoning in [the quartet] is not limited to trusts, nor to situations of colourable legislation attempting to give an artificial preference to government. Rather, these rulings are broad enough to encompass any potential area of conflict between provincial power to legislate in the area of property and civil rights, and exclusive federal jurisdiction over bankruptcy and insolvency.

In a similar vein these authors add at p. 81:

The Supreme Court of Canada's quartet of decisions, although dealing with provincial statutory trusts which affected priorities in bankruptcy, has progressively and finally provided a definite ruling on the relationship between priorities under the Bankruptcy Act and any other provincial statute which directly or indirectly affects priorities. [Emphasis in original.]

Importantly, they conclude at p. 105:

The law, in our opinion, is settled by these four judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada. In all four cases the issues were not whether the provinces could directly and blatantly attempt to alter the scheme of interests of secured and other creditors under what is now section 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. Rather, the issue was whether a province could indirectly influence priorities under the Bankruptcy Act. Even in this weaker version of influence, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that the provinces could not.

And in so concluding, they are also quick to caution at p. 106:

It is also incorrect to state that in all four cases the provinces attempted to redistribute or change priorities by explicitly elevating one of the lower ranked claims to a higher rank. As seen from an examination of the dissenting judgments in Deloitte Haskins and Henfrey, the provinces were not attempting specifically to target the bankruptcy situation but, rather, to create a general priority.

35 As a result, the "jump the queue" or "directly improve bankruptcy priorities" approach captures only part of the reasoning of the quartet. As Roman and Sweatman noted, in the Deloitte Haskins and Henfrey Samson cases, for example, the provinces were not directly or intentionally attempting to influence bankruptcy priorities. Rather, the provinces enacted laws of general application which sought to create a general priority not necessarily targeted to bankruptcy, but which had the effect of altering bankruptcy priorities. This Court nevertheless ruled that such provincial laws were inapplicable in the event of bankruptcy.

36 I underline that the "effect" which Roman and Sweatman speak of is the effect on bankruptcy priorities (Roman and Sweatman, supra, at pp. 81-105). Consequently, clear conflict, that is an inconsistent or mutually exclusive result, which in this case entails a reordering of federal priorities, is necessary in order to declare a provincial law to be inapplicable in bankruptcy.

37 I also think it is important to emphasize the importance of Roman and Sweatman's proposition 3. While I agree with my colleague Iacobucci J. that complete standardization of the distribution of property in bankruptcies is not possible across Canada having regard to the diversity of provincial laws relating to property and civil rights, yet the value of a national bankruptcy system is confirmed by the placing of bankruptcy under exclusive federal jurisdiction. As Professor Hogg has explained (supra, at pp. 25-1 and 25-2):

... debtors may move from one province to another, and may have property and creditors in more than one province. A national body of law is required to ensure that all of a debtor's property is available to satisfy his debts, that all creditors are fairly treated, and that all are bound by any arrangements for the settlement of the debtor's debts. Indeed, without these assurances, lenders would be reluctant to extend credit to persons who could evade their obligations simply by removing themselves or their assets across a provincial boundary.

Furthermore, as my overview of the quartet hopefully indicated, the goal of maintaining a nationally homogeneous system of bankruptcy priorities has properly been a constant concern of this Court. Were the situation otherwise, "Canada [would] have a balkanized bankruptcy regime which [would] diminish the significance of the exclusivity of federal jurisdiction over bankruptcy and insolvency.... Otherwise there could be a different scheme in every jurisdiction; ten different bankruptcy regimes would make ordinary commercial affairs extremely complex, unwieldy and costly, not only for Canadians but also for our international trading partners" (Roman and Sweatman, supra, at pp. 80 and 104). This is a prospect which this Court has been acutely mindful of in the past, and its vigilance has ensured the continuing vitality of our nation's bankruptcy legislation. In my view, its past vigilance commends itself to the present and, barring an amendment to s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867, also to the future.

38 In this regard, I agree with Iacobucci J., at para. 147, that a bankruptcy priority is a category, and also that provincial law may result in the content of such categories being different from province to province. However, provincial law does not and cannot define the content of bankruptcy priorities or categories without limitation. Indeed, crucial limitation is imposed by the order of priorities in the Bankruptcy Act itself. Thus, while individual provinces can define and rank categories such as "secured creditor" and "trust" as they each have their own purposes, those provincial laws which enter into conflict with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are simply without application in bankruptcy. Such, indeed, was this Court's unequivocal holding in Re Bourgault, Deloitte Haskins, and FBDB with respect to "secured creditors" and in Henfrey Samson with respect to "trusts".

39 Finally, I would observe that while in agreement with the above four propositions as embodying the reasoning of the quartet, in my view the list would be more complete with the addition of a fifth and sixth, as follows:

(5)in determining the relationship between provincial legislation and the Bankruptcy Act, the form of the provincial interest created must not be allowed to triumph over its substance. The provinces are not entitled to do indirectly what they are prohibited from doing directly;

(6)there need not be any provincial intention to intrude into the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy and to conflict with the order of priorities of the Bankruptcy Act in order to render the provincial law inapplicable. It is sufficient that the effect of provincial legislation is to do so.

40 I would hope that these propositions need little if any explanation or defence. They are clearly important principles at work in McLachlin J.'s reasons for the majority of the Court in Henfrey Samson in concluding that while the province was clearly entitled to define "trust" as it chose for the purposes of provincial law, the substance of the interest created was what was really relevant for the purpose of applying the Bankruptcy Act. Furthermore, there was no suggestion in that case that the province intended to subvert the scheme of distribution of the Bankruptcy Act. Instead, it had simply enacted a valid law of general application pursuant to its exclusive jurisdiction in relation to property and civil rights in the province, and was attempting to give itself a general priority with respect to collected but unpaid sales tax revenues. The Court ruled that the legislation was only inapplicable upon the occurrence of bankruptcy, because it was then that, if it had been applicable, it would have had the effect of conflicting with the scheme of distribution of the Bankruptcy Act.

41 What is more, these fifth and sixth propositions bear a close family resemblance to the doctrine of colourability. In describing the colourability doctrine, Professor Hogg has observed (supra, at p. 15-17):

The courts are, of course, concerned with the substance of the legislation to be characterized and not merely its form. The "colourability" doctrine is invoked when a statute bears the formal trappings of a matter within jurisdiction, but in reality is addressed to a matter outside jurisdiction.

See also R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at pp. 496-97, per Sopinka J. for the Court. The concern raised by colourable legislation has also been phrased thus: "it is a very familiar principle that you cannot do that indirectly which you are prohibited from doing directly" (Madden v. Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Co., [1899] A.C. 626 (P.C.), at pp. 627-28; see also Laskin's Canadian Constitutional Law (5th ed. 1986), vol. 1, at p. 310).

42 There are, however, two fundamental differences between the doctrine of colourability and the above propositions 5 and 6. First, the doctrine of colourability is a concept which is only applicable in assessing the threshold question of the validity of the impugned legislation, which is to say, its pith and substance. The above propositions, by contrast, continue to apply after having determined the validity of the impugned provincial law when assessing its applicability in the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy (see Hogg, supra, at p. 15-25). In the case at bar, it has been accepted that the provincial law is valid within its sphere; the question is as to its applicability outside its sphere, when it intrudes into the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy and conflicts with federal bankruptcy legislation.

43 In light of this distinction, it will be evident that none of the quartet cases were concerned with colourable provincial legislation. There was no question as to the validity of the impugned legislation in any of the quartet. Those cases are devoid of any suggestion that the impugned laws were anything other than provincial laws of general application, and thus validly enacted laws under the provinces' exclusive jurisdiction in relation to property and civil rights. Instead, those cases were only concerned with the applicability of provincial laws in bankruptcy, not their validity.

44 This last observation is also an important additional reason why I respectfully believe that it is inaccurate to interpret the quartet as only prohibiting legislation which "directly improves the priority of a claim". Such a characterization suggests that the quartet was concerned with the validity of the impugned laws. However, if the provinces had been attempting to improve the priority of their claims in bankruptcy directly, presumably this Court would simply have declared their laws to be ultra vires and invalid for being in relation to an exclusive federal matter, and no question of applicability or operability would ever have arisen.

45 The second crucial distinction between the doctrine of colourability and the above propositions 5 and 6 is that the doctrine of colourability often connotes a legislative intention to intrude into an exclusive federal sphere (see Elizabeth Edinger, "Comment" (1985), 63 Can. Bar Rev. 203, at pp. 206-11, and Albert S. Abel, "The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at p. 494). But even without such an intention, provincial legislation can quite evidently have the effect of trespassing onto an exclusive federal domain, and would thus be equally subject to an examination as to its applicability in the federal sphere. Were the situation otherwise, our constitutional law would countenance the absurd situation that valid provincial legislation of general application which entered into clear conflict with a valid federal law promulgated in an exclusive federal sphere would be exempt from constitutional challenge. In short, a legislative intention to intrude into an exclusive federal sphere is neither necessary nor sufficient to scrutinize the applicability of provincial law. It is the fact of intrusion, and not the intention to intrude, which is determinative for division of powers purposes.

46 As a result, the inquiry in the case at bar must be limited to assessing whether, if applied in bankruptcy, the effect of s. 133 of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, would be to conflict with the scheme of distribution in the Bankruptcy Act. It is this question which I now address.

C. Application of the Quartet to Section 133 of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979

(i) The Nature of the Legal Interest Created by Section 133

47 As I indicated earlier, it is important to examine the operation of s. 133 as a whole in order to address the issue raised in this appeal. This provision creates a curious scheme of liability. Section 133(1) imposes a duty on a principal to ensure that its contractor pays into the Workers' Compensation fund, and declares the principal absolutely liable for those payments in the event of the contractor's default. Using the language of the Civil Law, one might say that the principal (or owner) is under an obligation of diligence or means to ensure that the contractor makes its payments, and in the event of the contractor's default the principal is under an obligation of guarantee to the Board for those payments (see Paul-André Crépeau, L'intensité de l'obligation juridique ou des obligations de diligence, de résultat et de garantie (1989), at pp. 8-14). Section 133(3) then entitles the principal to withhold and indemnify itself from any funds owing to the contractor if the principal is deemed liable for the contractor's debt to the Board. In other words, it entitles a principal to set off against monies owing to the contractor the principal's claim for having paid the contractor's assessments. Finally, s. 133(4) empowers the Board to determine all questions as to the right and amount of the principal's indemnity for discharging the contractor's obligation.

48 In essence, under this scheme the principal is the surety or guarantor of the contractor's obligation, with the right and extent of the principal's indemnification from the withheld funds being determined by the provincial Workers' Compensation Board. It is abundantly clear that it is the contractor's obligation which is primarily in issue, since s. 133(3) entitles the principal to be indemnified "by any person who should have made the payment" (emphasis added).

49 Furthermore, when ss. 133(1) and (3) operate in tandem as intended by this legislation, the principal's right to withhold and be indemnified from monies owing to the contractor in the event that the principal is deemed responsible for the contractor's liability means that the principal will ultimately not be responsible for that liability. Instead, the debt to the Board is effectively discharged with property of the contractor when the principal exercises its right of set-off. Differently put, when ss. 133(1) and (3) operate together, the principal is no worse off after having acted as the contractor's surety. The principal's estate or, to use Civil Law terminology, its patrimony remains entirely unaffected even after discharging its "personal" liability to the Board. As a result of the principal's right of set-off against monies owing to the contractor, it is the contractor's estate or patrimony which is diminished to the extent of the assessments owing to the Board. The reality of this scheme, then, is that the contractor discharges its own liability to the Board, mediated through the legally compelled agency of the principal.

50 I would add that this is not a scheme of joint and several liability, since the principal and the contractor are not joint co-debtors at the outset. Nor does the Board have an unfettered choice as to which party to sue for recovery for outstanding fund payments, as it would if the principal and contractor were jointly and severally liable for the assessments. (See, for the accepted definitions of joint and several liability: Gerald H. L. Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada (1990), vol. 2, at pp. 350-51; Glanville L. Williams, Joint Torts and Contributory Negligence (1951), at pp. 49-50; County of Parkland No. 31 v. Stetar, 1974 CanLII 198 (SCC), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 884, at p. 899 (per Dickson J. as he then was).) Instead, upon default a personal liability of the principal is created for the amount owed by the contractor. As a result, the principal is compelled by statute to act as the surety for the contractor's obligation to the Board. I therefore believe that it is more accurate to characterize this provision as creating a form of involuntary, statutory suretyship. It is of course arguable that when the Board deems the principal liable for the contractor's default, they are jointly and severally liable for the assessment, even though the provision does not so specify expressly. But even this would only be an incident of the statutory suretyship in s. 133.

51 It is also clear that while formally the contractor is potentially liable for two debts, namely the debt to the Board for the unpaid assessment and the potential debt to the principal if the principal pays the contractor's assessment, the reality is that these are one and the same as against the contractor. The contractor cannot be liable for both cumulatively. There is thus an inseparable nexus between the Board's claim against the contractor and the principal's potential claim against the contractor. This point was well stated by Swinfen Eady L.J. in discussing the nature of suretyship in Re Melton; Milk v. Towers, [1918] 1 Ch. 37, at pp. 47-48, followed in Re Coughlin & Co. (1923), 4 C.B.R. 294, at p. 300 (Man. C.A.):

> It may well be that technically there are two claims against the debtor in respect of the transaction and two separate liabilities of the debtor arising out of the transaction. One of these is the debtor's liability to the bank for the money that he owed. The other, which is a separate liability arising out of the contract of guarantee, is the debtor's liability to indemnify the sureties in respect of their liability to the principal creditor. Technically, they are two separate liabilities, but in substance they are the same; and in respect of that liability there could not be a double proof against the estate. [Emphasis added.]

52 As a result, in light of the wording of s. 133 creating a form of involuntary suretyship, I would respectfully qualify Iacobucci J.'s characterization of this provision as imposing joint and several liability on the principal and the contractor for the unpaid assessments (see paras. 129, 183, 184).

53 With these preliminary remarks on the structure of the scheme of liability in s. 133 in mind, it is clear that when s. 133(1) operates in combination with s. 133(3), the effect is to secure the claim of the Board against assets of the contractor. This is accomplished through the combined operation of the statutory deemed debt imposed on the principal in the event of the contractor's default and the right of the principal to withhold and be indemnified from monies owing to the contractor. Thus, the combined effect of the deemed debt in s. 133(1) and set-off in s. 133(3) secures the Board's claim against the contractor's assets.

54 Read in this way, s. 133 creates a straightforward security device. This device secures the claim of the Board. When s. 133(1) operates in tandem with s. 133(3), the principal becomes nothing more than a conduit for transferring to the Board monies which are otherwise owed to the contractor. In other words, the principal essentially transfers an asset of the contractor (i.e., monies owing from the principal to the contractor) to the Board. This is because it is the contractor's liability for unpaid assessments which is imposed on the principal, and the contractor's monies which are withheld as security in order to be paid to the Board for the contractor's default. While s. 133(1) speaks of the principal's personal liability in the event of the contractor's default, the reality of the matter is that it is the contractor who is still liable, since as a result of s. 133(3) monies owing to the contractor are used to satisfy the debt owing to the Board. The contractor's patrimony is diminished to the extent of the liability to the Board for the unpaid assessment, whereas the size of the principal's patrimony remains unaffected. The net effect is thus that the contractor's liability is discharged out of its own property, and not from any property of the principal. The exercise of set-off, triggered by the deemed debt, thus has the effect of securing the Board's claim against the contractor's assets.

(ii) Does Section 133 Apply in Bankruptcy?

55 It is apparent that it is the set-off component of this device, s. 133(3), which effects a security interest in property of the contractor. But the right to set-off is triggered -- and thus the security interest created -- by the Board when it decides to create a deemed debt and impose liability on the principal for the contractor's liability. This right is, of course, perfectly valid outside of bankruptcy. The question is whether it continues to apply or operate in bankruptcy. In order to answer this question, a few words about the operation of set-off in bankruptcy are in order.

(a) The Operation of Set-Off in Bankruptcy

56 In Lister v. Hooson, [1908] 1 K.B. 174 (C.A.), Fletcher Moulton L.J. stated what has become one of the most accepted rationales for allowing set-off in bankruptcy (at p. 178):

> The right of set-off in bankruptcy has been dealt with by various statutes, but takes its origin from the fact that the jurisdiction in bankruptcy was from the first an equitable jurisdiction. The successive statutory formulations of the consequence of this principle, embodied in the clauses as to mutual credit, dealings, &c., have never altered this fundamental principle, and, speaking for myself, I cannot see any ground why in the present instance the injustice should be perpetrated of making a person who in the balance is not a debtor to the estate pay in full the sum due to the estate and receive only a dividend on the sums due from the estate.

(See also Fredericton Co-operative Ltd. v. Smith (1921), 2 C.B.R. 154 (N.B.K.B.), at pp. 157-58; Atlantic Acceptance Corp. v. Burns & Dutton Construction (1962) Ltd. (1970), 14 D.L.R. (3d) 175 (Alta. C.A.), at p. 184; and, for a particularly thorough and helpful discussion of the issues relating to set-off in bankruptcy and insolvency, see Kelly R. Palmer, The Law of Set-Off in Canada (1993), at pp. 157-223.)

57 In the bankruptcy context, a right to set-off necessarily has the effect of securing the claim of the party claiming set-off against assets of the bankrupt's estate. This was recently recognized in unambiguous terms by Lord Hoffman in his speech for the unanimous House of Lords in Stein v. Blake, [1995] 2 All E.R. 961. His Lordship stated at p. 964:

> Bankruptcy set-off ... affects the substantive rights of the parties by enabling the bankrupt's creditor to use his indebtedness to the bankrupt as a form of security. Instead of having to prove with other creditors for the whole of his debt in the bankruptcy, he can set off pound for pound what he owes the bankrupt and prove for or pay only the balance.

58 The security character of set-off is also borne out in several academic authorities. John A. M. Judge and Margaret E. Grottenthaler note in their article "Legal and Equitable Set-Offs" (1991), 70 Can. Bar Rev. 91, in discussing equitable set-off, which alone operates in the context of an assignment (at p. 92):

> The application of equitable set-off answers, in whole or in part, the plaintiff's claim. In this sense it has a self-help remedial aspect. Because equitable set-off applies as against an assignee, a security interest is effectively created in favour of the defendant which takes priority over the claim of the assignee. [Emphasis added.]

They later add (at p. 117):

If successful on his equitable set-off, the defendant's claim will be paid in full, or at least to the extent of the plaintiff's claim. Therefore, equitable set-off in effect gives an unsecured defendant priority over all secured and unsecured creditors.

Similarly, Palmer notes (supra, at p. 204):

... by allowing set-off to operate in a bankruptcy, an otherwise unsecured creditor can obtain a secured status and so can be paid the full value of the debt owed by the bankrupt before the general distribution of the estate to unsecured creditors.

Palmer also observes that the operation of set-off has been described as creating a "quasi-lien" against the cross-demand of the estate (Palmer, supra, at p. 206). The operation of set-off in bankruptcy can therefore be said to confer on the party claiming set-off a security interest or "quasi-lien" against assets of the bankrupt's estate.

59 Indeed, as a result of creating a type of security interest in the estate, the operation of set-off in bankruptcy has been the subject of academic criticism: see Palmer, supra, at pp. 204-7; Judge and Grottenthaler, supra, at p. 117; John C. McCoid, "Setoff: Why Bankruptcy Priority?" (1989), 75 Va. L. Rev. 15, and for counterpoint, Philip T. Lacy, "Setoff and the Principle of Creditor Equality" (1992), 43 S. Cal. L. Rev. 951. The central criticism has been that while outside of bankruptcy set-off strikes a fair balance between two parties with mutual obligations, in bankruptcy the material inquiry should be the rights of the estate's creditors inter se. An inquiry which considers the rights of creditors inter se must necessarily consider a broader range of interests than an inquiry limited to ensuring fairness between only two parties (McCoid, supra, at p. 43). Thus, allowing set-off in bankruptcy has been considered as unfairly limiting the class of relevant interests. The concern has also been voiced that allowing set-off in bankruptcy (Judge and Grottenthaler, supra, at p. 117):

... is disruptive of a complex and sophisticated system developed for establishing priorities amongst creditors of various types, particularly where registration of a secured interest is required.

This second concern is thus to the effect that allowing set-off gives a claimant the benefit of a security interest without imposing the important concomitant obligation of registering that interest.

60 While this academic debate is undoubtedly interesting, the fact remains that our Parliament has recognized in s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act that the "law of set-off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt". As a result, in the bankruptcy context, the law of set-off allows a debtor of a bankrupt who is also a creditor of the bankrupt to refrain from paying the full debt owing to the estate, since it may be that the estate will only fulfil a portion, if that, of the bankrupt's debt. Consequently, in this limited sense the party claiming set-off has Parliament's blessing for the "reordering" of his priority in bankruptcy by virtue of the operation of the law of set-off.

61 But there is an inherent limit to this deference to the provincial law of set-off. While the operation of set-off is permitted to allow for the party claiming set-off to recover from the estate ahead of the stipulated order of his claim under the Bankruptcy Act, it most emphatically is not permitted to allow for the operation of provincial legislation to reorder the priorities of third parties against the estate -- and by "third parties" I do of course mean the priority of any person other than the person who claims set-off against the estate. If provincial legislation were to have this effect, on the consistent authority of the quartet it must be declared inapplicable in bankruptcy.

62 Indeed, the existence of such an intrinsic constitutional limit to the application of provincial law in relation to property and civil rights has also been found in the context of defining secured creditors. The Bankruptcy Act defines "secured creditor" in s. 2, but defers to provincial law for the purpose of creating secured claims. The quartet of cases in this Court decided that the provinces are entitled to define secured creditors as they wish for their own purposes, but in bankruptcy those definitions which have the effect of reordering the priorities in the Bankruptcy Act are simply without application. In the same vein, the law of set-off is permitted to operate, but only to the extent that provincial legislation purporting to create a set-off does not have the effect of reordering federal priorities with respect to the claims of third parties against the estate. Federal deference to provincial law is thus necessarily limited by the order of priorities in the Bankruptcy Act.

63 Differently put, to paraphrase Wilson J. in Deloitte Haskins, supra, at p. 806 (who in turn was discussing the ratio of this Court's decision in Re Bourgault, supra), the question in the case at bar is not whether a proprietary interest has been created under the relevant provincial legislation by combining the instruments of deemed debt and set-off. It is whether the provincial legislation, even if it has created a proprietary interest, can defeat the scheme of distribution under s. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act. In the case at bar, it will defeat that scheme if it secures against the estate the claims of third parties whom Parliament has given a lower priority under s. 136.

64 The question in this appeal thus reduces to the following: does the operation of s. 133 have the effect of reordering federal priorities with respect to the claims of any third parties against the estate?

(b) Does Section 133 Affect Bankruptcy Priorities?

65 Prior to bankruptcy, the security device created by s. 133(3) and triggered by s. 133(1) is, of course, perfectly within the province's jurisdiction. However, if applicable in the event of bankruptcy, it would enter into conflict with the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act. Parliament has expressly indicated in s. 136(1)(h) that "all indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act" is to rank eighth in the list of preferred claims, to be distributed after the claims of secured creditors. By contrast, the combined effect of ss. 133(1) and (3) of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, is to secure the Board's claim against the bankrupt's estate ahead of its priority under the Bankruptcy Act. The two laws in their operation give rise to different and inconsistent orders of priority and are thereby in conflict. They operate as contrary directives as to the way assets on bankruptcy are to be distributed.

66 To explain how this result is effected, it is first important to remember that monies owing to the contractor but withheld by the principal are debts due to the bankrupt. They are thus unquestionably "property of the bankrupt" under the Bankruptcy Act, since s. 2 of the Act defines "property" to include "obligations". The monies held back are simply accounts receivable of the bankrupt (see, for example, Re Invitation Prêt-à-Porter Inc.; Miller v. Polbro Realty Co. (1979), 31 C.B.R. (N.S.) 54, at p. 58 (Que. S.C.); L. W. Houlden and C. H. Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1993), vol. 1, at F§45; Lewis Duncan and John D. Honsberger, Bankruptcy in Canada (3rd ed. 1961), at pp. 307-8).

67 Next, it is accepted that where the principal retains monies owing to the contractor, the Board's decision to deem the principal liable for the contractor's assessment has the effect of allowing the principal a right of set-off against the bankrupt estate. This right of set-off allows the principal to realize on a security interest or "quasi-lien" against the estate. However, this process of realization has the effect of securing the Board's claim against the estate. The estate is diminished to the extent of the contractor's liability to the Board, and the Board is correspondingly enriched by an identical amount. The principal's estate or patrimony remains unaffected. The Board's claim has thus been secured against the bankrupt estate, mediated through the legally compelled agency of the principal.

68 Nor, incidentally, can this process be justified by reference to the law of set-off. While the law of set-off incorporated by reference in s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act would permit the principal to secure its own claim against the estate, it does not permit the province to enact legislation which confers the same benefit on a third party, in this case the Board, since such legislation would have the effect of reordering priorities with respect to an entire class of preferred claims. We have consistently held that the deference to provincial law in the Bankruptcy Act does not extend to the reordering of claims against the estate. At that point, provincial law simply ceases to apply for intruding into an exclusive federal sphere. Such, then, must also be the fate of the impugned legislation in this appeal.

69 I therefore respectfully disagree with the conclusion of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Ontario (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Evelyn Stevens Interiors Ltd. (Trustee of) reflex, (1993), 100 D.L.R. (4th) 742, in holding that ss. 9(3) and (4) of the Ontario Workers' Compensation Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 539 (equivalent to Saskatchewan's ss. 133(1), (3) and (4)), are applicable in bankruptcy. The court reasoned (at pp. 748-49):

> The principle is simple. The money owing under s. 9(3) is not property of the bankrupt and never comes into the hands of the trustee. The board is not required to make a claim under s. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act. The money comes to it under s. 9 of the Workers' Compensation Act. It is the Bankruptcy Act itself and not the provincial legislation that recognizes rights of set-off ....
> A valid set-off, as defined under provincial law, would inevitably alter the priorities in a bankruptcy but that is what the Bankruptcy Act itself contemplates....
> The money in the case at bar has never (or should never have) come into the hands of the trustee. It is money that has been (and should remain) in the hands of the principals to compensate them for money that they are (or will be) bound to pay to the board.

70 The court thus concluded, first, that the principal paid the Board out of its own funds and not from property of the bankrupt. But this is only true in a trivial sense. When the set-off is effected, the estate is diminished to the extent of the indemnity and the principal's patrimony is entirely unaffected. The principal's "personal" liability is thus converted by set-off to a mere bookkeeping entry, and the debt satisfied by the estate. As a result, with respect, here the Ontario Court of Appeal has chosen form over substance.

71 Second, the court appeared to attach considerable importance to the fact that the monies owing should never have come into the "hands of the trustee". But with respect, the relevant question was simply whether these monies were property of the bankrupt, and not whether they were or should have been in the hands of the trustee. And since such monies are unquestionably property of the bankrupt, the Board has in effect secured its claim against the estate.

72 Third, and perhaps most importantly, the Ontario Court of Appeal concluded that the Bankruptcy Act itself recognizes set-off, and this will inevitably alter priorities in bankruptcy. With respect, the Court of Appeal's statement is overly broad. As already indicated, it is true that s. 97(3) allows the principal to secure his claim against the estate, whatever his priority under s. 136. In this limited sense, a "valid set-off, as defined under provincial law, would inevitably alter the priorities in a bankruptcy". Here, however, the effect is much broader, and entails securing by legislation the claim of a third party against the estate, thereby circumventing the order of priorities in the Bankruptcy Act.

73 Differently put, in the bankruptcy context, the law of set-off simply allows a debtor of a bankrupt who is also a creditor of the bankrupt to refrain from paying the full debt owing to the estate, since it may be that the estate will only fulfil a portion, if that, of the bankrupt's debt. Set-off is simply a defence to the payment of a debt, not a basis for validating statutory security devices which have the effect of securing the claims of third parties against the estate. Indeed, the defensive character of set-off is reflected in the wording of s. 97(3) which stipulates that set-off applies to "all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt and also to all actions instituted by the trustee for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt".

74 As a result, with the greatest respect, the reasoning of the Ontario Court of Appeal is flawed for applying provincial legislation which has the effect of securing against the estate an entire class of claims specifically given a lower priority by the Bankruptcy Act.

75 What is more, if the Ontario Court of Appeal's interpretation of s. 97(3) were correct, the consequences would be far-reaching. The provinces would, in effect, be entitled to create property interests which have the effect of subverting the federal scheme of distribution by purporting to validate them as set-offs. Nor is there any reason in principle why the provinces would be limited to rearranging federal priorities with respect to unpaid workers' compensation assessments. Each and every province would be licensed to create similar security devices to secure claims of their choosing, and thereby subvert entirely Parliament's chosen scheme of distribution. This prospect was repudiated by this Court in each of the cases in the bankruptcy quartet. The concerns voiced in those cases apply with equal force to this appeal. To rule otherwise would be to invite a balkanization of the scheme of bankruptcy priorities across the country and to tolerate the evisceration of Parliament's exclusive jurisdiction over bankruptcy conferred by our Constitution. The provinces are not entitled to so proceed, and thereby do indirectly what they are prohibited from doing directly. Our courts must therefore be vigilant to scrutinize the substance of the interests created and not rest content with merely examining their form.

76 I would add that apart from the security device created by the combined effect of ss. 133(1) and (3), s. 133(4) also has the effect of intruding into the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy. It will be recalled that s. 133(4) states that "[a]ll questions as to the right to and the amount of such indemnity shall be determined by the board". If allowed to apply in bankruptcy, this provision would have the effect of empowering a creditor of the estate (here the Board) to determine unilaterally the extent of its claim against the estate. As a result, the Board would be empowered to decide the size of the estate which is to remain available for the other secured, preferred and ordinary creditors. A province cannot empower a creditor of a bankrupt to determine the extent of a bankrupt's estate which is to be available for distribution. Thus, while otherwise perfectly valid provincial law, s. 133(4) is also inapplicable in the event of bankruptcy.

77 At this point, I should perhaps stress that nothing I have said detracts from a province's authority to impose liability on a third party for a bankrupt's debt. What a province cannot do, however, is create a statutory security device which has the effect of reordering the priorities of distribution of the assets in the bankrupt's estate. In such a case, what is otherwise valid provincial legislation is simply without application upon the occurrence of bankruptcy. To repeat, it is the combined effect of the statutory deemed debt and the right to withhold (and then set off against) property of the bankrupt which secures the Board's claim against property of the bankrupt. It is for this reason that examining the constitutional validity of s. 133(1) separately from s. 133(3) fundamentally obscures the nature of the legal interest created. Such an approach misses that this is nothing but a straightforward security device triggered by the province for securing the Board's claim against the estate, in exactly the same way that breaking a contract of pledge into debt and bailment and examining the validity of these legal interests separately would obscure the essential character of pledge as a security device.

78 It is therefore my conclusion that s. 133 is inapplicable in bankruptcy for intruding into an exclusive federal sphere.

79 In the foregoing, I have proceeded on the basis that s. 133(1) operates in tandem with s. 133(3), that is, that the principal has monies owing to the contractor which it can use as a basis for set-off when the Board deems it liable for the contractor's assessment. Where a principal has such monies owing, it was clearly the Legislature's intention that such a right to set-off be exercised in order that the contractor ultimately be responsible for its own assessment. In this sense, where both ss. 133(1) and (3) potentially apply on the facts of a given case, it was clearly the Legislature's intention that the right to set-off be exercised. As a result, in such a case s. 133 is inapplicable in toto against the bankruptcy.

80 However, there may be instances where the principal does not hold or retain any monies owing to the contractor. While the Court did not have the benefit of extensive submissions on this point, I believe it is quite plausible to conclude that the principal can then claim from the estate as a preferred creditor under s. 136(1)(h), since its claim is comprehended within "indebtedness of the bankrupt under any Workmen's Compensation Act". This would appear to be permissible because on its plain wording s. 136(1)(h) specifies only the nature of the claim and not the identity of the claimant. As a result, if only s. 133(1) applies, the Board has not secured its claim against the estate but recovers only from the principal. The scheme of distribution of assets in the estate is thereby unaffected. In such a case, there is no constitutional reason why full effect should not be given to provincial law within its legitimate sphere of operation. I would therefore only read down s. 133 to the extent that in application it enters into conflict with the scheme of distribution in the Bankruptcy Act. Where s. 133(1) alone is engaged in a given case, the Board's claim against the principal continues to be fully applicable.

(c) The Appropriate Remedy: Is Section 133 Inapplicable or Inoperative?

81 I have already concluded that the impugned legislation must be declared inapplicable rather than inoperable in bankruptcy. I should perhaps explain that this is preferable for the simple reason that bankruptcy is an exclusive federal domain within which provincial legislation does not apply, as distinguished from areas of joint or overlapping jurisdiction where federal legislation will prevail, rendering provincial legislation inoperable to the extent of any conflict. However, as bankruptcy is carved out from the domain of property and civil rights of which it is conceptually a part, valid provincial legislation of general application continues to apply in bankruptcy until Parliament legislates pursuant to its exclusive jurisdiction in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency. At that point, provincial legislation which conflicts with federal law must yield to the extent of the conflict (Tennant v. Union Bank of Canada, [1894] A.C. 31 (P.C.); Crown Grain Co. v. Day, [1908] A.C. 504 (P.C.)) and it becomes inapplicable to that extent. Consistent with the presumption of constitutionality __ that the enacting body is presumed to have intended to enact provisions which do not transgress the limits of its constitutional powers __ the provincial law should be read down to the extent of the conflict. In other words, it should be interpreted so as not to apply to the matter that is outside the jurisdiction of the enacting body.

82 This, I believe, has been the trend of this Court's approach to matters of applicability and operability. For example, in refusing to apply the paramountcy doctrine in Deloitte Haskins, Wilson J. explained (at p. 807):

I think rather that the applicable principle is the one stated by Laskin C.J. in Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., 1976 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054, at p. 1065, to the effect that "if the provincial legislation is of general application, it will be construed so as not to apply to such enterprises", i.e., those within federal competence.

She concluded at p. 808:

I believe that the trend of the more recent authorities favours a restrictive approach to the concept of "conflict" and a construction of impugned provincial legislation, where this is possible, so as to avoid operational conflict with valid federal legislation. Where this is done both provisions can stand and have their own legitimate spheres of operation. In this sense I find no conflict between s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and s. 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act. I would accordingly answer the question as framed by stating that s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act applies to determine priorities on a bankruptcy and s. 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act has no application in such a situation.

83 Another way of explaining this approach is simply to say, with Lamer J. in FBDB, that "in a bankruptcy matter, it is the Bankruptcy Act which must be applied" (at p. 1071).

84 This was also the Court's approach in Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121. The case concerned the relationship between Bank Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-1, security interests and the provincial procedural requirements for seizure under the Saskatchewan Limitation of Civil Rights Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. L-16. Speaking for the Court, La Forest J. found the federal and provincial legislation to conflict in operation. However, he added at p. 155:

I have dealt with this case on the basis of paramountcy to meet the arguments put forward by counsel. But the issue can, I think, be answered more directly. At the end of the day, I agree with counsel for the Attorney General of Canada that this is simply a case where Parliament, under its power to regulate banking, has enacted a complete code that at once defines and provides for the realization of a security interest. There is no room left for the operation of the provincial legislation and that legislation should, accordingly, be construed as inapplicable to the extent that it trenches on valid federal banking legislation.

In response to the third question, then, I would hold that ss. 19 to 36 of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act, if interpreted to include a s. 178 security, conflict with ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act so as to render ss. 19 to 36 inoperative in respect of the security taken pursuant to s. 178 by a chartered bank. To put it another way, ss. 19 to 36 of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act are inapplicable to security taken pursuant to ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act. [Emphasis added.]

85 I fully endorse this approach, and am of the opinion that my colleague La Forest J.'s remarks apply mutatis mutandis to the present appeal. Parliament has enacted a complete code in the Bankruptcy Act, one which necessarily calls upon provincial law for its operation. But Parliament's invitation stipulates an important limitation at the threshold of its domain, namely, that provincial law simply cannot apply when to do so would entail subverting the federal order of priorities in the Bankruptcy Act.

86 I therefore agree with the submissions of the Attorney General of Canada and find that s. 133 is inapplicable in bankruptcy when s. 133(1) operates together with s. 133(3) as it trenches on valid federal bankruptcy legislation.

87 In view of Iacobucci J.'s statement at para. 162 that provincial "[l]egislation that is intra vires is permitted to have an incidental and ancillary effect on a federal sphere", I think it appropriate in concluding to summarize my view as to the proper constitutional analysis where federal and provincial legislation potentially conflict. One must first determine whether the laws are respectively valid federal or provincial legislation. If so, the actual operation of the laws must be examined to determine whether they are in operational conflict, that is, inconsistent or incapable of being fully complied with in a given situation. If they are in operational conflict, the federal legislation prevails and the provincial legislation is without effect to the extent of this conflict. If the operational conflict is in a field of exclusive federal jurisdiction, the provincial legislation will be inapplicable as being ultra vires to that extent. If the conflict is in an area of concurrent or overlapping jurisdictions, the provincial legislation will remain intra vires but be inoperative. To the extent that there is operational conflict, there is no room for an incidental or ancillary effect of provincial legislation. If, on the other hand, there is no operational conflict, then both laws continue to operate and both continue to have effect to the extent that operational conflict does not arise. Short of operational conflict, provincial law may validly have an effect on bankruptcy, as I have indeed acknowledged in observing that there is no bankruptcy "bottom line" without provincial law (at para. 30). In the present case, I have found clear operational conflict in that ss. 133(1) and (3) in their operation together entail a reordering or subverting of the federal order of priorities under the Bankruptcy Act. Such an intrusion into an exclusive federal sphere necessarily goes far beyond an incidental and ancillary effect. I believe this proposition runs through my reasons.

D. Residual Issues

88 Finally, as my colleague Iacobucci J. notes, before this Court the Bank of Montreal raised factual and legal issues which had not been raised in the courts below. Specifically, the Bank argued that Husky was not liable under s. 133 for payment of Metal Fab's assessments since the Board was obliged to issue a demand against Metal Fab before issuing one against Husky. Similarly, the Board and the Bank argued that Husky cannot indemnify itself out of funds owing to Metal Fab since Husky received the demand from the Board after Metal Fab had given notice of assignment of its book debts to the Bank of Montreal. Since, as outlined, it is my opinion that s. 133 simply has no application in the event of bankruptcy, these threshold factual questions need not be addressed.

89 With respect to Husky's further argument that it was not in breach of its statutory duty under s. 133 to ensure payment by Metal Fab, again this question need not be addressed since s. 133 has no application upon the occurrence of bankruptcy.

90 The Bank also argued that s. 133 should be interpreted to limit Husky's liability to unpaid workers' compensation assessments with respect to the specific work performed for Husky by Metal Fab, and not for all Metal Fab's outstanding unpaid assessments which includes work for other principals. While it is not necessary to answer this question given my disposition of this appeal, I agree with Iacobucci J. that the liability under s. 133 is limited to unpaid assessments in respect of work performed for Husky. This less Draconian interpretation is confirmed by the recent clarifying amendment to s. 133 which inserted the words "pursuant to this Act with respect to that work" after "contribute to the fund" (The Workers' Compensation Amendment Act, 1993, S.S. 1993, c. 63, s. 40).

IV.Disposition

91 For the above reasons, I would answer the constitutional questions posed by Lamer C.J. as follows:

Question:1.Where a contractor as referred to in s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1, is in bankruptcy and but for the bankruptcy, the principal as referred to in s. 133 would be liable to pay the assessment due by the contractor under the Act, is s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in whole or in part, by reason of being in conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, and in particular ss. 17(1), 67, 95, 136(1)(h), 148, 158(a) and 198(a) thereof?

Answer:Yes. Section 133 is inapplicable in bankruptcy when s. 133(1) operates in tandem with s. 133(3).

Question:2.Was s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in the circumstances of this case?

Answer:Yes. Section 133 was inapplicable when Metal Fab entered bankruptcy.

92 I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs throughout.

The reasons of Sopinka, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ. were delivered by 93 IACOBUCCI J. (dissenting) -- The broad issue in this appeal is the extent to which a provincial statutory instrument can constitutionally assert itself in the bankruptcy context without entering into operational conflict with the federal Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3. The specific question at issue relates to the constitutional validity of ss. 133(1) and (3) of the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1. These provisions permit the Workers' Compensation Board (the Board), in a situation where a contractor has failed to pay its Injury Fund contributions, to obtain these amounts from a principal of the contractor (subs. (1)). Subsection (3) permits the principal to indemnify itself from the delinquent contractor. It is argued in this case that ss. 133(1) and (3) are constitutionally non-operational in a situation where the contractor is bankrupt, especially when that bankrupt has assigned its estate to a secured creditor.

I. Background

94 Husky Oil Operations Ltd. (the principal, hereinafter "Husky") is an owner of a Bi-Provincial Heavy Oil Upgrader at Lloydminster, Saskatchewan. Husky entered into six contracts with Metal Fabricating & Construction Ltd. (the contractor, subsequently the bankrupt, hereinafter "Metal Fab") respecting the construction of the upgrader. Metal Fab made an assignment in bankruptcy before completing five of those contracts. At the time, Husky owed approximately $800,000 to

Metal Fab in the form of hold-backs and contractual debt. These sums were paid into court upon the commencement of the instant legal proceedings.

95 Metal Fab had not paid its required Workers' Compensation Fund contribution for the employees on its payroll. It was alerted to this effect by the Workers' Compensation Board on March 2, 1992 by a Notice of Assessment showing that $208,850.50 was due and payable to the Board. Soon thereafter, the Bank of Montreal (the assignee) acquired a general assignment of book debts from Metal Fab for loans advanced to it. On March 12, 1992, Husky was notified of the Bank's security interest and told that it must pay to the Bank any amounts payable to Metal Fab. The Board was apprised of the ceasing of operations of Metal Fab on March 16, 1992. The Board then looked to Husky since s. 133(1) of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, made Husky personally liable in respect of the amounts that Metal Fab had not paid to the Board, but, pursuant to the terms of subs. (3), Husky could recover those sums from Metal Fab. Metal Fab made an assignment in bankruptcy on March 19, 1992. The co-respondent, Deloitte & Touche Inc., was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. Subsequent audits conducted by the Board revealed the amount owing by Metal Fab to the Injury Fund to be $246,745.26. Husky was advised of this increased amount by a letter, dated July 6, 1992. Under the assignment in bankruptcy, Metal Fab assigned a secured debt to the Bank of Montreal in the amount of $1,745,837.

96 Husky and Metal Fab's creditors submit that the operation of s. 133 conflicts with s. 136 of the federal Bankruptcy Act, which sets out the priorities of creditors on bankruptcy. Normally in bankruptcy the amount owed by Husky to Metal Fab would be used to satisfy lienholders and the secured creditor Bank of Montreal according to the priorities established in the Bankruptcy Act. In the appeal at bar, the Board, given its lower priority, would effectively recover none of the money owed to it by Metal Fab. However, s. 133 of the Workers' Compensation Act permits the Board to recover its debt directly from Husky and allows Husky, in turn, to set this off from the amount owed to the bankrupt, thereby effectively reducing the amount of money available to the secured creditor and, it is submitted, improperly affecting the priority scheme established by the Bankruptcy Act.

97 The aims of the litigants can be summarized as follows:

(1)Husky wants to avoid the operation of s. 133(1) but, if this provision is found to be valid, argues that s. 133(3) is also operative and, thus, Husky can set off the monies paid to the Board from the monies it owes the bankrupt.

(2)The Bank's position is influenced by the fact that, since it is the principal secured creditor, any funds set off to Husky are wholly funds that, in the absence of the intervention of the Board, would accrue to the Bank. Consequently, the Bank is principally preoccupied with affirming the non-operability of s. 133(3), realizing, however, that were Husky not to have any liability to the Board then there would be no set-off issue in the first place.

(3)The Board seeks the sums that the bankrupt should have paid to it all along. It relies on s. 133(1) of the provincial legislation and its creation of joint and several liability between the principal and contractor to this effect.

98 By a fiat, dated September 9, 1992, Wedge J. of the Court of Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan held that s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, was constitutionally inoperative because it altered the scheme of distribution specified in the Bankruptcy Act, the ordering of this scheme falling entirely within the legislative competence of Parliament. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed the Appellant Board's appeal from that decision. On April 28, 1994, leave to appeal was granted to this Court, [1994] 1 S.C.R. xii.

III. Judgments Below

Court of Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan, per Wedge J. reflex, (1992), 104 Sask. R. 225

99 This decision consisted of a fiat on a non-suit application by Husky that s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, was inapplicable to it.

100 Wedge J. first reviewed the facts and found that s. 133(1) made Husky personally liable for the payments to the Board yet authorized it to recover these payments from Metal Fab, the contractor. The trial judge then went on to note that the questions at hand were: (1) whether, in a bankruptcy situation, s. 133 encroached upon the exclusive federal jurisdiction over bankruptcy; and (2) whether, if it did not, Husky was entitled to set off the amount it must pay to the Board against the monies held in court.

101 Wedge J. answered the first question in the affirmative. She found assistance, in reaching her conclusion, in the decisions of this Court in Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35 (hereinafter Re Bourgault) (later referred to by Wakeling J.A. as Bourgault v. Quebec Deputy Minister of Revenue), Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 785, Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061 (FBDB), and British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24, colloquially referred to as the "quartet". While acknowledging at p. 228 that "...these decisions are not directly on point where, as here, the claim by the provincial body, is against a third party -- not the bankrupt", Wedge J. still felt they offered some guidance. In fact, the quartet, combined with some academic authority, lead her to conclude that provincial legislative initiatives are invalid simply when they affect the bankruptcy scheme.

102 Reference was also made to the Ontario case of Re Evelyn Stevens Interiors Ltd. reflex, (1990), 72 D.L.R. (4th) 712 (S.C.), where, according to Wedge J. at p. 228, McKeown J. "...relied upon the judgment of Madam Justice Wilson in Deloitte Haskins for the principle that provincial legislation cannot disturb the priority scheme in s. 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act." It was noted that McKeown J.'s reasoning in Evelyn Stevens was adopted by Lawton J. in Serdula Construction Management Inc. v. Workers' Compensation Board, Q.B. (Regina), Q.B.M. 126/91 (April 12, 1991), a case which also involved a claim under s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979. In Serdula, Lawton J. acknowledged that the Evelyn Stevens case was being appealed, but considered that McKeown J. had been correct. Wedge J. found the facts of the case at bar to be indistinguishable from those in Serdula. Ultimately, Wedge J. held that s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, has no application in a bankruptcy scenario.

103 Wedge J. then turned to the second issue and questioned whether the set-off issue could be separated from the s. 133(1) issue. She concluded at p. 229:

If Husky does not have to pay the Board out of the monies in court, the amount available to the Trustee is not diminished, the priority scheme in the Bankruptcy Act is not altered and there is no conflict between the provincial and federal legislation. It is only subs. (3) of s. 133, taken together with subs. (1) which would have the effect of disturbing the priority scheme. Thus the whole of s. 133 is under attack in the constitutional issue.

104 Wedge J. went on to reject the argument that the set-off provision in s. 133(3) is not in conflict with the Bankruptcy Act because, in s. 97(3), the Act itself recognizes rights of set-off. She reasoned at pp. 229-30:

To interpret the general right of set-off in s. 97(3) as overriding the specific reference to Workers' Compensation payments in the order of priorities would, in my view, ignore the intention of the federal legislation, i.e. the standardization of bankruptcy priorities across Canada.

105 In the end, Wedge J. agreed with Lawton J. in Serdula. In the circumstances, she also found it unnecessary to decide the second issue given the interconnection between ss. 133(1) and (3), such that the invalidity of the former necessarily triggered the inoperation of the latter.

Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, per Wakeling J.A. reflex, (1993), 116 Sask. R. 46

106 The Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan dismissed the appeal by the Workers' Compensation Board.

107 Wakeling J.A. commenced his analysis by noting, at p. 47, that "[t]his appeal probes the extent to which provincial legislation may affect federal legislation relating to bankruptcy." It was noted that were s. 133 not to exist, the claim of the Board would rank eighth in priority and in many cases would go unpaid; if s. 133 is valid, the claim of the Board would be paid by the owner who would then have a claim against the bankrupt estate. According to Wakeling J.A. at p. 48, "[t]he net result is a clear advantage to the W.C.B. as it has managed to assure payment of its claim and leave it to the owner to struggle for repayment under the Act either claiming right of set-off or ranking at the bottom of the list of priorities as an unsecured creditor."

108 The observation was then made that the provinces are dissatisfied with the degree of priority s. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act provides them. Wakeling J.A., at p. 48, characterized this appeal as but one more attempt by a province "to circumvent the restriction which s. 136 of the Act has imposed on the ability of the W.C.B. to collect its claim."

109 Wakeling J.A. referred to the "quartet" decisions discussed by Wedge J. and held, at p. 50, that "[i]t is apparent from these cases that the Supreme Court has determined that where the federal powers over bankruptcy have been exercised in the [Bankruptcy] Act, it is not possible for provincial legislation to change the scheme of distribution which the Act has established." Wakeling J.A. rejected the argument according to which s. 133 does not threaten the bankruptcy scheme since it merely permits a right of recovery against a third party surety, not the estate of the bankrupt. He noted that any third party caught by the Board order will want to seek repayment and will use the set-off and indemnification provisions to this effect, thereby interfering with the distribution of the bankrupt's estate. He disagreed with the approach taken by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Ontario (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Evelyn Stevens Interiors Ltd. (Trustee of) reflex, (1993), 100 D.L.R. (4th) 742, in which it was decided that similar legislation which had been contained in the Ontario Workers' Compensation Board Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 539, for many years was not in conflict with the federal bankruptcy scheme. As Wakeling J.A. elaborated, at p. 51:

> It [the Ontario Court of Appeal] concluded that the provincial legislation worked to require the principal to make payment to the Board so that the Board having received payment had no claim under the Act against the bankrupt so it did not need to rely on s. 136. The principal then had a right to set off what it had paid the W.C.B. against what it would otherwise pay the trustee in bankruptcy but that the right of set-off did not constitute a conflict with the Act as it was specifically provided for under [s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act].

110 In Wakeling J.A.'s view, s. 97(3) was intended only to acknowledge and accept the application of the common law right of set-off as it has been developed over the years. To read more than a common law right of set-off into s. 97(3) would conflict with the Henfrey Samson decision. Furthermore, he observed that the Ontario Court of Appeal in Evelyn Stevens referred to only three members of the "quartet", failing to make reference to the FBDB case which, in his mind, has considerable relevance to this case. Wakeling J.A. added that the FBDB judgment applied the Bourgault, Henfrey Samson and Deloitte Haskins reasoning to parties not directly involved in a bankruptcy.

111 In the end, Wakeling J.A. concluded, at pp. 52-53, that "[t]here is no way that the bankruptcy pie can be cut as a consequence of this legislation without disturbing the scheme of distribution established under s. 136 of the Act." In fact, he held that it could hardly be disputed that without the legislation the distribution would be different.

112 Deeming s. 133(1) to be invalid, Wakeling J.A. basically affirmed the approach taken by Wedge J. regarding the severance of the set-off provision. He found that the provision was to be struck as a whole, given that there is no apparent justification for a conclusion that the legislators would have intended the principal to pay in full whether or not a right of set-off was available.

IV. Issues on Appeal

113 The issues in this appeal are set out in the constitutional questions stated by the Chief Justice on September 14, 1994:

> 1 Where a contractor as referred to in s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1, is in bankruptcy and but for the bankruptcy, the principal as referred to in s. 133 would be liable to pay the assessment due by the contractor under the Act, is s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in whole or in part, by reason of being in conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, and in particular ss. 17(1), 67, 95, 136(1)(h), 148, 158(a) and 198(a) thereof?

Digitized by Google

2 Was s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in the circumstances of this case?

114 In my view, the gist of the appeal comes down to the following questions, as proposed by the appellants:

(a)Is section 133(1) of The Workers' Compensation Act inoperative by reason of inconsistency with the Bankruptcy Act?

(b)Is section 133(3) of The Workers' Compensation Act inoperative by reason of inconsistency with the Bankruptcy Act?

(c)If section 133(3) is inoperative, does that render section 133(1) inoperative as well?

V. Analysis

115 For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal. Section 133(1) is valid even in a situation where the contractor is or becomes bankrupt; s. 133(3) is also valid in the bankruptcy context and permits the principal to set off the amount paid to the Board from funds that it owes to the bankrupt or assignee thereof. Although I am aware of the fact that the set-off involves monies constituting the property of the bankrupt and that it potentially interferes with the order of priorities established by s. 136, I find that s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act eliminates any operational conflict between s. 133(3) and the Act since the cause of action contemplated by s. 133(3) is ordinarily available at law and equity. Further, when s. 133(3) is used simply for purposes of indemnification and this is pursued by the principal joining the ranks of the unsecured creditors then I believe any resultant interference with the bankruptcy scheme to be so incidental that it falls outside of the scope of the "clear conflict" required to trigger invalidation through the paramountcy doctrine.

116 At the outset, I note that the respondent's submissions that s. 133 is in conflict with ss. 17(1), 67, 95, 148, 158(a) and 198(a) of the Bankruptcy Act are of little, if any, merit. Nor were they seriously pleaded before us. The crux of this appeal involves s. 136(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and it is on this provision that I shall focus my attention.

A. Paramountcy Doctrine

117 Section 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, is valid provincial legislation enacted pursuant to s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Similarly, the Bankruptcy Act is intra vires the legislative purview of Parliament, specifically s. 91(21) of the Constitution: Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney General for the Dominion of Canada, [1894] A.C. 189 (P.C.), at p. 197; Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue, [1928] A.C. 187, affirming 1926 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1926] S.C.R. 218. To this end, the constitutional issue herein asks whether s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, is rendered inoperative by virtue of a conflict with the Bankruptcy Act. In a situation where there is clear operational conflict between valid federal and provincial legislation, the doctrine of paramountcy requires that the provincial legislation be, to the extent of the conflict, declared inoperational. It is upon this doctrine that the respondent relies.

118 I underscore that, in order to be triggered, the doctrine of paramountcy requires very clear conflict. As noted by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at p. 191:

In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"....

119 Conflict for purposes of paramountcy analysis is found when compliance with the enactment of one level of government entails defiance with that of the other: McCutcheon, supra, at p. 191. There must be a situation where one cannot be able to obey the law of one level of government without disobeying the law of the other level of government: Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121.

120 The requirement that clear operational conflict be found effectively narrows the situations in which federal legislation will be deemed to be paramount over provincial enactments. The rationale behind this restrictive use of paramountcy is self evident: governmental regulation in Canada operates through a complex web of federal and provincial legislation. The regimes structuring many areas of public policy, such as, bankruptcy, actively involve both levels of government. To this end, barring a situation where obeying the enactment of one level places a citizen in disobeyance of the legislation of the other level, an attempt must be made to read overlapping provincial and federal legislation in a complementary manner.

121 I am buttressed in this approach by the general comments of Dickson C.J. in General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 641. Although the GM case specifically involved validating legislation under the federal trade and commerce power, I find the following passage from Dickson C.J.'s reasons (at pp. 669-70) to be apposite to this appeal:

...it should be remembered that in a federal system it is inevitable that, in pursuing valid objectives, the legislation of each level of government will impact occasionally on the sphere of power of the other level of government; overlap of legislation is to be expected and accommodated in a federal state. Thus a certain degree of judicial restraint in proposing strict tests which will result in striking down such legislation is appropriate....

Both provincial and federal governments have equal ability to legislate in ways that may incidentally affect the other government's sphere of power.

122 In the case at bar, the courts below did not demonstrate the appropriate level of judicial restraint in their application of paramountcy doctrine. In my view, courts should carefully look for co-existence, not strive to find conflict.

B. The History and Purpose of Workers' Compensation Legislation in Canada

123 The disposition of this appeal requires not only a sensitivity to the true nature of the paramountcy doctrine, but also an appreciation of the history and purpose of workers' compensation legislation.

124 Workers' compensation legislation creates a "no fault" system of benefits whereby injured workers are guaranteed compensation in connection with their injuries. As noted by the Workers' Compensation Board of Alberta, the concept of workers' compensation in Canada was introduced in order to elevate Canadian society from an industrial "state of nature".

...in the years before there was workers' compensation. Economic necessity compelled people to work long hours, under conditions more hazardous than they would freely choose and without any opportunity to provide for their own personal safety. The physical conditions, equipment and work methods of the day often increased the likelihood of accidents and decreased the likelihood of recovery in tort. As many as half of the work place accidents were found to result from the hazards of the work place, not from anyone's fault. When an employer was at fault, he could erect the common law defences of contributory negligence and voluntary assumption of risk to insulate himself from liability. Both of those defences, though available generally, operated with particular harshness in the work place, because despite the dangers of the work place and the work tasks there were no real alternatives open to the worker. In addition, employers alone could assert the defence of common employment to neutralize claims based on the fault of a worker's fellow employees. All of these defences operated as absolute bars to recovery; all remain part of Ontario law, except where suppressed or modified by statute. Finally, even successful worker-plaintiffs had no assurance of meaningful recovery. Wealthy employers could often exhaust the worker's resources in a series of appeals. Legal fees and other costs reduced the amount realized from any award. Impecunious employers often could not pay the judgments against them. For slow developing industrial disease claims, workers might find their employers had gone out of business or disappeared.

126 In effect, the workers' compensation system involves an historic compromise. On the one hand, employees give up their rights of action against employers and other workers in exchange for benefits regardless of fault. On the other hand, employers are relieved of certain liabilities involving their employees but are obliged to fund wholly the burden of compensating injured workers through assessments paid to the Injury Fund. This compromise emanated from the 1913 Meredith Report, which constitutes the conceptual base for all workers' compensation legislation in Canada. In Reference re Workers' Compensation Act, 1983 (Nfld.) 1987 CanLII 118 (NL CA), (1987), 44 D.L.R. (4th) 501, affirmed 1989 CanLII 86 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 922, the Newfoundland Court of Appeal, at p. 509, summarized the funding scheme proposed by Meredith as follows:

. . . Meredith recommended that Ontario model its legislation after the German system which emphasized the duty of the state to provide sustenance and support to injured workers through a collective, no-fault, industry-funded insurance scheme by means of a regulated accident fund....

127 The strength of the fund is thus key to the viability of the workers' compensation system. In turn, the financial integrity of the Workers' Compensation program depends on an effective means of ensuring that sufficient monies are paid into the Injury Fund. It is here that s. 133 plays a key role. It, along with other devices such as statutory liens, ensures that the Injury Fund continues to be replenished and remains solvent. This is accomplished by holding principals liable for the unpaid dues of contractors because, from the perspective of the workers, both contractors and principals are "employers". Moreover, from the point of view of rudimentary economic analysis, both gain from the surplus value of the workers' labour. Without the existence of effective methods to finance the Injury Fund, the workers' compensation system is emptied of any content and the "historical compromise" is rendered meaningless. Provisions such as s. 133 further the policy choice to shift losses for unpaid premiums from the Board and workers to principals. Workers' compensation legislation strives to visit the costs of industrial disease, death and injury on the employer community which exposes its workforce to those risks. An attempt is made to spread responsibility for those costs amongst multiple employers engaged in a single project.

128 On a related note, I would, with respect, expressly reject Wakeling J.A.'s characterization at p. 48 of this case as "...one more attempt by a province to circumvent the restriction which s. 136 of the Act has imposed on the ability of the W.C.B. to collect its claim." To the extent that Wakeling J.A.'s remarks are aimed at criticizing the province for enacting the impugned legislation with that object in mind, I cannot agree. There is no basis in law or history to ascribe such a pejorative intent to s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979. I note that the original precursor to s. 133 was enacted in 1911 (The Workmen's Compensation Act, S.S. 1910-11, c. 9, s. 9), well before the introduction of The Bankruptcy Act in 1919 (S.C. 1919, c. 36) and of the original version of s. 136(1)(h) which was enacted in 1921 (The Bankruptcy Act Amendment Act, 1921, S.C. 1921, c. 17, s. 39).

129 From another angle, the present wording of s. 133 is essentially unchanged from the modifications made to s. 9 of the 1910 Act in the 1929 Workmen's Compensation Act, S.S. 1928-29, c. 73, s. 11. Now, s. 11 of the 1929 Act was modelled directly on the contemporaneous provisions of the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act, R.S.O. 1927, c. 179, s. 10, these being originally enacted in 1915 and 1919: S.O. 1914, c. 25, s. 10, as amended by S.O. 1915, c. 24, s. 5, and S.O. 1919, c. 34, s. 4(2). The creation of joint and several liability as between contractors and principals for the contractor's unpaid compensation debts (as well as the concomitant right to indemnification) thus pre-dates the scheme of priorities established by bankruptcy legislation. Consequently, there could not have been, at the time of enacting workers' compensation legislation, a desire to undermine federal bankruptcy arrangements nor circumvent the priority scheme.

130 It is helpful to recall that s. 133 is not addressed specifically to situations in which the contractor is bankrupt, although such a situation may occasionally arise on the facts as it does here. Principally, s. 133 is aimed at granting the Board an alternate route to obtain the funds that, but for the delinquency, absconding or unscrupulousness of the contractor, it would ordinarily have received. Clearly, when the contractor and principal have a working relationship, it is easier for the principal to recover the monies from the contractor than it is for the Board since it is the principal who pays the contractor for work completed.

131 This review of the legislative history and purpose of workers' compensation statutes fails to unearth any indication that s. 133 was enacted for the purpose of improving the ranking of the Board in a bankruptcy. See Evelyn Stevens (Ont. C.A.), supra, at p. 747, for a similar conclusion within the Ontario context.

C. Paramountcy in the Context of Bankruptcy: The "Quartet"

132 On four occasions, this Court has been called upon to affirm the paramountcy of the Bankruptcy Act over provincial enactments which directly interfered with the scheme of priorities established by s. 136 of the federal legislation. As was mentioned above, these four cases are commonly referred to as the "quartet". Although they are not directly on all fours with the appeal at bar (since they do not involve the provincial body claiming against a third-party, only the bankrupt), I agree with Wedge J. that they are of significant interpretive assistance.

133 In Re Bourgault, supra, this Court considered s. 30 of the Quebec Retail Sales Tax Act, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 71, which provided that "[e]very sum due to the Crown" under that Act constituted "a privileged debt ranking immediately after law costs". The facts of the Bourgault case, put briefly, are as follows. Upon the bankruptcy of a debtor, the Deputy Minister of Revenue of Quebec maintained that, by virtue of s. 30 of the Retail Sales Tax Act, he was a "secured creditor" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, and was therefore entitled to greater priority than normally available for Crown claims under the bankruptcy scheme. This Court rejected the claim on the grounds that s. 107 (now s. 136) of the Bankruptcy Act established an elaborate scheme of distribution of a bankrupt's assets, intending to confer a certain priority on Crown claims, and that provincial statutes which attempted to confer a higher priority were inconsistent with the Act. Specifically, Pigeon J., writing for a majority of the Court, stated at p. 44:

> Accordingly, I find that the case turns upon the interpretation of para. 107(1)(j) [of the Bankruptcy Act].... It is abundantly clear that this was intended to put on an equal footing all claims by Her Majesty in right of Canada or of a province except in cases where it was provided otherwise, namely, para. (c), the levy, and para. (h), workmen's compensation or unemployment insurance assessments and withholdings for income tax. Paragraph (j) ends with the following words, "notwithstanding any statutory preference to the contrary". The purpose of this part of the provision is obvious. Parliament intended to put all debts to a government on an equal footing; it therefore cannot have intended to allow provincial statutes to confer any higher priority. In my opinion, this is precisely what is being contended for when it is argued that, because the Quebec statute creates a privilege on immovable property effective from the date of registration, the Crown thereby becomes a "secured creditor" and thus escapes the effect of the provision which gives it only a lower priority. [Emphasis in original.]

134 Similarly, in Deloitte Haskins, supra, this Court considered s. 78(4)(a) of the Alberta Workers' Compensation Act, S.A. 1973, c. 87, which provided that any amount owed to the Workers' Compensation Board by an employer constituted a priority charge on that employer's assets. The Court concluded that this provision did not apply in bankruptcy in that it could not provide the Workers' Compensation Board with a security interest within the meaning of the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, so as to defeat the lower priority accorded to claims by Workers' Compensation Boards by s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act. Specifically, Wilson J. (on behalf of herself and two other judges, with Chouinard J. and two others concurring separately) relied on Re Bourgault, supra, and Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. (1981), 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 176 (N.S.S.C.), in concluding at p. 806 that:

> With respect, the issue in Re Bourgault and Re Black Forest Restaurant Ltd. was not whether a proprietary interest has been created under the relevant provincial legislation. It was whether provincial legislation, even if it did create a proprietary interest, could defeat the scheme of distribution under s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. These cases held that it could not, that while the provincial legislation could validly secure debts on the property of the debtor in a non-bankruptcy situation, once bankruptcy occurred s. 107(1) determined the status and priority of the claims specifically dealt with in that section. It was not open to the claimant in bankruptcy to say: By virtue of the applicable provincial legislation I am a secured creditor within the meaning of the opening words of s. 107(1) of the Bankruptcy Act and therefore the priority accorded my claim under the relevant paragraph of s. 107(1) does not apply to me. In effect, this is the position adopted by the Court of Appeal and advanced before us by the respondent. It cannot be supported as a matter of statutory interpretation of s. 107(1) since, if the section were to be read in this way, it would have the effect of permitting the provinces to determine priorities on a bankruptcy, a matter within exclusive federal jurisdiction.

How then should the constitutional question stated by the Chief Justice be answered? Does s. 107(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act conflict with s. 78(4) of The Workers' Compensation Act so as to render the latter provision inoperable? I do not believe so. Section 78(4) does not purport to deal with a bankruptcy situation and, by virtue of the presumption of constitutionality, the provincial legislature is presumed to be legislating within its competence rather than outside it. Faced with the choice of construing the provincial legislation in a way which would cause it to invade the federal sphere, thereby attracting the doctrine of paramountcy, or construing it in accordance with the presumption of constitutionality, I prefer the latter course. I believe also that it accords better with the more recent authorities on the scope of the paramountcy doctrine.

135 In FBDB, supra, this Court found that, where a secured creditor took advantage of s. 49(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, and liquidated his security outside the bankruptcy proceedings, the property constituting the security was still property of the bankrupt and the order of payment of creditors from the proceeds of the sale of the security was to be determined by the priorities specified in the Bankruptcy Act and not by the provisions of provincial law governing the order of collocation. Writing for the Court, Lamer J. (as he then was) stated at p. 1071:

In any event, I feel that the decisions in Re Bourgault and Deloitte are conclusive as to the fate of the appeal. These cases stand for the following proposition: in a bankruptcy matter, it is the Bankruptcy Act which must be applied. If a bankruptcy occurs, the order of priority is determined by the ranking in s. 107 of the Act, and any debt mentioned in that provision must therefore be given the specified priority.

Lamer J. went on to note that as provincial statutes cannot affect the priorities created by the federal statute, consistency in the order of priority in bankruptcy situations is ensured from one province to another.

136 Finally, in Henfrey Samson, supra, this Court reiterated its position in the three previous cases, holding that a deemed statutory trust created by s. 18(1) of the British Columbia Social Service Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 388, over all amounts collected as taxes under the Act could not give the province priority over other creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3. The issue was whether the deemed statutory trust could qualify as a trust within s. 47(a) of the Bankruptcy Act so as to exclude the amounts so held from the property of the bankrupt and instead require them to be given entirely to the provincial government. McLachlin J., writing for the majority, held at p. 33 that:

To interpret s. 47(a) as applying not only to trusts as defined by the general law, but to statutory trusts created by the provinces lacking the common law attributes of trusts, would be to permit the provinces to create their own priorities under the Bankruptcy Act and to invite a differential scheme of distribution on bankruptcy from province to province.

137 In Henfrey Samson, no common law trust was found since the monies in the impugned trust had been mixed with other monies. Consequently, the s. 47(a) definition of trust was not triggered. However, the important point to be taken from Henfrey Samson is that if the province were to have drafted its tax collection legislation in a way that created a valid trust under the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, that money would have been excluded from the property of the bankrupt. From another perspective, the province would be able to affect the outcome of the bankruptcy; yet, because it would not have altered the priorities of distribution, the legislation would have survived paramountcy analysis. In Henfrey Samson, Cory J. dissented regarding the applicability of the questions of law to the specific facts at hand, holding that a valid trust was created and that there was no conflict between the provincial and federal legislation since the Bankruptcy Act specifically gave priority to a trust.

138 In my view, the quartet has given rise to two interpretations. One is broad, the other narrow.

139 The respondents in the instant appeal advocate the broad interpretation, according to which any time provincial law affects the final result of a bankruptcy, the province is improperly attempting to alter the priorities of distribution. The Attorney General for Saskatchewan refers to this as the "bottom line" approach. Under such an approach, s. 133, since it affects the end result of the bankruptcy process, would be deemed invalid.

140 The appellants, on the other hand, advocate a narrower interpretation: the quartet precludes a province only from altering the position of a creditor vis-à-vis the other creditors claiming from the same estate within the scheme of distribution created by s. 136(1). In other words, the only thing the province cannot do is "jump the queue" set up by Parliament. Consequently, in order to impugn a provincial law affecting the bankruptcy process, there must be an attempt to reallocate the priority scheme by directly creating interests in the property of the bankrupt.

141 In my opinion, the second interpretation is the correct one. The quartet stands for the position that only those provincial laws which directly improve the priority of a claim upon the actual property of the bankrupt over that accorded by the Bankruptcy Act are inoperative. This accords with the facts of the cases in the quartet. In each case, the provincial governments endeavoured to change the priorities of preferred creditors in s. 136(1) by elevating a lower ranked claim to a higher rank. In Re Bourgault and Henfrey Samson, the province attempted to "queue jump" claims of the Crown ranked last by s. 136(1)(j) by declaring such debts to be "privileges" (Re Bourgault) or deeming them to be "trust money" and hence outside the distribution scheme (Henfrey Samson). In Deloitte Haskins, the province attempted to elevate its claim through a proposed security interest and, finally, in FBDB, the province once again endeavoured to use the mechanism of a privilege/lien.

142 In many ways, the broad approach propounded by the respondents would produce unacceptable results since it risks nullifying the broad array of provincial legislation underpinning the Bankruptcy Act. I am sensitive to the arguments by the Saskatchewan Attorney General that provincial legislation is deeply involved in determining the priority, registration, and amount of indebtedness in the bankruptcy process. In fact, the proprietary and contractual rights that are regulated by the bankruptcy process are usually created by virtue of provincial law. All of these enactments somehow affect the "bottom line".

143 For example, provincial personal property security legislation establishes security interests (such as that relied upon by the Bank of Montreal in the instant appeal) that create secured creditors and validate claims against the estate of the bankrupt. Of similar import is builders' and mechanics' lien legislation that has been held to be constitutionally valid in TransGas Ltd. v. Mid-Plains Contractors Ltd., 1994 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 753; see also Ecarnot (Trustee of) v. Western Credit Union Ltd. reflex, (1991), 7 C.B.R. (3d) 207 (Sask. C.A.) and John M. M. Troup Ltd. v. Royal Bank of Canada, 1962 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R. 487, at p. 494, per Judson J.

144 Other valid provincial legislation invariably affecting the "bottom line" includes: consumer protection and warranties legislation; land titles statutes; sale of goods laws; and a further array of specific statutes such as The Saskatchewan Farm Security Act, S.S. 1988-89, c. S-17.1, s. 44 (protecting and exempting farmland and farm equipment from the property of the bankrupt's estate), the Forest Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 140, s. 142, and the Employment Standards Act, S.B.C. 1980, c. 10, s. 19.

145 The fact that federal bankruptcy legislation is often contingent on provincial initiatives in the area of property and civil rights has been noted by Professor Hogg (Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), at p. 25-9):

> The term "secured creditor" is defined [in federal bankruptcy legislation] ... in terms so general that the validity and effect of "a mortgage, pledge, charge, lien or privilege" is left to be determined under the provincial law relating to secured transactions. For example, if a creditor claims to hold a first mortgage on land in Ontario, the trustee in bankruptcy ... will look to Ontario's law of mortgages to determine whether the creditor is indeed a secured creditor and, if so, the extent to which the creditor can resort to the land in priority to all other creditors. In this way, provincial law has a profound, albeit indirect, effect on the distribution of the bankrupt's assets. [Emphasis added.]

To my mind, there is nothing inherently undesirable about this interplay between federal and provincial statutory initiatives in the regulation of the bankruptcy process.

146 The Alberta Court of Appeal has, for its part, also demonstrated a reluctance to invalidate provincial legislation which simply touches upon bankruptcy proceedings. In Panamericana de Bienes y Servicios S.A. v. Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd., 1991 ABCA 336 (CanLII), [1991] 5 W.W.R. 577, the issue before the court was whether the Bankruptcy Act prevented a court-appointed receiver-manager of an insolvent and bankrupt oil company from complying with an order requiring that receiver-manager, in the interests of environmental integrity, carry out proper abandonment procedures on seven suspended oil wells. That work would be done at the expense of the secured creditors' entitlement under the Bankruptcy Act. At page 599, Laycraft C.J.A. held for the court:

> In my view, there is no...direct conflict in this case. The Alberta legislation regulating oil and gas wells in this province is a statute of general application within a valid provincial power. It is general law regulating the operation of oil and gas wells, and safe practices relating to them, for the protection of the public. It is not aimed at subversion of the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy Act though it may incidentally affect that distribution in some cases. It does so, not by a direct conflict in operation, but because compliance by the receiver with the general law means less money will be available for distribution.

Northern Badger thus echoes the proposition that provincial laws of general application continue to apply in bankruptcy even though they may incidentally alter the amount of proceeds available in the bankrupt's estate for distribution.

147 Provincial law plays a critical role in defining both the number and type of participants in the bankruptcy process and the size of the bankrupt's estate. A number of this Court's decisions have emphasized the value of standardizing bankruptcy priorities across the country. But it is important to remember that a bankruptcy priority is a category. The precise content of that category can and does vary to some extent from one province to the next. It seems to me that s. 72(1) of the Bankruptcy Act is an example of the recognition of provincial diversity. Section 72(1) reads as follows:

72. (1) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by that law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

148 Because the federal legislation already contemplates that provincial law will impact upon the bankruptcy process, the respondents must do more than simply show that s. 133 has an effect on a particular bankruptcy. Indeed, in Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., 1977 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 753, Beetz J., commenting on the precursor to s. 72(1) (s. 50(6)), wrote (at pp. 808-9):

> ...I am of the view that s. 50, subs. (6) of the Bankruptcy Act [R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3] provides a clear indication that Parliament, far from intending to depart from the rule of operational conflict, did in fact aim at the highest possible degree of legal integration of federal and provincial laws...[Emphasis added.]

149 I conclude that within the context of the bankruptcy process judicial authority and common sense militate in favour of a guarded approach to invalidation under the paramountcy doctrine. When this analysis is applied to the case at bar, it obliges the respondents, in order to prevail, to demonstrate that s. 133 of the impugned provincial Act actually reorders the federally established priority scheme with regard to the property of the bankrupt Metal Fab by directly creating interests therein. I now turn to this issue.

D.Application of the Law to Section 133 of The Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Act, 1979

(i) The Validity of Section 133(1)

150 I reproduce s. 133(1), with its important portion underscored:

> 133.--(1) Where a person, whether carrying on an industry included under this Act or not, in this section referred to as the principal, contracts with any other person, in this section referred to as the contractor, for the execution by or under the contractor of the whole or any part of any work for the principal, it is the duty of the principal to ensure that any sum that the contractor or any subcontractor is liable to contribute to the fund is paid and, where the principal fails to do so and the sum is not paid, he is personally liable to pay that sum to the board. [Emphasis added.]

151 In my opinion, s. 133(1) has nothing to do with the property of the bankrupt. It creates a strict in personam obligation from the principal owing to the Board. The property of the principal is in no way subject to the Bankruptcy Act. The bankrupt is not even involved: there is no concern for the specific monies held by Husky for Metal Fab or owing by Husky to Metal Fab. The provision simply creates a third-party guarantee by the principal that the contractor will pay its debts to the Board.

152 The respondent Husky alleges that, regardless of the fact that s. 133(1) does not involve the property of the bankrupt, it remains in operational conflict with the Bankruptcy Act since it may have the effect of allowing the Workers' Compensation Board to recover more money for the Injury Fund than it likely could have done by proving a claim in bankruptcy and relying on s. 136. It is suggested that s. 133 permits the Board to jump from eighth place (under s. 136(1)(h) of the Bankruptcy Act) to first, thereby circumventing the priorities in bankruptcy.

153 In response, I note that s. 133(1) only alters the Board's recovery by permitting it to recover from a non-bankrupt third-party. There is no direct conflict within the meaning of the quartet or of paramountcy doctrine more generally between s. 133(1) and the Bankruptcy Act. There is nothing in the Bankruptcy Act which precludes any creditor, even if specifically mentioned in s. 136, from pursuing its remedies against a third-party as well as or instead of proving a claim in bankruptcy, although double recovery would certainly be frowned upon.

154 The Attorney General for Saskatchewan takes this analysis one step further by suggesting two commonplace and intuitively reasonable examples of situations in which third-party liability operates in concordance with a bankruptcy: a situation involving a personal guarantee by a third party, and a plaintiff's claim in an action for negligence against two co-defendants. The Attorney General reasons as follows:

> [a]A lender may loan money on the condition of receiving a personal guarantee from a third party. If the borrower goes bankrupt, the lender has every right to pursue the third party under the guarantee, and may recover the full amount owing. The lender then will have "advanced its position rather dramatically", compared to what it could have received through the bankruptcy process. The net result is a "clear advantage" to the lender, who "has managed to assure payment of its claim and leave it to the [third party guarantor] to struggle for repayment under the Act," probably as an unsecured creditor of the bankrupt.
> [bIn] the claim of a plaintiff in an action for negligence against two co-defendants. If the plaintiff's claim succeeds, there is a judgment owing against the two defendants. The two defendants are jointly and severally liable for the judgment. If one defendant goes bankrupt, the plaintiff is fully entitled to proceed against the other defendant for the full amount of the judgment, and ignore the bankruptcy process entirely. Again, the net result is a "clear advantage" to the plaintiff, authorized by provincial statute: Contributory Negligence Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. C-71, s. 3(2).

155 In this case, we are not really dealing with the debt of Metal Fab any more. The legislation has validly created two debts that, although interconnected, are independent: the debt from Husky to the Board as surety of the Injury Fund, and then the debt of Metal Fab to Husky for the sums paid by the latter for the delinquency of the former. There is a great difference between altering the priorities under the Bankruptcy Act and statutorily empowering the Board to seek relief from more than one creditor.

156 I do not accept the respondents' submission, supported by Wakeling J.A. on appeal, that the FBDB case extended the "no interference" principle to the relationship between a creditor and a third-party to the bankruptcy. The FBDB decision involved a bank seizing the property of Structal Inc. pursuant to a security agreement. Subsequent to this seizure, Structal made an assignment in bankruptcy. The Workers' Compensation Board of Quebec then tried to claim a priority interest in the seized property by relying on a provision of the workers' compensation legislation which stipulated that assessments for which the employer Structal was liable amounted to a privileged claim on all the property of the employer. This Court, noting that the property in question was still part of the estate of the bankrupt, deemed the Quebec WCB's order to amount to a reordering of the bankruptcy priorities. On this point, Lamer J., held at pp. 1066-67:

> In this Court [the Workers' Compensation Board] argued, inter alia, that the order of priority set out in...the Bankruptcy Act is not applicable, as the immovable in Royal Trust's possession at the time of the bankruptcy was not part of the estate which passed to the trustee in bankruptcy....
> . . .
> With respect, I cannot accept this reasoning. The immovable, encumbered to [FBDB] and seized by the trustee, is part of the "property of a bankrupt" mentioned in...the Bankruptcy Act.

157 Regarding the proper interpretation of the FBDB decision, I agree with the following submissions by the Attorney General of British Columbia and the appellant Board, respectively:

> [In FBDB] the parties in question were seeking to realize, albeit outside of the bankruptcy proceedings, against property of the bankrupt. But that property was nevertheless subject to the Act and so, therefore, were the creditors who sought to realize against it. Accordingly, the Federal Business Development Bank decision does not purport to extend the scheme of priorities of proven claims under the Bankruptcy Act to recovery of the underlying indebtedness from a third party.
> That [FBDB] analysis does not take the trilogy of cases "one step further" and apply [them] to parties or property not involved in bankruptcy. To the contrary, it specifically involves a situation where provincial legislation directly creates an interest in the property of the bankrupt . . . . [T]his is very different from the situation involved in this case where Husky's liability under section 133(1)...is strictly personal and involves no claim whatsoever against either Metal Fab or the property of Metal Fab. Accordingly, it is submitted that the reasoning of the Court of Appeal is a significant and unwarranted extension of the principles established by the leading cases.

158 Section 133(1) does not involve property that is related to or part of the estate of the bankrupt and it is consequently not in operational conflict with the bankruptcy scheme. I am strengthened in this conclusion by the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Evelyn Stevens, supra, and the case of Re French River Contracting Co., [1937] O.W.N. 665. In fact, I prefer the Evelyn Stevens approach over that of both the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in its decision in the case at bar and the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench in Serdula, supra, per Lawton J.

> The principle is simple. The money owing under s. 9(3) [Ontario equivalent to s. 133(1)] is not property of the bankrupt and never comes into the hands of the trustee.

160 The Bank of Montreal submits that Evelyn Stevens can be distinguished on the facts. Its argument revolves around the observation that in Evelyn Stevens there was a trustee overseeing a group of unsecured creditors. On the other hand, in the case at bar, there has been an assignment to a secured creditor and the set-off would deplete the funds normally accruing to this secured creditor. I agree that this difference is noteworthy. However, I am not convinced that this difference is sufficient to undermine the persuasive authority of the Evelyn Stevens decision. The Evelyn Stevens court did not mention that the absence of secured creditors affected in any way its decision to uphold the validity of the impugned provision.

161 In sum, s. 136(1)(h) encompasses a claim against the property of the bankrupt. The Board claim under s. 133(1) targets a solvent principal. The two provisions are co-extensive, not mutually exclusive. Use of s. 133(1) does not displace s. 136(1)(h); it complements it.

162 In closing, although I find there to be no conflict between s. 133(1) and the Bankruptcy Act, I posit that, even if there were to be some element of conflict, this must be evaluated in light of the fact that the provincial legislation is intra vires. Legislation that is intra vires is permitted to have an incidental and ancillary effect on a federal sphere. I would emphasize again that this Court has traditionally declined to invoke the paramountcy doctrine in the absence of actual operational conflict. I am uncomfortable with the "water-tight" approach to federal bankruptcy legislation propounded by the respondents. To interpret the quartet as requiring the invalidation of provincial laws which have any effect on the bankruptcy process is to undermine the theory of co-operative federalism upon which (particularly post-war) Canada has been built. In Deloitte Haskins, supra, at pp. 807-8, Wilson J. recognized it to be appropriate to adopt as narrow a definition of operational conflict as possible in order to allow each level of government as much area of activity as possible within its respective sphere of authority.

163 On a related note, a rather weak argument has been made to the effect that s. 133(1) is inoperative simply because it increases the total amount of the claims being made by creditors. I would respond that even if this were true on the facts, many pieces of provincial legislation achieve precisely the same goal. In fact, as discussed earlier, most claims against a bankrupt's estate are grounded in provincial legislation; I do not see why The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, should be impugned because it may add a creditor to the list, when nearly all of the other creditors will have been added by virtue of other provincial statutes. Neither increasing the number of claims made nor decreasing the amount of assets in the estate is activity necessarily commensurate with altering the priorities of distribution among the creditors.

164 To this end, a principal's liability under s. 133(1) is not extinguished by the bankruptcy of the contractor.

(ii) The Validity of Section 133(3)

165 I find s. 133(1) to be constitutionally valid but because I believe (for reasons outlined infra) that the components of s. 133 are severable, I must evaluate s. 133(3) separately. As mentioned earlier, this provision engages a more direct interference with the bankruptcy scheme since it is the actual property of the bankrupt that is involved in the restitutionary claim launched by the principal. It constitutes, to my mind, the only linkage between the property of the principal and the estate of the bankrupt contractor. Section 133(3) reads as follows:

(3) Where the principal is liable to make payment to the board under subsection (1), he is entitled to be indemnified by any person who should have made the payment and is entitled to withhold, out of any indebtedness due to that person, a sufficient amount in respect of that indemnity.

166 Before proceeding any further, I believe it necessary to subdivide s. 133(3) into two parts because the provision enshrines two different remedies: that of set-off as well as that of indemnification. Clearly, set-off is the more intrusive of the two since it permits the principal to stand first in the priority scheme by taking away the property of the bankrupt before it enters the estate. As to indemnification, any such claim by the principal might have but an ancillary effect on the estate of the bankrupt since it only permits the principal to join the ranks of the unsecured creditors. On this latter point, I note that it has been submitted that s. 136(1)(h) might cover the amount owing to the principal; if so, then the principal would rank well above the unsecured creditors. Although it is not necessary to decide this issue, I shall simply assume that s. 136(1)(h) does not have such a wide ambit.

167 As will soon become evident, this sub-dividing of s. 133(3) is important: given that paramountcy doctrine operates to invalidate only to the extent of the operational conflict, it could be that because of their varying effects, the "set-off" claim could be struck while the indemnification claim remains operational: Robinson, supra, at p. 808; MacDonald v. Vapour Canada Ltd., 1976 CanLII 181 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 134; Hogg, supra, at p. 16-18.

168 However, at this point in the analysis we come to s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act. Neither claim will be invalid if s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy Act can be interpreted in a way that will reconcile the priority scheme of the Act with the common law of set-off (and, implicitly, of indemnification) and if the claims embodied in s. 133(3) can be found to be merely reflective of those common law causes of action. Section 97(3), which provides that the law of set-off is to persist in bankruptcy, reads as follows:

(3) The law of set-off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt and also to all actions instituted by the trustee for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt in the same manner and to the same extent as if the bankrupt were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, except in so far as any claim for set-off is affected by the provisions of this Act respecting frauds or fraudulent preferences. [Emphasis added.]

169 Section 97(3) thus specifically envisions that there will be cases where money owing to the bankrupt will not enter the bankrupt's estate because it will have been set off against a debt owed by the bankrupt to that individual. As Grange J.A. noted in Evelyn Stevens (at p. 748), the money comes to the Board by virtue of the Workers' Compensation Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 539: "[i]t is the Bankruptcy Act itself and not the provincial legislation that recognizes rights of set-off". I note in passing that the right of set-off in s. 97(3) includes both legal and equitable set-off: Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1993), vol. 1, at pp. 4-90 and 4-91. This Court has recognized that legal set-off does not operate within the context of an assignment since that assignment destroys the mutuality of the cross-obligations between the parties: Holt v. Telford, 1987 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 193. In the case at bar, Metal Fab assigned its book debts to the Bank, thereby presumptively eliminating the availability of legal set-off. To this end, my focus shall be limited to equitable set-off.

170 The fundamental question at this juncture is whether s. 133(3) is merely declaratory of the rights to set-off and indemnification that existed at equity. If s. 133(3) creates no new rights of set-off and merely confirms the availability of traditional equitable set-off, it is consistent with the Bankruptcy Act. In this regard, I rely on the Henfrey Samson case. In Henfrey Samson, McLachlin J. suggested at (pp. 34-35) that if the statutory device (in that case a trust) shared the characteristics of its common law counterpart, the former would be compatible with the Bankruptcy Act even if it affected the distribution scheme. On the other hand, if the statutory device was wider in scope than that available at law or equity, there would be conflict and the device would need to be declared a nullity. In Henfrey Samson, the Court found that the statutory trust shared none of the characteristics of a trust established under the general principles of law; accordingly, it was susceptible to invalidation on the ground of interference with the order of priorities. In this regard (and as shall become evident infra), Henfrey Samson is distinguishable from the case at bar. No "deeming" is necessary to bring Husky within the four corners of the "law of set-off" as that term is used in s. 97(3).

171 I note that set-off operated within the bankruptcy context as early as the time of Elizabeth I. The first specific statutory set-off clause was codified in a 1705 statute: Philip R. Wood, English and International Set-Off (1989), at p. 282. The rationale behind the use of set-off in the bankruptcy context is aptly summarized by Fletcher Moulton L.J. in Lister v. Hooson, [1908] 1 K.B. 174 (C.A.), at p. 178:

> The right of set-off in bankruptcy has been dealt with by various statutes, but takes its origin from the fact that the jurisdiction in bankruptcy was from the first an equitable jurisdiction. The successive statutory formulations of the consequence of this principle, embodied in the clauses as to mutual credit, dealings, &c., have never altered this fundamental principle, and, speaking for myself, I cannot see any ground why in the present instance the injustice should be perpetrated of making a person who in the balance is not a debtor to the estate pay in full the sum due to the estate and receive only a dividend on the sums due from the estate.

172 In my opinion, s. 133(3) is duplicative of the law of equitable set-off as delineated by this Court in Telford, supra, and confers a right that does not go beyond what would be ordinarily available at law or equity. Moreover, under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, a province has the competence to codify legal and equitable rules related to set-off. Ostensibly, the motivation behind the codification of these rules in s. 133(3) is to facilitate recovery by principals, many of whom would be more familiar with the terms of a statute than the intricacies of the common law.

173 Regarding the declaratory nature of Husky's claim against the now assigned estate of the bankrupt, I note that, absent s. 133(3), such a claim would exist according to the law of restitution or the law of contract. In terms of restitution, it is settled that a person may claim for recoupment or reimbursement of monies expended by him under compulsion of law if the effect of such a payment is to discharge the liability of another. In other words, A will be allowed to recover from B by way of set-off where A has been required to make a payment to C on B's behalf. I am supported in this conclusion by the following passage cited from Moule v. Garrett (1872), L.R. 7 Ex. 101, at p. 104:

> "Where the plaintiff has been compelled by law to pay, or, being compellable by law, has paid money which the defendant was ultimately liable to pay, so that the latter obtains the benefit of the payment by the discharge of his liability; under such circumstances the defendant is held indebted to the plaintiff in the amount."

174 This point was addressed in a more detailed manner in the decision of Lord Wright M.R. in Brook's Wharf and Bull Wharf, Ltd. v. Goodman Brothers, [1937] 1 K.B. 534 (C.A.), at p. 544:

> The essence of the rule is that there is a liability for the same debt resting on the plaintiff and the defendant and the plaintiff has been legally compelled to pay, but the defendant gets the benefit of the payment, because his debt is discharged either entirely or pro tanto, whereas the defendant is primarily liable to pay as between himself and the plaintiff. The case is analogous to that of a payment by a surety which has the effect of discharging the principal's debt and which, therefore, gives a right of indemnity against the principal. [Emphasis added.]

175 In the case at bar (assuming that the order was validly made and limited to the liabilities arising from Metal Fab's work for Husky), Husky is eligible for set-off since Husky's liability to pay arose only as a consequence of Metal Fab's default regarding its requirement to make payments to the Injury Fund. Payment by Husky would have the obvious effect of releasing Metal Fab of its liability to the Board. Thus, in light of the fact that Husky is under a clear legal obligation to make the payments in question, it follows that this is a circumstance where Husky is entitled to seek restitution from Metal Fab. In this connection, the Workers' Compensation Board of British Columbia points out that the B.C. legislation does not include an explicit recognition of set-off, but still the B.C. courts appear to have read it according to the general principles of restitution.

176 The second ground for set-off independent of s. 133(3) arises from the contractual relationship between Metal Fab and Husky. The contracts binding the parties, in clauses 12.01 and 13.01, oblige the contractor to "comply with all laws" and indemnify the principal from any expense arising from the "negligent performance, purported performance or non-performance of the Contract" by the contractors. Given this language, Metal Fab's failure to pay amounts owing to the Board constituted a breach of its contractual obligations to Husky. An indemnification claim rises concomitantly. This claim stands apart from s. 133(3).

177 It is submitted that the fact that the property of the bankrupt has been assigned to the Bank and, thus, that the debt is no longer technically owed to Metal Fab but to the Bank of Montreal, militates against a finding that the law of set-off applies in this case. I disagree. Equitable set-off (unlike legal set-off) can operate within the context of an assignment, even of book debts: Telford, supra, at pp. 206-9, affirming Government of Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Co. (1888), 13 App. Cas. 199 (P.C.). The only pre-requisite to set-off against the assignee is that the claim against the assignee is to arise out of the same contract or series of events which gave rise to the original claim or be closely connected with that contract or series of events. As noted by Wilson J. in Telford, supra, at p. 211:

. . . cases involving [set-off] debts that arise from the same contract or closely inter-related contracts form an exception to the general rule. In these cases a debt arising out of the contract or closely interrelated contracts may be set-off against the assignee even if the debt accrues due after the notice of the assignment.

178 In Telford, the two debts arose out of a land-swap. The Telfords and Canadian Stanley Development Ltd. exchanged lands of equal value, each paying the other a different cash sum and each taking back a first mortgage or a second mortgage. The end result of the transaction was that on closing Canadian Stanley would pay the Telfords $50,000 which the Telfords would use for the purpose of financing the construction of a residence on their new land. Five days prior to the closing of its deal with the Telfords, Canadian Stanley assigned its mortgage to the Holts to secure the balance of the purchase price on a piece of land the Holts had sold to Canadian Stanley, but failed to notify the Telfords about this assignment before the transaction with them was closed. The Telfords later agreed to a postponement of the Canadian Stanley mortgage resulting in the priority of that mortgage moving from second to third place on title. The Telfords only learned about Canadian Stanley's assignment after trying to tender their first payment on the mortgage. They then indicated that a court application for a discharge of the mortgage would be made. Shortly thereafter, the Holts demanded the payment then due ($50,000 plus interest, for a total of $50,886.60) and filed a statement of claim against the Telfords for the entire amount owing (this being $150,000, independent of the amount owing on the mortgage). This claim was based upon a clause in the Telford mortgage which provided that upon default of any payment of the principal the whole amount would become payable. After receiving notice of the Holts' statement of claim, the Telfords paid the $50,886.60 into court and then counter-claimed for a discharge of the mortgage, alleging that they had the right to set off the debt owed to them by Canadian Stanley against the assignee Holts' claim.

179 Wilson J. permitted the Telfords to use the doctrine of equitable set-off. It was duly noted that the debts did not accrue until after the assignment. However, Wilson J. did find that equitable set-off could operate since the debts were so closely connected that it would have been unfair to enforce one without allowing the setting off of the other.

180 The specific assignment and the specific bankruptcy extant in the case at bar satisfy the Telford test. I note that the debt from Metal Fab to Husky accrued on the date of the demand to Husky by the Board (March 16, 1992). This was four days after Husky was given notice of the assignment to the Bank yet before the occurrence of the actual assignment. However, the Telford test is met since Husky's indemnity claim arose out of the very contracts pursuant to which funds are now owing to the Bank of Montreal; in fact, Husky has a direct interest in the bankrupt's property which, by force of the assignment, is now held by the Bank. Moreover, the nexus between the amounts Husky seeks to set off and the assigned debt can be said to be more direct than it has been in other cases where equitable set-off has been allowed: Hanak v. Green, [1958] 2 All E.R. 141 (C.A.); Coba Industries Ltd. v. Millie's Holdings (Canada) Ltd., 1985 CanLII 144 (BC CA), [1985] 6 W.W.R. 14 (B.C.C.A.); Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd. v. Molena Alpha Inc., [1978] 3 All E.R. 1066 (C.A.), affirmed [1979] A.C. 757 (H.L.).

181 The cause of action specifically contemplated by Husky (i.e., a principal seeking restitution from an assignee for book debts from a assignor whose delinquency prompted the principal's liability in the first place) is of a sufficiently interconnected nexus so as to fit the "closeness" criteria mandated by the Telford test. This is especially the case when the assignee knew about the outstanding debts before receiving assignment of the estate. I am not persuaded by the Bank's submission that equitable set-off is not available because the right to indemnification did not arise under the contract. This analysis ignores the essential characterization of the debts. The basis of the indemnification in the appeal at bar is the debt paid by Husky on behalf of Metal Fab which related to the contracts signed between those two parties. Furthermore, according Husky the ability to set off also fulfils what is likely the principal raison d'être of the doctrine of equitable set-off in the first place, namely the promotion of fairness.

182 Lord Denning M.R., in the Federal Commerce case, remarks at p. 1078 (C.A.):

We have to ask ourselves: what should we do now so as to ensure fair dealing between the parties?... This question must be asked in each case as it arises for decision....

183 I recognize that, in the appeal at bar, Husky is liable under the terms of s. 133(1). Moreover, s. 133(1) entrenches an absolute liability standard in order to create joint and several responsibility among all employers for the sums that one of them has left unpaid. The question then arises why it would remain "fair" to allow Husky to, in the end, escape the effects of this liability by permitting all of the unpaid dues to flow from the estate of the insolvent bankrupt, to the detriment of the other creditors.

184 My response is twofold: (1) although s. 133 renders the principal and the contractor jointly and severally liable to the Board, as between the principal and contractor it is clear that the primary liability reposes with the contractor and, consequently, the solicitation of contribution for payments made on behalf of that contractor by the principal is consonant with commercial fairness; and (2) Husky's insistence that the contract contain terms obliging Metal Fab to make the payments to the Board and its decision to hold back funds (this being a standard industry practice), although certainly not relieving it of liability under s. 133, does militate in favour of a finding that Husky's conduct was such that it would be equitable and fair to allow it the right of set-off.

185 Apart from United Kingdom jurisprudence, the most persuasive authority cited to us on the s. 133(3) issue is the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Evelyn Stevens. Grange J.A., after reviewing the authorities, concluded that equitable set-off was available to a principal who had become fixed with liability for the contractor's unpaid debts. He concluded at p. 749:

> Whether or not the money was due to the principal before the bankruptcy, it most assuredly "arose out of or was closely connected with the same contract or series of events".

186 The Bank of Montreal also submits that s. 97(3) is not applicable to a situation where there are secured creditors who own the funds of the bankrupt. To this end, although s. 97(3) may have been applicable to the facts in Evelyn Stevens, it is not so to the case at bar. In response, I note that s. 97(3) deems the law of set-off to operate in relation to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt. There is no distinction made regarding the types of claims. And the Bank is the owner of nothing less and nothing more than the "estate of the bankrupt".

187 I thus find that, since s. 97(3) encapsulates the rights ordinarily available to Husky at equity, s. 133(3) is fully operative in the case at bar, as well as to all situations in bankruptcy where the principal would fall within the Telford test as I have interpreted it.

(iii) Does the Partial or Total Invalidity of Section 133(3) Render Section 133(1) Inoperative?

188 It is not necessary to consider this issue since I find that subs. (3) is constitutionally valid. However, I would like to offer certain comments on the interplay between ss. 133(1) and (3).

189 It is important to recognize that s. 133(1) does not make the principal's obligation to the Board in any way contingent upon the principal's ability to obtain indemnity (through set-off or otherwise) under s. 133(3). There may be many cases in which there is either no indebtedness between the principal and the contractor or insufficient indebtedness to cover the full liability involved. Yet, in either of these situations, s. 133(1) is still fully applicable. To this end, not only does s. 133(1) operate in isolation of the bankruptcy, it also operates independently from s. 133(3). Section 133(1) is the key feature of s. 133 as a whole. It aims at preserving the integrity of the Injury Fund. Section 133(3) is clearly secondary in this regard. Consequently, I do not accept Husky's argument that s. 133(1) was intended solely to operate in conjunction with s. 133(3). Although I might be prepared to find that s. 133(3) and the equitable rights it codifies cannot operate independently from s. 133(1), I have no doubt that s. 133(1) can operate independently from s. 133(3). The legislature contemplated that s. 133(3) may not always be available to assist a principal to recoup sums paid under subs. (1).

190 The argument was raised that s. 133(1) cannot stand alone since, without the accompaniment of s. 133(3), it is a draconian, unreasonable provision tantamount to an expropriation. But the point of the matter is that, since s. 133(3) is merely declaratory of law and equity, s. 133(1) does not exist without a right to indemnification (or to set-off).

191 If s. 133(3) were invalid and if the law did not incorporate the equitable right of set-off (as discussed supra), then s. 133(1) would operate to guarantee the Board payment from the principal without a corresponding restitutionary recourse on behalf of the latter. Although this may seem a difficult burden to bear, in a sense it is simply the cost of doing business in a context where, for public policy reasons, the yoke of the contractor's delinquency is placed on the principal's shoulders instead of those of the workers. Although heavy, this burden, in my mind, is not draconian. It is partly attenuated by the fact that Husky, as a sophisticated employer, can be safely assumed to be well-versed in the practice of obtaining clearance certificates to protect itself from principal's liability under s. 133(1). These certificates allow a principal to determine in advance of releasing funds to a contractor whether that contractor has outstanding indebtedness to the Board. However, even if it created a draconian burden, there is nothing barring the legislature from passing such legislation. The following passage from La Forest J.A. (as he then was) in New Brunswick v. Estabrooks Pontiac Buick Ltd. (1982), 44 N.B.R. (2d) 201, at p. 214, is pertinent:

> The courts should not...place themselves in the position of frustrating regulatory schemes or measures obviously intended to reallocate rights and resources simply because they affect vested rights. For legislation almost inevitably affects vested rights.

192 The legislature can even pass expropriation legislation (much more onerous than s. 133(1)) as long as the language is clear: TransGas Ltd., supra; Manitoba Fisheries Ltd. v. The Queen, 1978 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 101.

193 There are also policy reasons as to why s. 133(1) ought to be viewed as operating independently from s. 133(3). The Workers' Compensation Board of Alberta argues convincingly:

> ...it is submitted that to not construe section 133(1)...separately from section 133(3) would allow mischief to creep into industrial practices. An unscrupulous employer could incorporate a subcontractor to provide all its labour services. Thereafter if that former employer (now a principal) could not be held liable under section 133(1) where the subcontractor is allowed to go into or assigns itself into bankruptcy, the Accident [Injury] Fund is at risk. Ultimately, if such a practice became widespread, the efficacy of the workers' compensation system could be undermined.

194 In sum, I respectfully disagree with the trial judge's and Court of Appeal's conclusions that s. 133 is to be treated as an indivisible whole. Although this finding is not necessary to dispose of this appeal, I hope that it may settle any extant, and preclude any future, confusion regarding the operation of s. 133, as well as its counterparts in the laws of the provinces other than Saskatchewan.

E. Some Residual Issues

195 The view of this Court was principally solicited for the purpose of answering the constitutional questions. However, several of the parties raise threshold factual issues which were not pleaded at trial which I should like to address, albeit briefly.

196 The Bank of Montreal submits that Husky was not liable under s. 133 for payment of Metal Fab's assessments. Husky itself raises a similar issue. This follows, it is alleged, from the following argument: within the context of s. 133, assessments should relate only to the work done by the delinquent contractor for the impugned principal. In the case at bar, it is submitted that there is no indication the assessments against Husky were specific only to the work completed for Husky by Metal Fab; in fact, some affidavit evidence is now tendered to the contrary. This evidence alleges that the assessment sent to Metal Fab by the Board was not related to any particular work, but calculated in accordance with an annual payroll estimate supplied by the contractor to the Board.

197 In response, I note that both the trial judge and the appeal judges found that the order under s. 133 had been validly issued. This finding was not contested in the courts below. Leave was not granted by this Court to hear this issue. For these reasons, I believe that this issue should not now be heard for the first time. The general practice of this Court is, given the lack of considered reasons of the courts below, to refuse to consider new matters raised for the first time, especially where, had the issue actually been raised, the parties may have been in a position to present relevant evidence and submissions: Vickery v. Nova Scotia Supreme Court (Prothonotary), 1991 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 671; R. v. Amway Corp., 1989 CanLII 107 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 21.

198 A far preferable procedure would be to permit this argument to be raised at the new trial that, given the constitutionality in bankruptcy of s. 133, shall be ordered pursuant to the disposition of the instant appeal. At that point, evidence can be adduced as to the exact sources of the $246,745.26 allegedly owed by Metal Fab to the Board. A trial judge, when properly presented with all of the material evidence, will be in a far better position to sift through the records and ascertain the true amount of Metal Fab's unpaid contributions for which Husky could be held liable. Although it could very well be that the extant assessments reveal Husky's true liability, at this juncture I am not prepared to make such a finding.

199 However, although not in a position to determine whether the assessments made against Husky by the Board involved unpaid contributions stemming from work Metal Fab completed for principals other than Husky, this Court can, as a question of law, determine whether s. 133 could permit the recovery of such amounts. I find it does not. The liability of the principal is to be limited to the specific work that was completed for it by the delinquent contractor.

200 It is unfortunate that the wording of s. 133 in the 1979 version of the statute was amended in an ambiguous form. In cases of ambiguity, courts are to rely on the principle of statutory interpretation according to which statutes purporting to pay the debts of one person out of the property of another are to be given a restrictive interpretation: Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (3rd ed. 1994), at p. 370; Board of Industrial Relations v. Avco Financial Services Realty Ltd., 1979 CanLII 230 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 699.

201 I am further fortified in this regard by the fact that the grandfather of s. 133, s. 9 of the 1910 Workmen's Compensation Act, limited the principal's liability to the actual work executed for it by the delinquent contractor: see also s. 11 of the 1928 legislation. In any event, gauging from the submissions made before this Court by the Appellants and some of the Interveners, such appears to be the practice of the provincial Boards when issuing notices under s. 133 and its companion provisions. This accords with common sense, as it would appear counter-intuitive to hold Husky liable for all of Metal Fab's outstanding debts to the Board. Under such a regime, liability could be virtually limitless since it might encompass all of the shortfall accruing to the contractor independent of the particular principal under whose contracts that shortfall actually arose.

202 However, I note that, although relevant to the amount of the assessment in the appeal at bar, this issue is not of wide public importance given that the Saskatchewan legislation was once again amended in 1993 (S.S. 1993, c. 63, s. 40) to provide expressly that the liability be limited to the specific work performed. As I see it, the 1993 amendment supports my conclusion that the liability of the principal be limited to the unpaid funds arising out of the specific work completed for it since this amendment appears to be intended as a clarification of the law, not as a substantive change.

203 I also find that limiting s. 133(1) to the debts arising out of the actual work completed for the principal permits the subsection to operate in tandem with subs. (3). As was discussed supra, subs. (3), in order to be valid in the bankruptcy context, must be interpreted to permit only set-off to the extent allowed at law or equity. I believe that the law of set-off would only allow the restitution of the sums paid by the principal to the Board that actually involved monies that the delinquent contractor was liable to pay by virtue of its nexus with the principal.

204 The Board and the Bank of Montreal raise a further issue. It is suggested that s. 133(3) does not entitle Husky to indemnify itself out of funds owing to Metal Fab because it received the demand for payment from the Board after it had been notified that Metal Fab had given notice of assignment of book debts to the Bank of Montreal. There was thus no "indebtedness towards the contractor", but only towards the assigned party.

205 Again, I note that this issue was not argued fully in the courts below; in fact, no questions were raised regarding the factual ability of Husky to indemnify itself from the property of the bankrupt. It thus comes as no surprise that the factual record to which this Court can turn to resolve this question is somewhat bare. I therefore conclude that this issue should not be decided at this point. It is better left to be determined by a trial court, perhaps even by fiat. I would suggest, however, that the fact that s. 133(3) is but declaratory of equitable set-off (as discussed supra), in which set-off can operate after the assignment has occurred, be seriously taken into account in the eventual disposition of this issue.

206 Husky argues that it did not breach its statutory duty to ensure payment by the contractor under s. 133(1) because it held back certain sums (in excess of the unpaid assessments) and ensured that Metal Fab would be contractually bound to pay the WCB fund. Until this point in the litigation, it was settled that Husky was, barring the non-operation of the statute, liable to pay the Board. There is no reason for this Court now to review the findings of the trial and appellate judges in this matter, especially, once again, given the paucity of the factual record advanced in favour of this proposition.

207 In any event, I note that the duty created by s. 133(1) is not one of due diligence. The statutory language has encumbered the principal with absolute liability. Nothing short of actually ensuring payment will discharge the duty. Husky's reading of s. 133(1) ignores the true purpose of the provision, namely the maintenance of the viability of the Injury Fund through the creation of joint and several liability among employers for the contributions.

208 Finally, on a related note, it is submitted that once the property passed into the hands of the assigned Bank, Husky was no longer in any position of control or supervision over Metal Fab. Therefore it no longer operated under the statutory duty to ensure that Metal Fab paid its assessments. For this reason, the ability of the Board to collect under s. 133(1) could not be invoked. Husky also submits that, were it to encourage the bankrupt to pay the amounts due to the Board, it would infringe s. 158 (obligation of a bankrupt to deliver all of the property to the trustee) and thereby effectively aid and abet in the commission of an offence contrary to s. 198(a) of the Bankruptcy Act. I reject this submission. A bankrupt's obligations under s. 158 are necessarily qualified by other provisions of the Act such as s. 72(1) (allowing interplay with provincial legislation) and s. 97(3) (recognizing rights of set-off against the bankrupt's estate). There is no operational conflict between ss. 133(1) and 158(a). I also note that s. 133(1) creates a situation in which, ab initio, the principal is liable for any debt owed to the Board by the contractor. It does not matter whether, ex post facto, control over the contractor's estate passes into other hands.

VI. Conclusions and Disposition

209 By way of summary, it may be helpful to state my conclusions:

1 There is no conflict between s. 133(1) of the Act and the Bankruptcy Act. Consequently, s. 133(1), although not primarily designed for the bankruptcy context, is applicable and operative if and when the contractor whose delinquency gave rise to the Board's order against the principal files an assignment in bankruptcy.

2 There is no conflict, as the term is understood in paramountcy analysis, between s. 133(3) and the Bankruptcy Act, regardless of whether s. 133(3) is used for purposes of set-off or indemnification from the estate of the bankrupt. Section 133(3) is declaratory of the equitable right of set-off and indemnification. Such an equitable right arises upon the facts of this case and is reconcilable with the Bankruptcy Act by virtue of s. 97(3).

3 In terms of constitutional analysis, the simple fact that a provincial undertaking may have an effect upon a bankruptcy does not necessarily mean that such an undertaking is to be nullified under paramountcy analysis. Further, the fact that the Board might be able to recover more money as a result of s. 133 does not mean that this provision is in operational conflict with the Bankruptcy Act. Operational conflict means that compliance with the provincial statute means offending the federal one. But the two pieces of legislation involved here are complementary.

4 The Court of Appeal erred in law in asserting that the "quartet" of Supreme Court of Canada cases, Re Bourgault, Deloitte Haskins, Henfrey Samson, and FBDB, are to be interpreted as invalidating any provincial law that affects the outcome of a bankruptcy.

210 I would answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1 Where a contractor as referred to in s. 133 of The Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17, is in bankruptcy and but for the bankruptcy, the principal as referred to in s. 133 would be liable to pay the assessment due by the contractor under the Act, is s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in whole or in part, by reason of being in conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, and in particular ss. 17(1), 67, 95, 136(1)(h), 148, 158(a) and 198(a) thereof?

No.

2 Was s. 133 of the said Act inoperative or inapplicable in the circumstances of this case?

No.

211 Consequently, I would allow the appeal with costs throughout and set aside the judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal. I would remit the matter to trial in order to determine whether, on the facts of this case, the Board notice to pay was properly tendered under s. 133(1), whether Husky can (despite the assignment and the timing of the notice thereof) indemnify itself from the property of the bankrupt, and whether the amounts assessed were actually those which arose out of Metal Fab's work for Husky. If so, then the Board is statutorily entitled to recover the unpaid contributions from Husky and Husky, in turn, can set off these amounts from the hold-backs it has regarding the property of the bankrupt, which has been assigned to the Bank of Montreal. In the unlikely event of a shortfall between the contributions owing and the amount held back, Husky is entitled to file a claim for this shortfall as an unsecured creditor, unless it wishes to present legal submissions as to why it should be able to claim under s. 136(1)(h).

212 After these reasons were prepared, I had the benefit of reading the reasons of my colleague Gonthier J. I would like to offer a response on certain points. I am uncomfortable with reliance upon secondary sources -- even sources as allegedly succinct and helpful as the article by Roman and Sweatman, supra -- for interpretation of this Court's decisions. I believe that it is preferable to refer directly to the decisions, particularly when I find that the article in question advances propositions which I find problematic in the so-called "effect" aspect, which I will now discuss.

213 My understanding of the concept of "effect" in this Court's federalism jurisprudence is that both vires and paramountcy analyses hinge upon the extent of the effect. "An" effect on a federal sphere is, by itself, insufficient to invalidate provincial legislation. Rather, there must be a relatively substantial effect (i.e., an effect that is more than incidental or ancillary). Where this is so, the operational conflict must be express, as I have mentioned in these reasons; upon finding such an operational conflict, the provincial legislation will yield to the federal legislation to the extent of the conflict. In so far as my colleague has introduced some further refinements on this traditional analysis, dealing with exclusive as opposed to concurrent or overlapping jurisdictions, and invoking a separate concept or doctrine of "applicability" in this context, I, with respect, find this somewhat confusing. In short, it seems to me to confuse the doctrines of vires and paramountcy, as these have been traditionally understood, and I do not read the Deloitte Haskins and Bank of Montreal cases as supporting such a departure.

DECISION: December 13, 1996

SAUNDERS, .I.

BACKGROUND TO PROCEEDINGS

The hearing conducted in Special Chambers on November 13, 1996 comprised two separate appeals from the decision of the Registrar in Bankruptcy dated June 18, 1996.

Barrington and Vokey Limited (B & V) was a mechanical subcontractor with its head office in Sydney. Evidently the business had prospered for many years. In 1994 the bankrupt decided to expand its business and moved its central office to Halifax. It started work on a number of large projects spread throughout Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Within a year the bankrupt ran out of money and voluntarily declared bankruptcy on March 17, 1995. On that date B & V had a number of construction jobs with JonelJim Concrete Construction (1994) Limited; Dineen Construction (Atlantic) Incorporated and Maxim Construction Inc.. B & V had delivered certain of its inventories to each job site for the purpose of installation in the various projects. They had not been installed or paid for as of the date of bankruptcy.

Each of the general contractors took the position that they were entitled to use the inventories in order to complete the projects. A general outline of the contracts and projects is contained at pp. 2 - 4 of the decision of the Registrar. Maxim Construction Inc. and the Guaranty Company of North America did not participate in the appeals, as the dispute with those parties was settled.

Two separate appeals were heard together. The appeal filed by JonelJim Concrete Construction (1994) Limited ("JonelJim") is dated October 28,1996. No objection was taken to the late filing of this appeal document. Mr. Clarke, solicitor for the Trustee of the Estate of B & V took the position that the appeal filed by JonelJim was within time.

The second Notice of Appeal filed by Dineen Construction (Atlantic) Incorporated ("Dineen") is dated August 6, 1996.

The decision of A. Martin Smith, Q.C., Registrar in Bankruptcy is dated June 18, 1996. In summary, he concluded as follows:

(1) He had jurisdiction to deal with the matters set out in the Amended Notice of Motion dated February 15, 1996;

(2) He dismissed the defence of setoff;

(3) The contracts in question were contracts for work and materials and the property did not pass to the general contractors as of the date of bankruptcy;

(4) Neither Dineen nor JonelJim had properly appealed the disallowance of the Proof of Claim by the Trustee and had therefore lost any rights to the assets which they might have had.

In a series of correspondence subsequent to his decision, the Registrar held that the dollar value of the claim would be equal to the invoice value of the goods and further held that JonelJim was obliged to pay a rental payment to the Estate in the amount of $1,926.00.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

Having considered the submissions of counsel and the authorities to which I was referred, I conclude that the arguments advanced by Mr. Clarke for the Trustee are sound, and that the appeals of Dineen and JonelJim ought to be dismissed, with costs payable to the Estate, here and below.

I will adopt and apply much of the same analysis employed by Mr. Clarke in his submission when addressing each of the issues raised by the appellants in their grounds of appeal.

I will deal first with the appeal by JonelJim and follow that with a consideration of the appeal by Dineen.

APPEAL BY JONELJIM

I will use the same paragraph numbers set out in the Notice of Motion dated October 28, 1996.

1. JonelJim states that the Registrar erred in finding that the Proof of Claim of JonelJim constituted a valid claim against the inventory without first hearing the appeal of the Disallowance filed by JonelJim dated June 16,1995.

As a preliminary observation I note that this ground of appeal is factually incorrect. The Registrar never found that the Proof of Claim of Jonefrn constituted a valid claim against the inventory.

In argument, Mr. Corsano, counsel for JonelJim argued that the appeal of the Disallowance which they filed in June, 1995 should have been heard prior to the motion of the Trustee in Bankruptcy. However, the record indicates that this matter was never raised as an objection before the Registrar. JonelJim had the opportunity to set their appeal of disallowance down for hearing and never did so. In any event, the same issues would have been determined. JonelJim had every right to argue, and did in fact argue, the issues relating to their appeal of the disallowance during the Trustee's application.

2. That the Registrar erred in finding that the Appeal of the Disallowance dated June 16, 1995 by JonelJim had not been perfected because it was not set down for hearing.

The Appeal of the Disallowance is governed by s. 81(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Any appeal by a creditor from the trustee's decision is to be made to the Bankruptcy Court in accordance with the General Rules.

Rule 97 directs that appeals from a disallowance of proof of claim shall be by motion "of the Court" (sic). Rules 12 through 14 set out the procedures to be followed on a motion to the Court. These provisions indicate that a motion must not only be filed but must be set for hearing on a date certain. Form 45 found in Houlden and Morawetz contains the form of Notice of Appeal. The Form requires that a date certain be inserted in the appeal document prior to being filed.
In argument during the appeal, while conceding that the forms designed by Houlden and Morawetz are customarily used in general practice, Mr. Corsano argued that they are not legislative enactments and that simply because the form prescribes a date for hearing is not determinative of the issue. He suggested it would be a "denial of natural justice to disallow JonelJim's right to be heard" and that at the very least JonelJim "should have been told of its obligation to set its claim down for hearing or be at risk of having it struck out".

With respect, there is no merit to either argument. JonelJim was not prejudiced. Its position was advanced and considered during the Trustee's application before the Registrar.
There is ample support for the determination made by the Registrar that a notice of appeal is not perfected unless it is filed in accordance with the Rules, with a date certain. Otherwise, a notice may simply be filed by a creditor and the matter never pursued or concluded. That is in fact what happened in this particular case. I am satisfied that if the Estate had not filed its application, the matter never would have come before the Court.
I accept the submission made by Mr. Clarke that the proper test on an appeal from a decision of the Registrar should be that applied by Justice K. Peter Richard in Re Dr. Siraj Husain B17658 (unreported, oral decision delivered January 6, 1994, released March 16, 1994). In that case, Richard, J. approved and applied the observations of Justice Anderson in Re Barukory Investments Ltd. (Ont.) (1979), 32 CBR 185 at p. 186:

> " . . . Save in extraordinary circumstances, I do not think the differing opinion of the judge, if he entertains one, should be substituted for that of the registrar. Putting it in a slightly different fashion, unless there is demonstrated on the part of the registrar some error in principle, some failure to take into account a proper factor or some taking into account of an improper factor, which demonstrably led to a wrong conclusion. I think that his disposition in the matter should stand."

I accept that as a proper statement of the law. There is no authority referred to me which is contrary to the decision of the Registrar. I find that his decision is a reasonable one taking into account the provisions of the Bankruptcy Rules and the forms annexed thereto.

3. That the Registrar erred by finding that the ownership in the inventory had not transferred to JonelJim under s. 7(c) of the JonelJim Purchase Order or s. 5.5(a) of the Canadian Standard Construction Subcontract.

The Registrar determined that the construction contract between the parties was a contract for labour and materials. It was not a contract for the sale of particular chattels. That finding was not the subject of challenge or comment on the appeal.
I am satisfied that the Registrar's determination is in accordance with the Registrar's previous decision involving Emco Supply in this same bankruptcy, and is also consistent with such Nova Scotia cases as McNeil v. Ja Ron Construction Company Limited and Loughran (1979), 35 N.S.R. (2d) 150 (NSSC,TD); and Newell Fisheries Limited v. Gough et al (1983), 22 BLR 179 (NSSC,TD). In such cases the title of goods to be used in the construction does not pass to the general contractor or the owner until they are incorporated into the project or affixed to the real estate. The mere fact that they are delivered to a construction site is insufficient to pass title.
In support of their respective claims and appeals each of JonelJim and Dineen rely upon Article 5.5 of the Canadian Standard Construction Subcontract (CSCS) which provides:

> If the contractor terminates the subcontract under the conditions set out in 5.1 and 5.4, he is entitled to:
> a) take possession of the subcontractor's products and utilize the subcontractor's construction machinery and equipment, the whole subject to the rights of third parties, and to finish the subcontract work by whatever method he may deem expedient but without undue delay or expense;
> b) withhold any further payments to the subcontractor until the subcontract work is finished;
> c) upon total performance of the subcontract work, charge the subcontractor the amount by which the full cost of finishing the subcontract work together with a reasonable allowance to cover the cost of any corrections required by the warranties for which the subcontractor is liable exceeds the unpaid balance of the subcontract price; or if such cost of finishing the work is less than the unpaid balance of the subcontract price, pay the subcontractor the difference; and

d) on expiry of such warranty period as may exist, charge the subcontractor the amount by which the cost of corrections under warranty exceeds the allowance provided for such corrections, or if the costs of such correction is less than the allowance, pay the subcontractor the difference.

JonelJim had no such provision in its contract with B & V. The $1.5 Million contract between B & V and JonelJim consists of a single, double-sided page (purchase order) wherein (see Term and Condition No. 6, for example) the risk of assets was clearly that of B & V. While it is true that Term and Condition No. 7(c) gave JonelJim an election to convert its contract with B& V to a CSCS, there is no evidence it ever did so. There is absolutely no merit to JonelJim's submission that the unsigned pages of the CSCS became or "ought to be incorporated" in the one page purchase order/contract it signed with B & V.

The Registrar was in a perfect position to decide this issue, and did so. I will not interfere.

4. JonelJim states that the Registrar erred in finding that the Trustee had ownership of the inventory.

In an affidavit sworn January 31, 1996 by Derek G. Cramm, CMA, CIP, licensed Trustee for the Trustee of the Estate, claim is made to ownership of the inventories. It was never contested before the Registrar that these inventories were not the assets of B & V as of the date of bankruptcy, March 17, 1995. The assets vest in the Estate pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

5. JonelJim submits that the Registrar erred in failing to find that JonelJim had a legitimate claim against the Trustee for services of Mr. Peach and Mr. Brown during the inventory count in April of 1995 for the sum of $1,926.00.

It is evident from the record that JonelJim and the Trustee, both directly and through their respective solicitors, negotiated a rental for a piece of equipment. JonelJim agreed to pay the Estate the sum of $1,926.00.

It is equally apparent that when the Estate tried to collect the agreed upon rental amount, JonelJim "created" an off-setting invoice. Mr. Cramm's affidavit (Clause 14) and evidence while testifying before the Registrar on February 28, 1996 (Dineen's Appeal Book, Tab 8) make it clear that the Estate never requested any services from those persons nor was any invoice issued by JonelJim or discussed between JonelJim and the Estate prior to its issuance on September 15, 1995. An affidavit sworn by Mr. Knickle which might have been used in an effort to buttress JonelJim's claim, was struck by the Registrar because Mr. Knickle did not make himself available for cross-examination. As a result, the only evidence before the Court was the evidence of Mr. Cramm, which was accepted. I am satisfied the Registrar made no error of law in that respect.

6 (a) JonelJim wishes to have removed from the provisions of the Order certain assets which JonelJim either purchased from the Trustee or purchased from third parties with valid property claims.

It was accepted at the time of the hearing that items which fall into this category were not being claimed by the Estate. It therefore does not constitute a ground of appeal. It was understood between the parties that these matters were excluded.

6 (b) JonelJim submits that it was an error for the Registrar not to require the Trustee to take possession of any items still in the possession of JonelJim which had not been incorporated into the project.

There was no evidence before the Registrar that there were any assets which met this description. As a result, it would not have been possible for the Registrar to have dealt with this issue.

6 (c) JonelJim submits that the Registrar erred in determining that the valuation of the inventory should be based on their full invoice value, rather than an auction value.

There is no rule or principle of law which dictates a single method of valuation. The Registrar chose invoice value as the appropriate method. It should be remembered that in this case Dineen seized the inventory and incorporated the inventory in the project. What the goods would have sold for on the open market is unknown. What is clear is that they were of considerable value on the date of bankruptcy to the General Contractor, who required them in order to complete the work. Consequently, it is a very different situation than, for example, the sale of scrap at auction.

I am satisfied that the Registrar's determination of inventory value was a reasonable one. There was no error in principle, no failure to take into account a proper factor and no application of improper considerations. The Registrar's conclusion is not demonstrably wrong. Applying the test in Re Dr. Siraj Husain, supra, his determination with respect to valuation of the inventory should not be disturbed.

6 (d) Setoff

While both JonelJim and Dineen raised the issue of setoff, Mr. Corsano, in argument, adopted and relied upon the detailed submissions made by Mr. Aske. Therefore I propose to deal with the analysis of this ground of appeal in the section relating to Dineen.

APPEAL BY DINEEN

Digitized by Google

Dineen's appeal was limited to three issues:

(1) Whether the Registrar had jurisdiction;
(2) Whether the affidavit of Alfred F. Frizzle sworn February 27, 1996 and filed on behalf of Dineen (Dineen's Appeal Book, Tab 4) was properly filed; and
(3) Whether Dineen has a right of setoff.

On appeal before me Dineen abandoned its jurisdictional challenge and the Trustee conceded that the affidavit deposed to by Mr. Frizzle was properly before the Court. Consequently the primary thrust of Dineen's appeal related to the issue of setoff. In its Notice of Motion filed August 6, 1996, Dineen seeks a variation of the Registrar's decision to recognize:

> " . . . that the Trustee's claim to the property of the Bankrupt at the Project Site is subject to Dineen's right to set-off the amount by which the cost to complete the work required by Barrington and Vokey's subcontract have exceeded the unpaid balance of the subcontract price."

Setoff

The thrust of Mr. Aske's argument is that pursuant to the provisions of Article 5.5 Dineen had the right to make use of B & V's inventory and that the Trustee cannot ignore the terms of a contract entered into in good faith by the bankrupt. This was a bona fide contract negotiated between the parties which established their rights and remedies when involved in this multimillion dollar project. When B & V walked off the site, Dineen was, according to Mr. Aske, "left high and dry". Article 5.5 is a customary provision in a standard contract designed to protect general contractors and provide the means to complete the project with the least interruption. Mr. Aske argues that on March 17, 1995 the Trustee assumed no higher a position and acquired no higher rights than B & V had on that date.

In his factum Mr. Aske frames the argument concisely and urges that the particular circumstances be kept in context.

> "Barrington and Vokey went bankrupt and abandoned its work. Dineen incurred substantial costs, in excess of Subcontract monies available, to complete their work. The Trustee is seeking payment for inventory supplied by Barrington and Vokey pursuant to its Subcontract. But both the Subcontract and the Bankruptcy and insolvency Act recognize that Dineen can set off its costs against payments to Barrington and Vokey, and the Trustee. To ignore this right of set-off would permit Barrington and Vokey to be paid more than it is owed under the terms of its Subcontract. We are aware of no provisions in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act which require such an unjust result." (Dineen's factum, p. 12)

Thus Dineen relies upon its contractual rights with the bankrupt in order to defeat or modify the Trustee's claim.

Despite the able submissions of Mr. Aske I cannot agree. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act recognizes two types of claims to property; secured claims or trust claims. Dineen was not a valid, secured creditor. There is no suggestion of trust in the record before me and neither appellant is suggesting that such a classification applies here.

In the result both Dineen and JonelJim are unsecured creditors. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act does not acknowledge the existence of a contractual right to seize the property of a bankrupt unless it is a valid, secured or trust claim. In this sense it is too simplistic to say that the Trustee stands in the shoes of a bankrupt. By virtue of the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act, a trustee in bankruptcy, representing the creditors of a bankrupt, is conferred certain specific powers which are in addition to any rights which the bankrupt itself had. Furthermore, a trustee in bankruptcy has conferred upon it certain powers with respect to fraudulent preferences which are not powers available to the bankrupt. (See for example Re Frechette (1982), 42 CBR 50). There, a shareholders' agreement which allowed a purchase of shares at a discount was null and void as being contrary to public policy. Although such a provision may be enforceable as between the shareholders, in the event of a bankruptcy the trustee had the right to set that provision aside either for public policy reasons or because it constituted a reviewable transaction under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

I accept that Articles 5.1 and 5.5 are contractual provisions negotiated and executed by the parties, entitling the contractor to take possession and use the "products" of the subcontractor should it choose to exercise that option. It permits the contractor to finish the project expeditiously in situations where (bankruptcy, for example) the subcontractor is unable to complete its work, thus triggering termination of the contract by the contractor pursuant to the application, in tandem, of Articles 5.1 and 5.5. but this contractual entitlement does not pass title in the inventory to the contractor. Neither does it work to defeat or modify the trustee's entitlement to the bankrupt's assets which vested in the trustee immediately on the date of bankruptcy.

On the date of this bankruptcy, March 17, 1995, all of the assets of B & V vested in the Trustee for the benefit of the general body of creditors by virtue of the operation of s. 67 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The Trustee became obligated and empowered to take possession of the property of the bankrupt under s. 16 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("the Act"), the intention being that all creditors would receive the distribution to which they were entitled.

As of the date of bankruptcy, Dineen had a cause of action against the Estate for losses sustained as a result of B & V's breach of contract. A stay of proceedings was in effect by virtue of s. 69.3 whereby Dineen was prohibited from exercising any remedy against B & V or its property unless a cessation of the stay were obtained. That option was open to it. Dineen made a conscious decision not to seek an exempting declaration pursuant to s. 69.4, or at least chose to seize the inventories and use them for its own purposes in completing this project.

The right or defence of setoff involves two competing claims in existence as of the date of bankruptcy. Setoff requires mutuality of parties and existence of mutual cross obligations. The rights of the parties are to be determined as of the date of bankruptcy. A right of setoff does not arise where one of the claims relates to an obligation arising after the date of bankruptcy or one entered into or incurred by the trustee in bankruptcy on behalf of the estate.

I think the following illustrations proffered by Mr. Clarke show that the thesis advanced by Dineen is untenable. For example:

a) A trustee in bankruptcy could sell assets of the estate to someone who is a creditor of the estate. That creditor could purchase the assets and take delivery of them but then refuse to pay for them, raising set off as the defence. Re Coburg Felt Company (1925) 5 CBR 622 (Ont) considered a similar case and held that the attempt to exercise a right of set off in such a situation would be "a fraud on the bankruptcy laws";

b) A disgruntled creditor could seize assets of the bankrupt before a trustee could take possession of them and could refuse to return them or pay for them based upon a defence of set off;

c) A trustee in bankruptcy could continue to operate the business of the bankrupt and could order goods from a supplier and then raise set off as a reason not to pay the supplier.

I believe these examples advanced on behalf of the Trustee support the view that a claim to setoff is limited to situations where both claims exist as at the date of bankruptcy and are rights as between the bankrupt and a third party.

The following extracts from Houlden and Morawetz also illustrate this same point:

a) A bankrupt's estate includes only the net amount of a debt owing to the bankrupt after proper allowance for the recognized common law right of set off (page 4-91);

b) The debts could arise from transactions of a different nature, provided they could be ascertained with certainty at the relevant date (page 4-92);

c) Mutual debts are debts due from either party to the other for liquidated sums or money demands which can be ascertained with certainty at the date of bankruptcy. Each party must have the right to enforce its claim at the date of bankruptcy, and if one party cannot do so, there is no right of legal set off (page 4-92);

d) In order for there to be a right of set off, the mutuality of debts must exist at the date of bankruptcy (page 4-92);

e) A right of set off not existing at the date of bankruptcy cannot be acquired afterwards (page 4-93);

f) If the bankrupt was indebted to a creditor prior to bankruptcy for goods supplied, and the same creditor became indebted to the trustee for work done after bankruptcy pursuant to a contract entered into before bankruptcy, there can be no set off as they are not mutual debts. (page 4-93);

g) Although equitable set off does not require symmetry of remedies or accounts, the creditor asserting a claim to equitable set off must at the date of bankruptcy have an entitlement to a remedy in its own right. (page 4-98).

Further support for the position taken by the Trustee may be found in s. 97(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act which provides:

> "The law of set off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt and also to all actions instituted by the trustee for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt in the same manner and to the same extent as if the bankrupt were a plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, except in so far as any claim for set off is affected by the provisions of the Act respecting frauds or fraudulent preferences."

Thus it is clear from the legislation that the law of setoff is retained to the extent to which it relates to actions instituted by the Trustee for the "recovery of debts due to the bankrupt". In this case, the Trustee is not attempting to collect an accounts receivable owing to the bankrupt as of the date of the bankruptcy. The Trustee is attempting to liquidate assets which had vested in the Estate on March 17, 1995.

Mr. Aske, for the appellant Dineen cites Telford v. Holt 1987 CanLII 18 (SCC), (1987), 41 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (S.C.C..) and Husky Oil Operations v. MNR 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), (1995), 128 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (S.C.C.) in support of his submissions. With respect, I do not think either case is helpful to the appellant.

In both cases the discussion of setoff was of a general nature and in a different context. In Telford, supra, there was no bankruptcy involved and no seizure by a creditor of assets of the bankrupt after bankruptcy.

In Husky Oil, supra, a bankruptcy was involved but there the Court was asked to consider whether the Workers' Compensation Act (Saskatchewan) had the right to create a setoff where to do so would be contrary to the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The Court (in a 5:4 decision) held that the provincial legislation was inapplicable in bankruptcy by reason of there being a conflict with the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. The Court was not asked to consider setoff in the context of this particular case. I note in particular, that Justice Gonthier, writing for the majority, introduced his discussion of the setoff component of the Saskatchewan legislation with these observations:

> "But the right to set-off is triggered - and thus the security interest created - by the Board when it decides to create a deemed debt and impose liability on the principal for the contractor's liability." (at p. 24)

On the facts of the case the Saskatchewan Workers' Compensation Board "decided to create a deemed debt" and impose liability on Husky Oil by serving its notice of assessment on Metal Fab, dated March 2, 1992 claiming that $208,850.00 was due and payable to the Board. The assessment predated the bankruptcy by 17 days as Metal Fab made its assignment in bankruptcy on March 19, 1992. I conclude that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Husky Oil, supra contemplates that both debts would be in existence as outstanding claims as of the date of bankruptcy. That is not what happened here. In the result I conclude that set off has no application in the present circumstances and that neither JonelJim nor Dineen had the right to take assets away from the Trustee in Bankruptcy without paying for them.

CONCLUSION

The appeals brought by JonelJim and Dineen are each dismissed, with costs payable to the Estate, here and below. If counsel cannot agree on costs I will be pleased to hear them at their convenience.

On appeal from the final order of Mr. Justice Somers dated February 1, 1999

CHARRON J.A.:

[1] This appeal turns on whether an accounting firm can claim an equitable set-off against monies held in its capital account to the credit of two of its bankrupt partners, for payment made by the firm, after the bankruptcy of the two partners, to an unsecured creditor of the two bankrupts.

[2] The dispute over the monies is between the appellant, Canada Trustco Mortgage Company ("Trustco"), and the respondent, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce ("CIBC"). Trustco is a creditor of the bankrupts who obtained an order under s.38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA") authorizing it to bring an action against the accounting firm, Schwartz, Levitsky and Feldman ("SLF") for recovery of monies held in its capital account to the credit of the two bankrupt partners at the time of the bankruptcy. The CIBC is an unsecured creditor of the bankrupts who obtained the monies from SLF after the bankruptcy. SLF paid the CIBC in fulfillment of its undertaking to pay the bankrupts' loan upon the happening of certain events. In return for the payment, the CIBC agreed to indemnify SLF against any resulting liability to Trustco.

[3] Trustco brought a motion for summary judgment in this action against SLF and, in turn, SLF brought a motion for summary judgment against the third party, the CIBC. At the hearing, it was common ground between the parties that Trustco stood in the shoes of the trustee in bankruptcy and the contest was therefore essentially between the trustee in bankruptcy and one unsecured creditor, the CIBC. Somers J. resolved the contest in favour of the CIBC on the ground that SLF was entitled to set off the payments made to the CIBC against the monies held in its capital account to the credit of the bankrupts. Consequently, he dismissed Trustco's motion and its action against SLF and, in light of this conclusion, found it unnecessary to deal with SLF's motion for judgment against the CIBC. Trustco appeals from this decision.

[4] It is my view that the trustee in bankruptcy, represented by Trustco in this proceeding, has priority over the monies. The monies held in SLF's capital account to the credit of the two bankrupt partners vested in the trustee in bankruptcy at the time of bankruptcy. At that time, there was no debt owed by the bankrupts to SLF that could give rise to a claim by SLF to a right of set-off against those monies in priority to the rights of the trustee in bankruptcy. Further, SLF's obligation to repay the bankrupts' loan to the CIBC pursuant to its undertaking to do so does not, in the circumstances of this case, give rise to a claim for equitable set-off. Finally, whatever agreement SLF entered into with the CIBC after the bankruptcy cannot affect Trustco's priority over the monies.

2. The Facts

[5] The two bankrupts, David Donald Sugarman and Stacy Brad Mitchell, were chartered accountants. They practised together in partnership until February 1994 when they merged their practice with that of SLF. Upon joining SLF, they were required by SLF to inject capital into the firm. They each borrowed $100,000 from the CIBC for that purpose.

[6] At the time Sugarman and Mitchell joined SLF, they signed a partnership entry agreement and the existing SLF partnership agreement. The partnership entry agreement provided for SLF to assist Sugarman and Mitchell with respect to the capital loans in these terms:

> 2.3 Provisions Relating to Capital Loans.
> The Partnership shall assist Sugarman and Mitchell in arranging bank financing, if required, for the purposes of subsection 2.2(b) in the amount of One Hundred Thousand ($100,000) Dollars each, with a Canadian chartered bank or other lender. So long as such loan is outstanding, the Partnership shall make all payments of interest attributable to it, directly to the financial institution making such loan advance to Sugarman or Mitchell. In the event that either Sugarman or Mitchell ceases to be a Partner, the Partnership shall repay from the capital account of Sugarman or Mitchell as applicable, all principal and interest attributable to such loan, to the extent of such capital account. The parties acknowledge that at no time will the principal amount of any loan advanced by a financial institution to Sugarman or Mitchell pursuant to the provisions of this section exceed the capital account of Sugarman or Mitchell, as applicable. [Emphasis added.]

[7] SLF did accounting work for the CIBC and had a good relationship with the bank. At the request of the CIBC, SLF signed two letters of undertaking, one on behalf of Sugarman and one on behalf of Mitchell. The text in both letters is identical. The letter concerning Sugarman's loan reads as follows:

[8] Paragraph 12.01 of the SLF partnership agreement also has some bearing on this appeal in that it gives SLF a right of set-off against the value of any withdrawing partner's interest for sums owing by the partner to the partnership:

> In the event of the withdrawal ... of a partner, that such partner shall cease to be a member of the partnership, his partnership interest will terminate and the partnership will pay to such partner the value of his partnership interest as determined in accordance with Article 11.00 of this agreement and as hereinafter provided, minus the amount of any sums owing by the partner in question to the partnership and not already accounted for in the valuation of his partnership interest. [Emphasis added.]

1995, each of them filed a proposal under the BIA. The proposals were rejected by their creditors and they were deemed to have made an assignment in bankruptcy as of October 27, 1995. Upon their personal bankruptcy, both Sugarman and Mitchell lost their C.A. designation. Consequently, they were also deemed to have withdrawn from their partnership in SLF as of the same date.

[10] Upon the bankrupts making their proposal, the CIBC filed proofs of claim with the trustee in bankruptcy for the amounts of the loans as an unsecured creditor and demanded payment from SLF pursuant to the letters of undertaking. The trustee in bankruptcy also demanded that SLF pay the assets of each capital account of Sugarman and Mitchell to the estate. On September 19, 1996, SLF, faced with these competing claims, entered into a settlement agreement with the CIBC. Under the terms of this agreement, repayment of the loans was made to the CIBC by SLF, in return for which the CIBC agreed to indemnify SLF in the event any judgment or order was made against SLF with respect to this repayment. It was also agreed that SLF would take the position that it was entitled to set off the amount of the payments to the CIBC as against the bankrupts' capital accounts.

3. Analysis

[11] Upon the rejection of a proposal pursuant to the BIA, the insolvent person is deemed to have made an assignment in bankruptcy and all property belonging to the bankrupt passes to and vests in the trustee in bankruptcy: s. 57(a) and s. 71(2) of the BIA. Hence, any monies held by SLF in its capital account to the credit of Sugarman and Mitchell vested in the trustee in bankruptcy as of October 27, 1995. It is common ground between the parties that there was the total sum of $200,000 in the capital account at the time of bankruptcy. In this proceeding, Trustco stands in the shoes of the trustee in bankruptcy. Consequently, it is prima facie entitled to judgment for that amount.

[12] However, in certain circumstances, the trustee in bankruptcy will take the property of the bankrupts subject to certain equities. In this case, the respondent takes the position that the monies in the capital account were subject to SLF's right of set-off. The law of set-off is expressly preserved by s.97(3) of the BIA:

> The law of set-off applies to all claims made against the estate of the bankrupt and also to all actions instituted by the trustee for the recovery of debts due to the bankrupt in the same manner and to the same extent as if the bankrupt were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, except in so far as any claim for set-off is affected by the provisions of the Act respecting frauds or fraudulent preferences.

[13] In this case, Trustco, standing in the shoes of the trustee, is seeking recovery of monies due to the bankrupts by SLF, namely the monies in the capital account to the credit of each bankrupt, and this claim may be subject to a set-off by SLF against these monies. The question becomes whether SLF has any valid claim for set-off.

(a) set-off by agreement

[15] In this case, the agreement between SLF and Sugarman and Mitchell expressly provided for a right of set-off. As noted earlier, paragraph 12.01 of the partnership agreement provided that, in the event of the withdrawal of a partner, SLF was obliged to pay to the partner the value of his partnership interest (which, by definition in the agreement, included the amount credited to the partner's capital account) minus the amount of any sums owing by the partner to the partnership. However, there were no moneys owed to the firm by either Sugarman or Mitchell at the time of their bankruptcy and, therefore, it is not alleged that any right of set-off arose by agreement.

(b) legal set-off

[16] A legal right of set-off exists if both obligations are debts (as opposed to unliquidated claims for damages) and are mutual cross-obligations, although not necessarily connected. The requirement of mutuality can sometimes be difficult to understand from the cases, particularly in situations where an issue arises as to whether the assignment of a debt has destroyed mutuality.1 However, in this case, it is clear that there is no mutuality. The cross-claims are not owed between the original parties, SLF and Sugarman and Mitchell. Rather, SLF is asserting a right to set off a debt that it owes to a third party, the CIBC, against the debt owed by the firm to the bankrupt estate. The respondent concedes that there is no right of legal set-off at law in this case. Rather, the respondent relies on equitable principles.

(c) equitable set-off

[17] Equitable set-off may be available in circumstances where the strict requirements of legal set-off cannot be met. Kelly R. Palmer, in The Law of Set-Off in Canada (1993), reviews the different rationales for allowing equitable set-off as it has evolved over the years, from the need to prevent the harshness of imprisonment for non-payment of debts, to more modern exigencies such as reducing the number of actions and avoiding circuitous claims. Whatever the rationale, it would appear from the cases that the remedy is firmly rooted in the need to achieve fairness between the parties.

[18] One of the main differences between legal set-off and equitable set-off is that, in the latter case, the claims between the parties do not need to be liquidated. Hence, claims for damages are available for equitable set-off. This difference does not matter in this case. Another important difference, and one that is of relevance here, lies in the fact that the requirement for mutuality is relaxed. Hence, equitable set-off may be available even though the situation is not strictly one where A seeks to set off his debt to B against the debt B owes to A. However, for equitable set-off to be available, the cross-claims must be closely connected. It is logical to conclude that this latter requirement arises because mutuality is not strictly insisted upon. After all, it is difficult to imagine why, in the interests of fairness, the courts would allow A to reduce his debt to B by the amount A owes to C, unless it was because of the close connection between the claims. Finally, it is important to note that, just because cross-claims are closely connected to one another, it does not mean that set-off will necessarily follow. Not only must the connection be sufficiently close to warrant an exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court, the remedy must not result in any form of inequity.

[19] In order to determine whether equitable set-off should be allowed in this case, it is therefore necessary to look at the connection between the claims and also to consider the effect the remedy would have on the equities between the parties.

[20] It is the respondent's position, as set out in its factum, that the right of set-off claimed by SLF "arises out of the contractual obligation to repay the personal loans to CIBC out of the capital accounts, in accordance with Article 2.3 of the Partnership Entry Agreement between the bankrupts and SLF, as well as the written Undertakings given by SLF to CIBC for the benefit of the bankrupts". The respondent submits that the claims are so connected that it would be unfair to require SLF to pay the monies in the capital account to the trustee in bankruptcy without allowing SLF to offset its obligation to repay the very loan that provided the capital sum in the first place.

[21] In my view, although superficially attractive, this argument cannot hold. I find the argument unconvincing because it ignores the important fact that there has been an intervening bankruptcy in this case. This is not simply a case, for example, where Sugarman and Mitchell would decide to go back to practising on their own and would seek payment of the monies held to their credit in the firm's capital account, leaving SLF behind to pay the loan to the CIBC pursuant to its undertaking. If this were the case, I have no doubt that equity would intervene to allow SLF a right to set off its obligation to the CIBC against the debt to Sugarman and Mitchell, even in the absence of an indemnity agreement between SLF and the two withdrawing partners.

[22] In this case, because of the intervening bankruptcy, the equities are no longer just between SLF and Sugarman and Mitchell or even between SLF and the CIBC. The rights of others have come into play. These rights cannot simply be ignored on the basis that the CIBC lent the money that created the capital account in question. If the respondent's argument was accepted, the unsecured creditor who lent the bankrupt money to buy a car would be able to claim priority over the car based on that fact alone and in the absence of any secured interest in the car. Such a result would be contrary to the scheme of distribution under the BIA. It would result in an unfair preference of one unsecured creditor over other unsecured creditors. Similarly, in this case, the resulting unfairness to SLF, if any, must be assessed in the context of the bankruptcy where other unsecured creditors may stand to lose.

[23] In my view, at the time of bankruptcy, SLF stood in no different position than any other unsecured creditor in the bankrupt's estate.2 At the time SLF gave its undertaking to the bank to repay the loan, it could have obtained some form of security from Sugarman and Mitchell. SLF chose not to do so. SLF is an accounting firm, not an unsophisticated creditor. Obviously, it suited its own purposes to give the undertaking to the CIBC. Indeed, the evidence shows that SLF was receiving two new partners, an injection of $200,000 in the firm's capital account and ongoing accounting business from the CIBC. There is really no reason why SLF should be treated any differently than others who stand to lose as a result of the two partners' bankruptcy.

[24] Further, the ultimate result of granting the remedy of equitable set-off cannot simply be ignored. Given the indemnity it received from the CIBC, SLF does not lose any money. The claim of equitable set-off is made for the CIBC's benefit. Granting relief in this case would be akin to elevating the CIBC's status in the bankruptcy from unsecured to secured creditor to the detriment of other unsecured creditors. There is no justification in this case to so interfere with the scheme of distribution under the BIA.

[25] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of Somers J. and grant judgment to the appellant against Schwartz, Levitsky & Feldman for $200,000 plus interests and costs of the motion, the action and the appeal.

1 The case law is not entirely consistent on whether an assignment will automatically destroy mutuality. See Kelly R. Palmer, The Law of Set-Off in Canada (1993) Chapter 2 for a useful discussion of the case law on this point.

2 It is noteworthy that, according to the material before the court, SLF has not filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy.

MEMORANDUM OF JUDGMENT

THE COURT:

[1] This appeal arises from a Queen's Bench order dismissing an application by the appellants Duke Energy Marketing Limited Partnership ("Duke") and Engage Energy Canada L.P. ("Engage"). Duke and Engage sought an order lifting a stay granted under the Companies' Creditor Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA") with respect to all proceedings against the respondents Blue Range Resources Corp. ("Blue Range") and Humble Petroleum Marketing Ltd. ("Humble"). In particular, Duke and Engage sought to set-off anticipated damages they would incur under certain natural gas marketing contracts against payments owed under these contracts for the delivery of natural gas.

[2] Leave to appeal was granted by Fruman J.A. on the issue of whether equitable set-off was warranted in this case.

[3] We have the benefit of more recent jurisprudence on this issue than was before the chambers judge. It supports the application of equitable set off in the circumstances of this case and therefore we allow the appeal.

FACTS

[4] Duke and Humble entered into a long term contract for the supply of natural gas on June 25, 1996. Engage entered into a similar long term contracts with Blue Range. In accordance with industry practice both sets of contracts provided that any gas delivered within a given month would be paid for on the 25th day of the following month.

[5] Due to financial difficulties in early 1999 Blue Range and Humble, a wholly owned subsidiary of Blue Range, applied, ex parte, to the Court of Queen's Bench for an arrangement order pursuant to the CCAA. As part of the arrangement Blue Range and Humble requested and obtained a stay of all proceedings against them by order of March 2, 1999. Provisions 3(b) of the order is relevant to this appeal and states:

> 3(b) all Persons having arrangements or agreements, written or oral, with Blue Range for the supply of goods and/or services by or to Blue Range ... are hereby restrained from accelerating, terminating, suspending, modifying or cancelling any such agreements, arrangements or supply of goods and services, and are also hereby restrained from exercising any right of distress, recission, set-off or consolidation of accounts in relation to any indebtedness or obligation in favour of Blue Range ... without prior written consent of Blue Range ... or leave of this Honourable Court.

[6] The day the order was granted, Duke received a phone call from James Surbey, the senior Vice President of Humble and Blue Range, indicating that deliveries under their agreements would cease prior to the natural termination date of the contracts, October 31, 2008. On March 22, 1999 Mr. Surbey notified Duke, by telephone, that the contract would terminate as of March 31st and this was confirmed by letters dated March 29th. Engage received similar letters dated March 29th. Blue Range and Humble supplied natural gas under the contracts for the months of February and March, 1999 but on March 31, 1999 officially terminated the contracts. Under the contracts both Engage and Duke owe Blue Range and Humble the cost of the gas delivered in February and March. Specifically, the payments for the February deliveries were due March 25th, and payments for the March deliveries were due April 25th. Duke has paid this money into court while Engage has withheld payment pending the outcome of this appeal.

[7] Duke and Engage claim they will suffer significant losses as a result of the early termination of the natural gas supply contracts. According to Duke and Engage, and this is not disputed, the contracts were made at a time when the price of natural gas was significantly lower than it was at the time the contracts were terminated. In other words, the cost to the appellants to replace the gas is higher than the cost they were paying under the contracts. As a result, Duke and Engage assert that these unliquidated damages should be set off against the money they owe as a result of the February and March gas deliveries.

CHAMBERS DECISION

[8] Counsel and the court appeared to agree that the following principles from the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Telford v. Holt 1987 CanLII 18 (SCC), (1987), 41 D.L.R. (4th) 385 at 398 (S.C.C.) apply when dealing with equitable set-off:

> 1. The party relying on a set-off must show some equitable ground for being protected against his adversary's demands;
> 2. The equitable ground must go to the very root of the plaintiff's claim before a set-off will be allowed;
> 3. A cross-claim must be so clearly connected with the demand of the plaintiff that it would be manifestly unjust to allow the plaintiff to enforce payment without taking into consideration the cross claim;

Digitized by Google

4. The plaintiff's claim and the cross-claim need not arise out of the same contract; and
5. Unliquidated claims are on the same footing as liquidated claims.

In light of these considerations, the chambers judge found that the most contentious issue in the case was "whether the anticipated damages are so closely connected to the payments for the February and March natural gas that it would be manifestly unjust to require Duke and Engage to pay Blue Range for the natural gas without permitting Duke and Engage to set-off their claims for unliquidated damages" (para 72).

[9] Assessing whether or not the transactions were closely connected, the chambers judge relied on the decision of the B.C. Supreme Court in Quintette Coal Ltd. v. Nippon Steel Corporation reflex, (1990), 2 C.B.R. (3d) 291 (B.C.S.C.) affirmed on appeal 1990 CanLII 430 (BC CA), (1990), 2 C.B.R. (3d) 303 (B.C.C.A.). In Quintette the petitioner, a coal mining company, obtained an order under the CCAA allowing a reorganization between itself and its creditors. The order provided that no set-off was permitted. The respondent, Nippon Steel Corporation, was a major creditor of Quintette. In 1981, Nippon entered into contracts for the ongoing purchase of all of Quintette's coal production. The contracts provided for a price review every 4 years. In 1985, the parties were unable to agree on pricing and the matter was sent to arbitration. As a result of the arbitration it was determined that Quintette had overcharged Nippon and now owed Nippon, by way of refund, $46 million. Quintette continued to supply coal to Nippon and Nippon set off what it owed for the coal deliveries against the arbitration award. The B.C. Supreme Court found that this was not an appropriate case for set-off. Specifically the trial judge said:

> Nor do I accept the proposition that the order forces an overpayment by J.S.I. (Nippon) for future coal deliveries. They are obliged to pay, and Quintette is obliged to accept a price set pursuant to the arbitration award or any variation thereof pursuant to any appeal of that award. The award has created a debt owed by Quintette to J.S.I. and I see that as completely distinguishable from the debts incurred by J.S.I. for future coal deliveries (at 295-296).

[10] Following the reasoning in Quintette the chambers judge determined that the anticipated damages, owed to Duke and Engage, for the replacement costs of the natural gas arose after the obligation to pay for the February and March deliveries. He found that the future damages for non-delivery were sufficiently independent that it was not unjust to require Duke and Engage to pay for the natural gas they have already received (para 76).

[11] The chambers judge noted that Quintette was decided prior to the enactment of s. 18.1 of the CCAA which provides:

> 18.1. The law of set-off applies to all claims made against a debtor company and to all actions instituted by it for the recovery of debts due to the company in the same manner and to the same extent as if the company were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be.

This section was added to the CCAA in 1997 and the chambers judge recognized that even if the application of set-off had the result of preferring one creditor over others, parliament, by enacting s.18.1, made the decision that the general law of set-off is to apply in CCAA proceedings. It is apparent that the chambers judge had difficulty with this concept and was clearly of the view that allowing set-off was contrary to the purposes of insolvency legislation. He did, however, appear to instruct himself that this consideration should not carry any weight due to the addition of s.18.1. Specifically he said at paragraph 56:

> [56] Parliament has specifically mandated that, notwithstanding the well know purpose of the Act as a whole, namely to share amongst all of the creditors the asset shortfall, the general law of set-off is to apply to debts owed or claimed by the debtor company.

[12] While the chambers judge recognized that set-off was available in principle, in the end policy considerations regarding the priority of creditors appear to have influenced his decision. He says at paragraphs 82 and 83:

> [82] The anticipated damages arise after the completion of the deliveries. They arise after the stay order. They become an unsecured claim of any other unsecured creditor of Blue Range and lack the necessary relatedness to the deliveries and the consequent unfairness to take them out of this category.
> [83] Quite to the contrary, the applicants should share with the other unsecured creditors the burden of the reorganization and to hold otherwise would be potentially unfair to the other creditors.

ANALYSIS

[13] With respect, we find that the chambers judge erred in his application of the law of equitable set-off in a CCAA context. It appears to us that even though he recognized that concerns about the priority of creditors should be irrelevant in the face of s.18.1, his conclusion in paragraph 83 suggests he did not act on that recognition. Under s.18.1 set off was available to Duke and Engage and the chambers judge erred in taking into account potential prejudice to other creditors.

[14] We have also concluded that the chambers judge erred in his application of equitable set-off in a general context. While we agree that the only contentious aspect of the equitable set-off test, as articulated in Telford v. Holt, is the "close connection" test, we are of the opinion that the test was not correctly applied. We are influenced in this conclusion by a recent decision not available to the chambers judge, Cam-Net Communications v. Vancouver Telephone Co. [1999] B.C.J. No. 2855 (C.A.). In this case, the B.C. Court of Appeal was faced with the application of equitable set-off in a CCAA context even though the creditor, Vancouver Telephone, decided not to partake in the CCAA proceedings.

[15] In 1995 Cam-Net Communications ("Cam-Net") entered into an agreement with Vancouver Telephone Co. ("VT") to provide long-distance telephone service to VT's customers. In November 1996 Cam-Net commenced an action against VT claiming amounts owing over $500,000. In January 1997 Cam-Net filed for protection under the CCAA and the B.C. Supreme Court issued an order staying present or future action against Cam-Net. The order also prevented any creditors from exercising rights of set-off.

[16] VT claimed a right to set-off alleging that Cam-Net had breached the contract by failing to provide services of a sufficient quality, unilaterally terminating the contractual services without adequate notice and failing to give proper notice of price increases to VT. As a result of these breaches VT alleged that they had to enter into other contractual relationships at higher rates in order to continue in business.

[17] The B.C. Supreme Court determined that this was not an appropriate case for equitable set-off but the B.C. Court of Appeal overturned that decision. In reaching their decision, the Court drew a distinction between abatement and equitable set-off as follows:

> The law recognizes a distinction between what may be termed abatement and equitable set-off. The former, a product of the common law, applies to cases in which a defendant can show that as a result of the plaintiff's breach, the goods, services, or work provided by the plaintiff are diminished in value. The latter, a product of equity, refers to cases in which a defendant raises a cross-claim which goes directly to impeach the plaintiff's demands, i.e. which is so closely connected with the plaintiff's claim that it would be unjust to allow the plaintiff to enforce payment without taking into account the cross-claim. The latter involves damages other than a diminution of the value of the goods or services provided (para 33).

The court here also relied on the words of Lord Denning in Henriksens Rederi A/S v. T.H.Z. Rolimpex ("The Brede"), [1974] 1 Q.B. 233 at 248 (C.A.) where he said:

> When the contractor sues for the contract price, the employer can say to him: "You are not entitled to that sum because you have yourself broken the very contract on which you sue, and you cannot fairly claim that sum unless you take into account the loss you have occasioned to me".

On this basis, the B.C. Court of Appeal found that this was an appropriate case for equitable set-off as VT's claim directly impeached Cam-Net's demand for payment.

[18] The fundamental facts in Cam-Net are very similar to those in this appeal. In essence both cases involved a debt incurred during the course of a contract that is then negated when the contract itself is broken. In addition, the distinction pointed out in Cam-Net between equitable set-off and abatement is highly instructive. In his comment at paragraph 74 that there was nothing wrong with the gas delivered by Blue Range in February and March, the chambers judge appears to be requiring a defect in the goods in order to apply equitable set-off. With respect, such a defect would perhaps lead to a situation of abatement but is not directly relevant in the application of equitable set-off.

[19] The important point for invoking equitable set-off is the close connection of the transactions. Would it be manifestly unjust to require Duke and Engage to pay the cost of the February and March deliveries in view of the fact that they will suffer significant losses due to the early termination of the same contract that called for the delivery of gas in February and March? In our view, such a requirement would be unjust. The contracts in question are not a series of discreet monthly contracts. Rather, they are long term contracts for the supply of natural gas which call for payments to be made in installments settled monthly. These contracts are intended to be relied upon as a whole. Through the contracts, Blue Range and Humble are able to rely on a consistent purchaser of their natural gas over an extended period of time allowing a steady long term income. Similarly, Duke and Engage are able to trade on the natural gas market knowing that they have a long term supply of natural gas at a set price. The fact that the damages owed to Duke and Engage arise after the stay order is not relevant when the obligations arise out of the same contracts. To hold, as did the chambers judge, that there were no damages owed by Blue Range and Humble at the time of the February and March deliveries ignores the overall effect and long term nature of these contracts.

Digitized by Google

[20] We find, therefore, that all of the relevant transactions arose out of the same contracts and equitable set-off is available in these circumstances.
[21] The appeal is allowed.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Newbury:

[1] Galaxy Sports Inc. ("Galaxy") appeals several rulings made by the Chambers judge below in connection with its proposal to creditors under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 as amended (the "BIA"). For the most part, the questions raised by the appeal are very concrete and discrete; but some matters of principle that have apparently not been considered at the appellate court level in Canada also arise.

The Factual Background

[2] I turn first, however, to the facts of the case. Galaxy is a Canadian corporation, the shares of which are publicly listed. Until its insolvency, it was the exclusive distributor in Canada of "Umbro" sports clothing and related products. As such, Galaxy had a close working relationship with the Umbro companies, which I will refer to collectively as "Umbro". At some point, it is alleged that Galaxy and Umbro discussed Umbro's granting to Galaxy, or an American subsidiary thereof, a licence for the "big box" market in the United States. Allegedly, the parties even talked about Umbro's acquiring control of Galaxy. In reliance on representations made by Umbro, Galaxy says it turned down financing available to it from other sources.

[3] In early 2002, however, the negotiations came to a sudden halt. Umbro threatened to cancel Galaxy's licence, effective September 2002, unless certain alleged defaults were remedied. According to the Trustee's report, Galaxy could not remedy the defaults and foresaw that it would be unable to continue in business once the cancellation of its licence took effect. On August 23, 2002, Galaxy therefore filed a Notice of Intention to Make a Proposal under the BIA. The proposal was forwarded to Galaxy's creditors on September 20, 2002. Galaxy also began an action for damages against, inter alia, Umbro Worldwide Limited ("Umbro Worldwide") and Umbro International Limited ("Umbro International"), both of which are respondents in this appeal, alleging breaches of fiduciary duty, fraudulent and negligent misrepresentation, and "bad faith conduct" leading to the unjust enrichment of the defendants. As well, Galaxy's American subsidiary sought protection under Chapter 11 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Act in Seattle, Washington.

[4] Galaxy's proposal in Canada was unusual in that it did not appear to contemplate the debtor's complete cessation of business or the sale of all its inventory and operating assets. Instead, Galaxy proposed to sell "so much of its inventory and operating assets as [would be] necessary" to pay liquidation costs, to pay its only secured creditor in full, and to pay the sum of $420,000 to the Trustee, the respondent Abakhan& Associates, for distribution to unsecured creditors. Galaxy also proposed to pursue diligently its lawsuit against the Umbro defendants to a conclusion and then to pay the Trustee 50 percent of the net recovery after payment of legal costs. By accepting the proposal, then, the unsecured creditors would be deemed to have agreed to accept the $420,000 and half of the net amount recovered in the lawsuit, in full settlement and satisfaction of their provable claims. If the lawsuit yielded nothing, they would receive approximately five cents on each dollar of their claims.

[5] As required, the Trustee carried out an investigation of Galaxy's affairs and prepared a report to creditors concerning the proposal. It stated that based on Galaxy's statement of affairs, ordinary unsecured creditors had claims totalling approximately $3,600,000; that there was only one registered secured creditor, a bank, to which Galaxy owed approximately $5,000,000; and that Galaxy's assets included inventory of some $3,200,000, accounts receivable of some $2,470,000 and bank deposits of some $804,446, the latter to be applied against the bank's secured claim. As well, the Trustee reported:

> Galaxy invested approximately $1.2 mil into the US operation by way of shareholders loan. The main asset available for liquidation is UMBRO brand inventory with an approximate value of $1.6 mil., which is being claimed by UMBRO International. The determination of the value of the amount due to Galaxy from the US Corp is dependent on the outcome of the UMBRO Litigation.
> UMBRO Litigation
> Management's current assessment is that there will be adequate funds from the litigation such that 50% of the net recovery will be adequate to pay the unsecured creditors 100% of their claims.

The Trustee estimated that if the proposal were to proceed, the estate would have available to it approximately $584,000, apart from any proceeds of the Umbro litigation. On the other hand, if Galaxy were to go bankrupt, the funds available to the estate would be approximately $62,000. Accordingly, the Trustee concluded:

> Should Galaxy be Bankrupt it would be up to the creditors to decide whether the Estate should pursue the UMBRO litigation. If the litigation were not pursued the creditors could recover approximately $260,000 of the asset liquidation proceeds which are currently slated to be paid to the litigation effort as legal fees. . . . This potential recovery would not offset the projected reduction in liquidation proceeds should management not participate.
> Based on this analysis, allowing management to proceed by approving Galaxy's proposal will likely result in more funds being available to the unsecured creditors than would be the case if Galaxy were to be Bankrupt.

> Recommendation and Conclusion
> The Proposal of Galaxy allows management to realize on the existing operational assets and to pursue the litigation against UMBRO International. The quantum of funds projected to be available to the unsecured creditors is dependent on participation of management in those efforts. It is likely that should management not participate in the realization of assets and in the litigation that there will be less funds available to the unsecured creditors, perhaps NIL. Accordingly, the creditors will realize more in the proposal than they would in a Bankruptcy and that realization will be enhanced should the UMBRO litigation be successful.
> The Trustee recommends that the creditors accept the Proposal as they will likely realize more than would be the case should Galaxy be bankrupt.

[6] The first meeting of creditors was held on October 15 and continued after an adjournment on October 29, 2002. Mr. Nayer, an official receiver, chaired the meeting and received various objections from various parties regarding the proofs of claim filed by various creditors. For purposes of this appeal, I need note only three groups of such objections.

[7] First, Umbro Worldwide raised questions about the proofs of claim filed by Galaxy's two landlords (in respect of separate premises), Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada Ltd. ("Sun Life") and Cookstown Holdings Ltd. ("Cookstown"). Sun Life's claim (filed after the first meeting but before the second) was for $1,445,656.68, consisting of arrears of rent of $12,051.25, plus the aggregate amount (not discounted) of rent and operating costs that would, had the lease continued, have been payable by the tenant over the unexpired term ending September 30, 2007. Although this was referred to in Sun Life's statement of account as the "lease disclaimer", the disclaimer procedure provided by s. 65.2 of the BIA was not invoked in this case, since Galaxy required more time — two or three months — in occupation of the premises than what s. 65.2 would have permitted. Galaxy and Sun Life reached an understanding under which Galaxy agreed to vacate the leased premises by December 31, 2002 and to pay rent up to that date and acknowledged that Sun Life had "a preferred claim in the proposal or any further bankruptcy for the three months rent owed prior to August 23, 2002."

[8] With respect to Cookstown, an agreement was also reached in which the disclaimer procedure was expressly not invoked. Galaxy proposed in a letter of October 9 to Cookstown that it would "surrender" its lease by delivering vacant possession by November 1 at the latest, leaving Cookstown's "right to prove . . . actual losses" unaffected — a proposal the lessor apparently accepted. Accordingly, Cookstown claimed arrears of rent of $16,737.90 up to December 31, 2002, and again, the aggregate of anticipated rental and other amounts that would have been payable by the tenant over the unexpired term of the lease to December 31, 2005, or $311,798.16. The amount of Galaxy's original deposit and another minor amount were deducted, resulting in the final claim of $320,167.11.

[9] The amount of Sun Life's claim was the subject of considerable discussion at the meeting. On October 15, Galaxy's representative advised that the company expected to vacate the premises on or about December 15, 2002; that (in accordance with s. 136(1)(f) of the BIA) rental arrears for the three months prior to the proposal would be a preferred claim; and that subject to mitigation, Sun Life's remaining loss would be an unsecured claim. Although the solicitor for Galaxy, Mr. Gagnon, expressed the hope that the premises "should not be vacant for too long", so that Sun Life's claim "should be minimized", Sun Life's representative stated that it had been offering the premises for rent, and that a similar "unit" on Annacis Island had been on the market for a year.

[10] By the time the meeting continued on October 29, Sun Life's proof of claim had been filed. Various creditors who objected to the claim being allowed in full contended that the landlord's position seemed similar to that of various suppliers of goods shipped to Galaxy but not received by it at the time of its proposal. Most of these had been assigned a "zero" value by the Trustee. Similarly, it was said, Sun Life's claim should not be allowed as a liquidated claim or at full value, since like the suppliers, Sun Life could mitigate its future losses over the course of the tenancy by re-letting the premises. Mr. Abakhan, the Trustee's representative, told the meeting that he did "not know how to value the claim other than how it is presented. Creditors can go to Court and appeal the Trustee's decisions." When pressed further, he added:

> . . . that the courts make a distinction between landlord's claims and unliquidated claims such that landlords are permitted to file their entire claim for the total unexpired term of the lease, regardless of potential mitigation, while creditors such as King's Fashion have no claim until they liquidate the asset in their possession.

[11] In the result, Sun Life's claim was allowed "for voting purposes in full". The Chair requested that if the proposal were accepted by the creditors, the Trustee would give "notice to everyone who voted of SunLife's claim and of the fact that any creditor with a concern could make submissions to the Court. This would ensure that creditors who sent in voting letters but did not attend the meeting would be aware of Sun Life's claim and the possible dilution of dividends." Later in the meeting, the Trustee ruled that Cookstown was "in the same position as SunLife", and allowed its claim at the full amount.

[12] The second set of claims relevant to this appeal were those made by three of Galaxy's directors, Messrs. Dewar and Watson, who were also the President and the Chief Executive Officer respectively, and Mr. Gill, the chairman of the board. Mr. Dewar's claim was for $120,000. Attached as a schedule to his proof of claim was the statement "6 Months Severance Pay As Per Employment Contract — $120,000." Similarly, Mr. Watson, who claimed a total of $257,969.28 simply noted that his claim represented "15 Months Severance Pay Per Employment Contract." Mr. Gill's claim was for the reimbursement of some $4,600 of expenses apparently incurred on company business. Various creditors objected that these claimants were prohibited from voting by s. 109(6) of the BIA, which is reproduced later in these Reasons. After discussion of that provision and s. 113(3)(c), however, the Chair ruled that the votes of all three directors would be counted at the full amounts of their claims and that "these decisions could be appealed to the Court."

[13] The third contentious issue was a claim filed by Umbro Worldwide in the amount of $1,208,016.45. The proof of claim had attached to it various invoices apparently prepared by Umbro International, rather than Umbro Worldwide, for royalties and other amounts due under the licence agreement. A lengthy colloquy took place at the creditors' meeting among the Chair, counsel for Umbro Worldwide and Galaxy's representative, focussing on a secured debt apparently owing to Galaxy by its U.S. subsidiary. Then, the following discussion ensued:

> Mr. Gagnon then advised the Chair that he takes the position that UMBRO does not have a valid claim. He had only just been made aware of the fact that the UMBRO Proof of Claim filed in the Proposal had been made and signed by UMBRO Worldwide Limited, however, all of the support for the claim (the Schedule "A"), including invoices and statements were to the account of UMBRO International, a separate and distinct legal entity. Accordingly, in his opinion the claim was invalid as filed, for voting purposes.
> There followed discussion on the issue of the validity of the UMBRO claim as filed. Mr. Doyle [counsel for Umbro] indicated that UMBRO International did the invoicing for UMBRO Worldwide and both companies were subsidiaries of UMBRO Holdings.
> The Chair ruled that the Proof of Claim filed by UMBRO was valid for voting purposes.

Shortly thereafter, the Trustee advised the meeting that it was valuing Umbro Worldwide's claim at approximately $640,000.

[14] At the close of the meeting, the Trustee advised that 79 votes representing 75.93 percent of the claims had been cast in favour of the proposal and that eight votes representing 24.07 percent of the claims had been cast against. The Chair declared that the proposal had been accepted by the creditors.

The Proceedings Below

[15] Four motions came before the Supreme Court judge in Chambers. First, the Trustee applied under s. 58(a) of the BIA for court approval of the proposal. Second, Umbro Worldwide applied under s. 163(2) for an order permitting it to examine representatives of Sun Life and Galaxy under oath; an order for the lessor's production of books and records relating to its claim; and an order that Galaxy produce all books and records in its possession "relating to the administration of the estate of Galaxy". In that motion, Umbro Worldwide also appealed the Trustee's ruling in respect of the voting entitlement of the three directors.

[16] Apparently in response to Umbro Worldwide's application to examine, Sun Life thereafter reached an understanding with Umbro Worldwide that the latter would not proceed with the application, in return for Sun Life's agreement that its claim would be reduced to $12,051.25 "for voting purposes only". This understanding was confirmed in a letter dated January 21, 2003 prepared by Sun Life's solicitors, which stated:

> We confirm that Umbro [Worldwide] will not take issue with Sun Life's Proof of Claim for the purposes of distribution from the Estate of Galaxy Sports Inc. Sun Life will, of course, revise its Proof of Claim downward if it is able to mitigate its losses prior to any eventual distribution from the Estate of Galaxy Sports Inc.

[17] By the time of the foregoing correspondence, Umbro Worldwide had filed another notice of motion in Supreme Court seeking orders that:

> 1. the Proofs of Claim filed by Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada and of Cookstown Holdings Ltd. are to be reduced to $12,051.25 and zero dollars respectively, solely for the purpose of the vote by Galaxy's creditors on its Proposal and the votes of these creditors on the Proposal are to be correspondingly reduced in the calculation of the vote by Galaxy's creditors on its Proposal;
> 2. the Proofs of Claim filed by the Officers and Directors be expunged and the votes of the Officers and Directors are not to be counted in the vote by Galaxy's creditors on its proposal;
> 3. there be a declaration that Galaxy's creditors refused to accept the Proposal;
> pursuant to s. 135(5) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and Rules 6 and 11 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules.

In support of this motion and its earlier motion, Umbro Worldwide filed and adduced affidavit material referring to or having appended to it documents that had not been before the Chair of the creditors' meeting in October 2002.

[18] The fourth motion before the Chambers judge was filed by Galaxy. It sought declarations that both Umbro defendants were disentitled by s. 109(6) of the BIA from voting at any creditors' meetings "as they did not, at all times in the year preceding commencement of this proceeding, deal with [Galaxy] at arm's length"; and in the alternative, that Umbro Worldwide was not entitled to vote "as a result of its failure to duly prove its claim by annexing a statement of account that evidenced a debt owing to it that is provable under the Act".

The Judgment Appealed From

[19] The motions came on for hearing in January 30 and 31, 2003 (although I note the date of hearing on the face page of the Reasons refers to a hearing on December 2, 2002). The Chambers judge's Reasons were released on March 31, 2003 and are reproduced at 2003 BCSC 493 (CanLII), 2003 BCSC 493. It does not appear from the judgment that counsel made any objection to her consideration of what I shall refer to as "fresh evidence" — i.e., documents and other materials that were not before the Trustee or the Chair of the meeting of creditors — nor that any specific application was made to adduce the "fresh evidence" at the hearing. It was simply filed and admitted without objection or argument.

[20] The Chambers judge began by dealing with the voting entitlement of Messrs. Watson, Dewar and Gill. She first addressed the question of whether they were prohibited from voting by s. 109(6) of the BIA, which provides:

> (6) Except as otherwise provided by this Act, a creditor is not entitled to vote at any meeting of creditors if the creditor did not, at all times within the period beginning on the day that is one year before the date of the initial bankruptcy event in respect of the debtor and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included, deal with the debtor at arm's length.

Also relevant is s. 113(3)(b), which provides:

> (3) The following persons are not entitled to vote on the appointment of a trustee or inspectors: . . .
> (b) where the bankrupt is a corporation, any officer, director, or employee thereof; . . .

[21] The Chambers judge noted that whether parties are dealing at arm's length for purposes of s. 109(6) is a question of fact, citing Skalbania (Trustee of) v. Wedgewood Village Estate Ltd. (1989) 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 97 (B.C.C.A.). She found that the three men were not "passive directors" in that Messrs. Watson and Dewar had signed various agreements and dealt with Umbro and that Mr. Watson had even executed the Chapter 11 proceedings in the United States for Galaxy's U.S. subsidiary. Each of these men, she said, "could influence the direction of Galaxy." As well, she noted, the claims of Messrs. Watson and Dewar were predicated on the assumption that their employment contracts had been terminated, whereas there was no evidence of termination. Indeed, the Trustee's report suggested that Galaxy had ongoing operations and that the continued services of management would be required at least in connection with the Umbro lawsuit. Based on these facts, the Chambers judge ruled that the votes of none of the three directors could be counted, and that the proofs of claim of Messrs. Watson and Dewar should be expunged pursuant to s. 135(5).

[22] The Chambers judge then moved to the question of the landlords' entitlement to vote the full amounts of their claims under Galaxy's leases. Cookstown did not appear in the court below. Sun Life, in accordance with the understanding it had reached with Umbro, did not oppose Umbro Worldwide's motion to reduce its claim to $12,051.25.

[23] The Chambers judge drew a strong analogy between the claims of the landlords and those of various suppliers whose proofs of claim had been disallowed in their entirety. (The only exception was King's Fashion, whose representative had advised the meeting that the product it had shipped to Galaxy would be difficult to sell elsewhere because of its "custom" nature. King's Fashion had a claim in excess of $1,318,000 but the Trustee valued it at $544,837 for voting purposes.) The Chambers judge stated:

> The cases of the landlords and the suppliers are alike. In each of these cases the creditor has retained an asset and by re-leasing or selling that asset, will be able to mitigate its losses. There has not been sufficient time for the landlords to have re-let the premises or for the suppliers to have sold the manufactured goods.
> Section 135 provides that the trustee shall determine if an unliquidated claim is a provable claim and, if so, the value of the claim. The trustee may require further evidence in support of a claim. A creditor with an unliquidated claim has no right to vote until his claim has been valued and has a provable claim only for the amount at which the trustee values the claim. In valuing the claim, the trustee should look at what is reasonable in the circumstances and apply an appropriate contingency in determining the amount at which to value the claim, as the court did in Re Wiebe 1995 CanLII 7367 (ON SC), (1995), 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109 (Ont. Gen. Div.). [paras. 17-18]

The Chambers judge noted the statement made by Mr. Gagnon on behalf of Galaxy at the first creditors' meeting that "[t]he actual losses incurred by Sun Life would be unsecured and will be subject to mitigation, and it is the understanding of Galaxy that this space should not be vacant for too long and the claim should be minimized." She agreed, noting that in valuing Sun Life's claim for voting purposes, the likelihood of re-letting the premises must be considered. She continued:

> The landlords and Galaxy could provide the trustee with information respecting re-letting the property as could real estate agents. To simply allow the claim for the unexpired term inflates the claim and accords it inappropriate voting power. A claim allowed for voting purposes at far more than its true value may well be sufficient to approve or defeat a proposal over the views of other creditors. It is given disproportionate weight.
> The claims of the landlords must be discounted to reflect the likely loss, and consider the likely recovery on re-letting. The evidence before me does not allow me to determine an appropriate reduction as contemplated by s. 135(5). The parties may adduce further evidence on this point, if necessary. [paras. 22-23]

Accordingly, the Court adjourned this aspect of the motion, declaring that the parties were at liberty to schedule another hearing regarding the valuation of the landlords' claims.

[24] The Court next turned to the claim filed by Umbro Worldwide. Appended to its proof of claim were invoices from Umbro International. There was evidence from Mr. Watson that Galaxy was normally invoiced by and made payment to Umbro International for goods shipped under the licence agreement. With respect to Galaxy's objection that "the wrong company" had filed the claim, the Chambers judge concluded on the evidence before her that Umbro International had assigned its licence agreement with Galaxy, to Umbro Worldwide in 1999, and had given notice of the assignment to Galaxy. Thus, she said, it was "appropriate that [Umbro Worldwide] file the proof of claim." (Para. 27.) As to the objection based on s. 109(6), the Chambers judge reviewed affidavit evidence filed by Mr. Watson concerning Galaxy's court action against the Umbro companies, the Statement of Claim, and various e-mails between Galaxy and Umbro discussing their possible merger back in 2001-2002, Umbro's financial assistance to Galaxy, and extensions of the time for Galaxy's payment of royalties. However, the Chambers judge found:

> Without a clear sworn statement from Mr. Watson or another Galaxy representative detailing the manner in which Galaxy says that Umbro was not dealing at arm's length and setting out facts in support, I cannot conclude that Umbro was not acting at arm's length.
> The statement of claim is merely an unsworn pleading. It is not a sworn statement of the facts which Galaxy says lead to the conclusion that Umbro was not acting at arm's length.
> The e-mails do not demonstrate a non-arm's length relationship, even if the court could speculate as to the nature of the relationship, negotiations, etc. without further evidence from the parties involved.
> I will not set aside the chairman's rulings on these issues, Galaxy's motion is dismissed. [paras. 31-34; emphasis added.]

[25] In light of her rulings on the voting entitlements of Galaxy's directors and the adjournment of the motion concerning the landlords' claims, the Chambers judge concluded that it would be inappropriate to deal with the Trustee's application for approval of Galaxy's proposal by the Court. Obviously, this appeal has suspended further proceedings below and the matter has unfortunately sat unresolved for several more months.

ON APPEAL

[26] The first ground of appeal advanced by Galaxy is that the Chambers judge erred in ordering that the landlords' respective claims must be reduced for purposes of the creditors' vote on the proposal. Galaxy contends that in so concluding, the Chambers judge erred in three respects. The latter two grounds — that she should not have directed that additional evidence be adduced regarding the leases, and that she failed to show "proper deference" to the Trustee's decision — may conveniently be dealt with first, and together, since the questions of what evidence is properly adduced on an appeal under s. 135, and what standard of review is to be applied on such an appeal, are obviously related.

First Evidence and Standard of Review

[27] Galaxy submits that the Chambers judge erred in making an order "that would involve evidence on the question of mitigation, and a further hearing." In this regard, counsel commends to us the comments of Farley J. in Re Canadian Triton International Ltd. reflex, (1997) 49 C.B.R. (3d) 192 (Ont. Ct. Gen. Div.), where he observed:

> It would seem to me to be reasonably obvious that the determination as to who is allowed to vote at a particular meeting has to be decided on the basis of what information (i.e., the appropriate material) was available to the Chair of the meeting (in this case the Official Receiver) at the time the vote was conducted. See In Re Andrew Motherwell of Canada Limited (1923), 4 C.B.R. 265 (Ont. S.C.) at p. 268: "Again I do not see how I can allow any new material to go in at this stage. We must deal with the proxies as of the date the votes were cast under them." In other words, it would be inappropriate to go back after the meeting and attempt to cooper up any observed deficiency with the material filed for the purpose of voting. That is not to be confused with material then available to the Chair. If it were otherwise, then > there could be a (never ending) string of attempts at bolstering the material so that it was objectively satisfactory and that the estate would continue to be in a state of uncertainty as to any vote taken. Any appeal from the Chair's decision should be in accord with the appeal provision and be on a single appeal basis. That is not to imply that the material could not be coopered up for any future vote or for the purpose of entitlement to any future distribution. The time for lodging the proxy according to Houlden and Morawetz, "The 1997 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act" . . . at p. 335 "must, however, be filed with the Chair before the taking of the vote, not afterwards: Re Britannia Canning Co. (1938), 19 C.B.R. 250 (Ont. S.C.)." [para. 5; emphasis added.]

[28] Farley J.'s comments strike a pragmatic note, but one that would appear to be in keeping with the general scheme, or "purpose", of the BIA provisions relating to debtors' proposals and creditors' meetings. That scheme operates on fairly tight time lines: within five days of its appointment, the trustee is required to send to every known creditor a notice of the first meeting, to be held within 21 days of that appointment (s. 102(1)). Notice must be published in the local newspaper not later than five days prior to the first meeting of creditors (s. 102(4)), and after the first meeting, notice of meetings need not be given to any creditors other than those who have proven their claims (s. 104(2)).

[29] Sections 105-115 provide for the procedure to be followed at creditors' meetings generally. Section 105(1) states that the official receiver or his nominee shall chair the first meeting of creditors and "shall decide any questions or disputes arising at the meeting". A creditor may appeal any such decision to the court. (All subsequent meetings are required to be chaired by the trustee unless some other person is appointed by resolution at the meeting.) Section 107 requires that every class of creditors be permitted to express its views and wishes separately from every other class. Subject to the BIA, the question of what effect is to be given to those views and wishes in the event of any dispute lies "in the discretion of the court." The chair is given the authority under s. 108 to reject or admit a proof of claim "for the purpose of voting", but his decision is subject to appeal to the court. Section 108(3) also states:

> Where the chairman is in doubt as to whether a proof of claim should be admitted or rejected, he shall mark the proof as objected to and allow the creditor to vote, subject to the vote being declared invalid in the event of the objection being sustained.

[30] At the same time, a person may not vote as a creditor unless he has duly proved a claim which has been duly lodged with the trustee prior to the meeting: s. 109(1). The formal requirements for proofs of claim are set forth in s. 124. Under s. 135, the trustee may disallow, in whole or in part, any claim or security. Further, where the claim is contingent or unliquidated, the trustee must decide whether it is a provable claim, and if it is, he or she must value it. Only when that has occurred is the claim "deemed to be a proved claim to the amount of its valuation": s. 135(1.1). This represents a change from earlier versions of the BIA, which required that the court determine, on application by the trustee, whether any contingent or unliquidated claim was provable. If so, the court was also required to value the claim: see R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 121; R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, s. 95; R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, s. 83; and S.C. 1949 (2nd Sess.), c. 7, s. 83.

[31] Under s. 135(1), the trustee in examining a proof of claim may require further evidence in support of the claim. Section 135(4) provides that the trustee's decision as to the value of a contingent or unliquidated claim or the disallowance of any claim under s. 135(2) is "final and conclusive" unless it is appealed within 30 days of service of the notice referred to in s. 135(3).

[32] The interrelationship of the chair and the trustee has not been the subject of much judicial comment, presumably because the trustee normally becomes the chair after the first meeting, and the two generally co-operate in the treatment of creditors' claims. I do note one case in which the two disagreed: in Northstone Power Corp. v. R.J.K. Power Systems Ltd. 2002 ABQB 405 (CanLII), (2002) 33 C.B.R. (4th) 261 (Alta. Q.B.), a trustee had disallowed a creditor's claim but the official receiver, acting as chair of a subsequent creditors' meeting, decided to allow the creditor to vote on the debtor's proposal, relying on ss. 108(1) and (3). Forsyth J. ruled on the appeal that the official receiver had erred in doing so, and that upon a clear reading of those provisions together with ss. 109(1) and 135, "Section 108 would only come into play when the Trustee had not yet ruled on the validity or otherwise of a proof of claim." (para. 15.) Further, he said:

> I referred earlier in this judgment to the Notice of Disallowance served by the Trustee on R.J.K. and the language set out therein. At this point in time, and subject to appeal, which had not yet been launched as of the April 2nd voting date, or an application for a stay which again had not been applied for, the claim had been disallowed in total and therefore R.J.K. was not entitled to vote at the meeting of April 2nd. I cannot read into Section 108 that where there has been a ruling on the validity of the claim, the Chairperson (Official Receiver) can override that decision of the Trustee and purport to allow a vote to take place even on the limited basis that it is subject to Court subsequently validating the vote or disallowing the claim of R.J.K. . . .

> . . . I would note, however, that the Trustee did not make his decision absent any evidence whatsoever as to the debt claimed, but had the benefit of the investigation carried out by the party proposed under the contract entered into by both parties to be the person who would make the initial determination of the validities of various claims arising under the contract. The point is, that at the date of taking of the vote on April 2nd, the Trustee had clearly disallowed the claim in its entirety and I am satisfied that Section 108, as noted, does not give the Official Receiver, the Chairperson of the meeting, the right to override that decision and find that there was validity to the extent of allowing the vote to be taken and recorded. [paras. 17 and 18; emphasis added.]

[33] In any event, the foregoing provisions seem designed to encourage creditors to take the first meeting seriously (by requiring that they file complete proofs of claim) and to facilitate the prompt airing of the "views and wishes" of the various classes of creditors. Trustees at least are given a considerable degree of authority and have the benefit of the privative clause in s. 135(4). Presumably, this is because they possess specialized expertise in the areas of business financing, restructurings and insolvency, and are decision-makers to whom some deference is owed by a reviewing court. Expertise, of course, has been said to be the most important of the well-known factors to be considered in determining the standard of review applicable by a court of law to the decisions of administrative tribunals in accordance with the "pragmatic and functional" approach mandated by the Supreme Court of Canada. In Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc. 1997 CanLII 385 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, for example, the Court quoted at 773 the following passage from United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 579 v. Bradco Construction Ltd. 1993 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 316:

> . . . the expertise of the tribunal is of the utmost importance in determining the intention of the legislator with respect to the degree of deference to be shown to a tribunal's decision in the absence of a full privative clause. Even where the tribunal's enabling statute provides explicitly for appellate review, as was the case in Bell Canada [v. Canada (Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission) 1989 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1722], it has been stressed that deference should be shown by the appellate tribunal to the opinions of the specialized lower tribunal on matters squarely within its jurisdiction. [34] It is arguable that slightly different considerations apply to the decision of the chair when accepting or rejecting proofs of claim at the initial meeting of creditors. As earlier mentioned, he or she does not have the benefit of a privative clause. Instead, where a dispute arises concerning the effect to be given to the "views and wishes" of different classes of creditors, the matter is said to be "in the discretion of the court" (s. 107), and where the chair is in doubt as to whether a claim should be rejected, he or she must mark the proof as "objected to" and allow the creditor to vote, subject to the vote being invalidated if the objection is sustained — presumably, by the court (or the trustee if Northstone, supra, is correct).

[35] However, counsel before us did not differentiate between official receivers and trustees in this regard. Galaxy contends that in the bankruptcy area, the law has "long been clear" that in reviewing proofs of claim and determining voting rights at creditors' meetings, the chair (and presumably, the trustee where applicable) has a discretion which, if reasonably exercised, should not be interfered with unless the decision relates to a "mandatory" provision of the BIA. The source generally cited for this well-known proposition is the judgment of Tweedie J. in Re McCoubrey (1924) 5 C.B.R. 248 (Alta. S.C.):

> Coming now to the various objections in regard to proofs of claim and proxies: In considering the objections, regard must be had to the provisions of the statutes and Rules in connection with which the objections are raised. If they are mandatory, it is the duty of the chairman to require strict compliance with them; if they are merely directory, he is entitled to exercise his discretion concerning them and if there are reasonable grounds for his exercising such discretion in the manner in which he does, his decision will not be interfered with. [at 252]

[36] The Umbro respondents take issue both with the applicability of the Court's remarks in Triton (which they characterize as obiter in any event) and the proposition that where the chair or trustee has a discretion to exercise, a court of law should not interfere if there were reasonable grounds for the decision. In their submission, the hearing before the Chambers judge below was a trial de novo in which the Court was entitled to hear evidence regarding the valuation of the landlords' claims that was "not necessarily before the trustee." On this point, they cite Re Eskasoni Fisheries Ltd. 2000

CanLII 10880 (NS SC), (2000) 16 C.B.R. (4th) 173, a decision of the Registrar of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court dealing with a trustee's disallowance of a claim. The Registrar stated:

> Where a creditor appeals to the court from the decision of a trustee to disallow a claim that appeal will proceed by way of trial de novo. While I have found no specific case or commentary that makes this point clear, it is clear from a review of the cases generally that a Judge or Registrar hearing an appeal from a trustee's decision is not required simply to proceed upon the information before the trustee. In other words, on such appeals the court is entitled to accept and consider all evidence relevant to the claim. [para. 17]

(See also Re MacDonald [2002] O.J. No. 2744 at para. 19 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), Re Exner 2003 BCSC 260 (CanLII), (2003) 41 C.B.R. (4th) 49 at para. 22 (B.C.S.C.), and Re Beetown Honey Products Inc. [2003] O.J. No. 3853 at para. 16 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), all of which followed Eskasoni. In Port Chevrolet Oldsmobile Ltd. (Re), 2004 BCCA 37 (CanLII), 2004 BCCA 37, a recent decision of this court, counsel did not challenge the "trial de novo" approach taken in Eskasoni. The Court therefore proceeded on the assumption for purposes of that appeal that the Chambers judge below was entitled to consider material that had not been before the trustee in deciding whether a proof of claim had complied with s. 124 of the BIA.)

[37] The respondents also argue that the chair or trustee is not a "specialized tribunal" of the kind discussed in Southam and that there was neither a "hearing" before them in this case nor any meaningful opportunity afforded at the creditors' meeting to adduce evidence to contradict the position taken by the debtor. Yet the BIA obviously intends that a meaningful opportunity be accorded to all creditors at their meeting to raise objections and arguments for consideration by the chair or the trustee in making their determinations under ss. 108 and 135 respectively. At this point, the decision-maker has a 'gatekeeping' role with respect to creditors' voting entitlement, which in turn may decide the fate of the debtor's proposal. The fact that many of the formalities of a hearing in a court of law may be lacking is a necessary feature of the bankruptcy provisions relating to debtors' proposals as I have described them above, but in my view it is not conclusive of the issue of standard of review. Further, I know of no binding authority to the effect that such a hearing must take place before the relevant decision-maker will be regarded as a "specialized tribunal" with expertise that commands some deference. Many statutory decision-makers whose roles are not strictly "adjudicative" have been subjected to the standard of review analysis described in Southam and the cases following it. Thus in Brown and Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf, 1998) the authors observe:

> Until recently, the extension of the pragmatic or functional analysis to determine the appropriate standard of review to be applied to administrative action outside the adjudicative context has been sporadic. For the most part, courts have assumed that the interpretation of statutory provisions conferring legislative or administrative powers on non-adjudicative agencies or officials is subject to de novo determination by the courts. Judicial deference was typically not afforded to the decision-maker's view of what considerations are legally relevant to, or what purposes may legitimately be pursued by, the exercise of discretion. However, in a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada [Baker v. Canada, supra] a pragmatic or functional analysis was applied to the review of a refusal by an immigration officer to grant permanent residence status on humanitarian and compassionate grounds to a woman who had been living in Canada illegally.
> Baker makes two important changes to the review of the exercise of administrative discretion. First, it extends the doctrine of judicial deference to areas of administrative decision-making where it had previously been assumed that, as a general rule, any legal issue decided by the decision-maker was subject to review on a standard of correctness. Second, Baker firmly establishes the principle that, even if the decision-maker has committed none of the errors traditionally associated with the ultra vires doctrine, a reviewing court may still set the decision aside or declare it to be unlawful if the exercise of discretion fails to meet a basic standard of rationality. (See also Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36 2002 SCC 86 (CanLII), [2002] 4 S.C.R. 710 at para. 4.)

[38] Proceeding on the basis that the "pragmatic and functional" approach can be applied to the decisions at issue here, the nature of the question being decided — whether it is one of fact, or mixed fact and law, and whether it involves consideration of "polycentric" factors — is another important factor in deciding where on the (three-point) "continuum" the decision falls. Indeed, it was said by Donald J.A. in Aquasource, supra, that "whether an administrative tribunal's decision will attract curial deference largely depends on the question involved. It is no longer appropriate to grant blanket deference to the tribunal . . . ." (Para. 16.) It cannot be said that any of the decisions at issue here involves the balancing of polycentric interests. On the other hand, the chair's determination as to "what effect" to give to creditors' "views and wishes" and the trustee's power to allow or disallow a claim (for which the trustee must give written reasons) under s. 135

(which in turn also involves the requirements of s. 124) seem to be decisions more of law than fact. On these matters, a judge of the Supreme Court may be assumed to have equal expertise. Further, these questions have important legal consequences, in that a person whose proof of claim is disallowed or rejected may not participate as a creditor in the bankruptcy generally or in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate.

[39] On a consideration of all the "contextual" factors mandated by the "pragmatic and functional" approach, I see no reason to disagree with the long-standing principle enunciated in Re McCoubrey, supra, which requires the application of a "correctness" standard where compliance with a "mandatory" provision (which I would equate to a question of law or statutory compliance) is involved, and the application of a "reasonableness" standard where the determination of a factual matter or an exercise of true discretion is called for. In the former category, I would place the chair's decision under s. 108 rejecting a proof of claim for voting purposes and the trustee's decision disallowing a proof of claim under ss. 124 and 135(2). In the latter category, I would place the trustee's role in valuing contingent and unliquidated claims under s. 135(1.1). This general approach conforms with the objective, which I see as implicit in the BIA, of enabling debtors to have their proposals voted upon expeditiously and permitting creditors to have their rights and claims determined in a business-like manner, while at the same time providing a meaningful appeal to a court of law on questions that clearly affect legal rights, engage the relative expertise of judges, and set precedents for other cases.

[40] I am also of the view that the Supreme Court's hearing of an appeal under s. 135(4) of the BIA is not intended to be a trial de novo but a true appeal. With all due respect to Re Eskasoni, supra, the law in British Columbia is clear that unless the statute that provides an appeal also states that it is to take the form of a trial de novo (as do, for example, s. 119(4.1) of the Social Service Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 431 and s. 822(4) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46), the appeal will be an ordinary appeal. Thus in McKenzie v. Mason 1992 CanLII 2291 (BC CA), (1992) 72 B.C.L.R. (2d) 53, this court held that a statutory appeal to the Chief Gold Commissioner provided by s. 35 of the Mineral Tenure Act did not envisage a trial de novo. In the course of his reasons for the Court, Toy J.A. cited a passage from R. v. Dennis 1960 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1960] S.C.R. 286, where Ritchie J. wrote:

> . . . the distinction between "an appeal by holding a trial de novo" and an appeal to the provincial Court of Appeal is that although the object of both is to determine whether the decision appealed from was right or wrong, in the latter case the question is whether it was right or wrong having regard to the evidence upon which it was based, whereas in the former the issue is to be determined without any reference, except for purposes of cross-examination, to the evidence called in the Court appealed from and upon a fresh determination based upon evidence called anew and perhaps accompanied by entirely new evidence. [at 290-91]

McKenzie v. Mason was confirmed by a five-judge panel of this court in Dupras v. Mason 1994 CanLII 2772 (BC CA), (1994) 120 D.L.R. (4th) 127. There, Mr. Justice Lambert, speaking for the Court, reviewed the complaint procedure provided in the Mineral Tenure Act and said:

> Running through the consideration of s. 35 must be an understanding of the function and expertise of the chief gold commissioner. He or she may be expected to have had many years of experience with respect to the mining industry in general and the locating and recording of mineral claims in particular. That expertise will imbue the carrying out of his or her functions under s. 35. It will also make his or her decision under s. 34 about good faith non-compliance a decision which is well informed by practical experience of what constitutes a good faith attempt to comply with the Act and Regulations, and about whether a failure to comply was calculated to mislead other free miners.
> If an appeal were to be taken by trial de novo the chief gold commissioner's expertise would no longer be available in the process of decision-making under ss. 35 and 34. For that reason and for the other reasons set out by Mr. Justice Toy for this court in McKenzie v. Mason, including particularly the fact that the appeal is not specified in the statute to be by trial de novo, I conclude that s. 35(10) of the Mineral Tenure Act does not contemplate or permit an appeal to a Supreme Court judge by trial de novo.
> Having reached that conclusion, it follows that the appeal to the Supreme Court must be a true appeal confined to whether the chief gold commissioner made a reviewable error of fact, of law, or of procedure. [at 134-35; emphasis added.]

[41] In my opinion, similar considerations apply in this case with respect to the expertise of trustees in bankruptcy. As I have already mentioned, they can be expected to have considerable experience and expertise in the area of business financing, restructurings and insolvency. If "fresh evidence" — i.e., evidence not before the trustee or chair at the time of his or her decision — were to be adduced in Supreme Court on appeal as a matter of course, it seems to me that much would be lost in the way of efficiency in the operation of the bankruptcy scheme generally. Creditors who neglected to file proofs of claim in compliance with the requirements of s. 124 would suffer no practical consequences if, in Farley J.'s phrase, they could expect to "cooper up" their proofs at a later date in court; and the business now conducted at creditors' meetings by trustees (who are generally supervised by inspectors under the BIA) would be largely co-opted to courts of law, with all the attendant expense, delay and formality.

[42] With respect to decisions of the chair under s. 108, again it is arguable that a less restrictive approach to "fresh evidence" is intended. However, since counsel were content to "lump together" the two decision-makers for purposes of this appeal, I will not pursue or decide this rather fine point on this occasion. It will be sufficient, I believe, to state my view that to the extent the Chambers judge below proceeded on the basis that the appeal was a trial de novo in which "fresh evidence" was considered as a matter of course, she fell into error. As unsatisfactory as the state of the evidence may have been, she should have proceeded to consider whether the Trustee had made a reviewable error in its treatment of the landlords' claims on the evidence before it. If counsel applied to adduce "fresh evidence", she would then have been obliged to decide whether its admissibility was justified in the interests of justice or on some other principled basis. Since counsel before us did not make submissions as to what the appropriate criteria would be in this regard, I will leave that point as well for another day. But before counsel on appeals under the BIA file large volumes of affidavits and exhibits in the Supreme Court bearing no resemblance to what was actually before the decision-maker whose decision is being appealed, consideration should be given to that question.

Landlords' Claims

[43] This brings me to Galaxy's remaining ground of appeal under this rubric, which is that the Chambers judge erred in applying the reasoning in Re Wiebe 1995 CanLII 7367 (ON SC), (1995) 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109 (Ont. Ct. Gen. Div.), to the landlords' claims. (Another point of law which this court raised, and on which we received written argument — the effect, if any, of s. 65.1 on these claims — will be addressed below.) Galaxy says that the landlords' claims are, by virtue of Highway Properties Ltd. v. Kelly, Douglas and Co. Ltd. 1971 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 562, "entirely uncontingent". With respect, however, the Chambers judge proceeded not on the basis that these claims were contingent, but on the basis that they were unliquidated. Although she did not cite Highway Properties, she was correct on this point. Highway Properties made it clear that where (as here) a commercial lease is repudiated by the tenant prior to the expiration of its term, the "full armoury of remedies ordinarily available to redress repudiation of covenants" is available to the landlord, including "prospective remedial relief in damages." (At 576 and 573.) In Keneric Tractor Sales Ltd. v. Langille 1987 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 440, the Supreme Court of Canada applied similar reasoning to chattel leases and clarified that a repudiation of a lease "may be triggered by either the inability or the unwillingness of a party to perform his contractual obligations." (At 454.) The lessor's remedy was again to sue for damages as compensation for its "prospective loss." (See 32262 B.C. Ltd. v. See-Rite Optical Ltd. 1998 ABCA 89 (CanLII), [1998] 9 W.W.R. 442 (Alta. C.A.), at paras. 20-22.) The reasoning in these cases, and various judgments delivered by various courts since then, leave little doubt that Sun Life's claim above and beyond the $12,051.25 represented an unliquidated claim for damages which, leaving aside for the moment s. 65.1 of the BIA, the Trustee would have been required to evaluate in accordance with s. 135(1.1). Obviously, valuation is a matter of discretion in the sense that the Trustee could bring many factors, unspecified in the BIA, to bear on it, and in the sense that there is no one "correct" answer. (See S. Waddams, "Judicial Discretion", (2001) 1 Cwth. L.J. 59.) Obviously, such a determination would call upon the Trustee's expertise in commercial insolvency matters. For these reasons and the reasons given above at paras. 27-39, the Trustee's decision in this regard would normally be scrutinized on a "reasonableness" standard.

[44] I am doubtful, however, that the Trustee can be said to have exercised its discretion at all in this instance. Mr. Abakhan stated at the meeting that he did not know how to value the claim "other than how it is presented." Moreover, his observation that "landlords are permitted to file their entire claim for the total unexpired term of the lease, regardless of potential mitigation" begged the question of what effect "potential mitigation" should have had on the valuation of Sun Life's claim. Although as counsel for Galaxy argues, the Trustee did not have specific "evidence" as to the probability that Sun Life or Cookstown could successfully mitigate their damages, this was not a hearing in a court of law, where fine distinctions are drawn on the basis of where an onus of proof may lie. Again setting aside for the moment s. 65.1, the Trustee, using its knowledge and expertise, would have been required to consider whether as a factual matter, the valuation of the claims at their full amounts was appropriate — just as it did in connection with the suppliers' claims. (See, e.g., Re Eftaxias (1962) 3 C.B.R. (N.S.) 152 (Que. Sup. Ct.).)

[45] Following the hearing of this appeal, however, counsel were asked to consider and make submissions to the Court on the effect, if any, of s. 65.1 of the BIA on the landlords' claims. Section 65.1 provides in material part:

> 65.1 (1) Where a notice of intention or a proposal has been filed in respect of an insolvent person, no person may terminate or amend any agreement with the insolvent person, or claim an accelerated payment under any agreement with the insolvent person, by reason only that
> (a) the insolvent person is insolvent; or
> (b) a notice of intention or a proposal has been filed in respect of the insolvent person.

Digitized by Google

(2) Where the agreement referred to in subsection (1) is a lease or a licensing agreement, subsection (1) shall be read as including the following paragraph:

"(c) the insolvent person has not paid rent or royalties, as the case may be, or other payments of a similar nature, in respect of a period preceding the filing of

(i) the notice of intention, if one was filed, or

(ii) the proposal, if no notice of intention was filed."

(5) Any provision in an agreement that has the effect of providing for, or permitting, anything that, in substance, is contrary to subsections (1) to (3) is of no force or effect.

[46] Section 65.1 was enacted at the same time as s. 65.2, the "disclaimer" provision which permits the debtor to disclaim a lease on giving 30 days' written notice to the landlord. Where this occurs, the landlord has no claim for accelerated rent and may file a proof of claim only in respect of its "actual losses resulting from the disclaimer", or the formula amount set out in s. 65.2(4). Section 65.2 was not invoked by Galaxy in this case, since it wished to continue occupying the Sun Life and Cookstown premises, in order to sell its large inventory of clothing for a longer period than s. 65.2 would have permitted. At the same time, counsel for Galaxy informed the Court that his client wanted to avoid any action which could be taken as affirming the leases, since it wished to continue in occupation only for two or three months post-proposal. Galaxy therefore reached the understandings with the landlords described above at paras. 7 and 8.

[47] Our specific question to counsel was whether these arrangements contravened s. 65.1. Galaxy argued that the arrangements constituted a consensual "surrender" of the leases that fell outside both ss. 65.1 and 65.2. It submitted that Galaxy negotiated "terms of surrender" with the landlords and did so in a manner that did not prejudice the estate in bankruptcy in any way, since both agreements were premised upon the landlords' ability to claim actual losses, subject to mitigation. ("Actual losses" are, Galaxy emphasizes, one of the two options that the debtor may choose when a lease is disclaimed under s. 65.2.) Thus if Galaxy had invoked the disclaimer procedure, the landlords would be in exactly the same position, except that Galaxy (and thus the estate) would not have had the benefit of the extra time in the leased premises. In Galaxy's view, nothing in the BIA precludes it from "surrendering" its leases in this manner, and indeed ss. 30(1)(k) and 65.2(1) of the BIA both refer to the "surrender" of a lease as something different from a disclaimer.

[48] With respect to the specific terms of s. 65.1, Galaxy also submitted that the claim for damages by a landlord in accordance with Highway Properties does not constitute a claim for an accelerated payment, but simply the "present recovery of damages for [the landlord's] losing the benefit of the lease over its unexpired term." (At 570.) Thus it says the landlords' respective claims for damages upon Galaxy's "repudiation" of the leases and the landlords' agreements to "terms of surrender" leave the Trustee with claims provable like other claims under s. 121 of the BIA. By reference, s. 121 leads back to the question of whether the claims are contingent or unliquidated for purposes of s. 135.

[49] In response, Umbro submitted that ss. 65.1 and 65.2 of the BIA constitute a complete statutory code intended to govern all aspects of the contractual relationship between a lessor and an insolvent lessee. In this regard, Umbro cites this court's decision in Re B.C. Boat Sales Ltd.; Casson v. Redisco Ltd. (1962) 4 C.B.R. (N.S.) 168, as well as Re Vanwood Forest Products (1983) 45 C.B.R. (N.S.) 254 (B.C.S.C.) and KPMG Inc. v. Alberta Dental Association reflex, (2003) 44 C.B.R. (4th) 236 (Alta. Q.B.). All of these refer to the BIA as providing a comprehensive code for certain purposes, but none deals specifically with ss. 65.1 and 65.2 or with lessors/lessee relationships generally. (See, however, Re Cosgrove-Moore Bindery Services Ltd. reflex, (2000) 48 O.R. (3d) 540 at para. 2 (Ont. Sup. Ct.).)

[50] The real question for us is whether the arrangements agreed upon between Galaxy and its landlords constituted the "termination" of an agreement or resulted in the claiming of an "accelerated payment" under an agreement by reason only of the facts described in subparagraphs (a) and (b) of s. 65.1(1) or in s. 65.1(2). On the first point, Umbro notes that the "surrender" of a lease is not the same as a "termination" and that where a lease is surrendered at law, any claim by the landlord to damages ceases. Thus in Anger and Honsberger's Law of Real Property (2nd ed., 1985), the authors note that "the surrender of a lease stops rent accruing", since the effect of a surrender is "to extinguish the interest created by the lease by means of the term merging in the reversion." (At §811.1.) Similarly, H.M. Haber in Landlord's Rights and Remedies in a Commercial Lease (1996) writes that "If the landlord accepts the tenant's surrender of its lease, although not strictly a waiver of the landlord's right to re-enter, such acceptance negates any claim for damages the landlord may make after the surrender." (At 80.) Accordingly, Umbro contends that the leases were not surrendered but were terminated, in contravention of s. 65.1(1).

[51] I agree that the leases were indeed terminated and that subject to Galaxy's argument concerning the purpose of s. 65.1, the terminations appear to have contravened that provision. However, the effect of this fact on the landlords' claims, for both voting and other purposes, would seem to depend upon whether damages under the rubric of Highway Properties constitute an "accelerated payment", in which event the claim is prohibited. That a broad meaning should be given to the phrase "accelerated payment" is indicated by s. 65.1(5), which states that any provision in an agreement that has the effect of providing for or permitting anything that "in substance" is contrary to subsection (1) is of no force or effect. Although a technical argument might be mounted to the effect that damages for the repudiation of a lease should not be equated with the phrase "accelerated payment under any agreement", I am of the view that invoking an acceleration clause in a lease may "in substance" be equated to suing for damages under the Highway Properties principle. Suing for damages is the "fourth alternative" referred to by Laskin J. in that case — "namely, that the landlord may elect to terminate the lease but with notice to the defaulting tenant that damages will be claimed on the footing of a present recovery of damages for losing the benefit of the lease over its unexpired term." (At 570.) At 573, the Court held that the landlord's termination of the leasehold estate in Highway Properties as a result of the tenant's repudiation of the lease did not mean an end "to all covenants therein to the point of denying prospective remedial relief in damages." In practical terms, such a damage claim seems indistinguishable from a claim for an "accelerated payment" under the lease or any other agreement between debtor and landlord.

[52] The next question is whether the leases were terminated "by reason only" of Galaxy's failure to pay rent in respect of the period prior to the filing of the notice of intention, or by reason of its insolvency. Galaxy did not make any specific argument in respect to this question, although it might have contended that the landlords' respective claims arose out of their agreements with Galaxy rather than Galaxy's insolvency per se. Again, however, I would not give effect to such an argument, since on the evidence that is available to us, there is no suggestion that anything other than Galaxy's insolvency led to its proposal to the landlords and ultimately to the landlords' agreements. In the result, I do not think one can conclude that the leases were terminated for any reason other than the insolvency.

[53] I return, then, to Galaxy's broader submission that s. 65.1 was not intended to apply where the insolvent tenant itself seeks the termination of the lease, since the apparent purpose of s. 65.1 is to "permit commercial businesses to avoid being dismantled in a bankruptcy and to survive in the hope of future viability". (Crystalline Investments Ltd. v. Domgroup Ltd. 2002 CanLII 9612 (ON CA), (2002) 58 O.R. (3d) 549 at para. 8 (Ont. C.A.), aff'd 2004 SCC 3 (CanLII), 2004 SCC 3.) In this case, the arrangements reached between the parties were intended to assist, and presumably did assist, sales of inventory — an important aspect of Galaxy's proposal. Nevertheless, the interests of other creditors must be borne in mind. Very arguably, s. 65.1 is intended not only to prevent landlords from presenting burdensome proofs of claim that inhibit insolvents from regaining viability, but also to avoid prejudice to unsecured creditors whose ability to recover is dependent on the continued operation of the debtor. To that extent, s. 65 may be intended to prohibit the sort of arrangements that occurred in this case, notwithstanding Galaxy's willing promotion of those arrangements.

[54] Based on the foregoing, I am of the view that the landlords' claims to the "actual losses" over the unexpired terms of their leases were prohibited by s. 65.1(1) and that the Trustee was bound to reject their claims except insofar as they related to past arrears and rent as it became due monthly post-proposal. It follows that in the absence of a disclaimer by Galaxy, the claims of Sun Life and Cookstown for purposes of the creditors' meeting and other purposes must be so limited.

[55] I would allow the appeal insofar as the landlords' claims are concerned.

The Directors' Claims

[56] The Chambers judge disagreed with the Trustee's ruling which allowed Messrs. Watson, Dewar and Gill to vote as claimants at the creditors' meeting. The information available at that time was that Galaxy had over 300 shareholders, that it had five directors, and that the three individuals in question did not control, either through a related corporation or with a related group, more than 50 percent of the issued shares. The Chambers judge noted, correctly, that "arm's length" has generally been defined to mean that there are no bonds of dependence, control or influence, between the corporation and the person in question. She drew a distinction, however, between "passive" and "active" directors, finding that Messrs. Watson and Dewar were active managers and that "Each could influence the direction of Galaxy." With respect, I doubt that the BIA intended that a distinction be drawn between individual directors on that basis. All directors are required to devote their best efforts to the company's affairs, and every director can by the very nature of his or her office "influence" those affairs. (Presumably, each director had one vote of five on the board.) This does not mean, without more, that each was able to control the company or that the company was dependent on him.

[57] Thus while the three men were prohibited by s. 113(3)(b) from voting on the appointment of a trustee or inspectors, they were not in my view prohibited from filing proofs of claim and voting the dollar amount thereof by reason of the fact that they were directors, or even "active" directors. In this regard, I believe the Chambers judge erred.

[58] On the other hand, the Chambers judge was correct in concluding that the claims made by Messrs. Watson and Dewar assumed that their employment contracts had been terminated when there was no evidence of that fact, and indeed there was evidence to the contrary, before the Trustee. Moreover, any claims for severance they may have had would, unless their employment agreements provided otherwise, be claims for damages for wrongful dismissal, which would again be unliquidated claims subject to valuation by the Trustee. As it was, since there was no evidence of termination, the Chambers judge was correct in expunging the claims of Messrs. Watson and Dewar.

Umbro Worldwide and Umbro International

[59] Last, Galaxy contends that the Chambers judge erred in affirming the Trustee's decision to permit Umbro Worldwide to vote on the proposal. On this point, Galaxy relies on the fact that Umbro Worldwide's proof of claim had attached to it various invoices bearing the name "Umbro International" or "Umbro International Ltd." At the creditors' meeting, Mr. Doyle on behalf of Umbro Worldwide had stated that "Umbro International did the invoicing for Umbro Worldwide and both companies were subsidiaries of Umbro Holdings." More importantly, there was evidence before the Chair that the Umbro licence agreement had been assigned by Umbro International to Umbro Worldwide in 1999. This fact had even been asserted at para. 13 of Galaxy's Statement of Claim in the legal action against Umbro, which was circulated and discussed at the meeting. Given this, I cannot accede to Galaxy's submission that Umbro Worldwide failed to comply with the requirements of s. 124 regarding the filing of proofs of claim, or that the Trustee erred in ruling that Umbro Worldwide had a provable claim entitling it to vote at the creditors' meeting. It simply does not lie in Galaxy's mouth to deny the connection, by way of assignment, between Umbro International and Umbro Worldwide, and it cannot be said that the proof of claim filed by the latter did not contain or refer to adequate statements of account showing particulars of its claim for purposes of s. 124 of the BIA.

[60] It is also contended on appeal that the Chambers judge erred in declining to find on the evidence before her that Umbro Worldwide was not at arm's length to Galaxy in the year prior to the insolvency. Galaxy submits that the "arm's length" determination to be made pursuant to s. 109(6) of the BIA is less onerous than that required to be made under s. 3(1) in that it is "not transaction-specific and therefore must relate to the way the debtor and creditor conducted their business affairs in the subject period." In this regard, counsel notes the observations of the Court in Irving Oil Ltd. v. Noseworthy, Cook, Atlantic Transportation Company Limited and Heap Noseworthy Limited (1982) 42 C.B.R. (N.S.) 302 (Nfld. S.C.) that:

> Whether or not the dealings were at arm's length is a question of fact which cannot be decided by a finding that the companies concerned had a common director. There must be evidence of the existence of an unbusiness-like advantage.
> The agreement was in the ordinary course of business, and neither Peter Cook nor Roger Crosbie had control of the companies concerned, and there is no evidence to indicate that the dealings were not at arm's length. It can be said that, between all the parties concerned, each of them was selfishly seeking the best economic advantage and none had any reasons to expect from the others, nor would any party have been prepared to accord to another, any favours or concessions. [at 306]

Galaxy relies on the (fresh) affidavit evidence filed by Mr. Watson to which was appended various e-mails between him and the Umbro defendants concerning various dealings under the licence agreement. Even if this evidence were properly accepted, however, it does not show a relationship of dependence or control (which might lead to the existence of an "unbusiness-like advantage") between them. The parties may have been attempting to find common ground and to reach an understanding that would be of benefit to both sides, but the material falls short of proving that either had such influence that the other was sacrificing its own self-interest. I would therefore dismiss this aspect of the appeal.

Disposition

[61] I would allow the appeal to the extent of allowing Mr. Gill's claim to be voted at the meeting, and setting aside the Chambers judge's order directing that new evidence be adduced concerning the valuation of the landlords' claims. I would remit those claims to the Trustee for determination of the amounts of rent that have become due since the purported terminations, in respect of which s. 65.1 does not bar the claims, but damages under Highway Properties for loss of future rent are to be disallowed. Following the re-taking of the creditors' vote on the proposal, I would remit the motion for approval of the proposal back to the Supreme Court.

Policy

4. If the appropriate amount can be ascertained, the security shall be set at the time the assignment is filed with the official receiver.

5. The following shall be taken into consideration in deciding the appropriateness of any security:

(a) in fixing the amount of the security, if any, the official receiver shall consider the risks to creditors and costs to the estate and take into consideration other forms of creditor protection, such as insurance coverage;

(b) the security shall be set in relation to the anticipated realization that will be available for distribution to preferred and unsecured creditors after payment of the trustee's costs of administration;

(c) where a "range of security amounts" cost a fixed premium, the security shall be set at the highest amount within the range to avoid the need for later increases within the range;

(d) subject to the provisions of paragraph (c), the estate security shall not be fixed at an amount in excess of the largest

Politique

4. Lorsque le montant approprié peut être déterminé, la garantie doit être établie au moment du dépôt de la cession auprès du séquestre officiel.

5 Il faudra tenir compte des principes suivants pour fixer une garantie :

a) le séquestre officiel devra prendre en considération les autres formes de protection des créanciers, telles les assurances en vigueur, ainsi que les risques véritables pour les créanciers et les coûts de cette protection additionnelle;

b) la garantie doit être établie en fonction de la réalisation prévue qui sera disponible pour distribution aux créanciers privilégiés et non garantis après déduction des frais d'administration du syndic;

c) si une prime fixe couvre toute une « gamme de montants de garanties », la garantie doit être établie selon le montant le plus élevé de la gamme afin de pallier à un besoin ultérieur d'augmentation à l'intérieur de la gamme;

d) sous réserve de l'alinéa c), la garantie ne devra pas excéder le montant le plus élevé prévu amount to be on hand at any one time;

(e) if the estimated amount to be available to preferred and unsecured creditors, as per paragraph (b), is less than $3,000, no security will normally be fixed; and

(f) if a security is to be considered in excess of $25,000, the official receiver may review other avenues, including additional controls such as multiple counter-signatures of principals of the corporate trustee, with a view to fixing a lower security and reducing costs to the estate.

en tout temps pendant l'administration;

e) si la répartition prévue aux créanciers privilégiés et non garantis selon l'alinéa b) est inférieure à 3 000 $, aucune garantie ne devrait être établie; et

f) si le montant de la garantie doit dépasser 25 000 $, le séquestre officiel peut explorer d'autres solutions, y compris le recours à des contrôles supplémentaires tel l'endossement multiple des officiers de la corporation, et ce, afin d'abaisser la garantie et de réduire les frais pour l'actif

Changing the Amount of the Security

6. The trustee and the inspectors shall periodically review the adequacy of the security in accordance with subsection 120(3) of the Act.

7. When circumstances warrant increasing or decreasing the amount of a security, the trustee shall notify the official receiver detailing the change in the anticipated realization and the suggested adjustment to the amount of the security.

8. When deemed appropriate, the official receiver may revise the adequacy of the security.

Modification du montant de la garantie

6 Le syndic et les inspecteurs doivent réviser périodiquement la suffisance de la garantie en vertu du paragraphe 120(3) de la Loi.

7. Lorsque les circonstances justifient une augmentation ou une diminution de la garantie, le syndic doit aviser le séquestre officiel du changement anticipé en égard à la réalisation attendue et suggérer un montant révisé de la garantie.

8 Lorsqu'il le juge approprié, le séquestre officiel peut réviser la suffisance de la garantie.

STATUTES CONSIDERED: Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT ON APPLICATION TO ADMIT FRESH EVIDENCE ON BANKRUPCY APPEAL HALL, J.:

BACKGROUND

[1] This application is brought by M. J. Oppenheim, Attorney in Fact in Canada for Lloyd's Non-Marine Underwriters ("Lloyd's"). The First Defendant, J. J. Lacey Insurance Limited ("Lacey") is subject to a Receiving Order made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended, on December 30, 1994. The Second Defendant, Hiland Insurance Company Limited ("Hiland"), was ordered to be wound up in accordance with the provisions of the Winding-Up Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. W-11, as amended.

[2] Hiland filed a Proof of Claim with the Trustee in Bankruptcy of Lacey which claim was allowed by the Trustee. Lloyd's was a creditor of Lacey and in July of 2000 it filed an appeal from the allowance by the Trustee of the claim of Hiland, seeking an order of the Court that the claim of Hiland against the bankrupt estate of Lacey is invalid and should be disallowed.

[3] The Plaintiff claims that Lacey and Hiland are related corporations and that both Lacey and Hiland were de facto controlled by one Clayton Gillingham. The Plaintiff alleges that between January 1 and December 31, 1992 Lacey, as Cover-holder, had two Binding Authority Agreements under which it was authorized to sell Automobile and Residential insurance for Lloyds. The persons authorized under the 1992 Binding Authority Agreements were Clayton Gillingham and Carol Scott. The Plaintiff alleges that between October 1992 and December 31, 1992 (during the same period that Clayton Gillingham and Lacey applied for a provincial insurance license for Hiland), Lacey collected premiums on Lloyd's policies without reporting the associated policies to Lloyd's or forwarding the collected premiums to Lloyd's. Additionally, the Plaintiff alleges that between June 1, 1991 and December 31, 1992 certain insurance policies were entered into by Lacey and the name of certain Underwriters at Lloyds but certain of those policies were either not reported to Lloyds or Lacey failed to remit the premiums to Lloyds in accordance with the terms of the Binding Authority Agreement.

[4] The Plaintiff filed a Notice of Appeal of the Trustee's allowance of a claim of Hiland against the bankrupt estate of Lacey's under s. 135 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. By an earlier Order of this Court the appeal was converted to a trial and the Plaintiff had the leave of the Court to issue a Statement of Claim which he has done.

[5] The Amended Statement of Claim filed in this matter alleges that during the periods earlier referred to both Lacey and Hiland by their Directors, officers, servants and agents unduly, unlawfully, maliciously and lacking bona fides conspired and agreed together, one with the other, or with persons unknown to, inter alia:

(a) submit false, inaccurate and misleading information to the Plaintiff for the purposes of obtaining without authorization and to convert to their own use or to the use of the directors, officers or shareholders, the benefit of premiums otherwise due to the Plaintiff;

(b) submit false, inaccurate and misleading information to the Plaintiff, the purpose of which was to mislead, misstate, and otherwise mislead the Plaintiff as to the true nature of the potential exposure to the Plaintiff from the issuance of insurance policies;

(c) mislead the Plaintiff as to the premiums written and the potential exposure incurred as a result of the generation of policies of insurance pursuant to the Binding Authority Agreements; and

(d) conceal from the Plaintiff a true reflection of the insurance risk that the Plaintiff, by operation of law, was otherwise obliged to provide cover notwithstanding the failure of the Defendants to remit the premiums.

[6] The Plaintiff generally claimed that the motivation of the Defendants was to obtain capital generated by the premiums for the operation of one or other or both of the Defendants, or for the use of the directors, officers, or directing minds thereof to their own benefit. The Plaintiff alleges that the Defendants, the directors, officers, and shareholders thereof, or combinations thereof, acted as one and failed to remit the appropriate information including the type, nature and duration of insurance policies pursuant to the Binding Authority Agreement and that they retained to their own benefit or for the benefit of their directors, officers or others the premiums thereof knowing that such retention was misleading and unlawful.

[7] The Plaintiff claims that at all material times Hiland and Lacey and the affiliated companies as well as the shareholders, directors and officers shared a common purpose by designing and putting in place a plan of action so as to deny the Plaintiff of his lawful entitlement to payments collected on insurance policies generated pursuant to the Binding Authority Agreements and that under the law of Newfoundland the Defendants are liable for both their own acts and the acts and/or omissions of their subsidiaries, directors, officers or shareholders inasmuch as the Defendants operated their corporate entities as one entity with the sole and singular purpose of defrauding the Plaintiff of its lawful entitlement to the premiums collected. In particular the Plaintiff claims that Clayton Gillingham was the sole owner of Hiland and the de facto sole owner of Lacey and at all times controlled the day-to-day operations of both Hiland and Lacey, directing the staff of one or both of these corporate entities and their affiliates to set in place a scheme designed by Clayton Gillingham for the fraudulent activities referred to.

[8] As a result thereof the Plailntiff says that these fraudulent activities are such so as to deny the Defendants any reliance on the basic principles of corporate law to suggest that Hiland and Lacey should now be treated as separate operating entities as to do so would unjustly deprive the Plaintiff of its rights by means of the Defendants' very own misconduct and in particular would result in the allowance of a claim against the Estate of Lacey by Hiland to the detriment not only of the Plaintiff but as against all legitimate creditors of the bankrupt Estate of Lacey. As a result the Plaintiff in its Statement of Claim requests that the Court pierce the corporate veils of Hiland and Lacey as a consequence of the fraud alleged and as a result of the activities of the directing mind of Clayton Gillingham and that the claim of Hiland in the bankrupt Estate of Lacey be deemed invalid and disallowed. The amount of the claim of Hiland allowed in the bankruptcy of Lacey by the Trustee was approximately 2.9 million dollars.

FRESH EVIDENCE SOUGHT TO BE CALLED BY THE PLAINTIFF

[9] The Plaintiff indicated that, prior to the Order of the Court converting its Notice of Appeal to a Statement of Claim, it intended to file with the Court various pieces of affidavit and other evidence so as to properly ground its appeal. This evidence included:

(1) The Affidavit of Rita Christie, formerly of Lloyd's Non-Marine Underwriters;
(2) Discovery evidence of Clayton Gillingham and Carol Scott;
(3) Affidavit of Douglas Connolly, formerly of the Office of the Superintendent of Insurance;
(4) Affidavit of Karen Legge, formerly of the Office of the Superintend of Insurance;
(5) Corporate particulars of the Defendants and affiliated companies;
(6) Affidavit of David A. Howe, Chartered Accountant with NKHK Chartered Accountants;
(7) Affidavit of Alexia Mifflin, formerly of J. J. Lacey Insurance Limited and Hiland Insurance Company Limited.

[10] The Plaintiff/Applicant now seeks leave of the Court to call, inter alia, the above evidence either by viva voce or through the appropriate evidentiary process and such other evidence as it deems necessary to prove the allegations set forth in its Statement of Claim.

[11] The Plaintiff/Applicant alleges that the Trustee did not duly investigate the claim of Hiland and the Lacey bankruptcy but simply relied upon the evidence provided. In this regard the Trustee was in the difficult position as the Plaintiff/Applicant contends that the Trustee did not have evidence of the fraud and/or conspiracy of Hiland and Gillingham. Counsel for Lacey objects that the Statement of Claim raises a plethora of new grounds upon which the appeal is based, including the ground of conspiracy. Counsel for Lacey argues that the question is a simple question of disallowance of the Hiland claim. Counsel for Hiland objects that the Notice of Appeal was basically founded upon fraud and that not the Statement of Claim expands the claims to include conspiracy. Additionally, where counsel for the Plaintiff lays out the corporate interrelationships of Lacey and Hiland with their subsidiaries and shareholders, counsel for Hiland fears that the action is being turned into an investigation of the whole "family" of related companies. He contends that allowing such a procedure after the passage of 13 years takes away the certainty of the bankruptcy administration process and opens up the whole decision-making process of the Trustee to review by the Court, thus rendering the claims determination process of a trustee essentially ineffective.

[12] Counsel for the Plaintiff states that the sole purpose in outlining the family history of the interrelated companies is to show that Clayton Gillingham was the controlling mind of both Lacey and Highland. He contends that proving this will require very little evidence and very little time. Counsel for the Plaintiff contends that the Statement of Claim has put to rest the argument that the appeal was too general. Whether the allegation is fraud or conspiracy these issues are, in the mind of counsel for the Plaintiff/Applicant, two sides of the same coin. The relief sought is the same. Counsel for the Plaintiff/Applicant assured the Court that he was not getting into a forensic audit of all of the subsidiaries but intended to simply ask representatives of the Superintendent of Insurance to advise the Court where the various monies received by Lacey and Hiland went. He therefore asks leave to have the fresh evidence allowed.

APPEAL FROM DECISION OF TRUSTEE – TRUE APPEAL OR TRIAL DE NOVO?

Digitized by Google

[13] Section 135 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act deals with the admission or disallowance of proofs of claim and proofs of security by the Trustee of the Bankrupt estate. Section 135(1), (1.1.) and (2) state:

> "Trustee shall examine proof
> 135.(1) The trustee shall examine every proof of claim or proof of security and the grounds therefor and may require further evidence in support of the claim or security.
> Determination of provable claims
> (1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.
> Disallowance by trustee
> (2) The trustee may disallow, in whole or in part,
> (a) any claim;
> (b) any right to a priority under the applicable order of priority set out in this Act; or
> (c) any security.

[14] The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, s. 135(4) deals with appeals from such determinations or disallowances. It provides:

> "Determination or disallowance final and conclusive
> 135(4) A determination under subsection (1.1) or a disallowance referred to in subsection (2) is final and conclusive unless, within a thirty day period after the service of the notice referred to in subsection (3) or such further time as the court may on application made within that period allow, the person to whom the notice was provided appeals from the trustee's decision to the court in accordance with the General Rules."

[15] Generally it has been accepted that an appeal from the trustee's disallowance or determination of a claim is a hearing de novo and that the Court hearing the appeal is entitled to hear and consider all relevant information about the creditors' claims. (See Re Eskasoni Fisheries Ltd. (2000), 16 C.D.R. (4d) 173.) However recently, in Re Galaxy Sports Inc. (2004), 2004 Carswell BC 1112, the British Columbia Court of Appeal declined to follow Eskasoni and held that the hearing of an appeal of a trustee's valuation of a claim was not intended, under s. 135(4) to be a trial de novo but rather was a true appeal. That Court noted that if fresh evidence was adduced in the Appeal Court as a matter of course, there would be a loss of efficiency in the bankruptcy process, creditors who neglected to file proofs of claim in compliance with s. 124 would suffer no practical consequences, and the business conducted at creditors meetings would be co-opted by the Courts with attendant expense, delay and formality. The Court of Appeal held that the standard of review for trustees' legal determinations, such as the decision to allow or disallow a proof of claim, was one of correctness. The standard of reasonableness applies to the trustees' decisions of a factual nature, such as the valuation of a contingent or unliquidated claim.

[16] This decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal was based, in part, on the decision of Mr. Justice James Farley in Re Canadian Triton International Ltd. reflex, (1997), 49 C.B.R. (3d) 192 (Ont.Gen.Div.), in which he stated that:

> "The determination as to who is allowed to vote at a particular meeting was to be decided on the basis of what information was available ... at the time that the vote was conducted."

Justice Farley went on to say that creditors were able to file additional material to "cooper up" the proofs of claim for future votes or for the purpose of entitlement to any future distribution.

[17] The Plaintiff argues this is a situation where a creditor contesting a determination or a disallowance of a claim did not have the opportunity of reviewing all of the materials that the trustee reviewed and relied upon in making the determination to allow the creditor's claim. More importantly, as I think is a likely consideration here, the Court would not know what information the trustee had not considered in coming to its determination. In this case the interrelationships of Hiland and Lacey and their common control allegedly by Clayton Gillingham gives some serious cause for concern as to whether the Trustee considered these elements in allowing the claim of Hiland in the bankruptcy of Lacey. There is certainly merit to the suggestion that efficacy and expedition ought to be brought to the claims determination and disallowance procedure. It is undoubtedly true that the entry of fresh evidence at the appeal level may result in the loss of efficacy in the bankruptcy process in that the business at creditors' meetings would be co-opted and extra expense, delay and formality would be imposed upon the process.

[18] However, in my view efficacy, expedition, concerns over extra expense and delay or increased formality should not be permitted to trump fairness and should certainty not allow the claims determination process to constitute a de facto "good housekeeping seal of approval" upon activities surrounding which there is a serious allegation of criminality. Whether such criminality or unfairness in fact exists is a question to be determined upon the hearing of appropriate evidence. In my view however the Court should not be denied the opportunity to hear such evidence simply because doing so would be disruptive to the efficacy of the claims determination process.

CONCLUSION

[19] I am therefore prepared to allow this matter to proceed as a trial de novo and that the fresh evidence sought to be introduced by the Plaintiff/Applicant as more particularly set out in its application for the admission thereof is allowed, either by viva voce evidence or through the appropriate evidentiary process and as well this ruling includes such other evidence as the Plaintiff/Applicant may deem necessary to prove the allegations set forth in its Statement of Claim.

COSTS

[20] I am not prepared to award costs to the Plaintiff/Applicant in this present application. In my view, the very considerable delays of the Plaintiff/Applicant in bringing this matter forward disentitle it to such costs.

[1] This is an application by a creditor of the bankrupt to expunge a proof of claim of another creditor. The application is brought pursuant to s.135(5) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act:

> The court may expunge or reduce a proof of claim or a proof of security on the application of a creditor or of the debtor if the trustee declines to interfere in the matter.

[2] The trustee has not merely declined to interfere in the matter. It was counsel for the trustee who spoke in opposition to the application.

FACTS

[3] Marsuba Holdings Ltd., the bankrupt, owned and operated licensed premises in New Westminster. Till July 1994, they were run as a nightclub. Then the nightclub was closed, while substantial renovations were undertaken. It re-opened almost a year later, in June 1995, as a pub, restaurant and deli. The renovations resulted in numerous delays and cost overruns. These problems, combined with a shortfall in the anticipated revenue of the new operations, led to financial difficulties so serious that a receiving order was made on May 3, 1996.

[4] Prior to the commencement of the renovations, a Mr. Wosk was the president and sole director of Marsuba. He owned 80% of the shares. The other 20% were owned by the manager of the club, Mr. Sinclair, or by his corporate alter ego, 7012 Holdings Ltd. (Counsel told me they would not always distinguish between Mr. Sinclair and the company, and I will follow suit. Henceforth, I will refer simply to Mr. Sinclair, as nothing in these Reasons turns on the separate legal interests of the individual and his company.)

[5] At about the time of the commencement of the renovations, Mr. Wosk transferred a further 10% of Marsuba's shares to Mr. Sinclair, 15% to a Mr. Pulos, and 5% to a Mr. Palidwor. The reason these two individuals received their shares is not germane to the issue now before the court, although their involvement may become relevant later, as some sort of similar fact evidence.

[6] Before the renovations began, Mr. Sinclair had been paid $3,000 a month pursuant to a management contract. The provision for remuneration entitled him to receive "a management fee the amount and payment of which shall be negotiated and determined from time to time by the Parties hereto". When the nightclub was closed, Mr. Sinclair ceased to receive this salary. Instead, he was paid $1,500 a month by another company owned primarily by Mr. Wosk which operated a nightclub in Burnaby.

[7] The evidence before me was confined to affidavits, and does not deal extensively with any discussions between the parties with regard to the terms of Mr. Sinclair's remuneration, let alone the existence of a binding agreement on the subject. Basically, Mr. Wosk says that Mr. Sinclair has already received everything he was entitled to during the renovation period - $1,500 a month from the other company and an extra 10% of the shares. Mr. Sinclair says that his $3,000 a month was intended to continue, but was put in abeyance until the company started generating income again. To my knowledge, he has not explained what the $1,500 was intended to be for, nor why it should not be credited against the $3,000 he says he was supposed to receive. He says that the additional 10% of the shares he received were transferred to him because Mr. Wosk could not finance the renovations by himself. The renovations were in fact financed largely by shareholders' loans, and Mr. Sinclair says the assignment of the shares to himself, Mr. Palidwor and Mr. Pulos was made to induce them to advance funds to the company in proportion to their shareholdings.

[8] Both Mr. Wosk and Mr. Sinclair worked at the premises in connection with the renovations. The extent of the work done by each is now contested. When the premises re-opened, Mr. Sinclair went back to managing the business during the daytime. (Mr. Palidwor managed the evening shift). I presume there is evidence that Mr. Sinclair was paid nothing during this period, although I do not recall being referred to such evidence. But his claim for remuneration of $3,500 during this period makes no sense if he had been paid already. Although Mr. Sinclair purports to rely on the management contract to justify his salary of $3,000 a month during the renovations, he appears to have repudiated the contract for this post-renovation period by claiming $3,500, without alleging that the contract was renegotiated. He claims this sum, and the trustee allowed it, because Mr. Wosk also claimed a management fee or salary of $3,500 for this period (which was disallowed by the trustee).

[9] On about October 22, 1995, Mr. Wosk purported to terminate Mr. Sinclair's management contract and his employment by Marsuba. Mr. Sinclair has claimed wages of $1,500 per month from November 1, 1995 to April 30, 1996. The basis for this claim has not been explained to me. The only evidence is from the trustee, who has sworn that "this claim was considered by the inspectors and the trustee and was not considered unreasonable." Why they should have done so is completely beyond me.

[10] Following the dismissal of Mr. Sinclair, he, together with Mr. Palidwor and Mr. Pulos, petitioned the company into bankruptcy. Mr. Sinclair presented a proof of claim totalling some $171,000. The trustee disallowed $12,500 out of that because it had already been claimed by another creditor. The claim was also reduced by $8,646.13, part of a larger claim of $27,000 that Mr. Sinclair said should be added to his shareholder's loan account. This claim was for monies that Mr. Sinclair has said he paid "under the table" to contractors and work people engaged in the renovations. He produced a piece of paper saying that he had spent this $27,000, but the detailed breakdown on it amounted only to $18,353.87. After discussions with the inspectors, the trustee disallowed the difference of $8,646.13.

[11] The claim that appears to have been accepted by the trustee amounted to $152,641.98. The claim breaks down as follows:

Shareholders' Loan (as adjusted):	$ 83,353.87
Mastercard Purchases:	2,217.10
Satellite Dish Purchase:	3,799.00
Wages:
(July 1, 1994 to June 23, 1995) at $3,000 per month:	35,200.00
(June 23, 1995 to October 31, 1995) at $3,500 per month:	14,933.00
(November 1, 1995 to April 30, 1996) at $1,500 per month:	9,000.00
G.S.T. at 7% on Wages of $59,133:	4,139.31
SUBTOTAL:	$152,642.28
Adjustment to Correct the Arithmetic:	(.30)
AMOUNT CLAIMED:	$152,641.98

[12] Mr. Wosk has accepted or, to be more accurate, has been forced to accept, as a result of earlier litigation, some of Mr. Sinclair's claims. However, he objects to all the wages claimed (and presumably the G.S.T. purported to be payable thereon), and the $18,353.87 remaining from the claim for $27,000 reimbursement, after taking into account the already disallowed $8,646.13.

THE ONUS AND STANDARD OF PROOF

On whom is the burden of proof?

[13] There is no debate on this issue. The onus is on the party seeking to have the claim expunged: Ostrander& Co. v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association, [1930] 2 D.L.R. 88.

What precisely does the applicant have to prove?

[14] Counsel for the trustee says the applicant must show that the trustee acted unreasonably or improperly in accepting the proof of loss. Counsel would have it that so long as the trustee acted reasonably, the actual legitimacy of the claim is irrelevant. I respectfully disagree.

[15] Quite apart from questions of natural justice raised by this position (where officials would be given the power to make decisions on the legitimacy of claims, subject to no review other than on questions of the reasonableness of their conduct) this construction of s.135(5) is contrary to the tenor of s.135 as a whole. The first four sub-sections deal with the procedure to be followed where a creditor appeals the disallowance of a claim by a trustee, and in such cases the appeal is decided simply on the basis of the legitimacy of the claim. There is no reason at all why different considerations should apply to appeals of a decision by the trustee to allow a claim. The only question should be whether the claim is indeed legitimate.

[16] The trustee's position is also contrary to authority. In Re Browne (1960), 2 All E.R. 625, Cross J. said:

> ... if a trustee admits a proof on a view of the law which is generally thought to be right but subsequently turns out to be wrong the proof has been "improperly" admitted... .

[17] Self-evidently, a trustee would have been acting reasonably if he had admitted a proof on a view of the law which had generally been thought to be right. Thus, simply establishing that the trustee acted reasonably will not preclude a finding that the proof has been improperly admitted. The claim must stand or fall on its merits.

What is the standard of proof?

[18] In Re Browne (supra), the court declined to expunge the proof of loss, because it was not satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that it had been improperly admitted. However, the court came to that conclusion after reviewing evidence of an extremely lengthy and prejudicial delay between the admission of the proof of loss and the application to expunge. The debtor had been adjudicated bankrupt in 1912. The creditor filed a proof of the debt in May 1913. The creditor died in 1919 and the debtor in 1921. The trustee was discharged in 1925. In 1958 a reversionary interest belonging to the debtor fell into possession. It was only on this event, when it appeared that some dividend would be payable to creditors, that the official receiver, as the successor to the discharged trustee, sought to have the creditor's proof expunged on the ground that it was an unenforceable gambling debt. There was no evidence available to the court concerning the circumstances of the debt, nor of the additional information the original trustee might have sought and considered when deciding whether to allow the claim. All sorts of speculations were canvassed by the various parties as to what the trustee may or may not have known about the facts of the case or the applicable law. The court concluded:

> In a case where the vital witnesses are dead and the relevant documentary evidence may have been lost the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta applies with peculiar force. In such a case it is not enough for the official receiver to say that, as the terms of the proof suggest that the debt in question was an unenforceable gambling debt, the onus is thrown on the creditors' representatives to show that it was not. It is for the official receiver to satisfy me that the proof was wrongly admitted, and not, as I see it, simply to satisfy me on the balance of probabilities but to satisfy me beyond any reasonable doubt.
> (my emphasis)

[19] In my view, the imposition of this extremely high standard of proof is limited by the words "in such a case". In the case at bar, although there has certainly been a lengthy (and to some extent unexplained) delay between the filing of the proof of claim in 1995 and the present application, there is no question of dead, missing, or even forgetful witnesses. I can see no reason in principle or on precedent why the issue should not be decided on a simple balance of probabilities. The application here will be decided accordingly.

THE MERITS OF THE CLAIM

[20] I cannot decide the merits on the basis of the affidavits before me. There are simply too many unanswered questions. What, if anything, did the contending parties agree should be the basis of Mr. Sinclair's remuneration during and after construction? What precisely was the consideration for the new shares issued to him? Did he do enough work in the Burnaby club to justify a salary of $1,500 a month for that work alone? Why did he claim an additional $500 a month after the facilities re-opened? Why should he be paid anything at all after November 1995? Is there any proof of the purpose and payment of any of the items making up the $27,000? Were these sums paid to contractors paid in cash with the object of evading G.S.T., and if so, is the payment tainted with sufficient illegality to preclude their recovery in law?

[21] As a general rule, an application to expunge a proof of claim should follow the same procedure as the appeal of a trustee's disallowance of a proof. Such applications are decided on the basis of viva voce evidence of relevant witnesses. The same procedure should be followed here. The application is adjourned to a registrar in bankruptcy, to be determined on the basis of viva voce evidence. It may be heard by any registrar presiding on the date set for the hearing, including myself, but I am not seized of the matter.

[22] I would respectfully suggest that if the trustee has not already given any thought to the propriety of retaining counsel to argue one creditor's claim against another, and the potential consequences in costs, it might be appropriate to do so before the hearing continues.

DECISION

Before: Mr. Chief Justice David D. Smith
Heard: July 18, 2002

[1] This is an appeal pursuant to subsection 192(4) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (BIA) of a decision of the Registrar in Bankruptcy dismissing the Royal Bank of Canada's (RBC) appeal against a trustee's Notice of Disallowance on the ground that the appeal had not been filed within the 30-day period pursuant to subsection 135(4) of the BIA and therefore he did have the competence to hear the matter.

[2] The relevant facts of this matter are outlined below.

1. Mr. Thomas Blair Drummie filed an Assignment in Bankruptcy on March 29, 2001. The Respondent, Grant Thornton Limited (the "Respondent Trustee") was appointed the Trustee of the Estate of Bankrupt by the Official Receiver. The first meeting of creditors was held on April 19, 2001.

2. In April 2001, The Society of Lloyd's (the Respondent Lloyd's) proof of claim for an unsecured claim of $637,557.39 and a proxy appointing Mr. Bernard F. Miller in the matter of the Estate of Thomas Blair Drummie, iin Bankruptcy was delivered to the Trustee in Bankruptcy of Thomas Blair Drummie, Mr. V.L. Duff, Grant Thornton Limited (the "Trustee").

3. The Royal Bank of Canada (the "RBC") also filed with the Trustee, Mr. Duff, a proxy and a proof of claim, both dated May 14, 2001, for a claim of $310,801.00 which it claimed was partially secured and estimated the value of the security at $200,000.00.
4. A Section 170 Report dated December 10, 2001, prepared by the Trustee, indicates a secured claim in the amount of $200,000 and unsecured claims in the amount of $838,359.29, including the Lloyd's claim of $637,557.39.
5. The Trustee disallowed the RBC's security on the property in whole pursuant to subsection 135(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S., 1985, c. B-3 (The "BIA") and issued a Notice of Disallowance dated January 31, 2002 under subsection 135(3) of the BIA stating, in part:
The security given related to a specific loan in the amount of $150,000.00 and that loan was repaid in full prior to the date of bankruptcy.
6. On February 14, 2002, the Trustee informed Lloyd's that the solicitor representing the Royal Bank Financial Group had requested the Trustee to agree to an extension of time to March 29, 2002 to appeal the Trustee's decision to disallow its secured position, to which request the Trustee consented.
7. On March 13, 2002, Mr. George Benchetrit, agent and counsel of The Society of Lloyd's (the Intervenor) and the only inspector of the Estate of Thomas Blair Drummie in Bankruptcy, questioned the legal validity of the Trustee's consent to the late filing of an appeal from a notice of disallowance. In his letter dated March 13, 2002, he stated:
According to the wording in section 135(4) of the BIA, the trustee's disallowance of the claim by Royal Bank of Canada ("RBC") to a security interest is final and conclusive unless, within 30 days after service of the notice of disallowance, RBC appeals the trustee's decision or makes a court application to extend the 30-day period.
It is my understanding that the extension to March 29, 2002 mentioned in your letter was granted by you to counsel for RBC verbally. As I read the above-noted section of the BIA, it is the court (not the trustee) which can grant an extension of time for appealing the disallowance, and the court can only do so if the appellant applies for such an extension within the 30-day period.
Please let me know and when the trustee served the notice of disallowance on RBC. Also, please let me know if you have any reason to believe that the consent of a trustee to the late filing of an appeal from a notice of disallowance is legally valid.
8. On March 20, 2002, the RBC filed an appeal with Michael Bray, the Registrar of the Court of Queen's Bench in Bankruptcy in the Judicial District of Fredericton (the "Registrar in Bankruptcy"), of the Trustee's decision.
9. In response to Mr. Benchetrit's letter, the Trustee clarified his position as follows in a letter dated April 5, 2002:
By letter dated February 13, 2002, our solicitor received a request from the solicitor of the Bank for an extension of the time to file an appeal. This request was not unreasonable in our opinion nor could we see any prejudice to our consenting to the request, therefore we instructed our solicitor to consent to the extension to and including March 29, 2002.
It is now our understanding that the Bank's solicitor did not obtain a formal order from the Registrar extending time. we are advised that he will raise the issue with the Registrar at the hearing, which has been scheduled for May 13, 2002. If requested for input at the hearing by the Registrar we will confirm our knowledge of the events and advise that both the inspector of the Estate and a major unsecured creditor strongly object to the hearing of the appeal since a formal order extending the time was not obtained. It will then be the Registrar's decision as to whether or not the hearing is proceeded with.
10. The Society of Lloyd's requested by Notice of Motion dated May 6, 2002 that it be heard either as an added party or a friend of the Court on the issues which, according to the Trustee's April 5, 2002 letter, were to be raised at the hearing by the parties; that is the application of subsection 135(4) of the BIA and the Registrar in Bankruptcy's lack of jurisdiction to hear the appeal.
11. At the hearing of the RBC's appeal held on May 13th, 2002, the Registrar in Bankruptcy rendered three decisions, two of which are relevant to the present appeal:
a) right of The Society of Lloyd's to intervene – the motion of The Society of Lloyd's to intervene was granted insofar as The Society was permitted, as a friend of the Court, to make submissions on the issue of subsection 135(4) of the BIA, which issue the Registrar had previously stated would be addressed regardless of the outcome of the motion.
b) application of subsection 135(4) of the BIA to include the appeal of RBC because it did not fall within the 30-day period prescribed by the subsection.
[3] The issue is whether the Trustee had the authority to waive the prescribed 30-day period in which an appeal may be made pursuant to subsection 135(4) of the BIA by consenting to the RBC's request to extend said appeal period.
[4] Subsection 135(4) of the BIA:
Determination or disallowance final and conclusive – A determination under subsection (1.1) or a disallowance referred to in subsection (2) is final and conclusive unless, within a thirty day period after the service of the notice referred to in subsection (3) or such further time as the court may on application made within that period allow, the person to whom the notice was provided appeals from the trustee's decision to the court in accordance with the General Rules.

[5] The 2002 annotated BIA by Houlden & Morawetz at page 548 states that "the application for an extension must be made within the 30-day period; there is no jurisdiction in the court to extend the time after the 30-day period has expired".

[6] There is no question that the RBC requested an extension of time within the 30-day period from the Trustee and that it was consented to. The Trustee confirmed the consent in a letter dated April 5, 2002 in which he also states: "It is now our understanding that the Bank's solicitor did not obtain a formal order from the Registrar extending time". The RBC argues that the Trustee's consent amounts to a waiver of the 30-day appeal period in subsection 135(4). In other words, it states that a trustee can act in the stead of the court and without the necessity of a formal motion, extend the appeal period. The Appellant, the RBC, cites Re Norbert (1924) C.B.R. 586 (Que. K.B. – Appeal) as authority that the court may extend the period of appeal if the Trustee does not object to the delay. This case is obscure and I find it neither pursuasive nor binding on this court. See Wolf v. R 1974 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 107, and Reid v. Sigordson 17 B.C.L.R. 117. The leading case in New Brunswick regarding the extension of statutory appeal periods is K.C. v New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) [1998] N.B.J. No. 311 (C.A.) in which Drapeau, J.A. of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal states at para. 5:

There is no inherent jurisdiction to extend the time for appeal where it is set by statute. See OK Builders Supplies Ltd. v. British Columbia (Minister of Finance), [1983] B.C.J. No. 828 (B.C.S.C.). The power to extend the time for appeal must be found in the Act itself or in some other statute.

This case disposes of grounds one and two of the appeal.

[7] The third ground of appeal is that the Registrar erred in allowing the intervenor (Lloyd's) to raise non-compliance as a defense when the intervenor was not a party to the proceedings and was not a party to the consent to waive and extend time.

[8] This ground is without merit as the Registrar stated at the commencement of the hearing at page 219 of the Record on Appeal that "the question of subsection 135(4) will be addressed prior to the substantive issues of disallowance, regardless of the outcome of this motion" (the motion of Lloyd's to intervene).

[9] The fourth ground of appeal is that the intervenor was estopped from raising the limitation period in subsection 135(4). The appellant argues that Lloyd's should have given notice to it that strict compliance with the BIA would be sought after the 30-day appeal period. I find no authority which supports this ground.

[10] The fifth ground is that the Registrar erred in not exercising his equitable jurisdiction and dismissing the intervenor's objection to the Trustee's waiver of compliance with the 30-day period considering all the circumstances. The court clearly cannot exercise its' equitable jurisdiction contrary to statute.

[11] For the above reasons, I find that the Registrar in Bankruptcy has not erred in principle nor in the way in which he has applied or exercised his discretion. The appeal is dismissed with costs of $500.00 payable by the appellant to each to the respondents, The Society of Lloyd's and Grant Thornton Limited.

N° 3R2

EMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Issued: March 7, 2008

(Supersedes Circular N°3 issued on March 28, 2000, on the same topic)

Purpose

1. The purpose of this Circular is to provide trustees with the document prepared by Service Canada (SC), Employment Insurance Branch, entitled: "Subsection 46(1) of the Employment Insurance Act and its effects on a trustee acting pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act".

2. The document provides guidelines respecting the procedure to be followed by SC and trustees in determining whether overpayments of Employment Insurance benefits are owed to SC when individuals produce claims for unpaid salary to a trustee and, where applicable, the procedure to be followed for forwarding that payment to SC.

3. In the context of this Circular, for an overpayment of Employment Insurance benefits to exist, the following conditions must be met:

ASSURANCE-EMPLOI

Émise : le 7 mars 2008

(Remplace et annule la circulaire n° 3 sur le même sujet émise le 28 mars 2000.)

Objet

1. La présente circulaire vise à transmettre aux syndics le document intitulé Application du paragraphe 46(1) de la Loi sur l'assurance-emploi et ses effets sur les syndics agissant aux termes de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, préparé par la Division de l'assurance-emploi de Service Canada (SC).

2. Le document fournit des lignes directrices sur la procédure à suivre par SC et par les syndics pour déterminer si des versements excédentaires de prestations d'assurance-emploi sont dus à SC lorsque des personnes produisent des réclamations de salaires impayés auprès d'un syndic. Il précise en outre la marche à suivre pour acheminer ce paiement à SC.

3. Dans le contexte visé par la présente circulaire, il y a versement excédentaire de prestations d'assurance-emploi si :

- a trustee or receiver has been appointed to administer the estate;
- there has to be a work stoppage;
- Employment Insurance benefits are claimed from SC by the ex-employee;
- the benefits owed to the ex-employee (e.g.: severance pay, vacation pay, salary arrears, etc.) have to be claimed by the ex-employee in the employer's insolvent estate; and,
- the trustee declares a dividend regarding this type of claim.

Consequently, the amount of Employment Insurance benefits overpayment which SC could claim depends on the amount of the declared dividend. Therefore, SC informs us that this amount should not, in any circumstances, be greater than the amount of the dividend payable by the trustee.

4. In addition, we wish to inform practitioners that, pursuant to section 147 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Superintendent's levy applies before a payment is made to SC. Furthermore, the amount that must be reported by the trustee to SC in accordance with subsection 5.1(3), is the amount of the dividend after deduction of the Superintendent's levy.

- l'ex-employé réclame des prestations d'assurance-emploi à SC;
- les prestations à payer à l'ex-employé (p. ex., indemnité de départ, paie de vacances et arriérés de salaire) doivent faire l'objet d'une réclamation par l'ex-employé dans l'actif de l'employeur insolvable; et
- le syndic déclare un dividende à l'égard de ce type de réclamation.

Le montant du versement excédentaire de prestations d'assurance-emploi que pourrait réclamer SC dépend donc du dividende déclaré. Par conséquent, SC nous informe que ce montant ne devrait en aucun cas dépasser celui du dividende payable par le syndic.

4. De plus, nous désirons informer les praticiens que, conformément à l'article 147 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, le prélèvement du surintendant doit être effectué avant qu'un montant soit versé à SC. C'est pourquoi le montant que le syndic doit déclarer à SC selon le paragraphe 5.1(3) est le montant du dividende, déduction faite du prélèvement du surintendant.

5 Where it has been determined that an "overpayment" is payable to SC, the trustee should communicate by letter with the individuals who have filed claims to inform them of the possibilities that amounts may be deducted from their claim. Examples of letters, appropriate for such circumstances, are attached to this circular for use by trustees at their discretion.

6. For any questions related to the interpretation or the application of this circular, please contact the Regulatory Affairs and Compliance Section of the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy by email at: rac-car@ic.gc.ca.

5. S'il est établi qu'un versement excédentaire est payable à SC, le syndic devrait faire parvenir une lettre aux auteurs de la réclamation afin de les informer qu'un montant pourrait être déduit de leur réclamation. On trouvera ci-joint des exemples de lettres appropriées qui pourraient être utilisées à la discrétion des syndics.

Employment Insurance Act - 46(1)

Subsection 46(1) of the Employment Insurance Act and its effects on a Trustee acting pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act

1. INTRODUCTION

Former employees of bankrupt employers quite often file claims for Employment Insurance (EI) benefits. If a settlement is subsequently made for unpaid wages, severance pay or other monies owed to the employee at the time of termination of employment, these earnings may be allocated, for EI purposes, to the period of time before or after termination. This action may result in the creation of an overpayment of EI benefits.

The Employment Insurance Act, effective 30 June 1996, clarified provisions with respect to the liability of trustees in bankruptcy. Pursuant to subsection 46(1) of the EI Act (Appendix A) an employer, a trustee in bankruptcy or any other person who becomes liable to pay earnings to a claimant for a period and has reason to believe that benefits have been paid to the claimant for that period, shall ascertain whether an amount would be repayable if the earnings were paid to the claimant. If so they shall deduct the amount from the earnings payable to the claimant and remit it to the Receiver General as repayment of an overpayment of benefits.

For the purposes of this document, the term "Trustee" is used as a generic

Loi sur l'assurance-emploi - 46(1)

Application du paragraphe 46(1) de la Loi sur l'assurance-emploi et ses effets sur les syndics agissant aux termes de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité

1. INTRODUCTION

Il arrive souvent que d'anciens employés d'un employeur failli réclament des prestations d'assurance-emploi (a.-e.). Lorsqu'un règlement à l'amiable est conclu plus tard en vue du paiement pour salaire impayé, indemnité de départ ou autre somme due à l'employé à la date de cessation d'emploi, il se peut que cette rémunération soit répartie, aux fins de l'a.-e., à la période antérieure ou postérieure à la cessation d'emploi, ce qui risque de donner lieu à un versement excédentaire de prestations d'a.-e.

La Loi sur l'assurance-emploi, entrée en vigueur le 30 juin 1996, comporte des dispositions précisant la responsabilité des syndics de faillite. Aux termes du paragraphe 46(1) de la Loi sur l'a.-e. (annexe A), l'employeur, le syndic de faillite ou toute autre personne tenue de verser une rémunération à un prestataire au titre d'une période et ayant des motifs de croire que des prestations ont été versées à ce prestataire au titre de la même période, doit vérifier si un remboursement serait dû. Dans l'affirmative, il est tenu de retenir le montant du remboursement sur la rémunération qu'il doit payer au prestataire et de le verser au receveur général à titre de remboursement d'un versement excédentaire de prestations.

Pour les fins du présent document, le terme « Syndic » est employé de façon générique, expression, to include any person acting as trustee or receiver, as these are defined pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, and who may have an obligation pursuant to subsection 46 (1) of the EI Act.

2. PURPOSE

The purpose of this document is to establish guidelines for the application of subsection 46(1) of the EI Act and provide information concerning communications between Service Canada (SC) and trustees. It has been prepared for use of trustees and SC employees.

3. DETERMINATION OF EARNINGS

The Commission, with the approval of the Governor in Council, has the authority to make regulations that specify and clarify what constitutes earnings. Section 35 of the EI Regulations (Appendix A) has been made under that authority. It defines what monies are or are not earnings for benefit purposes.

Generally, earnings are the entire income arising out of any employment, including amounts payable to a claimant in respect of wages, accumulated sick leave credits, vacation pay, wages in lieu of notice, severance pay, bonuses, pecuniary benefits and all other advantages, pecuniary or non-pecuniary, that are related to, attached to or arising out of employment.

Earnings are taken into account to determine the amount to be deducted pour inclure toute personne agissant comme syndic ou séquestre, tel que ces termes sont définis dans la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité et qui pourrait avoir une obligation aux termes du paragraphe 46 (1) de la Loi sur l'a.-e.

2. OBJET

Le présent document vise à énoncer les lignes directrices concernant l'application du paragraphe 46(1) de la Loi sur l'a.-e. et à fournir des renseignements concernant les communications entre Service Canada (SC) et les syndics. Il a été préparé à l'intention des syndics et des employés de SC.

3. LA DÉTERMINATION DE LA RÉMUNÉRATION

La Commission a le pouvoir, avec l'approbation du gouverneur en conseil, d'adopter des règlements qui indiquent et précisent ce qui constitue une rémunération. L'article 35 du Règlement sur l'a.-e. (annexe A) a été adopté en vertu de ce pouvoir. Il définit les sommes d'argent qui constituent ou non une rémunération aux fins des prestations.

En général, la rémunération s'entend du revenu intégral provenant de tout emploi, y compris les montants à payer à un prestataire au titre du salaire, des crédits de congés de maladie accumulés, de la paie de vacances, du salaire tenant lieu de préavis, de l'indemnité de départ, des primes, des prestations en espèces et de tout autre avantage, pécuniaire ou non, qui sont liés à un emploi ou qui en découlent.

La rémunération est prise en compte notamment pour fixer le montant à déduire des prestations, pour déterminer s'il y a eu from benefits, to determine an interruption of earnings and the amount of benefits to be repaid to the Commission under certain circumstances by the claimant, the employer or the trustee in bankruptcy.

Amounts payable as dividends concerning unpaid wages claims pursuant to paragraph 136(1)(d) and subsection 136(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Appendix A) inter alia, are considered as earnings arising out of employment under subsection 35(2) of the regulation.

4. POLICY

4.1 To apply Subsection 46(1) it is necessary for the trustees and SC to work cooperatively to communicate and share information in order to provide timely service to the bankrupt.

4.2 Pursuant to subsection 46(1) of the EI Act where a trustee becomes liable to pay earnings to a claimant for a period and has reasons to believe that EI benefits have been paid to the claimant for that period, the trustee shall ascertain whether EI benefits are repayable to the Receiver General, and deduct that amount from the overall dividend for submission to the Receiver General.

4.3 In order to ensure an efficient process and timely service, a trustee should initiate contact with the SC Regional Coordinator and provide the necessary information to allow for a determination of whether an allocation of the trustee's payment would create overpayments of benefits against individual claimants.

un arrêt de rémunération et le montant des prestations devant être remboursées à la Commission dans certains cas par le prestataire, l'employeur ou le syndic de faillite.

Les montants versés par le syndic et payés comme dividendes à titre de salaires impayés conformément à l'alinéa 136(1)d) et au paragraphe 136(3) de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (annexe A), sont considérés notamment comme une rémunération provenant de l'emploi aux termes du paragraphe 35(2) du Règlement.

4. POLITIQUE

4.1 Aux fins du paragraphe 46(1), les syndics et SC doivent travailler en collaboration et s'échanger les renseignements nécessaires afin d'assurer un service opportun au failli.

4.2 Aux termes du paragraphe 46(1) de la Loi sur l'a.-e. le syndic qui est tenu de verser à un prestataire une rémunération, au titre d'une période, et qui a des motifs de croire que ledit prestataire a reçu des prestations d'a.-e. au titre de la même période, doit vérifier si des prestations d'a.-e. sont remboursables au receveur général, doit déduire ce montant du dividende total et doit le remettre au receveur général.

4.3 Pour que la procédure se déroule de façon efficace et que le service soit assuré en temps opportun, le syndic devrait communiquer avec le coordonnateur régional de SC et fournir les renseignements nécessaires en vue de déterminer si une répartition du paiement ou des paiements à verser donnerait lieu à des versements excédentaires de prestations au détriment de certains prestataires.

4.4 Once advised by the SC Regional Coordinator of the amount of money paid in excess to a claimant, the trustee must deduct from the payment owed to that claimant an amount equal to the overpayment of EI benefits and remit such an amount to the Receiver General.

4.4 Une fois qu'il est informé par le coordonnateur régional de SC du montant versé en trop à un prestataire, le syndic doit déduire du paiement dû à ce même prestataire une somme correspondant au versement excédentaire en question et remettre cette somme au receveur général.

5. PROCESS

5.1 Trustee:

• Supply to the SC Regional Coordinator (Appendix B) a list, (if possible on diskette) preferably by Province, on former employees to whom payments are to be made and specifying, to the extent that such information is available:

5) the last day worked.

5. PROCÉDURE

5.1 Le syndic :

1) le nom de l'entreprise en cause;

2) le nom, l'adresse au complet, la province et le numéro d'assurance sociale (NAS) de l'individu;

4) le salaire gagné durant la dernière semaine de travail;

5) le dernier jour de travail

5.2 Service Canada:

To facilitate contact and continuing communication with a trustee, the initial point of contact will be the Regional Office which covers the territory where the trustee is located.

5.2.1 Regional Coordinator:

- acknowledges receipt of the list supplied by the trustee;

- utilizes the Social Insurance Number to determine the existence of a benefit claim at the time of or after the bankruptcy;

- quickly identifies those with no claims and then shares this list immediately with the trustee;

- initiates discussions with the trustee to allow the determination of an acceptable time frame for completion of the process and also the frequency and method of communication of information;

- ensures that SC reviews and assesses each file to determine if an overpayment is to be created by the payment of earnings by the trustee;

- ensures that SC enters proper information to create the bankruptcy overpayment to allow recovery through the trustee;

- ensures that SC notifies the claimant of the earnings decision rendered based on the information received by the trustee and advises the claimant that the trustee will deduct from any dividend payment the amount of overpayment which is payable

5.2 Service Canada :

Afin de faciliter les communications avec le syndic, le point de contact initial sera le bureau régional couvrant le territoire où se situe le bureau du syndic.

5.2.1 Le coordonnateur régional :

- accuse réception de la liste fournie par le syndic;

- utilise le numéro d'assurance sociale pour vérifier si une demande de prestations existe à la date de la faillite ou après celle-ci;

- identifie rapidement les personnes pour lesquelles aucune demande n'existe et communique immédiatement cette liste au syndic;

- entreprend des discussions avec le syndic pour déterminer un délai acceptable aux fins de la procédure ainsi que la fréquence et la méthode de communication des renseignements;

- s'assure que SC revoit et évalue chaque dossier afin de déterminer si le paiement d'un montant par le syndic au titre de la rémunération donnera lieu à un trop-payé;

- s'assure que SC traite les données appropriées donnant lieu au versement excédentaire pour permettre le recouvrement du trop-payé par le syndic;

- s'assure que SC avise le prestataire de la décision prise sur la foi des renseignements reçus par le syndic et l'informe que celui-ci déduira de tout paiement de dividendes le montant du versement excédentaire devant être remis au receveur général;

to the Receiver General;

• provides the trustee with a list giving solely the amount of overpayment arising from a dividend.

5.3 Trustee:

• shall deduct the amount of overpayment from the overall dividend for each individual and remit via the Regional Coordinator a cheque to the Receiver General, preferably a cheque for each province, if there is more than one concerned;

• attach to the cheque the list indicating the claimants, including SINs for which a repayment applies.

5.4 Regional Coordinator:

• will ensure that monies received from the trustee cover all overpayments to be recouped, or if that is not the case, will perform the appropriate reconciliation in cooperation with the trustee. The monies will have to be deducted from the claimant's dividend as repayment of an overpayment of benefits, according to Subsection 46 (1) of the EI Act.

• will also transfer the amount of monies owing, i.e. the list and the cheque received from the trustee, to Regional Financial Services, for deposit.

• fournit au syndic une liste indiquant le montant du trop-payé découlant uniquement du versement d'un dividende.

5.3 Le syndic :

• déduit le montant du versement excédentaire du dividende total pour chaque individu et remet par l'entremise du coordonnateur régional un chèque libellé au nom du receveur général (préférablement un chèque par province si plusieurs provinces sont concernées);

• annexe au chèque la liste des prestataires incluant les NAS pour lesquels le remboursement s'applique.

5.4 Le coordonnateur régional :

• transfère le montant des sommes d'argent dues, soit la liste et le chèque reçus du syndic, aux Services financiers régionaux, pour dépôt.

Sir/Madam:

Re: In the MATTER of the BANKRUPTCY of_____ c/o_____

On _____, the bankruptcy inspectors authorized the payment of an interim dividend to the preferred (or ordinary) creditors. However, the bankruptcy trustee must verify whether Employment Insurance benefits in the name of former employees of the bankrupt should be reimbursed to the Receiver General for Canada

In order to do this, we have recently contacted the Employment Insurance Regional Office to determine whether there are benefits to be repaid by the employees, and if so, in what amount.

We will communicate with the employees again once we have obtained the requested information from the Employment Insurance Regional Office. This normally takes about 45 days.

Sincerely,

I. Introduction

[1] The Superintendent of Bankruptcy's (Superintendent) demand that four mortgagees (Re Fantasy Construction Ltd.), an equitable assignee of lands (Re Cutting Edge Foods Inc.), and builders' lien claimants (Re Southbend Construction Company Ltd.) pay the Superintendent's levy under s. 147 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[1] (BIA) is the subject of this dispute.

[2] PriceWaterhouseCoopers Inc. (PWC), the trustee in bankruptcy of Fantasy Construction Ltd., and Browning Crocker Inc. (BCI), the proposal administrator of Southbend Construction Company Ltd., seek advice and directions pursuant to s. 34 of the BIA as to the vires of the Superintendent's Directive No.10, entitled Redemption of Security and Section 147 Levy of the BIA (19 December 1997) and liability for the levy. Citing ss. 37, 136(2) and 147 of the BIA as the foundation for his application, Dr. David Climenhaga (Dr. Climenhaga), a secured creditor of Cutting Edge Foods Inc., seeks a declaration that he is not liable for the levy. Sufficient funds have been withheld in each case to pay the levy pending the outcome of the respective applications.

[3] A preliminary challenge by the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (OSB) to this Court's jurisdiction to determine the vires of Directive 10 resulted in my decision assuming jurisdiction[2] and an unsuccessful application for leave to appeal that decision.[3]

II. The Actors

[4] A brief overview of the circumstances of the three cases and the actors sets the stage for the analysis concerning the vires challenge and, ultimately, liability for the levy regardless of the outcome of that determination.

A. Fantasy Construction Ltd. (Fantasy)

[5] Banking on generating a better sale price, PWC obtained the cooperation of four mortgagees to refrain from commencing or continuing foreclosure proceedings in order to facilitate its attempt to sell the mortgaged lands. Ultimately, two of the mortgagees filed "proofs of claim." PWC secured an offer for the lands that would see the mortgagees paid in full. An unsecured creditor opposed the sale because it thought a better offer could be found. Burrows J. disagreed, and approved the sale and payout of the sale proceeds, with the mortgagees directed to be paid in full. While the sale proved to be fruitful for the mortgagees and PWC (which had its account, the vast majority of which did not pertain to the sale, significantly paid down), no funds flowed to the unsecured creditors.

[6] PWC characterizes the sale as a redemption of the four mortgagees' interests in the land that cannot trigger the levy irrespective of the vires of Directive 10. The OSB characterizes the sale as participation by the mortgagees in the bankruptcy, which when coupled with the trustee's non-compliance with Directive 10, triggers the levy.

B. Southbend Construction Inc. (Southbend)

[7] The proposal in Southbend was made by a building contractor to compromise its unsecured creditors' claims and to resolve builders' lien claims, the claimants of which had in rem rights not against Southbend, but against its customers. The proposal referred to the lien claimants as secured creditors and called on them to deliver proofs of claim and voting letters to BCI. The proposal, which ultimately was accepted by the creditors and sanctioned by the Court, provided for payment of the lien claims on BCI's say-so and delivery of a discharge of lien. The payment was made from trust funds held by Southbend's solicitors, comprised of funds transferred by a British Columbia Supreme Court order made in a builder's lien action, funds paid by a landowner, and funds paid by Southbend prior to making the proposal.

[8] None of the lien claimants' proofs of claim were disallowed by BCI. The votes provided by twelve of the fourteen lien claimants were collected, but not counted in tallying the creditors' votes on the proposal. Ultimately, these lien claimants received payment (minus holdback for the levy) from Southbend's counsel, which also paid money directly to other lien claimants who, for some unknown reason, did not engage in the proposal process.

[9] BCI characterizes the lien claimants as property claimants incapable of attracting the levy, irrespective of the description of them as "secured creditors" in the proposal and their questionable participation in the proposal. It contends that the proposal simply provided an efficient means of resolving the builders' lien claims and furthering the capture of residual funds for the benefit of the estate. BCI argues that, in any event, as trust funds were the source of payments to the lien claimants, there can be no liability for the levy. The OSB's view is that the lien claimants participated in and benefited from the proposal. Therefore, they must pay.

C. Dr. David Climenhaga v. OSB (Cutting Edge Foods)

[10] Dr. Climenhaga's involvement in a sale of assets ultimately found to be secured in his favour began with his consenting to a Court order (made without prejudice to the rights of secured creditors to exercise their security rights) allowing the trustee, Bill McCullough & Associates Inc. (McCullough) to sell all of the bankrupt's assets. When Dr.

Digitized by Google

Climenhaga's security was questioned, his consent became conditional on being paid in full from the sale proceeds. A tangle ensued.

[11] McCullough demanded a proof of claim and release of his interest in the assets covered by the security, and then obtained a Court order (again made without prejudice to the rights of secured creditors) approving the sale. The order provided that the proceeds were to stand in place of the secured assets, and directed McCullough to hold the proceeds in trust until further order. As Dr. Climenhaga's counsel had been unable to obtain instructions, the order was directed to be held. Six days later (coincidentally, one day after Dr. Climenhaga told McCullough that he opposed the sale and intended to enforce his security), McCullough obtained Court approval to enter the order. Dr. Climenhaga subsequently delivered a "proof of claim" and notice under s. 130 of the BIA requiring McCullough to elect whether to redeem the security. McCullough disallowed the proof of claim. After the disallowance was reversed on appeal, McCullough paid the full value of what Dr. Climenhaga said he was owed, less a holdback for the levy.

[12] Dr. Climenhaga characterizes his situation as one of an unwitting and unwilling participant in a sale of assets which were secured in his favour, the result of the sale being that he was paid the full value of his claim, minus a holdback for the levy. As such, he contends that he cannot be liable for the levy. The OSB maintains that the nature of Dr. Climenhaga's participation is irrelevant. He used and benefited from the system. Therefore, he must pay.

D. The Superintendent

[13] The Superintendent is a creature of statute, whose authority is derived from Part I of the BIA. Charged with supervising the administration of all BIA matters, a significant facet of the Superintendent's work involves licensing, monitoring and disciplining of trustees in bankruptcy. The Superintendent's work also includes investigating bankruptcy offences, record keeping and maintaining statistics.

[14] In Sam Lévy & Associés Inc. c. Mayrand,[4] Martineau J. commented as follows on the supervisory function of the Superintendent:

> The decisions made by a trustee under the Act in the administration of the property of an insolvent debtor have a direct impact on the creditors' rights. Thus, it is clear that Parliament intended to guarantee a high degree of protection for creditors and public confidence in the system of bankruptcy and assignment of property by an insolvent debtor: hence the supervisory role assigned by the Act exclusively to the Superintendent.

[15] According to Beaudry J. of the Federal Court Trial Division in Canada (Attorney General) v. Sam Lévy et Associés Inc.:[5] "[t]he Act gives the Superintendent the power to review the administration of trustees' affairs and estates. It allows him to take administrative and conservatory measures for the protection of the public."

[16] The Superintendent is authorized to intervene in any matter before the courts.[6] The Superintendent also is authorized to issue directives on a broad range of topics concerning administration of the BIA, a power derived from ss. 5(4)(b) to (e), which read:

> 5(4) The Superintendent may
> (b) issue, to official receivers, trustees, administrators of consumer proposals made under Division II of Part III and persons who provide counselling pursuant to this Act, directives with respect to the administration of this Act and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, directives requiring them
> (i) to keep such records as the Superintendent may require, and
> (ii) to provide the Superintendent with such information as the Superintendent may require;
> (c) issue such directives as may be necessary to give effect to any decision made by the Superintendent pursuant to this Act or to facilitate the carrying out of the purposes and provisions of this Act and the General Rules, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, directives relating to the powers, duties and functions of trustees, of receivers and of administrators as defined in section 66.11;
> (d) issue directives governing the criteria to be applied by the Superintendent in determining whether a trustee licence is to be issued to a person and governing the qualifications and activities of trustees; and
> (e) issue directives prescribing the form of any document that is by this Act to be prescribed and the information to be given therein. [Emphasis added.]

III. The Issues

[17] There are two main issues in these applications:

1. Is Directive 10 ultra vires the Superintendent's powers?

Digitized by Google

2. Is there liability for the levy in the Fantasy, Southbend, and Cutting Edge Foods matters?

IV. Is Directive 10 ultra vires the Superintendent?

A. Superintendent's Directives

[18] Directives issued by the Superintendent to date cover a variety of topics, both mundane and substantive, including the appropriate paper size to be used for fax transmissions (Directive 9R2 - Fax and Electronic Filing), the duties and responsibilities of trustees and administrators in performing the assessment of an individual debtor (Directive No. 6R - Assessment of an Individual Debtor), assisting the trustee in equitably and consistently determining the portion of the bankrupt's income that should be paid into the bankrupt's estate under s. 68(3) of the Act (Directive No. 11R - Surplus Income), and the subject directive about the requirements to avoid the levy payable under s. 147 of the BIA in the case of liquidation of encumbered assets on behalf of a secured creditor (Directive 10 - Redemption of Security and Section 147 Levy of the BIA).

[19] Section 5(5) of the BIA provides that: "Every person to whom a Superintendent's directive is issued under paragraph (4)(b) or (c) is obliged to comply with the directive in the manner and within the time specified therein."Accordingly, trustees must comply with the Superintendent's directives, failing which they are subject to disciplinary proceedings, which can lead to sanctions, the ultimate sanction being loss of the trustee's license to practice.[7]

[20] Pursuant to s. 5(6) of the BIA, directives issued by the Superintendent under s. 5 of the Act are deemed not to be statutory instruments within the meaning and for the purposes of the Statutory Instruments Act.[8]

[21] Subsections 5(4)(b) to (c), 5(5) and 5(6) of the BIA were enacted in 1992. To date, the reported decisions concerning the directives mainly address their application rather than their vires.[9]

B. Section 147 Levy

[22] The subject of Directive 10 is the levy under s. 147 of the BIA. Before embarking on a discussion of the vires of the directive, it is useful to describe the levy.

[23] It has been referred to as a "form of taxation"on creditors, intended to defray the general expenses of supervision by the OSB.[10] In characteristic fashion, Registrar Funduk minced no words in his description of the levy as: "... a tax regardless of semantics and it is a tax imposed on creditors who receive a dividend or a payment on account of the debt owed to them."[11] Similarly, the OSB characterizes the levy as "...in essence a tax imposed on debtors and creditors who use the bankruptcy system to deal with their affairs." It is payable on all payments made by a trustee by way of dividend or otherwise on account of the claims of creditors, whether unsecured, preferred or secured.

[24] The levy is authorized by s. 147 of the BIA, which reads as follows:

> 147(1) For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the supervision by the Superintendent, there shall be payable to the Superintendent for deposit with the Receiver General a levy on all payments, except the costs referred to in subsection 70(2), made by the trustee by way of dividend or otherwise on account of the claims of creditors, whether unsecured, preferred or secured creditors, and including Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province claiming in respect of taxes or otherwise.
> (2) The levy referred to in subsection (1) shall be at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council and shall be charged proportionately against all payments and deducted therefrom by the trustee before payment is made.[12]

[25] The predecessor of s. 147, s. 106, was enacted in 1950 and corresponds to s. 126 of the original Bankruptcy Act, which was enacted in 1919 and brought into force in 1920.[13] The provision has not been amended significantly since that time.

[26] Section 136(c) of the BIA affords the levy the status of a priority claim, ranking it in third place after testamentary expenses and the costs of administration/trustee's fees.

C. Directive 10

[27] Directive 10, issued on December 19, 1997, provides in part:

> This Directive is intended to specify the operation of section 147 of the BIA in the case of the liquidation of encumbered assets on behalf of a secured creditor. It is also aimed at ensuring greater transparency and uniformity in the trustee's presentation of the statements of receipts and disbursements, as well as a standard approach to the examination of these statements by bankruptcy officers.

> Subject
> This Directive is issued pursuant to paragraph 5(4)(b) of the Act and it establishes the circumstances in which trustees are viewed as acting in a double capacity and the circumstances in which they are considered to be making a redemption of security. This Directive also establishes the cases in which the levy prescribed by section 147 of the Act is payable on amount[s] paid to secured creditors.

In addition, it establishes the procedure to be followed in presenting a redemption in the statement of receipts and disbursements.
Sections of the Act Concerned:

13.4; 128; 147; and 152.
Related Directive Concerned:
15R.
Policy
Except in the cases listed below, the section 147 levy is payable on all payments by a trustee to a secured creditor. This principle stands even if a third party such as, for example, a notary public, liquidator or an auctioneer makes the payment to the secured creditor for and on behalf of the trustee.
Since the redemption is not a "consensual operation", but rather a unilateral action taken by the trustee with the intention of obtaining an advantage for the estate, it therefore excludes the case of the trustee acting on behalf of the secured creditor.
A trustee acting in this capacity can redeem a security only through the mechanism provided for in subsection 128(3) of the Act.
Exceptions
1. The trustee obtained a mandate from the secured creditor and complied with the provisions of section 13.4 of the Act, Directive No. 15R, sections 245 and following sections (if applicable), and the assets were sold while the trustee acted as an agent, receiver or mandatary but not as trustee.
2. The trustee proceeded with redemption of the security within the meaning of subsection 128(3) of the Act. In such a case, all of the following conditions must be fulfilled:

a) the secured creditor must produce a proof of claim prior to the offering of the encumbered assets for sale. Should the secured creditor not produce a proof of claim, it is the trustee's responsibility to take advantage of the provisions of subsection 128(1) of the Act;

b) the encumbered assets must be sold at a net price superior to, or at least equal to, either the total of the claim or the amount of the valuation of the security as established by the creditor in the creditor's proof of claim;

c) to show that it is a redemption that fulfils these conditions, the trustee must file, with the statement of receipts and disbursements, an attestation pursuant to Appendix 1 of this Directive...

For the purpose of this directive the net price is the gross price paid by the purchaser less the trustee's disbursements and remuneration pertaining to the redemption.
The receipts, the disbursements as well as the trustee's remuneration pertaining to the redemption must be recorded in the statement of receipts and disbursements. If the trustee makes several redemptions, the trust must submit an equivalent number of Appendices with the statement.
In the event that the trustee sells unencumbered and encumbered assets in the same transaction, the disbursements must be shares pro rata between these two categories of assets. If another method is used, the trustee must indicate the method used and justify the choice.

[28] Directive 10 identifies as one of its objectives: "... to ensure that the body of creditors is not penalized in any way and does not bear any cost for the trustee's liquidation of encumbered assets on behalf of a secured creditor." The Directive indicates in the "Subject" statement that it is meant to establish "the circumstances in which trustees are viewed as acting in a double capacity and the circumstances in which they are considered to be making a redemption of security."

[29] The following general principles relating to the levy are relevant to this application:

1. A creditor disputing liability for the levy bears the onus of establishing that he or she is not so liable.[14]
2. Levy is not payable where the trustee is acting in another capacity (i.e. as mandatory, agent or receiver);[15]

[30] The law is divided on:

1. Whether s. 128 of the BIA is a complete codification of the trustee's right of redemption;[16]

Digitized by Google

2. Whether the secured creditor must file a proof of claim before a trustee purports to redeem by paying the whole debt;
3. Whether a secured creditor who allows a trustee (not acting in a double capacity) to sell the bankrupt's assets covered by his or her security is necessarily liable for the levy;[17]
4. The effect of filing or not filing a proof of claim on a secured creditor's liability for the levy.[18]

D. Vires of Directive 10

[31] PWC and BCI assert that Directive 10 affects the rights of secured creditors, overrules case law, and usurps the court's function of interpreting the BIA. They contend the Directive is ultra vires as an unauthorized infringement on Parliament's right to legislate and the Court's right to adjudicate.

1. Rules of Statutory Interpretation

[32] Analysis of the vires of Directive 10 necessarily begins with an overview of the most relevant principles of statutory interpretation.

[33] The modern approach to statutory analysis was summarized as follows by Elmer A. Driedger in his text The Construction of Statutes, 2d ed.(Toronto: Butterworths, 1983) at p. 87, as cited in countless cases, including Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42 (CanLII), 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559 at para. 26: "Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament."

[34] Other relevant principles of statutory interpretation include:

1. The presumption of regularity, which requires the Court to proceed on the assumption that subordinate legislation is within the authority conferred by the enabling Act. The court is not to declare it invalid without clear evidence to support such a finding.[19]
2. Parliament is understood not to legislate gratuitously. Inferences of broader generality under the concept of expressio unius are discouraged.[20]
3. The presumption against absurdity; that is, an interpretation that leads to ridiculous or frivolous consequences, is extremely unreasonable or inequitable, is illogical or incoherent, is incompatible with other provisions or with the object of the legislative enactment, or defeats the purpose of a statute or renders some aspect of it pointless or futile.[21]

2. The BIA and Secured Creditors

[35] The BIA is a statute governed by business principles that puts day-to-day administration into the hands of business people (trustees in bankruptcy and often inspectors) and should not be interpreted in an overly narrow or legalistic fashion.[22] Stated otherwise, BIA issues require consideration of the realities of commerce, practicality and business efficacy.

[36] Subject to certain provisions of the BIA, ss. 79, 127 to 135 and 248(1) included, or unless the court orders otherwise, the bankruptcy of a debtor does not prevent secured creditors from realizing or otherwise dealing with their security as they would have but for the bankruptcy.[23] While secured creditors often are described as strangers to the bankruptcy process, such characterization is not entirely accurate. As noted by the Supreme Court of Canada in Federal Business Development Bank v. Québec (Commission de Santé et de la Securité du Travail du Québec):[24]

> The secured creditor did liquidate his security outside the bankruptcy proceeding. However, it must be kept in mind that it is the Bankruptcy Act itself which authorizes him to act in this way. Section 49(2) of the Act provides that "a secured creditor may realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it" if s. 49(1) had not had the effect of staying proceedings brought by creditors of the debtor. It is therefore wrong to suggest that the Bankruptcy Act does not apply to a creditor who chooses to realize his security outside the bankruptcy proceeding. Sections 49, 57, 98, 101 and 102 of the Act, which deal with secured creditors in this context, only reinforce this opinion.

[37] Secured creditors may choose to participate in a bankruptcy by surrendering their security or proving the balance due them after realizing their security.[25] Secured creditors affected by a proposal may choose to participate by voting on the proposal.[26]

[38] There are two ways that a trustee can oblige a secured creditor to deliver a proof of security (as compared to a proof of claim, although both types of proof are provided by delivery of Form 31). The trustee can serve a notice under s. 149(1) or s. 128(1). In both cases, a creditor which fails to prove its claim within thirty days or such further time as the court allows, is excluded from receiving a dividend.

[39] Typically, notice under s. 149(1) is sent when the trustee is contemplating payment of a dividend and wants to ensure that a secured creditor will not be claiming a dividend as an unsecured creditor.[27] Notice under s. 128(1), which is discussed below in the context of redemption, is intended to allow the trustee to determine whether it should redeem the security.[28] It obliges the creditor to provide the trustee with a proof of security that gives particulars of the security, the date the security was given, and the value at which the secured creditor assesses the security.

[40] In the context of a bankruptcy, if a secured creditor delivers a proof of claim or proof of security, s. 135 obliges the trustee to examine it and allows the trustee to require further evidence in support of the claim or security. However, partial or complete disallowance of the security by the trustee under s. 135 does not alter the value of the security as assessed by the secured creditor in the proof of security under s. 128 for redemption or realization purposes. If the trustee disagrees with the secured creditor's assessed value, s. 129 provides for a procedure whereby the trustee may force a sale of the security. Section 135 relates to the allowance or disallowance, in whole or in part, of the security itself for the purpose of distribution of dividends from the bankrupt estate.[29]

[41] Re Workgroup Designs Inc.[30] instructs proposal administrators to assess the value of a secured creditor's claim under s. 50.1, which specifically addresses the approach to be taken where a proposal has been made to secured creditors, rather than using the general provision in s. 135.[31]

3. The Nature of Directive 10

[42] In his Reasons on the jurisdiction challenge, Watson J.A. questioned whether Directive 10 should be classified as "hard" or "soft" law. Mr. Justice Watson's comments invited further discussion of the issue in the context of this application concerning the vires of Directive 10. Depending on their perspective, the parties posited that Directive 10 was "hard law" or a hybrid combining features of "soft law" and "hard law." PWC chose to extend the debate to discuss the effect of s. 5(6) of the BIA, which provides that the Superintendent's directives are not statutory instruments within the meaning of the Statutory Instruments Act. This in turn led to written submissions by the parties who, again depending on their perspective, advocated that Superintendent's directives should be defined as regulations or unenforceable administrative guidelines, given s. 5(6) of the BIA. Regrettably, this fulsome discussion did not occur at the time of the jurisdictional challenge.

[43] In the jurisdictional challenge I observed that the issuance of a general directive by the OSB was in the nature of a legislative act. I did not rule on whether the Superintendent was within his statutory jurisdiction to issue Directive 10, only that the Superintendent was purporting to do so and as such the action was a matter subject to "judicial scrutiny."

[44] The Dictionary of Canadian Law[32] defines "legislative act" as "[a]n action or decision which imposes a general rule of conduct. Contrasted with decisional or judicial act which concerns a particular case."

[45] Professor J.M. Evans in de Smith, Stanley A., Judicial Review of Administrative Action,[33] writes that:

> A distinction often made between legislative and administrative acts is that between the general and the particular. A legislative act is the creation and promulgation of a general rule of conduct without reference to particular cases; an administrative act cannot be exactly defined, but it includes the adoption of a policy, the making and issue of a specific direction, and the application of a general rule to a particular case in accordance with the requirements of policy or expediency or administrative practice.

[46] Based on these definitions, I am of the view that the Superintendent undertakes a legislative act in issuing directives pursuant to the BIA.

[47] In his Reasons for denying leave to appeal the jurisdiction challenge, Watson J.A. observed[34] that Directive 10 has legal consequences and, therefore, is "more affirmative as law than even 'soft law' procedural guidelines to regulate the tribunal process itself," referencing in that regard Thamotharem v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration).[35]

[48] Thamotharem dealt with the validity of a guideline issued by the Chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board, which set a standard practice for questioning a person seeking refugee protection. In determining that the guideline was "soft law" that did not require Parliamentary approval, the court noted there was no sanction for non-compliance and the guideline was not binding in any event. Of interest is the court's observation at para. 55 that:

> Legislative instruments (including such non-legally binding "soft law" documents as policy statements, guidelines, manuals, and handbooks) can assist members of the public to predict how an agency is likely to exercise its statutory discretion and to arrange their affairs accordingly, and enable an agency to deal with a problem comprehensively and proactively, rather than incrementally and reactively on a case by case basis.

[49] In Denys C. Holland and John P. McGowan's text, Delegated Legislation in Canada,[36] the authors suggest that: "A general rule has developed to the effect that regulations and other examples of subordinate legislation form substantive law, while guidelines and directives, although authorized by statute, do not."

[50] The Alberta Court of Appeal in Johnston v. Alberta (Director of Vital Statistics)[37] clarified that while this may be the general rule, there is an exception, stating:

Digitized by Google

> The general rule is that regulations, rules, by-laws and orders are legally binding, but policy statements and guidelines are not, unless "[a] functional and purposive approach to the nature of [the] guidelines reveals that they are a form of law, akin to regulations:" Bell Canada v. Canadian Telephone Employees Assn., 2003 SCC 36 (CanLII), 2003 SCC 36, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 884 at para. 37; Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. v. Canada, 1982 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2 at 6-7, 137 D.L.R. (3d) 558; Pezim v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Brokers), 1994 CanLII 103 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 557 at 596, 114 D.L.R. (4th) 385; Skyline Roofing Ltd. v. Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board), 2001 ABQB 624 (CanLII), 2001 ABQB 624, 292 A.R. 86 at paras. 75-82. [Emphasis added.]

[51] As the underlying statute in that case did not specifically or by inference contemplate a policy document, the court held the policy did not have the force of law and no legal rights and obligations arose from it.

[52] Skyline Roofing Ltd. v. Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board),[38] a decision of Slatter J. (as he then was), is of particular relevance to the issue of whether Directive 10 has legal effect, as there are a number of parallels between the two cases, including:

1. Skyline concerned a policy issued under the Workers' Compensation Act. The Act gave the Board the power to make policy and made such policies binding on the Appeals Commission. Slatter J. accepted[39] that the policy in issue was simply a clarification of a previous "directive" issued by the Assessment Management Committee that "individuals working in an industry to which the WCA applies and who are pooling their labour for completion of a labour contract for another person also engaged in an industry to which the WCA applies are each deemed to be workers of that other person ('the principal')." Here, Directive 10 was issued under the BIA, which gives the Superintendent the power to issue directives and makes such directives binding on trustees. Directive 10 refers to its substance as "policy."
2. The policy in Skyline was binding on the Appeals Commission but was of financial significance to Skyline, which, based on the policy, was found to be the employer of a subcontractor who had been injured on the job and, as the employer, was subject to assessment. Slatter J. commented that the policy was an "assessment policy" and that while assessments were not truly taxes, they were a compulsory statutory levy. Directive 10 concerns a similar levy and, while binding on trustees, has a potential financial impact on secured creditors.
3. The Workers' Compensation Act under consideration in Skyline specified that the orders, rulings, decisions or directions of the Board need not be published in the Alberta Gazette. Slatter J. declined to interpret this as meaning the policy was not otherwise covered by the Regulations Act, although he made no finding in that regard as he was of the view that it was unclear whether the policy was a regulation. Section 5(6) of the BIA provides that directives issued by the Superintendent under s. 5 of the Act are deemed not to be statutory instruments within the meaning and for the purposes of the Statutory Instruments Act.

[53] A notable difference between the present case and Skyline is that the matter before Slatter J. was a judicial review of a decision of the Workers' Compensation Appeals Commission, which had upheld a decision of the Workers' Compensation Assessment Review Committee finding Skyline to be the subcontractor's employer. The present applications concerning the vires of Directive 10 are for advice and directions.

[54] Interestingly, Slatter J. commented in Skyline on the potential for different results in scrutinizing a board's statutory interpretation undertaken in its adjudicative role as opposed to statutory interpretation involved in development of "policy," observing that:[40]

> ... As I have previously held, the standard of review for the decisions of the Board would generally be "patent unreasonableness." On the other hand, the standard of review for the validity of subordinate legislation would conventionally be "correctness:" Giant Grosmont Petroleums Ltd. v. Gulf Canada Resources, supra, para. 57. This leads to a rather unusual result. If the Board had decided this particular issue ad hoc, without any policy in place, its decision would not be reviewed unless it was patently unreasonable. However, if the Board enacts a statutorily authorized policy, conventional thinking would hold that the standard of review of the vires of the policy would be correctness. This apparent anomaly can perhaps be justified on the basis that if the decision was made ad hoc, the worker would have a right to a hearing, and would be allowed to address the issue without any presumptions. Once a policy is enacted, the worker must effectively explain why the policy should not be applied. Displacing a set policy is usually a significant task...

[55] The applicant in Skyline argued that: (1) the policy in issue was ultra vires the Board; (2) the Board had applied the policy in a way that fettered its discretion; and (3) the policy could not be applied retroactively to the accident that had occurred.

[56] In the process of determining the appropriate standard of review to be applied, Slatter J. commented[41] that there were significant policy issues underlying the questions in that case and that those questions were "all within the core jurisdiction of the Workers' Compensation Board and its Appeals Commission, and were intended by the Legislature to be decided by them."

[57] Skyline submitted that, whatever the policy-making power of the Board, it could not make a policy that overrode a particular statutory requirement. Slatter J. concluded that the policy was not ultra vires as it was supported by the deeming powers given to the Board and complemented by the policy-making power granted to the Board under the Act.

[58] Of particular note are the following portions of Slatter J.'s decision:[42]

> In discussing this issue it is appropriate to highlight that there are two different kinds of policy recognized by the law. Almost all administrative tribunals will have various internal directions, precedents, policies, discussion papers, and other materials that indicate the general approach they take to various issues that come before them on a regular basis. These materials may or may not be designated as "policies" but I will refer to them as "informal policies". A second type of policy is a policy that is authorized and sanctioned by the enabling legislation. Section 3.1 of the Workers' Compensation Act (supra, para. 16) is an example of an express power granted to an administrative tribunal to adopt policies. Both informal policies and policies authorized by statute must be consistent with the underlying statute, unless a specific power is given to enact policies beyond the scope of the statute. The effect, however, of the two types of policies is potentially different. [Emphasis added.]
> The high water mark in the effect of informal policies arose in Ainsley Financial Corp. v. Ontario Securities Commission 1994 CanLII 2621 (ON CA), (1994), 21 O.R. (3d) 104, 121 D.L.R. (4th) 79 (C.A.). The Securities Commission had adopted policies on "penny brokers." The policies were written in rigid, mandatory wording, much like regulations, and purported to impose penalties on those who did not comply. The Ontario Court of Appeal summarized the law as follows (at pp. 108-9, authorities omitted):
> > Having recognized the Commission's authority to use non-statutory instruments to fulfil its mandate, the limits on the use of those instruments must also be acknowledged. A non-statutory instrument can have no effect in the face of contradictory statutory provision or regulation... Nor can a non-statutory instrument preempt the exercise of a regulator's discretion in a particular case... Most importantly, for present purposes, a non-statutory instrument cannot impose mandatory requirements enforceable by sanction; that is, the regulator cannot issue de facto laws disguised as guidelines...
> The Ainsley decision resulted in the amendment of most Canadian securities acts to expressly authorize rules or policies of the type in question. Policies adopted pursuant to such specific statutory authority clearly stand on firmer ground, but even their status is not free from doubt. R. v. Beaver Creek Correctional Camp, Ex Parte MacCaud, [1969] 1 O.R. 373, 2 D.L.R. (3d) 545 (C.A.) and Martineau v. Matsqui Institution, 1977 CanLII 4 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 118, 74 D.L.R. (3d) 1 both concerned Commissioner's directives authorized by s. 29(3) of the Penitentiary Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-6: ". . . the Commissioner may make rules, to be known as Commissioner's directives . . . ". Both decisions held that the Commissioner's directives did not have the full force of law, at least in the same sense as the statute or the regulations. These two decisions have been persuasively criticized: see D.C. Holland and J.P. McGowan, Delegated Legislation in Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at pp. 104-108. In Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, Martineau was explained on the basis that the directives were merely administrative, with no legislative content that could make them "law" under the Federal Court Act and so subject them to judicial review.
> Later cases have given greater effect to policies authorized by statute. In Macoon v. Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board) 1993 ABCA 9 (CanLII), (1993), 7 Alta. L.R. (3d) 201, 135 A.R. 183 (C.A.), a decision binding on me, the Court held that the Board's policies do have legal force. The particular policy in issue was found not to contradict the Act, but the Court implied that if it did, it would be invalid. If a statute, a regulation and a policy conflict, the statute would prevail over the regulation, and probably the > Exactly how far a policy can go must in each case be a matter of statutory interpretation of the enabling legislation. As Holland and McGowan, supra, state at p. 109:

> > A careful examination of the relevant statute's enabling clause as well as of the instrument in question must be undertaken. In this respect, the title of the instrument may be of some, albeit slight, aid. The terms "guideline" and "circular", for instance, to us imply a less rigid and more informative content, while "rules" and "directives" seem to suggest a more mandatory, normative substance. We emphasize, however, that the terminology used to describe an instrument should never be seen as determinative of the issue.
> Particular issues about scope, such as whether a policy can be retroactive, or can impose sanctions, or levy fees, will depend on the context. See Friends of the Oldman River, supra.

[59] One of the issues before Slatter J. was whether the statutory policy in issue could narrow, foreclose or "fetter" a discretion granted by the statute. Clearly, an informal policy could not. Mr. Justice Slatter took from his review of the case law that so long as a policy runs parallel to the statute, there is no problem even if the policy suggests how and when the discretion might be exercised. However, the statutory wording must be considered in determining whether a rigid and mandatory policy can constrain statutory discretion. The discretion involved in Skyline was the ability of the Board to declare a particular worker to be the worker of one principal rather than of another. In view of the power given to the Board in the definition of "employer" to "deem" a person to be an employer, he concluded that the legislative intent was to allow the Board, in that particular case, to fetter the discretion it was otherwise granted by the Act.

[60] In accordance with Skyline, the starting point in determining the nature and effect of Directive 10 is the wording of the enabling provisions in the BIA and the directive itself.

[61] In BPCL Holdings Inc. v. Alberta,[43] the appellant challenged the validity of regulations and standards issued pursuant to the Public Health Act as being beyond the scope of the authority given by the Act to the Lieutenant Governor in Council. The majority noted[44] that "subordinate legislation must be authorized by the empowering statute and must accord with its object and purpose." Further, the majority agreed[45] with the chambers' judge that a real and meaningful connection must exist between the subordinate legislation and the authority granted to the Lieutenant Governor by virtue of the Act.

[62] As stated above, the Superintendent has authority under s. 5(4) of the BIA to issue directives to trustees with respect to administration of the Act or as may be necessary to facilitate the carrying out of the purposes and provisions of the Act and the General Rules, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, directives relating to the powers, duties and functions of trustees.

[63] "To administer" has been described as meaning to serve governmental policy. It is variously defined as: "responsible for the implementation of (the law, justice, punishment, etc.)"[46] or "the management or performance of the executive duties of a government, institution, or business."[47]

[64] In British Columbia Development Corp. v. British Columbia (Ombudsman),[48] the Supreme Court of Canada, considered the words "administration" and "administrative" to be "... fully broad enough to encompass all conduct engaged in by a governmental authority in furtherance of governmental policy—business or otherwise."

[65] "Facilitate" is defined in the The Canadian Oxford Dictionary[49] as: "[to] make (an action, result, etc.) easier, less difficult, or more easily achieved."

[66] Directive 10 is said to be issued pursuant to s. 5(4)(b) of the BIA, which authorizes the Superintendent to issue directives relating to administration of the Act, including directives requiring trustees to: (i) keep such records as the Superintendent may require; and (ii) provide the Superintendent with such information as the Superintendent may require.

[67] To the extent that Directive 10 deals with administration of the Act (for example, the requirement that the trustee file an attestation to show a redemption), it is within the general scope of the authority given by the Act to the Superintendent.

[68] Directive 10 states that it is aimed at establishing the circumstances in which trustees will be viewed as acting in a double capacity and the circumstances in which they will be considered to be making a redemption of security. Also, it is intended to establish situations where the levy prescribed by s. 147 of the Act will be payable on amounts paid to secured creditors, and to establish the procedure to be followed by trustees in presenting a redemption in the statement of receipts and disbursements.

[69] In my view, these matters go beyond simple administration of the Act. However, they fall within the broader directive-making authority granted to the Superintendent under s. 5(4)(c) of the BIA to facilitate the carrying out of the purposes and provisions of the Act and the General Rules by trustees. Under s. 128(3) of the Act, trustees have the power to redeem security. Pursuant to s. 147(2), they are required to deduct levy from payments made "by way of dividend or otherwise on account of the claims of creditors."

[70] Superintendent's directives have been said to serve the purpose of providing trustees and the insolvency community with direction as to how the BIA should be interpreted and applied so there will be consistency across Canada.[50]

[71] However, the BIA, unlike the legislation at issue in Skyline, does not give the Superintendent deeming authority with respect to the relevant provisions of the Act. The Superintendent is not entitled to deem that a trustee is acting as trustee of the bankrupt estate rather than as an agent, to deem that a redemption has or has not occurred, or to deem that levy is owing. Directives issued by the Superintendent are meant to assist in administration of or to facilitate the carrying out of the provisions of the BIA as properly interpreted.

[72] While the Superintendent may be required to interpret the Act in the course of developing directives, if he prefers one line of conflicting case authority over another, he must be correct. Similarly, if the Superintendent interprets a provision of the Act that has not been interpreted by the Courts, he must be correct. In other words, the Superintendent's interpretations must reflect the law. They cannot make or alter it.

[73] Re Dondale,[51] a decision by Burnyeat J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court, does not specifically address the vires of a Superintendent's directive, but nevertheless it is instructive as it dealt with a requirement by the Superintendent that trustees follow a process that favoured one of two lines of conflicting case authority. The dispute in that case focused on whether a proposal administrator could extend the time for the making of payments under a consumer proposal by a provision in the proposal suspending the operation of s. 66.31 of the BIA, which deems the proposal annulled if the debtor is in default of three months of payments.

[74] Similar provisions in consumer proposals had been dealt with differently by two Registrars; Re Williams[52] authorized suspension of the operation of s. 66.31, but Re Sztojka[53] did not. By means of a "Position Statement," the Superintendent directed all trustees and administrators that the Re Sztojka approach was to be preferred. Later, the Superintendent amended Form 47 by way of directive in order to reflect the decision in Re Sztojka.

[75] Burnyeat J. ruled in Re Dondale that the Superintendent could not dictate the terms of a proposal, stating that:[54]

> Fourth, it was the submission on behalf of the Superintendent that one of the functions of the Superintendent is to oversee compliance with the Act and to oppose the approval of proposals or, in this case, consumer proposals, that do not comply with the Act. That is not a duty which is imposed on the Superintendent of Bankruptcy under s. 5 of the Act or on Official Receivers pursuant to s. 12 of the Act. Rather, it is up to the Court to see that proposals and consumer proposals comply with the Act when requested to do so pursuant to s. 66.24 of the Act. Accordingly, while the Superintendent may intervene where the Superintendent "considers it expedient to do so" (s. 5(4)(a) of the Act) and while the Court must take into account submissions made by the Official Receiver (pursuant to s. 66.24(1) of the Act), it is up to the Court to decide whether there has been compliance with the Act.

[76] Burnyeat J. concluded that the effect of the Superintendent's actions was to ignore the clear effect and direction of one line of authority. He noted that in Re Williams, Master Baker observed that while the Superintendent's direction was apparently meant as a temporary solution to address possible inequities created by s. 66.31, it was "hard to see how such a directive and consequent Certificate could withstand a challenge by, say, a creditor."[55]

[77] Re Dondale is under appeal by the OSB, which urges that it is both distinguishable and wrong. I agree that it is distinguishable on its facts, but it does provides insight into the Superintendent's right to chose one interpretation of the BIA over another in the face of conflicting law.

[78] The topics dealt with in Directive 10 are of interest not only to trustees but also to secured creditors. However, it is apparent that Directive 10 is aimed only at trustees and bankruptcy officers. Section 5(5) of the BIA provides that: "Every person to whom a Superintendent's directive is issued under paragraph (4)(b) or (c) is obliged to comply with the directive in the manner and within the time specified therein." Trustees are bound by the Directive if it is intra vires. As the Superintendent's interpretation of the Act in Directive 10 has the potential to effect secured creditors, that interpretation must be right.

[79] In my view, Directive 10 is intra vires the Superintendent's powers only to the extent that it is consistent with and properly interprets the BIA. If it does not, the Superintendent has exceeded his authority in issuing the directive and it is ultra vires.[56]

[80] Certain cases have held that the courts are not bound by Superintendent's directives, although regard may be given to them.[57] Whether that conclusion is accurate depends on the vires and legal effect of the directive. If it is intra vires and was meant to have legal effect, the Court must give effect to the directive just as it would to a statute or regulation.

[81] In an annotation to Re Clements,[58] the late C.W. Morawetz Q.C. posited that a Registrar in Bankruptcy could not be bound by a directive issued by the Superintendent unless the directive was strictly in accordance with the then Bankruptcy Act or Bankruptcy Rules, observing that: "After all, although a 'directive' might be persuasive, it is neither a statute nor a rule or regulation." This observation preceded the 1992 amendments to the BIA, which included the Superintendent's express power to make directives (ss.5(4)(b) and (c)), the duty of trustees to comply with those directives (ss.5(5)) and 5(6), and deeming of such directives not to be statutory instruments within the meaning and for the purposes of the Statutory Instruments Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-22.6.

[82] In Sheriff v. Canada (Attorney General),[59] the Federal Court of Appeal considered a Superintendent's directive entitled "Disciplinary Process under sections 14.01 and 14.02 of the Act" in the context of the Superintendent's investigation into the conduct of a trustee, saying (without analysis as to why) this about the directive:

> The Superintendent's Directive describes the procedure to be followed by the OSB in examining the conduct of a trustee which may lead to disciplinary measures involving his or her license. While such directives do not have the force of an act or regulation, they can be used to provide legal context and inform decisions.

[83] In Re Ryan,[60] the Superintendent sought a strict interpretation of Directive 12. The New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench concluded:

> ...In 1992, ss. 5(4)(b) and (c) and ss. 5(5) and 5(6) were added to the Act. These amendments give statutory authority to the Directives issued by the Superintendent. If one accepts that a Directive has statutory authority, the Superintendent does not have the competence to waive its application in a specific case unless this power is conferred in the Act, which it is not.

[84] In Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada,[61] the authors comment:

> In 1992, ss. 5(4)(b) and (c) and ss. 5(5) and 5(6) were added to the Act. These amendments give statutory authority to the directives issued by the Superintendent. The directives are not statutory instruments so they do not have to be published. If a trustee fails without reasonable excuse to comply with a directive of the Superintendent, the trustee will be liable to have his or her licence suspended or cancelled under s. 14.01(1).

[85] Directive 10 is deemed not to be a statutory instrument within the meaning and for the purposes of the Statutory Instruments Act, which provides in part:

> 2(1) In this Act,
> "prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made pursuant to this Act;
> "regulation" means a statutory instrument
> (a) made in the exercise of a legislative power conferred by or under an Act of Parliament, or > (b) for the contravention of which a penalty, fine or imprisonment is prescribed by or under an Act of Parliament, > and includes a rule, order or regulation governing the practice or procedure in any proceedings before a judicial or quasi-judicial body established by or under an Act of Parliament, and any instrument described as a regulation in any other Act of Parliament;
> "statutory instrument"
> (a) means any rule, order, regulation, ordinance, direction, form, tariff of costs or fees, letters patent, commission, warrant, proclamation, by-law, resolution or other instrument issued, made or established
> (i) in the execution of a power conferred by or under an Act of Parliament, by or under which that instrument is expressly authorized to be issued, made or established otherwise than by the conferring on any person or body of powers or functions in relation to a matter to which that instrument relates, or

(b) does not include

(ii) any instrument referred to in paragraph (a) and issued, made or established by a judicial or quasi-judicial body, unless the instrument is a rule, order or regulation governing the practice or procedure in proceedings before a judicial or quasi-judicial body established by or under an Act of Parliament.

[86] Superintendent's directives are directions made in the execution of a power conferred by or under the BIA, which expressly authorizes issuance of directives by the Superintendent. Accordingly, directives appear to fit the definition of "statutory instrument" in the Statutory Instruments Act. Pursuant to s. 14.01(12) of the BIA, contravention of a directive by a trustee exposes the trustee to possible disciplinary action, including cancellation of the trustee's licence. This can be viewed as a penalty prescribed by an Act of Parliament. Directive 10 appears to have been issued in the exercise of a legislative power conferred by the Act. As a result, it appears to fit the definition of "regulation." However, the BIA expressly provides that it is not a statutory instrument for the purpose of the Statutory Instruments Act, leading to two possible interpretations:

(a) it is not a statutory instrument (and hence a legislative act with legal effect), despite the fact it facially meets the Statutory Instruments Act definition of such; or

(b) it is and all that s. 5(6) means is that it need not be promulgated in accordance with the Statutory Instruments Act.

[87] In my view, the deeming provision in the BIA would be unnecessary if directives, or at least some of them, were not in fact statutory instruments. I agree with the authors of Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada that the effect of deeming the directives not to be statutory instruments for purposes of the Statutory Instruments Act is that they do not have to be published and do not have to comply with the other formalities outlined in that Act.[62] However, for all other intents and purposes, Directive 10 does have the same legal effect as a regulation (if it is intra vires the Superintendent). This interpretation accords with the rule of statutory interpretation that Parliament is understood not to use words and to legislate gratuitously.

4. Redemption

[88] The heart of the debate on the vires of Directive 10 in Fantasy is whether it simply reflects the redemption provisions of the BIA, misstates them, or purports to augment them. The question that arises is whether Parliament modified the law of redemption by requiring that redemption occur only in compliance with s. 128 of the BIA, as specified in the Directive.

[89] "Redemption" and related terms have been defined as meaning:

1. "Redeem":

To buy back. To free property or article from mortgage or pledge by paying the debt for which it stood as security. To repurchase in a literal sense; as, to redeem one's land from a tax-sale. It implies the existence of a debt and means to rid property of that incumbrance.[63]

2. "Redemption":

The realization of the right to have the title of property restored free and clear of the mortgage; performance of the mortgage obligation being essential for that purpose; A repurchase; a buying back. The act of the vendor of property in buying it back from the purchaser at the same or an enhanced price...; The process of cancelling and annulling a defeasible title to land, such as is created by a mortgage or a tax-sale, by paying the debt or fulfilling the other conditions; Repurchase of notes, bonds, stock, bills, or other evidence of debt, by paying their value to their holders...[64]

... the right of parties entitled to such interest to obtain possession and enjoyment of real property and is a remedy which is available to a mortgagor, or other person, only when that person is out of possession. This means redemption is available only when the mortgagee is in actual or constructive possession of the real property.[65]

3. "Right of Redemption":

The right to disencumber property to free it from a claim or lien; specifically, the right (granted by statute only) to free property from the encumbrance of a foreclosure or other judicial sale, or to recover the title passing thereby, by paying what is due, with interest, costs, etc. Not to be confounded with the "equity of redemption," which exists independently of statute but must be exercised before sale.[66]

[90] Redemption is a unilateral act that operates irrespective of the wishes of the secured party.

[91] The equity of redemption in relation to land is an estate in the land that arises at common law in some jurisdictions and in others, such as in Alberta, by statute.[67] It enables the mortgagor, and hence the trustee, on payment of the mortgage debt, to obtain reconveyance of the lands in the case of a common law mortgage or a discharge or transfer of the mortgage in the case of a statutory mortgage. As stated by Baynton J. in Farm Credit Corp. v. Nelson:[68]

> The right to redeem a common law mortgage was granted in equity to enable the mortgagor to obtain a re-conveyance of the land on payment of the mortgage. The right to redeem a statutory mortgage arises by statute, not the mortgage document itself. As well, it only arises when the mortgage is in default and foreclosure or sale proceedings have been commenced to enforce it. It is not only the mortgagor who has a right to redeem. Any subsequent encumbrancer who is faced with losing the land or the subordinate security is entitled as well to exercise this right.
> The right to redeem a Torrens system mortgage also arises by statute. "Redemption" is somewhat of a fiction as no notional re-conveyance is required. A right to redeem is the right to have the property freed from the secured charge. Torrens System Mortgages, pp. 90-91.

[92] Dickson J. noted in Petranik v. Dale:[69]

> ... an equity of redemption is an interest in land, which the mortgagor can convey, devise, settle, lease or mortgage like any other interest in land (Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property (3rd ed.) at p. 885, and Cheshire's Modern Real Property (10th ed.) at p. 568) and that equity has always jealously guarded the mortgagor's right to redeem.

[93] The equity of redemption in terms of a common law mortgage is an asset that vests in the trustee.[70] In Alberta, as there is no restriction on the statutory right of redemption in the Law of Property Act which would limit the right to the bankrupt alone, it too vests in the trustee.[71]

[94] The right to redeem chattel security in Alberta is covered by s. 63 of the Personal Property Security Act.[72] A similar provision exists in other jurisdictions.[73] As property of the bankrupt, it too vests in the trustee.[74]

[95] Turning to the relevant provisions of the BIA, s. 128 is the primary provision concerning redemption by the trustee. However, it cannot be read in isolation from ss. 127 to 134.

[96] Section 128 reads as follows:

> 128(1) Where the trustee has knowledge of property that may be subject to a security, the trustee may, by serving notice in the prescribed form and manner, require any person to file, in the prescribed form and manner, a proof of the security that gives full particulars of the security, including the date on which the security was given and the value at which that person assesses it.
> (1.1) Where the trustee serves a notice pursuant to subsection (1), and the person on whom the notice is served does not file a proof of security within thirty days after the day of service of the notice, the trustee may thereupon, with leave of the court, sell or dispose of any property that was subject to the security, free of that security.
> (2) A creditor is entitled to receive a dividend in respect only of the balance due to him after deducting the assessed value of his security.
> (3) The trustee may redeem a security on payment to the secured creditor of the debt or the value of the security as assessed, in the proof of security, by the secured creditor.

[97] Section 128 refers to "proof of security," not "proof of claim." A "proof of claim" is what a secured creditor delivers to the trustee under s. 127 where the secured creditor seeks to claim for any deficiency after realizing on the security or surrenders the security to the trustee for the general benefit of the creditors. The form prescribed by the Superintendent for both types of proof is the same - Form 31, entitled "Proof of Claim." Directive 10 uses the language of Form 31 rather than that of s. 128. The interchangeable use of the terms "proof of claim" and "proof of security," coupled with the dual use of Form 31, adds an unnecessary element of confusion to the mix.

[98] Section 129 provides in part: "Where the trustee is dissatisfied with the value at which a security is assessed, the trustee may require that the property the security comprises be offered for sale at such time and on such terms and conditions as may be agreed on between the creditor and the trustee or, in default of such an agreement, as the court may direct."

[99] Section 130 offers a mechanism for a secured creditor to require a trustee to elect to redeem the security. It reads:

> 130. Notwithstanding subsection 128(3) and section 129, the creditor may, by notice in writing, require the trustee to elect whether he will exercise the power of redeeming the security or requiring it to be realized, and if the trustee does not, within one month after receiving the notice or such further time or times as the court may allow, signify in writing to the creditor his election to exercise the power, he is not entitled to exercise it, and the equity of redemption or any other interest in the property comprised in the security that is vested in the trustee shall vest in the creditor, and the amount of his claim shall be reduced by the amount at which the security has been valued.

Digitized by Google

[100] Section 132 refers to acquisition by the trustee of the security as provided in the BIA. It states that if the trustee has not elected to acquire the security, a secured creditor may amend the valuation and proof of security.

[101] Section 133 provides that if a secured creditor does not comply with sections 127 to 132, the creditor is excluded from receiving a dividend.

[102] It is important to remember that secured creditors do not stand outside the BIA. Rather, the BIA allows them to unilaterally enforce their security in certain circumstances, subject to the following:

(a) s. 69.3(2) permits the court to stay enforcement by a secured creditor;

(b) s. 79 provides that if the trustee wants to inspect the secured property, the creditor cannot realize on the security before allowing the inspection; and

(c) In the context of redemption, s. 128(1) halts enforcement, at least temporarily.

[103] When secured creditors want a dividend from the estate, they must become involved in the bankruptcy and with the trustee by complying with ss. 127 to 132.

5. Correctness of the Superintendent's Interpretation

[104] The Superintendent's interpretation of the BIA, as reflected in Directive 10, raises the following questions:

(a) Must the secured creditor produce a proof of security prior to the trustee redeeming the security? Implicitly, this question requires a determination of these overlapping questions:

(i) whether the BIA is a complete codification of the trustee's right of redemption, and

(ii) if so, whether redemption by payment of the "debt" per s. 128(3) is available in the absence of a proof of security?

(b) Must the sale of an encumbered asset result in a net price equal to or greater than the debt or value of the security per the proof of security in order to amount to a redemption?

(c) Absent compliance with s. 13.4 (the requirements for acting in a double capacity), is levy payable if the trustee sells encumbered assets for the secured creditor?

[105] If the answer to any of these questions is "No," the Superintendent's interpretation of the relevant provisions of the BIA is incorrect and that aspect of Directive 10 is ultra views.

(a) Must the secured creditor produce a proof of security prior to the trustee redeeming the security?

[106] As will become readily apparent, there has been no clear and consistent interpretation of the redemption provisions in the BIA. The result is a legal muddle.

[107] In advocating that "participation" in the bankruptcy process alone results in liability for the levy, the OSB relies on Re Kop Beverages,[75] the first of a trilogy of cases decided by Mr. Justice Smily; Re Alger Press, which followed Re Kop Beverages; and Electric Zoo Graphics which, in turn, followed Re Alger Press.

[108] In Re Kop Beverages, the secured creditors had filed "proofs of claim" before an opportunity arose for sale of the property affected by their security, on terms requiring the trustee to pay off the security. They argued that the trustee's payout of monies due to them was in effect not a payment by the trustee, but one made by the purchaser on the trustee's direction. Smily J. rejected their argument, finding instead that the payment was indeed by the trustee. Mr. Justice Smily acknowledged that if the mortgage was assumed by the purchaser and then the purchaser paid it off, there would be no question of the payment being made by the trustee, but declined to rule on the point as the mortgage was not in evidence to show that the purchaser had that right. In the result, the payments were considered payments by the trustee on account of the creditors' claims and levy was payable. Smily J. commented that:[76]

> ...It may seem a rather hard provision against a secured creditor who has a security and would be entitled to realize from that security under certain circumstances and receive full satisfaction of his claim against the bankrupt, at any rate, if he had taken proceedings before the bankruptcy, but I do not think the court is concerned with that.

[109] In Re Hart Equipment,[77] a creditor filed a proof of claim as a creditor with security on the bankrupt's inventory and certain equipment. The court found that an arrangement for the trustee to carry on the bankrupt's operations, consented to by the secured creditor, was one that was mutually beneficial to both, to which the levy applied. The creditor's failure to take possession of the assets secured in its favour appears to have been an important consideration.[78]

[110] In a commentary on Re Hart Equipment,[79] the author cautioned the reader that:

> To avoid payment of the levy, a bank must be careful in the light of this decision to take possession of goods covered by s. 88 security before permitting a trustee in bankruptcy to act as its agent in processing or realizing on such goods. As regards the sale of the inventory on the closing out of the business, the present decision is to the same effect as the earlier opinion of the same learned judge in re Kop

Digitized by Google

> Beverages, 32 C.B.R. 221, [1952] O.W.N. 647, 1 Abr. Con. (2nd) 415. The payment of levy could have been avoided by directing the purchaser to pay the amount on closing directly to the bank and having failed to do so, the levy was undoubtedly payable.

[111] That advice was taken to heart in Re Skingley,[80] which involved four mortgagees holding security over properties sold by cash sales requiring discharges of their security. The purchaser paid out the security from the purchase monies, a scheme the trustee was involved in structuring. Three of four mortgagees had not filed claims in the estate. The court restricted Re Kop Beverages to cases where proofs of claim were filed by secured creditors. As to those mortgagees that had not filed proofs of claim, he said there could be no question of payments being made by the trustee to them as creditors in the estate or as by way of redeeming the mortgages in accordance with the provisions of the then Bankruptcy Act. As to the filing of a proof of claim by one mortgagee, that was an irrelevant consideration as it was "an ignored claim" filed by a mortgagee who could have its mortgage paid off at any time without notice or bonus, thereby allowing the purchaser to pay it off as a matter of adjustments. That the trustee was involved in directing the mechanics of the payout was also considered to be irrelevant, "more a matter of form or an extra precaution by the purchaser's solicitor." [81]

> (1) collected accounts owing to the estate by land owners and paid lien holders who had filed mechanics' liens against their lands;
> (2) instructed debtors who owed money to the estate for work done on lands to directly pay certain mechanics lien holders with the balance paid to the trustee; and
> (3) sold equipment owned by the estate, received the purchase price in trust upon transfer of free and clear title and from those proceeds paid chattel mortgagees, retaining the balance.

[114] In each situation, Riley J. found no levy was payable, noting[84] that a secured creditor is not obliged to pay the levy if he realizes his security, and that payments out of a trust fund, such as the fund for lien holders, are not subject to the levy.[85] In terms of the second category, he categorized the payment as one not made "by the trustee."[86]

[115] Mr. Justice Riley ruled that the third category, which is relevant to the present analysis, constituted an implied redemption by the purchaser (rather than the trustee), reasoning:[87]

> I think Q. (3) is a matter of doubt in view of Re Kop Beverages Ltd. 32 CBR 221, [1952] OWN 647, where it was held that payments to mortgagees and lienholders from the proceeds of property are payments by the trustee on which the levy is payable. However, in an annotation immediately following the case at p. 225, a Mr. W. D. Goodman of the Ontario bar explains this decision on the basis that the trustee had there impliedly redeemed the security of the mortgagee and the lienholders and payment to them then would clearly be within sec. 106. Mr. Goodman goes on to state at p. 225:
> > "If, for reasons of convenience, in completing the sale of the property, he [the trustee] arranges for the discharge of the mortgage and actually receives and hands over to the mortgagee an amount sufficient to discharge the mortgage (or if he directs the purchaser to discharge it out of the purchase price, he has in fact made no payment to the mortgagee on his own behalf and no levy is payable." [sic]
> The author relies on In re Colonial Mfg. Co., supra. The explanation appears to be that what actually occurs is that the trustee sells only the estate's equity in the property and at the same time he arranges for the purchaser to redeem the mortgage or the lien. As the author points out, no levy is then payable since the redemption of the security was made by the purchaser and not by the trustee.

[116] Mr. Justice Riley did not have the benefit of the Ontario Court of Appeal's ruling in Re Prudential Finance,[88] which was decided the following year. The trustee in that case had redeemed securities held by a brokerage firm on a margin account for the full amount of the debt after obtaining a stay precluding the brokerage firm from realizing on its security. The firm had not surrendered its security, valued its security, or filed a proof of claim. The trustee attempted to deduct the levy from the payment made to the firm but the firm objected. The OSB argued that the payment was on account of a claim of the secured creditor and therefore was subject to the levy pursuant to the levy provision of the day, s. 106 of the Bankruptcy Act.

[117] McDermott J. expressed the view in Re Prudential Finance[89] that the circumstances of the case did not warrant imposition of the levy due to uncertainty in the law as to application of the levy and in view of the frustration by the court of the efforts of the creditor to realize on its security through a sale which would have paid the debt in full. McDermott J. held that it would lead to an absurd result if s. 106 was construed so as to impose a levy in circumstances where no claim was made under the Bankruptcy Act. It appears that Justice McDermott recited but did not rule on the secured creditor's argument that the redemption should be characterized as one at common law rather than under the Act.[90]

[118] MacKay J.A., who delivered the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Prudential Finance,[91] was of the opinion that the position of a secured creditor under the Bankruptcy Act may fall within any one of the following categories:

1. He may surrender his security and file a claim with the trustee in bankruptcy for the full amount of the debt owing to him.
2. He may have his security valued and if the value is less than the amount of the debt he may file a claim with the trustee for the balance of it.
3. If the value of the security is equal to or greater than the debt, he may (subject to the trustee's right to redeem) retain or sell sufficient of the securities held by him to pay the debt, in which case he can not make any claim in the bankruptcy proceedings, his debt having been paid.

[119] He acknowledged that the payment made by the trustee in that case was to redeem the securities. He held that the trustee was not paying a claim of the creditor.[92] Rather, he was purchasing the interest of the secured creditor in the securities and to do so had to pay the debt. He indicated the position of the secured creditor should be no different whether the sale of the securities is to a third party or to the trustee. In terms of liability for payment of the levy under s. 106, MacKay J.A. rejected the distinction made in some cases as to whether the amount owing to the creditor is paid by the trustee or assumed and paid by a person to whom the trustee sells the security. He commented that a secured creditor whose security is for an amount equal to or greater than his debt and who does not file a claim in the bankruptcy proceedings derives no benefit from the bankruptcy proceedings. In the end result, he agreed with McDermott J. that the secured creditor was entitled on redemption of his security by the trustee to payment of his debt in full without deduction for the levy. I find this reasoning more appealing than the "implied redemption by the purchaser" reasoning of Re Performance Drilling.

[120] The author of an annotation to the appellate decision in Re Prudential Finance commented that payment of levy on secured claims had been a nuisance to trustees for far too long.[93] The call, made some 40 years ago, for what was then described as a long overdue amendment to clarify or change s. 106 (the predecessor of s. 147), remains unheeded. The author further suggested that Re Prudential Finance clearly established that if a secured creditor does not file a claim in the bankruptcy and the trustee redeems the security, there is no levy payable, but left unsettled the problem of what happens if a claim is filed and the trustee redeems at the value at which the security has been assessed. However, the more recent decisions in Re Alger Press,[94] Electric Zoo Graphics,[95] and Re Brittain Steel[96] cast doubt on the first proposition.

[121] The court in Re Alger Press found, without discussing why, that absence of a proof of claim was not dispositive of liability for the levy by a secured creditor. Electric Zoo Graphics applied Re Alger Press without discussion. In obiter dicta, the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re Brittain Steel questioned,[97] but did not discuss the proposition in Re Prudential Finance that no levy is payable by a secured creditor who has not filed a proof of claim.

[122] Re Alger Press cited Re Prudential Finance and Re Skingley for the principle that liability for the levy arises where payments are made by a trustee as such, and in the course of the administration of the estate. The court neither discussed nor applied the result of the cases concerning the effect of filing or not filing a proof of claim, finding instead that the case was governed by Re Kop Beverages and Re Hart Equipment.

[123] The facts of Re Alger Press are straightforward. The bankrupt filed an assignment in bankruptcy. Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. was named trustee. It was also appointed agent by the Bank of Montreal, which had a first charge, to realize on Alger's accounts receivable and inventory. Algonquin held second position. It did not file a proof of claim. Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. thought it wise to complete outstanding orders for the benefit of the creditors. It did so, advising customers that in so doing it was acting as trustee. Remarkable success followed in realizing on the accounts receivable, both old and newly created. The bank was paid out its secured claim. There was also a surplus that arose mainly from equipment sales to a third party (on a free and clear basis) and the net proceeds of the trustee's operating the business

[124] Before the application on whether levy was payable by Algonquin, Mr. Justice Farley had allowed Algonquin's claim for entitlement to the benefit of the doctrine of marshalling, which had been a live issue amongst all interested parties from the start of the bankruptcy. Marshalling allowed Algonquin to share in the proceeds of the equipment sales since the bank had chosen to realize upon the accounts receivable and inventory instead of the equipment.

[125] Farley J. determined that levy was payable, finding that Algonquin did not realize its security, but benefited from the trustee liquidating the business of the bankrupt and distributing the proceeds to it. He related the term "or otherwise" in s. 147 of the BIA to the steps taken by the secured creditor to realize on its security, the role played by the trustee, and the relationship between the two, saying:[98]

Digitized by Google

> It seems to me that Algonquin took no effort to realize upon the equipment. Rather it stood by while the trustee did so. Can it be said that all that was happening was that the trustee was realizing upon its equity on the equipment? I think that not only was it doing this but it was also realizing upon the equity of Algonquin. I am of the view that "or otherwise" must be given appropriate meaning in s. 147(1) of the BIA. The trustee was performing a function not as agent of Algonquin; it was not retained to do so. Rather it was liquidating the business of the bankrupt Alger and distributing the proceeds of such liquidation to the remaining secured creditor, Algonquin, and thereafter it could make a dividend to the unsecured creditors...
> It seems to me that the present situation is governed by Hart, supra, and Kop, supra. It does not appear that the fact that Algonquin did not file a claim with the trustee is dispositive of the matter. The trustee had no other relationship with Algonquin than as trustee; it was not in an agency relationship as was the case in Colonial, supra. It took no action to realize upon its security even to the extent of taking possession. It seems that PMT did the sale as trustee.

[126] Mr. Justice Farley noted that Algonquin did not have direct security over the equipment (which was in essence the source of the payout), but the marshalling order resulted in it being treated as though it had it security over the equipment. He concluded that what had transpired was the trustee liquidating the bankrupt's business, distributing the proceeds to Algonquin, and thereafter making a dividend to the unsecured creditors. The filing of a proof of claim was not dispositive of the matter.

[127] Re Zutphen Bros.[99] concerned secured creditors in a proposal scenario who filed proofs of claim, accepted the proposal, and agreed to have their claims paid by the trustee. Saunders J. found levy payable on the basis of participation in the process, noting that courts have consistently held that the question to be determined is whether the payment is made by a trustee as such and in the course of the administration of the estate.

[128] The OSB relies on the judgment of Nuss J.A. in Restaurant Ocean Drive[100] to support its view that s. 128 is a complete codification of redemption rights for trustees and that a proof of security is a precondition to redemption. There, the National Bank had loaned $246,000 to the debtor restaurant, guaranteed by a conventional movable hypothec on the debtor's equipment. An assignment in bankruptcy followed about a year later. The next month, the bank served the trustee with a motion of forced surrender of the equipment and sale by judicial authority in which the bank valued its security at between $25,000 and $30,000. The required prior notice to surrender had been served on the debtor before the bankruptcy.

[129] The motion subsequently was amended by the secured creditor to seek authorization to sell the equipment to a company called Canpro Inc., the bankrupt's landlord, which had rented the restaurant to a third party, including the mortgaged equipment which the bank had agreed to sell it. Canpro had paid $7,500 to a third party when it was learned that some of the equipment belonged to the same third party. The bank reduced the value of its security to $16,000. The trustee made known his intention to redeem the security, which prompted Canpro to apply for a declaration of aggressive intervention, asking the court to forbid the trustee from redeeming the security and requiring the bank to sell it the equipment. The Quebec Superior Court allowed the bank's motion and Canpro's intervention.

[130] On appeal to the Quebec Court of Appeal, the trustee argued that it did not have to comply with s. 128 since it already had information about the creditor's claim from its application for forced surrender and, therefore, requiring a proof of claim under s. 128(1) would be redundant. The trustee also argued that a proof of claim under s. 128(1) was, in any event, not a prerequisite to redemption under s. 128(3) and that no prejudice to the creditor would result. Separate and varying reasons were given by Nuss J.A. and Beauregard J.A. Brossard J.A. concurred with both.

[131] Mr. Justice Nuss found that compliance with s. 128(1) was a prerequisite to redemption by a trustee under s. 128(3). He paid particular note to the circumstances of the case, stating:[101]

> The first judge concluded that the Trustee could not have recourse to section 128(3) B.I.A. without first having met the conditions set out in paragraph 1 of that section. I am of the opinion that he was right given the particular circumstances of this case, which involved the rights of a third party (Canpro) and contractual relationships - between that third party and the National Bank - that were established before the Trustee acted. [translation]

[132] He commented that a trustee cannot force a secured creditor to sell its security to the trustee if the trustee has not previously required a proof of security in the prescribed form,[102] citing Re F. Fiore & Son Limited,[103] an excerpt from Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada,[104] and the severe consequences to a secured creditor who fails to comply with the s. 128(1) notice[105] as evidencing the importance of the notice in the case before him. He accepted this statement from Re Comptoirs Bizou Mode Inc. (Syndic de):[106]

> Redemption of a security under the Bankruptcy Act is not a consensual operation. Redemption is not complete until such time as the secured creditor is paid [Re Bell's Ltd., (1986) 60 C.B.R. 244

(Sask.Q.B.)] or the trustee has elected to acquire the security after having been required to do so [S. 130; Norris (Ex parte), (1886) 17 Q.B. 728 cited in In re Kleckner, Huck and Co.: Bank of Toronto v. Canada Permanent Trust Co., (1940-41) 22 C.B.R. 136 (Sask. C.A.), 141.]. The right of redemption is not an option until the secured creditor has definitively assessed the value of the security through the affidavit required by section 128. Therefore, only the trustee can force the redemption of the security, unless the Court authorizes the creditor to amend his or her valuation (s. 132).

[133] Beauregard J.A. agreed with the result, finding that there was no actual benefit to the general body of creditors in the trustee's offer to redeem. He dubbed the trustee a last minute gate-crasher and observed that to accept the trustee's position would let him profit from an abuse of rights. Noteworthy is Mr. Justice Beauregard's finding that failure to give notice under s. 128(1) does not necessarily prevent the trustee from redeeming a security under ss. 128(3). He commented that:[107]

> The secured creditor can render that notice unnecessary: in the case at bar, in its motion for surrender that was served on the trustee, the bank itself evaluated its security at between $25,000 and $30,000. It therefore would have been redundant for the trustee to request from the bank an evaluation of its security. Because this violation does not entail absolute nullity, it seems to me that a third party that has not yet become owner of the security cannot oppose its redemption by the trustee by invoking the absence of formal notice. Furthermore, as s. 128. (3) does not give any time limit for the trustee to redeem the security, the trustee may redeem the security as long as it has not become the property of a third party.

[134] Restaurant Ocean Drive was followed in 9067-5661 Québec inc.[108] There, a secured creditor with a judgment to recover goods secured in its favour ignored the bankruptcy until learning that the trustee, with knowledge of its security, had sold the bankrupt's assets, including the goods over which it had security. The creditor delivered a proof of claim valuing its security, causing the trustee to say it had redeemed the security and that after paying priority claims it would pay the creditor, albeit significantly less than the claim and security. In turn, the creditor delivered an amended proof of claim, which the trustee disallowed. The creditor and purchaser applied for relief. The court found that non-compliance with s. 128(1) resulted in the trustee's right of redemption never having seen the light of day.

[135] Section 128(1) notice non-compliance also was an issue in Hester Creek Estate,[109] an appeal of a Master's decision applying Restaurant Ocean Drive and refusing to permit a trustee to redeem mortgage security for full payment of the debt in a sale by a receiver.

[136] In rejecting the contention that the trustee could not redeem because of notice non- compliance, Tysoe J. (as he then was) stated:[110]

> ... there is nothing on the face of s. 128 that requires the trustee to have received the proof of security before redeeming the security by payment of the full amount of the debt. Although the secured creditor will set out the amount of the debt in its proof of security, the trustee will have access to the records of the bankrupt to determine the amount of the debt or the trustee may be satisfied with a pay-out statement provided by the secured creditor.

[137] Tysoe J. distinguished Restaurant Ocean Drive[111] on its facts (the trustee there was not looking to pay out the full amount of the debt) and observed that statutory amendments had undone the effect of Re F. Fiore & Son Limited[112] (which said that reading all of s. 99 of the Bankruptcy Act (the predecessor to s. 128 of the BIA) together resulted in notice being a condition precedent to redemption) by clarifying that the trustee is not required to comply with s. 128(1) in order to redeem security when the sum paid is the full amount owing under the security.

[138] Of significance is Tysoe J.'s finding that requiring s. 128(1) notice to be a pre-condition to redemption leads to a perverse result since it emasculates trustees' ability to achieve the best recoveries for the estate by precluding sales of secured assets within the first 30 days of a bankruptcy (the time a secured creditor has to file a proof of security after receiving notice from the trustee).

[139] The result in Hester Creek Estate was that:[113]

1. Section 128 is not a complete codification of the trustee's right to redeem security. In other words, common law and provincial statutory rights of redemption continue and s. 128 is an adjunct to those rights.[114]
2. In the absence of an order absolute or order approving a sale, non-compliance with s. 128(1) does not preclude redemption by a trustee where all that is owed to the creditor is paid.[115]
3. Truly extraordinary circumstances must exist for the court to preclude redemption by a trustee by payment in full of the amount owed to the secured creditor before an order absolute or an order approving a sale the asset.[116]

4. Section 128(1) compliance is required only if the trustee seeks to redeem security for less than the full amount owed under it or wants to force the secured creditor to sell the security to it.[117]
5. Section 128 may be addressing a circumstance which is different from redemption of mortgaged property as even though the terms "redemption of mortgaged property" and "redemption of security" often are used interchangeably, the phrase "may redeem a security" in s. 128(3) could mean something other than "the trustee exercising a right of redemption vested in it by redeeming the property and being entitled to a reconveyance of the legal title to the property..."

[140] In Royal Bank of Canada v. United Used Auto & Truck Parts Ltd.,[118] assets subject to security by an individual named Mott were sold by PWC, which was acting in the dual capacity of trustee and receiver. Donning its trustee's hat, PWC sent a notice to Mott pursuant to s. 128(1) of the BIA. Before the 30 days for responding to the s. 128(1) notice had expired, PWC put on its receiver's hat and sought court approval of a sale which included the assets purportedly secured in Mott's favour

[141] Tysoe J. found that the sale was made by PWC as receiver. Accordingly, the effect of the s.128 notice was not truly in issue. He offered these views in obiter:[119]

1. The effect of s. 128 is to allow a trustee, with leave of the court, to sell assets free of any security the recipient of the notice may have in the assets if the recipient does not file a proof of security within 30 days.
2. Since nothing in s. 128 prevents a sale within the 30 day notice period, the only consequence is that the sale is made subject to the security.

[142] In Canada (Superintendent of Bankruptcy) v. Aberant Arnold and Chow Inc. [George's Cycle],[120] I found that secured creditors who had not taken enforcement proceedings, who had filed proofs of claim as both secured and unsecured creditors in a proposal, voted on the proposal, and received payments thereunder were liable for the levy. I also ruled that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that the trustee was acting as agent of the secured creditors or had redeemed their security despite purported compliance with Directive 10.

[143] The secured creditor in Electric Zoo Graphics [121]was a principal of the bankrupt who failed to disclose the existence of his security before the trustee sold the bankrupt's assets. The court found that his deference to the trustee in allowing him to realize on the security attracted the levy even though he had not filed a proof of claim. Apart from the case being distinguishable on its facts, the reliance on Re Alger Press[122] without discussion of Re Prudential Finance[123] is of concern.

(i) Is the BIA a complete codification of the trustee's right of redemption?

[144] Directive 10 specifies that a trustee "can redeem a security only through the mechanism provided for in subsection 128(3) of the Act." The Superintendent, by this statement, is interpreting the BIA as a complete codification of the trustee's right of redemption and foreclosing resort by a trustee to any common law or statutory right of redemption which lies outside of the BIA.

[145] Section 72(1) of the BIA states that:

> 72(1) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by that law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

[146] Despite s. 72(1), I agree with the Superintendent that the BIA constitutes a complete codification of the trustee's right of redemption as it effectively covers the field occupied by common law and statutory rights of redemption codified in provincial legislation by providing for redemption on payment of the debt. It also enhances the trustee's right of redemption.

[147] Given the ability of the court to stay enforcement actions by secured creditors under s. 69.3(2) of the BIA in appropriate circumstances,[124] I am not persuaded the presumption against absurdity applies. In my view, one of the reasons for the inclusion of s. 69.3(2) was to ensure that trustees have the opportunity to consider whether redemption is a viable option in the initial phases of bankruptcy. While some caution may be required as to the timing of applications under s. 69.3(2), given what redemption requires and the court's inability to interfere with binding contracts entered into by the secured creditor with third parties (as in Restaurant Ocean Drive[125] and Re Hallmac Limited[126]), that does not mandate a contrary result.

[148] A review of the authorities and literature is instructive.

[149] Re Dunham[127] clearly establishes that trustees must present cogent reasons and evidence to succeed in staying a secured creditor's right to realize on its security.[128]

[150] In his article "The Race to the Swiftest? Entitlement to the Possession of the Property of a Bankrupt," Kenneth S. Atlas observed[129] that permitting a trustee to exercise the right granted under s. 49(2) of the Bankruptcy Act (the predecessor of s. 69.3(2)) after a trustee under a trust deed (fiduciaire) had taken possession of the assets of the bankrupt prior to bankruptcy could only benefit the preferred and unsecured creditors and prevent the fiduciaire from depriving the bankrupt estate of equity which would rightfully belong to it. He also noted the policy of non-interference with secured creditors except in situations where the trustee can prove that permitting a secured creditor to realize on its security will result in a loss of equity in the property subject to the security, which might properly be an asset of the bankrupt estate, citing Re Dunham, Re Les Pharmacies Modernes Inc. and Re Dominion Lock Co. in support of his proposition.

[151] Relying largely on the evidence of the inspectors, who were experienced credit persons in the relevant industry, the court in Re Les Pharmacies Modernes Inc.[130]granted a stay against the secured party to give the trustee and inspectors an opportunity to assess the situation and to devise a plan whereby the secured creditor could be paid "without undue depression of the balance of the assets."

[152] The trustee in Re Dominion Lock Co. (Trustee of)[131] sought a 90 day stay against various secured creditors in anticipation of an offer that would pay out all of the secured creditors and generate a $550,000 surplus for the unsecured creditors. One of the secured creditors, which had taken possession of the assets secured in its favour, argued the court had no jurisdiction to order the stay given that realization had commenced. This argument was rejected, the court finding instead that in appropriate circumstances a stay for purposes of seeking offers which would put the trustee in funds to redeem the security would be appropriate. Noteworthy is the court's observation that it would be inconsistent with the philosophy of bankruptcy law if, after having expressly permitted the trustee to redeem security, the law did not permit reasonable delays to determine the extent to which offers could be found to put the trustee in funds to do so.

[153] In summary, ss. 127 to 134 and 69.3(2), when read together, lead to the conclusion that the BIA is a complete codification of redemption rights in bankruptcies. Reading ss. 128(2) in conjunction with 69.3(2) answers the concern of Mr. Justice Tysoe in Hester Creek Estate, who did not have the benefit of the decision of McDermott J. in Re Prudential Finance, or the decisions in Re Dunham, Re Les Pharmacies Modernes Inc., or Re Dominion Lock Co.

[154] By interpreting s. 128 as a complete codification of the trustee's rights of redemption, the need to apply local laws with potentially varying provisions is circumvented, and recognition is given to the BIA as a national, uniform method of resolving matters arising in insolvencies.

(ii) Is the s. 128(1) proof of security a precondition to redemption?

[155] Directive 10 states that a trustee can redeem security under s. 128(3) of the BIA only if the secured creditor either voluntarily or in response to a s. 128(1) notice has produced a proof of claim prior to the offering of the encumbered assets for sale.

[156] Section 128(3) of the BIA uses the disjunctive term "or." In my view, this indicates Parliament's intention that there are to be two distinct avenues for redemption open to trustees. They can either pay the debt of the secured creditor (the traditional means of redemption), or pay the value of the security as assessed in the proof of security by the secured creditor.

[157] Section 128(3) does not refer to proof of security in connection with redemption by debt satisfaction. Reference to proof of security is limited to the second avenue - paying the value of the security, as assessed in the proof of security, by the secured creditor.

[158] The court in Restaurant Ocean Drive[132] was divided on whether notice under s. 128(1) was a prerequisite where the trustee was in possession of the information to assess the viability of a redemption. The case concerned redemption by paying the value of the security as assessed by the creditor, not by payment of the debt owed to the creditor, and is distinguishable on that basis.

In any event, the comments of Nuss J.A. concerning the correctness of the lower court decision in the "peculiar circumstances" of that case, the changes to the law underpinning his analysis, the divided court, and concurrence by Brossard J.A. with opposing conclusions, cast sufficient doubt on the precedential value of the case.

[159] In my view, Parliament recognized that in many cases trustees will be armed with sufficient information to make an informed decision about the validity of the security and amount of the debt, thereby obviating the need to call for a proof of security under s. 128(1) when contemplating redemption by payment of the debt. In gathering the bankrupt's property, trustees often will have ready access to security documentation and the attendant financial information. Such information also may be available from other sources; for instance, where the bankrupt possesses materials filed in enforcement proceedings which exhibit the security document and offer information on the debt. Some secured creditors may voluntarily deliver proofs of security.

[160] The permissive language of s. 128(1) offers further support for this interpretation. It does not state that trustees 'shall' require a proof of security. It says they "may." Practically, trustees may choose to do so where their information about the validity of the security and/or debt is inadequate to make an informed decision about redemption. They also may choose to do so to force a secured creditor's hand, flesh out and potentially defeat questionable or dormant security (if the creditor fails to respond within 30 days), or pursue redemption for less than payment of the full debt. Doubtless there are many other situations where trustees would think it prudent to exercise their right to call on a creditor to prove his or her security.

[161] There is no need to import the requirement of notice for redemption by full payment of the debt. The trustee is duty bound to be satisfied of the validity of the security and amount of the debt before redeeming on this basis. The suggestion that the burden of notice under s. 128(1) is necessary to protect the interests of the unsecured creditors (from improper payouts of secured creditors under the guise of a redemption) ignores the fact that trustees are highly regulated officers of the court who are bound by professional codes of ethics and the provisions of the BIA to discharge that duty and to act honestly and with integrity in the interests of the general body of the creditors. It also ignores the role of inspectors in bankruptcies and trustees' ability to resort to the court for approval of their actions in appropriate circumstances.

[162] I am far from convinced that this approach will cause "a state of perpetual uncertainty" for all involved in the bankruptcy process, as suggested by some. In my view, this approach recognizes that the BIA is legislation designed to provide a pragmatic, expedient, and cost efficient means of resolving insolvency matters, something that slavish reliance on forms and form over substance does not further. It applies the plain language of s. 128(3) and respects the function and professionalism expected of trustees, who retain the option of delivering a notice under s. 128(1) even where they have an alternate source for obtaining information about security and debt.

[163] In summary, redemption of security by payment in full of the secured debt under s. 128(3) is not preconditioned on proof of security having been produced by the secured creditor. The secured creditor is not prejudiced, however, by having responded to a s. 128(1) notice or having voluntarily filed a proof of security. Levy is not payable on a redemption for payment of the debt, whether a proof of security has been filed or not, as the payment is not made on a claim of the creditor. Rather, it is payment to acquire the secured creditor's right or interest in the security.

[164] Having found that production of proof of security is not a precondition for redemption under the Act by full payment of the debt, I conclude that the Superintendent has misinterpreted the BIA and in doing so has exceeded his directive-making authority.

[165] That is not to say that the Superintendent could not issue a directive to trustees requiring that they obtain a proof of security before redeeming by payment in full. Breach of such a directive might well jeopardise the trustee's right to claim fees or disbursements of the transaction and might expose the trustee to sanction. However, the redemption would be a redemption nevertheless and the secured creditor would not be subject to the levy.

(b) Must the sale of an encumbered asset result in a net price equal to or greater than the debt or value of the security per the proof of security in order to amount to a redemption?

[166] Directive 10 specifies that the s. 147 levy is payable on all payments by a trustee to a secured creditor except in two situations, the second of which is redemption under s. 128 of the BIA. A condition of this exception requires that the encumbered assets be sold at a net price (after deduction of the fees pertaining to the transaction) superior to, or at least equal to, either the total of the claim or the amount of the value of the security as established by the creditor in the proof of security.

[167] Undoubtedly, redemption benefits secured creditors, who likely care a whit about the source of the funding used to satisfy the bankrupt's obligations to them. However, benefiting a secured creditor cannot be the impetus for a trustee selling encumbered assets. The trustee must perceive some advantage for the general body of creditors.[133]

[168] It is the responsibility of the trustee to make a sound business decision either to redeem the security because it is good for the general body of creditors or to walk away because it is not. The trustee must consider what the net result of the redemption likely will be in making such a decision. If, in the end, redemption is unlikely to benefit the general body of creditors, it is a hollow exercise. The trustee's decision in that case should be easy. But what if the trustee does not walk away? What if the trustee's business decision is not sound? What if the trustee neglects its duties by trying to curry favour with a secured creditor? What if the trustee innocently misjudges the market? Should these failings, innocent or not, be visited on the secured creditor by imposition of the levy? Given that redemption can be a unilateral act, particularly where initiated by the trustee and where payment of the debt in full is made, that cannot be what Parliament intended.

[169] It is likely that the Superintendent would be seen as acting within his authority in issuing a directive to trustees requiring that they only redeem if the net price realizable on the sale of an encumbered asset is likely to be equal to or greater than the debt or value of the security per the proof of security. That is not what Directive 10 says. In essence, it states that the sale of an encumbered asset at a net price which does not meet that criterion is not a redemption under s. 128.

[168] The redemption provisions of the BIA do not require that encumbered assets be sold at a net price (after deduction of the fees pertaining to the transaction) superior to, or at least equal to, either the total of the claim or the amount of the value of the security as established by the creditor in the proof of security. That condition is one which has been imposed by the Superintendent in an attempt to control the conduct of trustees. The BIA authorizes and, indeed, mandates that the Superintendent control trustees. However, he cannot do so by misinterpreting or adding to the BIA in such a manner as to affect third party rights.

[169] If there is no reasonable expectation of benefit for the general body of creditors from redemption, the trustee's right to claim fees or disbursements on the transaction may be at risk or the trustee may be subject to some other form of censure. However, in my view, a redemption under the Act remains a redemption nevertheless and no levy is payable by the secured creditor.

[170] In providing otherwise in Directive 10, the Superintendent has added a condition to redemption which does not appear in the Act and which prejudices secured creditors, thereby exceeding his authority. The relevant portions of Directive 10 are ultra vires.

(c) Absent compliance with s. 13.4 (the requirements for acting in a dual capacity), is levy payable if the trustee sells encumbered assets?

[171] Directive 10 provides that levy is not triggered if the trustee obtained a mandate from the secured creditor and complied with the provisions of s. 13.4 of the Act, Directive 15R ("Costs and Disclosure Associated with the Realization by the Trustee of Secured Creditors' Assets"), s. 245 and the assets were sold while the trustee acted as an agent, receiver or mandatary, but not as trustee.

[172] Section 13.4 provides:

> 13.4 (1) No trustee shall, while acting as the trustee of an estate, act for or assist a secured creditor of the estate to assert any claim against the estate or to realize or otherwise deal with the security that the secured creditor holds, unless the trustee has obtained a written opinion of a legal counsel who does not act for the secured creditor that the security is valid and enforceable as against the estate.
> (1.1) Forthwith on commencing to act for or assist a secured creditor of the estate in the manner set out in subsection (1), a trustee shall notify the Superintendent and the creditors or the inspectors
> (a) that the trustee is acting for the secured creditor;
> (b) of the basis of any remuneration from the secured creditor; and
> (c) of the opinion referred to in subsection (1).
> (2) Within two days after receiving a request therefor, a trustee shall provide the Superintendent with a copy of the opinion referred to in subsection (1) and shall also provide a copy to each creditor who has made a request therefor.

[173] The determination as to when a trustee sells encumbered assets in a capacity other than as trustee in bankruptcy is fact driven. Section 13.4 imposes certain obligations on trustees who purport to act in a dual capacity. Failure to comply with these obligations may lead to censure and sanction of the trustee under s. 14.1. However, trustee non-compliance with s. 13.4 does not necessarily obviate a finding that the trustee was selling encumbered assets as an agent, receiver, or mandatary. That is a question for the Court's determination based on the evidence. While compliance with s. 13.4 makes that determination easier, it is not the only factor that would be considered by the Court in making the determination.

[174] If the trustee, in fact, has acted as agent for the secured creditor in selling the encumbered assets, any fees of the trustee or costs associated with the sale would not be a liability of the bankrupt estate. Nor could payment to the creditor be characterized as payment on a claim. The entire transaction would fall outside of the bankruptcy.

[175] By purporting to direct that levy will be payable in the event of trustee non-compliance with s. 13.4, the Superintendent has misinterpreted the law and exceeded his authority. Consequently, the relevant provisions of Directive 10 are ultra vires.

5. Conclusion on Vires of Directive 10

[176] The Superintendent is doubtless conversant with the provisions of the BIA and may be called on to interpret the Act in fulfilling his duties. If he chooses to do so, his interpretation must be correct.

[177] Production by a secured creditor of proof of security is not a precondition to redemption of security under s. 128(3) of the BIA by payment in full of the debt. Directive 10 says that it is. To that extent, it is ultra vires.

[178] There is no requirement in the BIA that in order to constitute a redemption by the trustee, encumbered assets must be sold at a net price that equals or betters the total of the secured creditor's claim or value of the security per the proof of security. Directive 10 imposes such a requirement, thereby potentially affecting secured parties. To that extent, it is ultra vires.

[179] The requirement in Directive 10 that levy be paid in the event of non-compliance with s. 13.04 even where the trustee in fact acts as agent, receiver or mandatary, arises from misinterpretation of the BIA by the Superintendent. To that extent, Directive 10 is ultra vires.

V. Is Fantasy Liable for the Levy?

A. Facts

[180] Fantasy and a related company, Madison Development Corporation 1984 Ltd., developed a condominium project in Strathcona County, just east of Edmonton. The project was the subject of significant litigation both before and after the bankruptcy, which was in the fall of 2004. It has been case managed by Mr. Justice Burrows since the bankruptcy.

[181] With a view to conducting an orderly bloc sale of thirteen condominium units to generate a better sale price, PWC approached four mortgagees:

(i) Carevest Capital Inc. which held a mortgage on nine units and had commenced foreclosure proceedings;

(ii) Bank of Nova Scotia, which had commenced foreclosure proceedings on the one unit mortgaged in its favour;

(iii) Canadian Western Bank, which held a mortgage on two units, and agreed with PWC to not commence foreclosure proceedings; and

(iv) Capital City Saving & Credit Union Limited, which had not commenced foreclosure proceedings on the one unit on which it had a mortgage and presumably agreed (given C. Thomas Klaray's evidence that all of the mortgagees agreed to a sale by PWC) to refrain from taking such proceedings .

[182] Through counsel, PWC communicated this to Carevest:

> We can, if you require, plead to this matter, but with respect, we do not believe it is in anyone's interest to proceed with foreclosure at this time.
> PricewaterhouseCoopers has arranged a sale of the remainder of the lots at Sunrise Park. Subject to the priority claim by the County, we see no reason why Carevest would not be paid out in full, in respect of this sale.
> If you are in agreement to hold the foreclosure in abeyance pending the closing of the sale, please advise.

[183] C. Thomas Klaray, a senior vice president with PWC responsible for conduct of the bankruptcy, has deposed that it was "his belief throughout" that more monies would be generated for the estate if the lands were dealt with in an orderly fashion rather than by piecemeal foreclosures. In the end, he found a purchaser for the thirteen mortgaged units with an option to purchase others. The Inspectors approved the sale, but opposition from the Condominium Association (which considered PWC's sale efforts wanting) and the County of Strathcona (with which Fantasy was embroiled in litigation) prompted PWC to obtain an order from Mr. Justice Burrows approving the sale.

[184] In his affidavit in support of the sale motion, Mr. Klaray deposed that he considered the sale to be in the best interests of all concerned and proposed the net sale proceeds be applied in a fashion that would see the four mortgagees paid, PWC's fees paid down by about $400,000.00, a holdback for the County of Strathcona's contingent and disallowed claims (the latter then under appeal), and payment of all outstanding taxes in both estates. He also said (in his affidavit or on cross examination on that affidavit) that:

(i) He expected the sale of the condominium unit on which Capital City held a mortgage would net approximately $70,300.00 while the sale of the condominium unit on which the Bank of Nova Scotia held a mortgage would net approximately $7,400.00.

(ii) The condominium units over which Carevest and Canadian Western Bank held mortgage security were part of a bloc sale for $642,000.00, the proceeds of which would be applied to pay out, amongst other encumbrances, Carevest's mortgage in the estimated amount of $260,000.00 and an estimated $47,000.00 on the Canadian Western Bank mortgage.

(iii) PWC was now the largest creditor in the estates of Fantasy and Madison Developments, with a preferred claim over of $700,000.00 (not broken down by estate) that would be reduced to some $300,000.00 if the Court accepted the allocation of the net sale proceeds he had proposed.

[185] Satisfied that PWC's efforts to find a purchaser were sufficiently extensive and that the sale was in the interests of the estates, Burrows J. approved it,[134] referring to this statement from Re Hoque:[135]

Digitized by Google

> When it comes to making business decisions relating to the sale of the bankrupt's assets, a trustee, with the authorization of the inspectors, must exercise reasonable business judgment. The trustee must provide advice to the inspectors equivalent to the advice one would expect from a reasonably competent trustee in the circumstances. Both the trustee and the inspectors are entitled to rely on legal advice from counsel for the estate. And, of course, a trustee must act with honesty and integrity. Finally, the courts should show deference to business decisions made by those entrusted by the creditors and authorized by the Act to make such decisions.

[186] Burrows J. directed that PWC administer the sale proceeds in accordance with its proposed allocation.

[187] Mr. Klaray deposes on this application that Carevest and Canadian Western Bank filed "proofs of claim" as secured creditors. Canadian Western Bank's claim "for the full amount owing"and Carevest's claim for $175,585.06 (which is less than the amount proposed to be paid out on the mortgage) have not been put in evidence. The Bank of Nova Scotia and Capital City apparently did not file proofs of security.

[188] None of the evidence indicates when or why the Carevest and Canadian Western Bank "proofs of claim" were delivered. It is not clear whether they were proofs of security alone or also proofs of claim. Nor is it clear why PWC proposed a payout of $260,000.00 to satisfy Carevest's mortgages when Carevest's "proof of claim" was for $175,585.06. It is unclear whether the "full amount owing to it" claimed by Canadian Western Bank in its "proof of claim" was the $47,000.00 which PWC proposed to pay out to it. Finally, it is unclear whether the $70,300.00 net amount expected to be received on the sale of the condominium unit on which Capital City held a mortgage and the $7,400.00 net amount expected to be received on the sale of the condominium unit on which the Bank of Nova Scotia held a mortgage would cover payment in full of the debts owing to those secured creditors.

B. The Parties' Positions

[189] The OSB's position is that the sale of the secured assets cannot be regarded as a true redemption because of the poor quality of Mr. Klaray's evidence, there was no real benefit to the estate, and the mortgagees participated in and benefited from the bankruptcy process. Accordingly, it is a transaction that attracts liability for the levy.

[190] PWC sees the transaction as a redemption. It contends that the authorities which say "participation" in a bankruptcy attracts the levy are ill founded. It also submits that delivery of "proofs of claim" by two of the four mortgagees should not be considered evidence of their submission to the bankruptcy process as it would be unfair to treat the mortgagees differently.

C. Analysis

[191] In my discussion on the vires of Directive 10, I rejected the OSB's argument that redemption under the Act requires that a net price be obtained for the encumbered asset that is superior to, or at least equal to either the total of the claim or the amount of the value of the security as established by the creditor in the proof of security. Clearly, however, redemption does require that the secured creditor receive payment of the full amount of the debt or the value of the security as assessed, in the proof of security, by the secured creditor. If the full amount of the debt was not paid and no proof of security was submitted by the secured creditor assessing the value of the security or if the value of the security as assessed in the proof of security by the secured creditor was not paid, the transaction cannot be characterized as a redemption.

[192] PWC could have done a better job in presenting evidence on this application. I conclude, however that if Canadian Western Bank and Carevest were each paid the full amount of the debts owing to them, they are not liable for the s. 147 levy and there is no issue in terms of the proofs of claim submitted by them. As I have stated above in my discussion on the vires of Directive 10, filing proofs of claim does not convert a payment made as a redemption to a payment on a claim of the secured creditor attracting the s. 147 levy. If, however, the proofs of claim evidence an intention to surrender the security or to claim for a deficiency as an unsecured creditor, there is an issue as levy would follow payment of any dividend. Given that I do not have the proofs of claim before me, I leave it to PWC and the OSB to review the proofs of claim to ascertain whether levy is payable in accordance with my ruling. If they cannot agree, they may bring the matter back before me on notice to the secured creditor(s) involved.

[193] As to the Capital City and Bank of Nova Scotia transactions, I leave it to PWC to satisfy the OSB that payment was made of the debt in full in each case. If it was, levy is not payable by the secured creditors. If it was not in either case, the relevant parties may return before me, on notice to the secured creditor, and present further evidence and argument as to the nature of the transactions.

VI. Is Southbend Liable for the Levy?

A. Facts

[194] Financial straits prompted Southbend to make a Division I BIA proposal (Proposal). It had performed work on four projects: Petro-Canada projects in Alberta and the Yukon Territory (the Petro-Canada Projects), Imperial Oil Ltd.

Digitized by Google

projects in Alberta (the Imperial Oil Projects), McDonalds Restaurants of Canada projects in British Columbia (the McDonalds Projects), and Starbucks Coffee projects in British Columbia (the Starbucks Projects).

[195] The language of the Proposal is curious. It includes the following definitions in clause 1:

> c. "Creditors" and "Proposal Creditors" means the Preferred Creditors and Ordinary Creditors of the Debtor existing at the Notice of Intention Date.
> e. "Lien Claimant" means those persons with claims to builders' liens against projects undertaken by the Debtor in Alberta, British Columbia and the Yukon Territory who have, as at the Proposal Date, registered their claim of lien in the appropriate land titles or land registry office against title to the lands on which the project was undertaken.
> g. "Lien Claimant Pools" means the funds established to satisfy Lien Claimant claims as outlined in paragraph 8 herein.
> i. "Ordinary Creditors" means those persons with claims that are proved in respect of debts and liabilities present and future to which the Debtor was subject at the Notice of Intention Date or to which it may become subject by reason of any obligations incurred before the Proposal Date, including claims of landlords and all sub-trades of the Debtor on any project wherever located except for these claims:
> > i. That have been finally and conclusively disallowed or found by the Court not to be provable;
> > ii. That are claims by Secured Creditors or Preferred Creditors; > > iii. That there are claims relating to the SBC Projects; or > > iv. That are claims relating to the Administrative Fees and Expenses.
> k. "Preferred Creditors" means creditors whose claims are directed by the Act on a Proposal made by a Debtor to be paid in priority to all other claims except for Administrative Fees and Expenses.
> n. "Proposal Funds" means the funds established for the purpose of the Proposal as outlined in paragraph 9 hereof.
> q. "Secured Creditors" means persons holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the property of the Debtor or any part thereof as security for a debt or liability due to or accruing due to them by the Debtor including any Lien Claimant.

[196] Clause 2 states:

> 2. The classification of creditors for the purpose of considering and voting on this Proposal and either receiving payment from the Lien Claimant Pools or dividend shall be as follows:
> > a. Class I - Lien Claimants
> > b. Class II - Ordinary Creditors
> This Proposal is not being made to Secured Creditors other than Lien Claimants.

[197] Clause 8 deals with the treatment of Lien Claimants. It reads:

> 8. Lien Claimant Pools have been or will be established with funds sufficient to cover the claims of Lien Claimants in full with a provision for interest and costs. The Lien Claimant Pools will be held in trust by counsel for the Debtor, or as may be arranged with the applicable owner, and such funds will stand in the place and stead of the lands liened as security for the Lien Claimant claims. The claims of Lien Claimants will be administered as follows:
> > a. On or before 4 p.m. Mountain Stand[sic] Time of the last business day prior to the Meeting of Creditors, each Lien Claimant shall file with the Trustee a proof of claim with sufficient evidence to establish the validity of its claim of lien;
> > b. Any Lien Claimant who fails to file its proof of claim within the time stipulated in paragraph 8(a) will be deemed to have abandoned its claim of lien and will thereafter be treated as an Ordinary Creditor and will have its claim compromised in accordance with paragraph 9 to 11 herein [emphasis in the original];
> > c. Within 30 days of receipt of the Lien Claimants' proofs of claim, the Trustee will send a notice to each Lien Claimant so filing, a notice in writing advising the Lien Claimant that their claim has either been accepted as filed, accepted in part or rejected;
> > d. Where the Trustee makes a determination that the claim has been accepted only in part or has been rejected as a valid lien claim, that determination shall be deemed to be final and conclusive unless, within a 30 day period after service of the notice referred to in the preceding paragraph, the affected Lien Claimant files an appeal to the Court in Edmonton, Alberta in accordance with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act General Rules on notice to the Trustee and the Debtor's counsel...

e. Lien Claimants with accepted claims will receive funds within 30 days of being notified of the acceptance by the Trustee. In such cases, the Trustee will direct Debtor's counsel to release the approved sum to the appropriate Lien Claimant. Prior to receiving funds, such Lien Claimant shall provide appropriate registrable discharges of their lien or liens to Debtor's counsel. No funds will be provided until such documentation is provided;

f. Lien Claimants exercising rights of appeal as provided for in paragraph 8(d) will be protected for their claim until a decision has been made by the Court on the validity of their claim and all further appeals have been exhausted; and

g. Once all Lien Claimants have been paid from the Lien Claimant Pools and all appeals have been finalized, the balance remaining, if any, shall be paid to the Trustee and added to the Proposal Funds to be administered in accordance with paragraphs 9 to 11.

[198] Clause 9 says that (after payout of a major secured creditor and provision for the Lien Claimants) Southend anticipates it will have a total of $690.000 for distribution to its creditors.

[199] The Proposal goes on in clause 11 to provide that:

> 11. Upon acceptance of the Proposal by the requisite number of Creditors in each class, approval of the Proposal by the Court and payment of the Proposal Funds to the Trustee in accordance with paragraph 9, the Creditors shall have no further rights to enforce their claims except as provided in the Proposal and thereafter, each Creditor shall be deemed to release and forever discharge any and all claims, suits and causes of action, whether at law, in equity or under any statute, that each of them may have had against the Debtor or any of its principals, directors, officers or agents as at the Notice of Intention Date.

[200] In its August 22, 2002 Report to Creditors of Southbend, BCI said that Southbend had disclosed liabilities totalling $2,693,116, comprised of debt to secured creditors ($687,000), lien claimants ($275,000), preferred creditors ($70,000), and unsecured creditors ($1,661,116). BCI indicated that Southbend's disclosed assets, which it listed as including $275,000 in "lien holdbacks,"totalled $1,668,023. In describing the Proposal, BCI made no mention of payments to lien claimants or that lien claimants would constitute a separate voting class under the Proposal.

[201] According to the Minutes of the First Meeting of Creditors held on September 5, 2002, BCI tallied the votes of creditors and determined that 92.53 percent in dollar value and 93.33 percent in number of proven claims were in favour of the Proposal. Therefore, the Proposal was accepted.

[202] Robert Sword, Vice President of BCI, deposed that, prior to the first meeting of creditors, BCI received proofs of claim from fourteen lien claimants, all of which it reviewed and either allowed or disputed. It received voting letters from twelve of those lien claimants (totalling $303,102.38 in value). Mr. Sword deposed that the proofs of claim filed by the lien claimants "were not counted for the purposes of determining whether the requisite number and value of creditors had voted in favour of the Proposal." Attached as an exhibit to Mr. Sword's affidavit was a letter from a senior bankruptcy analyst with the OSB to BCI, dated April 6, 2006, in which the author made reference to a letter from BCI indicating that of the twelve lien claimants who submitted voting letters, "there was unanimous support for the proposal." However, Mr. Sword did not depose to that fact and it is not otherwise in evidence before me.

[203] In it's September 19, 2002 Report of Trustee on Proposal to the Court, BCI reported that: "... the proposal was accepted by the required majority of creditors in each class," offering that Southbend had assets which included cash in the bank, accounts receivable, and moneys due from a related company, totalling $1,387,850 in book value. In the Estimated Statement of Affairs (Adjusted), it mentioned liabilities to unsecured creditors, preferred creditors and secured creditors, the latter being listed at $686,000. Given that BCI's Report to Creditors indicated Southbend had disclosed liabilities of $687,000 to secured creditors other than lien claimants, presumably the liabilities to secured creditors shown in the Report to the Court did not include lien claims. BCI's Report to the Court appended its Report to Creditors and the Proposal, but did not otherwise refer to the lien claimant liability or holdback for same.

[204] The Proposal was sanctioned by the Court on October 1, 2002, the preamble to the order stating: "...AND UPON the Court being satisfied that the required majority of creditors have accepted the Proposal in the terms and conditions in the paper writing attached hereto and marked as Schedule 'A'..."

[205] According to the affidavit of Clayton Reitzel, funding for payments to the lien claimants came from four distinct sources:

1. Funds for payment of lien claimants on the Petro-Canada Projects came from Petro Canada, whose counsel imposed a trust condition that the money be used to pay lien claimants on the Petro-Canada Projects in Alberta and Yukon before any funds could be made available to Southbend and its creditors.

Digitized by Google

2. Funds were paid to Southbend's counsel by Southbend before the Proposal in trust for payment of the lien claimants with respect to the Imperial Oil Projects. (There is no evidence before me as to whether these funds were provided to Southbend by Imperial Oil in trust for payment of the lien claims).
3. Funds for payment of the Starbucks Projects were paid to counsel for Southbend, who paid the funds in compliance with British Columbia lien legislation.
4. Funds for the McDonalds Projects were partly paid into court in a British Columbia Supreme Court lawsuit. Pursuant to an order of that court, the funds previously paid to the credit of the court action were paid to the trustee through Southbend's British Columbia counsel. The order directed BCI to hold a portion of the funds pending determination of the lien claims of Alpine Roofing Ltd. and Kore Irrigation Ltd. The latter claim was never pursued. The former eventually was settled. The order directed McDonald's British Columbia counsel to pay one lien claimant and pay the balance of the funds held by them with respect to the McDonalds Projects to the trustee.

[206] On receipt of discharges of liens and BCI's say-so, Southbend's counsel paid interim distributions to lien claimants from funds held in respect to the lien claims (the remainder being held in trust pending the outcome of this application). One of the allowed claims was paid by counsel for the owner of the lands (on which the work had been done by Southbend) directly to the lien claimant. Another payment was made by the trustee from funds provided by the debtor's counsel from the lien fund as settlement of a claim for interest and costs under the Builder's Lien Act. A third payment constituted a settlement and was made from funds paid to the trustee pursuant to the British Columbia Supreme Court order which directed that the funds be held in trust in lieu of a builder's lien until disallowance of the lien had been dealt with. In total, $171,401.48 has been or will be paid out to lien claimants (less any levy found payable).

[207] BCI advised in its Second Report to the Court, filed May 6, 2003, that it was seeking a number of orders, including an order confirming that proofs of claim not filed by the "claims bar date" were barred as lien claims but could be proved as unsecured ordinary creditor claims, an order directing that claimants who had failed to file a proof of claim in time or at all discharge their lien registrations, and an order confirming that certain liens were invalid for failure to file an appeal and that Southbend's counsel was at liberty to release specific funds held in trust to the trustee.

[208] In the spring of 2006, the OSB notified BCI that it was of the view BCI was in breach of Directive 10 and was responsible for remittance of the levy because it was duty bound to and had reviewed all of the claims submitted pursuant to the Proposal. The OSB took the position that, by accepting characterization of their claims as those of secured creditors, the lien claimants had participated in and benefited from the Proposal process. Accordingly, they were liable for payment of the levy.

B. Issues

[209] Southbend's stated intention in crafting the Proposal as it did was to create an efficient process to deal with the lien claimants and to create a pool of surplus funds for the ordinary creditors with any lien funds that were not paid out to the lien claimants. The lien claimants were de facto unsecured creditors of Southbend. Their security (in the form of a lien) was not against Southbend, but rather against the owners of the lands on which Southbend had performed work. Curiously, however, the Proposal included them under the definition of "Secured Creditors." The Proposal defined two classes of creditors: "Lien Claimants" and "Ordinary Claimants." In order for the Proposal to pass, acceptance by both classes of creditors was said to be required.

[210] The lien claimants' votes were not counted in the final tally on the creditors' vote accepting the Proposal. The Court approved the Proposal as it was presented to the creditors.

[211] The following questions arise as a result of this scenario:

1. Were the funds which were used to pay the lien claimants trust monies that do not attract the levy?
2. Can the language of the Proposal and the lien claimants' response to it convert trust claims into secured claims and trigger liability for the levy as a result?
3. What is the effect of the order sanctioning the Proposal in terms of characterization of the lien claimants' claims?

C. Analysis

[212] But for a few exceptions, none of which are pertinent to the present case, all of the provisions of the BIA apply to this Division I Proposal.[136]

1. Trust Claims/Property of the Debtor

[213] There is a significant body of law addressing builders' liens and trust property in the context of bankruptcy proceedings. The principles most relevant to the present application can be summarized as follows:

1. A trust claimant is in no worse or no better a position as a result of the bankruptcy.[137]

Digitized by Google

2. A trust created by builders' lien legislation qualifies as a trust within the meaning of s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA.[138] As such, it is not property of the bankrupt. Rather, it provides protection for those down the contractual chain on construction projects.[139]
3. Money paid into court by the owner to remove builders' liens is not the property of the debtor/bankrupt.[140]
4. A trustee in bankruptcy may be considered as acting as a trustee under builders' and mechanics' lien legislation, under the provisions of which she holds funds, when distributing the funds to lien claimants.[141]

[214] Section 67 of the BIA states that any property held by a bankrupt in trust for another person shall not form any part of the bankrupt's estate divisible among his creditors.

[215] Section 72 of the BIA specifically provides that the BIA does not abrogate or supersede the provisions of provincial law dealing with property and civil rights. Therefore, provincial laws will apply in bankruptcy proceedings provided they do not conflict with the BIA. As noted in Houlden and Morawetz's Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada:[142]

> The trust fund provisions of the provincial lien Acts isolate contract monies and require them to be used for paying suppliers who have contributed to the contract or subcontract. By making the monies a trust, the suppliers are given protection in the event that the contractor or subcontractor becomes insolvent, since the monies will not form part of the bankrupt estate…

[216] Section 10 of the Builders' Lien Act of British Columbia[143] provides that any monies received by a contractor or subcontractor on account of the price of the contract or subcontract constitute "a trust fund for the benefit of persons engaged in connection with the improvement" and that the contractor or subcontractor is the trustee of the fund and not entitled to any of the money until all beneficiaries of the trust have been paid in full.

[217] Unlike the British Columbia statute, the Alberta and Yukon Acts do not create a trust, but rather create lien rights against the owners' land and establish obligations on the part of the owner. The lien right arises on the provision of work or materials and exists without registration of the lien against title to the lands. Registration of the lien against the title to the lands preserves the lien so that it will not lapse in accordance with the terms of the legislation.[144] Both Acts require that the owner retain a specified percentage of the value of the work actually done and materials actually furnished for a set period. The Acts allow the owner to pay the lien fund(s) into court, thereby discharging the owner from any liability with respect to the liens. The money paid into court stands in the place of the land.

[218] In Re Walter Davidson Co. (No. 2),[145] the court ruled that lien funds administered by a trustee in bankruptcy were not administered by the trustee as part of the bankrupt's estate and, therefore, could not attract the levy. The court commented:[146]

> This case is rather close to the line. I do feel, however, that these payments are not made by the trustee as part of the administration of the property of the debtor but rather as a trustee of the fund which is for the benefit of these persons who have supplied materials. It is true that he may become the trustee of the fund possibly by operation of the Trustee Act, as counsel for the Superintendent points out, but that does not mean in acting in that capacity he is administering the estate of the bankrupt but, rather, is administering this fund. This fund, while it may be in the legal title of the debtor, is really not the property of the debtor for distribution among the creditors under section 39 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and I think, therefore, these payments do not come within the meaning of section 106. I think section 106 covers the case and is intended to apply to the case where the payments are being made by the trustee as the trustee administering the estate of the bankrupt for the benefit of the creditors and not where he is making payments out of a fund which is a trust fund for certain lien holders. It is true they become cestuis que trust but, as I say, I think the payments and distributions of the fund are something outside of the exercise by the trustee of his duties as trustee in bankruptcy.

[219] Re Performance Drilling[147] has previously been discussed. There, Riley J. ruled that the levy did not apply to moneys collected by the trustee from landowners who were indebted to the bankrupt estate under building contracts and paid out by the trustee to the lienholders who had filed liens against the lands of the landowners, relying on Re Walter Davidson Co. (No. 2).

[220] In Re Stall Lake Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.),[148] the Manitoba Court of Appeal dealt with levy in the context of a trust obligation imposed on a trustee. Funding for the proposal in that case was provided by third parties (shareholders) on the trust condition that the money be used to make payment under the proposal if the proposal was accepted. If the proposal was not accepted, the monies were to be returned. The funds were not to become property of the bankrupt in the event of a deemed bankruptcy.

[221] Drawing an analogy to builders' lien cases, the court ruled that there should be no distinction between a trust created by statute and one imposed on a trustee in bankruptcy by letter. In the result, the funds were held not to be the property of the debtor and levy was not imposed. The court stated:[149]

> In the mechanics' liens cases, moneys which have been paid to the bankrupt or to which he is entitled under his building contract are made subject, by statute, to a trust in favour of lienholders. It is well settled that payments of such moneys to lienholders are not subject to the levy. In the instant case, moneys were supplied to the trustee under a trust condition, imposed by letter, for payment of the claims of specified unsecured creditors. I am unable to see, in these circumstances, any ground for distinguishing between a trust created by statute and one specifically imposed by letter. In the instance case the argument against the levy being applicable is even stronger, because the money supplied to the trustee was not money of the bankrupt nor money to which the bankrupt was entitled. It was supplied by other persons. It never became the property of the bankrupt. In paying it to the specified creditors the trustee was not administering any property of the bankrupt. He was simply making payments according to the trust obligation imposed upon him and which he had assumed.

[222] The author of an annotation on Re Stall Lake Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.)[150] criticized the decision as being indicative of the courts' unwillingness to fairly apply s. 147, noting that the case was unlike those where money is paid outside of the (then) Bankruptcy Act pursuant to a trust created by a mechanics' lien statute:

> Another reason given was that the funds distributed were not the property of the bankrupt but rather were received from third parties. In adopting this reason the courts relied on the decisions in the mechanics' lien cases where the money which was distributed was not an asset of the bankrupt estate by virtue of s. 39(a) of the Bankruptcy Act which provides that the property of a bankrupt divisible among creditors shall not comprise property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person.
> The emphasis of this decision is on the source of the funds. A better distinction would be the method and provisions governing the distribution of the funds. If the procedure and provisions of the Bankruptcy Act apply, levy should be payable. If the money is paid outside the Bankruptcy Act whether pursuant to a trust created by a Mechanics' Lien Act or to a secured creditor to obtain a discharge of his security, no levy should be payable.

[223] The OSB criticizes all of the authorities that predate 1992 on the basis that lien claimants then could not participate in commercial proposals. It argues that the lien claimants here knew or ought to have known that any money paid into the Proposal to satisfy their claims would be subject to a trust condition that their lien be discharged. They also knew or ought to have known that BCI would handle those trust monies. Accordingly, it would be inconsistent to say that the characterization of the lien monies as "trust monies" would not attract levy since the lien claimants could have pursued payment of their claims without the benefit of the trustee and the bankruptcy system. The OSB's bottom line is that the lien claimants availed themselves of the bankruptcy system and the price they must pay is the levy.

[224] In my view, the addition of s. 50.1 to the BIA,[151] which allows secured creditors to take part in proposals, does not affect the precedential value of the authorities that predated it.

[225] The lien claimants here are not secured creditors within the meaning of the BIA and calling them so in the Proposal does not make them so. Section 2 of the BIA defines "secured creditor" as meaning:

> ... a person holding a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge or lien on or against the property of the debtor or any part of that property as security for a debt due or accruing due to the person from the debtor, or a person whose claim is based on, or secured by, a negotiable instrument held as collateral security and on which the debtor is only indirectly or secondarily liable...

[226] Clearly, the lien claimants are creditors of the debtor, but the security which they hold is not against the property of the debtor but rather is against the property of the owner for whom the debtor did work or supplied materials.

[227] I agree with BCI that in a proposal situation, just as in a bankruptcy, the debtor is not free to use property that is held in trust for another to fund its proposal. In dealing with such funds, the trustee is not acting as trustee under the proposal but rather as trustee of the trust fund.

[228] The focus should not be on what the lien claimants knew or ought to have known about the use and handling of trust funds to pay them out. It is on whether the funds were impressed with a trust for someone else. If they were, they belong to the other person and levy does attach.

[229] The OSB cites Re Baria[152] for the broad proposition that participation in a proposal attracts levy even where trust monies held by the debtor's counsel are used to pay the proposal creditors on the trustee's say so. In my view, Re Baria does not stand for this proposition. The proposal in that case was made to secured and unsecured creditors. It included a term that $43,000 would be paid from funds paid by the debtor into his counsel's trust account held in satisfaction of a $70,000 debt secured by a collateral mortgage to the Bank of Nova Scotia. The Bank of Nova Scotia delivered a proof of claim for a reduced amount (as per its settlement with the debtor) and voted on the proposal. Levy was found to be payable on the basis that the trust funds were funds of the debtor, unlike the funds held in Re Stall Lake Mines Ltd. (N.P.L.), and in the event the proposal was not approved and there was a bankruptcy, the funds would have been received by the trustee and administered in the course of the bankruptcy. The court also determined that the funds being held by the debtor's solicitor were being held by him as agent for the proposal trustee and were properly paid as part of the proposal. The analysis is sound when viewed in that light.

[230] In assessing the trusts in the present case, I find that the monies paid to Southbend's counsel with respect to the Starbucks Projects were impressed with a statutory trust, the funding for which came from third parties. None of these monies would vest in the trustee on bankruptcy. Accordingly, the payments to lien claimants from those monies do not attract the s. 147 levy.

[231] The monies paid to lien claimants by the Proposal trustee in relation to the McDonald's Projects were from funds provided by the debtor's counsel from the lien fund and, therefore, were impressed with a statutory trust in favour of the lien claimant, or were from lien funds paid in trust to the trustee under the British Columbia order, and as such were also impressed with a statutory or at the very least a common law trust in favour of the lien claimant. In accordance with the authorities cited earlier, levy does not attach to those payments.

[233] Monies paid in relation to the Imperial Oil Projects do not necessarily stand on the same footing. Before the Proposal was made, those funds were deposited with Southbend's counsel by Southbend in trust that they be used to discharge the liens against Imperial Oil's Projects. There is no evidence before me as to whether those funds may have come from the holdback, when they were provided to Southbend's counsel, or the trust conditions imposed on Southbend's counsel. If the funds originally were paid to Southbend by Imperial in trust for payment of the lien claimants, the situation would be similar to payment of the lien claimants on the Petro-Canada Projects and levy would not be payable. If they were not, the relevant parties, on notice to the lien claimants, may return before me and present further evidence and argument as to the nature of the transactions.

2. Characterization of the Claimants

[234] The OSB argues that it is only to avoid imposition of the levy that BCI is now attempting to convert the lien claimants from "Secured Creditors" under the Proposal to property claimants.

[235] As I have stated above, the lien claimants do not fall within the definition of "secured creditor" in s. 2 of the BIA. Simply calling a person a "secured creditor" in a proposal does not make them one. The lien claimants here were not secured creditors as against Southbend within the meaning of s. 2 of the BIA. They were mere unsecured creditors of Southbend with an alternate remedy against the landowner by registration of a lien against the landowner's property. It is those landowners that the lien claimants had security against by virtue of the relevant provincial builders' lien legislation.[154]

[236] The question arises as to whether the lien claimant's tacit submission to the Proposal process by delivery of proofs of claim and, in the case of 12 of the 14 lien claimants, by submission of voting letters, coupled with BCI's acceptance of many of those claims, had the effect of converting their claims from those of lien claimants to those of secured creditors? In my view, it did not. The BIA provides that proposals may be made to secured creditors.[155] As the lien claimants here were not secured creditors of Southbend, they should not have been included in the Proposal unless they chose to participate as unsecured creditors. The definitions section of the Proposal clearly distinguishes between "Lien Claimants" and "Secured Creditors," although clause 2 creates some confusion by stating that the Proposal has not been made "to Secured Creditors other than Lien Claimants."

[237] Pursuant to clause 8 of the Proposal, the Lien Claimants are to be paid from Lien Claimant Pools, held in trust in place of the liened lands by counsel for the Debtor or as may be arranged with the applicable owner, and it is only once Lien Claimants with accepted claims have been paid from the Lien Claimant Pools and all appeals have been finalized that the balance remaining is to be paid to the trustee and added to the "Proposal Funds," to be administered in accordance with clauses 9 to 11 of the Proposal. Clause 8(a) of the Proposal calls on the lien claimants to provide a proof of claim along with "sufficient evidence to establish the validity of it's [sic] claim of lien."

[238] Reading the Proposal as a whole, it would appear that it was not designed to treat the lien claimants as secured creditors. Their inclusion does not affect the validity of the Proposal as the votes of the twelve lien claimants who submitted voting letters were not counted in determining whether the Proposal had been accepted by the unsecured creditors.

[239] BCI points to s. 81 of the BIA, which provides a method whereby property claimants, including beneficiaries of trusts, may submit claims to the trustee and the trustee is then required to administer the claim by reviewing the proof of claim and either admitting it, delivering possession of the property to the claimant, or giving notice of dispute of the claim. An appeal procedure is also provided.

[240] Section 81 relates to bankruptcy, not to proposals. However, the analogy is apt. Levy is not payable when the trustee gives property in the possession of the bankrupt back to the rightful owner. While the property claimant may be required to file a proof of claim, that is simply to allow the trustee to verify the assertion of ownership or interest in the property and to enable the property to be identified. The property claimant is not making a claim on the estate of the bankrupt but rather is seeking the return of property to which they are entitled. Levy is not payable as the trustee is not making a payment on account of a claim of a creditor. In my view, the same applies in the present case.

[241] Given that the lien claimants could not properly take part in the Proposal and that payment to them must be taken as having been made outside of the Proposal process, presumably the trustee's fees and disbursements associated with processing the claims were not deducted from the Proposal Funds.

[242] The processing of lien claims in the fashion outlined in the Proposal was an arrangement which appears to have been agreed to by the land owners, Southbend, the trustee and the lien claimants who filed proofs of claim. It allowed for the efficient and orderly settling of lien claims. Such an arrangement is not necessarily to be discouraged. However, in future it is to be made clear to all concerned that the arrangement is not undertaken pursuant to the BIA or builders' lien legislation and if the party responsible for payment of the trustee's fees and disbursements is specified.

3. Effect of the Order Sanctioning the Proposal

[243] As a general rule, an order properly made and entered cannot be varied or set aside except on appeal. Once it is entered and served, the judge who made it is functus officio.[156] The Court has no power to amend its judgment once entered, except where there has been a slip in drawing it up, or where there has been an error or omission in regard to the Court's intention.[157]

[244] No evidence was presented at the hearing of the present matter as to what was said in oral submissions to Master Breitkreuz. Accordingly, this Court must rely on the order as granted and the Report of Trustee on Proposal presented to the Master.

[245] The body of BCI's Report on the sanctioning application did not mention the lien claimants, only creditors. The Proposal itself differentiated between creditors (unsecured, secured and preferred) and lien claimants. "Creditors" were defined in clause 1 as meaning "Preferred Creditors and Ordinary Creditors of the Debtor existing at the Notice of Intention Date."

[246] The Report indicated that a meeting of creditors was held on September 5, 2002 and that the Proposal was "accepted by the require majority of creditors in each class." The only class of creditors involved in the Proposal consisted of unsecured creditors. The Minutes of the First Meeting of Creditors only listed unsecured creditors. The Report of Trustee on Proposal did not list the lien claims as liabilities of Southbend. BCI opined in its Report that the Proposal was an advantageous one for "creditors." The order of Master Breitkreuz states in the recital that: "UPON the Court being satisfied that the required majority of creditors have accepted the Proposal..."

[247] In my view, it was the Proposal at it affected unsecured creditors that was approved by the Court. Given this interpretation, no issue of estoppel arises.

[248] I caution trustees who might consider entering into a similar arrangement in the future with lien claimants who are not secured creditors of the debtor that the arrangement should clearly be separated from any proposal made to creditors under the BIA in order to avoid the type of confusion which has arisen in this case.

VII. Is Cutting Edge Foods Liability for the Levy

A. Facts

[249] Dr. David Climenhaga loaned Cutting Edge Foods $400,000 to restore an asset purchase agreement with a third party (Agreement) into good standing. He took an assignment of the Agreement and a general security agreement as security for the loan (Security). Less than a month later came Cutting Edge Foods' assignment into bankruptcy. The following subsequently unfolded:

- April 8, 2002 - Before taking steps to realize on his security, Dr. Climenhaga's counsel wrote the trustee asking about its intended actions.
- April 29, 2002 – The trustee obtained an order to sell all of the bankrupt's assets by tender without prejudice to the right of secured creditors to exercise their security rights (Tender Order). The Tender Order was consented to by Dr. Climenhaga. Although the validity of the security had not yet been verified by the trustee, the Tender Order nevertheless referred to Dr. Climenhaga as a secured creditor in the preamble.

Digitized by Google

- June 13, 2002 – Dr. Climenhaga's counsel notified the trustee's counsel that his client was the effective registered owner of certain land, that he would not agree to a sale of the bankrupt's assets until treatment of the security was resolved or the trustee agreed to pay him what he was owed.
- Also on June 13, 2002 – The trustee's counsel wrote to Dr. Climenhaga's counsel advising that the security could not be enforced without first proving the claim, obtaining a release from the trustee, and delivering a s. 130 notice to elect to redeem the security.
- June 14, 2002 – The trustee obtained an order approving the sale of the bankrupt's assets (Sale Order), the entry of which was stayed to allow Dr. Climenhaga's counsel the opportunity to obtain instructions. As the validity of Dr. Climenhaga's security had not yet been determined by the trustee, the Sale Order included this provision:

  > The sale proceeds shall be held in trust by the Trustee and shall stand in place and stead of the Purchased Assets as allocated in paragraph 5 subject to secured claims as the interests of secured creditors may appear and there shall be no distribution of the sale proceeds without further order of the Court. The sale of assets, and the holding of funds shall not prejudice the positions of any secured creditors or the Trustee in respect of claims to the Purchased Assets or the sale proceeds.

- June 19, 2002- Dr. Climenhaga's counsel wrote to the trustee's counsel advising of his client's opposition to the sale of the assets subject to his security, and of his intention to enforce the security.
- June 27, 2002 – The Court directed entry of the Sale Order.
- June 28, 2002 – Dr. Climenhaga's counsel delivered a notice under s. 130 for the trustee to elect to redeem the security (s. 130 notice), the response date for which was subsequently extended to July 31, 2002.
- July 30, 2002 – The trustee disallowed Dr. Climenhaga's claim and advised that the disallowance relieved it of its obligation to respond to the s. 130 notice.
- July 23, 2004 - Registrar Smart overturned the disallowance, finding that Dr. Climenhaga had an equitable interest in the lands, giving him a present charge on the lands in priority to the trustee.
- Unknown Date: The trustee filed an appeal of Registrar Smart's July 23rd order. The appeal was abandoned.
- Unknown date - Dr. Climenhaga delivered a "proof of claim" to the trustee. The "proof of claim" was not entered in evidence in these proceedings.
- Unknown date– The trustee paid Dr. Climenhaga the full value of his claim less a five percent holdback pending resolution of this application.

B. The Parties' Positions

[250] Dr. Climenhaga's position is that:

(a) His actions evidence resistance to being drawn into the bankruptcy process.

(b) At best, he was an unwilling participant in the bankruptcy, drawn in by the trustee's unfounded demand for a proof of claim.

(c) The orders made in connection with the asset sale preserved his security and/or created a trust in his favour.

[251] The OSB urges that:

(a) Dr. Climenhaga's circumstances are largely irrelevant. He participated in the process, received a payment from the trustee from funds generated by the trustee's efforts. He must pay the levy.

(b) The timing of Registrar Smart's order as to the validity of the security deprived Dr. Climenhaga of any protections afforded secured creditors by the Tender or Sale Orders.

(c) The "trust" referred to in the Sale Order is simply a "housekeeping trust."

(d) The court may not entertain equitable considerations because the levy is "tax legislation."

C. Analysis

[252] The relevant authorities have been canvassed in my decisions concerning Fantasy and Southbend and need not be revisited for the purposes of this analysis. Suffice to say that the concern in the present matter is the effect of Dr. Climenhaga's participation in the bankruptcy process by virtue of his delivery of a "proof of claim."

Digitized by Google

[253] As I have stated in my discussion above on the vires of Directive 10, the fact that a secured creditor has filed a proof of claim does not in and of itself subject the creditor to levy unless the secured creditor has surrendered his security and is claiming as an unsecured creditor or seeks to prove the balance due him after realizing his security.

[254] No evidence was presented on the hearing of this matter as to whether the proof submitted by Dr. Climenhaga was of security or of a claim. Again, use of the same form and term for two very different types of proofs muddies the waters. If Dr. Climenhaga's "proof of claim" was simply a proof of security, it is no evidence of true participation in the process. If, on the other hand, he valued his security at less than the amount of the debt, he can be seen as participating to the extent of the shortfall. Given that he served the trustee with a s. 130 notice to elect to redeem security and a proof of claim, it seems highly unlikely that he was looking for a dividend.

[255] I have no hesitation in rejecting the OSB's suggestion that Dr. Climenhaga is precluded from taking advantage of the protection afforded secured creditors because the declaration of validity of his security came later. The preamble to the Tender Order, which was drafted by the trustee's counsel, specified that Dr. Climenhaga was a secured creditor although his security had not yet been accepted by the trustee. It spoke to preservation of secured creditors' rights. Moreover, the curiously coincidental timing of expiration of the time for responding to Dr. Climenhaga's notice to elect to redeem (extended at the trustee's request) and the disallowance of his security by the trustee, raise some concern. Finally and perhaps most importantly, to find otherwise opens the door for potential abuse, absurd results and improper erosions of secured creditors' rights.

[256] In addition, I have no hesitation in rejecting the notion that Dr. Climenhaga's failure to appeal the Sale Order should be regarded as his tacit acceptance to somehow being drawn into the bankruptcy process. The Sale Order preserved his rights. Why would he appeal it?

[257] The final issue concerning the Sale Order is whether it created a trust in Dr. Climenhaga's favour, thus removing any potential liability for the levy. The intention of the Sale Order vis-a-vis secured creditors was to segregate the sale proceeds and hold them for the benefit of the secured creditors who, to use the vernacular, "had their mud and metal converted to money." Courts routinely make orders like this to allow sales in insolvencies to proceed, leaving disputes about the validity, enforceability and priority of security to be resolved another day. The Sale Order did not purport to do more than that. It did not create a trust in Dr. Climenhaga's favour in the sense that he suggests.

[258] In the present case, the Sale Order specified that the sale proceeds were to be held in trust by the trustee in the place and stead of the purchased assets. Ultimately, Dr. Climenhaga's security was declared to be valid and he was paid out the full amount of the debt (minus the holdback for the levy pending this application). Dr. Climenhaga was relying on his security. He was not making a claim in the bankruptcy. Accordingly, the levy is not triggered.

[259] Given my findings, I need not be concerned with application of equitable principles, an issue of some concern to the OSB.

[260] I conclude that Dr. Climenhaga is not liable for payment of the levy.

VIII. Conclusions

[261] Production by a secured creditor of proof of security is not a precondition to redemption of security under s. 128(3) of the BIA by payment in full of the debt. Directive 10 says that it is. To that extent, it is ultra vires.

[262] There is no requirement in the BIA that in order to constitute a redemption by the trustee, encumbered assets must be sold at a net price that equals or betters the total of the secured creditor's claim or value of the security per the proof of security. Directive 10 imposes such a requirement, thereby potentially affecting secured parties. To that extent, it is ultra vires.

[263] The requirement in Directive 10 that levy be paid in the event of non-compliance with s. 13.04 even where the trustee in fact acts as agent, receiver or mandatary, arises from misinterpretation of the BIA by the Superintendent. To that extent, Directive 10 is ultra vires.

[264] As to liability for the levy in Fantasy:

(a) If Canadian Western Bank and Carevest were each paid the full amount of the debts owing to them, they are not liable for the s. 147 levy. There is no issue in terms of the "proofs of claim" submitted by them.

(b) If, however, the "proofs of claim" delivered by Canadian Western Bank and Carevest evidence an intention to surrender their security or to claim for a deficiency as an unsecured creditor, levy would follow payment of any dividend. PWC and the OSB are to review the "proofs of claim" to ascertain whether levy is payable in accordance with this ruling. If they cannot agree, they may bring the matter back before me on notice to the secured creditor(s) involved.

(c) As to the Capital City and Bank of Nova Scotia transactions, PWC is to satisfy the OSB that payment was made of the debt in full in each case. If it was, levy is not payable by the secured creditors. If it was not the parties may return before me, on notice to the secured creditor, and present further evidence and argument as to the nature of the transactions.

[265] Concerning liability for the levy in Southbend:

(a) The monies paid with respect to the Starbucks Projects were impressed with a statutory trust. Payments to lien claimants from those monies do not attract the levy.

(b) The monies paid to lien claimants in relation to the McDonald's Projects were from funds impressed with a statutory trust in favour of the lien claimants or were from lien funds paid in trust to the trustee under the British Columbia order which were also impressed with a statutory, or at the very least, a common law trust in favour of the lien claimant. The levy does not attach to those payments.

(c) The monies paid for the Petro-Canada Projects were from the lien fund(s) held back by Petro-Canada that were impressed with a common law trust. Payments to lien claimants from those monies do not attract the levy.

(d) There is no evidence as to whether monies paid in relation to the Imperial Oil Projects came from a holdback or as to the trust conditions imposed on Southbend's counsel. If the funds were paid to Southbend by Imperial in trust for payment of the lien claimants, the levy would not be payable. If they were not, the parties may, on notice to the lien claimants, return before me and present further evidence and argument as to the nature of the transactions.

(e) The lien claimants could not properly take part in the Proposal and payment to them must be taken as having been made outside of the Proposal process.

(f) Neither the description of the lien claimants as "secured creditors" in the Proposal nor the order sanctioning the Proposal has the effect of attracting the levy.

[266] The Sale Order made in Re Cutting Edge Foods Inc. specified that the sale proceeds were to be held in trust by the trustee in the place and stead of the purchased assets. Dr. Climenhaga is not liable for payment of the levy.

[31] Section 50.1 provides that, subject to subsections (2) to (4), a secured creditor has the right to vote the claim as a secured creditor for the entire amount once it has filed proof of security. Section 50.1(4) sets out the mechanism for appealing the proposal trustee's assessment. It states: "Where a secured creditor is dissatisfied with the proposed assessed value of his security, the secured creditor may apply to the court, within fifteen days after the proposal is sent to the creditors, to have the proposed assessed value revised, and the court may revise the proposed assessed value, in which case the revised value henceforth applies for the purposes of this Part."

To: OSB Staff, Trustees and Registrars

Subject: Directive No. 10R, *Redemption of Security and Section 147 Levy of the BIA

The Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (OSB) has amended Directive No. 10, Redemption of Security and Section 147 Levy of the BIA, in order to provide trustees and other stakeholders with clearer direction as to how redemption of security and section 147 levy of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) should be applied.

The amended Directive states that the levy under section 147 of the BIA is payable on all payments by a trustee to a secured creditor. Two noteworthy exceptions are: (1) when the trustee has acted as agent, receiver or mandatary for the secured creditor in selling the encumbered assets; and (2) when the trustee proceeded with redemption of the security within the meaning of subsection 128(3) of the BIA.

When proceeding with redemption of the security within the meaning of subsection 128(3) of the BIA, trustees must assess the value of the security and amount of the debt before redeeming in full. The assessment shall be made by examining the proof of claim or

Objet : Instruction n° 10R, *Rachat de garantie et prélèvement en vertu de l'article 147 de la LFI

Le Bureau du surintendant des faillites (BSF) a modifié l'instruction n° 10, Rachat de garantie et prélèvement en vertu de l'article 147 de la LFI, afin de donner aux syndics et autres intervenants une orientation claire quant à la manière de mettre en application le rachat de garantie et le prélèvement en vertu de l'article 147 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (LFI).

L'instruction modifiée stipule que le prélèvement en vertu de l'article 147 de la LFI est exigible sur tous les paiements effectués par un syndic à un créancier garanti. Il existe deux exceptions notables à cette règle : 1) si le syndic a agi en qualité d'agent, de séquestre ou de mandataire pour le créancier garanti en vendant les biens grevés; et 2) si le syndic a procédé au rachat de la garantie aux termes du paragraphe 128(3) de la LFI.

Lorsqu'ils procèdent au rachat de la garantie aux termes du paragraphe 128(3) de la LFI, les syndics doivent évaluer la valeur de la garantie et le montant de la dette avant de procéder au rachat. L'évaluation doit se faire en examinant la preuve de réclamation ou la proof of security submitted by the secured creditor. Also, trustees should only redeem the security if the net price realizable on the sale of the encumbered asset is equal to or greater than the debt or value of the security as per the proof of security or proof of claim. The requirement to file an attestation with the statement of receipts and disbursements remains. The receipts, disbursements and trustee's remuneration must still be recorded in the statement of receipts and disbursements.

preuve de garantie soumise par le créancier garanti. De plus, les syndics devraient seulement racheter la garantie si le prix net réalisable sur la vente du bien grevé est égal ou supérieur à la créance ou à la valeur de la garantie selon la preuve de garantie ou la preuve de réclamation. L'exigence de déposer une attestation avec l'état des recettes et des débours est maintenue. Les recettes, les débours et la rémunération du syndic doivent encore être consignés dans l'état des recettes et des débours.

Coming into Force

Directive No. 10R, Redemption of Security and Section 147 Levy of the BIA, comes into force on May 22, 2009.

Entrée en vigueur

L'instruction n° 10R, Rachat de garantie et prélèvement en vertu de l'article 147 de la LFI, entre en vigueur le 22 mai 2009.

(a) To clarify the operation of section 147 of the Act in the case of the liquidation of encumbered assets and a consequent payment to a secured creditor.

(b) It is also aimed at ensuring greater transparency and uniformity in the trustee's presentation of the statements of receipts and disbursements.

Articles 13.4, 128, 147 et 152.

Politique

4. En vertu de l'article 147 de la Loi, un prélèvement est versé au surintendant des faillites sur tous les paiements - à l'exception des frais mentionnés au paragraphe 70(2) de la Loi – faits par le syndic par voie de dividende ou autrement pour le compte des réclamations de créanciers, que ces créanciers soient privilégiés, garantis ou non garantis. Le prélèvement est versé lorsque les paiements sont faits par un syndic agissant à titre de syndic au cours d'une administration sous la Loi.

5. Le prélèvement visé à l'article 147 est exigible sur tous les paiements faits par un syndic à un créancier garanti, sauf les cas d'exception énumérés au paragraphe 7 de la présente instruction. Ce principe demeure même si un tiers, tel un notaire, un liquidateur ou un encanteur, effectue le paiement au

trustee.

6. Since the redemption is not a "consensual operation," but rather a unilateral action taken by the trustee with the intention of obtaining an advantage for the estate, it excludes the case of the trustee acting as agent, receiver or mandatary for the secured creditor.

Exceptions

7. The section 147 levy is not payable on payments by a trustee to a secured creditor in situations where:

(a) The trustee has acted as agent, receiver or mandatary for the secured creditor in selling the encumbered assets;

(b) The trustee proceeded with redemption of the security within the meaning of subsection 128(3) of the Act.

8. When proceeding with redemption of the security within the meaning of subsection 128(3) of the Act:

(a) The trustee must assess the value of the security and amount of the debt before redeeming in full. The assessment shall be made by examining the proof of claim or proof of security submitted by the secured creditor. If the secured creditor does not produce a proof of claim, it is the trustee's responsibility to take advantage of the provisions of subsection 128(1) of the Act.

créancier garanti pour le syndic et en son nom.

6. Le rachat de garantie n'étant pas une « opération consensuelle », mais un acte unilatéral posé par le syndic dans le but de procurer un avantage à la masse, il exclut de ce fait le cas où le syndic agit à titre d'agent, de séquestre ou de mandataire pour le créancier garanti.

Exceptions

7. Le prélèvement en vertu de l'article 147 n'est pas exigible sur les paiements faits par un syndic à un créancier garanti dans les situations où :

a) le syndic a agi à titre d'agent, de séquestre ou de mandataire pour le créancier garanti en vendant les biens grevés;

b) le syndic a procédé au rachat de garantie aux termes du paragraphe 128(3) de la Loi.

8 Lorsqu'il procède au rachat de garantie aux termes du paragraphe 128(3) de la Loi :

a) le syndic doit évaluer la valeur de la garantie et le montant de la dette avant de procéder au rachat. L'évaluation doit se faire en examinant la preuve de réclamation ou la preuve de garantie soumise par le créancier garanti. Si le créancier garanti ne produit pas de preuve de réclamation, il incombe au syndic de se prévaloir des dispositions du paragraphe 128(1) de la Loi;

(b) The trustee should only redeem the security if the net price realizable on the sale of the encumbered asset is equal to or greater than the debt or value of the security as per the proof of security or proof of claim.

9. Where the trustee has proceeded with redemption of a security within the meaning of subsection 128(3) of the Act, the trustee must file, with the statement of receipts and disbursements, an attestation, pursuant to Appendix I of this Directive, containing the following information:

- date of receipt of the secured creditor's proof of claim or proof of security;
- amount due to the secured creditor and valuation of the security;
- date the encumbered assets are offered for sale and date of sale of the said assets;
- gross price paid by the purchaser;
- trustee's disbursements and remuneration pertaining to the redemption; and
- date of redemption of the security.

10. The receipts and disbursements, as well as the trustee's remuneration pertaining to the redemption, must be recorded in the statement of receipts and disbursements. If the trustee makes several redemptions, the trustee must submit an equivalent number of Appendices with the statement of receipts and disbursements.

b) le syndic devrait seulement racheter la garantie si le prix net réalisable sur la vente du bien grevé est égal ou supérieur à la créance ou à la valeur de la garantie selon la preuve de garantie ou la preuve de réclamation.

9. Là où le syndic aura procédé au rachat d'une garantie aux termes du paragraphe 128(3) de la Loi, le syndic devra déposer avec son état des recettes et des débours une attestation conforme à l'annexe I de la présente instruction contenant les renseignements suivants :

- date de réception de la preuve de réclamation ou de la preuve de garantie du créancier garanti;
- somme due au créancier garanti et évaluation de la garantie;
- date de la mise en vente des biens grevés et date de la vente de ces biens;
- prix brut payé par l'acquéreur;
- débours et rémunération du syndic afférents au rachat; et
- date du rachat de la garantie.

10. Les recettes, les débours et la rémunération du syndic afférents au rachat doivent être portés à l'état des recettes et des débours. Si le syndic procède à plusieurs rachats, il doit déposer avec son état des recettes et des débours autant d'annexes

11. In the event that the trustee sells unencumbered and encumbered assets in the same transaction, the disbursements must be shared pro rata between these two categories of assets. If another method is used, the trustee must indicate the method used and justify the choice.

DIVIDENDS

Trustee to pay dividends as required - Sec. 148
148. (1) Subject to the retention of such sums as may be necessary for the costs of administration or otherwise, the trustee shall, from time to time as required by the inspectors, declare and distribute dividends among the unsecured creditors entitled thereto.

Disputed claims - Sec. 148(2)
(2) Where the validity of any claim has not been determined, the trustee shall retain sufficient funds to provide for payment thereof in the event that the claim is admitted.

No action for dividend - Sec. 148(3)
(3) No action for a dividend lies against the trustee, but, if the trustee refuses or fails to pay any dividend after having been directed to do so by the inspectors, the court may, on the application of any creditor, order him to pay it, and also to pay personally interest thereon for the time that it is withheld and the costs of the application.
R.S., c. B-3, s. 119.

Notice that final dividend will be made - Sec. 149
149. (1) The trustee may, after the first meeting of the creditors, send a notice, in the prescribed manner, to every person with a claim of which the trustee has notice or knowledge but whose claim has not been proved. The notice must inform the person that, if that person does not prove the claim within a period of 30 days after the sending of the notice, the trustee will proceed to declare a dividend or final dividend without regard to that person's claim.

Court may extend time - Sec. 149(2)
(2) Where a person notified under subsection (1) does not prove the claim within the time limit or within such further time as the court, on proof of merits and satisfactory explanation of the delay in making proof, may allow, the claim of that person shall, notwithstanding anything in this Act, be excluded from all share in any dividend, but a taxing authority may notify the trustee within the period referred to in subsection (1) that it proposes to file a claim as soon as the amount has been ascertained, and the time for filing the claim shall thereupon be extended to three months or such further time as the court may allow.

Certain federal claims - Sec. 149(3)
(3) Despite subsection (2), a claim may be filed for an amount payable under the following Acts or provisions within the time limit referred to in subsection (2) — or within three months after the return of income or other evidence of the facts on which the claim is based is filed or comes to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue or, in the case of an amount payable under legislation referred to in paragraph (c), the minister in that province responsible for the legislation:

- (a) the Income Tax Act;
- (b) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance Act that refers to the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts;

(c) any provincial legislation that has a purpose similar to the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that Act, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, if the sum

(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

(ii) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection;

(d) the Excise Tax Act;
(e) the Excise Act, 2001;
(f) the Customs Act; and
(g) the Air Travellers Security Charge Act.

No dividend allowed - Sec. 149(4)
(4) Unless the trustee retains sufficient funds to provide for payment of any claims that may be filed under legislation referred to in subsection (3), no dividend is to be declared until the expiry of three months after the trustee has filed all returns that the trustee is required to file.

Right of creditor who has not proved claim before declaration of dividend - Sec. 150
150. A creditor who has not proved his claim before the declaration of any dividend is entitled on proof of his claim to be paid, out of any money for the time being in the hands of the trustee, any dividend or dividends he may have failed to receive before that money is applied to the payment of any future dividend, but he is not entitled to disturb the distribution of any dividend declared before his claim was proved for the reason that he has not participated therein, except on such terms and conditions as may be ordered by the court.
R.S., c. B-3, s. 121.

Final dividend and division of estate - Sec. 151
151. When the trustee has realized all the property of the bankrupt or all thereof that can, in the joint opinion of himself and of the inspectors, be realized without needlessly protracting the administration, and settled or determined or caused to be settled or determined the claims of all creditors to rank against the estate of the bankrupt, he shall prepare a final statement of receipts and disbursements and dividend sheet and, subject to this Act, divide the property of the bankrupt among the creditors who have proved their claims.

N° 18

UNCLAIMED DIVIDENDS AND UNDISTRIBUTED FUNDS

Issued: August 14, 2009

(Supersedes Directive No. 8 issued on July 23, 1993, on the same topic)

Interpretation

1. In this Directive,

"Act" means the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;

"OSB" means the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy;

"Rules" means the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules.

Authority and Purpose

2. This Directive is issued pursuant to the authority of paragraphs 5(4)(b) and (c) of the Act.

DIVIDENDES NON RÉCLAMÉS ET FONDS NON DISTRIBUÉS

Date d'émission : le 14 août 2009

(La présente instruction remplace et annule l'instruction n° 8 sur le même sujet émise le 23 juillet 1993.)

Interprétation

1. Les définitions qui suivent s'appliquent à la présente instruction :

« BSF » désigne le Bureau du surintendant des faillites;

« Loi » renvoie à la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité;

« Règles » s'entend des Règles générales sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité.

Autorité et objet

2. La présente instruction est émise en vertu de l'autorité conférée par les alinéas 5(4)b) et c) de la Loi.

3. The purpose of this Directive is twofold:

(a) to minimize the amount of unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds in order to maximize dividends to creditors; and

(b) to reduce the number of unnecessary requests to the OSB for the return to creditors of money remitted as unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds.

Unclaimed Dividends

4. Trustees, when proceeding to the discharge phase of their administration in those estates where a dividend will be payable, should:

(a) in a case of an ordinary administration, apply for a discharge hearing date that will allow a longer period of time for the cashing of cheques, hence reducing the number of returned cheques as a result of a stop-payment or closed account. It is suggested that this period should be 45 to 60 days after the mailing of the cheques to allow for most, if not all, of the outstanding cheques to be cashed. This becomes particularly important for those creditors from outside Canada. In the case of a summary administration, the

3. La présente instruction a une double finalité :

a) réduire le montant des dividendes non réclamés et des fonds non distribués de manière à maximiser les dividendes versés aux créanciers; et

b) réduire les demandes inutiles de remboursement des créanciers auprès du BSF pour les sommes qui ont été remises à titre de dividendes non réclamés ou de fonds non distribués.

Dividendes non réclamés

4. Les syndics procédant à leur libération dans les administrations où un dividende sera payable aux créanciers devraient :

a) demander une date d'audience en vue de leur libération, dans le cas d'une administration ordinaire, qui assurera un délai suffisant pour l'encaissement des chèques, minimisant ainsi le nombre de chèques retournés en raison de la fermeture du compte bancaire. Il est suggéré que la période soit de 45 à 60 jours après l'envoi des chèques afin de permettre que la majorité, sinon la totalité, des chèques retardataires soient encaissés. Ceci devient encore plus important lorsqu'il y a des créanciers de l'extérieur du sending of the certificate of compliance should be delayed by the same amount of time.

(b) make a reasonable effort to trace the current address for the local financial institutions or nationally known businesses (or those that have local branches) whose notice of trustee discharge or cheque has been returned by the postal services in order to forward the cheque to the proper address;

(c) include any reference account number found on the proof of claim or support document to facilitate the tracing by the receiving firm; and

(d) upon expiration of the above period and before proceeding to their discharge, trustees must, in conformity with subsection 154(1) of the Act, forward to the Superintendent all outstanding dividends remaining in their account.

Canada. Dans le cas d'une administration sommaire, l'envoi du certificat de conformité et de libération présumée devrait être retardé du même nombre de jours.

b) faire un effort raisonnable afin de retracer l'adresse courante des institutions financières locales ou d'entreprises connues nationalement (ou celles ayant un établissement local) dont l'avis de demande de libération du syndic a été retourné, afin de pouvoir faire suivre le chèque à la bonne adresse;

c) inclure sur le chèque toute référence ou tout numéro de compte figurant sur la preuve de réclamation ou le document à l'appui pour permettre au bénéficiaire du chèque d'en connaître l'objet; et

d) à l'expiration du délai dont il est question à l'alinéa 4*c*) ci-dessus et avant de procéder à sa libération, le syndic est tenu, au terme du paragraphe 154(1) de la Loi, de faire parvenir au surintendant tous les chèques non encaissés encore dans son compte bancaire.

remitting them as undistributed funds to the Superintendent.

6. Trustees are, however, not expected to distribute immaterial amounts available for distribution to a large number of creditors if the cost of the distribution would appreciably exceed the amount to be distributed. As a guideline, to determine what constitutes materiality, the following will apply to both preferred and ordinary creditors:

(a) if there is only one (1) creditor, the funds are to be paid to the creditor where the gross amount available in the estate exceeds $5;

(b) if there are two (2) to five (5) creditors inclusive, the funds are to be paid to the creditors where the gross amount available in the estate exceeds $50; and

(c) if there are more than five (5) creditors, the funds are to be paid to the creditors where the average dividend to ordinary creditors in the estate (total amount of dividends to ordinary creditors divided by the number of ordinary creditors) will exceed $10.

7. If additional interest is received after the preparation of the Statement of Receipts and Disbursements, the amount should be distributed to the creditors by way of an

a) lorsqu'il y a un (1) seul créancier, les fonds doivent être versés au créancier lorsque le montant brut disponible au dossier dépasse 5 $;

b) lorsqu'il y a entre deux (2) et cinq (5) créanciers inclusivement, les fonds doivent être versés aux créanciers lorsque le montant brut disponible au dossier dépasse 50 $;

c) lorsqu'il y a plus de cinq (5) créanciers, les fonds doivent être versés aux créanciers lorsque le dividende moyen aux créanciers ordinaires (montant total des dividendes possibles aux créanciers ordinaires divisé par le nombre de créanciers ordinaires) est supérieur à 10 $.

7. Lorsque des intérêts additionnels sont reçus suite à la préparation de l'état des recettes et des déboursés, le montant devrait être distribué aux créanciers au moyen d'un bordereau de

[1] Westgeest & Associates, the trustee of the bankruptcy of Jon Edward Los, appeals from an order whereby a Master, sitting as Registrar, approved its final statement of receipts and disbursements but not its fees of $8,583.50. The trustee obtained creditor approval of the remuneration sought, but the Superintendent of Bankruptcy intervened on the taxation and challenged the amount because of the trustee's unexplained delay of six years in the administration of the estate. The learned Master held that a reduction in the trustee's remuneration was warranted to offset interest lost to the creditors and to reflect the court's disapproval of inordinate delay. He approved a fee of $6,000.

[2] The question now is whether it was open to the Master to arbitrarily set and approve a reduced fee. The trustee says that, in the absence of conduct on its part amounting to an abuse of its position in the bankruptcy process, the Master erred in imposing what amounts to a penal sanction to address the delay that was permitted to occur.

[3] The bankrupt made his assignment in 1992. Sixteen unsecured claims were made against the estate. They total $417,411. One, that of Ann Carmichael, is for $396,000 or 95% of the total amount of the claims. There was an absolute discharge in 1993 which was apparently annulled in 1999. The estate is not large: $22,230. The amount available for distribution (before any reduction in the trustee's fees) is $7,337. The trustee is criticised for not making at least an interim payment to the creditors of close to that amount, as it could have done in 1993.

[4] The trustee's final statement of receipts and disbursements (including its fee of $8,553.50) was approved at a duly called meeting of creditors in September, 1999. Ms. Carmichael was the only creditor who attended.

[5] A copy of the statement was then sent to the Superintendent who, in response, recommended that there be some reduction in the trustee's remuneration because of the delay in the administration of the estate. The Superintendent requested that the trustee proceed to a taxation and that his office be given notice tration of the estate. Tso that he could be represented.

[6] Under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, a trustee's remuneration shall be such as is voted by ordinary resolution at a meeting of creditors, subject to an application by the trustee, a creditor, or a debtor for an order increasing or reducing the remuneration (s. 39(1)and (5)). It has, however, been accepted, at least in the courts of Quebec and Ontario, that the Superintendent is entitled to intervene on the taxing of a trustee's final statement (s. 152) for the purpose of disputing the remuneration sought by the trustee and, in order to control manifest abuses and to maintain the general credibility of the bankruptcy system, a registrar may approve a lower amount than the creditors have approved: Brune (syndic) (Re), [1999] J.Q. No. 2318 (C.A.), L'Heureux (syndic) (Re), 1999 CanLII 13791 (QC CA), [1999] R.J.Q. 945 (C.A.), Société de gestion Michel Douville Inc. (syndic) (Re), [1997] A.Q. No. 2348 (C.A.), and Re Hess (1977), 23 C.B.R. (N.S.) 215 (Ont. S.C.). However, a registrar's discretion in this regard must be exercised with great care and with due regard for the creditors' approval. In L'Heureux the point was made as follows:

[26] This power, however, must be used with a great deal of moderation and circumspection, and only for serious reasons. The legislator who provided for the procedure mentioned above certainly did not wish the registrar to sit propio motu in appeal against the creditors' decision if no complaint has been lodged. Neither did he wish, surely, in a process which should be expeditious, to delay the liberation of the bankrupt and the trustee by multiplying the stages of review. [translation]

[7] The only British Columbia decision to which I have been referred in relation to the point is Newbrook, Re 1998 CanLII 4948 (BC SC), (1998), 7 C.B.R. (4th) 231 (S.C.). There the Registrar refused a trustee's application for an increase over the amount of remuneration that had been voted to it at a meeting of the creditors in respect of a proposal. In my view, the decision is not at odds with the Quebec and Ontario cases and I respectfully adopt the views expressed by those courts.

[8] Only one of the cases cited is factually comparable to the case at bar. In Brune, the Quebec Court of Appeal upheld a registrar's decision to accept the Superintendent's challenge and reduce the amount of a trustee's remuneration where there had been a 10 year delay in the administration of the estate. There, creditors representing 74% of the claims made against the estate had approved the remuneration sought. It was, however, a much larger estate and, unlike the circumstances here, the trustee in that case failed to justify the services said to have been rendered in administering the estate. But the appellate court took the view that the delay alone was enough to justify the reduction in the trustee's remuneration that was made:

[10] The mere fact that the trustee left the file inactive for nearly 10 years, accumulating more than $58,800 of interest in his account, and during that time depriving the creditors of a dividend, is ample justification for setting aside the rule under which the creditors are the sole arbiters of the trustee's fees. ...

[9] The trustee accepts that the test this court must apply in considering this appeal is whether the Master made an error of law, made a manifest error of fact, or was clearly wrong: Teles, Re reflex, (1998), 1 C.B.R. (4th) 43 (S.C.) and Re Achilles reflex, (1993), 83 B.C.L.R. (2d) 116 (B.C.S.C.). Having considered the Master's reasons for reducing the trustee's fee, it is not clear to me to what extent he took into account the fact that the remuneration sought was approved by the creditor representing 95% of the unsecured claims against the estate and the limitation with which the exercise of his discretion was accordingly impressed. However, while I may not have reduced the trustee's remuneration by 30% as the Master did, it is not for me to substitute my judgment for his, and it cannot, in my view, be said that he erred in disposing of the matter as he did. He is not shown to have made an error in law nor an error of fact, and he was not clearly wrong.

[10] The Rules Amending the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Rules, SOR/98-240, prescribe a code of conduct for trustees that mandates that their duties be performed in a timely manner (s. 36). Confidence in the bankruptcy system demands that there be no unjustified delays of any consequence. Six years is, as the Master said, a substantial period of time in the context of the administration of an estate. A trustee who permits that time to pass without making a distribution to the creditors that should be made, and who offers no explanation is not fulfilling his duty. The Master cannot be said to have erred if, in response to the intervention of the Superintendent, he saw fit to exercise his discretion in favour of reducing the trustee's remuneration however arbitrary the reduction may seem.

[11] It follows that the trustee's appeal does not succeed and it will accordingly be dismissed.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE
MR. JUSTICE CÔTÉ

A. Issue

[1] The issue is as follows. To what extent should a trustee in bankruptcy who wishes to sell estate assets privately, deduct from the proposed sale price, commission or other expenses "saved" by not having a public sale?

B. Facts

[2] The respondents are a married couple who both went into bankruptcy. They lived in their own home, which had a mortgage. After allowing for the provincial exemption of $40,000, they had equity in the home upon which the trustee in bankruptcy could realize. There were two appraisals of the home, and it was eventually agreed to use the mid-point between the appraisals as the market value of the home; no one questions that. The trustee in bankruptcy agreed to sell the home back to the bankrupts for cash (presumably from some exempt source). The trustee properly gave credit on the sale for the provincial exemption, and for the mortgage balance. No one questions that either.

[3] However, the trustee in bankruptcy also deducted from the worth of the home what would have been the usual real estate commission, and the usual legal fees to the vendor, had the house been listed with a realtor and sold to a stranger.

[4] The Superintendent of Bankruptcy and the Minister of National Revenue (a small creditor of one of the bankrupts) questioned the propriety of the last-mentioned deductions.

[5] As a result, the trustee in bankruptcy moved for advice and directions. A Registrar in bankruptcy held that that deduction was improper, a chambers judge reversed that on appeal, and the Attorney-General of Canada now appeals to us. We heard argument from counsel for the Attorney-General, counsel for the bankrupts, and counsel for an intervener, the Alberta Insolvency Practitioners' Association. No one appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy.

C. The Law

[6] The Registrar in bankruptcy seemed to think that the question was whether to characterize this as a sale or not. I disagree (though I happen to think it is a sale).

[7] The factums tended to adopt opposing views of a simple question: whether commission or disposal expenses saved could be deducted in reaching fair value for a private sale. However, oral argument drew counsel closer together. Though counsel for the Attorney-General maintained that any such calculation had dangerous tendencies, and invited sloppy or misguided practice by a minority of trustees in bankruptcy, all three counsel came close to agreeing on the theory. And all three invited us to clarify the law in this area for a number of reasons.

[8] All three counsel agreed that a trustee about to sell should behave more or less as a reasonable person would, so far as reasonable efforts and business-like practices would permit. Within those limits, the trustee should try to maximize yield. And all three counsel agreed what a reasonable person would do who already knew one prospective buyer for a house, but could instead list the house for public sale. The reasonable vendor would first try to get the one known prospect to buy at a price higher than would be the net recovery after all expenses, were the house to be sold publicly.

[9] All counsel appeared to agree that one could not be more exact than that. How much more than that net recovery the reasonable vendor trustee should try to get from the known prospect, depends on many circumstances. Counsel agreed that there should not be any fixed percentage of the savings of selling expenses which should go to the vendor or to the purchaser.

[10] Counsel for the Attorney-General suggested that there may often be realistic alternatives to selling a house at full real estate commission. One might negotiate a lower commission, or try to use newspaper ads. In theory that is doubtless true, and whether it is a practical solution probably depends upon the time and the place, not to mention the particular asset to be sold. It is not necessary to sort out that narrow question today.

[11] Here is a summary of my own views of the principles involved here, which I hope are not very different from those of any of the three counsel.

[12] First, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act puts day-to-day administration into the hands of business people (trustees in bankruptcy and often inspectors). Of course the court has overriding control, and the Superintendent has some oversight, and now a power to issue directives. The point is that the administration is to be practical, not legalistic.

[13] Second, the trustee in bankruptcy has a duty to maximize the yield from all the assets legally available to the trustee, subject to practicalities and honesty.

Digitized by Google

[14] Third, it would usually be futile to try to hold out for a sale price higher than fair market value (though there may occasionally be special exceptions).
[15] Fourth, it is often dangerous to sell for less than fair market value, though individual circumstances often dictate that, such as a thin market, an unusual asset, or heavy carrying costs or liabilities from continued possession. Doubtless there are many other circumstances which would permit that.

[16] Why should one focus upon fair market value? Not because of some notion of fairness between the vendor trustee and some purchaser. Rather, fair market value is defined as the price that an arm's-length willing vendor and willing purchaser would probably negotiate. If such a willing buyer can be found, by definition that is the price which the vendor realistically should try to get. If no willing buyer can be found, or the vendor trustee is legitimately in a hurry to sell, then the price may be lower.
[17] If a number of willing buyers can be found without any significant expense, or if no willing buyer can be found, there is little more to say. What if one or two willing buyers can be found without any particular expense, and more could be found only by incurring significant expense (as was likely the case here)? Then the principles do not change; but the bargaining power of the parties does change.
[18] As counsel for the respondent and the intervener reminded us, the one known prospective purchaser has significant bargaining power, because he or she is the only person who will buy without the vendor trustee's incurring any expenses in finding a buyer, such as real estate commissions. For the trustee to insist upon full market value, and to turn away this prospective buyer for offering anything less, would be foolish. That is because selling instead to some stranger would likely cost real estate commission or other disposition costs, and so net significantly less than fair market value.
[19] But consider the other side. The vendor trustee has special bargaining power also. If the prospective purchaser already lives in the home (as the respondent bankrupts did here), obviously they too would save money and inconvenience by not having to move. Moving vans do not work free any more than do realtors. And even if the prospective purchaser does not live in or even near the home, he has a good chance of bargaining the vendor down to somewhat below the usual fair market value. The prospective buyer is highly unlikely to find that advantage anywhere else. Any other suitable house which he finds will probably be listed through a realtor, and that other vendor will have to pay a commission, and have no incentive whatever to go below fair market value.
[20] So in this situation, if this vendor and this prospective buyer make a deal, each can do significantly better than if each dealt with a stranger instead. Both should try hard to make a deal. As a matter of pure logic, so long as either vendor or purchaser can gain even a dollar of the disposition expenses "saved", he or she should make this deal and not look elsewhere. Only if the entire "savings" were to go to the other party, should it be a matter of indifference to either party whether to deal here or elsewhere.

[21] Another way to view the matter is this. Assume that real estate commissions and other expenses would be about 7% on a "public" sale. So value to the vendor is only around 93% of market value. But value to the purchaser is 100% of market value, given the price of comparable houses. The values to the two people thus overlap. That is why it is wrong in principle to say that market value is only 93% and that therefore that is all that the purchaser can be expected to pay. That confuses value to vendor with several other things. Nor should the trustee look on this as enhancing the size of the exemption under the Civil Enforcement Act.
[22] Of course on occasion the vendor might realize only the "net" price (say 93%). The opposite party might prove obdurate, and unwilling to yield a dollar in negotiation, insisting on having the entire "savings" of expenses for himself or herself.
[23] But, given the prospect of sharing the saved costs, and how most people bargain, most purchasers would not be so stubborn and so brave in negotiation as to risk all. Most would try to split the "savings" between the parties in some fashion, though doubtless trying to get a bigger fraction of the savings for his or her own side.
[24] I do not suggest that there is any set share of those savings which is proper. There is no formula such as 50:50.
[25] But what I do say, is that it is not logical for either party to fail even to attempt to make such a deal, or to fail to try to get any of the savings whatever for his or her side. The court does not care how people negotiating with trustees in bankruptcy bargain (so long as they do so honestly). But the court does care how trustees bargain, for they have a duty to try to maximize the yield from the assets.
[26] Therefore, it is not proper for a trustee in bankruptcy to consider that fair market value is automatically reduced by the full sum of all disposition costs, such as real estate commission. Nor is it proper for the trustee faced with a prospective known buyer in such a situation to make no attempt to bargain. For the same reason, it is not proper for the trustee to announce in advance that all that he or she seeks is the fair market value minus all disposition costs saved.

Digitized by Google

That is not bargaining at all. A sensible negotiator has in mind a minimum position below which he or she will not make a deal, but normally does not announce that price as his or her opening bid. For the reasons given above, this type of case is particularly ill-suited to such a tactic.

[27] Least of all should a trustee in bankruptcy think that this is a mere exercise in arithmetic, or that there is a formula which will let him or her calculate the "proper" price to sell for.

[28] Cases on division of matrimonial property were cited or referred to at all three levels of court. But examination of some of them convinces me that the analogy afforded there is too imperfect to be of any net use here. In that, I agree with the chambers judge.

D. The Present Case

[29] In the light of the principles above, should the court intervene here?

[30] This trustee in bankruptcy applied for advice and directions, yet her evidence really gave no actual express reasons for the decision which she made to sell at this particular price. Her affidavits deal with other matters, and at best hint at her true reasons, by annexing letters of calculations. She did not mention any bargaining (though counsel for the respondent bankrupts asked us not to assume that none had taken place).

[31] One of the bankrupts, with no asserted expertise, argued in an affidavit that selling without a realtor usually fails, and that when it succeeds the purchaser gets the saving in cost. I doubt that is admissible evidence. If it is, I would give it very little weight.

[32] In future, a trustee in bankruptcy who seeks approval for a course of action (as distinct from one who takes a neutral stance) should swear to explicit reasons for that course of action, so that the court does not have to guess at anything.

[33] In the present case, there are some hints that the trustee used the forbidden reasoning: see the calculations set out in the letters sent out to creditors by the trustee. Those letters are not secret, and there is great risk that the bankrupts who wished to buy saw or learned of them. The letters might be read as abandoning all "saved" disposition costs to the prospective known purchasers (the bankrupts).

[34] However, the courts are reluctant to interfere with reasonable business decisions by trustees in bankruptcy, and a few chambers judges handle bankruptcy and insolvency cases, and so gain great experience in these matters. Before us, an appellate court, there is no clear evidence of use of improper considerations, or total neglect of relevant considerations, by the trustee. The chambers judge based himself on the business judgment, and knowledge of all relevant considerations, by the trustee. I think it safer not to intervene.

[35] I would not interfere with the result in the present case, and would be content with the guidance which I have given above. It will instruct trustees in bankruptcy, and also give the Superintendent in Bankruptcy a chance to consider whether any kind of regulations or directives seem proper.

[36] In my view, the Attorney-General was right to appeal and to seek the court's guidance in the present case. The Rassells resisted the appeal, and (until partway through oral argument) advocated a proposition of law which has failed here. Under the circumstances, no costs will be payable to or for anyone in the Court of Appeal. I would not interfere with the costs in Queen's Bench.

[37] However, the formal order appealed from needs some adjustment, since it is expressed in terms of propositions of law rather than the disposition of this particular sale transaction (and its paragraphs are not numbered).

[38] As for propositions of law, I would let these reasons speak for themselves and not put them into the formal order. In the formal Queen's Bench order entered September 30, 1998, the first paragraph of recitals will stand. So will the third and last paragraph about costs, which I number 3. However, I would delete the middle paragraph (at the bottom of p. 47 of the appeal book), and in its place substitute the following:

1. IT WAS ORDERED that the appeal be allowed, and that the order of Registrar Waller entered the 8th day of January, 1998 be set aside.
2. AND IT WAS FURTHER ORDERED that the court do confirm the decision of the trustee in bankruptcy to sell the house and land in question to the bankrupts at the price proposed by the trustee in her two affidavits, filed.

[39] In all other respects, I would dismiss the appeal.

bankruptcy that will comprise property of the bankrupt's estate. Where provincial legislation exempts RRSPs from execution, the provincial legislation will apply. Where provincial legislation is silent regarding the treatment of RRSPs, they will be exempt subject to the clawback referred to above.

faillite sont saisissables et font partie de l'actif du failli. Là où la législation provinciale exempte les REER de la saisie, la législation provinciale s'appliquera. Là où la législation provinciale est silencieuse concernant le traitement des RREER, ils seront insaisissables sauf pour les contributions effectuées durant l'année précédant la faillite.

(2) For those amounts that are not exempt, the plan issuer (trust company, chartered bank, etc.) would, upon termination, hold the moneys in trust for the bankrupt and the Canada Revenue Agency with respect to withholding tax.

(2) L'établissement qui propose le régime (société de fiducie, banque à charte, etc.) garde l'argent en dépôt pour le failli et pour l'Agence du revenu du Canada en ce qui concerne les retenues d'impôt.

8. The trustee may realize only the residual trust funds received from the plan issuer in respect of the deregistration of an RRSP after income tax considerations. Therefore, only the amount received by the estate, net of tax liability, should be recorded in the Statement of Receipts and Disbursements for tariff purposes.

8. Le syndic ne peut percevoir que le résidu des fonds en fidéicommis après déduction d'impôt, suite à l'annulation du REER. Le syndic devra, pour fins de calcul du tarif, ne tenir compte que du montant net après impôt reçu par l'actif et insurire ce montant dans l'état des recettes et des débours.

Other Trust Claims

Autres réclamations sur des biens détenus en fidéicommis

9. With respect to trust claims of the Crown or others, when the trustee receives funds from the sale of assets that are subsequently determined to be trust moneys, these proceeds do not represent receipts in the estate. The trustee would hold these funds in trust for the eventual trust beneficiary subject to the Directive concerning administrative agreements with trustees and receivers.

9. Lorsque le syndic reçoit des fonds qui découlent de la vente de biens qui sont par la suite considérés comme des sommes en fiducie, ces fonds ne constituent pas des recettes de l'actif. Le syndic gardera ces fonds en dépôt pour l'éventuel bénéficiaire des sommes ainsi déposées en fiducie sous réserve de l'instruction qui traite de l'entente administrative avec les syndics et les séquestres.

10. The receipts and disbursements relating to a trust claim should be disclosed by way of a footnote or otherwise on the Statement of Receipts and Disbursements.

10. Toutefois, les recettes et les débours devraient être divulgués au moyen d'une annotation ou autrement à l'état des recettes et des débours.

Real Property or Immovables

11. In the case of real property or immovables, if there is expected material equity for the estate, the associated legal problems on the disposition of real property or immovables may warrant that any summary administration estate containing equity in real property or immovables should be converted to an ordinary administration.

Immeubles ou biens réels

11. Pour les immeubles ou biens réels, si l'on prévoit une valeur résiduelle appréciable de l'actif, les problèmes juridiques associés à la vente desdits immeubles ou biens réels peuvent justifier que toute administration sommaire comprenant une valeur résiduelle relativement à des immeubles ou biens réels soit convertie en administration ordinaire.

12. With respect to situations where it is apparent that the estate has no or minimal equity in the real property or immovables of the bankrupt, all legal costs with respect to the preparation of the quit claim documentation should be borne by the purchaser, who is the eventual beneficiary of the real estate.

12. Dans les situations où il est évident que l'actif constitué d'immeubles ou biens réels aura peu ou pas de valeur résiduelle, tous les frais juridiques concernant l'établissement des documents de l'avis de renonciation devraient être payés par l'acquéreur qui est l'éventuel bénéficiaire des biens immobiliers.

Reimbursement of Costs by a Secured Creditor

13. If the trustee is reimbursed by a secured creditor for costs incurred for the safekeeping of encumbered assets for which the estate has no interest, these receipts can be offset against the actual costs involved.

Remboursement de frais par un créancier garanti

13. Lorsque le syndic est remboursé par un créancier garanti pour les frais encourus pour la garde de biens nantis pour lesquels l'actif n'a aucun intérêt, le syndic peut faire compensation entre les coûts réels et le remboursement.

Please take note that Circular No. 2R has been revised. The "Application" section in paragraph 5 of Circular No. 2R ought to have been deleted when the Circular was updated and issued on August 14, 2009. Paragraph 5 was a carry over from the previous round of reform in 1997. This was inadvertently overlooked.

Coming into force

The Coming into Force provision at section 11 of the Circular No 2R2 applies and effectively replaces the wording of paragraph 5 in Circular No. 2R which ought to have been deleted.

Veuillez noter que la circulaire n° 2R a été révisée. Le paragraphe 5, à la section « Application », aurait dû être supprimé lorsque la circulaire a été mise à jour et publiée le 14 août 2009. Contexte

1. En vertu du paragraphe 49(6) de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, lorsque le failli n'est pas une personne morale et que, de l'avis du séquestre officiel, ses avoirs réalisables, déduction faite des réclamations des créanciers garantis, ne dépassent pas 15 000 $, les dispositions des articles 155, 156, 156.1 et 157 de la Loi relatives à l'administration sommaire s'appliquent, à moins que le séquestre officiel n'ordonne le contraire.

> 49. (8) Le séquestre officiel peut ordonner que le paragraphe (6) cesse de s'appliquer au failli s'il détermine que les avoirs réalisables de celui-ci, déduction faite des réclamations des créanciers garantis, dépassent cinq mille dollars ou le montant prescrit, ou que (...) et s'il estime pareille mesure indiquée.

2. The trustee's fees and disbursement in a summary administration are calculated according to Rule 128 (1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules.

2. Les honoraires et les débours du syndic en cas d'administration sommaire sont calculés selon la règle 128 (1) des Règles générales sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité.

Rule 128(1): The fees of the trustee for services performed in a summary administration are calculated on the total receipts remaining after deducting necessary disbursements relating directly to the realization of the property of the bankrupt, and the payments to secured creditors, according to the following percentages:

Règle 128 (1) Les honoraires du syndic pour les services fournis dans le cas d'une administration sommaire sont calculés sur le total des recettes après déduction, d'une part, des débours nécessaires directement liés à la réalisation des biens du failli et, d'autre part, des paiements aux créanciers garantis, selon les pourcentages suivants :

(a) 100 percent on the first $975 or less of receipts; known as "converting" or "changing the status of" an estate from summary administration to ordinary administration.

Purpose

4. This policy establishes the procedure that the official receiver will apply in those cases where the realizable assets in a summary administration exceed $15,000.

Conversion from Summary to Ordinary Where Realizable Assets Exceed $15,000

5. Subject to paragraph 6, the official receiver will convert summary administration estates to ordinary administration estates if the realizable assets exceed $15,000.

6. If a trustee opts to limit his or her fees to the amount calculated on total receipts no greater than $15,000, the summary administration provisions may continue to apply. For greater certainty, the fees of the trustee will be calculated on the total receipts remaining after deducting necessary disbursements relating directly to the realization of the property of the bankrupt and payments to secured creditors, to a maximum of $15,000.

Example 1:

The total receipts are $20,000. After deducting necessary disbursements relating directly to the realization of the property of the bankrupt of $3,000, total net receipts are $17,000. There are no payments to secured creditors. The trustee opts to limit his or her fees to the

Objet

Changement de statut d'administration sommaire à ordinaire lorsque les avoirs réalisables dépassent 15 000 $

5. Sous réserve du paragraphe 6, le séquestre officiel changera le statut d'administration sommaire à ordinaire si les avoirs réalisables dépassent 15 000 $.

6. Lorsqu'un syndic choisit de limiter ses honoraires au montant calculé sur le total des recettes ne dépassant pas 15 000 $, les dispositions relatives à l'administration sommaire peuvent continuer de s'appliquer. Il est entendu que les honoraires du syndic seront calculés sur le total des recettes après déduction, d'une part, des débours nécessaires directement liés à la réalisation des biens du failli et, d'autre part, des paiements aux créanciers garantis, pour un maximum de 15 000 $.

Exemple 1 :

Le total des recettes est de 20 000 $. Après déduction des débours nécessaires directement liés à la réalisation des biens du failli de 3 000 $, le total des recettes nettes est de 17 000 $. Il n'y a pas de paiements aux créanciers garantis. Le syndic choisit de

9. In the event that there has been no inspector appointment prior to the conversion, it is suggested that the trustee thereupon proceed pursuant to either section 102 or 118 of the Act, as the circumstances allow.

9. Dans l'éventualité où il n'y a pas eu d'inspecteurs nommés préalablement à la conversion, il est suggéré que le syndic procède conformément à l'article 102 ou 118 de la Loi, selon le cas.

10. Il est recommandé que le syndic ajoute une note explicative à l'état définitif des recettes et débours indiquant que le syndic a choisi de limiter ses honoraires tel que stipulé au paragraphe 6.

Vous êtes par les présentes informés des devoirs qui vous sont imposés par la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité et de certaines autres particularités de ladite Loi qui vous touchent à titre de failli (ou, lorsque le failli est une compagnie à responsabilité limitée, à titre de fonctionnaire désigné aux termes de l'article 159 de la Loi). Vous devrez étudier attentivement le présent document, étant donné qu'un manquement aux devoirs indiqués ci-après vous rendra passible de poursuites pénales.

a) les biens détenus par le failli en fiducie pour toute autre personne;

(i) soit sont des sommes soustraites à l'application de la présente loi,

(ii) soit sont des sommes qui lui sont dues et qui sont saisissables en vertu d'un bref de saisie-arrêt signifié à Sa Majesté en application de la Loi d'aide à l'exécution des ordonnances et des ententes familiales dans lequel il est nommé comme débiteur;

d) les pouvoirs sur des biens ou à leur égard, qui auraient pu être exercés par le failli pour son propre bénéfice.

(2) Sous réserve du paragraphe (3) et par dérogation à toute disposition législative fédérale ou provinciale ayant pour effet d'assimiler certains biens à des biens détenus en fiducie pour Sa Majesté, aucun des biens du failli ne peut, pour l'application de l'alinéa (1)a), être considéré comme détenu en fiducie pour Sa Majesté si, en l'absence de la disposition législative en question, il ne le serait pas.

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne s'applique pas à l'égard des montants réputés détenus en fiducie aux termes des paragraphes 227(4) ou (4.1) de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, des paragraphes 23(3) ou (4) du Régime de pensions du Canada ou des paragraphes 86(2) ou (2.1) de la Loi sur l'assurance-emploi (chacun étant appelé « disposition fédérale » au présent paragraphe) ou à l'égard des montants réputés détenus en fiducie aux termes de toute loi d'une province créant une fiducie présumée dans le seul but d'assurer à Sa Majesté du chef de cette province la remise de sommes déduites ou retenues aux termes d'une loi de cette province, dans la mesure où, dans ce dernier cas, se réalise l'une des conditions suivantes :

a) la loi de cette province prévoit un impôt semblable, de par sa nature, à celui prévu par la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, et les sommes déduites ou retenues aux termes de la loi de cette province sont de même nature que celles visées aux paragraphes 227(4) ou (4.1) de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu;

Supreme Court of Canada
A.H. Boulton Co. Ltd. v. Trusts & Guarantee Co. Ltd., [1942] S.C.R. 130
Date: 1942-03-03

In the Matter of the Bankruptcy of George Bozanich.
The A.H. Boulton Company Limited (Defendant) Appellant;
and
The Trusts and Guarantee Company Limited (Plaintiff) Respondent.
1941: November 14; 1942: March 3.
Present: Duff C.J. and Rinfret, Crocket, Davis and Kerwin JJ.
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO.

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 11, ss. 60, 61, 62, 64—"Settlement" within meaning of ss. 60, 62 (3)—Chattel mortage to creditor for debt incurred in store business—Constitutional law—Ontario legislation as to preferences superseded by s. 64 of Bankruptcy Act—B.N.A. Act, s. 91.

On April 5, 1939, B. gave to appellant a chattel mortgage on certain chattels in B.'s store to secure payment of indebtedness to appellant incurred by B. in the course of business. On October 21, 1939, B. made an authorized assignment in bankruptcy. Respondent, the trustee in bankruptcy, attacked the validity, as against it, of the security of the chattel mortgage.

Held (reversing judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, [1941] O.R. 21): The chattel mortgage was not a "settlement" within the meaning of ss. 60 and 62 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1927, c. 11, and is valid and effectual as against respondent.

The enactment in s. 62 (3) that, for the purpose of ss. 60, 61 and 62, "settlement" "shall include any conveyance or transfer of property" does not so extend the ordinary meaning of the word "settlement" as to bring within its scope all conveyances or transfers of property.

Per the Chief Justice and Davis and Kerwin JJ.: In enacting said sections Parliament adopted in substance provisions in the English Act which had been the subject of discussion and decision in the English courts, and it is proper to assume that Parliament intended to adopt those provisions as construed by the English courts and applied in the administration of the bankruptcy law in England; and the settled law in England had been that, although in the form of definition the words now in said s. 62 (3) purport to enlarge the meaning of the term "settlement", they must, by reason of the context, be restricted in their scope. Broadly speaking, the settled principle in England was that those words had not the effect of bringing within the scope of the term "settlement", as used in provisions corresponding to said ss. 60, 61 and 62, transactions which have none of the essential elements of a "settlement" as that term is commonly understood. Reading said ss. 60, 61 and 62 together with s. 64 (as to preference given to a creditor) and considering these enactments in the light of the history of the law in relation to preferences, it must be held that such a transaction as that in question does not fall within the intendment of "settlement" as employed in said sections; it belongs to the class of transactions the validity of which is to be determined by the application of s. 64.

The provisions of the Ontario Act, R.S.O. 1927, c. 162, in relation to preferences are superseded by s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, and the authority of the Ontario Legislature to enact such legislation is, in consequence of the enactment of said s. 64, suspended in virtue of the concluding paragraph of s. 91 of the B.N.A. Act.

Per Rinfret and Crocket JJ.: Said ss. 60 and 62 are directed against a "settlement of property", and it is apparent that in using the word "settlement" Parliament intended to connote a particular kind of gift or grant, excluding other kinds. Secs. 60 and 62 were adoption of provisions in the English Act, and the construction of the word had been settled in England and had there acquired an established meaning. A settlement in the ordinary sense of the word is intended; the transaction must be in the nature of a settlement, though it may be effected by a conveyance or transfer (In re Player, Ex parte Harvey, 15 Q.B.D. 682, at 686-7, and other cases, cited). The words "conveyance or transfer" in s. 62 (3) must be qualified by the word "settlement" in s. 60, and it is only such a conveyance or transfer as comes within the meaning of

"settlement" in s. 60 that is by s. 60 declared void. The transaction in question had not any of the necessary elements of a settlement. (Doubt expressed whether an arrangement with a creditor may ever be considered a "settlement"; and inclination expressed to the opinion that, generally speaking, "settlement" involves the idea of a clear gift or that type of cases where provision is made for a trust of some sort. It should not be taken to include an ordinary business transaction between a debtor and a creditor.)

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[1].

On April 5, 1939, one Bozanich (hereinafter called the debtor) executed and delivered to appellant a chattel mortgage on certain chattels in the debtor's store to secure payment of indebtedness to appellant incurred by the debtor in the course of business. On October 21, 1939, the debtor made an authorized assignment in bankruptcy. Respondent, the trustee in bankruptcy, attacked the validity, as against it, of the security of the chattel mortgage.

By an order in the Supreme Court of Ontario in Bankruptcy, Urquhart J. directed the trial of an issue in the County Court of the County of Essex before His Honour J.J. Coughlin, Esquire, Senior Judge of the said Court, in which the trustee in bankruptcy should be plaintiff and the present appellant (in said order called the creditor) should be defendant. The following question was ordered to be tried on the said issue:

> Is the chattel mortgage made by the said debtor to the said creditor on the 5th day of April, 1939, for the sum of $900 valid and effectual as against the said trustee and does the said creditor, by virtue of the said chattel mortgage, hold a valid security on the goods and chattels described in the said chattel mortgage?

(The question of the validity of a certain lien note, attacked by the trustee, was also ordered to be tried on said issue. This question was decided by the County Court Judge against the present appellant and no appeal was taken from this decision.)

The County Court Judge found that the chattel mortgage was valid and effectual as against the plaintiff and that the defendant by virtue of it held a valid security on the chattels described therein. He held that the transaction was not a "settlement" in the sense in which that word is used in s. 60 of the Bankruptcy Act.

On appeal by the plaintiff, Urquhart J.[2], feeling himself bound to follow the decision in Re Trenwith[3] (but intimating that, if not so bound, he would have held otherwise), held that the transaction in question was a "settlement"; but he directed a new trial before the County Court Judge on the question whether the chattel mortgage was made in favour of the incumbrancer "in good faith and for valuable consideration" within s. 60 (3) (b) of the Bankruptcy Act.

The decision of Urquhart J. was affirmed by the Court of Appeal for Ontario[4], Henderson J.A. dissenting, who would have restored the judgment of the County Court Judge.

The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada (special leave to do so was granted by a Judge of this Court).

Paul Martin K.C. for the appellant.

Lorne R. Cumming for the respondent.

The judgment of the Chief Justice and Davis and Kerwin JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—The material facts are stated in the respondent's factum, as follows:—

> The debtor, George Bozanich, operated a small retail grocery and meat market in the City of Windsor, under the name and style of "Goodwill Market" from January, 1936, until July, 1939, when he discontinued business. On October 21st, 1939, he made an authorized assignment under the Bankruptcy Act. The appellant company is a wholesale grocery firm with which the debtor had substantial dealings from the commencement of the business until April, 1939.
> On April 5th, 1939, the debtor executed a chattel mortgage in favour of the appellant to secure the sum of $900, the amount of a long past due indebtedness owing by the debtor to the appellant company. The chattel mortgage covered most of the debtor's store fixtures other than his cash register and it is alleged that the said fixtures at the time of the chattel mortgage and also at the time of the subsequent assignment constituted by far the greater part of the debtor's realizable assets.
> At the same time the appellant also took from the debtor a so-called lien note on the cash register as security for the sum of $361.45.
> Upon bankruptcy occurring the appellant claimed to be a secured creditor by virtue of both the chattel mortgage and the lien note, and the respondent, the trustee in bankruptcy, attacked the validity of both securities in a motion instituted in the Supreme Court of Ontario (in Bankruptcy) heard before the Honourable Mr. Justice Urquhart on April 1st, 1940.
> The learned Bankruptcy Judge directed the trial of an issue before the Senior Judge of the County Court of the County of Essex to determine the validity of the questioned securities. The trustee was made plaintiff in the issue and the present appellant was made defendant and the trial Judge was directed to find as to the validity of the chattel mortgage and the lien note and to find for or against the right of the appellant company to rank as a secured creditor under either or both of the said documents.

Digitized by Google

On the trial of this issue the lien note was set aside and there has been no appeal from this decision. The County Court Judge, however, reported that the chattel mortgage was valid and effectual as against the trustee in bankruptcy and that it did not constitute a "settlement" within the meaning of Section 60 of the Bankruptcy Act.

An appeal was taken by the trustee in bankruptcy from the finding of the trial Judge with respect to the chattel mortgage and on this appeal the Honourable Mr. Justice Urquhart held that the chattel mortgage did constitute a "settlement" under the provisions of the said section of the Bankruptcy Act and ordered a new trial before the County Court Judge on this basis, directing also that both parties might adduce further evidence.

The trial Judge having failed to make any finding as to good faith and valuable consideration within the meaning of Section 60, subsection 3 (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, and the learned Bankruptcy Judge finding himself unable to determine this question on appeal, the new trial was directed for the purpose of deciding this question and it was directed that the onus of establishing good faith and valuable consideration would be on the creditor, the present appellant.

From the decision of the Bankruptcy Judge an appeal was taken by the present appellant to the Court of Appeal for the Province of Ontario on the ground that the finding that the chattel mortgage was a "settlement" was erroneous, and that in any event the decision of the trial judge amounted to a finding of good faith and valuable consideration.

The trustee cross-appealed from the portion of the judgment of the Bankruptcy Judge directing a new trial on the ground that the onus being on the creditor to establish good faith and valuable consideration, the failure of the trial judge to find affirmatively in favour of the creditor on these points was sufficient to entitle the trustee to the relief sought.

The appeal and cross-appeal came on for hearing on December 9th, 1940, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Riddell, Acting Chief Justice, the Honourable Mr. Justice Henderson and the Honourable Mr. Justice Gillanders. On December 21st, 1940, the majority of the Court delivered judgment dismissing the appeal and the cross-appeal and confirming the decision of the Bankruptcy Judge that the chattel mortgage was a "settlement" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, Section 60, and also the directions of the Bankruptcy Judge for a new trial. The Honourable Mr. Justice Henderson dissented from this judgment and would have allowed the appeal and restored the report of the trial judge on the ground that the transaction was not a "settlement".

The question raised by the appeal concerns the interpretation of sections 60 to 62 inclusive and section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, which are under the caption "Settlements and Preferences". Sections 60, 61 and 62 were enacted in 1919 and section 64 in the following year. These were, in substance, re-enactments of sections 42 and 44 of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

The controversy turns upon the effect of section 62, subsection 3, which is in these words:—

> For the purpose of this section and sections sixty and sixty-one "settlement" shall include any conveyance or transfer of property.

It is contended that by force of this section the ordinary meaning of "settlement" is extended in such a manner as to bring within its scope any conveyance or transfer of property. The corresponding provision in the English Bankruptcy Act, which was found in the Act of 1869, was the subject of discussion and decision before the enactment of the Canadian Bankruptcy Act of 1919; and it may, I think, properly be said that in 1919 when these provisions were adopted by Parliament it was the settled law in England that, although in the form of definition these words purport to enlarge the meaning of the term "settlement", they must, by reason of the context, be restricted in their scope. Broadly speaking, the settled principle in England is that this clause has not the effect of bringing within the scope of the term "settlement", as used in the sections corresponding to sections 60, 61 and 62 of our Act, transactions which have none of the essential elements of a "settlement", as that term is commonly understood.

In the treatise on Bankruptcy and Insolvency in the 2nd edit. of Halsbury by Lord Justice Luxmoore, it is stated that the term "settlement" "implies an intention that the property shall be retained or preserved for the benefit of the donee in such a form that it can be traced". This construction was well settled in the year 1919 when the relative provisions of the English statute were enacted as part of the bankruptcy law of this country. It is proper to assume that it was the statute as it had been construed by the English courts and applied in the administration of bankruptcy law in England that Parliament intended to adopt.

I pass now to section 64 which deals with transactions between an insolvent person and his creditor. The history of the law relating to such transactions is familiar. At common law there is nothing to prevent a debtor preferring one creditor to another. The Statute, 13 Elizabeth, Chap. 5, did not prohibit such transactions. This common law privilege is obviously opposed to the fundamental principle of bankruptcy law—the equitable distribution of assets among all entitled to share; and the law of fraudulent preference was originally developed by the courts on the basis of the principles of the Bankruptcy Acts. The principle of section 64 was first formulated by statute in section 92 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. In Canada in most of the provinces there were, prior to the Bankruptcy Act, statutory enactments making voidable transfers of property by an insolvent made with the intention of giving a particular creditor an "unjust preference".

When sections 60, 61 and 62 of the Bankruptcy Act are read together with section 64 and these enactments are considered in light of the history of the law in relation to preferences, I find it impossible to convince myself that such a transaction as that with which we are now concerned falls within the intendment of "settlement", as employed in those sections. It belongs, I think, to the class of transactions, the validity of which is to be determined by the application of section 64.

I may add that, in my opinion, the provisions of R.S.O. 1927, Chap. 162, in relation to preferences are superseded by section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that the authority of the Ontario Legislature to enact such legislation is, in consequence of the enactment of section 64, suspended in virtue of the concluding paragraph of section 91.

The appeal should be allowed and the report of His Honour, Judge Coughlin, restored, with costs throughout.

The judgment of Rinfret and Crocket JJ. was delivered by RINFRET J.—This case is a bankruptcy matter.

An order was made by the Supreme Court of Ontario in Bankruptcy that the parties proceed to the trial of the following issue:

Is the chattel mortgage made by the bankrupt debtor to his creditor (the appellant), on the fifth day of April, 1939, for the sum of $900, valid and effectual as against the trustee in bankruptcy (the respondent); and does the said creditor, by virtue of the said mortgage, hold a valid security on the goods and chattels described in the said chattel mortgage?

Another matter (in respect of a lien note) was also made the subject of the issue; but it has been disposed of in the bankruptcy court, and there is no appeal as to it.

The chattel mortgage was given by the debtor to the appellant on the 5th of April, 1939. The bankruptcy occurred on the 21st of October, 1939.

Section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act provides that:

> Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, * * * by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor * * * with a view of giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors shall, if the person * * * is adjudged bankrupt on a bankruptcy petition presented within three months after the date of making * * * the same, * * * be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy * * *
> 2. If any such conveyance, transfer, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, * * * it shall be presumed prima facie to have been made * * * with such view as aforesaid whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be receivable or avail to support such transaction.

In this case, the chattel mortgage was given almost seven months before the date of the bankruptcy, and it does not come within that section.

There are, however, other sections of the Bankruptcy Act on which the respondent relies:

> 60. Any settlement of property made after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt or makes an authorized assignment within one year after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee.
> 2. Any such settlement shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt or makes an assignment as aforesaid at any subsequent time within five years after the date of the settlement, be void against such trustee, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof.
> 3. This section shall not extend to any settlement made
> (b) in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration.
> 62. (3) For the purpose of this section and sections sixty and sixty-one "settlement" shall include any conveyance or transfer of property.

The question is whether the chattel mortgage comes under those parts of sections 60 and 62 above reproduced.

His Honour the County Judge of the County of Essex determined that the chattel mortgage in question was valid. The trustee appealed to the Supreme Court in Bankruptcy, where Urquhart J., although holding the same view as the County Judge, felt bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Re Trenwith[5] and said:

Digitized by Google

> I cannot, in view of the very clear words of the Court of Appeal, see how I can distinguish the Trenwith case[5], although I realize that the circumstances there approach more nearly a settlement than the purely commercial transaction which occurred in the case at bar. I therefore feel bound to follow it.

He thought, however, that the question might come within the exception contained in subsection 3 (b) of section 60 "in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration"; and, for that reason, he directed a new trial and that the matter might "be remitted to the County Court Judge for reconsideration on the evidence as adduced and extended and such further evidence as either the parties or the Judge may desire", so that the appellant may be able "to establish the question of good faith and valuable consideration".

In the Court of Appeal, this judgment was affirmed, Henderson, J.A., dissenting on the ground that the case could be distinguished from Re Trenwith[6].

As will have appeared, the case is simple, but by no means an easy one.

If one confines himself to the literal meaning of the material portions of ss. 60 and 62, which have to be construed, what is first to be noted is that the agreement against which these sections are directed is the agreement known as a "settlement of property". The word "settlement" is the one exclusively used in subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 60.

Whether, therefore, "settlement" is or not a technical expression, it is apparent that, in the mind of the legislator, the use of the word "settlement" was intended to connote a particular kind of gift or grant excluding the others. Both sections 60 and 62, since over a quarter of a century, had been in the English Act in similar language; and the Canadian Bankruptcy Act borrowed them from the English statute. The construction of the word had been settled in England for some appreciable time and it had there acquired an established meaning.

It need not be stated that all conveyances or transfers of property are not settlements; nor can it be said that a settlement is a settlement because it happens to be a conveyance or a transfer.

Without attempting to give a definition of the word—and more particularly of that word as used in section 60—it seems to me sufficient for the purpose of interpreting the section to adopt a passage of Cave J., in the case of In re Player; Ex parte Harvey[7]:

> One must look at the whole of the language of the section in applying that definition, and consider what is meant by "settlement". Although "settlement", by the 3rd subsection, "shall for the purposes of this section include any conveyance or transfer of property", yet I think the view of my brother Mathew is well founded, and that a settlement in the ordinary sense of the word is intended. The transaction must be in the nature of a settlement, though it may be effected by a conveyance or transfer. The end and purpose of the thing must be a settlement, that is, a disposition of property to be held for the enjoyment of some other person.

This view was concurred in by Mathew and Wills JJ.

In the Player case[8], a gift of money to a son, made for the purpose ofling him to commence business on his own account, was held not to be a "settlement of property" within the meaning of the section of the English Bankruptcy Act which renders such settlements void in certain specified cases as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the settlor.

In the case of In re Vansittart; Ex parte Brown[9], upon an application under the section in the English Act (again, it should be noted, expressed in identical language with sections 60 and 62 (3) of the Canadian Act) to avoid a gift of valuable jewelry by the bankrupt, it appeared that such jewelry had been given by him as a present to his wife within two years of his bankruptcy. It was held that, to bring a transfer of personal property within the section, it must be manifest, from the nature and circumstances of the case, that it was the object of the transferor that the subject-matter of the transfer should permanently remain the property of the transferee; and, in the premises, it must be taken that the bankrupt contemplated the retention by his wife of the present which he had given her. In that case, Vaughan Williams J. approved the construction of Cave J. in the Player case[8]; and, applying it to the facts in the case then before him, he found that the donor contemplated the retention by his wife of the present which he gave her, and accordingly held the gift void against the trustee in bankruptcy.

Again, the Court of Appeal, in the case of In re Plummer[10]—Lord Alverstone, M.R., Rigby and Collins, LL.JJ.—approved of the principle stated in In re Vansittart[9] and In re Player[8] and held that the mere fact that some business had been acquired by the son partly by means of money obtained from or paid by the father was not sufficient to make the transaction a "settlement" within the section. "Settlement", in the English Bankruptcy Act, was held to mean such a conveyance or transfer by the donor as contemplates the retention of the property by the donee, either in its original form or in such a form that it can be traced, and does not extend to a conveyance or transfer of property which cannot be traced, as, for instance, where there is a gift of money to be employed in a business or in the purchase of a business and the money is so employed or spent, the business itself not being settled.

In his judgment, Rigby, L.J., referred to what Cave, J., had said (as above reproduced) in the Player case[11] and observed:

> I do not think that that judgment has been impeached by any of the later authorities that have been referred to.

Collins, L.J., expressing the same view, said:

It is impossible, in my opinion, to treat such a transaction as the subject-matter of a "settlement" within the section. It seems that the word "settlement" used in the Bankruptcy Act does not embrace the set of circumstances constituting the facts of the case at bar. I doubt whether an arrangement with a creditor may ever be considered a settlement; and I would incline to the opinion that, generally speaking, "settlement" involves the idea of a clear gift, or that type of cases where provision is made for a trust of some sort. It should not be taken to include an ordinary business transaction between a debtor and a creditor.

The transaction in the case at bar was one to secure a past and future indebtedness. The chattel mortgage in question was given in the course of an ordinary commercial transaction. The mortgagor settled nothing on the mortgagee.

Subsection 3 of section 62 provides that "settlement" shall include any conveyance or transfer of property; but the section which declares the transaction void against the trustee is section 60. That section uses the word "settlement". It follows that "conveyance or transfer", in section 62 (3) must be qualified by the word "settlement" in section 60. The mere fact that the transaction is said to include any conveyance or transfer does not make the transaction a settlement. The transactions which are declared void under section 60 are such conveyances and transfers as come within the meaning of the word in section 60.

As pointed out by Henderson, J.A., the necessary elements of a settlement were found in the Trenwith case[12]; but they are not to be found in the case now under review, where the transaction does not include any of the elements which one must find present in a settlement.

The Act, as broad as it is, allows of a clear distinction between settlements though effected by a conveyance or transfer of property and conveyances or transfers of property not in the nature of a settlement.

In the circumstances of the present case, I think the appeal ought to be allowed and the decision of the County Court Judge restored with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed with costs.

on appeal from the court of appeal for saskatchewan

Bankruptcy -- Settlement of funds -- RRSP transferred in good faith to RRIF (insurance annuity) for benefit of third party -- Settlements made up to five years prior to bankruptcy void against trustee in bankruptcy if interest of settlor in property did not pass on settlement -- RRIFs normally exempt from claims of bankrupt's creditors -- Bankruptcy declared within five years of transfer -- Whether transfer to RRIF a settlement -- If so, whether or not settlement void against trustee in bankruptcy -- If so, whether or not funds in RRIF available to satisfy claims of creditors notwithstanding exempt status of RRIF -- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, ss. 67, 91 -- The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. S-26, ss. 2(kk), 158.

In June 1990, respondent Ramgotra transferred the funds from his RRSPs into a RRIF managed by respondent insurance company. His wife was designated beneficiary under the RRIF and payments began that August. Circumstances related to relocation of respondent's medical practice led him to make an assignment into bankruptcy in February 1992. On his absolute discharge from bankruptcy in January 1993, his only assets were his clothing and household contents, and the RRIF. While the RRSPs would have been subject to his creditors' claims, the RRIF constituted a life insurance annuity and was therefore exempt from their claims on the basis of s. 67(1)(b) (property divisible among creditors on bankruptcy does not include property exempt from seizure under provincial law) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), when read in conjunction with ss. 2(kk)(vii) (life insurance includes annuities) and 158(2) (life insurance money and contract is exempt from seisure where a spouse is designated beneficiary) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act. The trustee in bankruptcy applied for a declaration that the transfer of the RRSP funds into the RRIF was void, pursuant to s. 91(2) of the BIA, which declares, in part, that "settlements" made one to five years prior to bankruptcy are void against the trustee if "the interest of the settlor in the property did not pass" upon settlement. The trustee's application was dismissed at trial because the transfer of the RRSP funds into the RRIF had been made in good faith and not for the purpose of defeating the claims of his creditors. Appellant's appeal to the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal was dismissed. The issues here were: (1) whether the transaction was a settlement within the meaning of s. 91 BIA; (2) if so, whether the settlement was void against the trustee in bankruptcy under the second branch of s. 91(2); and, (3) if so, whether the funds in the RRIF were available to satisfy the claims of the creditors despite the RRIF's exempt status under s. 67(1)(b).

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

When respondent Ramgotra transferred the funds from his two RRSPs into an RRIF designating his wife as beneficiary, the funds became exempt from execution or seizure by reason of s. 67(1)(b) BIA, when read in conjunction with ss. 2(kk)(vii) and 158(2) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act. Even if the beneficiary designation was a settlement within s. 91 BIA, and was void against the trustee in bankruptcy pursuant to the second branch of s. 91(2), the RRIF remained exempt from the claims of respondent Ramgotra's creditors and, in particular, the appellant.

Jurisprudential consensus has emerged that the designation of a beneficiary under a life insurance policy constitutes a s. 91 settlement. Respondent Ramgotra effected a settlement triggering s. 91.

Sections 67(1)(b) and 91 BIA are not in conflict. The two provisions can be reconciled by giving effect to their distinct terms, and by recognizing their distinct roles in bankruptcy. Section 91 dictates that certain settled property will fall back into the estate of the bankrupt in the possession of the trustee, while s. 67 is directed at the exercise of administrative powers over the estate by the trustee. Where a settlement is void against the trustee under s. 91, then in normal circumstances, the trustee is empowered to administer the settled asset and use it to satisfy the claims of creditors. However, in the special case where the asset is exempt under s. 67(1)(b), then the trustee is prohibited from exercising his or her distribution powers because the asset is not subject to division among creditors.

Respondent Ramgotra's property interest in the RRIF passed to and vested in the trustee in bankruptcy by operation of s. 71(2) BIA. The future contingent interest of the designated beneficiary under the RRIF was not captured by s. 71(2), since it had been settled on the designated beneficiary prior to bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy could apply to have this settlement set aside under s. 91(2) BIA.

The effect of s. 91 is to render certain settlements void against the trustee in bankruptcy. A life insurance policy, however, is rendered exempt under s. 67(1)(b) by the designation of a beneficiary and this status continues so long as the designation is "in effect" according to s. 158(2) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act. The fact that a beneficiary designation is void against the trustee under federal legislation does not necessarily result in its no longer having effect vis-à-vis the claims of creditors under the provincial legislation which s. 67(1)(b) incorporates.

It was not necessary to decide whether respondent Ramgotra effected a void settlement under the second branch of s. 91(2) when he designated his wife as beneficiary of his RRIF. Even if the settlement were void against the trustee in bankruptcy, that would not allow the trustee to use the funds in the RRIF to satisfy the claims of creditors such as the appellant bank. The RRIF is an exempt asset pursuant to the provincial legislation incorporated into s. 67(1)(b): it is not property which is divisible among creditors. Given this, even if Mrs. Ramgotra's future contingent interest in the RRIF had passed into the possession of the trustee through the application of s. 91(2), the RRIF was property "incapable of realization" by the trustee pursuant to s. 40(1) BIA. Therefore, the trustee was obliged to return it to respondent Ramgotra prior to applying for his discharge. Regardless of whether or not respondent Ramgotra's settlement was void against the trustee, the exempt status of the RRIF is an absolute bar to the appellant's claim.

Whether a settlor has acted in good faith or for the purpose of defeating creditors is not relevant to the question of whether a settlement has been made within s. 91. In contrast, however, a settlor's intention is highly relevant where a settlement is being challenged under provincial fraud legislation. It was not necessary to determine if a life insurance beneficiary designation can be set aside as a fraudulent conveyance of property. The provincial fraud provisions are clearly remedial in nature and should be given the fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation that best ensures the attainment of their objects. There is a strong case for concluding that a life insurance beneficiary designation is both a "juridical act" and a "disposition" or "conveyance" of "property".

The Statute of Elizabeth, assuming without deciding that it remains in force, would allow creditors to challenge fraudulent conveyances, including life insurance beneficiary designations, without having to prove that, at the time of the conveyance, the debtor was insolvent, was unable to pay his or her debts in full, or knew that he or she was on the eve of insolvency.

I. Issue

1 This case raises an important and controversial issue concerning the interpretation of ss. 67(1)(b) and 91 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, as amended (hereinafter "BIA"): Where a bankrupt has transferred registered retirement savings plan (RRSP) funds into a registered retirement income fund (RRIF) within the five years preceding bankruptcy, and where the RRIF is exempt from the claims of creditors under provincial legislation incorporated into the BIA by s. 67(1)(b), may a creditor set aside the transfer as a s. 91 "settlement", and thereby get at the RRIF despite its exempt status?

II. Factual Background

2 The respondent Ramgotra is a medical doctor who practised from 1971 to 1991 in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. During this period, as a self-employed doctor responsible for his own retirement planning, he built up savings and investments, including two RRSPs. In May 1989, he became an associate at a Saskatoon medical clinic, but his share of the clinic expenses proved higher than expected. As a result, in February 1990, he opened his own practice. Unfortunately, the practice was not as successful as Dr. Ramgotra had hoped, partly because of a slow patient load, but also because Dr. Ramgotra suffers from insulin dependent diabetes and was required to reduce his work hours in response to his medical condition.

3 In June 1990, at the suggestion of a financial adviser, Dr. Ramgotra transferred the funds from his two RRSPs into an RRIF under which his wife was designated as beneficiary. The RRIF was to provide Dr. Ramgotra with a gross monthly income of $1,066.20, and these payments commenced in August 1990. The respondent North American Life Assurance Company is the financial institution responsible for the management of the RRIF.

4 Ten months later, in May 1991, Dr. Ramgotra applied for and obtained a position as permanent physician with the Town of Dinsmore, Saskatchewan. He then attempted to negotiate with his landlord in Saskatoon in order to terminate the commercial lease for his practice there. These negotiations were unsuccessful, and the landlord obtained a judgment against Dr. Ramgotra for approximately $30,000. This event led Dr. Ramgotra to make an assignment into bankruptcy in February 1992. When he received an absolute discharge from bankruptcy in January 1993, the only assets which he retained were his clothing and household contents, and the RRIF.

5 While Dr. Ramgotra's RRSPs would have been subject to the claims of his creditors, the RRIF constituted a life insurance annuity, and was therefore exempt from their claims on the basis of s. 67(1)(b) BIA, when read in conjunction with ss. 2(kk)(vii) and 158(2) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. S-26. However, the trustee in bankruptcy applied under r. 89 of the Bankruptcy Rules, C.R.C. 1978, c. 368, for a declaration that the transfer of the RRSP funds into the RRIF was void, pursuant to s. 91(2) BIA. That provision declares, in part, that "settlements" made one to five years prior to bankruptcy are void against the trustee if "the interest of the settlor in the property did not pass" upon settlement.

6 At trial, the trustee's application was dismissed because Dr. Ramgotra's transfer of the RRSP funds into the RRIF had been made in good faith, and not for the purpose of defeating the claims of his creditors. An appeal to the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal by the appellant Royal Bank, Dr. Ramgotra's major creditor, was also dismissed.

III. Relevant Statutory Provisions

Saskatchewan Insurance Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. S-26:

2. — ...

(kk) "life insurance" means insurance whereby an insurer undertakes to pay insurance money:

(i) on death;

(ii) on the happening of an event or contingency dependent on human life;

(iii) at a fixed or determinable future time; or

(iv) for a term dependent on human life; and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, includes:

(vii) an undertaking given by an insurer, whether before or after this section comes into force, to provide an annuity or what would be an annuity except that the periodic payments may be unequal in amount;

158. — (1) Where a beneficiary is designated, the insurance money, from the time of the happening of the event upon which the insurance money becomes payable, is not part of the estate of the insured and is not subject to the claims of the creditors of the insured.

(2) While a designation in favour of a spouse, child, grandchild or parent of a person whose life is insured, or any of them, is in effect, the rights and interests of the insured in the insurance money and in the contract are exempt from execution or seizure.

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, as amended:

67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

...

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

91. (1) Any settlement of property, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within one year after the date of the settlement, is void against the trustee.

(2) Any settlement of property, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within five years after the date of the settlement, is void against the trustee if the trustee can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, unable to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement or that the interest of the settlor in the property did not pass on the execution thereof.

(3) This section does not extend to any settlement made

(b) in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration; ...

IV. Decisions Below

1. Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench reflex, (1993), 18 C.B.R. (3d) 1

7 In his reasons, Baynton J. made two factual findings: (1) Dr. Ramgotra was solvent at the time he transferred the RRSP funds into the RRIF, and (2) the transfer was made in good faith, and not for the purpose of defeating creditors. Because of the former factual finding, the first branch of s. 91(2) BIA could not be used by the trustee to void the transfer. However, the second branch of s. 91(2) was still available, and the issue was whether the transfer was a "settlement" in which the interest of the settlor in the property did not pass at the time of settlement.

8 Relying on recent case law establishing that the exchange of non-exempt property for exempt property (i.e., "self-settlement") could constitute a settlement under s. 91 BIA, Baynton J. reached the tentative conclusion that the transfer in the case at bar fell within the second branch of s. 91(2) because it was a settlement in which, by definition, the property interest of the settlor did not pass. He refused, however, to declare the settlement void against the trustee in bankruptcy. He referred to his previous decision in Royal Bank v. Oliver reflex, (1992), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 82 (Sask. Q.B.), where a similar settlement was at issue. In Oliver, he decided that a bona fide exchange of property should not be a voidable settlement under s. 91(2). He effectively "borrowed" the concept of good faith which appears in s. 91(3)(b) BIA (but is not applicable in the case of self-settlement), and used it to limit the common law definition of settlement.

9 Since Dr. Ramgotra had acted in good faith, and not for the purpose of defeating creditors, when he transferred his non-exempt RRSP funds into an exempt RRIF, Baynton J. concluded that the transfer was not a settlement which could be set aside under s. 91(2).

2. Saskatchewan Court of Appeal 1994 CanLII 4696 (SK CA), (1994), 26 C.B.R. (3d) 1

10 The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal unanimously dismissed the appellant's appeal. For the court, Jackson J.A. rejected the submission (which had been accepted by Baynton J.) that a settlement had been effected by the transfer of the non-exempt RRSP funds into the exempt RRIF. In her view, settlement within the meaning of the BIA involved settlement on a third party; the mere conversion of non-exempt property into exempt property was insufficient.

11 However, after a review of the jurisprudence on the meaning of settlement, Jackson J.A. concluded that the designation of a beneficiary under an insurance policy could constitute a settlement. Thus, when Dr. Ramgotra designated his wife as beneficiary under the RRIF, he settled a property interest on her. Jackson J.A. characterized this interest as a future contingent property interest.

12 Jackson J.A. then considered whether such a settlement could be declared void under the second branch of s. 91(2) concerning the passing of property. In her view, the essential issue was whether or not it was necessary to convey, or give up control over, all the interests in a particular piece of property in order for the property passing exception to be met. Jackson J.A. reviewed the case law on this issue, most of which concluded that a settlement in the form of an insurance beneficiary designation does not involve the passing of property because the settlor always maintains property interests in, and control over, the insurance after the designation. However, she preferred to rely on two early English cases, In re Lowndes; Ex parte Trustee (1887), 18 Q.B.D. 677, and Shrager v. March, [1908] A.C. 402 (P.C.), for the proposition that property passes if a settlor divests him- or herself of all interest in the property acquired by a third party beneficiary. Thus, the beneficiary designation in the case at bar passed a contingent property interest to Mrs. Ramgotra, and fully divested Dr. Ramgotra of that same property interest. Jackson J.A. held that this was sufficient to meet the property passing requirement of the second branch of s. 91(2), with the result that Dr. Ramgotra's designation of his wife as beneficiary under the RRIF was not void against his trustee in bankruptcy.

13 Jackson J.A.'s conclusion that the property passing requirement had been met was further reinforced by her view that any other conclusion would be contrary to bankruptcy policy and the purpose of RRIFs. She noted that if the designation of a beneficiary under an insurance policy were not found to pass property to the beneficiary, then all insurance beneficiary designations made within five years of bankruptcy would be void against the trustee in bankruptcy by operation of the second branch of s. 91(2), including those made in good faith when the bankrupt was solvent. Jackson J.A. was of the view that s. 91 BIA should be interpreted to avoid such an absurd result.

14 Finally, with respect to the bona fide test applied by the trial judge, Baynton J., Jackson J.A. stated that it was not necessary for her to adopt his position, but she nevertheless endorsed his analysis of the difficulties associated with any interpretation of s. 91 BIA which would automatically void legitimate transactions made by solvent debtors. Jackson J.A. agreed with Baynton J. that to attack a beneficiary designation made by a solvent debtor, a trustee in bankruptcy should have to prove some lack of good faith on the part of the debtor. However, she disagreed that the creation of a good faith requirement for self-settlement under s. 91 would be appropriate. Instead, she opined that trustees may rely on other legislation, such as provincial fraud legislation, to attack bad faith self-settlements.

V. Analysis

1. Introduction

15 In my recent decision in Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, I had the opportunity to review the two fundamental purposes underlying the BIA. As I stated there, the first such purpose is to ensure the equitable distribution of a bankrupt debtor's assets among the estate's creditors, while the second is to provide for the financial rehabilitation of insolvent persons (at para. 7). The case at bar demonstrates that these two purposes may come into conflict. The appellant bank, Dr. Ramgotra's principal creditor, wishes to attach his RRIF in order to satisfy its outstanding financial claims against him. Not surprisingly, in light of Dr. Ramgotra's post-bankruptcy financial position, he resists the bank's attempts to seize one of his few remaining assets. He argues that the RRIF, being life insurance under s. 2(kk)(vii) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, is exempt from execution or seizure by creditors (s. 158(2) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act and s. 67(1)(b) BIA). In short, the bank seeks an "equitable distribution" of Dr. Ramgotra's assets, while Dr. Ramgotra's "financial rehabilitation" is furthered if he maintains his interest in the RRIF.

16 Since Dr. Ramgotra transferred the funds from his two RRSPs into his exempt RRIF when he was solvent, and not for the purpose of defeating his creditors, one might well wonder how the bank could get around the exempt status of the RRIF — a status which, on its face, constitutes an absolute bar to the bank's claim. In the general context of debtor-creditor relations, the bank would have no expectation at all of attaching Dr. Ramgotra's exempt RRIF. On the facts of this case, Dr. Ramgotra's creditors are not being denied something which they would otherwise have, since the general rule is that they would not be entitled to attach the RRIF unless it had been removed from Dr. Ramgotra's estate through a fraudulent conveyance. Why should Dr. Ramgotra's bankruptcy place creditors like the bank in a better position than they would be in absent the bankruptcy? The bank's position before this Court appears to conflict with the principle that creditors should not gain on bankruptcy any greater access to their debtors' assets than they possessed prior to bankruptcy: M.N.R. v. Anthony 1995 CanLII 5595 (NL CA), (1995), 124 D.L.R. (4th) 575 (Nfld. C.A.), at p. 580.

17 Moreover, the policy of exempting life insurance investments and policies from execution or seizure under the BIA, where family members are designated as beneficiaries, is sound. Given the importance of insurance in providing for the welfare of dependents upon the death of the insured, an insurance policy may be characterized as a necessity. In Saskatchewan, as in the other provinces, many other necessities are excluded from the property of a bankrupt which is subject to execution or seizure by creditors. Examples include food, fuel, clothing, household items, tools of a trade (The Exemptions Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. E-14, s. 2), farm buildings, farming equipment, and livestock (The Saskatchewan Farm Security Act, S.S. 1988-89, c. S-17.1, s. 65). One might well characterize exempt property collectively as the "bare minimum" which a bankrupt is entitled to maintain in order to facilitate his or her rehabilitation following bankruptcy.

18 Thus, the bank's claim before this Court is at odds with the exempt status of the property in question, the policy justification underlying that exempt status, and its own expectations prior to Dr. Ramgotra's bankruptcy as to what it would be able to attach. However, the bank is challenging the transaction which transferred the RRSP funds into the RRIF. The bank claims that this transaction was a settlement within the meaning of s. 91 BIA, that Dr. Ramgotra's property interest did not pass at the time of the settlement, and that the settlement is void pursuant to the second branch of s. 91(2) (i.e., the "property passing branch"). According to the bank, the funds at issue are not exempt from execution or seizure because the transaction which rendered them exempt is void.

19 The issues raised by the bank are three-fold: (1) is the transaction in the case at bar a settlement within the meaning of s. 91 BIA; (2) if so, is the settlement void against the trustee in bankruptcy under the second branch of s. 91(2); and (3) if so, are the funds in the RRIF available to satisfy the claims of Dr. Ramgotra's creditors despite the RRIF's exempt status under s. 67(1)(b). These issues are not new. They have been the source of considerable controversy in the lower courts, where four competing approaches have been adopted. I will deal with each of these in turn. However, I should state at the outset that I find none of them to be a satisfactory resolution of the problem presented by the case at bar and similar cases. I prefer an approach which recognizes the distinct roles of ss. 67(1)(b) and 91 in bankruptcy, as outlined below.

2. The Competing Approaches in the Lower Courts

(i) The exchange of a non-exempt asset for an exempt asset is a settlement under the BIA, and is voidable against the trustee in bankruptcy pursuant to s. 91 where made in the five years preceding bankruptcy (the "Wilson approach")

20 The first approach to the problem raised by the case at bar involves the more general issue of whether a self-settlement is caught by s. 91 BIA. Such an approach is typified by the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal in Wilson v. Doane Raymond Ltd. (1988), 69 C.B.R. (N.S.) 156. There, the appellant dairy farmers sold their milk quota, a non-exempt asset, and used the proceeds to purchase a condominium, an exempt asset. A month later, they made assignments into bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy sought an order declaring the condominium purchase to be a void settlement of property under s. 69(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, (now s. 91(1)) BIA.

21 For the Court of Appeal, Haddad J.A. relied upon the decision of the Alberta Queen's Bench in Re Wozniuk 1987 CanLII 3436 (AB QB), (1987), 76 A.R. 42, a case the facts of which are strikingly similar to those of the case at bar. In Re Wozniuk, it was held that a self-settlement in which a non-exempt RRSP was exchanged for an exempt life insurance annuity was a settlement within the meaning of the BIA. Haddad J.A. agreed with this proposition, adding at p. 159 that "[a] settlement within the scheme of the statute occurs when a disposition of property reduces the bankrupt estate available to the trustee for distribution to creditors". He thus concluded that the appellants' conversion of non-exempt property into exempt property was a void settlement under the BIA, since it had the effect of reducing the estate which was available to creditors. It made no difference that the appellants had effected the conversion for the purpose of obtaining a home for themselves, and not for the purpose of defeating creditors.

22 The principle flowing from Wilson and Wozniuk, namely that the exchange of a non-exempt asset for an exempt asset is a settlement under the BIA, and is voidable under s. 91, has been adopted in numerous cases: Re Malloy (1983), 48 C.B.R. (N.S.) 308 (Ont. S.C.); Alberta Treasury Branches v. Guimond (1987), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 125 (Alta.

Q.B.); Camgoz (Trustee of) v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 131 (Sask. Q.B.), aff'd (1988), 72 C.B.R. (N.S.) 319 (Sask. C.A.); Klassen (Trustee of) v. Great West Life Assurance Co. reflex, (1990), 1 C.B.R. (3d) 263 (Sask. Q.B.). Moreover, this principle was adopted by the trial judge, Baynton J., in the case at bar, and in his earlier decision in Oliver, supra.

23 The approach which found favour with the Alberta Court of Appeal in Wilson was rejected, I think properly, by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in the case at bar. In my view, it is incorrect to conclude that a person may settle property on him- or herself. This is confirmed by the traditional judicial understanding of "settlement", as stated by this Court in In re Bozanich, 1942 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1942] S.C.R. 130. Rinfret J. described "settlement" as follows at pp. 138-39:

> Without attempting to give a definition of the word — and more particularly of that word as used in section 60 — it seems to me sufficient for the purpose of interpreting the section to adopt a passage of Cave J., in the case of In re Player; Ex parte Harvey (1885), 15 Q.B.D. 682, at 686-687:
> One must look at the whole of the language of the section in applying that definition, and consider what is meant by "settlement". Although "settlement", by the 3rd subsection, "shall for the purposes of this section include any conveyance or transfer of property", yet I think the view of my brother Mathew is well founded, and that a settlement in the ordinary sense of the word is intended. The transaction must be in the nature of a settlement, though it may be effected by a conveyance or transfer. The end and purpose of the thing must be a settlement, that is, a disposition of property to be held for the enjoyment of some other person. [Emphasis added.]

Rinfret J. then added, at p. 141:

> The Act, as broad as it is, allows of a clear distinction between settlements though effected by a conveyance or transfer of property and conveyances or transfers of property not in the nature of a settlement.

24 There is no room in the definition of settlement adopted by this Court in Re Bozanich for a "settlement onto oneself", since the settlement must involve the transfer of property to be held for the enjoyment of another person. It would seem that the lower courts have departed from this aspect of Re Bozanich, and have held that a self-settlement is a settlement under the BIA, because the exchange of non-exempt property for exempt property is one convenient means of defeating creditors. As the court reasoned in Re Wozniuk at p. 62, a bankrupt should not be able to "bootstrap himself" out of s. 91 "by taking non-exempt property and converting it into property which would be exempt".

25 Although the court in Wilson thought that excluding self-settlements from s. 91 BIA would allow for considerable abuse, it seems to me that the contrary conclusion is more problematic. If creditors may attach self-settled property by attacking the self-settlement under s. 91 BIA, notwithstanding the exempt status of the property, then the result follows that such property is attachable in all cases where the self-settlement occurred in the five years preceding bankruptcy, including those cases where the bankrupt was solvent and acting in good faith at the time of the impugned transaction. In his article, "Section 91 (Settlements) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: A Mutated Monster" (1995), 25 Can. Bus. L.J. 235, Professor Cuming strongly criticized the judicial extension of the concept of settlement to include self-settlement as "patently unreasonable", at p. 235, and "a dramatic mutation", at p. 238. He added, at p. 242:

> The problem of injustice arises when this expanded interpretation of the concept of settlement is combined with another Canadian-made adjunct to s. 91: that, in both such situations, the interest of the settlor does not pass on execution of the transfers, thereby bringing them within the third arm of s. 91. The logic of this reasoning appears to be as follows: the transfer of the property to the debtor is a settlement and the interest of the settlor did not pass on execution since, by definition, he retained or ended up with the interest or its equivalent.
> This approach alone, while unable to withstand close technical scrutiny, would not be a source of injustice if the property has not been converted into exempt property as a result of the unexecuted transaction. The "settled" property is divisible among the bankrupt settlor's creditors. The potential for injustice arises in situations where the "settlement" involves conversion of property from non-exempt to exempt property. [Emphasis added.]

26 I agree that there is considerable potential for injustice if the Wilson approach to self-settlement is adopted. The situation is quite different in the case of settlements on third parties, not only because in such cases the property of the settlor may well have passed, but also because of s. 91(3)(b). That provision states that a "settlement made ... in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration" is not void against the trustee in bankruptcy, thus providing a bona fide exception to s. 91(1) and (2). However, the provision is not available in the case of self-settlement because, (1) there is no "purchaser or incumbrancer", and (2) there is no exchange of "valuable consideration". The Act therefore affords no protection to self-settlors like Dr. Ramgotra, who have acted in good faith. This anomaly is a persuasive indication that Parliament did not intend s. 91 to apply to self-settlement.

Digitized by Google

27 Further to this, I think that the inclusion of self-settlements within s. 91 is contrary to the purpose of that provision. As I will explain in greater detail below, s. 91 empowers the trustee in bankruptcy to return property to the bankrupt's estate, where it has been removed from the estate through a settlement by the bankrupt on a third party. Since a self-settlement does not transfer property to a third party, the property remains in the bankrupt's estate and vests in the trustee at the time of the bankruptcy (s. 71(2) BIA). What possible role could s. 91 have in that situation? Moreover, the property passing branch of s. 91(2) has traditionally been viewed as providing a means by which the trustee in bankruptcy may challenge in futuro settlements by the bankrupt on third party beneficiaries, and thereby avoid future claims by those beneficiaries against the bankrupt's estate. In other words, as Jackson J.A. reasoned in the court below at para. 50, the property passing test catches those transactions by solvent debtors that do not confer an immediate interest. The purpose of the second branch of s. 91(2) would be distorted if creditors could employ it to attach self-settled property, since a self-settlement is qualitatively different from the kinds of dealings at which the property passing test is aimed.

28 Ultimately, I think that the Wilson approach to s. 91 fails to strike an appropriate balance between the Act's dual, and sometimes conflicting, purposes of protecting creditors and rehabilitating bankrupts. Even though a self-settlement which creates an exempt asset has the effect of reducing the property available to creditors, one must not lose sight of the fact that the result of the transaction is the acquisition of an asset which is so essential to the bankrupt and his or her dependents that it has been rendered exempt from execution or seizure by provincial legislation incorporated into the Act by s. 67(1)(b). To interpret s. 91 BIA in a manner which automatically allows creditors to attach exempt property of such an essential character is, in my view, going too far.

29 Thus, I see no reason in this case to depart from the definition of settlement adopted by this Court in Re Bozanich, which requires a disposition by the settlor to a third party. To borrow the words of Rinfret J., self-settlement is a transfer of property not in the nature of a settlement.

(ii) Bona fide self-settlements are not settlements under s. 91 BIA (the "Oliver approach")

30 In light of my rejection of the Wilson approach, it is not necessary to deal with the bona fide exception developed by Baynton J. in Oliver, supra, and applied in the case at bar. Suffice it to say that I share Baynton J.'s concerns about the harshness of the legal approach taken in cases like Wilson. While I appreciate his solution to the problem, I note that he was bound to follow the Wilson view that self-settlements are subject to s. 91, since the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal had accepted this proposition in Camgoz, supra. As I explain below, I do not think that good faith is relevant to the question of whether a settlement has been made within the meaning of s. 91. I prefer the approach to self-settlement taken by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in the instant case.

(iii) The designation of a beneficiary under a life insurance plan is a settlement under the BIA, and is voidable against the trustee in bankruptcy pursuant to s. 91 where made in the five years preceding bankruptcy (the "Geraci (Court of Appeal) approach")

31 Although the Court of Appeal in the instant case found that Dr. Ramgotra's exchange of a non-exempt asset for an exempt asset was not, by the fact of the exchange alone, a settlement under s. 91, Jackson J.A. proceeded to hold that when Dr. Ramgotra designated his wife as beneficiary of the RRIF, he effected a s. 91 settlement. This approach, which is particular to life insurance plans, was based on the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Geraci (1970), 14 C.B.R. (N.S.) 253. There, at a time when the bankrupt was clearly insolvent, he designated his wife as beneficiary of a life insurance policy with a cash surrender value of $9,000. The effect of the designation was to render the insurance exempt from execution or seizure. The trustee in bankruptcy applied for a declaration that the beneficiary designation was void under the first branch (i.e., the "insolvency branch") of what is now s. 91(2) BIA. For the court, Jessup J.A. reasoned at pp. 255-56:

> I think there emerges from the authorities a definition of the ordinary meaning of "settlement" that it is a disposition of property to be held, either in original form or in such form that it can be traced, for the enjoyment of some other person; and that the designation of a beneficiary of an insurance policy is such a disposition.... Having regard to the wide ranging affairs to which the Bankruptcy Act applies, I do not think that the word "settlement" in s. 60(1) [now s. 91] of that statute should be given a restricted meaning. The respondent argues that the designation of the wife as beneficiary of the policy was not a disposition of property because she would acquire no property rights in or benefit from the policy, unless and until the prior death of the bankrupt. I think it would be more accurate to say the wife's rights are contingent on the death of her husband. But the definition of property in s. 2(o) of the Bankruptcy Act, which is in the widest terms, includes "every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of, or incident to property".... Moreover, the circumstance that the wife's contingent interest in the policy may be divested by the designation of a different beneficiary does not derogate from the fact that she has an interest until there is divestiture. [Italics added by Jessup J.A.]

He thus concluded that the beneficiary designation in question, having been made when the bankrupt was insolvent, was void against the trustee in bankruptcy.

2. ...

"settlement" includes a contract, covenant, transfer, gift and designation of beneficiary in an insurance contract, to the extent that the contract, covenant, transfer, gift or designation is gratuitous or made for merely nominal consideration; [Emphasis added.]

(Act to Amend the Bankruptcy Act, S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 3(2))

This definition was not in force when the circumstances of the instant appeal arose (in fact, between 1949 and 1992, there was no statutory definition of settlement in BIA). However, in light of Geraci and the cases following it, I think that a jurisprudential consensus has emerged that the designation of a beneficiary under a life insurance policy constitutes a s. 91 settlement. The new statutory definition reflects this consensus. On this basis, I agree with Jackson J.A. that Dr. Ramgotra effected a settlement triggering s. 91.

33 After concluding that the designation of Mrs. Ramgotra as beneficiary of Dr. Ramgotra's RRIF was a s. 91 settlement, Jackson J.A. turned to the second branch of s. 91(2), and inquired as to whether Dr. Ramgotra's interest in the settled property passed at the time of settlement. The settlement would only be void against the trustee in bankruptcy if Dr. Ramgotra's interest had not passed. This raised the perplexing issue of which "interest" should be considered in relation to the property passing requirement: Dr. Ramgotra's present interest in the RRIF itself, which certainly did not pass at the time of settlement, or the future contingent interest which he had obviously passed to Mrs. Ramgotra when she became his beneficiary? (For a general discussion of this controversial issue, see David J. McKee, "Debtor-Creditor Issues Affecting Annuity Contracts" (1993), 12 Est. & Tr. J. 247, at pp. 272-78, and Norwood and Weir, Norwood on Life Insurance Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1993), at pp. 253-56.)

34 Before this Court, the parties focused their submissions on the property passing issue. This was not surprising, as Jackson J.A. wrote substantial reasons justifying her conclusion that the relevant property interest was the future contingent interest which had passed to Mrs. Ramgotra. Jackson J.A.'s position was in direct conflict with the decision in Re MacDonald, supra. The difficulty with Jackson J.A.'s position is that it does violence to the distinction which s. 91(2) requires to be made between in futuro and immediate transfers of property. The settlement of a contingent and revocable future interest in RRIF funds is an in futuro settlement, i.e., the settlor's interest in the property does not pass at the moment of the settlement. If the settlement of a contingent and revocable future interest were considered an immediate transfer of property, as Jackson J.A. proposes, it is difficult to imagine what sort of settlement of future property could not be so described.

35 Since the designation of a beneficiary was an in futuro settlement made within the five years prior to Dr. Ramgotra's bankruptcy, it is void against the trustee, pursuant to s. 91(2). However, this does not mean that the RRIF funds may be distributed to the creditors of the estate. For the reasons given below, the exempt status of the life-assured RRIF remains in effect under provincial law so as to block the creditors' claims. Before explaining why this is so, I will examine the fourth approach to the problem raised in the instant case.

(iv) Where property is exempt from execution or seizure by creditors, pursuant to s. 67(1)(b) BIA, then its exempt status prevails over the fact that it became exempt as a result of a voidable settlement (the "Geraci (trial) approach")

36 Dr. Ramgotra argued forcefully in his submissions that since his RRIF was an exempt property under The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, and since this exemption is incorporated into the BIA by s. 67(1)(b), then it should be irrelevant that the funds in the RRIF were settled when his wife was designated as the beneficiary. In essence, Dr. Ramgotra urged this Court to hold that the exemption provision of the Act should be given effect regardless of s. 91.

37 Support for Dr. Ramgotra's submission can be found in the judgment of Houlden J. in the trial decision in Re Geraci (1969), 13 C.B.R. (N.S.) 86 (Ont. S.C.) (a judgment later overturned by the Ontario Court of Appeal, as discussed above). Houlden J. began by confirming that the designation of a beneficiary under a life insurance policy is a settlement within the BIA. He then observed that by reason of the beneficiary designation, the policy itself was exempt from execution or seizure by creditors pursuant to s. 162(2) of The Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 190 (re-enacted by S.O. 1961-62, c. 63, s. 4) (now s. 196(2) of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8). He construed the effect of the exemption as follows, at pp. 92-93:

Digitized by Google

> ... I believe on a close examination of s. 162(2) that it is the clear intention of the section to make the policy immune from attack by creditors while the wife is designated as beneficiary.
> In my opinion, s. 162(2) has been drafted to provide for the group of persons who were formerly called "preferred beneficiaries". It is now possible to name a person who would formerly have been a preferred beneficiary and at the same time, if the designation is not irrevocable, to retain the right to borrow against, surrender or otherwise deal with the policy, but in my view, the Legislature by the wording of s. 162(2) has made it plain that the policy, while such a designation is in effect, is not to be "exigible for the benefit of (his) creditors": see Mulock C.J.O., in Royal Bank of Canada v. Dumart, [1932] O.R. 661 (C.A.).

Houlden J. recognized that some injustice would result from giving precedence to the exempt status of the life insurance policy. For example, an insolvent debtor could convert all his or her assets into cash, purchase a life insurance policy, and render it exempt from seizure by designating a family member as beneficiary. However, he wrote at p. 94:

> At the present time, if my interpretation of The Insurance Act is correct, the Legislature had decided that an insurance policy coming within s. 157(1) or s. 162(2) is not available to creditors and, in my opinion, there is good moral justification for this position. Insurance is a very different asset from say a house or an automobile.... It is purchased to provide for the dependants of the insured and it is ordinarily paid for in small amounts over the insured's lifetime. I believe there are very good reasons for exempting policies of insurance from seizure....

38 Houlden J.'s reasons in Geraci largely repeat the view he expressed in an earlier article, "Life Insurance Contracts in Ontario" (1963), 4 C.B.R. (N.S.) 113, at p. 115:

> If a [beneficiary] designation is made in favour of a spouse, child, grandchild or parent of a person whose life is insured, the rights and interests of the insured in the insurance money and in the contract are exempt from execution or seizure (s. 162(2)). Even if the designation of such a beneficiary is not irrevocable, a trustee in bankruptcy cannot deal with such a policy because the rights and interests of the insured are declared to be exempt from execution and seizure and by s. 39(b) [now s. 67(1)(b)] of the Bankruptcy Act property of a bankrupt does not include property which is exempt from execution or seizure. It would seem that s. 162(2) is drawn with s. 39(b) in mind as it uses the identical wording of s. 39(b).

39 On appeal, Jessup J.A. rejected Houlden J.'s construction of the exemption and settlement provisions of the BIA, arguing at p. 258:

> If a settlement of property which comes within s. 60(1) [now s. 91(1)] of the Bankruptcy Act, both as to substance and as to time, is none the less to be taken as exempt, by virtue of s. 39(b), from the claims of a bankrupt's creditors merely because it would enjoy that exemption under provincial law apart from s. 60(1), the result would be to make s. 60(1) completely nugatory. I cannot conceive that to have been the intent of Parliament. The proper rule of construction is to harmonize all sections of an enactment and this is achieved in the present case by applying s. 39(b) in the light of s. 60(1) and not despite s. 60(1). I would, therefore, hold that property settled by a bankrupt within a year before his bankruptcy includes property rendered exempt from execution or seizure, under the laws of the relevant province, as a result of the settlement. [Emphasis added.]

40 Jessup J.A.'s reasoning was expressly rejected in preference to that of Houlden J. by the British Columbia Supreme Court in Re Sykes 1993 CanLII 2360 (BC SC), (1993), 18 C.B.R. (3d) 148. Meredith J. noted, at para. 19, that Jessup J.A.'s reasons in Geraci

> ... seems... to tag onto s. 167(b) [sic] words such as "unless the disposition of the property referred to amounts to a settlement referred to in s. 91". That comes close to judicial legislation.

Meredith J. was not prepared to go that route, and instead concluded that the exempt status of the life insurance policy in question was conclusive in that it was not available for seizure by creditors, even though it became exempt as a result of a voidable settlement (see also, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Meltzer reflex, (1991), 6 C.B.R. (3d) 1 (Man. Q.B.), which adopted Houlden J.'s construction of the exemption provisions of the BIA).

41 The debate between Houlden J. and Jessup J.A. in Geraci, which was taken up by Meredith J. in Sykes, was premised on the view that ss. 67(1)(b) and 91 BIA were in conflict. As Michael J. McCabe stated in his article, "Execution Against an R.R.S.P." (1990), 76 C.B.R. (N.S.) 218, at p. 234:

> The issue, simply stated, is which takes precedence, the exemption provision of s. 67 incorporating the provincial exemptions or the settlement provision of s. 91.

In resolving this issue, both Houlden J. and Jessup J.A. undertook a "lesser of two evils"-type analysis. Houlden J. preferred to give effect to s. 67(1)(b) over s. 91, to avoid the result that every designation of a beneficiary under a life insurance policy, made within one year of bankruptcy (or within five years if the designation was made when the debtor was insolvent, or if the property interest of the debtor did not pass when the beneficiary was designated), would be voidable. He thought that instances in which such a designation would be made for the purpose of defeating creditors would be rare, and that "it is better to permit injury to the creditors [in those rare cases] than to inflict the undoubted hardship of the forfeiture of a life's investment" (at p. 94). Jessup J.A. reached the opposite conclusion, because Houlden J.'s interpretation of s. 67(1)(b) would render s. 91 "completely nugatory". Nevertheless, Jessup J.A. added, at p. 259:

It does seem unjust that moneys paid in good faith over a period of years to secure a man's wife and children should be available to his creditors....

He then suggested a legislative amendment to avoid this result.

42 If I had to choose between the approaches of Houlden J. and Jessup J.A., then I would prefer that of Houlden J. for two reasons. First, I think that Jessup J.A. exaggerated the impact on s. 91 of Houlden J.'s construction, since settlements which change the status of property from non-exempt to exempt are only a portion of the settlements subject to s. 91. Houlden J.'s position certainly does not render s. 91 "completely nugatory", as stated by Jessup J.A. at p. 258. Second, Jessup J.A.'s interpretation of s. 67(1)(b) clearly favours the interests of creditors over the rehabilitation interest of the bankrupt settlor. The Act itself provides no indication that this should be so in the circumstances presented by the instant case, or Geraci. I do not believe that Parliament intended the funds in exempt life insurance plans to be subject to execution and seizure by creditors, simply on the basis that a settlement occurred when a beneficiary was designated. After all, it is the designation which makes the asset exempt under the provincial legislation incorporated into s. 67(1)(b). Are we really to believe that Parliament intended the very act which renders an asset exempt to be the cause of its losing its exempt status? I do not think so. Like Houlden J., I think that it would be preferable to respect the exempt status of a life insurance policy, even where the policy became exempt as a result of a s. 91 settlement.

43 In any event, I reject the view that ss. 67(1)(b) and 91 BIA are in conflict, and that the resolution of the case at bar requires me to choose one provision over the other on the basis of policy considerations. In fact, I think that it is possible to reconcile the two provisions by giving effect to their distinct terms, and by recognizing their distinct roles in bankruptcy.

3. The Preferred Approach to the Problem in the Case at Bar

(v) Even if a settlement which creates an exempt asset is void against the trustee in bankruptcy under s. 91, the exempt status of the asset under provincial law remains in effect to block the claims of creditors

44 In reconciling ss. 67(1)(b) and 91 BIA, it is important to remember that the general scheme through which a bankrupt's estate is divided by the trustee among creditors involves two distinct stages. First, the Act provides that an insolvent person "may make an assignment of all his property for the general benefit of his creditors" (s. 49(1)), or that creditors "may file in court a petition for a receiving order against a debtor" (s. 43(1)). At the time of the assignment or receiving order, the trustee in bankruptcy is obligated to take possession of the assets forming the estate of the bankrupt. Thus, by operation of s. 71(2), the bankrupt's property passes to and vests in the trustee:

> (2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

Section 16(3) BIA imposes a duty on the trustee to "take possession of the deeds, books, records and documents and all property of the bankrupt and make an inventory...." Section 158(a) imposes a complimentary duty on the bankrupt to inform the trustee of all his or her property which is in his or her possession or control, and to deliver it to the trustee. Other provisions of the Act elaborate upon the powers, duties and functions of the trustee during the property-passing stage of bankruptcy (see, in particular, ss. 17, 18, 19 and 24 BIA).

45 Once the bankrupt's property has passed into the possession of the trustee, the Act provides the trustee with the power to administer the estate. For example, the trustee may, with the permission of the estate inspectors, sell or dispose of assets (s. 30(1)(a)), lease real property (s. 30(1)(b)), carry on the business of the bankrupt (s. 30(1)(c)), or divide certain property among the creditors (s. 30(1)(j)). The ultimate purpose of these administrative powers is to manage the estate, in order to provide equitable satisfaction of the creditor's claims. This, then, is the estate-administration stage of bankruptcy, one distinct aspect of which is the distribution of the estate among creditors.

46 During the property-passing stage of bankruptcy, the trustee is empowered under s. 91 of the Act to set aside certain settlements which have reduced the size of the estate. Thus, s. 91 outlines the circumstances in which a settlement will be voidable at the behest of the trustee in bankruptcy. If a settlement is declared void against the trustee, then the settled property reverts back to the bankrupt's estate, and falls into the possession of the trustee in bankruptcy. Several other provisions of the BIA have relevance to the property-passing stage. For example, s. 94 renders certain assignments of book debts void against the trustee; s. 98(1) empowers the trustee to take possession of any money or proceeds from the sale of settled property to a third party, where the original settlement was void; and s. 99 dictates that while property acquired by the bankrupt after the bankruptcy vests in the trustee, it may be transferred by the bankrupt to a good faith purchaser, unless the trustee intervenes in the transaction (in which case the transaction is void against the trustee).

47 After-acquired property is also dealt with in s. 68, which constitutes a complete code in respect of a bankrupt's salary, wages or other remuneration. The provision stipulates that after-acquired remuneration will not pass to and vest in the trustee unless the trustee intervenes by applying for a court order directing the payment of the remuneration (or a portion of it) to the trustee (Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765, at p. 794). Where the trustee obtains such a court order, then the remuneration which passes into his or her possession is also divisible among creditors, even if it would otherwise be exempt from execution or seizure under provincial law. This is because s. 68 operates "notwithstanding section 67(1)", with the result that a provincial exemption for remuneration which would otherwise be incorporated into s. 67(1)(b) is ineffective: Marzetti, at pp. 792-93 and 795. I note that Parliament considered it necessary to exclude explicitly after-acquired remuneration from the operation of s. 67(1)(b), thereby overriding the exempt status of the remuneration under provincial law, in order to ensure that in those circumstances where such remuneration passed to the trustee, it was also divisible among creditors. This supports the view that absent a specific override of s. 67(1)(b), exempt property which passes to and vests in the trustee, whether as a result of ss. 71(2) or 91, will not be divisible among creditors.

48 Unlike provisions of the Act such as ss. 71(2), 91 or 68, s. 67(1) tells us nothing about the property-passing stage of bankruptcy. Instead, it relates to the estate-administration stage by defining which property in the estate is available to satisfy the claims of creditors. It effectively constitutes a direction to the trustee regarding the disposition of property. Thus, property which is divisible among creditors is defined very broadly in s. 67(1) as:

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

However, the trustee is barred from dividing two categories of property among creditors: property held by the bankrupt in trust for another person (s. 67(1)(a)), and property rendered exempt from execution or seizure under provincial legislation (s. 67(1)(b)). While such property becomes part of the bankrupt's estate in the possession of the trustee, the trustee may not exercise his or her estate distribution powers over it by reason of s. 67.

49 Thus, it can be seen that ss. 91 and 67 relate to two different stages of bankruptcy. Section 91 dictates that certain settled property will fall back into the estate of the bankrupt in the possession of the trustee, while s. 67 is directed at the exercise of administrative powers over the estate by the trustee. Where a settlement is void against the trustee under s. 91, then in normal circumstances, the trustee is empowered to administer the settled asset, and use it to satisfy the claims of creditors. However, in the special case where the asset is exempt under s. 67(1)(b), then the trustee is prohibited from exercising his or her distribution powers because the asset is not subject to division among creditors. This two-stage analysis is similar to the one adopted by Henry J. of the Ontario Supreme Court in Re Pearson (1977), 23 C.B.R. (N.S.) 44. That case was concerned with the issue of whether a trustee in bankruptcy could revoke the designation of a beneficiary under a life insurance plan, and substitute the estate as beneficiary. Although the plan itself was exempt from the BIA, the trustee sought to defeat the exemption by exercising a "power" under s. 47(d) [now s. 67(1)(d)]. Henry J. dismissed the trustee's application, and in doing so characterized the effect of the exemption provisions of the Act as follows, at pp. 48-49:

What comes into the hands of the trustee on the occurrence of the bankruptcy are the rights and interests of the insured in the insurance money and in the contract as they stood at the date of the bankruptcy. When that event occurred, those rights and interests were, by s. 170 of The Insurance Act, exempt from execution or seizure. In my opinion, so far as the creditors of the bankrupt are concerned, that situation crystallized at the time the bankruptcy occurred, and that property by virtue of s. 47(b) [now s. 67(1)(b)] of the Bankruptcy Act was impressed with its character of not being divisible among the creditors, for all the purposes of the bankruptcy.

I adopt this as a correct statement of the law. Therefore, while an asset which is exempt under provincial law passes into the possession of the trustee at the time of bankruptcy, the exemption itself bars the trustee from dividing the asset among creditors where s. 67(1)(b) is operative.

50 Relating this to the circumstances in the case at bar, at the time of Dr. Ramgotra's bankruptcy application, his property interest in the RRIF passed to and vested in the trustee in bankruptcy by operation of s. 71(2) BIA. Mrs. Ramgotra's future contingent interest as the designated beneficiary under the RRIF was not captured by s. 71(2), since it had been settled on her prior to bankruptcy. It was open to the trustee in bankruptcy to apply to have this settlement set aside under s. 91(2) BIA. As I noted above, the settlement was void under s. 91(2) and, consequently, Mrs. Ramgotra's future contingent interest passed to and vested in the trustee. The trustee in bankruptcy possessed the complete set of property interests associated with the RRIF. But the trustee could not divide the RRIF among creditors because its exempt status under s. 67(1)(b) BIA continued regardless of s. 91. In other words, the role of s. 91 is to bring settled property back into the estate of the bankrupt in the possession of the trustee. Therefore, while s. 91 could be employed to bring Dr. Ramgotra's RRIF fully into the possession of the trustee in bankruptcy, it has no bearing on the issue of whether or not the RRIF is exempt under s. 67(1)(b).

51 The appellant has argued that when a settlement creating an exempt asset has been set aside under s. 91, then the exempt status itself is no longer effective. In other words, the existence of a valid settlement is a logical precondition to the enforceability of a s. 67(1)(b) exemption. This argument found favour in Re Yewdale, supra, where Tysoe J. stated at p. 204:

> While s. 67(1)(b) does provide an exemption for insurance annuities, it cannot be viewed in isolation. An asset can only be properly exempted under s. 67(1)(b) if the transaction creating the asset is valid. If the transaction is void under s. 91 (or any other provision), the exempted asset must be considered to revert to its form prior to the invalid transaction. If its prior form was not an exempted asset, s. 67(1)(b) is not applicable.

With respect, I cannot agree. The effect of s. 91 is to render certain settlements void against the trustee in bankruptcy. However, in the case of a life insurance policy, it must be remembered that what renders it exempt under s. 67(1)(b) is the designation of a beneficiary. According to s. 158(2) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, the exempt status of the life insurance policy continues so long as the designation is "in effect". To reach the conclusion of Tysoe J. in Re Yewdale, I would have to find that the designation in the case at bar is no longer "in effect" for the purpose of preventing distribution of the funds in the RRIF to Dr. Ramgotra's creditors, because the designation "is void against the trustee". However, I do not think that the fact a beneficiary designation is void against the trustee under federal legislation necessarily results in it no longer having effect vis-à-vis the claims of creditors under the provincial legislation which s. 67(1)(b) incorporates. As I stated above, ss. 91 and 67(1)(b) are directed at different stages of bankruptcy, and play different roles. Section 91 assists in identifying the property of the bankrupt which comes into the possession of the trustee, whereas s. 67(1)(b) is relevant in determining the property in the trustee's possession over which he or she may exercise his or her administrative powers. I therefore prefer a construction of ss. 91 and 67(1)(b) which recognizes their distinct roles in bankruptcy, as opposed to a construction which holds one to be a precondition of the other.

52 Therefore, even though Dr. Ramgotra effected a void settlement under the second branch of s. 91(2) when he designated his wife as beneficiary of his RRIF, that does not allow the trustee to use the funds in the RRIF to satisfy the claims of creditors such as the appellant bank. The RRIF is an exempt asset pursuant to the provincial legislation incorporated into s. 67(1)(b), meaning that it is not property which is divisible among creditors. Given this, even though Mrs. Ramgotra's future contingent interest in the RRIF had passed into the possession of the trustee through the application of s. 91(2), the RRIF was property "incapable of realization" by the trustee pursuant to s. 40(1) BIA. Therefore, the trustee was obliged to return it to Dr. Ramgotra prior to applying for his discharge: Thompson v. Coulombe (1984), 54 C.B.R. (N.S.) 254 (Que. C.A.), at p. 257; Zemlak (Trustee of) v. Zemlak (1987), 66 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (Sask. C.A.), at pp. 9 and 11. Despite the fact that Dr. Ramgotra's settlement was void against the trustee, the exempt status of the RRIF is an absolute bar to the appellant bank's claim.

4. The Application of Provincial Fraud Legislation

53 In the lower courts which have considered the issue presented by the case at bar, considerable concern has been expressed over the fact that the conversion of a non-exempt asset into an exempt asset is a convenient means for a bankrupt to reduce the size of his or her estate available to creditors. Thus, the bankrupt's intention in effecting a transaction, and the impact of the transaction on creditors, have both been important factors directing the jurisprudence related to ss. 91 and 67(1)(b) BIA. Of course, in the case at bar, Dr. Ramgotra acted in good faith, and not for the purpose of defeating his creditors' claims. One could well imagine more troubling circumstances, however.

54 In her case comment on the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal decision in the instant case Lisa H. Kerbel Caplan ((1994), 26 C.B.R. (3d) 252), argues that at common law, the role of intention has focused "on the settlor's intention that the donee hold the settled property in its current form or in a traceable form", and not on the settlor's purpose in making a settlement (at p. 253). Like her, I am of the view that whether a settlor has acted in good faith, or for the purpose of defeating creditors, is not relevant to the question of whether a settlement has been made within s. 91.

55 In contrast, however, a settlor's intention is highly relevant where a settlement is being challenged under provincial (or territorial) fraud legislation: Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.N. 1990, c. F-24, s. 3; Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 25, s. 4; Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. A-16, s. 2; Frauds on Creditors Act, R.S.P.E.I. 1988, c. F-15, s. 2; Civil Code of Québec, art. 1631 ("Paulian Action"); Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. A.33, s. 4(1), and Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.29, s. 2; The Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.M. 1987, c. F160, s. 2; The Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. F-21, s. 3; Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. F-18, s. 2; Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 142, s. 1, and Fraudulent Preference Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 143, s. 3; Fraudulent Preferences and Conveyances Act, R.S.Y. 1986, c. 72, s. 2. (Note: the Northwest Territories has no legislation on fraudulent conveyances or preferences.) In fact, several lower courts have suggested that bad faith settlements, made for the purpose of defeating creditors, may be set aside under these statutes. Although it is not strictly necessary to decide this issue in the case at bar, since Dr. Ramgotra was found by Baynton J. to have acted in good faith, I am mindful of the need to provide some guidance to bankrupts, trustees, creditors and lower courts.

56 Generally, where a conveyance has rendered property exempt from execution or seizure by creditors under provincial legislation, but the conveyance itself is void against those creditors pursuant to provincial fraud legislation, then the exemption is not in effect vis-à-vis those creditors. In terms of the law of bankruptcy, I would hold that a bankrupt cannot enjoy the benefit of a s. 67(1)(b) exemption where the property in question became exempt by reason of a fraudulent conveyance declared void pursuant to provincial law. I note that Houlden J. concluded in Geraci (trial), at p. 92, that a s. 67(1)(b) exemption has force even where the property became exempt under provincial law as a result of a fraudulent conveyance. I do not agree. In my view, a precondition to s. 67(1)(b) protection is that the property in question is exempt against the claims of creditors under provincial law. A fraudulent conveyance rendering property exempt is void against creditors, as illustrated by s. 3 of the Saskatchewan Act:

> 3. ... every gift, conveyance, assignment or transfer, delivery over or payment of goods, chattels or effects or of bills, bonds, notes or securities or of shares, dividends, premiums or bonus in a bank, company or corporation, or of any other property real or personal, made by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances or is unable to pay his debts in full or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency, with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice his creditors or any one or more of them, is void as against the creditor or creditors injured, delayed or prejudiced. [Emphasis added.]

Since a fraudulent conveyance rendering property exempt is void against creditors by operation of provincial law, the property is not exempt from execution or seizure by creditors under provincial law, as required by s. 67(1)(b) BIA. Section 67(1)(b) therefore has no application, once a fraudulent conveyance is found to have occurred.

57 Can a life insurance beneficiary designation be set aside as a fraudulent conveyance of property? This question has generated some conflict in the lower courts. In Geraci (trial), for example, Houlden J. found at p. 89 that the beneficiary designation could be attacked under s. 2 of Ontario's Act, since it was a conveyance made with the fraudulent intent of defeating creditors. The Court of Appeal, per Jessup J.A., agreed, at p. 259:

> I agree with the learned trial Judge that the declaration made by the bankrupt, changing the beneficiary of his policy of insurance to his wife while he was insolvent, was a fraudulent conveyance within the meaning of s. 2 of The Fraudulent Conveyances Act and, if it were necessary to do so, I would hold that it was therefore fraudulent and void against his creditors and that such a void designation does not attract the protection against creditors provided by either s. 162 or s. 157 of the present Insurance Act.

58 Geraci was not followed on this point in Sovereign General Insurance Co. v. Dale 1988 CanLII 3204 (BC SC), (1988), 32 B.C.L.R. (2d) 226 (S.C.). There, the defendant had transferred the funds from a non-exempt RRSP into an insurance annuity which was exempt from execution or seizure under s. 147 of British Columbia's Insurance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 200, because his wife was the designated beneficiary of the plan. The plaintiff, who had obtained judgment against the defendant, sought to set aside the transfer of the RRSP funds into the annuity on the basis that it was a fraudulent conveyance. Gibbs J. held that the defendant had the necessary intent for fraud because he effected the fund transfer in order to hinder the plaintiff from realizing on its judgment. He then turned to the question of whether the transfer was a "disposition of property" which could be set aside under the British Columbia's Fraudulent Conveyance Act. After stating that Jessup J.A.'s reasons in Geraci were obiter on this point, and that the issue remained unresolved, Gibbs J. held at pp. 230-31:

> In my opinion, it is not appropriate to look at the consequences that flow from the naming of the wife as beneficiary under the insurance contract to determine whether an interest in property has been disposed of. That seems to have happened in a number of the cases cited. With respect, I think that is the wrong approach for whatever statutory protection might or might not be afforded to the "interest" conveyed cannot be determinative of what the "interest" is. In my view, the task must be to inquire whether the "interest", if that is the correct terminology, has any of the commonly understood incidents of property. When I follow that course I am led to the conclusion that it does not.
> Until a vesting occurs, the expression "interest" is probably nothing more than a convenient label to describe a future expectation which may never become a reality; for instance, the insured may change the beneficiary, or the beneficiary may predecease the insured. Until vesting, if that ever occurs, the expectation of the beneficiary is not real property, or personalty; it is not a chose in action; it is not merchantable; it is not exigible. At the most

Digitized by Google

> it is expectancy based upon a contingency. It has been held to be within the broad definition of property in the Bankruptcy Act which includes a future contingent interest incident to property, but it does not follow that it is subsumed within the single word "property" in the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. In my opinion, it is not.

Thus, according to Gibbs J., the transfer of funds at issue was not a conveyance of "property" which could be set aside under the British Columbia Act.

59 I do not intend to resolve this issue in the case at bar. However, I would make the following observation. The technical question of whether a life insurance beneficiary designation is a "property conveyance" does not arise under art. 1631 of the Civil Code of Québec, which allows creditors to set aside fraudulent "juridical acts":

> 1631. A creditor who suffers prejudice through a juridical act made by his debtor in fraud of his rights, in particular an act by which he renders or seeks to render himself insolvent, or by which, being insolvent, he grants preference to another creditor may obtain a declaration that the act may not be set up against him.

However, the other provincial statutes all refer to some sort of "conveyance" or "disposition" of "property" with the "intent to defeat" creditors' claims. All the provincial fraud provisions are clearly remedial in nature, and their purpose is to ensure that creditors may set aside a broad range of transactions involving a broad range of property interests, where such transactions were effected for the purpose of defeating the legitimate claims of creditors. Therefore, the statutes should be given the fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation that best ensures the attainment of their objects, as required by provincial statutory interpretation legislation (see, for example, The Interpretation Act, 1993, S.S. 1993, c. I-11.1, s. 10). I agree with the following observation by Professor Dunlop in Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1995), at p. 598, that the purpose of fraudulent conveyance legislation:

> ... is to strike down all conveyances of property made with the intention of delaying, hindering or defrauding creditors and others except for conveyances made for good consideration and bona fide to persons not having notice of such fraud. The legislation is couched in very general terms and should be interpreted liberally. [Emphasis added.]

60 Given the need for a broad and liberal interpretation, I would suggest that there is a strong case for concluding that a life insurance beneficiary designation is both a "juridical act", and a "disposition" or "conveyance" of "property".

5. The Application of the Statute of Elizabeth

61 In the Court of Appeal, Jackson J.A. suggested that An Acte agaynst fraudulent Deedes Gyftes Alienations, &c. (Statute of Elizabeth), 1571 (Eng.) 13 Eliz. 1, c. 5, would be available to challenge fraudulent transactions rendering property exempt from execution or seizure. The Statute of Elizabeth is the model for the fraudulent conveyance legislation of the common law provinces, as discussed above. Its archaic language states that:

> ... all and every Feoffement Gyfte Graunte Alienation Bargayne and Conveyaunce of Landes Tenements Hereditams Goodes and Catalls or of any of them [[which were] contryved of Malyce Fraude Covyne Collusion or Guyle [with the] Purpose and Intent to delaye hynder or defraude Creditors] [shall be] clearely and utterly voyde frustrate and of none Effecte.

In Nicholson v. Milne (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 263 (Alta. Q.B.), Virtue J. considered the applicability of the Statute of Elizabeth in a situation where the defendants had each rendered RRSP and mutual funds exempt under Alberta's Insurance Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-5, s. 265, by transferring the funds into life insurance policies under which family members were named as beneficiaries. The issue before Virtue J. was whether the transfers could be set aside under Alberta's Fraudulent Preferences Act, or alternatively under the Statute of Elizabeth. He observed that the principal difference between the two statutes was that the provincial legislation required the gift or conveyance to have been made when the debtor was insolvent, was unable to pay his or her debts in full, or knew that he or she was on the eve of insolvency, whereas this was not a requirement under the Statute of Elizabeth. He then decided to proceed under the Statute of Elizabeth, in order to avoid dealing with the insolvency issue. He found that the fund transfers were effected for the purpose of defeating creditors, and then decided that the transfers, and the beneficiary designations, were "conveyances" subject to the Statute of Elizabeth, at p. 274:

> The term "Conveyance" (like the term transfer) is itself wide enough to encompass every method of disposing of, or parting with, property or an interest therein, absolutely or conditionally. The word is of general meaning and, given a liberal interpretation, includes the transactions here which resulted in the transfer of entitlement to the benefits of the R.R.S.P. property from the debtor to another in such a way as to remove it from execution by creditors. In my view, such a transaction comes within the meaning of "conveyance", as that term is used in the Statute of Elizabeth.

Thus, the fraudulent transfers and beneficiary designations were void, and the funds in the life insurance policies were not exempt from execution or seizure under the Insurance Act (see also Technurbe Building Construction Ltd. v. McKinley (1989), 76 C.B.R. (N.S.) 106 (Alta. Q.B.)).

62 Several of the provincial fraudulent conveyance statutes impose an insolvency requirement, like that contained in Alberta's Act: Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Yukon. Thus, assuming without deciding that the Statute of Elizabeth remains in force in those jurisdictions, it would allow creditors to challenge fraudulent conveyances without having to prove that, at the time of the conveyance, the debtor was insolvent, was unable to pay his or her debts in full, or knew that he or she was on the eve of insolvency.

63 There remains some controversy as to whether the Statute of Elizabeth is in force in all of the common law provinces and territories. Professor Dunlop discusses this issue in Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, supra, and suggests at p. 597 that the Statute has likely been repealed in British Columbia, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Ontario, where pure fraudulent conveyance legislation (i.e., legislation without the insolvency requirement) has been enacted. Since the matter was not argued in the case at bar, it would be inappropriate to decide here whether the Statute of Elizabeth remains in force in any particular jurisdiction. Suffice it to say that if the Statute is in force in a province or territory, then it will be available to challenge fraudulent conveyances rendering property exempt from execution or seizure under provincial law. I should add that my comments above concerning the issue of whether a life insurance beneficiary designation is a "property conveyance" apply equally in the case of the Statute of Elizabeth.

6. Conclusion

64 When Dr. Ramgotra transferred the funds from his two RRSPs into an RRIF under which his wife was the designated beneficiary, the funds became exempt from execution or seizure by reason of s. 67(1)(b) BIA, when read in conjunction with ss. 2(kk)(vii) and 158(2) of The Saskatchewan Insurance Act. Even though the beneficiary designation was a settlement within s. 91 BIA, and was void against the trustee in bankruptcy pursuant to the second branch of s. 91(2), the RRIF remained exempt from the claims of Dr. Ramgotra's creditors and, in particular, the appellant bank.

HALLETT, J.A.:

This is an application for leave to appeal and an appeal from Justice Hood's order refusing to reverse a prior decision she rendered refusing to order that Terrance Russell, a former employee of the respondent, be examined by the appellant pursuant to s. 163(2) of the Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. The appellant did not appeal the first order of Justice Hood.

Terry Russell is a former assistant vice-president of the respondent Bank with primary responsibility for the loan to NsC Diesel during the period from 1989 to July 1992. In late 1991 the respondent Bank petitioned NSC Diesel into bankruptcy. On December 3r', 1991, the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy appointed Ernst & Young as Trustee.

Terrance Russell was appointed an Inspector under the provisions of the Act. He left the respondent Bank in late 1992 and is no longer an Inspector of NsC Diesel in bankruptcy. Both NsC Diesel and NsC Corp. are controlled by the appellant.

Section 163(2) of the Act authorizes the examination of a number of persons for the purpose of investigating, the administration of the estate. The applicant must show sufficient cause before the court will order the examination sought.

Section 163(2) states:

163(2) On the application to the court by the Superintendent, any creditor or other interested person and on sufficient cause being shown, an order may be made for the examination under oath, before the registrar or other authorized person, of the trustee, the bankrupt, an inspector or a creditor, or any other person named in the order, for the purpose of investigating the administration of the estate of any bankrupt, and the court may further order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in the person's possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, the trustee or any creditor, the costs of the examination and investigation to be in the discretion of the court.

It must be remembered that this appeal is from a decision of Justice Hood on a motion brought by the appellant for her to reconsider her initial decision.

Section 187(5) of the Act provides:

187. (5) Every court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction.

To succeed the appellant must satisfy this Court that on the reconsideration motion Justice Hood applied wrong principles of law or that the order she made has resulted in a patent injustice. It is an error in law if Justice Hood misapprehended or failed to consider relevant evidence (Minkoff v. Poole and Lambert 1991 CanLII 2516 (NS CA), (1991), 101 N.S.R. (2d) 143).

On the motion to reconsider the appellant asserted that Justice Hood did not have before her on the original application heard on August 20t", 1997, certain materials he was relying on in support of his motion to examine Terrance Russell. In particular, Exhibit "C" to the Inspector's affidavit of July 9t", 1996, which was initially filed in support of a 1996 application under s. 163(2) to examine a Mr. Tony Purchase who was employed by ACOA, a government agency. ACOA was involved in the financing of NsC Diesel and in discussions with the respondent Bank and others after NsC Diesel got into financial difficulties in 1989.

The appellant's notice of motion for the first application expressly stated that the appellant would be relying on two affidavits of the Inspectors; one dated July, 1994, and the other July 9th, 1996. There is no reference to Terrance Russell in the body of either of these affidavits.

In February, 1992, at the first meeting of the Inspectors, they authorized the Trustee to examine the Benn brothers of Corporation House. They had been advising the appellant in developing his project at Sheet Harbour. The project involved the construction of premises and related works to test ships' engines manufactured by Krupp MaK for installation in vessels operated by the Canadian Navy.

A May 25t", 1992, meeting with the Benn brothers and the Trustee was arranged by Terrance Russell as a result of the resolution. The Inspectors wished to ascertain if there was fraud in relation to the payment by NsC Diesel of an insurance premium on a performance bond arranged through Corporation House. The meeting took place as scheduled and certain information was obtained from Corporation House. The July 1994 affidavit of the Inspectors asserts that the Trustee refused to redo the examinations of the Benn brothers but acknowledged that the Trustee's refusal was due to the fact that, by this time, the Trustee was not being funded; the respondent Bank having ceased to fund the Trustee in late 1992.

The affidavit concludes with paragraph 15 which states:

15. THAT it is the belief of the Inspectors that further examination under s. 163 of the BIA respecting the conduct of the June, 1992 examinations by the Officer of the Bankrupt or any other interested person would potentially be beneficial to the Estate, assist in proper administration and not be harmful and the information obtained will be without cost to the Estate.

There are ten exhibits attached to this affidavit. One of the exhibits is an affidavit of Joseph Brown dated September 31, 1993. With the exception of a paragraph in Joseph Brown's affidavit that Terrance Russell had been involved in arranging and administering the Bank's loan to NsC Diesel until July, 1992, there is no mention of Terrance Russell. Mr. Brown, at the time his affidavit was signed, was a vice-president of the respondent Bank and had primary responsibility for handling the NsC Diesel file since July of 1992. His affidavit was filed in an Ontario action brought by the respondent Bank against Krupp MaK and Collins Barrow.

Attached as Exhibit "H" to the Inspectors July, 1994, affidavit is a memorandum from the Inspectors to the Trustee dated October 23rd, 1993, in which the Inspectors outline their criticisms of the manner in which the Trustee performed its duties. The purpose of the memorandum was to advise the Trustee that they did not agree with the Trustee's opinion that the appellant's representation of NsC Diesel in legal proceedings had a negative effect. The memorandum also deals with the Inspectors' views concerning the role of Krupp MaK in the financial collapse of NsC Diesel in 1989. The Inspectors seem to support the appellant's theory that Krupp MaK wanted to regain control of the so-called technology agreement it had made with NsC Diesel and in order to do so did not honour its alleged commitment to invest approximately $4 million dollars in NsC Diesel and this precipitated the financial collapse of the company.

In his affidavit filed in the Ontario proceeding, Joseph Brown makes assertions which are at odds with the appellant's theory that Krupp MaK and the Bank conspired against NsC Diesel to cause its financial collapse. At paragraphs 8 and 13 Mr. Brown states:

8. Based on the information and documents referenced in the following paragraphs, it would appear that Black and Krupp Mak entered into arrangements, the effect of which was to create the appearance that a technology licencing agreement between Krupp Mak and NsC Diesel had a value of $4 million and that Black had made an equity injection of $5 million, neither of which were true. This appearance was created through a series of transactions which are summarized in the diagram attached as Exhibit "F" hereto, whereby Krupp MaK provided indirectly or directly the funds necessary to create on paper the appearance of the equity injection by Black in NsC Diesel when in fact such funds came from Krupp MaK, flowed through NsC Diesel and were sent immediately back to Krupp MaK.

13. Attached hereto and marked as Exhibit "M" is a letter dated December 2, 1988 from Black to NsC Diesel's representative Corporation House, which document I am advised by Gordon McGee and verily believe was obtained by him from Corporation House shortly before the commencement of this litigation. In that letter, Mr. Black states the following:

"As you fully understand, the $4 million value for technology is a paper value, which we use to inflate the overall project costs. MaK will forward this money, by way of a loan to F.W.L. Black, who will then invest it in the corporation and pay it back to Mak for the purchase of the technology."

Other than the references to Terrance Russell to which I have referred, the July, 1994, affidavit contains nothing relevant to Terrance Russell's involvement with NsC Diesel's loan or the meeting between the Trustee, its solicitors and the Benn brothers on May 26t", 1992. The evidence does disclose that he attended that meeting.

The appellant, with the support of the Inspectors, alleges that the Trustee acted improperly in (i) the examination of the Benn brothers; and (ii) providing information obtained at that meeting to the respondent Bank and not to the Inspectors. The appellant asserts that the Trustee did not protect the interests of the creditors in the technology agreement. I would also infer from the record that the only possible asset of NsC Diesel is its potential recovery in the lawsuits commenced by the appellant in his own name or in the name of NsC Diesel alleging conspiracies between the respondent Bank, Krupp as well as claims against the Trustee, etc. It would not appear from the record that the technology agreement has any value to the Estate of NsC Diesel in bankruptcy.

The July 9`", 1996, affidavit of the Inspectors focuses on a desire to examine Mr. Tony Purchase respecting discussions in 1989 between representatives of a few creditors, ACOA, the respondent Bank, Krupp MaK, the Benn brothers and Ernst & Young. The apparent purpose of these discussions was to see if the Sheet Harbour facility could be completed following NsC Diesel's defaults to its building contractor and other creditors.

It is alleged by the Inspectors that the parties to these 1989 discussions, and in particular Krupp and the respondent Bank, had an objective of securing the operating control of the bankrupt's project at Sheet Harbour to "the exclusion of the estate of the bankrupt". I would note that NsC Diesel was not in bankruptcy until December, 1991.

Exhibit "C" to the Inspector's affidavit of July, 1996, is a large binder containing documents estimated to be some 500 pages in length.

On the reconsideration hearing, the appellant only referred Justice Hood to certain documents in Exhibit "C". It would appear that he referred her to a document entitled "Issues for Meeting with Superintendent/Official Receiver". This document was prepared by the Inspectors and is dated May 30", 1994. It is contained at Tab B4 of Exhibit "C". Essentially the document complains of the failure of the Trustee to do certain things, including examinations under s. 163 of the Act of persons authorized by the Inspectors to be examined. The Inspectors wanted the Trustee to redo the examination of the

Digitized by Google

Benn brothers with respect to the bonding issue and the Inspectors wanted information from the Benn brothers on the "transaction outline". This is a reference to a document created in 1989 for discussion at the meeting to which I have referred, of certain creditors, including the respondent Bank, to explore courses of action to enable the NsC Diesel project at Sheet Harbour to be completed. The appellant takes a different view as to the purpose of the meeting. In any event, the meeting pre-dated the bankruptcy by two years.

Tab B4 of Exhibit "C" also contains Minutes of the Inspector's first meeting in February, 1992, and certain correspondence between the Trustee and the Benn brothers or their corporation and correspondence between law firms, etc. Much of what is in Exhibit "C" is irrelevant to the motions requesting an order to examine Terrance Russell.

An exhibit attached to Exhibit "C" of the July, 1996, affidavit of the Inspectors is an affidavit of S. Gordon McGee, a partner of Blake, Cassels& Graydon, sworn on May 18", 1994, and filed in Ontario proceeding 92-CQ-29496A in connection with an application by the appellant to have Blake, Cassels & Graydon removed as solicitors for the respondent Bank.

The record shows that the respondent Bank had initially funded the Trustee but withdrew funding in late 1992. None of the creditors, including those substantial creditors whose principal shareholders or employees are inspectors of NsC Diesel in bankruptcy have since been prepared to fund the Trustee.

A review of the material in Exhibit "C" would indicate that, in the Trustee's opinion, there were no tangible assets of NsC Diesel upon which anything could be realized. A review of the documentation would indicate that the Inspectors apparently pinned their hopes for some recovery on the possible success of any of the appellant's many law suits, including those against the Trustee, its solicitors, the respondent Bank and Krupp MaK. The record also shows that the respondent Bank has sued the appellant for fraudulent misrepresentation that induced the Bank to advance several million dollars to NsC Diesel. I would infer from the documents in Exhibit "C" that the office of the Superintendent in bankruptcy has apparently not seen fit to carry out the sort of investigation of the Trustee that the Inspectors desire.

The extent of the proceedings commenced by the appellant arising out of the collapse of his companies, NsC Corp. and NsC Diesel is illustrated in paragraphs 47, 64 and 65 of the McGee affidavit of May 14, 1994, which I quote:

47. In virtually all of the various proceedings described in Exhibit "O" hereto, Black has represented himself and NsC Corp. The following are some of the more salient highlights of the events in Nova Scotia as they relate to Black's conduct:

a) Black has, on five separate occasions, sought ex parte relief from the Nova Scotia Courts in circumstances where notice ought to have been given to the respondents, including ABN. On each occasion the requested relief was either refused or, if granted, subsequently set aside when it came to the notice of the effected party.

b) Black has, unsuccessfully, attempted through three separate claims or counterclaims and numerous motions in the bankruptcy proceedings to attack the petitioning into bankruptcy of NsC Diesel or sought damages from the trustee, ABN or ABN's counsel in respect thereto. On each occasion the proceedings have been stayed or dismissed, save for certain of his claims as against ABN which are ongoing.

c) Black has appealed virtually every decision made by the Nova Scotia Supreme Court or the Nova Scotia Bankruptcy Court. A total of eight appeals have been brought by him to the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal and five applications for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Each appeal or leave to appeal application has been unsuccessful.

64. In addition to those matters set out above relating to Black's role and conduct in the Nova Scotia Court, Black, NsC Corp. and/or NsC Diesel have commenced the following actions in the province of Ontario:

a) NsC Corp. issued a statement of claim against Krupp MaK and others in the Federal Court in Ottawa on June 4, 1990. A motion was brought in that action for an injunction, which was resolved on the basis of the delivery of an undertaking by one or more of the defendants. I have been advised by Krupp MaK's Ontario solicitors and believe that NsC Corp. is continuing to pursue that action.

b) Black, NsC Corp. and others commenced an action against Krupp MaK, Corporation House, Bruce Benn, Ron Benn, Steelwood Consulting Corporation, Gary Wiseman and others in the Supreme Court of Ontario at Ottawa on June 15, 1990 claiming damages in excess of $100 million. On December 13, 1990 the plaintiffs were ordered to add NsC Diesel (the corporate party who dealt with the defendants in that action) as a plaintiff in the action. That action has not proceeded further because NsC Diesel is a bankrupt and cannot be added as a party without leave of the Court, which leave has not been obtained. In May 1992 Krupp MaK brought a motion for security for costs in that action, which motion was dismissed by the Honourable Mr. Justice Cosgrove on May 22, 1992 on the basis that Black and NsC Corp. had demonstrated that they were impecunious.

c) NsC Corp. and Black commenced an action against Ernst & Young Inc. and Peter Cleveland (the partner at Ernst & Young Inc. responsible for the custodianship and receivership of NsC Diesel in the CCAA proceedings) on June 30, 1992 claiming damages in excess of $580 million. I have been advised by Michael Thompson, general counsel at Ernst & Young Inc., and believe that this action has been stayed on the basis that Ontario is not the convenient forum.

65. In addition to the within proceedings ABN also commenced a separate action in late 1991 against the solicitors who represented it in making the loan and in early 1992 a further action was commenced with respect to the loan insurance which was to be provided to it by ACOA. Examinations for discovery of all parties in these actions have been held (in excess of ten full days). These actions have been ordered tried together and are expected to be pre-tried within the next few months. A motion for summary judgment has been scheduled for September of this year in the action against ACOA.

I have already referred to Mr. Brown's affidavit filed in the respondent Bank's action in Ontario alleging conspiracy between Krupp MaK and NsC Diesel to misrepresent to the respondent Bank that Krupp MaK was investing $4 million in NsC Diesel when the transaction was, in the Bank's view, a sham.

There was no reference in the notice of motion on the original application to the July 14th, 1994, affidavit of the appellant in which affidavit Terrance Russell was mentioned as a person that ought to be ordered to be examined by the appellant.

On the first application Justice Hood refused to consider the Inspector's Resolution dated August 191", 1997, supporting the appellant's motion for an order to examine Terrance Russell. She refused to do so as the Resolution was not properly put before the court having been presented to the Court during the appellant's oral argument; and secondly, was not verified by an affidavit as being a resolution of the Inspectors.

In her decision on the original motion, Justice Hood made express reference to the two affidavits of the inspectors.

As noted by Justice Hood in her decision on the first application, the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy has, since 1991, dealt with a "myriad of applications" arising out of the bankruptcy of NsC Diesel and NsC Corporation.

It was within Justice Hood's discretion on the first application not to consider the Inspector's resolution of August 19`", 1997.

The essence of Justice Hood's decision on the first application is contained in the following paragraphs:

> Examinations under Section 163(2) are only ordered when sufficient cause is shown and that sufficient cause must be directly related to the person sought to be examined. To say there is cause for questions to be asked and, as Mr. Black repeated in his oral submissions, "I must start somewhere" is not what Section 163(2) requires. There must be some demonstrated connection between the evidence, if any, of something being amiss and the ability of the named person to shed some light on it as it relates to the administration of the Estate.
> Mr. Black says that there may be assets of the bankrupt estate which were not recovered. There is no evidence of this and nothing whatsoever to cause me to believe that even if it is true, Mr. Russell knows anything about it.
> I therefore refuse to exercise my discretion to order the examination of Terry Russell.

In her decision on the reconsideration motion, Justice Hood stated, with respect to material that may not have been available to her on the first application:

> Material dated July of 1996 could have been available. If Mr. Black was concerned that it had material in it that was vital to the application before me in August of 1997, the onus was upon him to ensure that not only was it available, but the specific parts of it to which I need, according to him, direct my attention were in fact brought to my attention . . . . .
> I should also note that the only way for Mr. Black to ensure that on each court application the court has whatever material he wishes to have the court's attention drawn to is to take the responsibility himself of making that information available. If he wants the court to read an affidavit or if wants the court to read material then that material 'needs to be produced for the court.

I would infer that Justice Hood was referring to the possible absence, from the Inspector's July, 1996 affidavit, of Exhibit "C" to that affidavit.

I agree with Justice Hood's remarks that the appellant must alert the court to the evidence he relies on in support of his applications. There was no mention in the notices of motion filed with respect to the applications that the appellant was relying upon his July 1994 affidavit which had been filed in connection with another application. There was nothing in the body of the Inspector's affidavits of July, 1994 and July, 1996, that contained any reference to Terrance Russell let alone why he would have evidence that warranted an order for his examination. There is, however, the information in Exhibit "C" to the July, 1996 affidavit of the Inspectors that Terrance Russell was involved in a meeting between the Trustee and the Benn brothers on May 25t", 1992. This information is also in Joseph Brown's affidavit attached to the July, 1994, affidavit of the Inspectors. Whether Exhibit "C" was or was not before Justice Hood cannot be conclusively determined but it would appear from the record that it may not have been before her.

On the first application it is clear from the record that Justice Hood was aware that Terrance Russell attended the meeting on May 25'", 1992, at which meeting the Trustee obtained certain information from the Benn brothers and made that information available to the Bank. Justice MacPherson of the Ontario Supreme Court dealt with allegations made by the appellant in one of the proceedings in Ontario that the Trustee acted improperly in turning over this information to the bank. Justice MacPherson apparently found no fault with the Trustee having done so. As Justice Hood in her decision on the first application quoted from Justice MacPherson's decision as follows:

The information was obtained, with no objection from Corporation House, pursuant to various provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, especially ss. 26 and 163. The entire scheme of this Act is to permit the trustee to investigate the events surrounding a bankruptcy and to make the fruits of the trustee's investigation available to the creditors and their representatives, the inspectors. The information and documentation received from Corporation House comes squarely within this statutory scheme. The trustee was entitled to obtain it and all of the creditors, including ABN, are entitled to know about it.

The appellant persists in putting forward his argument that the Trustee or its solicitor acted improperly in turning over to the respondent Bank information obtained from Corporation House (the Benn brothers). The propriety of the Trustee's action has been resolved by Justice MacPherson's decision even though the appellant does not accept his finding.

A review of Exhibit "C" shows that on April 23rd, 1993, the Trustee sent to Mr. Jerry Dill, one of the Inspectors, the report of the Trustee's representative who had conducted the interview of the Benn brothers. In paragraphs 67 and 68 of S. Gordon McGee's affidavit of May 14, 1994, he stated:

67. As set out above, neither ABN nor Blake, Cassels & Graydon have any objections to producing to the parties in this litigation the documents which were obtained during the various interviews conducted in May and June of 1992 which they have in their possession and which they obtained from R. Benn, B. Benn, G. Wiseman and M. Panciuk. No prior request for the production of these documents has ever been made of Blake, Cassels & Graydon or ABN.

68. In paragraph 8 of Black's "Supplementary Factum" filed herein Black suggests:

These solicitors Blake, Cassels and Boyne Clarke, moved to protect the section 163 material obtained by the trustee and the solicitors of the Estate from Corporation House Limited (B. Benn and R. Benn) and to keep, this information confidential for sole use of (heir client the ABN Amro Bank in a Ontario Civil proceeding (this proceeding) and in direct contravention of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure.

To the extent that these unsworn allegations require a response, I categorically deny them. At no time have I or, to my knowledge, any member of Blake, Cassels & Graydon, or Boyne Clarke, whether in our former capacity as solicitors for the trustee in bankruptcy, or in our capacity as solicitors for ABN, attempted to prevent any party from having access to the subject documents.

These allegations made by the appellant were rejected by Justice MacPherson and fly in the face of the documents in Exhibit "C" which show that the material information obtained by the Trustee from the interview of the Benn brothers was sent to Inspector Dill albeit not until several months after the information was given to the respondent Bank.

The conspiracy that the appellant alleges between the respondent bank and Krupp MaK allegedly occurred in 1989, long before NsC Diesel was petitioned into bankruptcy. Therefore, questions that might be asked of Terrance Russell relevant to the alleged 1989 conspiracy have nothing to do with the administration of the estate of NsC Diesel in bankruptcy. The Civil Procedure Rules of Ontario relating to discovery are available to the appellant with respect to the actions he has commenced in Ontario. Section 163(2) of the Act and the Rules made thereunder are available to the appellant in the actions he has commenced in either or both his own name and that of NsC Diesel within the bankruptcy proceedings in Nova Scotia with respect to the administration of the estate. However, to obtain an order under s. 163(2) to examine Terrance Russell the appellant must show cause why such an order ought to be made.

The wording of s. 163(2) of the Act that requires an applicant to show sufficient cause to warrant the order being granted requires that the applicant put forth factual information in affidavit form or in sworn testimony that would disclose something more than a desire to go on a fishing expedition. The scheme of the Act and its proper functioning requires that trustees act with integrity and, in effect, assumes they will so act. Otherwise the purposes and objectives of the Act would be frustrated. If a trustee's actions are being questioned, as in this case, the Act properly requires that sufficient cause be shown to warrant an order for examination. This requires that evidence be put forward on the application that would indicate a problem existed with respect to the trustee's administration of the estate and that the person sought to be examined would likely have evidence relevant to the issue. The unwillingness of a Trustee, who is not being paid, to carry out tasks the Inspectors authorize is not a breach of the Trustee's duties under the Act.

Justice Hood did not fail to consider the evidence that was pro operly put forward by the appellant in support of his first motion to examine Terrance Russell. The appellant did not satisfy Justice Hood that there was sufficient cause shown to warrant issuing an order for the examination of Terrance Russell under s. 163(2) of the Act. Justice Hood found as a fact that there was no evidence before her of anything amiss in the administration of the estate of NsC Diesel in bankruptcy and no evidence that the bankrupt had assets that were not recovered by the Trustee or that if there were there is no evidence from which it could be inferred that Terrance Russell would likely have relevant evidence on the issue. A review of the record indicates that Justice Hood did not err in coming to this conclusion and, therefore, did not err in dismissing the original application.

The legal principles that would apply to a reconsideration motion under s. 187(5) of the Act are set out in Houlden & Morowetz text Bankruptcy 8Z Insolvency Law of Canada, 31 edition, vol. 2, at pp. 7-20 to 7-25 as follows:

(a) The jurisdiction given by Section 187(5) should be sparingly exercised; it is a matter of indulgence and must be carefully guarded.

(b) The discretion given by Section 187(5) must be exercised judicially ... different considerations apply to the exercise of the discretion according to the character of the Order sought to be varied or rescinded.

(c) The sub-section permits a judge to deal with continuing matters in the bankruptcy so as not to be bound by an earlier decision, if circumstances have changed ... there must be a fundamental change in circumstances between the original hearing and the time when a review is sought, or evidence must have been discovered which was not known at the time of the original hearing and which would have led to a different result.

(d) The question on a Section 187(5) application is not, as in an appeal, whether the original Order ought to have been made, but whether an Order ought to remain in force in the light of either of changed circumstances or in the light of fresh evidence.

(e) The onus is on the applicant to satisfy the Court that the Order should be varied or rescinded.

(f) Section 187(5) is not an alternative remedy to an appeal, nor is it designed merely to give a disgruntled party an opportunity to relitigate questions and issues already decided. There must be new material or material indicating a change in circumstances for the Court to make an Order under Section 187(5).

(g) If the applicant intends to proceed on the record that was before the Court when the original Order was made, the proper mode of proceeding is ordinarily an appeal. If there is new evidence or evidence of a change of circumstances, then an application under Section 187(5) is the appropriate remedy.

(h) Although Section 187(5) contains no time limit, an application must be made promptly and within a reasonable time of acquiring knowledge of the order sought to be varied or rescinded.

Section 187(5) of the Act is not an alternative remedy to an appeal of the original order of Justice Hood. Nor is it an opportunity to have an issue relitigated.

This was an interlocutory matter that required Justice Hood to exercise her discretion judicially. A review of the record discloses that Justice Hood did not appear to give consideration, to the support of the Inspectors of the appellant's motion to examine Terrance Russell. She said their support was irrelevant but did so in the context of stating that the discretion to make the order was hers, not the Inspectors. She was correct.

I would note that in the Minutes of the Inspectors' meeting of May 211, 1996, at which the Inspectors approved of an application for an order to examine Tony Purchase of ACOA, it is stated that one of the purposes of examining him was to assist one of the Inspectors "in a potential action against ACOA". That is not a proper reason to authorize examination under s. 163(2) of the Act. The Inspectors' resolution of August, 1997, supporting the appellant's application to examine Terrance Russell contains nothing of that sort. However, the appellant's law suits are the only straw the Inspectors have to grasp at if they hope to be paid anything on their outstanding accounts. Their support must be looked at in this light.

A review of Justice Hood's decision on the reconsideration motion shows that she applied the correct legal test in deciding that she would not reverse her original order as there was no change of circumstance since the original application nor was any new material put before her on the reconsideration motion that could not have been properly put before her on the original application. Therefore, it was not a legal error for Justice Hood to refuse to consider the evidence in Exhibit "C" put forward on the reconsideration motion.

I have reviewed the evidence in Exhibit "C" simply to show that it did not contain facts that could have resulted in a different decision on the first application, assuming that Justice Hood failed to consider Exhibit "C" on that application.

At first blush it may appear that an order for the examination of Terrance Russell might have been made either on the first application or on the motion for reconsideration. However, on analysis of the facts the appellant failed to show sufficient cause to warrant such an order. The application lacked facts to support the granting of the order sought. The support of the Inspectors does not change this deficiency in the application. If the Inspectors have evidence to put before the court that would warrant an order for the examination of Terrance Russell it is open to the Inspectors to make such an application. Therefore, Justice Hood's decision on the reconsideration motion has not resulted in a patent injustice. I would not interfere with the exercise by Justice Hood of her discretion on the reconsideration motion.

In her reconsideration decision Hood, J. stated:

With respect to costs, my decision from August indicated that costs were to be paid forthwith. If costs have not been paid forthwith I understand that in the Ontario Courts, the courts made a ruling that the costs have to be paid before further proceedings are taken. I think it is time that such an order be made in this court. If the costs with respect to the proceedings under S.H. No. 80055 are not paid, then no further proceedings are to be taken until those costs are paid. That may affect the hearing which I understand is scheduled for about two weeks from now. If the costs are not paid, then that hearing should not proceed.

Because of my decision today with respect to the necessity of the s. 187(5) application, I am going to order that the costs of the ABN AMRO Bank be paid forthwith. I order costs to be paid forthwith in the amount of $500.00.

The essence of this ruling was incorporated into the order issued on December 19t", 1997.

The appellant asserts Justice Hood erred in ordering that he could not proceed further without paying the outstanding cost awards.

In S. Gordon McGee's affidavit of May 181h'1994, which forms part of Exhibit
"C", the deponent states in paragraph 48:

48. I am advised by David Coles and believe that as a result of Black's and NsC Corp.'s unsuccessful efforts to attack the bankruptcy of NsC Diesel or to pursue the trustee in bankruptcy, ABN , or ABN's counsel, it has been ordered to pay ABN (or its counsel) costs on at least 17 separate occasions. I am advised by David Coles and believe that these cost Orders total in excess of $14,000.00. Six of the cost Orders which were granted were payable forthwith and are in the total amount of more than $10,000.00. I am advised by David Coles and believe that none of these latter cost Orders have been satisfied.

Attached hereto and marked as Exhibit `P"to this my affidavit are true copies of the six cost Orders, or reasons for decision on which Orders were subsequently granted, which were payable forthwith and which were granted by the Nova Scotia courts.

The appellant has disregarded the orders of the Nova Scotia courts. He submits that he is impecunious. He has not presented any evidence to support this submission. However, I do note that in 1992 he apparently satisfied Justice Cosgrove in Ontario that he was impecunious. Whether he still is I do not know.

Costs are in the discretion of the court. The court has an inherent jurisdiction to control its own process.

The appellant acknowledged during the hearing of this appeal that there are approximately six outstanding orders requiring him to pay costs forthwith and that he has not complied with the Orders. Under the circumstances, I would not interfere with the exercise by Justice Hood of her discretion on this issue except to vary her Order so as to authorize a Judge of the Supreme Court to grant leave to the appellant to bring further proceedings or applications if circumstances are shown that it would be just to allow the appellant to initiate or continue any proceeding notwithstanding that costs remain outstanding.

Leave to appeal is granted but the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs to the Bank of $1,000.00 plus disbursements to be paid by the appellant and further costs to the Bank of $500.00 inclusive of disbursements payable by the Intervenors. Both cost awards ought to be paid forthwith.

CROMWELL, J.A.: (Dissenting)

In my view, the Chambers judge erred in principle in refusing to reconsider her earlier order. Accordingly, and with great respect to my colleague, Hallett, J.A., whose reasons I have had the advantage of reviewing, I would grant leave to appeal and allow the appeal. I will briefly set out my reasons for reaching this conclusion.

Section 163(2) of the Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act permits orders to be made for the examination under oath of persons for the purpose of investigating the administration of the estate. Interested persons may apply for these orders and they may be made if "sufficient cause" is shown. These orders are often made by the Registrar in Bankruptcy without notice to other interested parties. Their purpose is to help ensure that the estate is being administered in the interests of the creditors and in accordance with the law.

Section 187(5) of the Bankruptcy Bz Insolvency Act allows all courts making orders in bankruptcy matters to "review, rescind or vary" them. While its main purpose is to provide flexibility that is needed to deal with changing circumstances in the course of the administration of the estate, the authority granted by the section is extremely broad. It is appropriate to invoke these powers of review if evidence or points of law have been overlooked, if the consideration of the matter was in some way incomplete or if it is otherwise just and expedient in the control of the Court's process: see Re Strachan (1980), 34 C.B.R. 136 (Ont Sup Ct in Bank) at 139 and Re Quinn (1989), 72 C.B.R. 80 (Ont Sup Ct in Bank) at 82.

Since 1994, Mr. Black has attempted to obtain orders for the examination of various individuals under s. 163(2). In 1994, he applied to examine 15 people including one Terry Russell. That application was dismissed but on appeal to this Court, the dismissal was set aside and Mr. Black was given leave to make a fresh application.

He did so, this time limiting the application to a request for an examination of Mr. Russell. His application was dismissed by Hood, J. in August of 1997. Mr. Black applied to the learned judge for reconsideration of her decision. That application was dismissed in December of 1997. Hood, J. also made an order requiring Mr. Black to pay all outstanding cost awards presently due and payable by him to the ABN AMRO Bank before initiating or continuing any proceedings in respect to this bankruptcy file.

Mr. Black now seeks leave to appeal, if required, and appeals the dismissal of his application for reconsideration and the imposition of this condition.

In my respectful view, the learned judge applied the wrong test under s. 187(5) and applied the test she did adopt in an unduly rigid manner. In both respects she erred in principle. In essence, the teamed judge held that before she could review her earlier order, it had to be demonstrated that there was substantial new evidence that was not known or could not have been made available at the first hearing with reasonable diligence or that the circumstances had changed.

At the outset of the Chambers hearing, the learned judge referred to this principle as one that went to her jurisdiction to hear the matter. At another point, she referred to it as a "preliminary hurdle." While some of the cases assert this as the general rule, others, including Re Strachan to which the learned judge referred, make it clear that the approach to a s. 187(5) review should not be inflexible.

Of course, the section must not be used simply to relitigate points that have been settled. But on the other hand, the section is very broadly worded and is intended to provide a simple way to ensure that the substance of the matter before the court has been dealt with appropriately. In this way, the delay and expense of appeals are avoided. In my view, broadly framed statutory conferrals of jurisdiction to review, rescind and vary such as that found in s. 187(5) should not be circumscribed by inflexible, judicially created rules. Whether the evidence could have been placed before the court on the earlier occasion or there are changed circumstances are factors to be considered in exercising the discretion to review, vary or rescind. However, these factors are not inflexible rules of law to be applied without regard to other relevant considerations.

Even if these review applications require the applicant to show that there is new evidence that could not have been placed before the court with due diligence or that the circumstances have changed, I think , with respect, that the learned Chambers judge applied this test in an unduly restrictive way.

It was argued that a lengthy exhibit to an affidavit ought to have been before the judge on the earlier hearing but apparently was not. Of course, I agree completely with the Chambers judge that it was Mr. Black's responsibility to ensure that all the material necessary for the Court was placed before it. It is not enough to refer compendiously to material on file, particularly in a voluminous and complex file such as this. However, when this material was drawn to the Court's attention, at least some consideration ought to have been given to the substance of the argument rather than dismissing it purely on the basis that it could have been placed before the court on the earlier occasion. The learned Chambers judge stated that " whether or not it [i.e. the material relied on] is substantial ... does not need to be decided, and I am not going to make a decision on that issue." Adopting that approach was an error in principle.

Digitized by Google

Further, the learned judge made no reference on the reconsideration application to a resolution of the Inspectors of the estate which she had ruled inadmissible at the first hearing because it was filed late. It is implicit in the learned judge's decision that the Inspectors' resolution was not new even though it had been presented at the earlier hearing and ruled inadmissible as a result of late filing. With great respect, this seems to me to take an unduly restrictive approach to what may constitute new evidence for the purposes of a s. 187(5) review. Of course, lack of diligence of the party advancing the material is relevant to the exercise of the discretion. However, to hold that evidence which was previously ruled inadmissible on technical grounds is not "new" when properly submitted and therefore precludes further consideration of it is an error in principle.

I also am of the view that the learned Chambers judge erred in her approach to the Inspectors' resolution. The Inspectors of the estate had expressed their support for the examination of Mr. Russell. Although not referred to in her decision, it seems from the transcript of the hearing that the judge accepted submissions made on behalf of the Bank that the position of the Inspectors was simply irrelevant to whether Mr. Black had shown sufficient cause for the examination of Mr. Russell.

Of course the decision to order, or not to order, the examination is for the Court and not the Inspectors. That does not make their views irrelevant. The examination under s. 163(2) is ultimately for the benefit of the creditors. The Inspectors are their representatives. Under s. 163(1) of the Bankruptcy& Insolvency Act, the Trustee, on the resolution of the creditors, may examine without order of the court a wide range of persons thought to have relevant information. In this bankruptcy, there was effectively no trustee in that the trustee by the time of this application was inactive because there were no funds to cover the trustee's fees. In addition, this bankruptcy is complex, with allegations and cross allegations of all manner of wrongdoing both before and after the petition. In these circumstances, the views of the inspectors, while not controlling the court's discretion in any way, were and are entitled to considerable respect. In the particular circumstances of this bankruptcy, I should have thought that a judge would wish to have substantial reasons for not giving the Inspectors' views very considerable weight in deciding whether sufficient cause had been shown for a s. 163(2) examination. Dismissing their views as irrelevant, as the learned Chambers judge appears to have done was, in my respectful view, an error in principle.

For these reasons, I conclude that the teamed Chambers judge erred in principle in her consideration of the application under s. 187(5) and that her order dismissing the application should be set aside.

By the combined effect of Rule 51 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Rules and Civil Procedure Rule 62.23(1) (a), this Court is authorized to make"... any order which might have been made by the court appealed from..." . I therefore turn to the question of whether the Chambers judge ought to have rescinded her earlier order and ordered the examination of Mr. Russell.

I do not wish to contribute unnecessarily to the repetition of allegations and cross-allegations of wrongdoing in this bankruptcy. I will limit myself to saying that the material before the Court raises questions that are relevant to the administration of the estate and about which Mr. Russell as a former inspector of the estate and senior officer of the Bank is likely to have relevant information. The evidence supporting this conclusion is summarized by Flinn J.A. in the decision of this Court in this matter in May of 1997. The Inspectors think Mr. Russell should be examined. The Trustee, if active, could examine him without order at the request of the creditors. In my view, sufficient cause existed for the examination and I would issue an order authorizing Mr. Black to conduct it. I would therefore rescind the order of Hood, J. dated September 18, 1997, set aside her order dated December 19, 1997 and in their place issue an order authorizing the examination of Mr. Russell.

However, I would do so on conditions. As noted by the learned Chambers judge, various cost awards made against Mr. Black and payable forthwith in these proceedings remain unsatisfied. I would make my order authorizing the examination of Mr. Russell conditional on payment of all costs awards against Mr. Black which were directed to be payable forthwith and which remain unpaid in all bankruptcy proceedings involving Mr. Black in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy or in this Court. Of course, any costs awards in his favour that have not been paid may be set off.

I would not award costs of either of the proceedings before Hood, J. or of this appeal.

CLARKE, C.J.N.S.: (In Chambers)

The Bankruptcy of NsC Diesel Power Inc. and its associated companies has resulted in a series of proceedings before the courts that have been spread over the last five years or thereabouts.

Mr. Frederick W. F. Black was its principal operating officer and also a director and shareholder. He has been both the applicant and the respondent in most of the matters which have been before the courts. Prompted by another flurry of applications by various of the parties who are intimately involved in this continuing proceeding, I agreed to hear the parties in Chambers on October 10 and 11, 1996.

It is to these matters that I shall refer in the pages that follow. There is some repetition in the narrative respecting certain of the applications which is difficult to avoid. Some of the proceedings are characterized by a measure of brevity which at the minimum should be understood by the parties.

1. This Proceeding

On May 30, 1996, Mr. Black, creditors, the Superintendent in Bankruptcy, and the Inspectors appeared before me in chambers (NSCA) with several applications. I set down October 10, 1996 to hear all the applications filed by the parties relating to the Bankruptcy. The hearing continued on October 11, 1996.

On July 11, 1996, Mr. Black and the Inspectors appeared before Justice Roscoe in Chambers (NSCA) in Bankruptcy with an application seeking an Order for examination under s. 163 BIA of certain persons in now or formerly in the employ of the Ernst & Young Inc., Trustee and more particularly Messrs. Cleveland, Harris, Reiter and Purchase. She concluded that she did not have jurisdiction to hear the matter or to grant the Order. She made reference to the hearing scheduled before me on October 10, 1996, indicating that further consideration of this application might be given at that time. (C.A. No. 127649) Chambers.

On July 15, 1996, Ernst & Young Inc. (Trustee), Ernst & Young Inc. (personal capacity), ABN Amro Bank, Krupp MaK Maschinenbau GmbH and Krupp MaK Diesel Inc. filed separate notices of application for Orders, (1) quashing the respondent's (Mr. Black) notice of appeal pursuant to CPR 62.31(1) and CPR 14.25(1), (2) security for costs pursuant to General Rule 49(4) and CPR 42, and (3) solicitor-client costs in the event of the cause.

Krupp MaK Machinenbau GmnH and Krupp MaK Diesel Inc. requested, in addition to the above, an injunction and stay of proceedings with respect to issues in this matter already determined by the NSSC, NSCA and SCC.

On July 15, 1996, Mr. Black filed a notice of motion in the Court of Appeal in Chambers for an Order "reviewing and rescinding" Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's orders of June 20, 1994 and August 3, 8 and 10, 1994 on the grounds that "all offend the appropriate provisions of the BIA, the Judicature Act and its Rules of Practice and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and prejudice the applicant Black, in the fulfilment of his duties and the majority of the Estate of NsC Diesel in the recovery of their claims".

On July 29, 1996, the Registrar of the Court of Appeal, by correspondence, informed Mr. Black that I granted him leave to make an application in Chambers for an Order of Examination pursuant to s. 163 BIA, provided Mr. Black limited his submissions to writing and that notice of such application is given to the other parties so that they would have an opportunity to respond in writing in a timely fashion.

On August 15, 1996, Mr. Black filed material regarding his application for the examination of Messrs. Harris, Reiter, Cleveland and Landers, all of or formerly, persons in the employ of Ernst & Young Inc., the Trustee of the Estate of the Bankrupt.

On August 15, 1996, Mr. Black also filed a cross-motion to the motions of the Trustee (Ernst & Young) and the creditor (ABN Amro Bank). The cross-motion alleging breach of trust sought to remove Ernst & Young Inc. as Trustee and remove its solicitors and agent as well as the solicitors and agents for the Bank.

The above reflects in a general way the matters that came before me on October 10 and 11, 1996.

2. History of the Proceedings

Digitized by Google

The following is a chronological summary of relevant proceedings to date. It is accurate so far as I can ascertain from the considerable volume of applications, decisions and Orders that have accumulated to this time.

On February 13, 1993, Justice Boudreau (NSSC) (not reported) ordered that Mr. Black was not permitted to continue to act in the same manner as a counsel representing the appellant, NsC Corporation in proceedings before him relative to the Bankruptcy of NsC Diesel Inc. He stayed proceedings taken by NsC Corporation in Bankruptcy until such time as counsel was engaged. His decision was based on his concern that Mr. Black would be in a position of conflict should he be acting as counsel for the Bankrupt while at the same time be called as a witness giving evidence in preliminary and trial matters.

The decision of Justice Boudreau was upheld on Appeal to NSCA [reflex, (1993), 125 N.S.R. (2d) 223]. Leave to appeal to Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed.

On Friday, June 17, 1994, Mr. Black obtained from the Registrar in Bankruptcy an ex parte Order for Examination of certain persons in the employ of the Trustee including Messrs. Cleveland, Harris, Reiter and Landers. During the weekend, counsel for the Trustee contacted Associate Chief Justice Palmeter at his home to inform him of the Registrar's Order and indicated that the Trustee objected to the nature of the Order. The Associate Chief Justice was then the caseflow manager of an action in process before the NSSC.

On Monday, June 20, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter filed an ex parte Order which stayed the June 17, 1994 Order of the Registrar of Bankruptcy "pending further determination" by the Court.

On June 29, 1994, Mr. Black filed a notice of motion in the NSSC to rescind the Order of June 20, 1994 pursuant to s. 187(5) BIA.

On or about July 13, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter reconvened the case management process to permit an inter partes hearing on the June 17, 1994 Order of the Registrar and his June 20, 1994 Order by which he stayed the Registrar's Order. Associate Chief Justice Palmeter determined that the Registrar's Order was improper and he refused to exercise his discretion to revisit his own Order staying the Registrar's Order or further, to entertain an appeal. He also determined that all applications by Mr. Black would be stayed until Mr. Black obtained legal counsel. In July, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter, by correspondence, informed Mr. Black to "not correspond further with this Court except through counsel".

An appeal was filed in NSCA Chambers by Mr. Blacknrespecting the July 13, 1994 decision and the June 20, 1994 Order. Mr. Black set these down for hearing in NSCA Chambers on August 4, 1994.

On August 3, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter issued Orders confirming an earlier decision (July 13, 1994) in which he, (1) dismissed with costs Mr. Black's application for an Order removing Boyne Clarke as solicitor for ABN Amro Bank, (2) dismissed Mr. Black's application for an Order for examination of certain parties under s. 163 BIA and, (3) issued an order, upon the motion of the Court, requiring that all applications by Frederick W. L. Black as an officer of any of his related companies and any applications by the said companies be stayed until such time as they are represented by legal counsel authorized to carry on the practice of law in the province of Nova Scotia.

On August 4, 1994, Mr. Black sought directions before me in Chambers. After hearing submissions from Mr. Black and counsel for other parties, I set down his application to appeal the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter for hearing by a panel of judges of the Court of Appeal.

On August 8, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter ordered, (1) upon the motion of the Trustee, that the application made by NsC Corporation Limited dated December 14, 1992 for removal of Ernst & Young Inc. as Trustee of the Estate of NsC Diesel Power Incorporated, a Bankrupt, be dismissed, and (2) granted the application of ABN Amro Bank to dismiss all applications to annul the Bankrupt being applications of June, 1992, August 7, 1992, September, 1992, December, 1992 and October, 1993.

On August 10, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter granted, (1) approval to Krupp MaK Diesel under s. 38(1) BIA to enable it to take action against Mr. Black for fraud, and (2) dismissed the Inspector's application to challenge the votes of Krupp and the Bank cast at a creditors' meeting in November, 1993.

On October 4, 1994, Mr. Black applied to the Court of Appeal in Chambers for an Order to, (1) nullify the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter dated August 8 and 10, 1994, (2) to change the venue for the balance of the Bankruptcy proceedings to NSCA, and (3) out of pocket costs on the motions.

On October 26, 1994, Justice Pugsley, in Chambers (NSCA), heard the application brought by Mr. Black. He (Mr. Black) stated he was not appealing the August 8 and 10, 1994 Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. Justice Pugsley found that, (1) he had no authority to "nullify" the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter dated August 8 and 10, 1994, and (2) that these Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter were not proceedings under the August 3, 1994 Order and thereby could not be stayed pursuant to s. 195 BIA, and (3) he denied the motion to change venue on the basis that there was no evidence that Associate Chief Justice Palmeter was biased toward Mr. Black at the time he heard the August 8 and 10, 1994 matters. (C.A. No. 107528)

On October 26, 1994, Justice Pugsley also heard two applications brought by Ernst& Young Inc. in its personal capacity and by ABN Amro Bank. The Court granted an Order for security of costs against Mr. Black personally on the appeal of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's August 3, 1994 Order. (C.A. No. 107528)
On November 24, 1994, Mr. Black sought to appeal the October 26, 1994 Orders of Justice Pugsley. This he made by application before me in Chambers (NSCA) pursuant to s. 193(a), (b), (c) BIA. He requested that the decisions appealed from be reversed. I considered it doubtful whether it was possible to appeal an Order of the NSCA in Chambers to a panel of the NSCA under s. 193, and stated in part, ... "the major hurdle confronting the appellant/applicant in this proceeding is whether (a), (b) and (c) of s. 193 have any application at all. The bottom line of this application is to have me reverse and set aside the referenced Orders of Pugsley, J.A. or, possibly, grant leave to have them considered by a panel of the Court of Appeal."
In upholding the Orders of Pugsley, J.A., I concluded that on the facts the above sections of s. 193 BIA did not apply and there was no cause for the Court to exercise its discretion to grant leave under s. 193(e) [1994 CanLII 3970 (NS CA), (1994), 137 N.S.R. (2d) 37].

On November 24, 1994, I also heard two further applications in Chambers brought by Ernst & Young Inc. in its personal capacity and by ABN Amro Bank. I ordered that Mr. Black's appeal from Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's August 3, 1994 Order be dismissed on the grounds that he failed to comply with the Order of Justice Pugsley respecting the posting of security for costs.
On March 2, 1995, Mr. Black brought an application in Chambers before Justice Freeman seeking leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from judgments of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court being the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter, and decisions of the Court of Appeal in Chambers being mine of November 24, 1994, or, in the alternative, for leave to have the appeal set down to be heard before "an independent and unbiased panel" of the Court of Appeal. Justice Freeman observed that the first portion of the application could not be supported given that the appeal of the August 3, 1994 Order had been dismissed by this Court. He further denied leave to appeal on the basis that s. 195 BIA made all decisions of the Court on any appeal final and conclusive. He concluded there was no procedure for an appeal to a panel of this Court from a Judge of the Court of Appeal (NSCA) sitting in Chambers [1995 CanLII 4352 (NS CA), (1995), 140 N.S.R. (2d) 279].
Mr. Black filed a notice of application for leave to appeal the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Chambers (November 24, 1994 and March 2, 1995) to the Supreme Court of Canada. He did not file all the necessary material within the required time period and as a result, he applied for an extension of time for filing.
On December 15, 1995, Mr. Justice Major of the Supreme Court of Canada responded to the application for directions from Mr. Black with respect to the style of cause and also his application for an Order extending the time for serving and filing the materials. Mr. Justice Major, for the Supreme Court of Canada, ordered that "the style of cause shall remain as determined by the Registrar and the motion for an extension of time is denied". The style of cause identified Frederick W. L. Black as the Applicant. (S.C.C. File No. 24792).
On February 26, 1996, Chief Justice Glube, by letter, responded to Mr. Black's request for the N.S.S.C to vary, rescind or review the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. Chief Justice Glube concluded that the Court had "nothing on which to base such a request" and noted that one and one-half years had passed since the August 3, 1994 Order.
On April 11, 1996, Mr. Black brought an ex parte application before Justice Goodfellow (NSSC) pursuant to s. 187(5) BIA for an order to rescind the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. The application was dismissed on the grounds that the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter had been in force for two years and the Court refused to exercise its discretion to review and rescind it. (S.H. No. 80055)
On April 29, 1996, a notice of appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow was filed by Mr. Black and the named creditors of the Estate of NsC Diesel Power Inc.

3. Jurisdiction of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal

(a) Section 187(5) BIA

The form of relief sought by Mr. Black on the motion before me on October 10, 1996 is the "review and rescinding" of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's Orders dated June 20, 1994 and August 3, 8 and 10, 1994. Mr. Black relies in part upon s. 187(5) BIA to request that this Court review and if required rescind the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. According to Houlden and Morawetz, pp. 501-502 and General Rules 49, 50 and 51, matters in bankruptcy on appeal are to be dealt with according to the Court's ordinary procedures, except as varied by the Act or the General Rules.

Counsel for the Superintendent in Bankruptcy and the Trustee submit the NSCA does not have the jurisdiction to review and rescind the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter under s. 187(5) BIA. They contend that under s. 187(5), the jurisdiction to review an Order in bankruptcy is vested only in the Court having original jurisdiction in bankruptcy and cannot be exercised by the Court of Appeal. Conversely, a Bankruptcy Judge has no power under 187(5) to review or rescind an Order made by the Court of Appeal. (See Houlden and Morawetz, p. 419) In this instance, the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter issued in June and August, 1994 were made in his capacity as the Court of original jurisdiction (NSSC) pursuant to s. 183(1) BIA. In my opinion a Chambers Judge of the Court of Appeal does not have the jurisdiction under s. 187(5) to review or rescind the referenced Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter.

(b) Sections 183(2) and 193 BIA

The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in bankruptcy, including a judge in Chambers, is restricted by statute. Pursuant to s. 183(2) BIA, the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal is given the jurisdiction to determine appeals from the courts vested with original jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of this Court is restricted by s. 193 BIA in that the Court must satisfy itself that the matter being appealed comes within one of the categories capable of being appealed as provided by s. 193 BIA. Under s. 193 an appeal lies to the Court in the following cases:

(a) if the point at issue involves future rights;
(b) if the order or decision is likely to affect other cases of a similar nature in the bankruptcy proceedings;
(c) if the property involved in the appeal exceeds in value ten thousand dollars;
(d) from the grant of or refusal to grant a discharge if the aggregate unpaid claims of creditors exceed five hundred dollars;
...

Subsection (e) of 193 provides for one further and more discretionary provision, namely, "in any other case by leave of a judge of the Court of Appeal."

Mr. Black has brought an application to rescind the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. As was the case when Mr. Black appeared before this Court on November 24, 1994, "the bottom line of this application is to have the court reverse and set aside the referenced orders of Palmeter, ACJ or, possibly, grant leave to have them considered by a panel of the Court of Appeal."

(c) Jurisdiction of an Appeal Court Judge in Chambers in Bankruptcy

The General Rules provide that all applications to the Court are to be by motions [R. 12, R. 13, R. 14 BIA]. The court to which reference is made is that of original jurisdiction and not a court of appeal. Applied to these proceedings, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter of NSSC exercised his "original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction" in issuing the referenced Orders. As a judge of the Court of Appeal, it would appear that I can exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon me under s. 183(2); namely, to hear applications for leave to appeal from Orders of courts of first instance. [See NsC Diesel Power Inc. (Bankrupt) 1994 CanLII 3970 (NS CA), (1994), 137 N.S.R. (2d) 37 at 40 (Chambers); see Re: 58494 Ontario Ltd. (1985), 57 C.B.R. (N.S.) 272 (Ont.)]

The motions brought by Mr. Black come before me as a judge sitting in Chambers of the Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy. BIA s. 183 and s. 193 provide that bankruptcy matters that come before the Court of Appeal are to be in the form of appeals.

General Rule 51 (BIA) provides that if there is nothing in the Act or Rules governing appeals, then the Provincial Rules of Civil Procedure apply. Neither the BIA nor its General Rules specify the composition of the Court when hearing an appeal. Reference to the Civil Procedure Rules indicates that all appeals, whether granted by way of leave or as of right, must be heard by a panel of three judges of the Court of Appeal [CPR 62.23(4)].

The Civil Procedure Rules make a clear distinction between the authority of a judge in Chambers and that of the Court itself. A Chambers Judge is authorized to hear applications that are procedural in nature but do not deal with the substantive merits of the main appeal. The applications which may be brought before a Chambers Judge of the Court of Appeal include an,

(1) application to amend a notice of appeal [R. 62.04(4)];
(2) application to set down times for hearing appeals by the Court [R. 62.19];
(3) application for a stay of a judgment pending appeal [R. 62.10];
(4) application for leave to appeal [R. 62.11];
(5) application for an Order for security for costs of appeal [R. 62.13];
(6) application to extend time for hearing appeals [R. 62.14 and R. 62.31(8)(e)], and

Digitized by Google

(7) application to direct the perfection of an appeal [R. 62.17(3)].
See also Future Inns Canada Inc. v. Labour Relations Board, et al., C.A. No. 131106, judgment delivered October 31, 1996, Hallett, J.A. in Chambers.

As already indicated, Mr. Black is seeking to have the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter (June 20, August 3, 8 and 10, 1994) "reviewed and rescinded". In the case of the June 20, 1994 and August 3, 1994 Orders, lifting the stays imposed by those Orders would appear to be one form of relief available to respond to his application. However, I am unable to find a prescribed Rule under the Civil Procedure Rules or those of the BIA that permits a Chambers Judge of the Court of Appeal, on an application, to grant or lift a stay, except where the stay is of an Order pending appeal [CPR 62.10].
The authority of a judge of this Court sitting in Chambers is prescribed by BIA and the Rules of Civil Procedure. I have concluded that such authority is limited to extending the time for filing a notice of appeal [CPR 62.31(8)(e); General Rule 49] and granting leave to appeal the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter [CPR 62.11; BIA s. 193(e)].
(d) Granting Leave to Appeal
Mr. Black must fall within one of the "cases" described in s. 193 (BIA) before the Court of Appeal can deal with his application as an appeal from the Orders issued by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. In my opinion, subsections (a), (b), (c) and (d) of s. 193 (BIA) do not apply. [See Houlden and Morawetz, p. 432.] As already noted, there is a fifth "case" provided in s. 193(e) and that is the discretion given to me to grant leave "in any other case".
General Rule 49(2) requires that where an appeal is brought pursuant to s. 193(e), the notice shall combine the notice of appeal and the application for leave. Mr. Black has filed neither a notice of appeal nor an application for leave to appeal the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter.
General Rule 49(1) requires that notice of an appeal be served within ten days of the Order or decision appealed from. A notice to appeal from Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's orders of June 20, August 3, 8 and 10, 1994 is clearly out of time. However, a judge, sitting in Chambers, of the Court of Appeal has the discretion to extend the time for filing and serving such notice. In such a case the appellant must establish, (1) a bona fide intention, within the time limit to appeal, (2) a reason why the notice of appeal was not filed within the time limit, and (3) that there is an arguable ground of appeal. [See Re Gigault (1979), 32 CBR 190 (Ont. S.C.) [Bankruptcy]. The overriding concern is whether justice requires that an extension of time be given. [See Bratti v. Wabco Standard Trane Inc. 1994 CanLII 1261 (ON CA), (1994), 25 CBR (3d), 1 (Ont. C.A.); see also Hanna v. Maritime Life Assurance Co. reflex, (1995) 150 N.S.R. (2d) 34, (NSCA).] In particular, in ABN Bank Canada v. NsC Diesel Power Inc. (1993), 125 N.S.R. (2d) 387 (C.A.), Matthews, J.A. stated at pp. 387-388:

> [5] The applicant argues that although the five decisions before Justice Roscoe concerned the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act she applied the test for granting an extension of time for an appeal as set out in Maritime Co-op Services Ltd. and Martin v. Maritime Processing Co., Hogg and Hillcrest Rent-A-Car et al. (1979), 32 N.S.R. (2d) 71; 54 A.P.R. 71 (C.A.), as summarized in Nova Scotia Annotated Rules of Practice (Ehrlich), at p. 308:
> "The time period for filing a notice of appeal should only be extended where:
> (1) The appeal has sufficient merit on the basis that it is arguable that the trial judge made a clear error in his perception and evaluation of the evidence;
> (2) There was a bona fide intention to appeal while the right to appeal existed;
> (3) A reasonable excuse for the delay in launching the appeal is advanced."
> [6] A study of the test to be applied in bankruptcy proceedings discloses that it is similar to that expressed in Maritime Co-op particularly in that the applicant must show a bona fide intention to appeal before the expiration date of the appeal period. See Re Gigault (1979), 32 C.B.R.(N.S.) 190 (Ont. S.C.); Re Flair Construction Ltd.; Venables v. Bank of Montreal (1981), 38 C.B.R.(N.S.) 92 (B.C.C.A.), and Hansen (Trustee of) v. Hansen (1988), 71 C.B.R.(N.S.) 79 (B.C.C.A.).

Counsel for the respondents argue that Mr. Black is in effect appealing the Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter for a second time. Counsel for Ernst & Young Inc. in its personal capacity submits that the "motion is made in the context of his attempted appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow ... it is completely inappropriate to now submit, in the guise of a motion within an appeal, what is in substance an attempt to again appeal from the decision of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter."

Digitized by Google

An examination of the grounds set forth in Mr. Black's notice of motion persuade me that they are in effect grounds of appeal. It cannot be said that the respondents have not received notice. The form of the notice was served on them on July 15, 1996. Mr. Black has furnished the Court with comprehensive legal arguments and documents, sufficient to enable me to exercise my discretion to consider granting Mr. Black leave to appeal on these matters. The notice of motions and the material filed in support, combined with the material filed on behalf of the respondents, provide sufficient detail of the circumstances surrounding the issue of the Orders to permit the matter to proceed as a leave application before a single judge of the Court of Appeal in Chambers. [See s. 193(e) BIA; see also Re 58494 Ontario Ltd. (1985), 57 CBR (NS) 272 (Ont.)]

It remains to be determined whether the discretion to grant leave to appeal from these orders should be exercised and on what grounds. Granting leave is within the discretion of the Court and in my view should only be granted if the "Order or decision" appealed from appears to be "contrary to law, amounts to an abuse of judicial power, or involves obvious judicial error, causing prejudice, for which there is no remedy." [See Re Leard 1994 CanLII 2673 (ON CA), (1994), 25 CBR (3d) 210 (Ont. CA) [In Bankruptcy].

In the opinion of counsel for ABN Bank, Ernst & Young Inc. (as Trustee and also in its personal capacity) and Krupp MaK, the issues relating to the June 20, August 3, 8 and 10, 1994 Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter are res judicata. They also raise the same argument on the application to quash the notice of appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow.

Mr. Black submits that the merits of the Orders issued by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter have not been reviewed by the Court of Appeal. He contends that as such, his application is not barred by the doctrine of res judicata and should be "reviewed and rescinded" by the Court. I have concluded that it is necessary to consider each of the Orders issued by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter separately.

(i) The Order of June 20, 1994

On June 20, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter filed an Order staying the Order of the Registrar of Bankruptcy dated June 17, 1994. The Registrar's Order was issued following an ex parte application made by Mr. Black for an examination of personnel of the Trustee, Ernst & Young Inc., pursuant to s. 163 (BIA). Four of the individuals listed in the June 17 Order are the same as those listed in the present application made by Mr. Black, namely: Matt Harris, Harold Reiter, Peter Cleveland and Ross Landers, all or formerly, of Ernst & Young Inc.

The June 20, 1994 Order provided:

> UPON APPLICATION of the Trustee, Ernst & Young Inc. (the "Trustee") made ex parte;
> IT IS ORDERED THAT the Order for examination dated June 17, 1994, granted by A. Martin Smith, Q.C., Registrar, be ending further determination by this Honourable Court:
> IT IS FURTHER ORDERED THAT the Notice of Examination dated June 17, 1994, directed to Harold Reiter, be set aside pending further determination by this Honourable Court.
> [emphasis added]

Both Orders of June 17, 1994 and June 20, 1994 were issued ex parte. Both involve the bankruptcy of NsC Diesel Power Inc. Neither parties received notice of the application of the other.

Counsel for ABN Amro Bank indicates that the events surrounding the issue of the June 20, 1994 Order necessitated the ex parte stay because it was a matter of urgency.

In his summary, counsel for the Bank states:

> On June 17, 1994, Mr. Black applied ex parte to the Registrar for an Order for Examinations pursuant to s. 163(2) of the Bankruptcy Act. This Order obtained on a Friday, without notice to counsel, and delivered by facsimile to the office of counsel for the Estate after normal business hours, provided in part, for the discovery of legal counsels, accountants and bank officials as early as Monday, June 20, 1994, in Toronto.
> Counsel for the Bank contacted the Case Management Justice at his home late on the evening of June 17, 1994, to advise His Lordship of the existence of the Registrar in Bankruptcy's Order. The Case Management Justice directed that counsel for the Estate deliver a copy of the Order to his residence on Saturday, June 18, 1994. On Sunday, June 19, 1994, counsel for Ernst & Young applied on an ex parte basis before Associate Chief Justice Palmeter for an Order staying the notices of examination authorized by the Registrar in Bankruptcy's Order. On June 20, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter filed an Order staying the Order of the Registrar in Bankruptcy.

The events which followed the issue of the June 20, 1994 Order are somewhat blurred as a result of conflicting accounts and an imperfect record. It appears that on June 29, 1994, Mr. Black, on behalf of NsC Diesel Power

Inc., advanced a notice of motion in the Supreme Court to rescind the June 20, 1994 Order of the Associate Chief Justice. This was based upon s. 187(5) BIA. On July 13, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter reconvened the case management process for an inter partes hearing. According to the summary provided by the solicitor for the Bank, it appears that on July 13, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter considered Mr. Black's request but refused to exercise his discretion pursuant to s. 187(5) BIA to revisit his June 20, 1994 Order which stayed the Order of the Registrar permitting the examination of certain persons.

The June 20, 1994 Order plus the August 3, 1994 Order resulted in the dismissal of Mr. Black's application for an Order of Examination and stayed all applications of Mr. Black and named companies until legal counsel was obtained.

In his response to the submissions of the respondents, Mr. Black maintains his original position as set forth in his application of June 29, 1994, namely, that Associate Chief Justice Palmeter did not have the jurisdiction to issue the stay and that it has "caused injustice which cannot be remedied except by the recession of the offending order". As authority for his position, Mr. Black relies in part on Bache Halsey Shields v. Charles 1982 CanLII 730 (BC SC), (1982), 140 DLR (3d) 378 (BCSC).

As a judge sitting in Chambers of the Court of Appeal, I am satisfied that I have the discretion to extend the time to file and serve a notice of appeal from the Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter dated June 20, 1994. In the circumstances, Mr. Black has satisfied the requirements to justify the exercise of such a discretion. The material indicates that he had a bona fide intention to file an appeal of the June 20, 1994 Order which he in fact did but after appearing in the Chambers of this Court, elected to proceed with an appeal of the August 3, 1994 Order. There is an arguable ground of appeal based on the circumstances which gave rise to the June 20, 1994 Order. Finally, given Mr. Black's inability to obtain an Order for Examination of certain of the Trustee's personnel, it is in the interest of justice that time should be extended for filing and serving a notice of appeal.

Such an appeal, if made, should be perfected according to Rule 49 BIA and CPR Rule 62. Mr. Black would be required to file a notice of appeal regarding the June 20, 1994 Order along with the necessary documentation to comply with CPR 62.

I am satisfied I have the discretion to grant Mr. Black leave to have the matter heard by the Court of Appeal pursuant to s. 193(e) BIA. By reason of the decisions/Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter on June 20, 1994 and July 13, 1994, coupled with that of August 3, 1994, Mr. Black has not been able to apply to the Court for an Order for Examination of the individuals listed in the Registrar's Order of June 17, 1994. This is especially disturbing given the fact that other interested parties have been able to obtain such Orders in the Supreme Court without difficulty.

I am unable to say with certainty that the matter is in fact res judicata. In my opinion, Mr. Black should not be denied leave to appeal the June 20, 1994 Order on that ground. Until such time as the arguments on appeal with respect to that Order are determined, Mr. Black will not be in a position to apply for an Order for Examination of the individuals named in the Registrar's original Order of June 17, 1994.

In my opinion, leave to appeal the June 20, 1994 Order should be granted.

(ii) The Order of August 3. 1994

Mr. Black alleges that Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's Order of August 3, 1994 was issued "without notice, without evidence, without argument, without service" contrary to certain rules of the Bankruptcy Act and contrary to the principles of natural justice.

Counsel for ABN Amro Bank submits that the Order of August 3, 1994 is an "exemplification" to that of Justice Boudreau's Order dated February 13, 1993. He considered that unless Mr. Black retained legal counsel he was not permitted to represent NsC Corporation in proceedings relating to the bankruptcy of NsC Power Diesel Inc. Proceedings commenced by NsC Corporation in bankruptcy were stayed until such time as counsel was engaged. The decision upheld on appeal [reflex, (1993), 125 N.S.R. (2d) 223] was based on a concern that Mr. Black would be in a position of conflict should he be acting as counsel for the bankrupt while at the same time being called as a witness in the trial matters. Counsel opposing Mr. Black's application to "rescind" the August 3, 1994 Order have not raised this as an issue in the present proceeding before me. Nor does it appear to have been the basis for the Orders issued by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter which were made to determine "matters relating to the practice and procedure" before the Court.

The Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter dated August 3, 1996 states:

> UPON IT APPEARING necessary to determine matters relating to the practice and procedure before this Honourable Court relating to the matter therein.
> NOW UPON MOTION of the Court.

Digitized by Google

> IT IS ORDERED that all applications presently before this Court by the bankrupt NsC Diesel Power Incorporated, NsC Consultants Limited and Nova Scotia Commonwealth (NsC) Consultants Limited, or by Frederick W. L. Black as an officer of any of the said companies, be and the same are hereby stayed until such time as NsC Diesel Power Incorporated, NsC Consultants Limited and Nova Scotia Commonwealth (NsC) Consultants Limited, or Frederick W. L. Black as an officer of any of the said companies, shall be represented by counsel authorized to carry on the practice of law in the Province of Nova Scotia, or until further order of this Court.
> AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that all further applications relating to the Bankruptcy of NsC Diesel Power Incorporated shall be made to the case management Judge of the Court assigned to this matter, rather than to the Registrar in Bankruptcy, until further order of this Court. [emphasis added]

On matters having to do, inter alia, with security for costs, an appeal of this Order was dismissed [1994 CanLII 3970 (NS CA), (1994), 137 N.S.R. (2d) 37 (CA)].
Mr. Black brought an ex parte application pursuant to s. 187(5) BIA before Justice Goodfellow in Chambers (NSSC) seeking an order to rescind the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. The Chambers Judge dismissed the motion principally because of the two year delay in bringing the application. Justice Goodfellow made the following comments:

> ... the reasons are, one in my view I have no discretion or authority to overrule and rescind an order that was granted almost two years ago by a fellow justice. Secondly, if I have such discretion, the delay in my view is such and the background of this matter is such that it's not an appropriate exercise in discretion almost two years later to resurrect something that ought to have been deal with before. And you have had a run at the Court of Appeal. I'm not a hundred percent certain what transpired there, quite frankly, but my view if I have discretion it would be inappropriate to exercise my discretion with such a long period of delay. So, there, you can take those remarks to the Court of Appeal. (S.H. No. 80055).

On April 29, 1996, a notice of appeal was filed by Mr. Black and "Creditors of the Estate" of NsC Diesel Power Incorporated. The notice is signed by Mr. Black and creditors (or inspectors) of the Estate Heather Cruickshanks, Hanson Josey and Gerry Dell. This notice relates to an intended appeal of the decision of Justice Goodfellow referenced above. Counsel for Ernst & Young Inc., in its personal capacity, and for the Superintendent of Bankruptcy submit that the only appealable matter before the Court is the appeal of Justice Goodfellow's decision of April 17, 1996.
Counsel for ABN Bank asserts that "to entertain a reconsideration of the August 3, 1994 Order at this time in the manner sought by Mr. Black, would be to permit Mr. Black to 'escape by the back door' the consequences of the previous orders of this Honourable court respecting the posting of security for costs, and the consequences of the failure to comply with such order."
In response, counsel for each of the respondents submits that there remains on record a valid and binding Order of this Court dismissing Mr. Black's appeal. They say that the matter having gone forward to the Supreme Court of Canada, where leave to appeal was denied, Mr. Black is precluded from the right to appeal for a second time.
Counsel for the respondents have brought an application before me to quash the notice of appeal from the April 17, 1996 decision of Justice Goodfellow. They rely in part upon the doctrine of res judicata and argue that the appeal is frivolous, vexatious and without merit (CPR 62.18).

The effect of the Order of August 3, 1994 has impaired Mr. Black's ability to advance his case in the matters relating to the bankruptcy of NsC Diesel Power Inc. Since the stay was issued Mr. Black, as an interested party in the bankruptcy proceedings, has been prevented from participating in the proceedings. This has both directly and indirectly affected his rights as an officer of the bankrupt companies. The difficulties with which he has been confronted are well illustrated by the on-going problems he faces in being precluded from seeking an Order for Examination unless he retains counsel.
Section 187(5) BIA provides that an application can be made to the Court of original jurisdiction to review and rescind an Order of that Court. In this instance, Mr. Black availed himself of that provision and applied to Justice Goodfellow to exercise his discretion under s. 187(5) to rescind the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. As noted above, the application was dismissed and Mr. Black filed a notice of appeal from that decision. In the ordinary course an appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow, already set in motion, will enable Mr. Black to challenge the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. In my opinion, Mr.

Black should be permitted to set down his appeal to a panel of this Court from the decision and Order of Justice Goodfellow. It is my further opinion that that is a more acceptable course of action than granting leave to appeal the August 3, 1994 Order.

(iii) The Orders of August 8, 1994

On August 8, 1994, it was ordered in part that the application made by NsC Corporation Limited dated December 14, 1992 for the removal of Ernst & Young Inc. as Trustee of the Estate of NsC Diesel Power Inc., a bankrupt, be dismissed. Counsel for the Trustee, in its personal capacity, submits that Associate Chief Justice Palmeter had given written directions on June 2, 1994 to the effect that "if NsC Diesel Inc. intended to proceed with an application to remove Ernst & Young as Trustee, it was to file a renewed application with supporting affidavits and memorandum no later than July 8, 1994."

Mr. Black did not file a renewed application and the Trustee subsequently filed an application to dismiss Mr. Black's original application to have Ernst & Young removed. On August 8, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter granted the Order and dismissed the earlier application made by Mr. Black.

On October 26, 1994, Mr. Black appeared before Justice Pugsley of the Court of Appeal, in Chambers. He indicated that he was not appealing the Orders of August 8, 1996 but rather was bringing a motion to "nullify" and stay the Orders pending the hearing of the appeal of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's decision of August 3, 1994. Justice Pugsley concluded that the Court did not have jurisdiction to "nullify" the Orders and no further remarks as to the merits of the August 8, 1994 Orders were made. Furthermore, Justice Pugsley was not prepared to exercise his discretion to grant Mr. Black leave to appeal the Orders. On November 24, 1994, I upheld the Order of Justice Pugsley and found that s. 193(e) did not then apply.

After considering the record, the arguments and submissions, I am not convinced that Mr. Black has a right of appeal under s. 193 BIA. I find no grounds to justify exercising my discretion to grant leave to appeal from the August 8, 1994 Orders.

(iv) The Orders of August 10 1994

On August 10, 1994, Associate Chief Justice Palmeter granted Orders enabling Krupp MaK Diesel, under s. 38(1) BIA, to commence an action against Mr. Black and by Order dismissed the Inspector's application to challenge the votes of Krupp and the Bank as cast at a creditors' meeting in November, 1993.

Mr. Black argues that since the August 10, 1994 Orders have not been considered by this Court, they are not res judicata.

Counsel for Krupp MaK, respondent on this motion, submits that the jurisdictional issue surrounding the s. 38 application was already determined by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter by concluding that "an intended Defendant of such an application is not entitled to notice and is not to have the status to contest the validity of the claim or to oppose leave."

Counsel for Krupp MaK further submits that Associate Chief Justice Palmeter decided the issue with respect to the vote of the creditors and that this matter has already been dealt with by the Court of Appeal. Counsel refers to the following passage from the transcript of the August 10, 1994 hearing at which Associate Chief Justice Palmeter stated:

> The second matter relates to Krupp. The Trustee indicates that he accepted Krupp's claim as a liquidated amount; that there was a problem with it. He went to Mr. Macdonald, solicitor for Krupp, to get an explanation. He got an explanation. He was satisfied with the explanation. He accepted that as a liquidated amount. That was his obligation. He was to determine if, in his opinion, it was a liquidated amount.
> Again, no bad faith. I have no problem in finding that the trustee acted properly, and that Krupp should been allowed to vote at the meeting. So far as the application is concerned, I will deny the application. And confirm the actions of the trustee at the meeting in the December 1993.

When Mr. Black appeared before Justice Pugsley on October 26, 1994, he indicated that he was not appealing the Orders of August 8 and 10, 1994, but rather was bringing a motion to "nullify the decisions and any Order flowing therefrom made by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter on August 8 and 10." He further requested a stay of the Orders pending the hearing of the appeal of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter's decision of August 3, 1994.

Justice Pugsley concluded that the Court did not have jurisdiction to "nullify" the Orders. In rendering his decision he commented on the August 10, 1994 (s. 38 application). Order issued by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter concerning the s. 38 BIA application and concluded that Mr. Black did not have a right to be given notice or to contest the Order which was sought.

Digitized by Google

Justice Pugsley further concluded that the remaining three applications considered by Associate Chief Justice Palmeter on August 8 and 10, 1994, were not proceedings arising under the August 3, 1994 Order. As such, the Orders were not stayed under s. 195 BIA.

On October 9, 1996, Mr. Black appeared before this Court by way of an appeal from an Interlocutory Order of Justice M. MacDonald (NSSC) who dismissed the motion to strike Krupp's statement of claim. In his appeal, Mr. Black made the same argument as advanced before me on October 10, 1996, namely, that Associate Chief Justice Palmeter was without jurisdiction to issue the s. 38 Order because Krupp is not a creditor of NsC Diesel Power Inc. This Court in its judgment delivered October 22, 1996 in C.A. 128144, affirmed the decision of Justice M. MacDonald and in turn affirmed the August 10, 1994 Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter.

The August 10, 1994 Orders of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter have been upheld as valid Orders at different times by both the NSSC and the NSCA. The cumulative effect of all this leads me to the conclusion that the merits of the August 10, 1994 Orders have been considered by both NSSC and NSCA. They are res judicata.

The applicant has not satisfied me that he has a right of appeal under s. 193 BIA. Mr. Black's motions with respect to the Orders of August 10, 1994 are dismissed.

(v) Decision of Justice Goodfellow (N.S.S.C.) - April 11 and 17 1996 - S.H. No. 80055

A further matter to be considered is whether this Court has the jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow dated April 17, 1996. His decision was made in his capacity as a Judge of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court and within that Court's original, or auxiliary, or ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy pursuant to s. 183(1) BIA. Mr. Black brought an application before Justice Goodfellow under s. 187(5) BIA. The section permits the Court to review and rescind its own Orders.

The record reveals that Mr. Black and certain named creditors filed a notice of appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow which notice is dated April 29, 1996. To the best of my knowledge no hearing date has yet been set.

Mr. Black is required under the General Rules of BIA to establish that an appeal lies to the Court under s. 193 BIA. From all that I have seen, heard and read, I am persuaded that the appellants ought to be given such leave pursuant to s. 193(e) BIA. A hearing date suitable to the Court remains to be settled upon in Chambers of the Appeal Court.

4. Application for Order of Examination, s. 163 BIA

On August 15, 1996, Mr. Black made an application in writing to this Court requesting Orders of Examination pursuant to s. 163 BIA. By correspondence, he further clarified that his intention was to apply to this Court "for a proper examination order so that evidence would be available for the deliberation of the Court on the hearings of October 10, 1996."

Mr. Black wished to cross-examine certain of the Trustee's personnel in order to have the evidence available to refute the applications brought by the Trustee and the Bank to strike the amended notice of appeal. He was informed by letter on September 6, 1996 that this Court would further consider his application after having heard submissions on all of the applications to come before me in Chambers.

Section 163(2) BIA states:

> On the application of any creditor or other interested person to the court, and on sufficient cause being shown, an order may be made for the examination under oath, before the registrar or other authorized person, of the trustee, the bankrupt, an inspector or a creditor, or any other person named in the order, for the purpose of investigating the administration of the estate of any bankrupt, and the court may further order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in his possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, the trustee or any creditor, the costs of the examination and investigation to be in the discretion of the court.

In his notice of motion, Mr. Black alleges in part that:

> 2. The Trustee Ernst & Young, assisted by the then solicitors of the Estate, Blake, Cassels & Graydon and Boyne Clarke, originally wished to examine Mr. Purchase and the other parties, but has refused all requests from the Inspectors to do so since an Inspectors' Resolution was passed as the request of the Trustee on February 26, 1992. The trustee Ernst & Young and a solicitor from Blake, Cassels & Graydon, acting in his capacity as solicitor for the estate, did conduct one examination, that being an examination of the files of the Corporation House Limited (CHL)/Benn brothers as the former consultants to NsC Corporation.
> 7. The Trustee and the past and present solicitors of the Estate sought to, and have, suppressed the evidence of the conversion of the assets of the Estate.

Digitized by Google

> 8. The applicant Black and the Inspectors of the Estate for the creditors of the Estate have repeatedly sought to complete the examination as directed by resolution of the Inspectors of the Estate dated February 26, 1992.
> 9. The information believed to be in the knowledge of Messrs. Cleveland, Reiter, Harris and Landers will be of assistance to the creditors of the Estate and its officer in their presentations to the Court on future motions to be heard when the evidence is available to help recover Estate assets for the benefit of the Creditors.

Mr. Black filed, in addition to his own affidavit, a number of affidavits including those of the Inspectors dated July 8, 1994 and July 9, 1996. Numerous exhibits have also been put before the Court in support of this application for an Order for Examination.

Counsel for the Trustee describes the issues arising in connection with this motion in the following way: "In seeking orders under s. 163 of the BIA, Mr. Black is, in essence, asking the Court to assume original jurisdiction. Section 183(2) of the BIA makes it clear that this Honourable court is a court of appeal. By virtue of s. 183(1)(c), the NSSC is the Court of original jurisdiction. If Mr. Black seeks such an order the appropriate place is in the NSSC ..."

On July 11, 1996, Mr. Black along with Inspectors, appeared before Justice Roscoe in Chambers (NSCA) in bankruptcy with an application seeking an Order for Examination under s. 163 BIA of three of the named individuals in the present application before the Court. Justice Roscoe concluded she did not have jurisdiction to hear the matter.

Since that time the Inspectors have obtained an Order from the NSSC for the examination of Mr. Purchase of Ernst & Young Inc. Mr. Black, on the other hand, has had to bring an application to this Court to seek the rescission of the June 20, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter and in the alternative apply to this Court a second time for an Order of Examination.

I am satisfied that the Court of Appeal does not have the jurisdiction to issue an Order for Examination under s. 163(2) BIA. Such an Order can only be issued by a Court of original jurisdiction and in the context of these circumstances that means the Nova Scotia Supreme Court. It appears that if Mr. Black is to be able to obtain such an Order, he will have to be successful in his appeal from the Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter of June 20, 1994 and that of Justice Goodfellow in order to lift the stays imposed on June 20 and August 3, 1994.

The relief which Mr. Black seeks from this Court will not be granted. To repeat, the Court of Appeal lacks the jurisdiction to do so.

5. Cross-Application brought by Mr. Black to remove Trustee and the Solicitors for the Trustee and ABN Amro Bank

Mr. Black has requested a variety of Orders including the removal of the Trustee, Ernst & Young Inc,, and a direction to the Official Receiver to appoint an interim trustee. In addition he has applied to have the solicitors for the Trustee and their agent and the solicitors for the Bank and their agent removed.

Mr. Black alleges that the solicitors for the Bank breached their fiduciary duty to their former client, the Estate of the Bankrupt, by using confidential documents of the Estate to the benefit of the Bank. He further alleges that the solicitors for the Trustee acted contrary to the provisions of the BIA and the "directions" of the Estate, and that the Trustee has been acting in a conflict of interest since its appointment.

Mr. Hill, counsel for the Trustee, in his written submission asserts, in part:

> ... The application is not in the nature of an appeal. Original jurisdiction for such an application would vest in the Supreme Court. Such an application was previously made two years ago and essentially abandoned by Mr. Black at the time of Justice Palmeter's order requiring he be represented by counsel.

As discussed earlier, the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in bankruptcy, including the Judge in Chambers, is defined in s. 183(2) BIA. It provides that the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal is vested with the jurisdiction to determine appeals from courts vested with original jurisdiction. Mr. Black's cross-motion has been brought before this Court, not as an appeal, but as a matter to be dealt with as if the Court had original jurisdiction. Since this Court does not have such jurisdiction, it is my opinion that as a Judge of the Court of Appeal, sitting in Chambers (bankruptcy), I do not have the authority to grant the Orders Mr. Black has requested. Accordingly, the relief sought by his motion will be refused.

6. Applications brought by Krupp MaK Maschinenbau GmbH and Krupp MaK Diesel Inc., ABN Amro Bank, and Ernst& Young Inc., in its personal capacity and as Trustee

(a) An application to quash the amended notice of appeal from the April 17, 1996 decision of Justice Goodfellow

Digitized by Google

On April 29, 1996, Mr. Black, on his behalf and "Creditors of the Estate" of NsC Diesel Power Incorporated, filed a notice of appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow (NSSC) delivered on April 17, 1996. The notice is signed by Mr. Black and creditors/inspectors Heather Cruickshanks, Hanson Josey and Gerry Dell.
Counsel on behalf of the applicant creditors and the Trustee brought applications before me to strike the amended notice of appeal on the grounds that it is frivolous and without merit. They rely upon CPR 14.25 and 63.31.
They submit that Justice Goodfellow was correct in refusing to exercise his discretion to review an Order of the Supreme Court that has been upheld by the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. They reason that the appeal is frivolous. They also argue that the notice of appeal should be struck because it is without merit. They contend there was neither any change in circumstances nor any new evidence upon which Justice Goodfellow could rely to exercise his discretion to rescind the August 3, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter. They contend that s. 187(5) BIA is not an alternative to an appeal. Counsel for the Superintendent of Bankruptcy also made submissions on these issues.
The threshold issue is whether a Judge of the Court of Appeal sitting in Chambers has the authority to quash a notice of appeal on the grounds that it is frivolous, vexatious and without merit.
A review of the Civil Procedure Rules persuades me that the authority of a Judge of the Court of Appeal sitting in Chambers to deal with applications to quash a notice of appeal is restricted to either hearing applications to set a date for the main application to be heard by the Court [R. 62.18 and R. 62.30(2)] or applications to quash a notice of appeal where the appellant has failed to perfect the appeal [R. 62.11(d) and R. 62.17(1)]. (See Blackburn v. Blackburn 1991 CanLII 2533 (NS CA), (1991), 105 N.S.R. (2d) 348.)
However, it is the Court which is authorized by CPR Rule 62.18(1) to hear applications to quash a notice of appeal where the application is based on the ground that the appeal is frivolous, vexatious or without merit. Rule 62.01(d) defines "Court" as the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal. Civil Procedure Rule 62.24(3) provides that matters heard on appeal by the Court shall consist of a Court of three or more judges. Therefore, the Rules distinguish between the authority of the Court to grant an Order to quash a notice of appeal under CPR 62.18 and that of a Judge sitting in Chambers under CPR 62.11(d), which refers to a failure to comply and CPR 62.17, which refers to a failure to perfect.

(As I indicated earlier in these reasons, a useful discussion on the jurisdiction of a Judge of the Appeal Court sitting in Chambers is contained in the decision of Hallett, J.A., in Chambers, in Future Inns Canada Inc. v. Labour Relations Board (N.S.) et al., C.A. 131106, judgment delivered October 31, 1996.)
As a result of all this, I conclude that my role as a Judge in Chambers is limited to setting down a hearing date for an application to quash the amended notice of appeal so that it may be heard by a panel of Judges in the Court of Appeal. Accordingly, for the record, I must dismiss the application which is before me to quash the amended notice of appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow. However, that does not mean the application is at an end. It means that the applicants may, if they wish, apply to a Judge in Chambers in the Court of Appeal for a date to have the application to quash set down for hearing.
(b) Injunction and Stays of Proceedings
Counsel for Krupp MaK Maschinenbau GmbH and Krupp MaK Diesel Inc. have requested that the proceedings be stayed with respect to the issues in this matter because they contend that they have already been determined during the course of proceedings before the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. They also seek an injunction to restrain Mr. Black from instituting further proceedings with respect to all of these issues.
In light of the conclusions which I have reached, which are to grant leave to appeal the June 20, 1994 Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter and the April 17, 1996 decision of Justice Goodfellow, it is neither necessary nor appropriate for this Court to issue a stay or injunction with respect to those matters.
(c) Security for Costs
In the event an appeal goes forward, all counsel have requested on behalf of their respective clients Orders against Mr. Black for security of costs.
General Rule 49(3) provides that, "Before entering an appeal to the Court of Appeal, the appellant shall deposit in court $100 as security for costs." General Rule 49(4) gives the Court of Appeal authority to increase, decrease or dispense with security for costs.
I have concluded that,

(i) if an appeal of the Order of Associate Chief Justice Palmeter dated June 20, 1994 is entered, Mr. Black will be required to deposit $500.00 as security for costs, and
(ii) if the appeal from the decision of Justice Goodfellow (S.H. No. 80055) is carried forward, the appellant(s) are required to deposit $500.00 as security for costs.

(d) Costs in the event of the Cause

Digitized by Google

Counsel for Krupp MaK Maschinenbau GmbH and Krupp MaK Diesel Inc. have requested costs of the application in the amount of $1,000.00 from each of the appellants, in any event of the cause payable forthwith. Counsel for ABN Amro Bank request that solicitor-client costs should be awarded against all of the named applicants jointly and severally based on the conduct of Ms. Cruickshanks, Mr. Dell and Mr. Josey in bringing the notice of appeal as well their past involvement in bringing proceedings along with those of their co-applicant, Mr. Black.

Counsel for Ernst & Young Inc. in its personal capacity has requested costs awarded on this application on a solicitor-client basis against Mr. Black personally.

Counsel for Ernst & Young Inc. as Trustee has requested costs on the appeal on a solicitor-client basis.

Since success on these applications is divided, I am not prepared to order costs either by way of a specific sum or solicitor-client or in the event of the cause, apart from the Order for security for costs noted above under that head.

7. Summary of Conclusions

WEILER J.A.:

The applicant seeks leave to appeal from the order of Kennedy J. The Bankruptcy judge dismissed the applicant's motion for an order quashing a subpoena issued by the Deputy Registrar in Bankruptcy at the request of the Trustee in Bankruptcy ("the trustee") of the bankrupt estates of Wayne S. Leard ("Leard") and Leard's corporations and directed to the applicant Anthony H. Graat under the authority of ss. 163 and 164 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended ("the Act").

On an application for leave to appeal pursuant to s.193(e) of the Act, leave should only be granted if the judgment appears to be contrary to law, amounts to an abuse of judicial power, or involves an obvious error, causing prejudice, for which there is no remedy: Houlden and Morawitz, Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, 1994 p.396; McNab v. B.S.& B. Enterprises Ltd. (1951), 32 C.B.R. 53.

Kennedy J. found that Leard was involved in a pyramid scheme involving many individuals over a two and one-half year period. A typical arrangement between Leard and an investor entailed an investment in the purchase of a designated item of distressed inventory intended to be re-sold within a short period of time at substantial profit. In some instances co-venture agreements were executed by Leard and the investor, with Leard personally guaranteeing the obligations contained in the agreements. In other cases, investors provided funds to Leard with no such documentation. The trustee determined from the records available that very few actual purchases took place. Most exchanges were paper fabrications. No verified transactions which agree with the provisions of any co-venture agreements located to date have been found. There are no accounting records which summarize the activity of the various bankrupt estates, and not all transactions have been analyzed to date. A few investors who got into the scheme early, including the applicant Graat, are up substantial sums of money; most are down. Leard has been charged by the R.C.M.P. with 41 charges of fraud and one charge of obtaining property using false pretences arising from his dealings with such investors. Through his company, Key Property Management Corporation, the applicant invested funds with two Leard companies. Available records indicate Key Property Management had about 120 transactions with the Leard companies totalling approximately $24,000,000, and that profits realized by the applicant from his dealings in 1992 alone, were in excess of 1.5 million dollars.

By letter dated May 6, 1993, the Trustee wrote to the applicant and to other individuals and companies who entered into co-venture agreements with Leard and requested delivery of copies of all co-venture agreements, cheques written for trades participated in with Leard, and particulars of amounts received in respect of such transactions. The applicant did not comply with that request.

At a meeting of inspectors of the bankrupt estates, held on June 14th, 1993, the Trustee sought approval to examine certain individuals regarding the affairs of the bankrupt companies under the power conferred in s.163(1) of the Act.

The relevant portion of s.163(1) of the Act states:

> The trustee ... on the written request or resolution of a majority of the inspectors, may without an order, examine under oath before the registrar of the court or other authorized person ... any person reasonably thought to have knowledge of the affairs of the bankrupt ... respecting the bankrupt, his dealings or property and may order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in his possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, his dealings or property.

The inspectors passed a reolution authorizing the Trustee to conduct examinations of Mr. Wes Suchard and Mr. Jack Asbury "and any other party where the Trustee believes an examination would be appropriate."

No specific request or authorization by the inspectors was given to the Trustee to examine the applicant under s.163 in respect of the affairs of Leard or his corporations.

By letter dated July 5th, 1993, the Trustee advised the applicant that, pursuant to s.164(1) of the Act, the Trustee required production of the information and documentation requested in its earlier correspondence failing which the Trustee would compel the applicant to attend an examination to provide such information pursuant to s.164(2).

Section 164(2) states:

> Where a person fails to produce a book, document or paper or to deliver property as required by this section within four days of his being required so to do, the trustee may, without an order, examine the person before the registrar of the court or other authorized person concerning the property, book, document, or paper that he is supposed to have in his possession.

On September 14, the Trustee requested the Deputy Registrar in Bankruptcy to issue a subpoena commanding the Applicant's attendance at the Official Examiner's office on September 24, 1993, "to give evidence on behalf of the above-noted bankrupt" and to produce "any and all documents, material or things relating in any way to this matter." The proposed examination was adjourned to determine the motion heard before Kennedy J.

The applicant seeks leave to argue five grounds of appeal:

1. Was the Trustee validly authorized to examine the Applicant by resolution of inspectors of the estate on June 14th, 1993?
2. Did the Bankruptcy judge err in law in refusing to stay the proposed examination of the Applicant as unfair and oppressive, having regard to the Trustee's stated intention to commence legal proceedings against the Applicant?
3. Does the Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("the Charter") apply to govern the conduct of the Trustee?
4. Do the powers of examination under ss.163 (1) and 164(2) of the Act offend the protection conferred by s.7 of the Charter?
5. Does the compelled production of documents under s.164(1) offend s.8 of the Charter?

With respect to the first ground of appeal, the applicant argues that it was necessary for the inspectors to name the applicant as a person to be examined. The applicant submits that the blanket resolution passed does not suffice because it delegates to the Trustee the power to determine who is to be examined and gives the Trustee an unbounded discretion which goes beyond the intent of the section.

Kennedy J. took judicial notice of the fact that in another case before the court, C.I.B.C. v. Key Property et al., the accountant Suchard, who had been named, was found to be the architect of the Graat financial empire. He concluded that, by naming Suchard, Graat was surely in the category of those whom the inspectors had in mind when the non-specific authority was directed to the Trustee and that the resolution was properly worded.

I can find no error in this conclusion by Kennedy J.

With respect to the second argument, that the proposed examination would be unfair or oppressive, Kennedy J. concluded:

> It is clear that the Trustee will be unable to complete its investigation and prepare the necessary accounting without the examination of Graat and the production of the documentation which he has. The proposed examination is critical to the investigation of the Trustee. Graat is the sole means by which the Trustee can obtain the missing documentation.

There would appear to be an ample evidentiary basis for Kennedy J. to come to this conclusion and accordingly the proposed examination is not unfair or abusive. The applicant argued that the proposed examination was simply a "fishing expedition" by the Trustee on behalf of the creditors who were down, and that this was not the role of the Trustee. In response to this argument, the respondent points out that the Trustee could advance trustee's remedies of fraudulent preference and settlement as part of the role of Trustee and that this was an additional reason why the action was not abusive. I accept this submission.

I now turn to the issues raised pursuant to the Charter. In paragraph 59 of its factum the applicant's solicitors state, "the proposed examination and production of documents is confined to the interests of those creditors and is in no sense related to the administrative or regulatory interests of the community at large." Kennedy J. found that, on the basis of R.W.D.S.U. v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd. (1986), 2 S.C.R. at 594, the Trustee was not a government actor and that the element of government intervention sufficient to require invocation of the Charter had not been demonstrated. The applicant does not really quarrel with this conclusion nor, I believe, could he. See Mancini (Trustee of) v. Falconi (1989), 17 A.C.W.S. (3d) 44 (Ont. H.C.).

The arguments raised with respect to s.7 have, in my opinion, all directly or implicitly been dealt with by the Supreme Court's decision in Thomson Newspapers Ltd. et al v. Director of Investigations and Research et al. 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC), (1990), 54 C.C.C. (3d) 417 (S.C.C.) and R. V. McKinlay Transport Ltd. 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), (1990), 47 C.R.R. 151 (S.C.C), and Kennedy J. so held.

The Thomson Newspapers decision is also authority for the proposition that there is no requirement to establish relevancy before a subpoena is issued. It is sufficient if the subpoena can be challenged by way of judicial review after its issue with respect to relevancy and this is an adequate guarantee against abuse of the power (pp.532 and 535).

The point with respect to S.8, which the applicant seeks to raise on appeal, would appear to have been settled by the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Le Comité paritaire de l'industrie de la chemise et le Procureur general du Quebec on January 27, 1994, with reasons to follow. In that case the court was asked to answer the following question:

> Are the provisions of s.22(e) of An Act Respecting Collective Agreement Decrees, R.S.Q., c. D-2, which confer powers of inspection inconsistent with s.8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

This Act constitutes the Joint Committee of the Garment Industry as a civil corporation and gives the director general, the secretary and any inspector the right, at any reasonable hour, to examine certain records which are required to be kept by employers. These same persons can also compel production of the records listed in paragraph (e) or any document relating to the application of the Act. Any employer who refuses to furnish a document to a person authorized under the Act commits an infraction and is liable to be fined.

Digitized by Google

The judge of the Quebec Court (Criminal and Penal Division) indicated that the real question to be answered was whether Southam, supra, is applicable in the context of a law and a process of inspection which are civil and administrative in nature. Relying on Zeigler v. Hunter (1984), 8 D.L.R. 648, a decision of the Federal Court of Appeal, he dismissed the contention that paragraph (e) violated s.8 of the Charter of Rights. The Quebec Court of Appeal reversed the decision. The Supreme Court of Canada held that paragraph (e) did not violate s.8 of the Charter.

While the reasons of the Supreme Court are yet to be released, the principle involved would appear to be the same as that raised in the instant motion for leave to appeal. Accordingly, leave to appeal is denied on this point also.

The application for leave to appeal is dismissed with costs to the Trustee and the Attorney General of Canada.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

RE: IN THE MATTER OF THE BANKRUPTCY OF SAMUEL R. BAKER of the City of Toronto, in the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto in the Province of Ontario, Lawyer
Frank S. Kisluk Limited, the Trustee of the Estate of Samuel R. Baker, a bankrupt v. Samuel R. Baker

BEFORE: OSBORNE J.A. (In Chambers)

COUNSEL: John Honsberger for the moving party bankrupt
Frank Bennett for the trustee in bankruptcy

HEARD: January 17, 1995

The bankrupt appeals, or seeks leave to appeal if required, from the order of Farley J. (made on an appeal from the order of the Registrar) in which he set aside the automatic discharge of the bankrupt issued under s. 168.1 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 as am. S.C. 1992, c. 27 (the "Act") by resort to the provisions of s. 187(9) of the Act.

Whether leave to appeal is required, and if leave is required whether it should be granted, are issues which must be considered in the context of the facts of this matter. Thus, before turning to the relevant provisions of the Act and the issues raised by counsels' submissions, I will briefly refer to the evidence.

The Evidence and the History of the Proceedings

Samuel R. Baker (the "bankrupt") is a lawyer. He was a adjudged bankrupt upon the issuance of a receiving order, on May 7, 1993. Frank S. Kisluk Limited is the bankrupt's trustee in bankruptcy (the "trustee").

In the course of the administration of the bankrupt's estate, the trustee, through inadvertence, did not provide notice to the creditors, as required by s. 168.1 of the Act, of the bankrupt's entitlement to an automatic discharge nine months after the issuance of the receiving order. In addition, through inadvertence, the trustee did not file notice opposing the automatic discharge within the prescribed time. The trustee first became aware of these errors when he received a request from the bankrupt for his discharge certificate.

At that point the trustee moved before the Registrar for an order declaring that there had been no automatic discharge under s. 168.1 of the Act. The bankrupt moved at the same time for an order directing the trustee to issue a certificate of discharge. On May 19, 1994, the Registrar held that the bankrupt was disentitled to an automatic discharge because he had refused or neglected to attend a mandatory counselling session and had thus failed to comply with s. 157.1(3) of the Act.

On the appeal, on September 16, 1994, Ground J. set aside the Registrar's declaration on the basis of his conclusion that a bankrupt against whom a receiving order is made is excused from complying with the counselling provisions of s. 157.1 of the Act. He then issued a declaration that the bankrupt was discharged, as of January 21, 1994. He held that his disposition of the appeal before him was without prejudice to the right of the trustee, or any creditor, to make further application to set aside the bankrupt's automatic discharge.

The trustee, relying on that part of Ground J.'s order, then renewed its earlier application to the Registrar in which it sought an order setting aside the bankrupt's automatic discharge. The Registrar dismissed the trustee's application to set aside the bankrupt's discharge on the basis that the court had no jurisdiction to set aside an automatic discharge granted under s. 168.1 of the Act. The trustee appealed. On the appeal, Farley J. issued an order dated December 18, 1994 invalidating the automatic discharge. It is this order which the bankrupt now appeals or, in the alternative, seeks leave to appeal.

Is Leave to Appeal Required?

Section 193 of the Act provides for appeals to this court. I set out s. 193 in full below.

> 193. Unless otherwise expressly provided, an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from any order or decision of a judge of the court in the following cases:
> (a) if the point at issue involves future rights;
> (b) if the order or decision is likely to affect other cases of a similar nature in the bankruptcy proceedings;
> (c) if the property involved in the appeal exceeds in value five hundred dollars;
> (d) from the grant of or refusal to grant a discharge if the aggregate unpaid claims of creditors exceed five hundred dollars; and
> (e) in any other case by leave of a judge of the Court of Appeal.

As can be seen, subsections (a) through (d) provide for an appeal to this court as of right where certain conditions are satisfied. Subsection (e) permits an appeal to this court with leave. The bankrupt asserts a right of appeal under s. 193(d) and alternatively seeks leave to appeal under s. 193(e).

In respect of subsection (d), there is no question that the unpaid claims of the creditors exceed $500. Thus that criterion is satisfied. The bankrupt submits that Farley J.'s order which set aside his automatic discharge has the same gravity and substance as a refusal to grant a discharge and that, accordingly, s. 193(d) is applicable. If it is, the bankrupt has automatic right of appeal to this court. The trustee argues that there has not been a grant or a refusal to grant a discharge and that subsection (d) cannot be invoked in this case.

The decision to grant or refuse a discharge is an exercise of judicial discretion. That discretion is capable of being exercised on erroneous principles or on the basis of a misapprehension of the evidence. Further exploration of the theoretical scope of error is not required. It is the potential for error that Parliament has recognized in creating this specific right of appeal from an order granting or refusing a discharge. Parliament made no specific reference in s. 193 of the Act to automatic discharges or to the automatic discharge process. It seems to me that there can be no direct right of appeal unless the granting of an automatic discharge can by analogy be viewed as coming within s. 193(d) of the Act.

Although an order to set aside an automatic discharge may have the same consequence for a bankrupt as the court's refusal to grant a discharge, the court's determination of these two questions is based upon very different considerations, as is amply illustrated by this case. It seems to me, therefore, that the power conferred upon the Court of Appeal to review discharge decisions should not be invoked to authorize the review without leave of decisions which are different in character, even if the decision in issue has a somewhat comparable effect as refusing to grant a discharge. In addition, both Farley J. and the Registrar concluded, I think correctly, that an automatic discharge issued under s. 168.1 does not involve "any order or decision of a judge" as those words appear in s. 193 of the Act. I think, therefore, that there is no direct right of appeal under s. 193(d). In my view, leave to appeal is required.

Analysis and Conclusion

Section 193(e) is wide in its scope. It provides access to an appeal to this court, with leave, from "any order or decision of a judge of the court". The section makes no reference to the basis upon which leave may be granted, or refused. It is necessary to examine Farley J.'s decision to determine whether this is a proper case for granting leave.

Farley J. agreed with the Registrar's conclusion that s. 187(5) does not provide a basis to set aside the discharge. That section provides:

> Every court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction.

Simply put, Farley J. agreed with the Registrar that an automatic discharge issued under s. 168.1(1)(f) is not an order made by the court. He concluded, however, that:

> ...[I]t would be a miscarriage of the bankruptcy regime (including the salutary benefits to the bankrupt) if an automatic discharge were to slip between the cracks through an error of the trustee.

Farley J. proceeded on the basis that there was a bona fide error by the trustee. He found that had the required notice been given by the trustee, at least one creditor would have objected. He also found that, in the circumstances, the trustee itself would have objected.

Digitized by Google

Having concluded that s. 187(5) did not provide access to an order setting aside the automatic discharge, Farley J. turned to the provisions of s. 187(9). It provides:

> No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of the opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

He characterized the automatic discharge provisions of s. 168.1 as a "proceeding" within the meaning of s. 187(9). Further, he viewed the failure of the trustee to give notice to those entitled to it by the provisions of s. 168.1 as an irregularity in that proceeding.

In the result, Farley J. informed counsel that he intended to invalidate the bankrupt's automatic discharge by resort to s. 187(9) of the Act, however, before doing so he permitted counsel to argue the issue of the application of s. 187(9) of the Act because it had not been addressed in counsels' submissions before him. Counsel accepted his invitation and the matter was further argued.

In his submissions on the scope and application of s. 187(9), counsel for the bankrupt argued that the automatic discharge process was not a "proceeding" or a "proceeding in bankruptcy" as referred to in s. 187(9). He also argued that the trustee's failure to provide notice to those entitled to it should not be taken as a "formal defect or irregularity" within the meaning of s. 187(9).

Farley J. did not accept these submissions and maintained his position characterizing the trustee's failure to provide the required notice as an irregularity in the proceeding in bankruptcy. He considered the existence of prejudice to the creditors and the public at large, finding that there was prejudice to both. He weighed against that finding the relative absence of prejudice to the bankrupt, apart from the bankrupt's ability to take advantage of what Farley J. characterized as an "administrative slip-up". In the result he applied s. 187(9) and set aside the bankrupt's automatic discharge. He required the trustee to give notice, as required, forthwith. He provided that if there were objections the trustee should arrange for a discharge hearing at the earliest opportunity.

Both parties look to the decision of McNab v. B.S. and B. Enterprises Limited (1951), 32 C.B.R. 53 (Que. C.A.) on the issue of what factors should be taken into account in deciding whether to grant leave. They submit that leave should not be granted unless: (a) the judgment appears to be contrary to law, (b) the judgment was an abuse of judicial power, or (c) the judgment involves an obvious error causing prejudice for which there is no other remedy.

These factors were referred to in a recent judgment of this court in In the Matter of the Bankruptcy of R.J. Nicol Homes Ltd. (unreported, released January 12, 1995).

An alternative test for determining whether leave to appeal should be granted was proposed by McLachlin J.A. (as she then was) in Power Consolidated (China) Pulp Inc. v. British Columbia Resources Investment Corp. (1988), 19 C.P.C. (3d) 396 (B.C.C.A.). McLachlin J.A. set out the following consideration: (a) is the point appealed of significance to the practice; (b) is the point raised of significance in the action itself; c) is the appeal prima facie meritorious; and (d) will the appeal unduly hinder the progress of the action?

In my view, the factors generally relevant to the issue whether leave to appeal should be granted are set out by Goodman J.A. in Nicol Homes. I do not, however, think that in each case all of the listed factors should be given equal weight. It seems to me that in this case, the question whether the trustee's failure to provide the notice required by s. 168.1 of the Act can be remedied by resort to s. 187(9) of the Act is a matter of considerable general importance in bankruptcy practice. It seems to me to be likely that from time to time trustees handling a large number of personal bankruptcies will, due to administrative errors, not comply with the requirements of s. 168.1 (see Annotation to Re Tong reflex, (1993), 23 C.B.R. (3d) 39 (Ont. Gen. Div.)). In addition, while I am satisfied that there are arguable grounds of appeal, I do not express any view as to whether the appeal will, or will not, succeed.

In the result, leave to appeal is granted. If so advised, the panel hearing the appeal may consider the broader issue whether leave is required in these circumstances.

Costs should be left to the panel hearing the appeal.

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Donald Cameron dated June 22, 1999.

MACPHERSON J.A.:

INTRODUCTION

[1] Most first-time bankrupts apply for a discharge approximately one year after they have been adjudged to be bankrupt. Pursuant to s.172 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, a judge sitting in bankruptcy court has a wide array of remedies at his or her disposal. Positive remedies which will provide some measure of relief to the bankrupt include an absolute discharge, a conditional discharge and a suspended discharge.

[2] A judge is entitled, under s.172, to refuse to make any type of discharge order. This appeal raises the issue of what type of circumstances and conduct would justify such an order.

A. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[3] Peter Giannotti was a major real estate development player in the booming economy of the late 1980s. As a senior officer and directing mind of the Carlyle group of companies, he was involved in scores of construction projects. Some of the projects were of quite grand proportions; one, for example, was a condominium development project in Mississauga consisting of four phases and approximately 2000 separate units. In Mr. Giannotti's words "those were the good old days."

[4] As the calendar turned from the 1980s to the 1990s, the good old days disappeared. Many of Mr. Giannotti's projects turned sour as purchasers declined to close transactions and as lenders withdrew their support.

[5] Mr. Giannotti had provided personal guarantees to several institutional lenders. On May 7, 1998, one of those lenders, the Bank of Montreal, and the Ontario New Home Warranty Program petitioned Mr. Giannotti into bankruptcy. At that juncture, he owed almost 30 creditors somewhere between $25,000,000 and $29,000,000, including $892,000 to the Bank of Montreal, $335,000 to the Ontario New Home Warranty Program and almost $19,000,000 to Montreal Trust.

[6] Just over a year later, Mr. Giannotti applied for a discharge. The Bank of Montreal opposed the discharge. The trustee in bankruptcy filed a report in which he was highly critical of Mr. Giannotti. Two other creditors, through counsel, appeared at the discharge and were given standing to cross-examine Mr. Giannotti.

[7] The discharge hearing took place before Cameron J. on June 22, 1999. At the conclusion of the hearing, Cameron J. granted a combined suspended and conditional discharge. His endorsement was:

> Discharge granted but operation of this order is suspended until 1 Jan. 2000. Discharge is conditional on bankrupt entering into an agreement with the Trustee to pay to the Trustee for the creditors one third of the amounts received by or for the Bankrupt prior to 1 Jan. 03 as evidenced by income tax returns of the Bankrupt together with a summary of the Bankrupt's business activities as sworn by him, by 30 Apr. of the year following that to which the return and summary relate.
> The Trustee may continue his rights to examine under the Bankruptcy Act, including the trustees of the Giannotti Family Trust who this court thinks have knowledge of the affairs of the Bankrupt, including the funding of the trust and placing of assets with it and the rights of the Bankrupt and members of his household under the Trust.

[8] The Bank of Montreal appeals Cameron J.'s decision. In its Notice of Appeal, the bank sought relief as follows:

> THE APPELLANT ASKS that the order be set aside and varied as follows:
> 1. That the application for discharge be refused.
> 2. In the alternative, that the terms of the Order of Mr. Justice Cameron remain intact save for the discharge granted on the condition that he pay the sum of $250,000 to the benefit of the estate.

[9] At the appeal hearing, the bank withdrew its request for alternative relief in the form of a conditional order requiring Mr. Giannotti to pay $250,000 to the benefit of the estate. The bank submits that Mr. Giannotti's post-bankruptcy conduct has been so egregious as to disentitle him to any relief.

B. ISSUE

[10] The sole issue in this appeal is whether the bankruptcy judge erred by not refusing the bankrupt's application for discharge.

C. ANALYSIS

[11] There is no question that a principal purpose of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") is the rehabilitation of unfortunate debtors. As expressed by Houlden and Morawetz in their treatise, Bankruptcy Law of Canada (3rd ed., rev., Vol. 1, 1998) at p. 1-5:

> The Act permits an honest debtor, who has been unfortunate in business, to secure a discharge so that he or she can make a fresh start and resume his or her place in the business community.

[12] However, the rehabilitation of the debtor must be balanced with the interests of creditors who have lost money because of the bankrupt's conduct. This requirement of a balanced approach in discharge hearings was well articulated by Adams J. in Re Goodman, [1995] O.J. No.72 (Gen. Div.), at para. 1:

> The rehabilitative purpose of bankruptcy legislation is well understood. See Re Willey (1981), 38 C.B.R. (N.S.) 24 (Ont. S.C.). Individuals and society generally benefit from a process by which the crushing burden of financial debt can be lifted, thereby permitting a bankrupt to resume the life of a useful and productive citizen. See Re Shakell ...(1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 270 (Ont. S.C.) Equally important, however, is the integrity of the bankruptcy process itself. While the central purpose of the statute is to enable the honest but unfortunate debtor to make a fresh start, parity of treatment between debtors and fairness to creditors need to be kept in mind.

[13] Both Adams J. and Houlden and Morawetz use two adjectives to describe a debtor who should be entitled to the relief of a discharge – "unfortunate" and "honest". I have no doubt that Mr. Giannotti has been unfortunate. The downturn in the real estate market in the late 1980s and early 1990s ruined many developers. Mr. Giannotti, with millions of dollars in personal guarantees behind his companies, was one of them.

[14] However, I do not think that the adjective "honest" applies to the manner in which Mr. Giannotti conducted himself in this proceeding. My review of his testimony at the discharge hearing leads to the inevitable and overwhelming conclusion that Mr. Giannotti has not told the truth to his creditors, his trustee in bankruptcy, or the court at the discharge hearing. In Re Miklos Gestetner and Phyllis Pearl Gestetner (25 November 1996), (Ont. Gen. Div.) [unreported], Sharpe J. said, at para. 7:

> An honest but unfortunate debtor is entitled by the law to have a fresh financial start. The applicants may have been unfortunate, but I find that they have not been honest. In my view, they are not entitled to have the fresh start the law allows them unless they are prepared to be honest with their creditors and with the court. The court has an obligation to ensure that the integrity of the bankruptcy law is maintained. The applicants have refused to provide the court with the information required to make an appropriate judgment. In light of the evidence the applicants have offered and the level of disclosure they have made as to the true state of their financial affairs, I find that they are not entitled to discharges on any terms.

[15] I agree entirely with the philosophy manifest in this passage – a dishonest debtor, and a debtor unwilling to make full disclosure of his financial affairs, is entitled to no relief under the BIA. For several reasons, I find that every word of the above passage applies to Mr. Giannotti and, therefore, like the bankrupts in Re Gestetner, he was entitled to no relief at his discharge hearing.

[16] First, Mr. Giannotti did not co-operate with his trustee in bankruptcy as the trustee sought to administer his estate. Pursuant to s.170 of the BIA, the trustee filed a report on February 19, 1999 in which he criticized Mr. Giannotti in a number of aspects, including his refusal to provide information about a family trust, his inability to explain why he disclosed different years of birth on his statement of affairs and during his examination by the official receiver, and his failure to co-operate in appearing for an examination pursuant to s.163 of the BIA.

[17] In a supplementary report dated June 1, 1999, filed three weeks before the discharge hearing, the trustee expanded on his criticism of Mr. Giannotti. According to the trustee, Mr. Giannotti was continuing in his refusal to provide information about a family trust, he had put the trustee to unnecessary expense by frivolous and vexatious actions regarding his s.163 examination, he had refused to comply with undertakings after the s.163 examination, and he refused or was unable to answer questions about how rent and office expenses were being paid for a business in which Mr. Giannotti appeared to be involved after he became bankrupt.

[18] In my view, the integrity of the bankruptcy system requires a bankrupt to co-operate with the trustee. See Mancini (Trustees of) v. Mancini (1987), 63 C.B.R. (N.S.) 254 (Ont. S.C.), Re Adelman (1945), 26 C.B.R. 152 (Ont. S.C.), and Re Rahall 1997 CanLII 14970 (AB QB), (1997), 49 C. B. R. (3d) 268 (Alta. Q.B.). The trustee is appointed by order of the court. After a receiving order is made by the court, the trustee administers the bankrupt's estate on behalf of the court. Accordingly, a bankrupt who seeks relief, by way of discharge, from the court must co-operate fully with the trustee before seeking that relief. Mr. Giannotti did not comply with this obligation.

[19] Second, Mr. Giannotti's conduct and evidence with respect to the Giannotti Family Trust was, and continues to be, completely unacceptable. The family trust was established in the late 1980s with professional assistance from a major Toronto law firm and a sophisticated international accounting firm. In his testimony at the discharge hearing, Mr. Giannotti was extremely vague and unforthcoming about the origins, funding and beneficiaries of the trust. He tried to portray the trust as the brainchild of his father, a man of humble background and no business experience, and his wife, a part-time school teacher. Eventually, the bankruptcy judge intervened and asked a series of probing questions about the trust. Mr. Giannotti continued to be highly evasive, which ultimately provoked this observation from the bankruptcy judge:

> All right, now, I'm having trouble accepting that you didn't know who the beneficiaries were, you didn't know who funded this trust, only that you told Arthur Anderson and Borden Elliot you wanted to minimize your tax exposure, draft the trust agreement and that that was the extent of your understanding of the trust arrangement. As they say down in Georgia, I'm from Missouri.

[20] In my view, Mr. Giannotti's failure to co-operate with the trustee and his testimony at the discharge hearing concerning the family trust constitute serious barriers to a discharge. When the trust was established, Mr. Giannotti was a very successful property developer operating, by his own count, 48 companies in a boom economy. It is difficult to imagine that the family trust is not a substantial asset about which the court is entitled to know a good deal more. It is also discreditable that Mr. Giannotti would try to hide his own detailed knowledge about the trust behind his father and wife.

[21] Third, Mr. Giannotti was evasive and inconsistent with respect to funding for an office he used after he became bankrupt. The office consisted of approximately 6000 square feet and had a rent of over $5000 a month. Mr. Giannotti testified that Carlyle Management Services paid for the office rent, telephone expenses, and the salary of his sister who answered the telephone. He admitted that his sister answered the telephone "Ameriplex", yet he insisted that there was no relationship between Ameriplex and the Carlyle group of companies. After exploring this matter in some detail through questions, the bankruptcy judge observed: "I find this is an unusual relationship, something's missing, but maybe we'll find out later".

[22] Fourth, in an income and expense statement dated May 31, 1999, just three weeks before his discharge hearing, Mr. Giannotti declared his monthly income as $186, all of it coming from family members. Not only does this strain belief in light of the fact that he admitted going to work at the Ameriplex/Carlyle office almost every day; it is also inconsistent with his testimony that various family members had loaned him at least $130,000 in the year after he became bankrupt.

[23] Fifth, it is clear that Mr. Giannotti engaged in at least one development venture after he was petitioned into bankruptcy. He admitted to the bankruptcy judge that the trustee had told him that he could not engage in business deals while he was an undischarged bankrupt. After several pointed questions from the bankruptcy judge, Mr. Giannotti finally conceded, referring to the business deal, that "I ought not to have signed it".

[24] Sixth, I return to Adams J.'s observation in Re Goodman that there should be "parity of treatment between debtors and fairness to creditors" in the bankruptcy process. Mr. Giannotti owes more that $25,000,000 to almost 30 creditors. He has not paid one cent to the trustee for the benefit of those creditors. Yet, to cite but one example, after he became bankrupt he continued to be a member at the exclusive King Valley Golf Club where the annual membership is approximately $4500. This is hardly parity and fairness.

[25] The factors and conduct that I have summarized clearly placed Mr. Giannotti within s. 173 of the BIA. The bankruptcy judge could not have granted him an absolute discharge; his options were to grant either a suspended discharge or a conditional discharge, or to refuse to order any kind of discharge. The bankruptcy judge chose a combination of a suspended discharge and a conditional discharge.

[26] The case law establishes that a complete refusal of any type of discharge is an unusual order given the BIA's emphasis on rehabilitation of the debtor. In Re Adelman, Urquhart J. said that a refusal of discharge "is a harsh step ... which should be resorted to only in extraordinary cases" (supra, at p. 153). However, in this case, given Mr. Giannotti's conduct and testimony, a refusal of any kind of discharge was, in my view, required. Mr. Giannotti was simply too uncooperative, evasive and untruthful with both the trustee and the bankruptcy judge.

[27] The BIA seeks to provide relief to honest and unfortunate debtors. The word 'honest' introduces a strong element of integrity into the administration of the Act. In my view, a reasonable member of the public would seriously question the integrity of the BIA if Mr. Giannotti was given any form of relief at this juncture. He has not been honest with the trustee or the bankruptcy court. He is free to re-apply for a discharge, but he must co-operate with the trustee and make full disclosure of the relevant facts.

DISPOSITION

[28] I would allow the appeal. The applicant is entitled to its costs of the appeal and the discharge hearing.

REASONS OF LÉGER, J.A.

[6] This appeal concerns the conditions required for the appellant's discharge from his bankruptcy, to which the Royal Bank of Canada ("RBC") is opposed after having granted him a loan to finance his studies. Unlike government loans,[1] this type of loan is not explicitly protected from opportunistic bankruptcies in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[2] ("BIA"). This appeal considers the relevant criteria in matters involving discharge and the terms of reimbursement of such loans.

I. BACKGROUND

[7] In broad strokes, the material facts necessary to understanding the present case are as follows.

[8] The appellant, from Ghana, is a foreign student who arrived in Montreal in 1999 to study biochemistry. After receiving his bachelor's degree in 2002, he worked at various odd jobs until the end of the summer of 2003. He then decided to return to school to obtain a university degree in podiatry.

[9] Admitted to the Faculty of Medicine at Finch University in Chicago, the appellant realized that he would be facing annual expenses of about US$40,000, that is, US$24,000 in school fees and about US$16,000 in living expenses.

[10] In September of 2003, after obtaining a first student loan from the Quebec government and another from the SLM Corporation (Sallie Mae), an American company, the appellant called on the respondent to help him finance his schooling in the United States for the three years to come. After reviewing his file and taking into account the fact that once the appellant completed his studies he would earn substantial income, the respondent made a Royal Credit Line Agreement for Students[3] available to him. Initially in the amount of $20,000 as at December of 2003, the appellant gradually increased this line of credit to $200,000, performing a final levy in the amount of $8,000 in May of 2007, a few weeks prior to obtaining his degree on June 4, 2007.

[11] The appellant obtained this line of credit without having to offer security or a guarantor. According to his explanations, he was to begin reimbursing the capital[4] of the accumulated debt only once he had obtained his first degree.

[12] Once he obtained this degree, however, the appellant chose to perfect his specialization in podiatry for four more years by accepting a residency position in a Boston hospital. During that time, his income was approximately $2,500 per month (net) with foreseeable monthly expenses of approximately $2,300. It was only upon finishing his residency, which was due to end in June of 2011, that his income would increase substantially to between US$93,000 and US$150,000, depending on the position he would then find.

[13] In June of 2007, the respondent required that the appellant begin making monthly payments of $1,500 ($1,000 in interest and $500 in capital), which amount he refused to pay, arguing his financial incapacity to meet such an obligation during his residency.

[14] In the fall of 2007, the appellant instead proposed to the respondent a deferral of the reimbursement of the capital until the end of his residency in June of 2011, while offering to pay monthly instalments of $200-300. The respondent refused, but stated that it was amenable to an increase of the line of credit, which the appellant refused because he was wary of increasing his indebtedness.

[15] Faced with this deadlock, the appellant made a voluntary assignment into personal bankruptcy on November 28, 2007, without first presenting a proposal in bankruptcy to the respondent, which might have allowed him to avoid bankruptcy.[5]

[16] On June 13, 2008, at the end of the statutory time limit, the trustee brought before the Registrar in bankruptcy an application for discharge, which was opposed by the respondent[6] on the grounds that [translation] "it was a debt arising from a student loan from which the bankrupt could not be discharged".

[17] At the hearing, the trustee's report identified a debt of $199,103.61 owed to the respondent and another of $57,170.49 owed to the Quebec department of education for a student loan, from which the appellant cannot be discharged pursuant to paragraph 178(1)(g) of the BIA. The appellant also had a few other debts that were relatively unimportant or undeclared, including one in the amount of $20,361.58 owed to the American company, Sallie Mae.

[18] The trustee foresees that the realization of the bankrupt's assets as a result of the assignment amounts to about $8,500.

II. JUDICIAL HISTORY

Digitized by Google

1. Registrar's decision

[19] The respondent's opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt was heard on July 18, 2008, by Mtre Pierre Pellerin, the registrar in bankruptcy, who rendered his decision orally from the bench. He ordered that the appellant be discharged of his debts on the following conditions:

[translation]

[6] ORDERS that the debtor be discharged on the condition that he pay to the trustee a monthly amount of $150 to be distributed among the creditors from December 1, 2008, to June 1, 2011, (date on which the bankrupt ends the practice of his profession as a resident podiatrist);

[7] ORDERS that the debtor be discharged on the condition of payment of the above-mentioned monthly instalments and of the amount of $30,000, to be paid in $10,000 yearly instalments from 2011, until paid in full;

[8] RESERVES the debtor's ability to meet the above-mentioned conditions in advance and thus to benefit from an anticipatory discharge.

[20] He explained:

[translation]

This proposal, in light of all the circumstances, in light of the debtor's behaviour, in light of a risk that could have been assessed with, in my opinion, greater attention...greater scrutiny and maybe more detailed consideration, this risk that the opposing party chose to assume, in my opinion, was in every respect greater than the actual capacity of the debtor.

There is no question here of laying blame on the opposing creditor for giving individuals, like the debtor, the opportunity to pursue their studies. But, as lenders, we cannot fail to subscribe, to perform a thorough analysis of the risk we are undertaking and then, afterwards, attempt to impute this carelessness or this failure to a debtor.

2. Superior Court Judgment

[21] The respondent appealed this decision before the Superior Court. The hearing took place on October 20, 2008, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Pierre Journet, who set aside the registrar's decision.

[22] At the end of his analysis, the judge found that the bank had not committed an assessment error when it granted a line of credit to the appellant. Additionally, the judge found that the conditions imposed by the registrar for the discharge of the bankrupt were too lenient. He wrote:

[translation]

[18] In the case at hand, the Court is of the opinion that the bank did not have to perform a special risk assessment when it granted the loan to the bankrupt because the only risk it could foresee was the borrower failing his studies.

[19] As to the security of the loan, the bank had it through the bankrupt's eventual reimbursement capacity stemming from his anticipated income.

[20] With respect, the Court does not share the opinion of Registrar Pellerin, who erroneously interpreted the legislative rule set out in the BIA regarding the reimbursement of 50% of the debt to be discharged.

[21] The conditions for reimbursing the loan as decided by the registrar are contrary to the Act and to case law. With great respect, the Court points out that the risk of failing out of school did not materialize and the security has not been modified. Consequently, the Court does not see how it can allow an application for discharge without payment in full, as doing so would be contrary to the opposing creditor's rights and to public interest in general.

[22] The Bankruptcy Court must not become an escape route permitting the cancellation of debts without consideration of the circumstances that led to the debtor's assignment in bankruptcy.

[23] In the words of Osborne J. in Snedden, "It is incumbent upon the Court to guard against laxity in granting discharges so as not to offend against commercial morality".

[24] Consequently, the Court sees no reason to cancel or reduce the bankrupt's debt since he will have the means to reimburse it as planned.

[25] In the absence of reasons other than the desire to erase debts when the capacity to reimburse exists, the debtor cannot use bankruptcy as a means to erase debts incurred and loans granted in good faith.

[26] To allow such a manoeuvre would go against both public order and public interest, which dictate that one's undertakings be honoured except in the specific cases provided for in the Act.

[27] Considering that the bankrupt had no other reason justifying his failure to reimburse his debt, the Court cannot condone its reduction without jeopardizing the judicial system's credibility in matters of bankruptcy and insolvency.

[23] After rendering judgment from the bench on October 20, 2008, and filing his reasons on October 30, 2008, the judge corrected the conclusions on November 6, 2008:

[translation]

Orders the bankrupt to pay to the trustee in bankruptcy of Fui Yao Dawson the amount of $199,903.61, for the benefit of the Royal Bank of Canada, in equal and consecutive monthly payments of $200 from the month of December of 2008, to the month of June of 2011, and to then reimburse the balance of the outstanding sums in yearly instalments of at least $10,000.

Orders that the bankrupt be discharged once the sums described above have been paid in full.

III. GROUNDS OF APPEAL
[24] The appellant faults the trial judge for having improperly interpreted the evidence, improperly applied the accepted principles in matters of discharge, and imposed conditions on him that were too severe.
[25] He also argues that the judge erred with respect to the payment terms. First, the payments should not be made for the benefit of the respondent, but to the trustee for the benefit of the body of creditors.[7] Second, the judge should have left him the possibility of making anticipatory payments in order to be discharged more quickly, as the registrar had planned.
[26] For the purpose of analysis, we will categorize these diverse grounds under two main headings:
1. Did the trial judge err with respect to the bankrupt's payment terms?
2. Did the judge improperly assess the evidence and err in his application of the principles of discharge?

IV. ANALYSIS
1. Did the trial judge err with respect to the bankrupt's payment terms?
[27] In its statement, the respondent did not dispute the appellant's arguments concerning the payment terms, and at the hearing, it reiterated that it would defer to the Court's discretion on the matter.
[28] With respect, as to the beneficiary of the payments, in light of the absence of explanations from the judge justifying his choice, I am of the view that he should not have departed from the general principle that payments are remitted to the trustee for the benefit of the body of creditors.[8] Subsection 176(3) of the BIA is unequivocal:
176. (3) Where a conditional order of discharge of a bankrupt is made providing for payment of a further dividend or sum of money by the bankrupt, all payments on account thereof shall be made to the trustee for distribution to the creditors.
[29] This conclusion in the judgment a quo being wrong, I would intervene to correct the order so that any amounts to be paid shall be so paid to the trustee for the body of creditors.
[30] I am also of the view that the second term should be made more flexible and should allow the appellant to make anticipatory payments, if circumstances allow him to do so, which would in turn enable him to be discharged more quickly.
2. Did the judge improperly assess the evidence and err in his application of the principles of discharge?
[31] The appellant submits that the registrar did not commit any error justifying the intervention of the Superior Court judge. He points out that he did not cause his insolvency, nor did he display any reprehensible conduct. His bankruptcy was caused by the respondent's refusal to reduce his monthly reimbursement payments before he completed his residency. In these circumstances, no viable proposal in bankruptcy would have been possible for him.
[32] Moreover, the appellant asks us to correct the approach taken, specifically with regard to the so-called rule raised by the judge in his reasons whereby, in order to obtain a discharge, 50% of a student loan must be reimbursed.[9]
[33] As for the respondent, it argues that the judge of the Superior Court was justified in setting aside the registrar's decision because the latter had erroneously criticized the respondent for not sufficiently attending to its risk assessment. In its view, the line of credit was granted to the appellant because of the income that it could rightly expect a medical student to earn upon finishing his studies. The appellant is about to complete the final part of his professional training in the expected period of time and without having suffered any misfortune.
[34] The respondent maintains that it financed the higher education of the appellant, who thus acquired an intangible asset, exempt from seizure, that he will soon be able to use. The respondent argues that in the present case, if the appellant were allowed to declare bankruptcy and be so easily discharged, the integrity of the student loan system would be threatened.
[35] Finally, it argues that even if the period of time ordered by the judge of the Superior Court to reimburse the debt appears lengthy, it corresponds very closely to the initial period provided, except for an adjustment to take into account the evolution of the appellant's income.

* * * * *

[36] The appellant faults the judge for writing, at paragraph 20 of the judgment under appeal, that the registrar had [translation] "incorrectly interpreted the legislative rule set out in the BIA regarding the reimbursement of 50% of the debt to be discharged"; he argues that, in so doing, the judge erroneously implied that the statute requires that 50% of the debt be reimbursed before the bankrupt's discharge may be ordered.

Digitized by Google

[37] Obviously, and even if the judge's comments might be considered ambiguous, the judge did not state that the statute requires that every debtor reimburse 50% of his debts prior to being discharged. There is no such rule according to the BIA, no more than there exists a rule requiring the debt to be reimbursed in full. Each case turns on its own facts.
[38] The judge's comments quite probably concern paragraph 173(1)(a) of the BIA regarding conditional discharge, which includes one of the facts that the judge took into account before rendering judgment:
173. (1) The facts referred to in section 172 are:
(a) the assets of the bankrupt are not of a value equal to fifty cents on the dollar on the amount of the bankrupt's unsecured liabilities, unless the bankrupt satisfies the court that the fact that the assets are not of a value equal to fifty cents on the dollar on the amount of the bankrupt's unsecured liabilities has arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible;
[39] That being said, I am of the opinion that the other grounds raised by the appellant cannot succeed.
[40] The judge rightly found that the registrar had erred in faulting the respondent for improperly assessing its risk or for failing to pay sufficient attention to its assessment.
[41] First, in granting the line of credit to the appellant, the respondent did not improperly assess its risk because the loan was granted with the view that the appellant would obtain well-paid employment once his training was completed. Thus, the respondent's only risk was that the appellant might fail to complete his professional training or to obtain the projected income. The appellant did obtain his degree in podiatry, however, was earning money during his residency, and there is every reason to believe that he will be earning the projected income as of June 2011.
[42] In short, it was premature for the registrar to determine that the respondent had improperly assessed its risk because, in so doing, he considered the risk to stem from the disproportion of the amount loaned to the appellant and the income he earned during his residency. This can only be assessed upon completion of the appellant's professional training, however, once he enters the job market.
[43] Also, the appellant undoubtedly knew what expenses he would incur prior to undertaking his medical studies in the United States, which is reflected in his accumulated debt. Certainly, the aggregate of his various debts is not negligible, but we must keep in mind that his unprofitable financial situation is only temporary. Indeed, the appellant never alleged that he would be unable to pay his debt once his residency was completed. Thus, the conditions for reimbursement established by the trial judge very closely correspond to the compromise the appellant had put to the respondent prior to his bankruptcy, except that they were adapted to take into account his more limited short-term financial means.
[44] The judge was also right to conclude that the registrar applied the discharge principles improperly, which justified him in weighing up the evidence and substituting his own assessment. These criteria are: (a) an honest but unfortunate person's right to start afresh; (b) the prima facie right of creditors to be paid; (c) the right of the public to trust in the system and in its integrity.[10]

(a) an honest but unfortunate person's right to start afresh
[45] It is common ground that one of the objectives of the BIA is to enable the rehabilitation of individuals who, crumbling under their debt loads, merit a second chance and a fresh start. In Dolgetta, Re, Registrar J.B. Hanebury wrote the following in the context of an application for discharge:
[43] Is Ms. Dolgetta an honest but unfortunate debtor who is entitled to a fresh start? In this case, as in Ament, the bankrupt is graduating with the education that she bargained for. She, like many of her other fellow students, is completing her education with significant debt. Her misfortune was becoming involved in a negative personal relationship which resulted in depression and ultimately resulted in her working only on her Ph.D. and taking a leave from her medical studies until it was completed. However, I fail to see how this circumstance should result in an entitlement to a fresh start. It hasn't led to a poor result; she will still have two degrees and a promising career.[11]
[46] The same can be said of the appellant, who has not yet begun his professional career and whose financial situation is the result of his legitimate desire to acquire a high level degree that will serve as a springboard, once his residency is complete.
[47] The appellant has not been unfortunate, quite the opposite. He successfully completed his studies and obtained a degree in podiatry, while continuing to travel and to lead a normal life. What is more, from the moment his residency is completed in June of 2011, he will be able to rely on significant income, ranging from US$93,000 to US$150.000, and still more in the long term. His expectations, therefore, remain unchanged since the line of credit was granted by the respondent.
[48] There is nothing in the evidence to show any unforeseeable circumstance affecting the plan the appellant had initially made for himself, except his choice of filing for voluntary assignment into personal bankruptcy in November of 2007, citing the following grounds: "after failing to, obviously, have the bank work with me". Although the reimbursements that the appellant must make are spread over a lengthy period of time, this situation is no different from the one he had originally anticipated. In short, everything unfolded as planned.

[49] It is difficult to see, therefore, why he should benefit from a second chance. His indebtedness directly helped him to obtain an intangible asset allowing him to optimistically consider a medical career with all the attending financial benefits. Seen from this angle, the hardly restrictive conditions set by the registrar to obtain his discharge might be interpreted as incentive to behave irresponsibly.

(b) the prima facie right of creditors to be paid

[50] The evidence has shown that the respondent's claim represents 78% of the proved debts in the bankruptcy, the balance being due to the Quebec department of education, whose claim will not be extinguished by the appellant's discharge. His intangible durable asset, his degree in podiatry, will enable him to have the financial means to reimburse the amounts due to the respondent. On this issue, Registrar Nettie had the following to say in Ament (Re):

[10] It is clear that the Bankrupt has no present income or ability to make payments, under the Superintendent's guidelines or otherwise, to his creditors. However, it is equally clear that the Bankrupt may reasonably expect to have significant earning potential in the years to come, utilizing his medical education. In fact, not only is it reasonable for him to expect this, but both RBC and the US lender have lent on this basis. Nothing in the evidence detracts from the obvious conclusion that RBC, in particular, lent its funds to the Bankrupt not on the basis of his present ability to pay, but on the basis of his expected future to pay, and I so find.[12]

[51] In Coffey (Re), Registrar J. Orsborn aptly wrote the following, to the same effect:

[33] Coffey will earn a modest income for the next three years. After that, and as anticipated when he applied for the line of credit, his income will rise substantially. At that point he will begin to realize the benefit of the asset that he has acquired at least in part through the assistance of those who have financed his education.

[34] While Coffey may need present relief from his obligation to pay his creditors – although such obligations were not being pressed prior to his bankruptcy – he does not require relief from those obligations once he achieves his anticipated earnings potential. Neither has it been demonstrated that once Coffey acquires his specialist credentials, he will legitimately require relief from a significant portion of those obligations. To put it shortly, it appears that Coffey was advised to go into bankruptcy not because he needed relief from his creditors so he "could get back on his feet" and start again, but simply because it was thought that bankruptcy provided a legally-sanctioned way to avoid paying his debts.[13]

[52] In short, the respondent gave the appellant credit based on his representations that his indebtedness would allow him to acquire a quality, durable, intangible asset: in light of the circumstances of the case at hand, it is therefore entitled to expect that its claim will be reimbursed.

(c) the right of the public to trust in the integrity of the system

[53] In this case, the judge was correct to note that it could be offensive to commercial morality and to the integrity of the system if the appellant were allowed to get off so lightly.

[54] Loans granted by financial institutions for post-secondary studies serve in some capacity as intermediate support for students who wish to pursue their studies. As noted above, this type of loan is not given the particular legislative treatment that is given to government student loans,[14] but it should nonetheless be treated similarly. This was underlined in Korenic (Re),[15] where the registrar wrote:

[13] ... However, I come to this conclusion, not because it is a loan called "student loan", but because it was a loan for the acquisition of a long term durable asset, which is incapable of realization by the Estate, except through the mechanism of conditional discharge payments. It cannot be seized, or sold, except by a bankrupt. A bankrupt cannot be forced to work or utilize it, only incented through the imposition of payment terms on a bankrupt's discharge to realize on the asset and include the creditors in the fruits of that realization.

[14] To my view, it is the nature of the asset acquired by the loan, and not the name of the loan, which attracts the same type of analysis as in the former student loan cases. A similar analysis is occasionally applied where the dollar value of exempt assets is found by the Court to be unconscionably large and conditional payments are imposed on the discharge, notwithstanding the lack of income to fund them. In my view, the higher moral character attributed to loans of this type, is attributable not to the loan, but to the situation where there is a loan used to acquire an asset of the type described above, and found in the case at bar in the form of a professional degree. It would be inappropriate to allow a bankrupt to keep such an asset without any realization on it for the benefit of creditors. To find otherwise would undermine public confidence in the insolvency system. It is trite law to point out that a discharge Court is charged with the balancing not only of the rights of a bankrupt to a fresh start, and the right of creditors to be repaid, but also maintaining the integrity of the insolvency system, and public confidence in it, as an integral part of our country's system of commerce.

[55] Insley (Re)[16] is to the same effect. Therein, Saskatchewan's Court of Queen's Bench wrote:

[45] As noted, through her education, financed largely by the RBC, this bankrupt acquired a long term durable asset, and at that, a professional degree which is in demand and has the potential to generate a relatively high level of income. By law, assets vest in the trustee, however, an asset which is an 'education' cannot be realized upon for the benefit of creditors, and the only means to do so is by repayment of a significant amount owing. At para. 15 in Re Ament, supra, Registrar Nettie said: "It would be offensive to commercial morality and, in my view, call the integrity of the insolvency system into question if this asset were not realized upon for the benefit of the creditors." And in Re Saunders, supra, Registrar Funduk on the same point with similar facts observed at para. 14: "What is paramount here is the integrity of the bankruptcy process and the public's perception of it."

[46] This bankrupt is an intelligent, well-educated woman who can expect a bright and promising career. Like the bankrupt in Re Lopez, also a doctor, Registrar Herauf (as he then was), at para. 4 observed that he had: "received a highly sought after professional degree at the taxpayers expense, with the prospect of substantial income in the future." See also Re Saunders, supra.

[47] I am satisfied that hard work and effort by the bankrupt will result in a comfortable life for her. She acquired exactly what she bargained for – financial support for purposes of acquiring a long term, durable asset – and did so, in her own words, in the relative comfort that easy credit affords.

[56] This same reasoning was accepted by the registrar in Ament (Re),[17] where the bankrupt was ordered to pay an amount corresponding to the totality of his indebtedness to the financial institution.

[57] Lastly, in Dolgetta (Re),[18] the registrar noted that public confidence in the integrity of the bankruptcy system required that bankrupt individuals in situations similar to that of the appellant not be discharged from a debt that enabled them to acquire a post-secondary education. He concluded that the bankrupt was liable for the total debt due to the lending institution:

[45] Finally, for the public to have confidence in the integrity of the bankruptcy system, Ms. Dolgetta should not be allowed to wash her hands of this debt. She will be left with a valuable asset, the fruits of which she will likely enjoy for the rest of her life. As the court has noted, a debtor can expect to make long-term payments for a lifelong asset.

[47] In this case, Ms. Dolgetta states that she tried to renegotiate with the Royal Bank, to no avail. The notes attached to the affidavit of the bank's officer indicate that, at least once when renegotiation was apparently discussed, increased credit was sought. The evidence indicates that Ms. Dolgetta is seeking to avoid payment to her primary creditor, the Royal Bank. The integrity of the bankruptcy system requires that, in the facts of this case, this not be allowed to occur. Ms. Dolgetta hoped to obtain two degrees while most students were obtaining one. Her personal situation resulted in an adjustment to her timing. This is not a reason to permit her to graduate almost debt-free, while other students will be shouldering heavy debt loads as they commence their medical careers. Public confidence in the bankruptcy system would be diminished.

[58] It is self-evident that post-secondary education enables the acquisition of a durable and quality asset; in the present case, this intangible asset was acquired by the appellant thanks in part to the financing granted by the respondent. This asset will survive the bankruptcy and the appellant will continue to benefit from it his entire career. In these circumstances, it would be shocking to the public if the appellant were allowed to be so easily released from his obligations toward the respondent.

V. SUMMARY

[59] We reiterate that each case must be analyzed according to its particular context. Though it may sometimes be appropriate to impose less severe payments, the circumstances of the present case do not militate in favour of a discharge according to the conditions devised by the registrar. Thus, there is no cause to intervene in the corrections brought by the judge, with the exception to those regarding the payment terms.

[60] On the first question, I would allow the appeal in part for the sole purpose of reviewing the conclusions of the trial judgment to order that the payments be made by the bankrupt to the trustee for the benefit of the body of creditors, not to the respondent, in compliance with section 176(3) of the BIA. There is also cause to allow the bankrupt to make anticipatory payments to accelerate his discharge, as the case may be.

[61] On the second question, the trial judge's analysis is free from error. He correctly applied the criteria to be considered in the discharge of a bankrupt. There is no cause for intervention.

[62] Although the appeal has been allowed in part, I would nonetheless condemn the appellant to pay costs because the issues on which we are intervening are minor and unopposed by the respondent.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN
Bankruptcy—Review of judicial discretion—Bankruptcy due to judgment on bankrupt's tort—Order for discharge—Principles of judicial discretion—Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, s. 142(2).

The appellant was a gratuitous passenger in the respondent's car which collided with a train at a grade crossing in the City of Regina. As a result of this collision the appellant suffered serious head injuries. The respondent, a wage earner in modest circumstances and with a large family, was found fully responsible for the accident by reason of "wilful and wanton misconduct". Damages were assessed at $12,909.03 together with taxed costs of $1,194. The respondent appealed unsuccessfully and thereafter made an assignment in bankruptcy. When in due course the respondent applied for his discharge this was initially suspended for three months and later in the Court of Appeal granted on condition that the respondent consent to judgment being entered against him for $1,800 payable by monthly instalments of $50.

Held (Abbott J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per Martland, Ritchie, Spence and Pigeon JJ: The effect of the order appealed from would be that the appellant would recover nothing: having regard to the proper application of judicial discretion as vested in the Courts by s. 142(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C 1970, c. B-3, and the fact that the bankruptcy was precipitated by a judgment in damages for wilful and wanton misconduct in the operation of a motor vehicle, the damages should be increased to approximate 50 per cent of the total debt to the appellant without interest. The modest circumstances of the respondent were considered and the amount of monthly payment fixed by the Court of Appeal was not increased.

Per Abbott J. dissenting: The facts in this case are not in dispute and the only question concerns the principles to be applied by the Court in reviewing the exercise of judicial discretion. This Court is certainly in no better position to exercise that discretion than was the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan. As a second appellate Court, this Court should not attempt to interfere.

APPEAL by special leave of the Supreme Court of Canada from an order of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan setting terms for a discharge in bankruptcy. Appeal allowed, Abbott J. dissenting.

E.F.A. Merchant, for the appellant.
R.W. Thompson, for the respondent.

ABBOTT J. (dissenting)—This appeal, by leave of this Court, is from a unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan granting the respondent a conditional discharge under s. 142 of the Bankruptcy Act.

The relevant facts are not in dispute. They are admirably summarized in the reasons of my brother Pigeon and I need not repeat them.

The principles to be applied in the exercise of the judicial discretion given under s. 142 of the Bankruptcy Act, were considered by this Court in Industrial Acceptance Corporation Ltd. et al. v. Lalonde et al.[1] Esty J. who delivered the unanimous judgment of the Court said at p. 120:

> A judgment rendered in the exercise of a judicial discretion under s. 142 ought not to be disturbed by an appellate court, unless the learned judge, in arriving at his conclusion, has omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact, or violated some principle of law. In re Richards (1893), 10 Mor. B.R. 136; In re Wood (1915), Han. B.R. 53; In re Labrosse 5 C.B.R. 600; In re Lobel [1929] 1 D.L.R. 986; Re Smith [1947] 1 All E.R., 769. A consideration of the whole of the evidence, with great respect, does not warrant a reversal of the judgment of the learned judge of the first instance.
> Appellate courts, however, where they have concluded that the discretionary judgment of the judge of the first instance ought not to be disturbed, have repeatedly relieved against what has appeared to them to be an undue severity in the terms imposed. Re Nicholas 7 Mor. B.R. 54; Re Swabey 76 T.L.R. 534; Re Thiessen [1924] 1 D.L.R. 588. The purpose and object of the Bankruptcy Act is to equitably distribute the assets of the debtor and to permit of his rehabilitation as a citizen, unfettered by past debts. The discharge, however, is not a matter of right and the provisions of ss. 142 and 143 plainly indicate that in certain cases the debtor should suffer a period of probation. The penalty involved in the absolute refusal of discharge ought to be imposed only in cases where the conduct of the debtor has been particularly reprehensible, or in what have been described as extreme cases. The conduct of the debtor in this case, while not sufficient, with great respect, to justify the absolute refusal, does justify his discharge only subject to the imposition of terms.

As I have stated, the relevant facts are not in dispute. Those facts, as they relate to the automobile accident which gave rise to appellant's claim and to the respondent's bankruptcy, were carefully reviewed in the judgment of MacPherson J., the learned trial judge, and again by Culliton C.J.S., who delivered the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal confirming that judgment. Chief Justice Culliton also delivered the unanimous judgment granting the conditional discharge, which is now under appeal. As to the proceedings in bankruptcy, the court below had before it the same factual material as was placed before this Court, and it would not appear that it "has omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact".

Appellant argued before us that a distinction should be made between a bankruptcy arising out of trade debts and one arising out of the commission of a tort, but no such distinction exists under the Bankruptcy Act.

The sole issue here is whether the judicial discretion exercised by the court below was unreasonable. This Court is certainly in no better position to exercise that discretion than was the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan. As a second appellate court, I do not think we should attempt to interfere.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs. Under the terms of the order granting leave, the appellant is entitled to her costs on the application for leave.

The judgment of Martland, Ritchie, Spence and Pigeon JJ. was delivered by PIGEON J.—This is an appeal, by special leave of this Court, from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan varying the order made by a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench on respondent's application for discharge under the Bankruptcy Act. This order had suspended the discharge for a period of three months only. In the Court of Appeal, it was directed that respondent be required to consent to judgment being entered against him in the sum of $1,800 payable without interest by monthly payments of $50 starting February 1st, 1970.

Respondent's debt towards the appellant arises out of an automobile accident. She was a gratuitous passenger in his car when she suffered serious head injuries in a collision with a train at a grade crossing in the City of Regina. Red lights were flashing and a warning bell was ringing and respondent was found fully responsible by reason of "wilful and wanton misconduct". Damages were assessed by MacPherson J. at $12,909.03 plus costs taxed at $1,194. Respondent's appeal from this judgment was unanimously dismissed. Thereupon, he made an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act and, in due course, applied for discharge.

The net result of the order appealed from is obviously that the appellant will recover nothing. With respect, I cannot agree that this is in conformity with the proper principles to be applied in the exercise of the discretion vested in the courts by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act (R.S.C. c. B-3) respecting discharge. Section 142(2) reads:

> (2) The court shall on proof of any of the facts mentioned in section 143
> (a) refuse the discharge,
> (b) suspend the discharge for such period as the court thinks proper, or
> (c) require the bankrupt, as a condition of his discharge, to perform such acts, pay such moneys, consent to such judgments, or comply with such other terms, as the court may direct.

The first fact mentioned in s.143 is:

> (a) the assets of the bankrupt are not of a value equal to fifty cents in the dollar on the amount of his unsecured liabilities, unless he satisfies the court that the fact that the assets are not of a value equal to fifty cents in the dollar on the amount of his unsecured liabilities has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible:

In the present case, respondent's bankruptcy was precipitated by his condemnation to pay damages to the appellant. This being due to a finding of "wilful and wanton misconduct" on his part, certainly his financial predicament cannot be said to have arisen "from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible". The courts below did not ignore this provision. However, the sanction meted out in the first instance was purely nominal. In the Court of Appeal, respondent was in effect ordered to make payments that would hardly cover more than appellant's costs in the trial court and in the Court of Appeal. Although respondent is a wage earner with a large family in very modest circumstances, I cannot agree that the proper application of the provisions above quoted should result in a plaintiff making no recovery for personal injuries caused by gross negligence. It would mean that motorists in respondent's situation would be able to tell such a claimant: "There is no use suing me, if you lose you will have to pay the costs, if you win I will make an assignment in bankruptcy and you will get nothing".

Counsel for the appellant has referred us to a number of cases dealing with analogous situations on applications for discharge. Among recent cases, the following may be noted: Rice v. Copeland[2] in which the bankruptcy was similarly precipitated by a claim for damages arising out of a car accident which was said to be due to driving in an intoxicated condition. Dickson J. (as he then was) ordered the bankrupts to pay as a condition of their discharge 25% of their unsecured liabilities. He said (at p. 232):

> In Re McIntosh, supra, Williams, C.J.Q.B. agreed with the judgment of Smily J. In re Buell (35 C.B.R. 53, [1955] O.W.N. 421), that although the Bankruptcy Act is available to an insolvent not engaged in business, the Act was never intended to enable a judgment debtor to get rid of a judgment for damages and with no other purpose to serve than the convenience and comfort of the debtor.

In Sederoff v. Vigneault (23 C.B.R. 228, [1942] Que K.B. 44), the debtor had gone into bankruptcy to escape payment of a judgment in damages arising out of an automobile collision. The bankruptcy judge, in the exercise of his discretion, suspended the discharge until the debtor had paid 50 cents in the dollar on the amount of his unsecured liabilities. The court of appeal refused to interfere.

In the present case, I would not increase the amount of the monthly payments fixed by the Court of Appeal, but I would increase the sum to be paid to approximate 50 per cent of the total debt to the appellant without interest.

For those reasons, I would allow the appeal with costs and vary the judgment of the Court of Appeal by increasing to $7,200 plus the costs in this Court the amount of the judgment to be satisfied by the respondent as a condition of his discharge.

Appeal allowed with costs. ABBOTT J. dissenting.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

RE: ROBERT BRATTI (Plaintiff (Appellant)) v. WABCO STANDARD TRANE INC. carrying on business as TRANE CANADA, TORONTO-DOMINION BANK and RELLUMCOR SALES INC. (Defendants (Respondents))

BEFORE: LASKIN J.A. (In Chambers)

COUNSEL: WILLIAM J. HUBAR, Q.C. for the applicant
LOU BRZENZINSKI for Wabco
JEFFREY KRIWEZ for Toronto-Dominion Bank

HEARD: APRIL 21, 1994

ENDORSEMENT

The applicant Robert Bratti seeks leave to extend the time to file a notice of appeal from the judgment of Carruthers J. dated December 23, 1992.

The applicant filed an assignment in bankruptcy on February 25, 1992. He had made a previous assignment in bankruptcy some nine years earlier. On December 23, 1992, Carruthers J. heard the applicant's application for an unconditional discharge which was contested by three of the applicant's creditors. The applicant apparently had a falling out with his solicitor just prior to the discharge hearing and, as a result, represented himself. Carruthers J. ordered a discharge but conditional upon the applicant paying the sum of $500,000 within three years. Rule 49(1) of the Bankruptcy Rules provides:

> 49.(1) No appeal to the Court of Appeal shall be brought unless notice thereof is filed with the registrar and served within 10 days after the day of the order or decision appealed from or within such further time as a judge of the Court of Appeal allows.

The applicant neither appealed within the 10-day period nor gave any indication that he intended to do so. On January 20, 1993, a law firm retained by the applicant with respect to his bankruptcy wrote to the applicant's creditors stating that it had been advised that the applicant intended to appeal the decision of Carruthers J. The law firm asked for consent to an order extending the time for appealing. Consent was not forthcoming. On the evidence before me the applicant took no other steps to appeal until he brought this motion, which was launched over 15 months after the order of Carruthers J.

While appellate courts have considered a number of different factors in determining whether to grant leave to extend the time for appealing, the governing principle is simply whether the "justice of the case" requires that an extension be given. See Frey v. MacDonald (1989), 33 C.P.C. (2d) 13 (per Blair J.A.).

I have concluded that the justice of this case does not require the granting of a extension of time for appealing for the following reasons.

Digitized by Google

(1) The applicant did not have a bona fide intention to appeal before the expiration of the appeal period provided in the Rules.

(2) The material filed on the motion does not even indicate that the applicant maintained a firm intention to appeal after January 20, 1993. If anything the opposite inference may be drawn.

(3) The applicant has provided no explanation for his delay in bringing this motion. Indeed the applicant has not filed an affidavit in support of his motion, but instead has relied upon the affidavit of an articling student in the law firm now representing him. That affidavit is silent as to why nothing occurred between January 1993 and March 1994. While the respondents on this motion have not submitted that they have been unduly prejudiced by the delay, it seems to me that there is an obligation on a party seeking the indulgence of the court to provide a reasonable explanation for his failure to move earlier. This applicant has not done so.

(4) The merits of the proposed appeal are dubious. Pursuant to s.172 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act the plaintiff could not obtain an absolute discharge if any of the facts referred to in s.173 were made out. There is no doubt on the evidence before Carruthers J. that several of the subparagraphs of s.173 were proven and the applicant's counsel in this court did not suggest otherwise. Thus the only arguable issue on an appeal would be the amount of the payment ordered by Carruthers J. The applicant had debts in excess of 5.1 million dollars at the time of his assignment and his creditors asked for a payment to the trustee of half of that amount. Carruthers J. in the exercise of his discretion ordered the sum of $500,000. The applicant says the amount is excessive. On my review of the record the trial judge, in arriving at this figure, was justifiably influenced by the applicant's lifestyle which included continuing to live in a very large home and continuing to drive a luxury car, by the applicant's failure to disclose in his statement of affairs all of the benefits that he had received and by the fact that this was the applicant's second bankruptcy in less than 10 years.

The motion is dismissed with costs.

Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta

Toal (Bankrupt), Re

Date: 19930929

Docket: 36896

Agrios, J.: A bankrupt medical doctor, 54, appeals the decision of the Registrar in Banruptcy, M. Funduk, providing for a conditional discharge of the bankrupt upon the consent to a judgment to survive the bankruptcy. The judgment is for 65% of an outstanding income tax liability of $267,000 owed to the one preferred creditor, the Minister of National Revenue, as of the date of bankruptcy.

I dismiss the appeal. I am satisfied that Registrar Funduk has not omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact or violated some principle of law. Accordingly, it would be improper for me, under the circumstances, to substitute my discretion for the Registrar's and I decline to do so.

As noted in Sillito (Bankrupt), Re (1993), 142 A.R. 127 (Q.B.) under the recently amended Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, an opposed application for the discharge of a bankrupt is heard by a Registrar and an appeal from the Registrar is to a bankruptcy judge. Such an appeal is a true appeal and not a hearing de novo. To succeed the applicant must satisfy the judge that the Registrar erred in principle or in law in the way he exercised his discretion. In this case the applicant (appellant) has been unable to satisfy this overriding requirement.

The bankrupt, a practising medical doctor, assigned himself in bankruptcy in April 1992. The following creditors proved their claims:

1. One secured creditor for $31,065;
2. Two unsecured creditors for $16,467;
3. One preferred creditor, the Minister of National Revenue, for $267,000 inclusive of income tax liability plus penalties and interest.

There was also a contingent unsecured creditor for $410,000 for alleged medical negligence. The Registrar quite properly, in my view, refused to delay the discharge for this creditor, as at best this creditor, if successful, would still rank behind the Minister and it was apparent that the Minister's claim would not be paid in full.

In his reasons, the Registrar noted a cavalier attitude on the part of the bankrupt, which continued even after the bankruptcy. The bankrupt is liable for post-bankrupt income tax of about $40,000 and as of the date of the application to the Registrar in June of 1993, the bankrupt had only made one quarterly payment on his post-bankruptcy income. The Registrar said:

> "Self-earners should not be able to abuse the system in this way. Self-earners should not be able to avoid income tax liability in this way. Self-earners should not be encouraged to not pay income tax, run it up and then go into bankruptcy.
> "In my view this bankrupt has a serious attitude problem.
> "The conclusion I draw is that this is simply a case of a bankrupt who has decided that he is going to keep all his income, spend it as he sees fit and just will not pay income tax.
> "That is just not acceptable."

Counsel for the appellant argued that the Registrar's terms for a conditional discharge were "unduly severe and onerous" under the circumstances. This wording was taken from an Alberta Court of Appeal decision in Links v. Robinson (1970), 16 C.B.R. (N.S.) 180 (Alta. C.A.) at 185. Counsel also made reference to seven other cases involving Revenue Canada and professionals, all of which would tend to indicate that Dr. Toal's conditional discharge was unduly severe and onerous by comparison. I am not persuaded. To me, the two authorities cited by the Crown provide the more significant, relevant comparisons and distinctions in the various cases involving professionals and liability for income tax: Links and Steward v. A.G. Canada 1991 CanLII 1519 (BC CA), (1991), 4 C.B.R.(3d) 240 (B.C.C.A.).

In this case counsel for the respondent, Minister of National Revenue, set out the current pattern of earnings of the bankrupt and an appropriate shielding based on the Superintendent's guidelines. Counsel estimated that with the current earnings and appropriate payments on the proposed consent judgment, the judgment would be paid in a little over three years. Based on this data, I cannot say that the Registrar has imposed conditions that are unduly severe and onerous. Unlike Dr. Links, it may be said that Dr. Toal, in his failure to make appropriate deductions for income tax during the four years, 1988-1991 plus the first quarter of 1992, should be subject to censure. In the Links bankruptcy a series of economic disasters involving a farm operation drove Dr. Links into bankruptcy. In this case, our Court of Appeal noted the bankrupt's conduct, both before and after the bankruptcy, as the first and apparently the most important element to be taken into account. In the Links decision the Court of Appeal indicated at p. 185 that: "There is no criticism of his conduct throughout, either prior to or during the bankruptcy, except that his business undertaking outside his practice failed."

The question of conduct and the circumstances surrounding the incurring of the income tax liability as addressed in Links, foreshadowed the Steward decision by more than twenty years. The Steward decision of the B.C. Court of Appeal clearly delineated an important distinction in the question of bankruptcy discharges involving tax liability.
The distinction is between:

1. An unfortunate event overtaking the bankrupt; and
2. An indifference to obligations.

The Steward decision accepted the principle expressed in Re Katari (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 178 (Ont. S.C.), that a debt for income tax is a debt owed to all members of the public of Canada. By this principle, such a debt should be treated as if in a different category than other debts and even a different category than debts to other preferred creditors. This distinction is made because of the nature of income tax obligations and because of the fact that everyone in the country must share the burden.
However, in both the cases of Dr. Links and Dr. Steward there was no evidence of indifference to tax responsibilities. Further, there was no evidence that the reason for the bankruptcy was the escape from tax obligation. Rather, in those cases, the bankruptcies were caused by unwise investments.
Registrar Funduk has effectively noted this distinction and applied the reasoning in Links and Steward. The court in Steward stated at 243:

> "If there is shown to have been a persistent ignoring of tax obligations and an indifference to sharing the tax responsibility of other Canadians then that would be a significant fact in determining the conditions which would be attached to a conditional discharge from bankruptcy. Such a scoffing at the tax system was present in the case of Re Katari."

Dr. Toal has very persistently ignored tax obligations and scoffed at the tax system, thus meeting the test referred to by the court in Steward. Registrar Funduk correctly analyzed the situation, in my view, when he said:

> "Nobody likes paying income tax. But I resile from the position that a taxpayer should not pay income tax when he incurs it (when he makes the income) and when the liability reaches a large amount go into bankruptcy and piously say that he cannot now pay that large debt and it has caused his bankruptcy. Debts do not cause bankruptcy. In this case it was the unacceptable conduct of the bankrupt which created this situation."

I find no error in Registrar Funduk's reasoning. The appeal is dismissed.
Appeal dismissed.

ISSUE

[1] Mr. Willier applies for his discharge from bankruptcy. The sole reason for the trustee's objection is the fact that this is Mr. Willier's third bankruptcy.

BACKGROUND

[2] Mr. Willier is 61 years of age and has no dependents. He lives alone. He is in good physical health but apparently receives medication for certain nervous conditions. He is unsure of the exact condition, but it sounds by his description to be a form of agoraphobia (the fear of open places and crowds) alternating occasionally with claustrophobia.

[3] Mr. Willier is a truck driver, though currently unemployed. He receives employment insurance of approximately $1,430.00 per month. Mr. Willier has no other skills or trade. Driving is the only thing he knows, and he says finding work is getting more and more difficult as employers tend to prefer younger employees.

[4] When asked what effects, if any, his bankruptcy had on his employability, he was vague, and seemed to indicate that his employment would likely be more influenced by his advancing age than by his bankruptcy status.

[5] Mr. Willier's assignment makes for interesting reading. He does not list a single asset: no cash on hand, no personal effects - nothing. All of his debts, therefore, are obviously unsecured, but they total only $16,850.00. I say "only", fully realizing that $16,850.00 is a significant sum, especially if you do not have it, but compared to most bankruptcies it is a relatively small sum. Certainly, it seems curious that it would be enough to trigger a third bankruptcy, when Mr. Willier must have been made aware of the significance of a third bankruptcy, and the possible implications.

[6] Mr. Willier has very limited schooling. When I asked the level of his education, he said ". . . about grade 6". It became obvious, as I discussed the matter with him, that literacy and writing are a real challenge to Mr. Willier. This simply confirmed my expectation that Mr. Willier's prospects are extremely limited.

[7] Mr. Willier's first bankruptcy occurred in 1979 and he was given an absolute discharge in 1981. His second bankruptcy began in 1985, and ended with his discharge in October 1995, almost 10 years later. His s. 170 report indicates that his discharge from his second bankruptcy was "Absolute (cond.)", which I assume means that, rather than receiving a suspension, he was given a condition. It is surprising to me that he did not receive a suspension on his second discharge. When I asked him why his second discharge took so long, he said that he was in contact with his then-trustee for those 10 years, but the trustee's fee "kept increasing", and that a fee that began at $1,000.00 increased to over $4,000.00, and that he was unable to pay it.

[8] A third bankruptcy is an extremely serious matter. The authors of Bennett on Bankruptcy (CCH Canadian Limited 8th ed. at p. 266) state in absolute terms that "Where the bankrupt goes into bankruptcy for the third time, the court will refuse the discharge", citing as authorities Re Hardy ((1979) 23 O.R. (2d) 227) and Re Resnick ((1990) C.B.R. (N.S.) 223). The pithy comment of Anderson J. in Hardy (at p. 228) is oft-quoted: "In my view, a third bankruptcy is one too many." The reasons for Mr. Hardy's various bankruptcies are not given, but they occurred in 1958, 1974, and 1977, a chronology not all that dissimilar to Mr. Willier's. Anderson J.'s thinking seemed simply to be that a "three strikes" rule is at work, and that the system should not permit "periodic purging" of debts.

[9] In Re Randall ((1984) 54 C.B.R. (N.S.) 121) Sutherland J. of the Ontario Supreme Court also refused a discharge to a third-time bankrupt. In Mr. Randall's case it seems there was more at work than just the problem of a third bankruptcy. Part of the court's frustration may have arisen from the fact that Randall was a medical professional (a chiropractor) yet "...he seems to pay creditors when they attach his OHIP moneys and when they hold security or threaten action against him" (at p. 123). That frustration is obvious in another comment:

> ...one simply does not know to what extent there are parallel human and emotional responsibility shortfalls reflected in the marital and parenting history of this bankrupt. (also at p. 123)

In considering Re Hardy, Sutherland J. pointed out that that Anderson J. did not purport to "lay down the general rule of law" and regarded it as guidance, but not a binding authority. With respect, I agree; had the parliament intended that third-time bankrupts should be routinely refused discharge it would have provided for that in the amendments that have been made to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (R.S. 1992 ch. 27) ("the Act") since Hardy.

[10] Finally, in Resnick Registrar Ferron also refused discharge on a third bankruptcy. The Registrar concluded that Resnick had systematically used the Act to avoid taxes (over $140,000.00 during the three bankruptcies), and that while enjoying a handsome income (over $7,000.00 per month in 1990) all was spent in daily expenses "...including the costs of three rental automobiles" (at p. 224). Having examined the bankrupt and his pattern of assignments, the Registrar concluded (at p. 224) that to discharge Mr. Resnick "...merely prepares the way for a fourth bankruptcy."

[11] Mr. Willier, approaching the court for a third time, is already obviously in a very bad light. But he is not in as bad a light as Mr. Resnick; he does not seem to have routinely used the Act to avoid taxes. It cannot be said that he has such character flaws or familial failings as those that apparently afflicted Mr. Randall. No, the facts with Mr. Willier seem to suggest financial incompetence combined with a general lack of education that have produced disastrous results for him and for his creditors.

[12] By the time an individual has entered a third bankruptcy, the purpose and intent of the Act shifts from its remedial purpose of assisting well-intentioned but unfortunate debtors to one of protecting society, and in particular unsuspecting potential creditors. The best intentions and hopes of such bankrupts become subordinated to the need to protect others from the bankrupt's demonstrated financial incompetence, negligence, and carelessness. If there can be a concept of debtors' recidivism, it is demonstrated in stark relief by a third-time bankrupt.

[13] To even consider a discharge for a third time bankrupt the court must be satisfied that the bankrupt has gained sufficient insight and made sufficient changes in his or her life that it is not reasonably possible that further bankruptcy will occur. I have serious concerns about Mr. Willier on that score. When I asked what he would do differently to avoid another bankruptcy, his answer was simple and direct: "I am a poor businessman". By this he was referring to his failed attempt to run a restaurant in Chetwynd, B.C. Implicit in that was his conclusion (and, when asked, his assurance to the court) that he would not attempt his own business again, but would remain an employee for the balance of his working life. Against this, however, is his advancing age and his admitted difficulty in finding work as a truck driver when younger drivers are available. One wonders if, as work becomes more and more scarce, Mr. Willier might not be tempted to attempt self-employment or a business venture again.

[14] Related to this question of insight is the relatively small amount of his debts: one wonders why Mr. Willier did not attempt other forms of resolution before declaring bankruptcy. If he has not learned from his multiple bankruptcies to manage a relatively modest debt load, is it not likely that he will again, and possibly in short order, find himself in financial straits?

[15] On the other hand, one must qualify any expectations of Mr. Willier with the salient fact of his limited education, and the serious limitations on his literacy. Similarly, his age is a factor; he is now 61 and, bluntly put, he has less time in the future to create economic difficulties than might a younger person.

[16] Any financial condition on Mr. Willier's discharge could be insurmountable for him. Instead, Mr. Willier will be given his discharge, but it will be suspended for three years from the date of his application, being July 19, 2005. Such a lengthy suspension, in my view, serves the dual purpose of recognizing the seriousness of a third bankruptcy, while at the same time protecting unsuspecting future creditors for, probably, the balance of Mr. Willier's working career.

JUDGMENT LIAN M. SCHWANN, Q.C.
February 17, 2009 Registrar in Bankruptcy

[1] Denis Biblow ("Biblow") applies for his discharge from bankruptcy. His discharge is opposed by both the trustee and the Official Receiver (OR). While the Springside Credit Union did not oppose discharge, an employee of the Credit Union made submissions in her role as inspector which amplified the positions of the opposing parties.

Digitized by Google

BACKGROUND

[2] Biblow assigned into bankruptcy in December 2007. An addiction to gambling is given as the cause. At the time of assignment he had declared assets of $837,442 against unsecured debts of $244,720 and secured debts of $16,300. Of the declared assets, the vast bulk (in excess of $765,000) is in the form of RRSP's which is exempt from execution by virtue of provincial law. [The Registered Plan (Retirement Income) Exemption Act, S.S, 2002, ch. R-13.01].

[3] Biblow had been employed in the credit union system rising through its ranks to the branch manager position; however within months following assignment Biblow was terminated from his employment. He initially contested his dismissal for cause through Labour Standards but has since abandoned this claim and the trustee shows no interest in pursuing it on behalf of creditors.

[4] Shortly before assignment Biblow had been transferred from a credit union branch in Regina to Theodore, a small town in Saskatchewan. He and his wife resided in a credit union owned house from the time of transfer to dismissal however loss of employment also meant loss of the house. The bankrupt has decided to remain in that town primarily because of the lower cost of living. His wife resides with him. She is employed on a casual basis.

[5] Trustee opposition is premised on these four grounds set out in the trustee's section 170 Report:

- the bankrupt failed to disclose the transfer of his half interest in the 2000 Prowler fifth wheel trailer to his son for a nominal fee;
- the bankrupt failed to disclose his half interest in a term deposit held by his spouse in the amount of $225,000;
- the bankrupt failed to disclose the existence of the boat lift and docks; and
- the bankrupt brought on his bankruptcy by gambling.

[6] Although the evidence is somewhat unclear on this point, Biblow borrowed from both the Springside Credit Union and the Torquay Credit Union in the year prior to assignment using the bulk of the loans to acquire RRSP's. The OR claims these loans total $27,500 and suggests that little has been paid on principal. Biblow places the balance outstanding closer to $20,000 however based on the proven claims the trustee says $21,372 is owed.

[7] The OR examined Biblow under oath and filed both an OR Report and the bankrupt's written declaration which together shed further light on his bankruptcy and its cause. The information revealed that Biblow's gambling began about five years ago, becoming more frequent in the two years preceding bankruptcy. In total he estimates spending over $100,000 largely financed by cash advances. Repayment of debt was softened by loan extensions given to himself in his position as branch manager.

POSITION OF THE PARTIES

Trustee

[8] In spite of a relatively good income stream and a successful career in the financial industry, the financial problems which arose were attributable solely to his gambling addiction. This fact was not disputed by Biblow and is supported by the examination conducted by the OR. While gambling alone is worthy of censure, the trustee argues that Biblow's failure to perform certain fundamental duties in bankruptcy should not go unnoticed.

[9] These failures relate to the following:

½ interest in 2000 Prowler fifth wheel trailer - This asset was not listed on his Statement of Affairs, however he subsequently admits to having gifted it to his son. The sum of $4,885 was later collected from the son and forms part of realized assets.

½ interest in term deposit held by his spouse in the amount of $225,000 – The trustee recovered over $115,177 from a term deposit which again was not disclosed in his Statement of Affairs. The history behind this stems from the sale of his house in Regina. Net proceeds of $225,000 were placed in a term deposit solely in his wife's name with interest thereon paid monthly to her. The trustee considered this to be a settlement in favor of Mrs. Biblow and in due course she agreed to release ½ interest for the benefit of her husband's estate.

boat lift and docks - These were not disclosed initially. They appear to have no value or were fully secured as no amount was realized from them according to the s. 170 Report.

[10] Biblow had surplus income obligations for the first nine months of bankruptcy with the sum of $1,642 remaining. The trustee recommends that additional surplus income payments be made for the ensuing 12 month period calculated at the rate of $750 per month for a total of $9,000. In total, $10,642 is the recommended amount of surplus income.

[11] Further, a period of suspension of 6 to 12 months is recommended owing to the causes of bankruptcy.

Official Receiver

[12] The OR takes the position that the facts of this case warrant a conditional order in the amount of $30,000 which approximates loans outstanding to the Springside and Torquay Credit Unions obtained by Biblow to acquire exempt RRSP's. These loans were arranged on the eve of bankruptcy and at a time he was gambling heavily.

Digitized by Google

[13] The OR highlights the fact Biblow's conduct only came to light through the diligence of inspectors and creditors and not through the bankrupt's candor. According to the OR Biblow acquired two RRSP's valued at $13,000 and $14,500 respectively, financed through loans from the Springside and Torquay Credit Unions in 2007. The OR further points to the fact these were acquired separately and knowingly, and were not part of a pension rollover.
[14] The OR urges this court to impose a sizeable conditional order in view of the conduct of the bankrupt and the large amount of exempt assets. Reliance is placed on Kreese (Re), 45 C.B.R. (3d) 36 and Nelson (Trustee of) v. Nelson 33 C.B.R. (3d) 292 in support of the position that a bankrupt should not be allowed to exit from bankruptcy with a large amount of exempt assets if doing so would undermine public confidence in the bankruptcy system.
[15] The OR is not completely satisfied full disclosure has been made and has therefore referred this case to the RCMP for further investigation.

Inspector

[16] The Inspector's comments were brief but pointed. She maintains that because of Biblow's senior position with the Credit Union he was able to advance money to himself with little or no oversight and with which he purchased RRSP's knowing them to be exempt from execution. His knowledge of the system and ability to easily facilitate loans to himself along with loan extensions – while knowing to be insolvent - should be sanctioned. Anything less would put lending institutions on notice and potentially cast a pall on lending practices for purposes of purchasing exempt RRSP's.

Biblow

[17] Biblow showed himself to be a polished, professional man. Through counseling, he claims to have quit gambling and changed his lifestyle. He now wishes to make amends to his family and move on.
[18] He is presently 61 years of age working on a temporary basis for a local business. Although he hopes to continue working for several more years, because of his age, the limited employment opportunities in a small community and his present circumstance, his options are limited. Work in the financial sector for instance, which had served him well over the years, would be difficult if not impossible to secure in light of what has transpired.
[19] Biblow offered no explanation to the many concerns expressed by the Trustee, the OR or the Inspector other than to briefly explain circumstances giving rise to the term deposit. He claims that when his Regina house sold, the net proceeds were initially paid to him alone despite his instructions to the contrary. He later put the money in a term deposit in the sole name of his wife so that she would have an income stream from interest earned on it. Although he did not say so expressly, the implication I was left to draw was that this was an innocent and well meaning gesture on his part and not a contrived attempt to avoid creditors.
[20] Finally he points to the fact that the vast bulk of his current RRSP's were accumulated through pension contributions and subsequent rollover well before his assignment into bankruptcy.

[21] This case comes down to this simple question: should this bankrupt be allowed to exit bankruptcy with a large amount of exempt assets without making a sizeable contribution to his creditors?
[22] Before addressing the central issue, a return to basic principles is in order. Section 172 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA") allows this court to make an order of discharge which is either absolute, conditional or suspended. Where, however, a s. 173 fact is established, an absolute order is precluded.
[23] Gambling which brings on or contributes to bankruptcy is a recognized s. 173 fact. (BIA, s. 173(e)). Having found one fact, it is unnecessary to probe further however this file is rich with other conduct-based irregularities highlighted in paragraph 5 of the trustee's s. 170 Report. In each case (the fifth wheel trailer and gift to son, boat lift / docks, and ½ interest in the term deposit) the assets and transactions were purposively undisclosed at the time of assignment. What makes this even more offensive is the fact these irregularities only came to light after probing and investigation by the trustee and creditors. Biblow did not dispute these facts at the hearing nor offer any justification for them. I am satisfied these omissions and failures constitute a failure to perform duties under the Act which is a recognized s. 173 fact. (BIA, s. 73(o) and s. 158(f),(g) and (k)).
[24] Even if I am wrong about the existence of a s. 173 fact, this Court has discretion under s. 172(1) to make a conditional or a suspended order of discharge having regard to the bankrupt's conduct, income and other relevant factors. [see: Papazoglou (Re), 11 C.B.R. (4th) 95; Giesbrecht (Re), 50 C.B.R. (N.S.) 46].
[25] Discharge is discretionary, exercised judicially having in mind the objects and purposes of the BIA. Courts across Canada have routinely found the primary purpose of the Act to be this:

> ... it gives the honest but unfortunate debtor who has surrendered all non-exempt assets for distribution a new opportunity in life and a clear field for future effort unhampered by the pressure and discouragement of pre-existing debts.
> [J.M. Ferron, Q.C. "The Approach of the Court to the Discharge of Bankrupt Judgment Debtors" (1986) 61 C.B.R. (N.S.) 134.]

Digitized by Google

[26] With those broad objects and purposes in mind, courts exercise discretionary power by striking a balance between three recognized factors.

> The first, the interest of the creditors who claim moneys that is properly owing to them. Second, the interest of the bankrupt who, faced with insurmountable debt obligations, seeks the process provided by the system for some relief from those obligations to the extent that he is unable to discharge them from his own resources. The third factor is the integrity of the system itself and the public perception of that integrity.
> [Shakell (Re), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 270]

[27] The OR places focus on the third factor advocating in favour of a sizeable conditional order where, as here, the size of the bankrupt's exempt assets would offend most reasonable people and thereby undermine the integrity of the bankruptcy system. The appropriate balance in this case tilts in favour of public perception and integrity of the system, they argue.

[28] The OR's position is a delicate one because almost all of the bankrupt's assets are exempt. Exemptions, of course, play a pivotal role underpinning the second of the three factors that being the rehabilitation of the bankrupt by allowing him to exit bankruptcy in an economically viable fashion. Houlden & Morawetz, (Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3rd ed., loose-leaf, vol. 2 at 3-51) have described the role of exemptions in this fashion:

> The reason for conferring the exemption on bankrupts is (a) the social interest in preserving the viability of debtors so that their continued maintenance does not fall on society, and (b) the humane considerations of permitting debtors sufficient assets so that they may maintain themselves and their families at a reasonable standard of living.

[29] Notwithstanding the existence of exempt assets (which are not divisible amongst creditors by virtue of s. 67(1)(b) of the BIA), courts have not backed away from imposing conditional orders of discharge where considered appropriate. The case of Nelson (Trustee of) v. Nelson, is often cited as the leading authority in support of the principle advanced by the OR. There Wedge, J. concluded: "…leaving a bankruptcy with $250,000 in assets brings into question the integrity of the bankruptcy system."

[30] That case was followed in this province by Kreese where Registrar Herauf (as he then was) framed the issue more as a balancing of interests. On the one hand are exemptions the purpose of which, he says, is described by the Supreme Court of Canada as: "the bare minimum which a bankrupt is entitled to maintain in order to facilitate his or her rehabilitation following bankruptcy". [Ramgotra (Trustee of) v. Northern American Life 1996 CanLII 219 (SCC), (1996), 37 C.B.R. (3d) 141]

[31] Where the total value of the bankrupt's exempt assets goes beyond a 'bare minimum', other factors may take precedence. He concludes at paragraph 10:

> I have no doubt that this is the philosophy behind exemption legislation. As stated previously the difficulty arises when the size of the exemption is such that it would offend the majority of reasonable people and certainly diminish the integrity of the bankruptcy process. Notwithstanding this difficulty the courts must attempt to fashion orders that pay due deference to both these principles.

[32] This approach has been followed elsewhere. [See: Wells (Re), 178 Sask. R. 150; Davey (Re) 1999 CanLII 14798 (ON SC), (1999) 44 O.R. (3d) 327 (Ont. S.C.J.); Zibara (Re), 34 C.B.R.(4th) 149 (N.S.S.C.); Fredette (Re), 45 C.B.R. (4th) 34; Bird (Re) reflex, (2002), 37 C.B.R. (4th) 163 (Ont. S.C.J.)].

[33] To be clear, these cases do not stand for the bald proposition that no bankrupt should exit bankruptcy without a sizeable (or any) conditional order simply because the bankrupt has exempt assets. The dollar amount of the exempt assets coupled with the unique facts of each case informs the court on the appropriate disposition. In fact there have been just as many cases where the facts did not justify a conditional order. [See: Huber (Re), 1986 Sask.R. 314; Fernuik (Re), 169 Sask.R. 136; and Poettcker (Re), 38 C.B.R. (5th) 259 (Alta. Q.B.)].

[34] Poettcker (Re), the most recent case where the issue came to the fore, was an appeal from a decision of the Registrar who had granted an absolute discharge in the face of sizeable exempt assets. In dismissing the appeal, the court emphasized that the analysis was not reduced to a mere consideration of the ratio of exempt assets to proven claims; something more is required which is often an element of misconduct on the part of the bankrupt.

[35] Balancing the interests at play, I find that the third factor – the integrity of the bankruptcy system – must take precedence in the unique facts before me. I conclude that reasonable people would be offended if this bankrupt, given these facts, were to exit bankruptcy with such a sizeable amount of exempt assets. The integrity of the bankruptcy system would be seriously undermined in the minds of fair minded people if I were to give greater weight to his rehabilitation.

[36] It is not just the large amount of exempt RRSP's which brings me to this conclusion. The actions and inactions of the bankrupt have a direct bearing on the result. First of all, this bankrupt was a seasoned employee in the financial lending sector, and at that, one who occupied a very senior position at the time of assignment. In such a position he likely had knowledge of debtor–creditor law including personal exemption laws and their interplay in bankruptcy. Armed with this knowledge, at a time he was insolvent and gambling, he acquired exempt RRSP's and allowed himself loan extensions.

[37] Second, his insolvency did not arise because he was unfortunate, instead it came about through gambling. As alluded to above, one of the purposes of the BIA is to facilitate the rehabilitation of honest but unfortunate debtors. While uncontrolled gambling can bring about misfortune in people's lives, it is not the same type of misfortune which the BIA was intended to remedy. This was not an unfortunate event that suddenly and inexplicably befell him such as illness, business or job loss, or sharp drop in family income. He gambled of his own choosing and had the ability to quit at any time before the losses began to undermine his financial position.

[38] Third, the bankrupt failed to make proper disclosure of his assets at the time of assignment as evidenced in the s. 170 Report. And to make matters worse, information about these assets only came to light after much prodding and digging by the trustee and creditors. This behavior, coupled with gambling, constitutes the requisite 'misconduct' element deemed necessary in Poettcker.

[39] In carrying out this balancing exercise, I must be mindful of the bankrupt's ability to make a monetary contribution to his estate. To the extent a bankrupt is financially able, he or she should contribute so that the creditors get the best possible return from the estate. [see: Davey, p. 334; and Wells at p.153]

[40] Biblow will exit bankruptcy with in excess of $765,000 in RRSP's plus pension and he will be relieved of his unsecured debts. This amount is a fairly sizeable nest egg for most people and one which he can look to in retirement. Payment to his estate for the benefit of creditors of a small amount will not in my view impose an undue burden on him nor undermine his financial viability in the short or long term.

[41] Further, although nearing the end of his working career, the bankrupt is in good health and fully capable of working for several years to come. He struck me as an articulate, polished businessman whose skills and training could be put to good use for several more years. He may encounter difficulty in finding a replacement job in his chosen field but that doesn't preclude him from finding a reasonably well paying job elsewhere.

[42] The last issue is the matter of surplus income. The trustee seeks a conditional order totaling $10,642 composed of $1,642 for the balance owing on the first nine months along with a further sum of $9,000 calculated on the basis of $750 per month for 12 months. His net income per month ranges from $2,500 to $5,000. Given these facts, surplus income is warranted.

CONCLUSION

[43] Based on these considerations and the balancing of interests required by the BIA, I find this to be an appropriate case for the bankrupt to make a sizeable contribution to his estate which I fix at $20,000. I further order the bankrupt to pay surplus income of $6,000.

[44] An order of discharge shall issue therefore conditional upon payment of $26,000. Payment may be made monthly at the rate of $500 per month, which I believe can be comfortably accommodated, beginning on the 1st of March, 2009 until fully paid. Judgment interest will accrue on any arrears. The bankrupt will enjoy the right of prepayment.

[45] Finally, as the bankrupt brought about this bankruptcy through gambling, I find it appropriate to also suspend his discharge for a period of 6 months following compliance with the terms of the conditional order.

DATED at the City of Regina, in the Province of Saskatchewan, this 17th day of February, A.D. 2009.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
OF THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE McCLUNG

[1] This appeal is directed to a determination of the procedural prerequisites sustaining a successful allegation that a listed bankruptcy debt was fraudulently incurred and therefore survives a discharge from bankruptcy. Section 178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, provides that among debts not released by an Order of Discharge is:

> (e) any debt or liability for obtaining property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation;

The appeal originally came before us without oral argument. However, limited oral submissions were later taken on some points in dispute.

[2] This appeal features an Order of Discharge applied for by the Trustee, Faber and Company, which was granted by Registrar Breitkreuz. The Order for Discharge included a clause which required a further court application by the Appellant Attorney-General if it wished to treat its debt owed by Cory Shane Bourassa, the bankrupt, as a fraudulent debt to be excepted from the discharge under s. 178(1)(e), supra. The Appellant Attorney-General entered no appearance at the discharge application, and therefore did not oppose it. However, at the application the Trustee requested the inclusion of the clause in the discharge order, advising the Registrar that earlier, instead of obtaining a court order declaring that a debt fell under s. 178(1)(e), the Employment Insurance Commission had used its own internal mechanisms in deciding that debt was fraudulent. Upon exhaustion of the statutory appeal procedures, it would pursue the bankrupt for his debt. The Trustee successfully argued that the establishment of fraud, triggering a s. 178(1)(e) exemption, must be rooted to an adjudication to that effect and that a finding based on the Commission's internal procedures was at best collateral and in this proceeding not proven. Indeed the decision of the Employment Insurance Commission is not reproduced in the Appeal Book nor was it placed in evidence before the Registrar at the discharge hearing.

[3] This order that was made was upheld on appeal to Wilson J., who concluded that a court declaration that a debt survives bankruptcy is required, and that the procedures under s. 38 of the Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23, were inadequate for this purpose.

[4] Before this Court, the Appellant Attorney-General argued that a debt which falls under s. 178(1)(e) survives bankruptcy by operation of law, so that no court declaration to this effect is required. As a consequence, it is argued, the Registrar lacked jurisdiction to impose such a condition obliging the Crown to pursue a further court application. The Appellant Attorney-General relies on the Employment Insurance Commission's internal finding of fraud, stressing that it is the bankrupt who must seek to refute that finding by either appealing it through the statutory appeal procedures found in the Employment Insurance Act, or by seeking to answer the Appellant Attorney-General's attempts to collect the debt on the basis of his bankruptcy and subsequent discharge.

[5] I disagree with the Appellant's stance. While it is true that s. 178(1)(e) does not expressly require a court declaration, a creditor, even the Crown, cannot be permitted to make its own determination of fraud and then revert to collection of its debt on that basis. A court order declaring fraud, whether obtained before, during or after a discharge from bankruptcy, is required to free a creditor to pursue its claim against a discharged bankrupt. In my view, the impugned condition that was imposed was merely a direction that is incidental to the core of the judgment and did not equate to a jurisdictional error. Indeed, it favoured the Attorney-General of Canada by giving him an opportunity to shore up a defective record when the application is renewed.

[6] The case law reflects the various ways in which such orders can be sought. For example, when a pre-bankruptcy judgment does not contain an express finding of fraud, a creditor can either seek a declaration of fraud at the time of the discharge application or he can seek a declaration from the Court of Queen's Bench after the discharge: Berthold v. McLellan reflex, (1994), 19 Alta. L.R. (3d) 28 (C.A.). Furthermore, if no judgment exists at the time of the bankruptcy, a creditor may subsequently initiate an action to recover the debt, pleading fraud. If the creditor can prove fraud, the existence of the discharge from bankruptcy will be no defence to the action: Moose Jaw Credit Union Limited v. Kennedy (1981), 13 Sask. R. 252 (Q.B.); Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Aksoy (1989), 75 C.B.R. (N.S.) 248; [1989] O.J. No. 867 (Ont. Dist. Ct.). On the other hand, when a judgment, which pre-dates the bankruptcy, expressly finds fraud, no further court order would be needed before the creditor may pursue collection of its debt: Smith (Re) reflex, (1985), 43 Sask. R. 27 (Q.B.), aff'd reflex, (1986), 45 Sask. R. 240 (C.A.). The same is true of a consent judgment from which an admission of fraud can be inferred: Beneficial Finance v. Williamson (1971), 16 C.B.R. (N.S.) 30 (Ont. Co. Ct.); Demitor (Re) (1993), 137 A.R. 381 (Master).

[7] Section 38 of the Employment Insurance Act grants the Commission the power to impose penalties on a claimant when it is aware of facts that, in its opinion, establish that the claimant has made false or misleading representations. However, recitation of this power, without more, does not grant the Commission jurisdiction to establish internally "false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" for the purposes of the exemption set out in s. 178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[8] Wilson J. was understandably concerned when he balked at the Attorney-General's submission, noting:

> I have to say that I have difficulty with the suggestion that a finding of the Commission based on "facts of which they are aware" should be elevated to that status. Perhaps that is what the federal legislation says, but it does not accord with my view of how the rights of people are to be determined after full exploration of the facts in law, particularly when a matter of such importance as fraud is alleged.

[9] The Registrar's conclusion which was affirmed by Wilson J. is supported by the rules of practice touching allegations of fraud in civil proceedings. Fraud and its proof have their own distinct biosphere. In commercial disputes, allegations of fraud are frequently levelled. But they must be levelled with caution. At common law the claim must be specified and with particulars, or it will be struck: see Canadian Abridgement, vol. R17D, (2d) ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1991) at Digest 1689 et seq. Regarding evidence of fraud, Kerr on Fraud and Mistake notes that; "fraud is not to be assumed on doubtful evidence. The facts constituting fraud must be clearly and conclusively established." Where fraud is unsuccessfully alleged, the success of the allegor otherwise may not earn costs, or may earn only a reduced costs award: Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Forest Oil Corporation 1990 CanLII 5502 (AB QB), (1990), 73 Alta. L.R. (2d) 223; Gerber v. Eagle Star Insurance Co., [1981] I.L.R. 1-1442 (B.C. S.C.); McLaughlin v. Colvin, [1941] 4 D.L.R. 568 at 576, 583 (Ont. C.A.), aff'd [1942] 3 D.L.R. 292 (S.C.C.). An unsuccessful party, who has alleged but not proven fraud, may incur taxable costs on a scale well beyond that which would otherwise be payable: Wong v. Schienbein reflex, (1986), 49 Sask. R. 86 (Q.B.). An unfounded allegation of fraud by a defendant may even justify an award of costs to an unsuccessful plaintiff: Snider v. New Brunswick Telephone Co. reflex, (1986), 69 N.B.R. (2d) 8 (Q.B.), aff'd on different grounds reflex, (1987), 78 N.B.R. (2d) 266 (C.A.). These sanctions reflect the gravity with which the courts regard an allegation of fraud. Its existence will not be judicially noticed.

[10] He who alleges must prove. It is that simple. Counsel's assertion, which invites the dispensing of proof, is not enough. And internal administrative reviews, even reviews for which a right of appeal is provided, do not suffice. The Appellant must seek a judicial finding of fraud in order to pursue its debt. Registrar Breitkreuz' order was not beyond his jurisdiction as alleged. It merely reiterated this requirement.

[11] Here the record filed is silent on issues such as how fraud was found by the Employment Insurance Commission, and whether Bourassa had any input in the process.

[12] The bankruptcy court, by statute, normally determines what claims may survive a bankruptcy discharge application. The Court of Queen's Bench may exercise jurisdiction as well. Berthold v. McLellan, ante. But this Court is the forum which must decide whether the Registrar in Bankruptcy was wrong in the face of the evidence placed before him, i.e. whether the onus imposed by s. 178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act has been satisfied. The record we have been given is neither adequate or reparable. The documents now offered by the Crown were available at the time of the hearing. They cannot now be received as exhibits via a fresh-evidence affidavit. For this appeal, it is too late.

[13] In future cases, the issue may be resolvable by timely proof of certification from the Employment Insurance Commission or the Federal Court of Canada that fraud permeates the debt that is involved. Thus, I do not foreclose a proper s. 178(1)(e) objection in future. I agree with Chief Justice Fraser that the possible equation of a s. 38 Employment Insurance Act declaration to s. 178(1)(e) Bankruptcy fraud cannot be resolved now but must await some future determination.

[14] We should be clear. The appeal of the Attorney-General of Canada is dismissed solely because of the inadequacy of the record that is filed to support it.

[15] To bring closure to this case, I would vary the judgment under appeal by directing that the Appellant Attorney-General of Canada institute any further application by filing and serving it not later than 60 days from the issuance of these reasons. Absent such application within the time allotted, Bourassa's debt to the Appellant Attorney-General of Canada will be deemed to have been discharged in its entirety. I would dismiss the appeal and in so doing affirm the Registrar's direction.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE CHIEF JUSTICE FRASER
CONCURRING IN THE RESULT

[16] The Registrar in Bankruptcy granted an Order of Discharge which was upheld by the chambers judge on appeal. The Registrar ordered at A.B. 11 that the Employment Insurance debt (EI debt) totalling $3060.00 owing by the bankrupt, Cory Shane Bourassa, "is discharged or the Stay of Proceedings is in place until Human Resources Development Canada makes a Court application and the Court subsequently declares that the Employment Insurance debt was a fraudulent debt pursuant to Section 178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act" (Bankruptcy Act).

[17] The appeal focussed on whether a finding of fraud must be made by a court in order for a debt to fall within s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act or whether a decision by the Canada Employment Insurance Commission (Commission) that a debt is owing due to a fraudulent Employment Insurance claim (EI claim) as determined under s.38 of the Employment Insurance Act (EI Act) will suffice for this purpose.

[18] The difficulty is that characterizing the issue in this way obscures, indeed ignores, two key underlying issues critical to this analysis:

1. Is a decision made under s.38 of the EI Act binding on the parties?
2. If so, what is the scope of that decision? In particular, is a debt owing to the Crown in respect of which a penalty has been levied against a claimant debtor under s.38 of the EI Act necessarily equivalent to a "debt or liability for obtaining property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" under s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act?

[19] Focussing on who must make a finding of fraud in a vacuum also mixes these unaddressed and unresolved substantive issues with a third procedural issue, namely the manner in which it is determined that a debt falls within the scope of s.178(1)(e). Since the answer to the procedural issue is linked to the first two issues, the result of failing to deal with the core underlying issues is that the answer to the question as posed is "it depends".

[20] The Attorney General of Canada (Canada) takes the position that fraudulent debts survive a discharge of bankruptcy by operation of law pursuant to s.178(1)(e), independent of any court declaration. On this basis, therefore, Canada argues that the Registrar exceeded his jurisdiction in making the order he did.

[21] Canada concedes that penalties imposed under s.38 do not survive an individual's bankruptcy since the penalty portion of the debt does not represent property fraudulently obtained by the bankrupt. But it contends that the underlying debt does so. It points out that Parliament has expressly conferred on the Commission under s.38 of the EI Act jurisdiction to determine if an EI claim was "false and misleading", that is fraudulent.

[22] Canada submits that this is the conclusion which the Commission reached with respect to Bourassa's EI debt, namely that Bourassa obtained "property", the EI benefits, by "false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation". In other words, the EI debt is a "fraudulent" one within the scope of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act. Since Bourassa did not appeal that decision, it is binding on Bourassa and thus his Trustee in Bankruptcy (Trustee).

[23] The Trustee contends that a Commission decision that a particular EI claim was a fraudulent one is not sufficient to bring the underlying debt within s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act. It insists that no creditor, including the Commission, can make "its own finding of fraud". Only a court of competent jurisdiction can do so. The Trustee also claims that under the EI Act, the "onus" is on the debtor claimant to disprove the finding of fraud while under the Bankruptcy Act, it is on the creditor. According to the Trustee, this "reverse onus" is another reason why a court, and not simply the Commission, must determine this issue.

[24] Indeed, the Trustee went so far as to assert before the Registrar that "so often on our files where EI is involved they assume a person's fraudulent ...." [A.B.7]. In this regard, there is no evidence before this Court to substantiate this assertion.

[25] I turn first to the effect of a decision under s.38 of the EI Act. The EI Act, along with the related employment insurance regulations, constitutes a complete regulatory scheme for funding and payment of employment insurance benefits. Parliament's jurisdiction to enact this version of the legislation has not been challenged. The purpose of the legislation is to provide an income support safety net for those claimants who meet the qualifying criteria. In its present form, funding is provided solely through employer and employee contributions. In recent years, claimants have numbered in excess of a million annually. For example, in 2000/01, there were about 1.8 million new claims for EI benefits: The Canada Employment Insurance Commission, Employment Insurance 2001 Monitoring and Assessment Report (Ottawa: Human Resources Development Canada, 2002).

[26] This comprehensive social welfare statute expressly confers on the Commission certain statutorily prescribed rights and obligations. Under s.38(1), the Commission is given the authority to impose penalties on claimants for 8 different categories of acts or omissions:

> 38 (1) The Commission may impose on a claimant, or any other person acting for a claimant, a penalty for each of the following acts or omissions if the Commission becomes aware of facts that in its opinion establish that the claimant or other person has
> (a) in relation to a claim for benefits, made a representation that the claimant or other person knew was false or misleading;
> (b) being required under this Act or the regulations to provide information, provided information or made a representation that the claimant or other person knew was false or misleading;
> (c) knowingly failed to declare to the Commission all or some of the claimant's earnings for a period determined under the regulations for which the claimant claimed benefits;
> (d) made a claim or declaration that the claimant or other person knew was false or misleading because of the non-disclosure of facts;
> (e) being the payee of a special warrant, knowingly negotiated or attempted to negotiate it for benefits to which the claimant was not entitled;
> (f) knowingly failed to return a special warrant or the amount of the warrant or any excess amount, as required by section 44;
> (g) imported or exported a document issued by the Commission, or had it imported or exported, for the purpose of defrauding or deceiving the Commission; or
> (h) participated in, assented to or acquiesced in an act or omission mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (g).

[27] It is clear that the common denominator in more than one subsection of s.38 is that the claimant must have made a representation, claim or declaration which the claimant knew was "false or misleading". While other subsections of s.38 do not use the words "false or misleading", the proscribed conduct outlined in them could nevertheless arguably bring the resulting debt within the scope of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act.

[28] Whatever the scope of s.38, where a claimant debtor has received monies to which the claimant "was not entitled", he or she is liable to repay to the Commission an amount equal to any benefits so received: s.43. This necessarily includes a debt which is the subject of a penalty order under s.38. In turn, s.47 expressly provides that all amounts payable by the claimant under s.43 (and other sections) are "debts due to Her Majesty and are recoverable in the Federal Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act."

[29] There are a number of methods under the EI Act for collecting overpayment debts owing by a claimant, whether the subject of a s.38 decision or otherwise:

1. action in a court of competent jurisdiction (s.47(1));
2. certifying that an amount has not been paid and filing that certificate in the Federal Court of Canada (s.126(2));
3. deduction from any benefits otherwise payable to the debtor claimant (s.47(2)); and
4. garnishment (s.126(4)).

[30] What is significant about this broad range of remedies is that Parliament has seen fit to confer on the Commission rights not extended to other creditors. For example, garnishment proceedings may be initiated without the necessity of first obtaining a court judgment for the amount of the overpayment: Prevost v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission) (1980) 36 C.B.R. (N.S.) 103 (F.C.T.D.). Further, the EI Act provides two alternative remedies where a person is alleged to have made false and misleading representations. First, s.38 permits the Commission to impose a penalty on so finding; and second, s.135 provides that a person who engages in any conduct proscribed under that section is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable to a fine not to exceed $5,000, and imprisonment not to exceed 6 months.

[31] Most significant, when an amount is owing to the Commission, including a debt arising out of a fraudulent EI claim, the Commission has the right to file a certificate in the Federal Court certifying the amount of the outstanding debt. Pursuant to s.126(2) of the EI Act, once registered, the certificate "has the same force and effect, and all proceedings may be taken, as if the certificate were a judgment obtained in the Court for a debt of the amount specified in the certificate".

[32] All this being so, there is no merit to the Trustee's assertion that the Commission is wrongly seeking rights not extended to other creditors. The short answer is that Parliament has chosen to grant certain rights to the Commission under the EI Act and the constitutional validity of these provisions has not been challenged. That Parliament has devised a system for recovering overpayments, including fraudulent EI claims, which sidesteps the courts in the first instance is hardly surprising. The Commission handles a substantial volume of cases annually and overpayments will not generally be huge amounts in themselves. The provisions in the EI Act for collecting overpayments are consistent with the need to provide a reasonable and cost effective method of administering a system resting largely on self-reporting and voluntary compliance. Since the program is now fully self-funding by employers and employees, all administrative costs incurred in collecting overpayments would be passed along to the beneficiaries of the program: see Prevost, supra.

[33] Nor is it fair to suggest that the debtor's interests under this statutory regime are not protected. Any decision by the Commission under s.38 may be appealed by the claimant debtor through two appeal levels and then, if the grounds exist, through judicial review in the Federal Court of Canada. The first right of appeal is to a Board of Referees (s.114) and then to an Umpire (s.115). Umpires are appointed from among judges of the Federal Court of Canada and other federally-appointed or provincially-appointed judges or retired judges. The EI Act provides for an appeal as of right to an Umpire on certain statutorily prescribed grounds. In addition, the Umpire's decision is subject to judicial review in the Federal Court of Canada (s.118).

[34] Most important, for a penalty to be imposed under s.38, it must be proven that the claimant intended to make – and did make – a "false or misleading statement" at the time the statement was made, in other words, that the statement was made "knowingly": Courty v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission) reflex, (1987) 16 F.T.R. 36 (T.D.). It will also suffice if the statement was made recklessly without concern for the truth or falsity of the statement: Canada (A.G.) v. Gates 1995 CanLII 3601 (FCA), [1995] 3 F.C. 17 (C.A.). Unless this condition precedent is met, no penalty can be imposed under s.38.

[35] Nor does the statutory scheme reverse the burden of proof. Although the Trustee argued that the EI Act requires the claimant to disprove the claims against him or her, this is simply not so. The burden of proof rests on the Commission throughout. It is an error of law to impose on the claimant the burden of disproving that a statement was made knowingly: Canada (A.G.) v. Antonio (1998) 5 C.C.L.I. (3d) 105 (F.C.A.); McDonald v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission) reflex, (1991) 50 Admin. L.R. 258 (F.C.A.). That said, the evidentiary onus may well shift to the claimant in the course of the proceedings if an appropriate factual foundation has been laid by the Commission: Antonio, supra.

[36] In addition, s.41 of the EI Act provides a further safety net for the claimant debtor akin to a fresh evidence application in the courts. This section provides that the Commission may rescind a penalty or reduce it on the presentation of new facts or on being satisfied that the penalty was imposed without knowledge of, or on the basis of a mistake as to, some material fact.

[37] Thus, there is no merit to the submission that a Commission decision is nothing more than an internal administrative review which lacks the force of law. Although Commission decisions are made within the scope of the statutory scheme mandated by Parliament, and do not require subsequent court affirmation, this does not mean that they are bereft of any legitimacy in law. To the contrary. The EI Act speaks for itself on this point. Despite the gravity with which courts approach allegations of civil fraud, a Commission decision based on a finding of fraudulent conduct, if not appealed and reversed, can be enforced as if it were a judgment of the Federal Court of Canada on registration of the required certificate under s.126(2). In this regard, Commission decisions are comparable to those made by other administrative tribunals whose decisions may be enforced as judgments of a superior trial court, such as a labour relations board: see for example Canada Labour Code R.S.C. 1985, c.L-2, ss.23(3) and 23.1.

[38] Further, given the provisions of the EI Act, if a Commission decision is not successfully appealed in the manner prescribed by statute, it follows that the Commission findings under s.38 are res judicata as between the debtor and the Commission. There is no rational legal or policy basis for requiring that these issues be litigated afresh as between the claimant debtor and the Commission either in the course of the bankruptcy proceedings or thereafter. Had the subject Commission decision been registered in the Federal Court of Canada, there could be no argument that this decision did not bind the parties. Does the absence of registration undercut the binding effect of the decision for purposes of the Bankruptcy Act? In my view, it does not.

[39] Parliament intended that a Commission decision under s.38 have binding effect in law, subject of course to appeal rights. The fact that any such decision (not appealed or not reversed on appeal) can be enforced as if it were a judgment of the Federal Court confirms that intention. The law is clear that in a bankruptcy, a debtor is not relieved of any finding already made by a court of competent jurisdiction that the debtor has obtained property from a creditor by false pretences or by fraudulent misrepresentation. The judgment is conclusive on this point: Re Smith reflex, (1985) 43 Sask. R. 27 (Q.B.), aff'd reflex, (1986) 45 Sask. R. 240 (C.A.); and see also Berthold v. McLellan reflex, (1994) 19 Alta. L.R. (3d) 28 (C.A.). The same result follows where an admission of fraud can be inferred from a consent judgment: Demitor (Re) (1993) 137 A.R. 381 (Q.B.). A Commission decision not appealed by a claimant debtor is therefore analogous to a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction and should be treated as such.

[40] Here, Bourassa did not appeal the Commission decision under s.38. Accordingly, that decision is binding in accordance with its terms.

[41] But whether a Commission decision is binding is not the only issue to be resolved. Its binding effect is one thing; its scope another issue altogether. This takes me therefore to the other key issue, the scope of the Commission's decision. In particular, does the Commission's imposition of a penalty under s.38 necessarily mean that the underlying debt is a "fraudulent" one within the meaning of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act? In other words, is a debt in respect of which a penalty has been levied by the Commission under s.38 of the EI Act necessarily a "debt or liability for obtaining property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation"?

[42] To resolve this issue, one would be required to compare the foundational elements of a "fraudulent" debt within the meaning of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act with the foundational elements required for the imposition of a penalty under s.38. The purpose of this analysis would be to determine whether a finding under s.38 of the EI Act that a penalty is warranted because of a "false and misleading" EI claim is tantamount to a finding that the underlying debt is a "fraudulent" one within the meaning of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act.

[43] If the foundational elements were found to be congruent, then it may well be that fraudulent debts under the EI Act are subsumed in fraudulent debts under s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act. In that event, then the Commission decision under s.38 would arguably be conclusive on this point and the subject debt exempt from discharge under s.178(1)(e).

[44] If not, then arguably Canada would be in no different position than any other creditor. Whether an EI debt in these circumstances would be exempt from discharge under s.178(1)(e) could potentially be dealt with in a number of ways.

[45] It may be that the findings made by the Commission regarding an EI debt for which a penalty had been levied under s.38 would permit the matter to be determined on the application for discharge rather than post-discharge: Re Herdman (1992) 128 A.R. 127 (Q.B.); Re McKee (1997) 203 A.R. 283 (Q.B.); Re Mariyanayagam reflex, (1998) 10 C.B.R. (4th) 105 (Ont. Gen. Div.). The court could also consider the evidence in support of the Commission decision if the findings did not expressly or by implication address the nature and extent of the fraudulent conduct: Morgan v. Demers 1986 ABCA 100 (CanLII), (1986) 71 A.R. 244 (C.A.). If necessary, the court might also see fit to direct the trial of an issue to determine whether the debt fell within s.178(1)(e): Kushnir v. Voshall 1989 CanLII 3337 (AB QB), (1989) 102 A.R. 146 (Q.B.).

[46] Alternatively, the Commission could initiate action to recover the debt post-discharge in the ordinary civil courts, whether by seeking a declaration that the subject debt falls within the s.178(1)(e) exemption or otherwise: Beneficial Finance v. Durward (1961) 2 C.B.R. (N.S.) 173 (Ont. Bktcy.); Graves v. Hughes 2001 NSSC 68 (CanLII), (2001) 25 C.B.R. (4th) 255 (N.S.S.C.). That the earlier decision was not based on fraudulent misrepresentation or false pretences may not necessarily be a bar to a Commission claim that a debt survives bankruptcy: Re Phillips 1994 CanLII 9102 (AB QB), (1994) 156 A.R. 123 (Q.B.). In this regard, it may well be that evidence of wrongdoing only emerges after the initial Commission decision, or, for that matter, after the bankrupt's discharge. Of course, should fraud be established or affirmed, a discharge of a bankrupt debtor does not provide a defence to the claim: Wilson v. Wilson 2001 CanLII 28111 (ON SC), (2001) 21 C.B.R. (4th) 304, additional reasons at (February 28, 2001) Doc. C31610/95 (Ont. S.C.J.).

[47] Regardless of which procedure were to be followed though, the onus would be on Canada to establish that the EI debt fell within the s.178(1)(e) exemption: Peterson v. Peterson [1996] 3 W.W.R. 426 (Alta. C.A.); Jerrard v. Peacock (1985) 61 A.R. 161 (Q.B.). This would be so unless Parliament elected to statutorily provide that all debts owing for fraudulent EI claims as determined by the Commission under s.38 of the EI Act were automatically exempt from any discharge order.

[48] However, since the parties did not address before either the Registrar or the chambers judge whether a s.38 decision by the Commission necessarily means that the underlying debt was for obtaining property, namely UI benefits, by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation within the meaning of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy Act, I decline to resolve this issue and what necessarily flows from it at this stage of the proceedings. Resolution of these matters must await another day.

[49] In these circumstances, I have concluded that the order staying the proceedings by Canada pending a further court application should stand. I would however strike that portion of the order indicating that the EI debt is discharged. It is an error of law to make such an order where, as here, there is no evidence as to what that debt entails. I would therefore dismiss the appeal but vary the order to the extent noted.

R. A. BLAIR J (ad hoc):

I - OVERVIEW AND FACTS

Overview

[1] On December 27, 1991, Michael and Sandy Simone orally agreed to purchase a home located at 55 Bayside Court in the Town of Vaughan from the Defendants, Sean Daley and Sandra Montanari. They moved in immediately, and have continued to live in the premises to the present time -- although not in their capacity as purchasers. The transaction was to have closed in January 1993, but it aborted. It failed to close largely because of the financial travails of the appellant, Sean Daley, which ultimately led to his voluntary assignment in bankruptcy in October 1993. Mortgagees sold under power of sale. Relatives of the Respondent purchasers acquired the premises from the mortgagee and the Simones still reside in the premises, but as tenants. In the meantime, they have lost more than $130,000 in payments they made to the appellant vendors on account of the purchase price, and on behalf of the appellants to the first mortgagee, and in improvements which they made to the property in contemplation of becoming its owners.

[2] The trial judge concluded that the transaction had failed to close because of Sean Daley's failure to arrange for the financing on closing, which he held Mr. Daley had agreed to do as part of the transaction. As a result of the breach the Simone's lost the amounts above referred to; however, the trial judge deducted from those amounts the sum of $11,000 for taxes which he held were the responsibility of the Simone's under the oral agreement, and a further sum of $64,800 for occupation rent. He therefore awarded the Simones damages in the amount of $53,320 plus pre-judgment interest from January 1, 1995. The trial judge also concluded that Mr. Daley had been acting in a fiduciary capacity and that his breach constituted a misappropriation or defalcation as contemplated in paragraph 178(1)(d) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended (the "BIA"), and accordingly he granted a declaration that Mr. Daley's discharge from bankruptcy does not extinguish the debt as against him.

[3] The central issue on this appeal relates to that declaration and to the trial judge's conclusion that Mr. Daley had committed a misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. An additional element on the appeal relates to damages (the appellants argue further deductions should have been made), and the Respondents cross-appeal as to damages as well (submitting that fewer deductions should have been made).

Facts

[4] At the time of the agreement, Mr. Daley was a young lawyer recently called to the Bar, and Ms. Montanari was his secretary. They had been engaged to be married, but at the time had had a falling out1. In contemplation of their pending marriage they had purchased 55 Bayside Court, which was situated across the street from Ms. Montanari's parents. Because of the falling out, however, Mr. Daley no longer wished to live across the street from Ms. Montanari and her parents. Moreover, with a large mortgage against them and taxes, calling for monthly payments in the area of $5,000, the premises were difficult to carry. Accordingly, Mr. Daley was looking for a solution to this problem.

[5] He found what was thought to be the solution in his friend, Michael Simone. Mr. Simone is a real estate agent of 20 years experience. He and Mr. Daley had first become acquainted when Mr. Daley had successfully represented Mr. Simone in some court proceedings. A friendship developed. They began to socialize together. Mr. Daley became aware that Michael and Sandy Simone were looking for a place to live. Mr. Simone discovered that Mr. Daley was an interested seller. In late December, 1991 B with some involvement of Sandy Simone B they negotiated the agreement.

[6] The agreement, however, was never reduced to writing. The parties disagreed as to some of its terms. They were substantially in agreement that:

(a) the purchase price was to be

Digitized by Google

$380,000.00;
(b) the Simones were to take possession immediately, and were to assume the costs of utilities;
(c) the Simones were to make monthly payments on account of the purchase price at a minimum of $1,000.00 to a maximum of $2,000.00 per month for about one year; and,
(d) title was to transfer from the defendants to the Simones in or about January 1993 when the balance of the purchase price was to be paid.

[7] There were three issues upon which the parties could not agree, however, and the trial judge was required to resolve them. The issues, and his findings with respect to them, were as follows:

(1) Who was responsible for the payment of municipal taxes during the period of possession prior to closing? Jennings J. found that the taxes were to have been paid by Mr. and Mrs. Simone, the purchasers.
(2) Had the Simones agreed to make a payment of up to $60,000 to Mr. Daley, on account of the purchase price, by June 30, 1992? The trial judge found that there was to be no such "maximum" payment made by that date.
(3) Who was to arrange for the financing required to pay the balance of the purchase price due on closing? Significantly, for the purposes of this case, the trial judge found that it was Mr. Daley who agreed to find the financing to close, and that he failed to comply with that obligation.

[8] In making his findings, the trial judge assessed the evidence of Michael Simone and of Sean Daley and concluded that where the evidence of the two differed on critical matters he preferred and accepted the evidence of Mr. Simone. It was open to the trial judge to make the foregoing findings on the evidence, and I see no basis for interfering with them. The trial judge then went on to conclude that the appellants had breached their agreement of purchase and sale, that Sean Daley was in breach of fiduciary obligations owed to the plaintiffs, that his fiduciary breach constituted a misappropriation or defalcation as contemplated by paragraph 178(1)(d) of the BIA, and accordingly that the judgment against him survives his discharge from bankruptcy. I turn now to an analysis and consideration of those issues.

II - LAW AND ANALYSIS

Fiduciary Obligations

[9] From the start of his analysis, Jennings J. rejected "out of hand" the submission that Mr. Daley was acting as the Simone's solicitor in connection with the transaction. This finding is well-supported by the evidence. It meant, however, that the finding of a fiduciary relationship, if one were to be made, had to be based on something other than the existence of a solicitor-client relationship B a clear category of fiduciary. That circumstance has given rise to some difficulties in this case, in my view.

[10] The trial judge correctly relied upon the observations of appellate courts to the effect B as stated by Griffiths J.A. in Knoch Estate v. John Picken Ltd.reflex, (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 385, at p. 394 B that, > it is a question of fact in each case whether a fiduciary relationship exists and that it is the nature of the relationship, not the special category of the actors involved, which gives rise to the finding of a fiduciary.

[11] He then proceeded to examine the facts in light of the "three general characteristics" first attributed to fiduciaries by Wilson J., in dissent in Frame v. Frame, 1987 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99, and subsequently adopted by the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada (per Sopinka J.) in Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd., 1989 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574, at pp. 598-599, as a "rough and ready guide", namely that:

(a) the fiduciary has scope for the exercise of some discretion or power;
(b) the fiduciary can unilaterally exercise that power or discretion so as to affect the beneficiary's legal or practical interests; and,
(c) the beneficiary is peculiarly vulnerable to or at the mercy of the fiduciary holding the discretion or power.

[12] Applying the foregoing principles to the circumstances of this case, Jennings J. concluded that, once the agreement had been made, the appellant vendors were in "a special relationship" with the plaintiffs by reasons of their obligation, as vendors, to act as trustees of the title to the property for the purchasers pending closing. I quote in full his reasoning with respect to the fiduciary finding, which is contained in the following passage from his Reasons:

> In the case before me, once the agreement was made, I find the defendants were in a special relationship with the plaintiffs. Although they were the legal owners of the property, the plaintiffs were the beneficial owners, subject to complying with the terms of the agreement. To that extent, the defendants acted as trustees of the title to the property. They were obliged to take no steps to deal with that title in a manner harmful to the plaintiffs' beneficial interest. As legal owners, they clearly had the scope to exercise power, and to exercise it unilaterally, to affect the beneficiaries' interest. As legal owners, they knew they were trusted, as friends of the plaintiffs, and because of that trust the plaintiffs were vulnerable to or at the mercy of any dealing they chose to take with the title.
> They were obliged to keep the mortgages

> in good standing so that they could be discharged, and they did not. They were obliged to keep the title clear of executions so that a clear title could be transferred, and they did not. Most importantly, they were obliged not to further encumber the title, and by placing a third mortgage for $60,000 on title six months into the deal, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, they breached what I find to be their fiduciary duty to the plaintiffs.

[13] I have serious reservations about the finding of a fiduciary relationship between the plaintiffs and the defendants in the circumstances here. Nonetheless, the existence of such a relationship is a question of fact for determination in each case, and I would not interfere with the trial judge's ultimate disposition in this regard. Some further comments with respect to the fiduciary aspect of this case are nevertheless in order however, in my opinion.

[14] The relationship between the parties was that of vendor and purchaser, and in my opinion the existence of such a relationship does not, in itself, give rise to fiduciary duties. Nor does the fact that the vendors and purchasers happened to be friends, elevate the relationship to a fiduciary level. The normal contractual relationship between a vendor and purchaser is not characterized by the reposing of a trust or confidence by one person in another and a consequent dependence resulting therefrom, which the authorities indicate give rise to a fiduciary duty. It is true that the vendor acts as trustee of the title for the purchaser pending completion of the transaction. However, to the extent that there may be an obligation of the vendor "to take no steps to deal with [the] title in a manner harmful to the [purchaser's] beneficial interest", as the trial judge concluded, it is only in the sense of an obligation to be in a position to deliver title on closing, in my view. Breach of the obligation to convey the title, on tender of the purchase price at closing, is remedied by damages or, in appropriate circumstances B because of the equitable requirement to hold title B by the equitable remedy of specific performance. There is no need to resort to the fiduciary concept.

[15] Thus, I would be reluctant to attribute to vendors and purchasers, generally, the obligations pending the completion of a sale which the trial judge attributes to them in order to seal the existence of a fiduciary obligation. It goes too far, in my respectful view, to suggest categorically that a vendor is obligated "to keep the mortgages in good standing so that they could be discharged", or "to keep the title clear of executions so that a clear title could be transferred", or even "not to further encumber the title". The obligation of a vendor is to convey clear title on closing. Not infrequently people find themselves in a position where it is necessary to re-organize and restructure their financial and proprietary affairs in order to place them on a sounder footing and avoid insolvency. They are not always successful in this endeavour. There will be many circumstances where mortgages continue to be in default with arrears continuing to accumulate, or where the property becomes subject to other executions because of a vendor's outstanding financial difficulties in other areas, pending the closing of a transaction. Such developments in themselves do not constitute the sort of unilateral exercise of power in respect of a "vulnerable" beneficiary which gives rise to a fiduciary duty or a breach of that duty. Even the placing of a further mortgage against the property is not necessarily prohibited, provided the vendor can convey title free of it on closing B particularly where, as here, the additional mortgage was placed on title in order to raise funds to reduce the outstanding obligations pursuant to the first mortgage.

[16] Purchasers are well able to protect themselves with respect to title by registering the agreement: see the Land Titles Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L-5, section 71. I observe in passing that Mr. Simone, the purchaser in this case, was hardly a neophyte when it came to matters of real estate. He is a real estate agent with more than 30 years of experience. It is apparent that the trial judge was not impressed with Mr. Daley as a witness. Nor was he impressed with his financial and investment lifestyle, for a young professional of such limited experience. A fiduciary obligation must be grounded in the nature of the relationship which exists between the parties, however, and not on the result in law or equity which it is sought to reach. The courts have cautioned against the latter approach and the resort to what have been referred to as "false indicators of a fiduciary relationship", one of which may be the presence of conduct which attracts judicial sanction: see, Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] S.C.R. 277, per Sopinka J. and McLachlin J., at p. 463.

[17] Subject to the caveat of the foregoing reservations, however, I think there was evidence which might have supported a fiduciary finding in this case. That evidence relates to the undertaking on the part of Mr. Daley to arrange the financing, which he was unable to do. A fiduciary finding based upon the power/discretion/vulnerability analysis might have been sustained on that footing. In the end, I would not interfere with the conclusion of Jennings J. that in the peculiar circumstances of this case Mr. Daley owed a fiduciary duty to the plaintiffs.

Debt Surviving Bankruptcy

[18] Having concluded that Mr. Daley owed a fiduciary duty to the plaintiffs, the trial judge went on to find that he had committed a misappropriation or defalcation in that capacity, as contemplated by paragraph 178(1)(d) of the BIA. He accordingly granted the plaintiffs a declaration that the debt of Mr. Daley arising from the judgment was not extinguished by his discharge from bankruptcy.

[19] Respectfully, I am of the opinion that he erred in this regard.

[20] Section 178 of the BIA, in its entirety, reads as follows:

> 178(1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from > (a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine,

Digitized by Google

> penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail;
> (b) any debt or liability for alimony;
> (c) any debt or liability under a support, maintenance or affiliation order or under an agreement for maintenance and support of a spouse or child living apart from the bankrupt;
> (d) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity;
> (e) any debt or liability for obtaining property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation; or
> (f) liability for the dividend that a creditor would have been entitled to receive on any provable claim not disclosed to the trustee, unless the creditor had notice or knowledge of the bankruptcy and failed to take reasonable action to prove his claim.
> (2) Subject to subsection (1), an order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy.

[21] The trial judge addressed both paragraphs (d) and (e). He found that there was no evidence of false pretences, that Mr. Daley had not made any fraudulent misrepresentations, and that he had committed no fraud. This left him with the concepts of "misappropriation" and "defalcation", as contemplated by paragraph 178(d), and he concluded that Mr. Daley had fallen afoul of those provisions. Specifically, he held that Mr. Daley had committed a misappropriation and defalcation in a fiduciary capacity,

> (a) by failing to keep the mortgages in good standing so that they could be discharged;
> (b) by failing to keep title clear of executions so that a clear title could be transferred; and,
> (c) by further encumbering the title by placing a third mortgage on the property, without the knowledge of the purchasers.

[22] I have already indicated that, in my view, the foregoing conduct neither creates a fiduciary duty in relation to a real estate transaction, nor constitutes a breach of such a duty. Even accepting the existence of a fiduciary duty on the part of Mr. Daley, based on the evidence as a whole, I am satisfied, in the same way, that they do not amount to a "misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity", as contemplated in paragraph 178(1)(d) of the BIA. In the circumstances of this case, they do not entail the misapplication of, or failure to account properly for, property or funds entrusted to a fiduciary which is the characteristic of conduct amounting to misappropriation or defalcation.

[23] It is worth observing at this point that not only did the trial judge negative fraudulent misrepresentation and fraud on the part of Mr. Daley, and make no finding of bad faith; importantly, he did not make a finding that the parties had agreed the funds paid by the Simones were to be used solely for purposes of reducing the defendant's obligations vis € vis the subject property. It was Mr. Daley's position that he was permitted to use the funds to make payments towards other obligations. While Mr. Simone testified at one point that he was under the assumption the monies were going to be used to pay the mortgages on 55 Bayside Court, he ultimately conceded in cross-examination that he didn't care where the money went or what Mr. Daley did with it, as long as it went towards reducing the purchase price.

[24] The problems with accumulating arrears on the mortgages to which the property was subject, and the registration of executions against the lands, had their origins in Mr. Daley's inability to cope with his overall financial difficulties arising from the six or seven bad real estate investments in which he found himself entangled. He did not have sufficient revenues from all sources B including the monies coming from the Simone's B to defray the costs of carrying those investments. His financial world was tumbling down over his head. Even the criticized third mortgage in question, as I have previously noted, was placed on title in order to raise funds to reduce the outstanding obligations under the first mortgage, and thus did not have any overall negative affect on the net encumbrances outstanding against the property.

[25] Not infrequently, bankrupts are at least to some extent the authors of their own misfortune. This does not disqualify them from ultimately obtaining their discharge; nor should it necessarily turn them into fiduciaries of those with whom they have dealt. Suppose that people make reasonable, but ultimately unwise, attempts to stave off bankruptcy by agreeing to sell certain of their assets in order to reduce liabilities and free up funds to carry other remaining assets. Are those people to be precluded from obtaining a discharge, after bankruptcy, from liabilities relating to the failed attempts, because arrears have continued to accumulate against the properties which are subject to the sale pending closing, and third party executions are registered during the same period as a result of other judgments incurred? In my opinion, a significant purpose of bankruptcy legislation might well be jeopardized, if such were to be the case.

[26] I turn now to a consideration of that purpose and of the scheme of section 178 of the BIA, and to an examination of the concepts of "misappropriation" and "defalcation" as found in that section.

[27] An important purpose of bankruptcy legislation is to encourage the rehabilitation of an honest but unfortunate debtor, and to permit his or her re-integration into society B subject to reasonable conditions B by obtaining a discharge from the continued burden of crushing financial obligations which cannot be met: see, Re Newsome (1927), 8 C.B.R. 279 (Ont. (1955), 35 C.B.R. 135 (S.C.C.); Cleve's Sporting Goods Ltd. v. J.G. Touchie & Associates Ltd. (1986), 58 C.B.R. (N.S.) 304 (N.S.C.A.); Ironwood Investments Joint Venture v. Leggett (Trustee of) 1996 CanLII 8252 (ON SC), (1995), 38 C.B.R. (3d) 256 (Ont. Gen. Div.), at p. 264; and Jerrard v. Peacock (1985), 57 C.B.R. (N.S.) 54 (Alta. Q.B., Master).

[28] Debts which survive a bankruptcy as a result of the provisions of subsection 178(1), therefore, are exceptions to this overriding principle, and should be addressed accordingly.

[29] An analysis of the provisions of subsection 178(1) shows that the types of debt which survive a bankruptcy may be divided into four overall categories, namely,

(1) those which have been imposed by a court in the form of a fine or some other penalty for an offence against the state (paragraph (a));

(2) those which reflect the legislative policy decision to protect spouses and children requiring support (paragraphs (b) and (c));

(3) those arising out of acts of fraud, dishonesty, or misconduct while acting in a fiduciary capacity (paragraphs (d) and (e)); and finally,

(4) those which, if discharged, would undermine the integrity of the bankruptcy process itself (paragraph (f)).

[30] In Jerrard v. Peacock, supra, Master Funduk B an experienced official in matters of this nature B subjected section 178 to the following analysis, which in my opinion is an accurate one. At pp. 62-63 he said:

> Considering the new start object ingrained in the Act, the logical interpretation of the two subsections in question is that subs. (2) creates the general principle (being a release of all debts) with subs. (1) being an exception to the general principle. Subsection (2) [sic]2 establishes exceptions, not the principle, and must be viewed in that light.
> It is as if the section literally reads that the order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy "except the following" and then lists the seven (now six) categories in subs. (1).
> . . .
>
> All of the exceptions in the section are based on what might be classed as an overriding social policy. In other words, they are the kinds of claims which society (through the legislators) considers to be of a quality which outweighs any possible benefit to society in the bankrupt being released of these obligations.
> Paragraph (a) is essentially an administration of justice concept. The liabilities caught by it will be in relation to criminal or quasi-criminal matters.

> Paragraphs (b) and (c), regardless of the language used, are nothing other than society's vested interest in ensuring that a person "supports" a dependent spouse and children. Obligations incurred for that cannot be shucked by the bankruptcy.
> Paragraphs (d) and (e) are morality concepts which look at conduct. Those kinds of conduct are unacceptable to society and a bankrupt will not be rewarded for such conduct by a release of liability.

[31] Others have taken a different approach to paragraphs (d) and (e), however. In Smith v. Henderson 1992 CanLII 680 (BC CA), (1992), 10 C.B.R. (3d) 153, the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that a "defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity", as envisaged by paragraph 178(1)(d), did not necessarily involve dishonesty and that, in the case of a fiduciary, a simple failure to meet an obligation was sufficient. Herold D.C.J. (as he then was) adopted a similar view with regard to a "misappropriation" in Abstainer's Insurance Company v. Pellegrino (1989), 77 C.B.R. (N.S.) 108 (Ont. D.C.).

[32] Smith v. Henderson involved a judgment against Mr. Smith, the principal of a small trucking operation, Normax Transport Inc. Mr. Smith was an officer and director, and the operating mind of the company. Normax had contracted with another trucker, Mr. Henderson, to permit him to work off the purchase of a truck and trailer through the payment of $1500 per month over 48 months. Normax was itself purchasing the truck under a conditional sales contract. After 34 2 months and the payment of $43,128 by Mr. Henderson, however, the truck was repossessed by the conditional vendor because the company had not kept up payments or paid off liens which had accumulated against the vehicles for non-payment for repairs. At trial, Smith was found to be personally liable on the ground that, as the sole directing mind of the corporation, he had caused Normax to be in breach of trust by allowing the liens to accumulate and not making the payments, and accordingly he was equally liable for breach of trust. Smith ultimately went bankrupt. He was granted a discharge from bankruptcy, but the judge granting the discharge held that it did not release him from the liability under the judgment because it was caught by paragraph 178(1)(d) of the Bankruptcy Act. That decision was upheld on appeal.

[33] In Abstainer's Insurance Company v. Pellegrino (1989), 77 C.B.R. (N.S.) 108 (Ont. D.C.), the defendant, Pellegrino, had obtained judgment against Abstainer's for the recovery of accident benefits and for damages for mental distress, in an earlier action. The insurer had appealed, but had agreed to pay certain monies to the defendant in order to reduce the risk of post-judgment interest. The payment pending appeal, however, was subject to a negotiated condition that the defendant would repay the monies if the insurer were successful on an appeal. Abstainer's succeeded on the appeal. Nonetheless, the defendant refused to repay the monies. He had gone bankrupt in the interim and argued, amongst other things, that the debt had been extinguished by his bankruptcy. In response to this argument, Abstainer's relied upon paragraph 178(1)(d) of the Bankruptcy

Act. Herold D.C.J. agreed with the insurer, concluding that the defendant's failure to repay the monies constituted a "misappropriation" of funds by a fiduciary in the circumstances. He held that the defendant had accepted the monies on the premise that he would have an obligation to account for them in the event the insurer was successful on the appeal, that he was acting on behalf of the insurer to the extent of an accounting, and that he had misused the position of trust which was created by his implied undertaking. At p. 111, Herold D.C.J. noted:

> The word "misappropriate" in the Bankruptcy Act is not, as I read the cases, used in any pejorative or accusatory sense; rather, it may simply be the failure of a person to account when he is called upon to do so, particularly where, as here, he is in possession of the necessary funds to do so and chooses for reasons which he believes are valid not to do so.

[34] Jennings J. followed Smith v. Henderson and Abstainer's Insurance.

[35] Mr. Justice Day, on the other hand, declined to follow the reasoning of Abstainer's Insurance in Ironwood Investments Joint Venture v. Leggett, supra. He does not appear to have been referred to Smith v. Henderson. Before Day J., the issue revolved around a disputed management fee which the promoter and manager of a joint venture, Mr. Leggett, had caused the joint venture to pay to him. The project failed and Mr. Leggett subsequently went bankrupt and was later discharged. The unit holders sought to recover the monies against him nonetheless, on the grounds that he had obtained the monies through fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. Day J. immediately ruled out fraud or embezzlement on the part of Mr. Leggett. He was then faced with deciding whether or not the monies had been obtained as a result of misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. Day J. concluded that the defendant had not deliberately misappropriated the funds, believing that he was entitled to them and that the fee had been disclosed to the unit holders, notwithstanding that under the strict terms of the agreement he had not properly formalized authorization for the payment. With regard to the interpretation of paragraph 178(1)(d) of the BIA, Day J stated (p. 264):

> In any event, the subsection read as a whole includes fraud and embezzlement, both of which are quasi-criminal in nature, along with misappropriation and defalcation. In my opinion if a debt is to survive bankruptcy pursuant to s. 178(1)(d) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, there must have been some wrongful conduct on the part of the debtor sufficient to exclude the debtor from the relief granted by the Act. One of the prime purposes of the Bankruptcy Act is to permit an honest but unfortunate debtor to obtain a discharge from his debts subject to > reasonable conditions. The Act is designed to permit a bankrupt to eventually receive a complete discharge so that he can integrate himself into the business life of the country as a useful citizen, free from the crushing burden of his debts: Re Newsome (1927), 8 C.B.R. 279 (Ont. S.C.); Canadian Bankers' Association v. Saskatchewan (Attorney General) (1955), 35 C.B.R. 135 (S.C.C.). Given that a bankrupt may be saved from the consequence of his negligence and incompetence, as was the case in Urbanowski v. Demkiw reflex, (1992), 12 C.B.R. (3d) 129 (Man. C.A.), it is preposterous that a discharged bankrupt might remain accountable for monies paid to himself as compensation, when in all the circumstances he had very good reason to believe he was acting properly and with the knowledge of the affected parties, with neither their objection nor challenge. Accordingly, I adopt the approach taken in Janco (Huppe), supra,3 that misappropriation is the act of misappropriating or turning to a wrong purpose.[Emphasis added.]

[36] Thus, there appear to be two approaches which have been taken to the interpretation of the words "misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity". On the one hand, the approach reflected in Ironwood Investments Joint Venture v. Leggett and in Jerrard v. Peacock views the words in the context of those with which they are associated in the paragraph and attributes to them some element of dishonesty, wrongdoing, or misconduct. On the other hand, decisions such as that of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Smith v. Henderson suggest a broader interpretation which eschews the need for dishonesty, wrongdoing or misconduct, and is prepared to extend the exception to all cases in which a fiduciary is in breach of any fiduciary obligation.

[37] In my view, the former approach is the correct one, having regard to the purposes of bankruptcy legislation and to the language used in section 178, and keeping in mind as well that not all breaches of obligation by a fiduciary are breaches of a fiduciary obligation. They may simply be inadvertence, negligence or incompetence. In this latter regard, the remarks of Sopinka J. and McLachlin J. in Hodgkinson v. Simms, supra, concerning what they viewed as the second "false indicator" of a fiduciary obligation, are worth noting. At p. 463 they observed:

> The second consideration which may act as a false indicator of a fiduciary obligation is the "category" into which the relationship falls. Professional relationships like doctor-patient and lawyer-client often possess fiduciary aspects. But equally, many of the tasks undertaken pursuant to these relationships may not be > trust-like or attract a fiduciary obligation. (citation omitted)

> > Just as not every act in a so-called fiduciary relationship is encumbered with a fiduciary obligation, so conversely fiduciary obligations may arise in relationships which have not been traditionally considered as fiduciary. [Emphasis added.]

[38] I agree with the observation of Day J., cited above, that if bankrupts are normally saved from the consequences of their negligence or incompetence by a discharge, it makes no sense that they should remain accountable for similar conduct simply because the conduct is carried out by someone who may now be classified as falling within a certain category of relationship, namely that of fiduciary. The courts have resisted a rigid approach to the determination of what constitutes a fiduciary relationship, as previously noted, emphasizing that it is "the nature of the relationship and not the category of actors involved" which is important for purposes of that exercise. In this same spirit, it seems to me, the courts should avoid attempting to sweep into concepts such as "misappropriation" or "defalcation" B which in their ordinary meanings connote some element of wrong doing, improper conduct, or improper accounting B any and all failures by the fiduciary to comply with the obligations attending upon that capacity. When it comes to the application of insolvency legislation, the results of not resisting that temptation can be far reaching and inconsistent with the purposes of such legislation.

[39] The Shorter Oxford Dictionary defines the words "misappropriate", "defalcate", and "defalcation" as follows:

> Misappropriate
> To appropriate to wrong uses; chiefly, to apply dishonestly to one's own use. So, misappropriation.
> Defalcate
> To cut or lop off (a portion from the whole); to retrench, deduct; to curtail, reduce; to commit defalcations; to misappropriate property in one's charge.
> Defalcation
> To reduce by deductions; to lop off; to abate; defection; shortcoming; failure; a fraudulent deficiency in money matters; also, the amount misappropriated.

[40] Black's Law Dictionary, 6th ed., defines "misappropriation" as "the unauthorized, improper, or unlawful use of funds or other property for purpose other than that for which intended".

[41] In Smith v. Henderson, Legg J.A. cited the definition of "defalcation" from Black's Law Dictionary 5th ed., in the following fashion (supra, p. 158):

> Defalcation: The act of a defaulter . . . failure to meet an obligation . . .

[42] Respectfully, this citation omits important aspects of the full definition, and takes the phrase "failure to meet an obligation" out of context. The full definition in the 5th edition of Black's Law Dictionary reads as follows:

Digitized by Google

> Defalcation
> The act of a defaulter; act of embezzling; failure to meet an obligation; misappropriation of trust funds or money held in any fiduciary capacity; failure to properly account for such funds. Commonly spoken of officers of corporations or public officials.4

[43] Looked at in its entirety, then, the Black's definition demonstrates that the reference to a failure to meet an obligation must be read in the context of the references to "embezzling", to "misappropriation of trust funds" and to a "failure to properly account". Moreover, an examination of the American authorities on which the inclusion by Black's of "failure to meet an obligation" within the concept of defalcation for purposes of bankruptcy legislation, confirms that they can be explained in these terms, notwithstanding that they may appear on the surface to stand for the proposition that an innocent default in duty on the part of a fiduciary will suffice to create a debt that survives bankruptcy.

[44] Re Anderson (1986), 64 B.R. 331, a decision of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court, Northern District of Illinois, Western Division, is an example. In that case the court ruled that a creditor need not show wrongdoing on the part of a fiduciary debtor for the purposes of establishing a nondischargeable debt under section 523(a)(4) of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code. "Defalcation", for such purposes, was held to encompass a debt resulting from fraud or defalcation by a debtor while acting in a fiduciary capacity, a failure to meet an obligation, misappropriation of trust funds or money held in any fiduciary capacity, and a failure to properly account for such funds. Mr. Anderson, the bankrupt debtor, had undertaken to act as the treasurer for a non-profit corporation which was established to set up a bicycle racing track for community children, and which earned revenues through entry fees and concessions. He failed to account for the revenues he had received. There was no evidence of wrongdoing. During a period of ill health and family difficulties, he had failed to deposit the proceeds from three races in a timely fashion. Instead he kept the monies in a paper back in his desk at home. The monies were stolen from his home, apparently by someone else. Mr. Anderson agreed to repay the funds, and signed a promissory note to that effect, but eventually went bankrupt. The court held his debt survived his discharge from bankruptcy, concluding that his failure to deposit the monies that had been entrusted to him by the corporation in a timely fashion amounted to a failure to account properly, and constituted a breach rising to the level of a defalcation.

[45] In Re Anderson the court relied upon a decision of Justice Learned Hand in Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co. v. Herbst, 93 F. 2d 510 (2nd Cir. 1937). It attributed to Learned Hand J. the proposition that, in the context of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, Adefalcation" did not contemplate fraud or dishonesty, but rather, because of the special trust given to a fiduciary, the word included innocent defaults in duty on the part of the fiduciary. An examination of Learned Hand J's decision shows, however, that the learned justice did not stop there.

[46] In Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co. v. Herbst a privately appointed receiver in a foreclosure action had withdrawn and spent for his own account monies which had been awarded to him on an interim passing of accounts when he knew that the time for appeal had not elapsed and without consulting with the plaintiff in the foreclosure action as to whether it intended to appeal. The plaintiff successfully appealed and obtained judgment against the receiver, who subsequently went bankrupt and obtained a stay of execution. The stay was vacated, and it was the appeal from the order vacating the stay which came before the Second Circuit. That Court held that when a fiduciary takes money upon a conditional authority which may be revoked and knows at the time that it may be, the fiduciary is guilty of a "defalcation" though it may not be a "fraud" or an "embezzlement" or perhaps not even a "misappropriation".

[47] The Court did not rule, however, that any innocent default on the part of a fiduciary gives rise to a debt which is not discharged by bankruptcy. It pointed out (p. 512) that the bankrupt "had not been entirely innocent . . . though possibly one may acquit him of deliberate wrongdoing." Learned Hand J. noted that in its origins a bankruptcy discharge "relieved bankrupts of all their debts without exception, provided they conducted themselves properly" (p. 511). His reference to "innocent defaults" was as follows (p. 511):

> . . . Colloquially perhaps the word, "defalcation," ordinarily implies some moral dereliction, but in this context it may have included innocent defaults, so as to include all fiduciaries who for any reason were short in their accounts. [Emphasis added.]

[48] Finally, and significantly, Learned Hand J. concluded (p. 512):

> . . . We do not hold that no possible deficiency in a fiduciary's accounts is dischargeable; in Re Bernard, 87 F. 2d 705, 707, we said that "the misappropriation must be due to a known breach of the duty, and not to mere negligence or mistake." Although that word probably carries a larger implication of misconduct than "defalcation," "defalcation" may demand some portion of misconduct; we will assume arguendo that it does. [Emphasis added.]

[49] See also: Re Gagliano, 44 B.R. 259 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1984), where an insurance agent who had failed to remit collected premiums to the insurance company had committed a defalcation; and Re Alvey, 56 B.R. 170 (Bankr. W.D. Kentucky, 1985), which involved the unauthorized use of cash collateral received by a debtor in possession under Chapter 11 proceedings without reporting to the court as required.

[50] Thus, it would appear that the American authorities which have held that a failure by a fiduciary to meet an obligation gives rise to a debt which is not discharged from bankruptcy, and which have given rise to the reference to such an event in the definition of "defalcation" in Black's Law Dictionary, are all cases where there has been "some portion of misconduct" in the sense, at least, of a failure by the fiduciary to account properly for funds entrusted to the fiduciaries possession and care.

[51] There is a qualitative difference in the nature of the breaches involved in the American authorities referred to above, and in the Canadian authorities which have extended the meaning of "defalcation" or "misappropriation" to innocent breaches, on the one hand, and the type of breach committed by Mr. Daley in the circumstances of this case, on the other hand. Those cases in which it has been held that an innocent default in duty or a failure to meet an obligation on the part of a fiduciary create a debt which survives a bankruptcy all involve at least a failure to account in a proper fashion for monies or entrusted to the fiduciary. That is not the case with Mr. Daley, whose breach was not a failure to account for monies paid to him by the Simones, but rather a failure to close the real estate transaction in his capacity as vendor.

[52] Consequently, I am not persuaded that the exception to a release of liability upon a bankruptcy discharge which is provided for in paragraph 178(1)(d) of the BIA should be extended to conduct which does not display at least some element of wrongdoing or improper conduct on the part of the fiduciary in question in the sense of a failure to account properly for monies or property entrusted to the fiduciary in that capacity or inappropriate dealing with such trust property. Had Parliament intended that any innocent breach of an obligation on the part of fiduciary would give rise to a debt that would not be released by a discharge from bankruptcy it could very easily have said so, by providing that an order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from any debt or liability arising from a breach of fiduciary obligation. It did not do so. It chose to couch the types of debts or liabilities "while acting in a fiduciary capacity" which would attract the exceptions of subsection 178(1), in the context of debts or liabilities arising from fraud, embezzlement or misappropriation, as well as defalcation. While these notions may have slightly different shades or gradations of meaning, I can only conclude that Parliament intended the words "misappropriation" and "defalcation" to bear their plain and ordinary meaning, as the context in which they are used suggests.

[53] Here, there was no finding of bad faith with respect to the conduct of Mr. Daley. The trial judge expressly found that there was neither fraud nor fraudulent misrepresentation on his part. Had there been a finding that Mr. Daley had agreed to use the funds paid by the Simones solely for purposes of paying down the mortgages and indebtedness against 55 Bayside Court, and that he had failed to do so, the results might arguably be different. In such a case, a finding that there had been a misappropriation or a defalcation would have been justified. There was no such finding, however.

[54] In my view, the declaration that the judgment against Mr. Daley survives his discharge from bankruptcy cannot be sustained.

Damages

[55] The appellants submit that the trial judge erred in including in his assessment of damages the value of improvements made to the property by the respondents. They argue that the appellants received no benefit from the improvements, although the plaintiffs have, and that the plaintiffs assumed the risk of any improvements they made when they made them without title having yet been transferred. The appellants accordingly seek to have the damages assessed by the trial judge reduced by the sum of $40,000 which was allowed for improvements. They also seek a further reduction of $45,000 in the damages awarded on the basis that this later amount was paid by the Simones after they knew that the transaction had not closed in January 1993. These two deductions would have the effect of wiping out the damage award altogether.

[56] There is no merit in the latter claim. Mr. Daley and Ms. Montanari gladly accepted the $45,000 from the Simones during the period in question, after they knew that the transaction had not closed in January 1993. It hardly lies in their mouths now to say that the plaintiffs should not have paid the monies, particularly when approximately $32,000 of it went to pay down obligations on the first mortgage. All parties were operating on the hope, during this period of time, that the agreement would ultimately be completed. In my view the trial judge was quite correct in including those sums paid in the losses sustained by the plaintiffs.

[57] The issue of recovery for the improvements made by the plaintiffs stands on a different footing, however. There was no express approval on the part of the defendants for the improvements that were made, although it could be said that they were aware of them and acquiesced in what was being done. Neither Mr. Daley nor Ms. Montanari (except indirectly) received any benefit from any of the improvements. With the exception of the paving done to the driveway, which may have been necessary to meet subdivision requirement, the improvements seem to have been made by the Simone's without asking for permission on the premise -- as Mr. Simone testified -- that he "didn't think he needed to ask Daley's consent to do any work because it was my house", and to convenience them in their new home. It could be said that Ms. Montanari received at least some indirect benefit from the paving because her father had posted a letter of credit on behalf of the defendants in the amount of approximately $10,000 regarding the completion of the pavement. The other improvements consisted of such things as interior painting and decorating, including the installation custom light switches, expensive french doors between rooms, window screens, locks, and an alarm system. The Simones continue to enjoy the benefits of these improvements to this day, abeit as tenants rather than owners. As far as the interior improvements are concerned, they could in fact be said to be very much in the nature of tenants improvements.

[58] The trial judge did not provide any rationale for including the cost of the improvements in the recovery he awarded, other than to say that they formed part of the plaintiffs "investment' in the house. The respondents argue that they are entitled to such recovery on the basis of equitable compensation for breach of fiduciary duty. Except for the outside paving and related work B which could be said to be more "real property" related, and where at least an indirect benefit was enjoyed by the defendants as a result of the release of Mr. Montanari's letter of credit B I do not agree. The plaintiffs simply proceeded to decorate the premises to their liking, and they took the risk of losing these expenditures on improvements if the transaction, for whatever reason, failed to close: see Peter D. Maddaugh and John D. McCamus, The Law of Restitution, (Aurora: Canada Law Book), pp. 288-291.

[59] I would reduce the amount credited to the plaintiffs for their investment in the property by the sum of $15,000.00, representing the amount which the trial judge allowed for the interior decorating and finishing matters. I would not alter the trial judge's decision to permit the $25,000.00 which was expended on the outdoor paving, curbing and drainage work.

Cross-Appeal

[60] On the cross-appeal, the plaintiff respondents attack,

(a) the trial judge's finding that they were responsible for paying municipal taxes pending closing;

(b) the reduction of their recovery by an amount representing the sum of $1,800 per month for occupation rent, both in terms of its quantum and in terms of the period of time for which it was applied; and,

(c) the award of pre-judgment interest only from January 1, 1995, and only on the sum of $55,320.00 when the payments by the plaintiffs were made in 1992 and 1993.

Municipal Taxes

[61] The question whether it was the plaintiffs or the defendants who were to be responsible for the payment of municipal taxes under the terms of the agreement was one of fact. There was ample evidence upon which the finding of the trial judge in this regard could be based and it should not be interfered with.

Occupation Rent

[62] The trial judge was justified in the circumstances in finding the plaintiffs responsible for the payment of occupation rent. It is not correct to say, as the cross-appellants submit, that there was no evidence regarding what a reasonable rent would be. After the house was sold, in March 1995, the Simones have continued to live in it, as tenants to owners who are relatives, and they paid a monthly rental of $1,400. The amount they were to pay per month under the agreement with Mr. Daley pending closing was between $1,000 and $2,000. Moreover, Ms. Montanari B who had at least some experience in real estate matters as a legal clerk, and whose evidence the trial judge accepted in other respects B testified that in her view $2,500 per month was a reasonable rental for the premises. The trial judge made a finding in this regard, on the evidence he had, and I would not interfere with it.

[63] As to the length of "rent-free use of the property", the trial judge found on the evidence that the period ended at the end of 1994. It was shortly thereafter that the property was sold under power of sale and the new owners obtained title. The finding is not unsupported by the evidence, and should stand.

Pre-judgment Interest

[64] For the same reason, I would not interfere with the trial judge's determination of the timing of pre-judgment interest, or the amount on which it is to be paid. The amount of the judgment is an amalgam of the payments made by the plaintiffs over the period 1992 - 93, and the deductions for taxes and occupancy rent extending throughout 1994. The trial judge obviously considered that matters were finally terminated at the end of 1994, as between the parties, and he allowed pre-judgment interest from that point on.

[65] The court has a discretion under subsection 130(1) of the Courts of Justice Act R.S.O., c. C.43, to award pre-judgement interest for a period other than that provided for in section 128 of that Act. I would not interfere with the exercise of that discretion in the circumstances of this case.

Motion for Leave to Introduce Fresh Evidence on Appeal

[66] The appellants sought leave to introduce fresh evidence on the appeal to this Court. The evidence sought to be introduced related to an update of the plaintiffs' legal interest in and occupation of 55 Bayside Court since the date of the trial. It was said to relate to the issue of the plaintiffs' right to recover the cost of improvements.

[67] In my view the proposed evidence would not be dispositive of the appeal, or even particularly helpful in its determination, to the extent that it adds anything to what was conceded by the plaintiffs, namely, that they continue to live in the premises and that the premises are owned by relatives. I would dismiss the motion with costs.

III - DISPOSITION

[68] In the end, then, I would allow the appeal to the extent of setting aside the declaration that the judgment as against Mr. Daley is not extinguished by his discharge from bankruptcy, and to the extent of reducing the principal amount of the recovery awarded by $15,000, from the sum of $55,320.00 to $40,320.00. The appeal is otherwise dismissed. As success was divided, I would not award any costs of the appeal.

[69] The cross-appeal is dismissed. Again, in the circumstances, I would not award any costs of the cross-appeal.

2 From the context, this is clearly an error, and should be a reference to subsection (1).

4 "Defalcation" also had a second meaning, namely that of set-off, recoupment or counterclaim, or the diminution of a debt or claim by deducting from it a smaller claim held by the debtor or payor. This aspect of "defalcation", also recited in Black's Law Dictionary, is not relevant to this case.

Court may order non-application of subsection (1) - Sec. 178(1.1)

(1.1) At any time after five years after a bankrupt who has a debt referred to in paragraph (1)(g) ceases to be a full- or part-time student, as the case may be, under the applicable Act or enactment, the court may, on application, order that subsection (1) does not apply to the debt if the court is satisfied that

(a) the bankrupt has acted in good faith in connection with the bankrupt's liabilities under the debt; and

(b) the bankrupt has and will continue to experience financial difficulty to such an extent that the bankrupt will be unable to pay the debt.

Ontario Superior Court of Justice (In Bankruptcy and Insolvency) Deputy Registrar Sproat

Judgment: November 6, 2000

D. Nakelsky, for Her Majesty the Queen as represented by the Minister of Human Resources, Canada Student Loans Program.

Deputy Registrar Sproat*:
[1] This is one of four applications heard together, for an order under subsection 178(1.1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (the "BIA") that paragraph 178(1)(g) of the BIA no longer applies to the bankrupt. Such an order would have the effect of releasing the bankrupt from liability for student loans, as defined in paragraph 178(1)(g). For the purpose of these reasons, I will simply refer to such indebtedness as "student loans". The application is opposed by both the Ontario Student Loans Plan and Canada Student Loans Program.
The Facts
[2] The bankrupt obtained Canada student loans and Ontario student loans of about $8,000 and $15,278, respectively, for furthering her post-secondary education. She attended York University from 1992 to 1996 and graduated in 1996 with a Bachelor of Arts degree in Psychology and a Bachelor of Arts degree in Education. She is a qualified teacher. She searched for a teaching position for about 1 to 2 years and did volunteer work in various private and public schools in the hopes of "getting her foot in the door". As a mother of two teenaged children, she received family benefits during this period.
[3] The bankrupt was unable to secure employment as a teacher and, in August, 1997, she obtained work as a receptionist with Security Insurance Company of Hartford ("Hartford"). She earned $24,000 per annum in this position.

Digitized by Google

She has remained employed with Hartford continuously since August, 1997. The bankrupt has proven to be a good employee and was recently promoted. She is now an underwriting assistant with Hartford, which has been described as an administrative position. She earns $37,000 per annum and has enjoyed a bonus in the past years (the latest being $1,350 received March, 2000).

[4] The bankrupt claims that she had difficulty servicing her debts and therefore she made an assignment in bankruptcy on October 6, 1997, two months after securing full-time employment with Hartford. She had limited contact from the administrators of the Ontario Student Loans Plan and said that she contacted a representative of the Royal Bank of Canada and her MPP about her student loan. She admitted, however, that she largely ignored the situation of her student loans and, in fact, she made no payments on account of this indebtedness.

[5] On August 13, 1998, the bankrupt obtained a conditional order of discharge from the court. The condition related to the completion of the mandatory counselling requirement. She fulfilled this condition and obtained her discharge in May, 2000.

Discussion

[6] The bankrupt brings this application under subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA. Before turning to the merits of this application, it may be helpful to provide some history as to debts or obligations in respect of loans made under the Canada Student Loans Act and other similar legislation. Until 1997, such liabilities were released by an order of discharge from bankruptcy, by operation of subsection 178(2) of the BIA, which provides that all claims provable in bankruptcy (with the exception of debts referred to in subsection 178(1)) are released by an order of discharge.

[7] However, in 1997, the BIA was amended. Subsection 178(1) of the BIA was amended to add paragraph 178(1)(g), which thereby excepted student loans from the operation of subsection 178(2) of the BIA. The amendment came into force on September 30, 1997. Thus, if the date of bankruptcy was after September 30, 1997, student loans were not automatically released by an order of discharge. A further amendment (subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA) was enacted to permit the bankrupt to effectively apply for the release of student loans upon the expiry of two years after the bankrupt ceased to be a full or part-time student.

[8] These amendments were motivated by the recognition that a bankrupt had and would continue to have the benefit from the education he or she obtained with the assistance of the student loans and to address a perceived abuse of the bankruptcy process. It was said that:

> The broad purpose of the Act is to permit honest but unfortunate debtors to obtain a discharge of their obligations in order to facilitate a return to stable participation in social and economic life, while balancing this objective against the interests of creditors. Section 178(1)(g) reflects a policy decision which accords with this objective and recognizes that student loans involve a situation where funds are advanced when there is no existing capacity of the debtor to repay the debt, but education obtained will hopefully enable the debtor to begin active and fruitful participation in the economy at some later date.
> Realization of earning potential associated with education can take some period of time after leaving school, so Parliament saw fit to disallow the immediate discharge of student loans, in this case for two years after ceasing to be a student. This measure addressed the perceived abuse of students using the Act to obtain a discharge of student loans prior to making reasonable efforts to realize upon their earning potential achieved through education.

(See Re Minto 1999 CanLII 13045 (SK QB), (1999), 14 C.B.R. (4th) 235 (Sask. Q.B.) at paragraph 16)

[9] Thus, the date on which the bankrupt filed for bankruptcy is of importance as to whether student loans are or are not automatically released. If a bankrupt made an assignment on or after September 30, 1997, liabilities for student loans were not released upon an order of discharge. In such a bankruptcy, to be released of liability for student loans, the bankrupt is required to bring an application under subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA, after the expiry of two years from the date the bankrupt ceased being a full or part-time student, for the requisite order.

[10] To complicate matters somewhat further, the BIA was again amended in 1998 to increase the time after which the bankrupt could apply to the court for an order under subsection 178(1.1). Thus, if the date of bankruptcy was on or after June 18, 1998, the bankrupt was not entitled to bring an application for the release of student loans until after the expiry of 10 years (as opposed to the 2 year period resulting from the 1997 amendments) from the date the bankrupt ceased being a full or part-time student.

[11] Thus, there are now three relevent time periods, insofar as student loan obligations are concerned. They are:

1. if the date of bankruptcy was after December, 1992 but before September 30, 1997, debts or obligations in respect of student loans were released by an order of discharge;
2. if the date of bankruptcy was on or after September 30, 1997 but before June 18, 1998, the bankrupt's student loans were not released by an order of discharge and the bankrupt was obligated to wait 2 years from the time the bankrupt ceased being a full or part-time student before applying to the court for an order that the student loans be released; and

3. if the date of bankruptcy was on or after June 18, 1998, the bankrupt's student loans were not released and the bankrupt was obligated to wait 10 years from the time the bankrupt ceased being a full or part-time student before applying to the court for an order that the student loans be released.

[12] In this case, the date of bankruptcy is October 6, 1997. The bankrupt ceased being a full time student in April, 1996 and two years have since lapsed. The bankrupt is therefore entitled to bring this application for a release of her student loan obligations.

[13] The test which the bankrupt must meet on this application is set forth in subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA which provided (in 1997) as follows:

> At any time after two years after a bankrupt who has a debt referred to in paragraph (1)(g) ceases to be a full- or part-time student, as the case may be, under the applicable Act or enactment, the court may, on application, order that subsection (1) does not apply to the debt if the court is satisfied that
> (a) the bankrupt has acted in good faith in connection with the bankrupt's liabilities under the loan; and
> (b) the bankrupt has and will continue to experience financial difficulty to such an extent that the bankrupt will be unable to pay the liabilities under the loan.

[14] The test is conjunctive and the bankrupt therefore has the onus of establishing on a balance of probabilities that she has acted in good faith and has and will continue to experience financial difficulty such that she will be unable to pay her student loan liabilities.

(a) Good Faith

[15] Given the existence of the two year waiting period before an application could be brought for an order releasing student loans, there have been few occasions (until recently) where the court was required to consider the test set forth in subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA and what factors the court should consider on such an application.

[16] In Re Minto, supra, Registrar Herauf referred to the factors which the court had considered on applications for discharge of a bankrupt with student loans and determined that these same factors were relevant to an application under subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA. I agree. In Re Minto, Registrar Herauf summarized the following factors as relevant to the determination of the issue of "good faith": whether the money was used for the purpose loaned, whether the applicant completed the education, whether the applicant derived economic benefit from the education (i.e. is the applicant employed in an area directly related to the education), whether the applicant has made reasonable efforts to repay the debts and whether the applicant has made use of available options such as interest relief, remission, etc.

[17] However, I do not see these factors as exhaustive. I would add that the timing of the bankruptcy and whether the student loans form a significant part of the bankrupt's overall indebtedness as of the date of bankruptcy are factors that the court could consider in the determination of the good faith aspect of the test. I am of this view given the purpose of and the policy reasons for the 1997 amendments to the BIA.

[18] Having regard to the facts of this case, I am of the view that the bankrupt has not acted in good faith. I am not satisfied that the bankrupt made reasonable efforts to secure employment as a teacher (although I think that she did make some efforts). However, that is not all. I find as fact that the bankrupt failed to make any inquiries or at least meaningful inquiries as to the options which might have been available to her to reduce or avoid, at least in part, the burden relating to her student loans. For example, she may have been entitled to interest relief or loan forgiveness. She did not pursue these avenues of relief and admittedly ignored her student loan obligations.

[19] I think it also significant that she made her assignment in bankruptcy two months after she secured gainful employment. She claimed to have done so because she could not service her debts. In addition, the bankrupt had financial ability to make some provision for her student loans. She has, over the period August, 1997 to the present, managed to contribute about $4,500 into an RRSP plan (presumably on a receptionists' salary of $24,000 given that her promotion was recent). Yet, the bankrupt has made no provision for her student loans. In my view, the bankrupt has not made reasonable efforts to pay the student loans.

[20] I therefore find that the bankrupt fails on the first branch of the test on this application.

(b) Financial Difficulty

[21] As to the second branch of the test, it is necessary for the bankrupt to establish that she has and will continue to experience financial difficulty to such an extent that she will be unable to pay the student loans.

[22] The issue as to whether a bankrupt "will continue to experience financial difficulty" will in most cases pose the biggest obstacle for bankrupts bringing a subsection 178(1.1) application. The BIA does not provide any guidance to the court as to the appropriate duration of time into the future wherein the bankrupt must experience this financial difficulty. I agree with Registrar Herauf that the time period cannot be established with certainty and is dependent upon the facts of the particular case.

[23] In this case, I am not satisfied that the bankrupt has, in the past, experienced financial difficulty to such an extent that she was unable to pay her student loans. I come to this view as she has been employed on a full-time basis for about 3 years. During this period of time, she was capable of making contributions to an RRSP plan at the rate of about $85 every two weeks (which is roughly $184 per month).

[24] In addition, I am of the view that the bankrupt had and will have, in my view, sufficient income with which to make some provision for her student loans. Her monthly budget filed in support of the application revealed net income of $2,153, which figure was arrived at by multiplying her net income (for a two week pay period) of $994.19 by 26 pay periods and dividing by 12. However, the bankrupt neglected to include in her net income the $184 deduction automatically made from her pay on account of her RRSP contribution. If one adds the $184 RRSP contribution and the $170 child tax credit to her income, the total net income is $2,507. Her stated expenses are $2,286. Thus, the excess income of $221 would be available to make some provision on account of her student loans.

[25] Lastly, I note that she has about $4,500 in her RRSP that she could cash out and pay towards her student loans. She has failed to do so. She does not wish to do so. This is a liquid asset now available to her to pay down her student loan. She has also enjoyed income tax refunds of about $1,300 yearly. She has also enjoyed bonuses from her employer of a similar amount. These too could have been paid against the student loans. For these reasons, I do not think that the bankrupt has experienced financial difficulty to such an extent that she was unable to pay her student loans.

[26] Even if I am wrong on this issue, I would also find against the bankrupt on the issue as to whether she would continue to experience financial difficulty to such an extent that she would be unable to pay her student loans. The bankrupt has been steadily employed for the past three years. She is now remunerated very well. She has demonstrated an ability to make contributions to an RRSP over the past 3 years. I believe her prospects at Hartford are positive. She is 38 years of age and remains employable for many years. She has taken 3 of 12 courses required to become a fully qualified underwriter. Given the bankrupt's age, current assets and income and future prospects, I am not satisfied that she will continue to experience financial difficulty such that she will be unable to pay her student loans.

[27] I dismiss the application without costs.

Application dismissed.

JUDGMENT MAURICE J. HERAUF, Q.C.
April 12, 2006 Registrar in Bankruptcy

INTRODUCTION

[1] Each applicant made a Consumer Proposal under the terms of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 as amended (the "Act"). When each applicant made the Consumer Proposal, they had outstanding student loans. Accordingly, their student loans fell under section 178(1) (g) of the Act as debts that would not be released upon a discharge from bankruptcy. One or more of the student loan creditors, including the Canada Student Loans Program or its agent, consented to the Proposal by voting for acceptance. Each applicant completed the Proposal and received a Certificate of Completion. At least one of the student loan creditors that consented to the Proposal recommenced pursuing the applicant for payment. The student loan creditor has charged interest at the rate originally set under the agreement with the applicant, including through the term of his or her Proposal.

[2] Both applicants are now applying for declarations that the debts of student loan creditors were discharged by operation of section 66.28(2) of the Act.

[3] The applicant Cardwell applies for relief in the alternative, namely for release of his debts under section 178(1.1) of the Act and for an order that section 178(1)(g) does not apply to his student loan debt.

ISSUES

A. What is the effect of a consent to a Proposal or Consumer Proposal by a student loans creditor?

B. In the case of Cardwell should an order be made under subsection 178(1.1) of the Act that subsection 178(1)(g) of the Act does not apply to the student loan debts of that applicant? To address this issue, the following questions must be considered:

1. Is such relief available to a person who has made a Proposal or Consumer Proposal?

2. What factors should be considered in determining whether to grant the relief sought?

Submissions on Issue A:

[4] The applicants submit that the Court can utilize section 183 of the Act to make a declaration that the student loan debts owing to those creditors who consented to the Consumer Proposal of the applicants were released upon the completion of the Proposal.

[5] The point in issue involves the proper construction of the words found in subsection 66.28(2) of the Act which reads:

> 66.28(2) A consumer proposal accepted, or deemed accepted, > by the creditors and approved, or deemed approved, > by the court is binding on creditors in respect of > (a) all unsecured claims, and
> (b) secured claims for which proofs of claim have been filed in the manner provided for in sections 124 to 134, > but does not release the consumer debtor from the debts and liabilities referred to in section 178, unless the creditor assents thereto.

[6] The applicants assert that this provision and the similar provision in subsection 62(2) have traditionally been interpreted to mean that creditor assent to a Proposal meant release of the debt even if that debt would normally survive a bankruptcy.

[7] The applicants point to similar provisions that have been included in English and Canadian bankruptcy legislation for many decades. The English Bankruptcy Act, 1869 32 & 33 Vict., c. 62, permitted debtors to make arrangements or compositions with creditors. Specifically s. 15 of this legislation provided that:

> Where a debtor makes an arrangement or composition with his creditors under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, he shall remain liable for the unpaid balance of any debt which he incurred or increased, or whereof before the date of the arrangement or composition he obtained forbearance, by any fraud, provided the defrauded creditor has not assented to the arrangement or composition otherwise than by proving his debt and accepting dividends.

[8] Similarly, the Bankruptcy Act, 1919 R.S.C. 1927, c. 11 permitted compositions by debtors with their creditors. Section 18(1) provided that:

> A composition, extension or scheme accepted and approved shall be binding on all the creditors so far as relates to any debts due to them from the debtor and provable under this Act, but shall not release the > debtor from any liability [for various debts], except to such an extent and under such conditions as the court expressly orders in respect of such liability.

[9] Ms. Hardy argues that the English provision makes it clear that if a creditor assented to a Proposal, it was bound by that Proposal, even if its debt would normally have survived a bankruptcy. Under the later Canadian bankruptcy legislation, the court ratifying a composition had the authority to release a debtor from debts that would normally not be released on a discharge from bankruptcy.

[10] This interpretation, according to Ms. Hardy, has until recently been applied to the current provisions of the Act. Therefore, if a creditor with a debt falling within section 178 assented to a Proposal, its debt would be discharged on completion of the Proposal: Houlden & Morawetz, 2004 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, sections E18(4) and E35.8.

[11] Because of this, the applicants take issue with the interpretation of the current provision by Master Bolton in Re Slaney 2004 BCSC 388 (CanLII), (2004), 4 C.B.R. (5th) 95 (B.C.S.C.) where the Court held that in a student loan debt a creditor must not only assent to the Proposal but also to the release of the debt upon completion of the Proposal. Counsel for the applicants submits that this decision did not consider the wording of the predecessor provisions under which the concern was whether the creditor assented to the composition, not the release of its debts. It also did not consider the accepted interpretation of the current provisions.

[12] According to Ms. Hardy, trustees in Bankruptcy, lawyers and insolvent persons have relied on the interpretation in Houlden & Morawetz in giving advice or deciding what action to take and that the decision in Re Slaney, supra is incorrect.

[13] Counsel for the respondent submits that the Court in Re Slaney, supra came to the correct conclusion relating to the current provisions in the Act. The Court recognized that the phrase "assents thereto" was ambiguous, and considered on a grammatical basis as capable of meaning either assents to the release of a s. 178 debt or assents to the Proposal.

[14] According to Mr. Miller, Master Bolton carefully considered the policy reasons for each interpretation in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the decision which bear repeating here:

> The argument for the bankrupt is that it is not fair to allow a s. 178 creditor to take advantage of a proposal to pay more than might otherwise be recoverable under a routine assignment in bankruptcy, and then turn round and claim the excess when the bankrupt has complied with all the terms of the proposal. Along these lines, I note that such a creditor could very well cast the decisive vote for or against a proposal, as in many cases a s. 178 debt is likely to be a very significant percentage of the whole estate. It can therefore be argued that it would be unjust not only to the bankrupt but to other creditors to allow a s. 178 creditor to dictate the course of a proposal when, no matter what the outcome of the proposal might be, it will still be able to pursue a claim to recover one hundred cents on the dollar.
> The contrary position is that the policy reasons for the special treatment of s. 178 debts are obvious from the very nature of the debts. There is no apparent policy reason why this treatment should differ in a bankruptcy pursuant to a proposal and in an assignment into bankruptcy. It would be unfair to bar a right to recovery by mere implication, when such a creditor is asked only to approve or reject a proposal.

[15] The learned Master in paragraph 12 considered the proper interpretation of the phrase "assents thereto" to be that it requires an explicit term in the Proposal that a section 178 debt is to be compromised. Master Bolton stated:

> There is merit in both arguments, but on balance I prefer the latter. No-one reading the voting letter sent out to the creditors here would be put on notice that assent to the proposal would cancel a debt that would otherwise survive the bankruptcy. I conclude that if a proposal is to have the effect of releasing the bankrupt from a s. 178 debt, it should do so explicitly, rather than pursuant to an implication read into a statute which can arguably be construed to be ambiguous.

[16] To bolster his contention that the finding in Re Slaney, supra is persuasive and its conclusion correct in law, Mr. Miller points to the proposed amendment to section 66.28 which would read as follows:

Digitized by Google

> 66.28(2.1) A consumer proposal accepted, or deemed accepted,by the creditors and approved, or deemed approved, by the court does not release the consumer debtor from any particular debt or liability referred to in subsection 178(1) unless the consumer proposal explicitly provides for the compromise of that debt or liability and the creditor in relation to that debt or liability has assented to the consumer proposal."

[17] Of course, this provision is not in effect as yet but when given the force of law would codify the interpretation of the current provision as found in Re Slaney, supra.

[18] In conclusion, counsel for the respondent submits that section 66.28(2) and its companion provision in section 62(2) of the Act stipulate that in order for a creditor to compromise the effect of its debt that would otherwise survive a discharge in bankruptcy, the creditor must explicitly agree to the compromise of its section 178 status. Since there is no evidence in either of these cases that would indicate Canada Student Loans explicitly agreed to compromise its status under section 178 the application should be dismissed.

Discussion and Analysis

[19] Despite the able argument and analysis put forward by counsel for the applicants I find myself in agreement with the position of the respondent.

[20] First of all I am not so sure that the cases cited in Houlden & Morawetz to support the applicant's position, namely Skytal Ltd. V. Schiber 1997 CanLII 12404 (ON SC), (1997), 46 C.B.R. (3d) 275 (Ont. Gen. Div.), aff'd 1998 CanLII 17736 (ON CA), (1999), 9 C.B.R. (4th) 129 (Ont. C.A.) and Trade Collection & Mercantile Agency v. Derome (1934), 16 C.B.R. 158 (Que. S.C.), actually stand for the principle that assenting to a proposal by a creditor means that one is also consenting to the release of a section 178 debt.

[21] Second, the interpretation of the provisions as outlined in Re Slaney, supra, accords with the object of the Act and the intention of Parliament and treats consumer debtors and bankrupts similar with respect to section 178 debts.

[22] Third, the Re Slaney, supra interpretation reflects what is obviously the intent of Parliament which will be clearly set out when the proposed amendment is proclaimed into force.

[23] Fourth, no one appears to have commented upon section 66.28(3) and section 62(3) of the Act which read as follows:

> 66.28(3) The acceptance of a consumer proposal by a creditor does not release any person who would not be released under this Act by the discharge of the consumer debtor.
> 62.(3) The acceptance of a proposal by a creditor does not release any person who would not be released under this Act by the discharge of the debtor.

[24] This provision, in my respectful opinion, appears to verify the non release of a section 178 debt where a creditor is simply consenting to the terms of the Proposal and not the release of the debt.

[25] Therefore, I decline to grant the relief requested by the applicants, namely that the completion of a Proposal or Consumer Proposal will release the debtor from debts falling within section 178 of the Act, including student loans debts within subsection 178(1)(g), if the creditor consented to the proposal itself.

[26] Since this was the only relief requested by Rederburg, the dismissal of this portion ends her involvement.

Submissions on B. 1

[27] Both parties assert that subsection 178(1.1) of the Act is available to a person who has made a Proposal or Consumer Proposal. Both contend that the decision in Canada v. Snopko 2004 CanLII 17058 (ON SC), (2004), 48 C.B.R. (4th) 41 (Ont. S.C.) is wrongly decided and should not be followed by this Court. In Snopko, supra, Sills, J. held relief pursuant to this provision was not available to a debtor in a Consumer Proposal. In coming to this conclusion, Justice Sills considered the definitions of a 'bankrupt' and an 'insolvent person' in subsection 2(1) of the Act, and the definition of a 'consumer debtor' in subsection 66.11. Counsel submit that the learned Justice failed to consider the effect of subsection 66(1) with respect to Proposals, and subsection 66.4(1) with respect to Consumer Proposals. These sections read as follows:

> 66(1) All the provisions of this Act, except Division II of this Part, in so far as they are applicable, apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to proposals made under this Division.
> 66.4(1)All the provisions of this Act, except Division I of this Part, in so far as they are applicable, apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to consumer proposals.

[28] Counsel drew the Court's attention to two appellate court decisions which aid in the interpretation of these provisions.

[29] In Hancor Inc. v. Systemes de Drainage Modernes Inc. 1995 CanLII 3536 (FCA), (1995), 37 C.B.R. (3d) 117 (Fed. C.A.), the Federal Court of Appeal was critical of the wording of subsection 66(1), but indicated that 'all the provisions of the Act apply to Proposals in so far as is possible.' The courts should 'participate in a process of intelligent harmonization and adaptation' of the rules applicable to bankruptcy with the rules applicable to Proposals.
[30] In Re Perrette Inc. 1998 CanLII 12721 (QC CA), (1998), 2 C.B.R. (4th) 165 (Que. C.A.); leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused (1998), 235 N.R. 398 (note), the Quebec Court of Appeal held that it is important to standardize rules applicable to bankruptcies with rules applicable to proposals. The words 'with such modifications as the circumstances require' mean that the provisions relating to bankruptcies are to be applied to subsections 50 to 65.3 by making the necessary terminological changes to other provisions.
[31] The parties argue that it is clear subsections 62(2) and 66.28(2) of the Act contain specific references to subsection 178(1) and therefore, that section applies to Proposals and Consumer Proposals as well as bankruptcies. Student loan debts were included in subsection 178(1) only on the understanding that relief against such debts would eventually be available in cases of hardship. It was expected that if student loan debts were not released upon a discharge from bankruptcy, debtors with student loans would be encouraged to make Consumer Proposals, thus paying a portion of their debts, rather than going into bankruptcy. In these circumstances, there is no reason that subsection 178(1.1) should not apply to Proposals and Consumer Proposals as well as bankruptcies. To hold otherwise would be to deny any recourse to persons who have made an effort to pay their debts in good faith. They would be in a worse position than persons who went into bankruptcy. Their only options in cases of hardship would be to make another Consumer Proposal or Proposal, go into bankruptcy or make a Proposal for the Orderly Payment of Debts. Subsection 178(1.1) should simply be interpreted to include debtors who have made Proposals or Consumer Proposals under Divisions I or II of the Act.
[32] In support of this position, Mr. Miller also contends that the object of section 178 of the Act is to define those specific debts and liabilities from which bankruptcy is not to provide relief, since by the wording of subsection (1) an order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from the debts and liabilities listed in paragraphs (a) to (h).
[33] This court in Re Minto 1999 CanLII 13045 (SK QB), (1999), 14 C.B.R. (4th) 235 (Sask. Q.B.) commented on the abuse paragraph 178(1)(g) was designed to avoid at para. 16:

> Section 178(1)(g) reflects a policy decision which accords with this objective and recognizes that student loans involve a situation where funds are advanced when there is no existing capacity of the debtor to repay the debt, but education obtained will hopefully enable the debtor to begin active and fruitful participation in the economy at some later date. Realization of earning potential associated with education can take some period of time after leaving school, so Parliament saw fit to disallow the immediate discharge of student loans in this case for two years after ceasing to be a student. This measure addressed the perceived abuse of students using the Act to obtain a discharge of student loans prior to making reasonable efforts to realize upon their earning potential achieved through education.

[34] The abuse that paragraph 178(1)(g) was designed to avoid is still maintained if a non-bankrupt consumer debtor is allowed to apply for relief under subsection 178(1.1) of the Act because applicants must meet the criteria in paragraphs (a) and (b) and also the application can only be brought ten years after the applicant ceased to be a student.
[35] Consequently, counsel for the respondent submits that the precise type of insolvency proceeding in which debt and liabilities are addressed, whether in the form of a bankruptcy or a Consumer Proposal, is of no consequence to the relief from student loan indebtedness at which subsection 178(1.1) is aimed. The passage of time after study in itself allows realization of earnings potential associated with education. The requirements of good faith and continued financial hardship preclude perceived potential abuses of failing to make reasonable efforts to realize upon earning potential through education.
[36] With respect to other creditors, the application of subsection 178(1.1) of the Act to non-bankrupt consumer debtors would not result in prejudice as they are no worse off than if the debtor was bankrupt and possibly better off if a former student's liability for subsection 178(1)(g) debt is relieved.
[37] It follows that the plain meaning of the words in subsections 66(1) and 66.4(1) is that the provisions in subsection 178(1.1) of the Act are to apply to Proposals and Consumer Proposals 'with such modifications as the circumstances require.' Accordingly, while the language of subsection 178(1.1) of the Act speaks of 'a bankrupt' applying for relief from student loans debt, the provision can be modified in circumstances involving non-bankrupt Proposal and Consumer Proposal debtors, by replacing the word 'bankrupt' with the words 'debtor or consumer debtor with an accepted and approved Proposal or Consumer Proposal under Division I or Division II of the Act.'

Discussion and Analysis

[38] I entirely agree with the thoughtful and articulate submissions of counsel. I have, therefore, little to add to this discussion.

Digitized by Google

[39] I do note, however, that Parliament has caused confusion with the use of the word 'bankrupt' in subsections 178(1)(g) and (1.1) of the Act. This court in Re Minto, supra, was required to interpret the phrase 'bankrupt' to include a discharged bankrupt in order to make sense out of the provision.
[40] I also agree that a restricted interpretation of this provision to include bankrupts only and not debtors who have an approved Proposal would make little sense. Instead of encouraging Proposals as an alternative to bankruptcy for student loan debtors the opposite effect would result.
[41] Having come to this conclusion, it now remains for the Court to examine whether relief should be granted to the applicant Cardwell pursuant to subsection 178(1.1) of the Act.

Submissions on B. 2

[42] Before outlining the submissions it is necessary to set out Mr. Cardwell's personal and financial circumstances.
[43] The applicant obtained a Bachelor of Education Degree from the University of Saskatchewan in 1995. He also obtained a Bachelor of Arts in Studio Art from the University of Saskatchewan in 2001. The Arts degree was obtained with assistance from his parents and student loan funding was not involved.
[44] After graduation, Mr. Cardwell obtained some part-time work as a teacher but indicated that he did not earn a sufficient salary to pay anything toward his debt.
[45] Canada Student Loans obtained a judgment against Mr. Cardwell and garnished his pay. This prompted him to contact a Trustee in bankruptcy to discuss his options. At the suggestion of the Trustee he made a Consumer Proposal in February, 1998. The applicant was required to pay $250.00 per month for 48 months. The student loan creditors consented to the proposal. The applicant made all payments and received a Certificate of Full Performance in March of 2002.
[46] Mr. Cardwell gave evidence under oath that he was advised by his administrator that the remaining student loan debt would be discharged because the creditors consented to the Proposal. In the spring of 2004, Canada Student Loans contacted Mr. Cardwell and reactivated collection of the student loan debt. With the addition of interest the amount demanded exceeded the amount when he first made his proposal.
[47] The bankrupt is now 37 years old. He lives in a common-law relationship and supports two children of his partner from a previous relationship. Mr. Cardwell and his partner also have a 2 ½ year old daughter. His partner is self-employed with a net monthly income that averages only $100.00 per month. She is currently looking for part-time salaried work. His partner receives child support from the father of her two children and also receives the Child Tax Benefit for all three children.
[48] The applicant is gainfully employed as a teacher with net monthly income of $3,100.00. Total net family income is $3,988.05.
[49] The bankrupt and his partner obtained a mortgage, purchased a car and van and incurred other expenses on the premise that he no longer had student loans since he successfully completed his Consumer Proposal. As a result, his total monthly debt is $4,409.00 per month.

Submissions of the Parties

[50] The applicant contends that he has met the onus and satisfied the test set out in subsection 178(1.1) of the Act.
[51] Counsel for Cardwell submits that the applicant acted in good faith by entering into and satisfying the Consumer Proposal which resulted in dividends to the respondent of over $6,200.00. She also argues that the applicant should not be held responsible for the apparent confusion relating to the successful completion of a Consumer Proposal vis-à-vis a section 178 debt. As a result of this confusion, the applicant obtained a mortgage and car loans which basically leave no income available for payment toward this debt either now or in the foreseeable future.
[52] The respondent contends that the bankrupt has not met the onus upon him. Since the applicant is gainfully employed as a teacher and earning a healthy income with those earnings to continue, he has not satisfied the court that he will continue to have financial difficulty.
[53] In addition, despite graduating in 1995, the applicant made little effort to make payments until three years later when faced by enforcement remedies being utilized by the respondent.

Discussion and Analysis

[54] This court in Re Minto, supra set out various factors which a court should consider in this type of application. These factors have been followed and expanded upon in many decisions including Re Kelly 2000 CanLII 22497 (ON SC), (2000), 20 C.B.R. (4th) 251 (Ont. Gen. Div.). I do not intend to repeat the criteria here.
[55] To put it bluntly, I have not been convinced that the applicant has satisfied the requirements in subsection 178(1.1) of the Act. The applicant made no attempt to make any payment until compelled to do so by enforcement action brought against him. He did not take advantage of any interest relief mechanisms. While I certainly appreciate the effort by the applicant to complete a Consumer Proposal I cannot equate that effort as a show of good faith. It was judgment enforcement that prompted the Consumer Proposal and not a genuine effort by the applicant to pay down this debt.

Digitized by Google

[56] I also agree with the respondent's submission that the applicant is gainfully employed in a profession for which he received a student loan funded education. Furthermore, he will be employed in that area for the foreseeable future. The applicant earns substantial remuneration for this work. To allow the application in the present circumstances would make a farce of this provision.
[57] I am not unsympathetic to the plight of the applicant who arranged his finances on the mistaken belief that the successful completion of his Proposal eradicated the remaining student loan payment obligation.
[58] As stated in Re Minto, supra, the court is limited in this type of application to either granting, dismissing or adjourning the application. The court also has no jurisdiction to eliminate interest on student loans: Re Lowe 2004 ABQB 255 (CanLII), (2004) 2 C.B.R. (5th) 277 (Alta. Q.B.)
[59] If this was a discharge application, I would carefully consider these facts when fashioning an appropriate order and I would request that the respondent do the same before taking any further action on the debt.

Conclusion

[60] The applicants' request for a declaration that the debts of student loan creditors who consented to their Proposals did not survive the completion of the Proposals is dismissed. Since this was the only relief requested by the applicant Rederburg, her application is dismissed.
[61] Relief under subsection 178(1.1) of the Act is available to a person who has made a Proposal or Consumer Proposal. However, the applicant Cardwell's application for relief pursuant to this provision is also dismissed for the reasons stated above.
[62] The Respondent did not request costs and none will be awarded.

DATED at the City of Regina, in the Province of Saskatchewan, this 12th day of April, A.D. 2006.

Summary: The applicant's student loans were not discharged by his bankruptcy as he made his assignment before seven years had passed since he had ceased to be a student. He applied for relief under Subsection 178(1.1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Result: The court was satisfied that he had acted in good faith respecting the loans. As his resources were limited and he had family responsibilities the court was also satisfied that he would continue experiencing financial difficulty so that he would not be able to pay the debt. Relief was granted.

Present: Joseph R. Wall, representing the Attorney General of Canada.
Rita Anderson, representing the Trustee, PricewaterhouseCoopers.
Daniel George Lundrigan, representing himself.

[1] Background
This is an application by Daniel George Lundrigan for relief under Subsection 178(1.1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (BIA) with respect to two student loans which have remained outstanding after his discharge from Bankruptcy. It is opposed by the Attorney General of Canada.

[2] Mr. Lundrigan enrolled in a two year course at the Marconi Campus in Sydney in 2003. However after completing one and a half years, his common law relationship ended leaving him responsible for debts totalling $27,000.00, in addition to two student loans, one under Federal sponsorship and the other under Provincial sponsorship, on which were owing on the date of his assignment, February 17, 2011, balances of $14,575.97 and $3,799.49 respectively.

[3] He ceased to be a student in June 2004. This date is 4 months short of seven years from the date of his assignment. Accordingly, because of the provisions of Subsection 178(1)(g) of the BIA, the student loans were not discharged with his automatic discharge on November 18, 2011.

[4] There was considerable pressure on him to deal with the indebtedness from his broken relationship. His father agreed to help him. They arranged a loan with the TD Bank for the $27,000.00. His father co-signed the loan on condition that he live at home and thus be able to make $600.00 payments each month against this loan. He had to leave his studies and find work. The loan apparently was paid in a timely manner. He then addressed his student loans. He had an understanding with the collection agency that he would pay $150.00 per month. That was all he could pay as he was no longer living at home. He only made 9 payments.

[5] He has been working throughout as a cashier at the casino in Sydney. He has married. He and his wife, Michelle Lynn Lundrigan, have twins, born July 19, 2010.

[6] His monthly take home pay averages $1,500.00. His wife's monthly take home pay averages $1,084.00. She also receives the Child Tax Benefits of $223.00 and Universal Child Care Benefit of $200.00 each month. The total current household monthly income is now $3,007.00.

[7] He works the evening shift at the casino and she works during the day so that one of them is always able to look after their children. This way they avoid child care expenses.

Digitized by Google

[8] The claims made in his bankruptcy, in addition to the student loans, consisted of a secured claim by TD Canada Trust for $10,875.47, and an unsecured claims of Capital One Services, LLC for $4,163.76.

[9] Mr. Lundrigan's work at the casino is steady but he does not see any opportunity for advancement. He does not see that there are other opportunities in the region for him which would pay more.

[10] If he had completed the course at the Marconi Campus, he would be qualified for much better paying work. He needed another half year of study to complete it. He doubts that he could now complete the course. He probably would have to start all over again as the technology involved is always changing.

[11] Law

To be relieved of student loans under Subsection 178(1.1) a bankrupt must satisfy the court that:

> (a) the bankrupt has acted in good faith in connection with the bankrupt's liabilities under the debt; and
> (b) the bankrupt has and will continue to experience financial difficulty to such an extent that the bankrupt will be unable to pay the debt.

[12] I must be satisfied that Mr. Lundrigan has acted in good faith with respect to these debts. The following is a review I have made of cases and commentary on good faith. A number of points are relevant to Mr. Lundrigan's situation.

[13] I shall start by quoting what I wrote in Hankinson (Re), 2009 NSSC 211 (CanLII), 2009 NSSC 211:

> [17] Re Minto 1999 CanLII 13045 (SK QB), (1999), 14 C.B.R. (4th) 235 (Sask., Registrar Herauf) is often referred to for its list of factors relevant to the determination of good faith. In paragraph [62] he says:
>
> > I agree with counsel that in the context of student loans one can look at certain factors considered in determining whether a condition should be imposed on the discharge of a bankrupt with student loan liabilities; namely, whether the money was used for the purpose loaned, whether the applicant completed the education, whether the applicant derived economic benefit from the education (ie: is the applicant employed in an area directly related to the education), whether the applicant has made reasonable efforts to pay the debts and whether the applicant has made use of available options such as interest relief, remission, etc.
> [18] Registrar Sprout in Kelly, Re, 2000 CanL II 22 497 (Ont., S.C.) after referring to these factors added:
> > - the timing of the bankruptcy, and
> > - whether the student loan forms a significant part of the bankrupt's overall indebtedness as of the date of bankruptcy.
> [19] I would add the following:
> > - whether the applicant had sufficient work and income to be reasonably expected to make payments on the loan,
> > - the lifestyle of the applicant,
> > - whether the applicant has had sufficient income for there to be surplus income under the Superintendent's standards,
> > - what proposals the applicant may have made to the loan administrators and the responses received, and
> > - whether the applicant was at any time disabled from working by illness.

[14] Black's Law Dictionary (9th ed): gives the following definition:

> A state of mind consisting in (1) honesty in belief or purpose, (2) faithfulness to one's duty or obligation, (3) observance of reasonable commercial standards or fair dealing in a given trade or business, or (4) absence of intent to defraud or to see unconscionable advantage. - Also termed bona fides.
> > "The phrase 'good faith' is used in a variety of contexts, and its meaning varies somewhat with the context. Good faith performance or enforcement of a contract emphasizes faithfulness to an agreed common purpose and consistency with the justified expectations of the other party; It excludes a variety of types of conduct > characterized as involving 'bad faith' because they violate community standards of decency, fairness or reasonableness.,

Digitized by Google

and Barron's Law Dictionary, 3rd edition, the following:

> GOOD FAITH a total absence of any intention to seek an unfair advantage or to defraud another party; an honest and sincere intention to fulfill one's obligations. In the case of a merchant, good faith refers to honest in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade. U.C.C. §2-103(1)(b). More generally, the term means "honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned. "U.C.C. §1-201(19).

[15] In Frank Bennett: Bennett on Bankruptcy, 14th ed, at page 564 the following factors are suggested:

- whether the money was used for the purpose loaned;
- whether the bankrupt completed the education;
- whether the bankrupt derived economic benefit from the education, namely whether the bankrupt obtained a job in the area directly related to the education;
- whether the bankrupt made reasonable efforts to repay the debts;
- whether the bankrupt had made use of available options such as interest relief, remission, etc.;
- the timing of the bankruptcy;
- whether the student loans form a significant part of the bankrupt's overall debts.
- whether the bankrupt has acquired a significant estate, property, savings, investments or has the bankrupt incurred and discharged other debts for non-necessaries, while continuing in default of the student loan;
- whether the bankrupt had sufficient work and income to be reasonably expected to make payments on the loan;
- the lifestyle of the applicant;
- whether the applicant has had sufficient income for there to be surplus income under the Superintendent's standards;
- what proposals the applicant may have made to the loan administrators and the responses received; and
- whether the applicant was at any time disabled from working by illness.

[16] The following is said in Roderick J. Wood: Bankruptcy & Insolvency Law, Irwin Law, 2009, at page 295:

> The good faith requirement means that the debtor must have acted honestly both in the bankruptcy and in obtaining the student loan.

[17] Houlden, Morawetz & Sarra: Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, Fourth Edition, at H§40, page 6-185, says the following:

> "Good faith" implies honesty of intention. Failure to properly disclose the debtor's marital status on the student loan application shows dishonesty of intention: Re Dustow 1999 CanLII 13044 (SK QB), (1999), 14 C.B.R. (4th) 186, 1999 Carswell Sask 831, 193 Sask. R. 159 (Sask. Q.B.).
> In determining whether the bankrupt acted in good faith, the following factors may be considered:
> 1. Was the money used for the purpose loaned?
> 2. Did the bankrupt complete the education or make an honest effort to do so?
> 3. Did the bankrupt derive benefit from the education in the sense of gaining employment in an area directly related to the education?
> 4. Did the bankrupt make reasonable efforts to pay the loan or did the bankrupt make an immediate assignment in bankruptcy?

> 5. Did the bankrupt take advantage of other options with respect to the loan such as interest relief or loan remission?
> 6. Was the bankrupt extravagant or irresponsible with his or her finances?
> 7. Did the bankrupt fairly disclose his or her circumstances on the application for the loan in the sense of acting with an honest intention?

[18] In Duke v. Nanaimo (Regional District)(1998), 50 M.P.L.R. (2d) 116 (B.C.S.C.) at paragraph 52 one finds the following:

> Although the phrase "good faith" always contains a component of honesty, it often connotes additional qualities depending on the circumstance in which it is used. In my view, the requirement of good faith mandates genuineness, realism and reasonableness both subjectively and objectively.

[19] Lowe, Re, 2004 ABQB 255 (CanLII), 2004 ABQB 255 (Romaine J.) concerned a modest balance owing on a student loan of a bankrupt, the head of a family of eight. He ran a successful business. The family income was well in excess of $100,000. It was observed they lived very well - two cars, several computers, involvement in sports, the expenses for which were very high. He never made voluntary payments on the student loan in question. He spent his money on family priorities. The point made in this case is that, although it is important that children be given access to sports, cultural activities etc., good faith requires that one's priorities reasonably reflect community standards. Put another way, a certain life style is necessary to earn a living and be a part of a community, and children should be able to participate in community activities, sports, etc., but the expenditures must be reasonable; extravagance is not acceptable. This observation applies to both the bankrupt's good faith and ability to pay.

[20] In Cardwell, Re, 2006 SKQB 164 (CanLII), 2006 SKQB 164, Registrar Herauf was first concerned with whether Subsection 178(1.1) relief was available to one who had made a consumer proposal. He determined that it did, but questioned whether making such was indicative of good faith. He said:

> 55.To put it bluntly, I have not been convinced that the applicant has satisfied the requirements in subsection 178(1.1) of the Act. The applicant made no attempt to make any payment until compelled to do so by enforcement action brought against him. He did not take advantage of any interest relief mechanisms. While I certainly appreciate the effort by the applicant to complete a Consumer Proposal I cannot equate that effort as a show of good faith. It was judgment enforcement that prompted the Consumer Proposal and not a genuine effort by the applicant to pay down this debt.
> 56. I also agree with the respondent's submission that the applicant is gainfully employed in a profession for which he received a student loan funded education. Furthermore, he will be employed in that area for the foreseeable future. The applicant earns substantial remuneration for this work. To allow the application in the present circumstances would make a farce of this provision.

[21] In Fournier, Re, 2009 Carswell Ont. 3522, Registrar Nettie considered the need for the applicant to have acquired a new automobile when it was apparent that she could be well served by public transit, as she lived and worked in central Toronto. He said:

> 14. When what apparently gives in her budget at the same time that the car is leased are the payments to the student loans, I find this not to be acting in good faith in respect of those loans. No evidence was offered of any real exploration of taking public transit, or of keeping the old car, either of which would have permitted continued or increased payments on the student loans, and I draw the adverse inference that either of those options could have resulted in money being paid under the loans, but that the Applicant chose to have a new car for reasons personal to herself, and not in keeping with her obligation to act in good faith to these two loan programs.
> 15. Turning to the second part of the test, financial difficulty, I find that while the Applicant certainly appears to be in financial difficulty, her present difficulty is of her own choosing - the car. But for that new car, which increases her regular transit costs from approximately $200.00 per month for bus passes to $800.00 or more, she would be able to make her support payments and pay something to the student loans.

[22] Analysis - Good Faith

Mr. Lundrigan has not benefitted from the education acquired with the money borrowed. The technology behind it is now stale. The asset he acquired with the loans in now of little, if any, value to him.

[23] One might criticize him for abandoning his studies with only six months left in the course. However, one must consider the situation he was in. In addition to these loans he was confronted with the debts he assumed from his previous relationship. No doubt he was being pursued by creditors more aggressive than the student loan authorities. He was a person with limited qualifications in an acknowledged depressed economic area. His father was willing to help him with the assumed debts. He let him stay at home free, so that from a modest income he was able to repay them, no doubt with his father seeing that such happened as quickly as possible. His father's generosity did not extend to the student loans. He had done his part. It might be argued that he preferred these creditors to his student loan creditors. I do not see this as a strong argument. He managed what he could with limited income. His father's help was limited.

[24] One can second guess what he did. Maybe he could have made a few more payments, but with his limited income the amount available would not be significant. In the situation he found himself I do not see that he can be accused of acting unreasonably. There is no suggestion of extravagance on his part nor of dishonesty. With the birth of his children and with his limited income I see no basis for suggesting that he should be paying anything on these loans to prove that he has been acting in good faith.

[25] As to the period before his children's birth, there is nothing before me to suggest that he was not acting in good faith. He made some payments. He discharged the other loans, which would not have been possible without his father's help and discipline. There would have been little, if anything, left over.

[26] Although the respondent has suggested bad faith on Mr. Lundrigan's part, and one must be careful in this regard, no real incidents of it have been proved. The question is simply - Has Mr. Lundrigan, considering all the circumstances and looking at the total picture, acted in good faith?

[27] He found himself in debt because of personal misfortune. He was fortunate that his father offered to help him out. He would not help him with the student loan, but at least he was relieved of the greater part of his indebtedness. There were few options for him. He did what he could, maybe not perfectly. He would not have had any significant surplus income prior to the birth of his children, and certainly has had none since. The most he could find for the student loans would be very little.

[28] Some flexibility and generosity regarding human nature has to be given in determining whether one has acted in good faith. One must look at his actions and ask whether he has he acted in good faith. His resources have been limited. To act in good faith does not require perfection. I think he, on the whole, has acted with honesty and reasonableness. I am thus satisfied that he has acted with the good faith required of him.

[29] Analysis - Financial Difficulty

As to financial difficulty, the household monthly income is approximately $3,000.00. The Superintendent's Standard for a family of four is currently $3,680.00. There is no reasonable expectation of any significant increase in the family income. He and his wife have two young children to raise on a modest income. Their circumstances are such that I am quite satisfied that they will continue to have financial difficulty and be unable to pay off these loans.

[30] Conclusion

He is entitled to the relief provided by Subsection 178(1.1) of the BIA.

In the matter of the bankruptcy of Henry John Wale
Ontario Court of Justice (General Division) [In Bankruptcy] O'Connor J.
Judgment – November 29,1996.

Mona Anis, for Applicant.
Ross Thompson, for Bankrupt.
Harold Poultney, Q.C., for Trustee.
(Doc. Owen Sound 35-063684)

[1] November 29, 1996. O'CONNOR J.:–Henry John Wale's assignment in bankruptcy was date-stamped by the Official Receiver an hour and a half before the commencement of his family law trial. His former wife brings this motion, under s. 181 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, to annul the bankruptcy and to vest his property in her pending the outcome of the family law trial, or to exempt her claims from the usual stay of creditor proceedings under s. 69.3, and other relief. She argues his filing was motivated solely by his desire to defeat her family law claims and was an abuse of the process of the court. He says he had no such intention, he is an "insolvent person", as defined by the act and is entitled to its' protection.

History of the proceedings

[2] Ms. Wale commenced family law proceedings by application on August 11, 1994. The parties were divorced in October 1995 and he has remarried. On December 15, 1995 McKay J., made an interim order, inter alia, restraining Mr. Wale from dissipating assets except in the ordinary course of business. At the outset of the trial on October 16, 1996, Ms. Wale sought an order declaring Mr. Wale in contempt for breach of the interim order, alleging he had sold his inventory and tools, removed all the furnishings from the matrimonial home and attempted to place other assets out of her reach. The court was also advised Mr. Wale had attended on a trustee in bankruptcy the previous week and filed an assignment late Friday afternoon, October 13, 1996. It was received and date-stamped by the Official Receiver at 8:30 am, October 16, 1996, the first day of trial. After one day's evidence and argument the matter was adjourned to October 28, 1996 to permit Ms. Wale to bring this motion to annul the bankruptcy assignment. Pending return of the matter, I ordered Mr. Wale's interest in the matrimonial home and all his assets be held in trust, the contents of the home be returned to it, that he make the mortgage and other payments, that Ms. Wale may occupy the home and the parties cooperate in selling it.

[3] The annulment motion was served on the parties, the trustee and all the creditors. Upon return of the motion the parties and the trustee were represented by counsel. None of the creditors attended or was represented. Pending this ruling I ordered several measures intended to preserve the status quo, including postponing the creditors meeting and requiring Mr. Wale deliver to the trustee $4500 (part of what he received on the sale of his inventory), out of which the trustee is required to pay the mortgage and other household expenses.

Evidence Summary

[4] The Wales lived together and were married for a total of eighteen years. He is a skilled cabinet-maker, specializing in custom-built kitchens. They developed a successful business, first designing and constructing pine furniture and then building and installing kitchens. They built a workshop and showroom behind their home in Chatsworth. She did the books and some of the sales and customer relations work and he built and installed the kitchens. During the several years before their separation in May, 1994 the business prospered and the Wales lived comfortably. At separation she moved out and he stayed in the matrimonial home and continued to run the business. She has one daughter living with her and he has a son and daughter living with him. In October 1995 they were divorced and he has remarried. Ms. Wale's claims in the matrimonial action include child and spousal support and an unequal division of the matrimonial property.

[5] Although it is difficult to determine exact figures for the business because some of it was done for cash, its' reported net incomes for the several years before separation were:

Year ended	Net income
February 1990	$73,072
February 1991	$44,182
February 1992	$8,540

Digitized by Google

February 1993	$27,682
February 1994	$30,575

[6] He says that his business declined severely during 1995 and 1996. He was forced to declare bankruptcy, the close timing to the family law trial being merely coincidental. His reported net incomes for the years after separation were:

Year ended	Net Income
December 1995	$(15,334)

[7] However during a part of the year prior to his declaration Mr. Wale continued paying in excess of $1,500 per month against the mortgage, an accelerated rate of about three times that required by the bank About a week prior to the commencement of the family law trial Mr. Wale met with Richard Burnside, a trustee in bankruptcy. Mr. Burnside advised him an assignment would stay all creditors claims, including those of Ms. Wale, except for support. In the week prior to his declaration Mr. Wale removed all his tools and equipment from his workshop. They were appraised at $18,915 and are security for a line of credit with Scotiabank of about the same amount. He sold his inventory for $8,500 and used this money to pay some creditors and his trustees' fee, $750 to board his dog and cat and he kept $4,500 for "'Room and board for 3 children @ $1500 each". He took from the home all the furnishings and contents, appraised at $8896, and stored them at an unknown location. He left a mobile 4' x 6' sign at the bottom of the driveway, on Hwy. 10, which read, "Joyce Wale Your Kids Lost Their Home God Bless You. Closed Sorry".

[8] Although he says he lost money over 1996 and is unable to obtain credit to carry on his business, it appears he has been doing a considerable cash business. His trade creditors are owed less than $5700. When confronted with business records Ms. Wale found in the garbage after he moved out, he admitted receiving $17,885.27 in September and October of 1996. When he filed his assignment he had orders for at least five kitchen projects and had received deposits from four of these customers, totalling $3800. Ms. Wale says his usual practice was to take deposits of about 20% of the value of a project before starting it. Projecting the 20% figure, the deposits are evidence of orders for work worth about $19,000. His 1956 MGA sportscar was appraised at $9000 and a lawn tractor at $1200. He claims both are held by a repairman who is owed much of their values.

[9] In his Statement of Affairs, Mr. Wale declares assets of $157,000 and debts of $105,800. However, the values he placed on some of the assets are less than the appraised values mentioned above. Using the appraised values and including the cash he received for the inventory, his assets would total about $19,000 more than declared. Mr. Wale argues this figure may be decreased by an overstatement of the value of some assets, e.g. the home by $7000 and his tools by $1000.

[10] He declared income for himself and new wife of $1593 per month and expenses of $4428.82. However, the declared income does not take into account the $17,855.27 received in September and October, and the expenses appear to be inflated in that they include house taxes, mortgage and other expenses which he has not paid and has no intention of paying, as he had abandoned the house before the assignment.

[11] In summary, Mr. Wale moved out of the house, stored his furniture and tools, discontinued producing kitchens despite a backlog of orders which had been partly paid for, sold his inventory to obtain cash and stopped paying the mortgage and other expenses, apparently prepared to let the house be sold under a power of sale.

[12] Particularly telling of Mr. Wale's scheming are his plans to accelerate his loan payments to the Scotiabank once he finalized the divorce proceedings, as confirmed in the bank's letter to him, and a handwritten note on a bill to him from a real estate appraiser, "Okay to pay after court case".

The Parties' Positions

[13] Ms. Wale argues the purpose of the bankruptcy filing was obvious. Mr. Wale intended to stop the family law trial from proceeding in any meaningful way by removing the couples' assets from the reach of the court and Ms. Wale's claim for an unequal division of them. She points out that even he now admits his assumption he could no longer carry on the business may have been incorrect. He was determined to move anything movable out of her reach and devalue or destroy anything immovable, i.e. the house and shop, by allowing it to be sold under power of sale.

[14] Mr. Wale and his trustee argue there was nothing improper in his assignment immediately before the trial. He met the definition of an insolvent person. He had debts over $1000, he was "...unable to meet his obligations as they generally become due..." and he had "...ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business...". He had a right to avail himself of the act's protection against all his creditors, including Ms. Wale, who has no special status as his former wife. To grant the annulment would give Ms. Wale a preference over other creditors, which the Court ought not do. The filing in advance of the trial would actually assist the court by apprising it of his true financial circumstances. Annulment is a rarely granted remedy reserved only for cases of clear fraud or abuse of the process of the court. These circumstances do not exist here, he and his trustee argue.

Analysis

[15] S. 181 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act reads:

> (1) Where, in the opinion of the court, a receiving order ought not to have been made or an assignment ought not to have been filed, the court may by order annul the bankruptcy.
> (2) Where an order is made under subsection (1), all sales, dispositions of property, payments duly made and acts done theretofore by the trustee or other person acting under his authority, or by the court, are valid, but the property of the bankrupt shall vest in such person as the court may appoint, or, in default of any appointment, revert to the bankrupt for all the estate or interest of the trustee therein on such terms and subject to such conditions, if any, as the court may order.

[16] The jurisdiction of this court, sitting as a bankruptcy court, is limited by the special rules and procedures set out in the Act. The court has no authority, either on an interim or permanent basis to stay an assignment. However, the Act does give the court authority to annul a bankruptcy. Kalau v. Dahl (1985), 57 C.B.R. (N.S.) 296 (Alta. Q.B.).

[17] An annulment will be granted only where it is shown either the debtor was not an insolvent person when he made the assignment or where it is shown that the debtor abused the process of the court or committed a fraud on his creditors.

Was Mr. Wale an insolvent person when he made the assignment?

[18] An insolvent person is defined in s. 2:

> "insolvent person" means a person who is not bankrupt and who resides or carries on business in Canada, whose liabilities to creditors provable as claims under this Act amount to one thousand dollars, and
> (a) who is for any reason unable to meet his obligations as they generally become due,
> (b) who has ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business as they generally become due, or
> (c) the aggregate of whose property is not, at a fair valuation, sufficient, or, if disposed of at a fairly conducted sale under legal process, would not be sufficient to enable payment of all his obligations, due and accruing due.

[19] Here, Mr. Wale's liabilities exceeded $1000 when he made the assignment. They totalled at least $105,000, and more, if the repair accounts for the sportscar and the lawn tractor are valid. He satisfies the preamble requirement.

[20] Subsections (a), (b) and (c) of the definition are disjunctive. If he has debts exceeding $1000 a person claiming insolvency must show either (a) he is unable to meet his obligations as they generally become due or (b) he has ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business or (c) establish his assets, if sold, would not yield sufficient money to pay his debts. Mr. Wale does not rely on ss.(c), as his assets, even allowing for devaluation caused by a quick or forced sale of them, would appear to exceed his liabilities.

[21] He argues he complies with both ss.(a) and (b). However, in considering ss.(a) it appears he had sufficient cash flow in the September and October of this year to meet his obligations as they became due. He received over $17,800, part of which arose from the sale of his inventory, a finished kitchen and part from the receipt of deposits from new orders. His trade debts were about $5700. He had orders for four or five kitchens or smaller jobs which would have produced further income. He declared personal living expenses of $4427 per month, and his loan payment to the Scotiabank was $500 per month. He clearly had an ability to meet his obligations as they generally became due. He simply chose not to do so. He does not meet the criteria under ss.(a).

[22] Mr. Wale had ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business as they generally became due. The cheques he wrote in payment of some of his trade creditors were returned NSF and he has not replaced them. Perhaps better organization of his affairs or the use of money he held as cash and put to personal use would have permitted payment of some or all of the trade creditors. However, unlike ss.(a) which requires the debtor to show an inability to meet obligations, ss.(b) requires only that the debtor "has ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business...". Unlike ss.(a) there is no requirement in ss.(b) for the debtor to show and thus no need to investigate his inability to make payments. If he has ceased paying current obligations, which he had, he meets the criteria of this sub-section. I must assume the reference by parliament to a debtor's "inability" in ss.(a) and not in ss.(b) is intentional and the easier test in the business oriented subsection, i.e.ss.(b), was imposed for a specific reason.

[23] Mr. Wale qualifies as an insolvent person, if only marginally so, and was therefore entitled to make an assignment in bankruptcy, unless in doing so he abused the process of the court or committed a fraud on his creditors.

Was there an abuse of the court's process?

[24] Numerous cases conclude that the debtor's motive in making an assignment is not generally relevant. There is nothing unlawful in declaring bankruptcy for the sole purpose of defeating the claims of one's creditors. Irving Oil Co. v. Murphy (1962), 5 C.B.R. (N.S.) 203 (P.E.I. S.C.). One of the objectives of bankruptcy legislation is to permit the debtor, in the words of Evershed M.R. "to protect himself from the evils which he might otherwise suffer". Re Dunn, [1949] 2 All E.R. 388 (C.A.). However, this general principle must always be tempered by the caveat that fraud or abuse of the process will permit a court to annul the assignment. In Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, by Holden and Morawetz, Third Edition, Vol 2, at page 6-107, the learned authors say:

> The court must consider the rights not only of the debtor and of the creditors but also the rights of the public. A bankrupt should not be permitted to benefit from his own turpitude.

[25] In Blaxland v. Fuller reflex, (1990), 2 C.B.R. (3d) 125 (B.C. S.C.), Donald J. of the B.C. S.C. [In Bankruptcy], said at page 127: "If, however, the conduct is tainted by bad motives, then the Court remains able to annul a bankruptcy under s. 181 of the Bankruptcy Act".

[26] Under s. 181 the Court has a wide discretion when considering an annulment application. An exhaustive review of the circumstances surrounding the assignment should be made by the Court. There is no single test or principle to be applied. The test is flexible and fact specific. The debtor's motive is the primary consideration is determining abuse of process or fraud. After considering whether the debtor is an insolvent person some of the questions the court might pose to ascertain the debtor's motive are:

> (1) Is the debtor's financial situation genuinely overwhelming or could it have been managed?
> (2) Was the timing of the assignment related to another agenda or was bankruptcy inevitable in the near or relatively near furture?
> (3) Was the debtor forthcoming in revealing his situation to his creditors or did he hide assets or prefer some creditors over others?
> (4) Did the debtor convert money or assets to himself which would otherwise have been assets in the bankruptcy?
> (5) What had been the debtor's relationship with his creditors, particularly his major ones? Was it such that they might have assisted him, if he had approached them, by granting time or terms of repayment or had any goodwill been destroyed by past unfulfilled promises?
> (6) Are there other relationships–business partnerships shareholder arrangements, spousal, competitors for an asset, or simply personal associations which could cast light on a possible bad faith motive for making an assignment?

[27] In Re Good reflex, (1991), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 12 (Ont. Bktcy.), Rosenberg J. of the Ontario Court (General Division) annulled a bankruptcy where he found the husband in a bitter family law dispute filed an assignment because he was "... determined to destroy himself and all of his assets rather than allow his wife the benefit of any of those assets... In my view, a clear case of abuse of process has been established."

Conclusion

[28] Here, Mr. Wale's motives and conduct compel the Court to exercise its discretion under s. 181 to annul the assignment. He barely meets the definition of an insolvent person. With a modicum of effort and good intentions on his part he could easily have worked his way through his less than formidable financial problems. He was on good terms with Scotiabank, a major creditor which had agreed to reduced payments on its fully secured loan until after his matrimonial difficulties were settled. His mortgage to National Trust, upon which he had been paying three times the required amount within the year prior to the assignment, was current. His trade debts were only $5700 among five creditors with whom he had worked for years. He made no approaches to his mortgagee or his trade creditors to reduce or postpone parts or all of their accounts. The timing of the assignment, the day of his family law trial, is not coincidental, nor motivated by a desire to assist the Court. The visceral antipathy toward his former wife, as evidenced by the mobile sign he left at the property, the holy war that has raged between them since separation, his egregious conduct in selling assets and pocketing the cash shortly prior to the assignment, contrary to an order of the Court, and his removing and hiding the contents of the matrimonial home all overwhelmingly demonstrate male fides by him. I have little difficulty concluding he made his assignment with the intention of removing assets from the reach of the Court and his former wife so as to frustrate her claim for an unequal division of them. The assignment was an abuse of the process of the bankruptcy court and a fraud on at least one of his creditors, his former wife.

COUNSEL:

C. D. O'Brien, Esq., for J. Gordon Hutchison.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE CHIEF JUSTICE McGILLIVRAY

[1] This is an application to quash an appeal to the Court of Appeal of Alberta.

[2] Two arguments were advanced:

(1) that the appellant had no appeal as of right under Section 163 of The Bankruptcy Act; and

(2) that the appeal is an abuse of the process in that the very matter has earlier been the subject of a decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta.

[3] Briefly, the course of events leading up to this application is as follows:

[4] The trustee in bankruptcy was appointed shortly after the voluntary assignment in bankruptcy in early March 1971. A proposal to creditors by Mr. Elias to carry on the business of the bankrupt was rejected by the inspectors on April 21st, 1971, and the major asset of the bankrupt (a fully-equipped seismic vessel) was sold for a monetary consideration and the relinquishment of the claims of two creditors. By December 21st, 1971, the estate was substantially administered.

[5] On September 29th, 1975, Mr. Elias made application for:

(1) an order annulling the bankruptcy pursuant to Section 151 (1) of The Bankruptcy Act;

(2) Leave to commence an action against the trustee pursuant to Section 186 of The Bankruptcy Act.

Digitized by Google

The application was dismissed.

[6] An appeal to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta from this dismissal was itself dismissed on June 16th, 1976. In March, 1980, the appellant applied again to a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench for leave to sue the trustee and for an order pursuant to Section 157 (5) of The Bankruptcy Act to review, rescind or vary the order of September 29th, 1975, insofar as it was necessary for the Court to grant the leave sought. Section 157 (5) reads as follows:

> "157. ....
> (5) Every court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction..."

[7] The application was dismissed by Waite, J. on March 21st, 1980. On March 28th, 1980, a notice of appeal was filed, no leave to appeal having been obtained pursuant to Section 163 (e) of The Bankruptcy Act.

[8] The application to quash, as mentioned, is brought on the ground that no appeal as of right lies under Section 163 and that the purported appeal is an abuse of the process.

[9] Sections 163 and 164 of The Bankruptcy Act read as follows:

> "163. Unless otherwise expressly provided an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from any order or decision of a judge of the court in the following cases:
> (a) if the point at issue involves future rights;
> (b) if the order or decision is likely to affect other cases of a similar nature in the bankruptcy proceedings;
> (c) if the property involved in the appeal exceeds in value five hundred dollars;
> (d) from the grant of or refusal to grant a discharge of the aggregate unpaid claims of creditors exceed five hundred dollars;
>
> (e) in any other case by leave of a judge of the Court of Appeal..."
> "164. The decision of the Court of Appeal upon any appeal is final and conclusive unless special leave to appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of Canada is granted by that court."

[10] The jurisdiction of this Court to hear an appeal is conferred by S. 163 of the Bankruptcy Act. As was said in In re Solloway Mills & Co.; Ex parte Solloway, 16 C.B.R., 161; (1935) O.R. 37:

> "The winding-up is a proceeding in bankruptcy and insolvency over which the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction, not only as to substantive law but also as to procedure.... it is a general principle that appellate jurisdiction in this Court exists only where that jurisdiction, is specifically conferred by statute. The Parliament of Canada has expressly stated in sec. 103 of The Winding-up Act, the three cases in which an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal. Under the maxim mentio unius exclusio alterius these three cases are the only cases in which this Court has jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from a single judge."

[11] These observations apply equally to the jurisdiction conferred on the Court of Appeal under The Bankruptcy Act. It is plain, then, that the appellant must bring himself within one of the five subsections of Section 163.

[12] It will be seen that Subsections (b), (d) and (e) are not applicable, and the only questions in issue before us are whether or not Subsections (a) - "future rights" and (c) - "property involved in the appeal exceeds $500.00" -- confer jurisdiction upon the Court to hear the appeal.

[13] The appellant firstly contends that the point in issue involves future rights, those rights being, according to the appellant Elias' brief:

> "... the damages for which the Appellants in the case at Bar seek Leave to sue."

The appellant relies upon two decisions. The first is Re J. McCarthy & Sons Co. of Prescott Limited (1916) O.L.R. 3. In this case leave was given to a creditor of a company in liquidation to prosecute an action against the company in liquidation instead of proving its claim in the winding-up proceedings. The liquidator appealed, and a preliminary question arose as to whether the Court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. The Court stated that it was difficult to perceive how "future rights" were directly involved, but concluded that authorities cited required a wide interpretation of the words "future rights"; and that there was indirectly involved the right of trial by ordinary methods involving future possible trial by jury and future unrestricted rights of appeal and other such like rights to the ordinary litigant. The Court also held that as the amount being claimed was some $3,000.00, it could be said indirectly that the property involved in the appeal exceeded in value $500.00.

[14] The second case relied upon by the appellant is that of In re Kern Agencies Ltd. 12 C.B.R., 279. In this case, a proposal was submitted through a trustee in bankruptcy which the majority of the creditors had accepted. Application was made to the Court for approval. That approval was refused. The trustee appealed. A motion was launched for an order quashing the appeal on the ground that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction. A right of appeal was given if:

> "... the question to be raised on the appeal involved future rights."

The Court there held that it could not distinguish the case from cases in which it had been held that an appeal lies from a refusal of a winding-up order under The Winding-Up Act, where, again, future rights were a condition of jurisdiction. One such case was In re Union Fire Insur. Co. (1886) 13 O.A.R., 268. Osler, J.A. is reported as follows:

> "It was argued that there was no right of appeal from the order in question under section 78 of the Act of 1882. That section provides 'that any one dissatisfied with an order of the Court may appeal (by leave of a Judge of the Court), in Ontario to the Court of Appeal. Provided that in the question to be decided on the appeal future rights are involved'.
> The question here is, whether the winding-up order now made shall stand, and that seems to me very clearly to involve the future rights of the creditors and shareholders of the company, which are directly affected by the winding-up proceedings which may take place under the order."

[15] I confess to difficulty in perceiving what exactly Parliament sought to do by providing for an appeal without leave in a case involving future rights while requiring leave in cases which do not involve future rights. Indeed,. I find the authorities leave me in a state of uncertainty as to what a future right is at all, leave alone what there is about a future right that would require a treatment of cases involving future rights different from cases that do not involve future rights. Perhaps a case which directly challenges the authority of a trustee to act in a particular way which will be a recurring situation with other trustees in other cases may be a case involving future rights, but certainly no element of that sort exists in the present case involving, as it does, specific complaints of fact.

[16] In the McCarthy case, it was said that future rights were involved in giving a creditor leave to sue instead of proving its claim in the bankruptcy. The Court said that mode of trial i.e. by jury or otherwise, or unrestricted rights of appeal were future rights. If future proceedings involve "future rights" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, it is difficult to think of any case in which it could not be said that future rights were involved. I am unable to agree with the decision in the McCarthy case.

[17] The Kern Agencies decision is to my mind distinguishable from the McCarthy case. It can at least be argued that the bankruptcy or a winding-up will affect the rights of creditors or shareholders in the future and from that point of view are rights which are not presently existing.

[18] A more recent case where facts more closely resembled those alleged in the case at bar, is the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal in In re Bankruptcy of Dominion Foundry Co. Ltd.; Continental Forwarding Ltd. (Creditors) v. Canadian Credit Men's Association (trustee) reflex, (1965) 51 W.W.R., 679 (Man. C.A.). In this case the original motion in the Trial Court sought an order to set aside the sale of assets of Dominion Foundry Co. Ltd. It sought an injunction to restrain the trustee in bankruptcy from completing the sale, and it sought a directive that there be further and more thorough advertising. The Chambers Judge refused the application, finding that it could not be said that the sale was improvident, nor that the inspectors or the trustee were guilty of fraud, or acted in bad faith and contrary to the interests of the creditors. An appeal from that order was taken.

[19] Section 150 of The Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, ch. 14, covered the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal. That section is identical to the present Section 163 of The Bankruptcy Act.

[20] The Court concluded that neither future rights nor property involved in the appeal in excess of $500.00 was involved, and that the Court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Mr. Justice Guy, who delivered the Judgment of the Court, referred to numerous authorities which he had considered and said this at page 682 with regard to "future rights" and with regard to whether "the property involved in the appeal exceeds in value $500.00":

> "I have read these decisions and others. Many deal with the Winding-Up Act, RSC, 1952, ch. 296, rather than the Bankruptcy Act, but in the main they apply the same basic principles. What can be gleaned from them, amongst other things, is this: Legal rights either exist or do not exist, unless the peculiar circumstances of the case clearly indicate that future rights will be affected; and as to the amount involved (whether or not it is over $500) the trend has been away from the Cushing case, supra, which held that there must be $500, specifically, in controversy-and in favour of the principle that the appeal may be heard if the amount in jeopardy is $500 or more; and further, that 'value of the property' means the same thing as 'amount involved' in these cases; but all the cases which deal with the aspect of procedure indicate that the conduct of the court-appointed trustee does not involve money or property within the meaning of sec. 150 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act."

[21] The decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal then concluded with this statement:

> "In the motion before us, we have passed beyond the realm of common law civil dispute. We are now under the statute law of the Bankruptcy Act. The company is actually found to be bankrupt and has been placed by the court in the hands of a trustee with his attendant inspectors advising and assisting in the making of decisions relating to the duties imposed upon the trustee. The methods employed by the trustee and his inspectors to dispose of the assets of the bankrupt have been called in question. This is surely a matter of procedure. With respect, I adopt the language of Macdonald, C.J.A. of the British Columbia court of appeal in In re Coast Shingle Mill Co., supra, where he says at p. 537:
> > 'There are a number of cases bearing upon different facts, but on this fact they seem to agree, that where the question is a question of procedure it does not fall within either (a) or (c) of subsec. (2) of sec. 74; that is to say, no question of future rights arises, nor does any question of a specific sum of money.' "

[22] A right in a legal sense exists when one is entitled to enforce a claim against another or to resist the enforcement of a claim advanced by another. A present right exists presently; a future right is inchoate in that while it does not now exist, it may arise in the future. For the adjective "future" to have any meaning, it cannot refer to that which presently exists. Does the claim alleged against the trustee presently exist? It is a current allegation of existing facts though they may be procedurally blocked by a need to obtain leave to assert the claim.

[23] To give "future" the meaning that includes that which a litigant may obtain by success in litigation in the future is to say that a right of appeal exists in all cases. Any claim advanced is, in that sense, a future right to a judgment which does not yet exist. It would seem to me for clause (a) of Section 163 to have any meaning that it must refer to rights which could not at the present time be asserted but which will come into existence at a future time.

[24] It is sufficient to say that in my opinion a presently existing right to seek leave to sue a trustee in respect of presently existing facts is not a future right and the appellant does not bring the case within subsection (a) of Section 163 of the Bankruptcy Act.

[25] I then turn to the question of whether it can be said that "the property involved in the appeal exceeds in value $500.00" within the meaning of subsection (c) of Section 163.

[26] It is to be kept in mind that the appeal is from the Chambers Judge's refusal to grant to the appellant leave to sue for damages for allegedly wrongful acts in the course of his trusteeship. The case is akin on this score to the Dominion Foundry Company case which I have already quoted and in which it was held that Section 163 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act was not applicable.

[27] The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Gatineau Power Company and Freeman F. T. Cross 1929 S.C.R. 35 appears to be in point. In this case the Gatineau Power Company applied to a commission for authority to expropriate. The commission refused the authorization applied for. An appeal lay to the Court of King's Bench with leave of a judge of that Court. An application for leave to appeal was granted. The full Court of Appeal subsequently quashed the order for leave. The Gatineau Power Company then served notice of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and an application was made to quash the appeal for want of jurisdiction. Mr. Justice Rinfret stated the issue as being:

> "Whether an appeal lies to the Supreme Court of Canada from a judgment rendered in a provincial court where the appeal to that court was quashed for want of jurisdiction."

One of the requirements for appeal to the Supreme Court was that:

> "the amount or value of the matter in controversy in the appeal exceeds the sum of two thousand dollars."

Mr. Justice Rinfret said this:

> "Thus, the whole matter in controversy, even if traced back to the Commission - and we do not think it should be - is merely the right to have that body entertain an application for authority to expropriate. Such right is not appreciable in money. Still less so is the right of appeal to the Court of King's Bench which is the sole matter in controversy on the projected appeal here. The consequence of the authorization by the Commission might result in a proceeding in which the amount involved would exceed two thousand dollars; but the ultimate award on the expropriation is not the matter in controversy in this appeal? and, as was said in Lachance v. La Societe de Prets et de Placements de Quebec:
> > 'our jurisdiction does not depend on the possible consequences of a possible judgment.'
> We have no jurisdiction in this case as it now stands. The motion must be allowed and the appeal quashed with costs."

[28] I am of the view that the appellant does not bring himself within Section 163 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act and in the result the appeal must be quashed for want of jurisdiction.

[29] A further matter, in my opinion, stands in the way of the appellant. He earlier sought leave to sue the trustee. That leave was refused. That decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The point of jurisdiction apparently was not raised. The learned Chambers Judge in respect of the present application before him said this:

> "On a consideration of all of the material before me I am satisfied that:
> 1. The substantive allegations were before the first Court, at least in general terms, and the disposition of those allegations by that Court, as affirmed by the Court of Appeal, must be deemed a final and conclusive adjudication of them as against the applicant.
> 2. Apart from possibly minor details, the substantive allegations against the Trustee were within the awareness of the applicant at the time of the first application, and the evidence in support of them was either known to him or, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have been so known."

[30] The appellant, in renewing his application to sue the trustee, relied on Section 157 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act which I have quoted earlier and which I repeat for convenience:

> "157. ...
> (5) Every court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction..."

[31] While the language of this section is broad, it seems to me that it is designed to permit of a judge to deal with continuing matters in the bankruptcy so as not to be found by an earlier decision if faced by changing circumstances. Thus, while a judge might approve the appointment of a trustee, he at a future date might alter that order by appointing more than one trustee or removing a trustee. He might refuse a discharge to a bankrupt but later, having regard to then circumstances, vary that order so as to permit of a discharge on terms and he might again at a future date vary that order. Similarly, the manner of remuneration might from time to time be subject to variation and review. Against this, however, there is that type of case where a final adjudication has to be made. The claim of one class of creditors over another has to have priority. The question whether a particular piece of property forms part of the bankrupt's estate; the validity of the claim or the amount of the claim, are all matters which should be the subject of a final adjudication in respect of which an appeal with leave would lie, but surely, adjudication of claims of that sort cannot be the subject of repeated applications. There have been cases where an order disallowing a creditor's claim has been reviewed, but new evidence was available and it was apparently very cogent evidence, but I am of the view that by and large claims capable of final determination should not be the subject of repeated applications. The learned authors of Houlden and Morawetz Bankruptcy Law of Canada in thier 1980 revision of an earlier text, in dealing with this subject say this:

> "The power given by Sec. 157 (5) can only be applied in respect of judgments on interlocutory matters and not where a final judgment dealing with the rights of the parties has been given; in the latter type of situation an appeal under Sec. 163 is the proper remedy. A judgment dismissing a petition for a receiving order is a final judgment and an appeal under Sec. 157 (5) is the appropriate recourse: Traders Finance Corpn. Ltd. v. Garage Morrissett et Fils Ltee, (1960) Que. S.C. 712, 1 C.B.R. (N.S.) 267."

[32] In the circumstances as found by the learned Trial Judge, I am of the view that no right to review, rescind, or vary the earlier order refusing leave lies. In the result I am of the opinion that the appeal must be quashed for lack of jurisdiction. As the meaning to be attributed to future rights, in my mind at least, is obscure. I would direct that there be no costs.

Court of Appeal for British Columbia
Haywood Securities Ltd.
v
Stanley Walter Witwicki

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE HUTCHEON

1 The respondent, Stanley Walter Witwicki, made an assignment in bankruptcy on 29 April 1992. Under an amendment to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act R.S.C. 1985, C. B-3, effective 30 November 1992, he was entitled at the end of nine months to an automatic discharge from bankruptcy unless a notice of intended opposition was given prior to the expiration of the nine month period. One of the creditors, the appellant Haywood Securities Ltd., gave to the Trustee a written notice of opposition dated January 27, 1993. That notice was given properly to the trustee within the nine month period but the creditor failed to give the bankrupt the required notice pursuant to s. 168.1(1)(b).

> 168.1(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), the following provisions apply in respect of an individual bankrupt who has never before been bankrupt under the laws of Canada or of any prescribed jurisdiction:
> . . .
> (c) where a creditor intends to oppose the discharge of the bankrupt, the creditor shall give notice of the intended opposition , stating the grounds therefor, to the Superintendent, to the trustee and to the bankrupt at any time prior to the expiration of the nine month period immediately following the bankruptcy;

2 The only issue of significance on this appeal is whether the failure by the creditor to give notice to the bankrupt could be relieved against under the provision of s.187(9) of the Act.

> 187(9) No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

3 In allowing the appeal from the decision of Master Wilson, sitting as a registrar under the Bankruptcy Act, Mr. Justice Tysoe stated:

> It is my view that Registrar Wilson erred in relying on this section. The automatic discharge from bankruptcy is not a proceeding in bankruptcy within the meaning of s.187[9]. The intent of s.187[9] is to deal with the matter where the court has made an order in circumstances where notice may not have been properly given to all interested persons. That is not the type of situation here. The challenge here is not to say that a proceeding is invalid but to attempt to make an automatic discharge from bankruptcy invalid. As it stands, the automatic discharge from bankruptcy is valid.

4 Counsel for the creditor submitted that the "proceeding" in question was the giving of the notice of objection by the creditor. Because that notice was not given to the bankrupt as required by s.168.1(1)(c) the proceeding was "invalidated", that is deprived of legal efficacy. The failure to give notice was a defect in form or an irregularity and should be relieved against by the use of s.187(9). If the faulty notice is relieved against, the provisions of s.168.1(1)(f) do not apply because a creditor has opposed the discharge. Instead the provisions of s.168.1(1)(e) are applicable. I quote the relevant parts of the two subsections:

> 168.1(1)(e) where the Superintendent, the trustee or a creditor opposes the discharge of the bankrupt, the trustee shall forthwith apply to the court for an appointment for the hearing of the opposition in the manner referred to in sections 169 to 176....
> 168.1(1)(f) where the Superintendent, the trustee or a creditor has not opposed the discharge of the bankrupt in the nine month period immediately following the bankruptcy, then subject to subsection 157.1(3),
> (i)on the expiration of that nine month period, the bankrupt is automatically discharged,

5 With due respect to the chambers judge, I cannot agree with his reasoning that the challenge was confined to the automatic discharge. The challenge was to the proceeding that is provided for by s.168.1 of the Act in the nine month period immediately following the bankruptcy.

6 In my view, the question that has to be decided is whether the failure to give the notice of objection to the bankrupt was a matter of form or a matter of substance. If it is a matter of substance, the authorities are all to the effect that s.187(9) is not available to relieve against the failure; what is a matter of form and what is a matter of substance depends on the circumstances of each case. Re Roosenboom (1973), 18 C.B.R. 180 citing Re Little, (1924), 56 OLR 196, 5 CBR 244.

7 The effect of applying s.187(9) to relieve against the failure to give notice of objection to the bankrupt prior to the expiration of the nine month period is to place Witwicki back into bankruptcy. Between January 29, 1993 and July 1993 when he received a copy of a notice of motion from the Trustee, Witwicki was entitled to consider himself a discharged bankrupt and conduct himself accordingly. The change of status from that of a discharged bankrupt to that of an undischarged bankrupt is clearly a matter of substance and not form.

8 In my opinion, s.187(9) is not available to remedy the failure of the creditor to give notice of objection to the bankrupt.

9 For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DRAPEAU C.J.N.B.

[1] Under the Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "Act"), the portion of the bankrupt's earnings that exceeds reasonable living expenses may be attached and used to pay creditors in bankruptcy. It is common ground between the parties that the bankrupt's earnings do not constitute property divisible among creditors pursuant to section 67(1) of the Act and that proceedings to attach those earnings can only be brought under section 68. The leading case on point is Marzetti v. Marzetti, 1994 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 765.

[2] That said, on occasion, the Trustee lacks the information required to fix the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay out of his or her earnings in accordance with s. 68(3) and a constellation of circumstances operate to give rise to a real and substantial possibility that those earnings may dissipate. The question raised by the present appeal is whether, in those circumstances, s. 183(1) of the Act authorizes the Court of Queen's Bench to make an order granting the Trustee temporary control over the bankrupt's earnings, despite s. 68's silence on the subject. Section 183(1) is a provision of general application that invests the Court of Queen's Bench with such jurisdiction at law, and in equity, as will enable it to exercise original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy.

[3] In the case at bar, Justice Léger of the Court of Queen's Bench in a decision reported at [2003] N.B.J. No. 210 (Q.B.)(Q.L.), allowed the Trustee's application for relief under the Act and ordered that: (1) the revenues arising in 2003 from the appellant's crab-fishing license be paid directly to the Trustee; (2) the Trustee immediately pay all reasonable bona fide arm's length expenses arising out of the ordinary course of the fishing activities, including salaries; (3) the Trustee prepare a report for the benefit of the bankrupt and the creditors in bankruptcy of all revenues and expenses and then proceed in accordance with s. 68; and (4) any unresolved issues relating to the fishing activities, including reasonable expenses, be submitted for judicial determination.

[4] The appellant, Cyrenus Joseph Dugas, contends that Justice Léger lacked jurisdiction to make that order. In Mr. Dugas' submission, s. 68 constitutes a complete code for the Trustee's and the Court's jurisdiction over the bankrupt's earnings, and the provision does not authorize the making of an asset-preservation order of the kind made in the court below.

[5] Relying on Landry (Re) 2000 CanLII 16846 (ON CA), (2000), 192 D.L.R. (4th) 728 (Ont.C.A.), the Trustee counters that s. 68 only comes into play once it is possible to fix the amount to be paid out of earnings to the bankrupt's estate. The Trustee submits that where it is impossible to fix that amount, and the bankrupt's earnings are in need of protection for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy, the court may make an asset-preservation order, such as the order under appeal, effective until such time as the Trustee is able to make the determination under section 68(3).

[6] After hearing counsel for Mr. Dugas, the Court dismissed the appeal, with reasons to follow. These are the reasons.

The context

[7] On August 23, 2001, Peter Gaudet, Adam Gaudet, 508571 N.B. Ltd. and 100167 P.E.I. Inc. obtained a consent judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick against Mr. Dugas in the amount of $2,100,000. Under the terms of that judgment, Mr. Dugas was ordered to pay the sum of $50,000 forthwith and $2,050,000 within thirty days. The sum of $50,000 was paid, but Mr. Dugas defaulted on his obligation to pay the balance of $2,050,000. That debt remains outstanding in full.

[8] From April to October 2002, Mr. Dugas fished for crab, earning gross revenues in excess of $800,000. As noted, he did not pay down the judgment debt mentioned above.

[9] On October 27, 2002, following the end of the crab fishing season, Mr. Dugas made an assignment in bankruptcy for the general benefit of his creditors. The Trustee at the time, J.G. Touchie & Associates Ltd., filed with the Official Receiver, a copy of Mr. Dugas' Statement of Affairs. The only creditor listed in that document was Adam Gaudet who was shown as being owed $2,050,000.00.

[10] Under s. 68(3) of the Act, the Trustee is required to have regard "to the personal and family situation of the bankrupt" in fixing the amount that the latter is required to pay from earnings to the estate of the bankrupt. Form 65, entitled "Monthly Income and Expense Statement of the Bankrupt and the Family Unit and Information Concerning the Financial Situation of the Individual Bankrupt", is designed to assist the Trustee in assessing the bankrupt's personal and family situation.

[11] Mr. Dugas filed a Form 65 that indicated "0.00$" whenever a specific amount was to be provided. Thus, he specified "0.00$" for his net employment income, "0.00$" for the total monthly income of the family unit, "0.00$" for his monthly non-discretionary expenses, "0.00$" for the monthly non-discretionary expenses of the family unit, "0.00$" for his available monthly income, "0.00$" for the available monthly income of the family unit, "0.0%" for his portion of the available monthly family unit income and "0.00$" for the monthly surplus or (deficit) of the family unit.

[12] On November 1, 2002, Peter Gaudet, Adam Gaudet, 508571 N.B. Ltd. and 100167 P.E.I. Inc. filed proofs of claim. No other creditor, whether secured or unsecured, filed a proof of claim.

[13] The first meeting of creditors was held on November 19, 2002. At that time, PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. took over as Trustee and the list of creditors was expanded to include Peter Gaudet, 508571 N.B. Ltd. and 100167 P.E.I. Inc. On December 6, 2002, the first meeting of creditors reconvened and Mr. Dugas' examination began. At that time, Mr. Dugas testified that he had received an allocation of the snow crab quota for nearly every year since 1977 and that, in 2002, his gross income from crab-fishing amounted to $820,000.00, while the amount indicated in his tax return as taxable income was $287,000.73. Mr. Dugas disclosed, as well, that the expenses deducted from his gross income included the sum of $85,000 paid to his son, Serge, even though the latter had no direct involvement in fishing for crab. The meeting ended without Mr. Dugas' examination being completed.

[14] Mr. Dugas has since refused to submit to any further out-of-court examination by the Trustee.

[15] As mentioned, on May 27, 2003, Justice Léger allowed the Trustee's application and made the following order:

(a) That all revenues arising from Mr. Dugas' crab fishing licence for the year 2003 be paid directly to the Trustee;

(b) That the Trustee pay immediately all reasonable bona fide arm's length expenses arising out of the ordinary course of the fishing activities including salaries;

(c) That the Trustee prepare a report for the benefit of the Bankrupt and the Creditors of all revenues and expenses and then proceed according to the provisions of Section 68 of the Act; and

(d) That the hearing into the Trustee's motion resume on the 2nd day of July, 2003 at 1:30 p.m. in Bathurst, New Brunswick or at such other time as the parties may agree in order to determine all unresolved issues relating to the 2003 crab fishing activities including reasonable expenses.

[16] On May 29, 2003, Mr. Dugas filed a Notice of Appeal from Justice Léger's decision. That filing triggered the application of s. 195 and, as a result, all proceedings under Justice Léger's May 27, 2003 order were stayed until I made an order canceling that stay on June 6, 2003 (see Dugas (Re), [2003] N.B.J. No. 230 (C.A.)(Q.L.)).

[17] The parties agreed to adjourn sine die the hearing before Justice Léger scheduled for July 2, 2003. Neither party has sought directions from him with respect to the many "unresolved issues relating to the 2003 crab fishing activities including reasonable expenses".

Analysis and Decision

(a) Preliminary procedural issues

(i) Non-compliance with Rule 37.03(b)

[18] Mr. Dugas contests the Trustee's right to invoke s. 183(1) of the Act to buttress its submission in support of Justice Léger's jurisdiction. Mr. Dugas rightly points out that the Trustee's Notice of Motion does not refer to section 183(1). Rule 37.03(b) of the Rules of Court is clear on the subject. A Notice of Motion must state the grounds to be argued, including a reference to any statutory provision to be relied on (see Lloyd's of London v. Norris, [1998] N.B.J. No. 351 (C.A.) leave to appeal dismissed reflex, (1998) 218 N.B.R. (2d) 400 (S.C.C.) at para. 10; Waugh et al. v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp. et al. (2000), 224 N.B.R. (2d) 39 (C.A.) at paras. 11-14 and Doiron v. Cameron, [2003] N.B.J. No. 301 (Q.B.)(Q.L.) at paras. 14-15).

[19] There is, however, nothing in the record to indicate that counsel for Mr. Dugas in the court below - who was not his current counsel, Ms. Sivret - raised any objection on the ground of non-compliance with Rule 37.03(b). Moreover, and contrary to what was noted in passing in my June 6, 2003 reasons for judgment, the motion heard in the court below was not concerned solely with sections 67 and 68 of the Act. Indeed, the Notice of Motion's prayer for relief is worded broadly and invokes the full jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench under the Act. As well, the motion appears to have been heard and determined on that basis. In his reasons for judgment, at paras. 1 and 2, Justice Léger describes the relief sought in these terms:

> This motion is brought by the Trustee in Bankruptcy [PriceWaterHouseCoopers] Inc as trustee of the Bankrupt Cyrenus Joseph Dugas requesting an order that the revenues from the 2003 crab fishing season be declared the property of the Bankrupt and therefore divisible among the creditors pursuant to the provisions of section 67 and 68 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. B-3 (hereinafter "the Act"), as amended.
> The other remedies sought in the motion are that all revenues derived from the fishing activities be paid directly to the Trustee who shall fix the amount to be paid to the Estate of the Bankrupt in accordance with Section 68 of the Act, supra. (Emphasis added)

[20] In my view, there is every reason to bring s. 183(1) into the mix as a potential source of jurisdiction for the order under appeal.

(ii) Further evidence

[21] By motion, Mr. Dugas asks that this Court receive evidence as to matters that have occurred since Justice Léger's May 27, 2003 order. Under Rule 62.21 (2)(b), the Court may receive evidence of this nature if it is relevant to the issues requiring determination on appeal.

[22] The issue at hand is whether Justice Léger had jurisdiction to make the May 27, 2003 order. Evidence as to matters that have occurred since then is irrelevant to the determination of that issue. Accordingly, I would dismiss Mr. Dugas' motion and reject the proffered evidence.

(b) Scope of s. 183(1)

[23] In Sam Lévy & Associés Inc. v. Azco Mining Inc., 2001 SCC 92 (CanLII), [2001] 3 S.C.R. 978, at para. 17, the Court noted that, on its face, the intent of s. 183(1) is to attribute to the bankruptcy court "powers and duties co-extensive with Parliament's jurisdiction over 'Bankruptcy' under s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867 except insofar as that jurisdiction has been limited or specifically assigned elsewhere by Parliament itself." The Court went on to note, at para. 38, that the broad scope of authority conferred by s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to Parliament had "been passed along to the bankruptcy court in s. 183(1) of the Act, which confers correspondingly broad jurisdiction."

[24] In Landry (Re), the bankrupt had brought an action for wrongful dismissal against her former employer and had been proceeding through arbitration, when she was discharged under the Act. The bankrupt was successful at arbitration and prior to payment of the award, the Trustee brought an application for a declaration that any amount awarded for lost wages constituted property of the bankrupt that vested in the Trustee for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy. The Trustee submitted that vesting could occur by way of section 68. The motions judge rejected that submission on the ground, among others, that the Trustee had not followed the procedure set out in s. 68 for the making of a claim in respect to earnings.

[25] On appeal, it was argued that the Trustee was precluded from resorting to s. 68 because the procedure provided therein had not been followed. The Ontario Court of Appeal dealt with that issue, as follows at pp. 741-742:

> 6. Is the trustee precluded from resorting to s. 68 because the procedure set out thereunder has not been followed?
> [41] The motions judge was correct in noting that, before an application can be made to the court under s. 68(10) to fix the amount of the bankrupt's income that is payable to the estate of the bankrupt, the trustee must bring himself under the terms of that provision. As discussed earlier, by its terms, s. 68(10) effectively limits the number of applications to the court to those cases where the issue has not otherwise been resolved by consent or mediation in accordance with the established procedure. In this case, of course, it was impossible for the trustee to have followed this procedure since the arbitrator's award was not yet ascertained. Once the arbitrator's decision is made, the trustee will be in a position to fix the amount which, in its view, must be paid to the estate and the balance of the procedure set out in s. 68 can follow its course. Hence, the trustee's motion, insofar as it purports to be made under s. 68(10), is simply premature.
> [42] However, the trustee's motion was not made strictly under s. 68(10). It is apparent from the relief sought, which was mainly declaratory in nature, that the motion was brought with a view to preserving a potential asset in anticipation of a future determination of the parties' rights under s. 68. In my view, the motions judge erred in foreclosing any resort to s. 68 on the basis that the procedure set out thereunder had not been followed. At worst, the motion could have been dismissed as premature. [Emphasis added.]

[26] Viewing the Trustee's motion as one brought for the purpose of preserving a potential asset in anticipation of a future determination of the parties' rights under s. 68, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the motions judge had jurisdiction to direct that any monies awarded by the arbitrator as compensation for lost wages be paid into court until the parties' rights under s. 68 were determined. The Court allowed the appeal, and so ordered. Additionally in Cole (Re), [2001] N.S.J. 155 (Q.L.), at para. 41, Registrar Hill makes the following observations in connection with a yet-to-be adjudicated claim for lost income arising out of a motor-vehicle accident:

Digitized by Google

> ... If, prior to the amount of "income" to be received by the Bankrupt being determined, the Trustee becomes concerned that his ability to obtain any funds subject to a s. 68 order may be prejudiced for some reason, the Trustee may apply for an order such as that granted in Landry. In Landry the court ordered that any monies to be paid by the employer to the bankrupt as compensation for lost wages be paid into court pending resolution of the amount to be paid under s. 68.

[27] Courts should be chary of interpreting the Act's provisions in a manner inimical to the attainment of its objectives, chief among which is the equitable distribution of a bankrupt's assets among the creditors in bankruptcy (see Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, per Gonthier J., for the majority, at para. 7). In my view, the court's earnings-related jurisdiction under s. 183(1) is not limited to making an order directing their payment into court. Indeed, such an order would have been impractical in the case at hand. In my view, the scope of s. 183(1) is accurately delineated in Houlden & Morawetz, 2004 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, (Toronto: Carswell, 2004), at p. 774:

> For carrying out the purposes of the Act, there is deemed to be vested in the Bankruptcy Court the necessary power and jurisdiction to authorize and sanction acts required to be done by the trustee for the due administration and protection of the bankrupt estate, even though there is no specific provision in the Act expressly conferring such power and jurisdiction
> [Citations omitted.]

In that context, "bankrupt estate" is to be understood as including the bankrupt's "total income" within the meaning of section 68(1).

(c) Application to the case at hand

[28] I begin by noting that, in the court below, Mr. Dugas did not take issue with Justice Léger's jurisdiction to make the order under appeal. In fact, he was prepared to turn over to the Trustee 20% of the total income from his fishing operations in 2003. He suggested that the Trustee could then assess the amount to be given to him for reasonable living expenses in accordance with s. 68 of the Act. That said, Justice Léger could not acquire jurisdiction by consent: his capacity and authority to make the order under appeal must spring from the Act.

[29] In his reasons for judgment, Justice Léger makes the following observations:

(1) Historically, Mr. Dugas' crab fishing operations have generated substantial income over a very short period of time;

(2) Mr. Dugas is not a first-time bankrupt;

(3) The Trustee entertains serious doubts as to whether the expenses claimed in previous years by Mr. Dugas (in reduction of his gross income) were truly business-related;

(4) Mr. Dugas did not know the price of crab for the 2003 season. (In the affidavit that he filed in opposition to the Trustee's motion, Mr. Dugas asserted that the price could not be forecast because it would be influenced, to an unpredictable extent, by factors such as the exchange rate, the war in Iraq and "problems in North Korea").

[30] Justice Léger concluded that Mr. Dugas' earnings from crab-fishing were in need of protection and that "the best approach to ensure that the assets are protected is to order that all revenues from the 2003 crab fishing activities under the crab license # 23622 issued to the Bankrupt Cyrenus Dugas be paid directly to the Trustee [PriceWaterHouseCoopers] Inc." As noted, he went on to order that the Trustee prepare a "report for the benefit of the Bankrupt and the Creditors of all revenues and expenses and then proceed according to the provisions of Section 68 of the Act."

[31] Under s. 68(3), the Trustee must have regard for the bankrupt's personal and family situation in fixing the amount payable out of earnings to the bankrupt's estate. A duly completed Form 65 is essential if the Trustee is to competently perform his statutory mandate. Mr. Dugas failed, without justification, to complete Form 65 in any useful manner. Moreover, Mr. Dugas subsequently refused to fully comply with the Trustee's requests for financial information. Finally, the Trustee's doubts regarding the reliability of the financial data that Mr. Dugas did provide concerning his business operations in 2002 were far from fanciful and they led the Trustee to conclude that Mr. Dugas' 2003 earnings were in need of protection for the benefit of his creditors. In those circumstances, it was entirely proper for the Trustee to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for an asset-preservation order under section 183(1).

[32] Section 183(1) invests the Court of Queen's Bench with capacity and authority to make any order that will enable it to exercise its original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy. Under s. 183(1), the Court of Queen's Bench may authorize acts required "for the due administration and protection of the bankrupt estate, even though there is no specific provision in the Act expressly conferring such power and jurisdiction" (see Houlden & Morawetz, Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, at p. 774). In my view, nothing said in Marzetti contradicts that proposition. Any order designed to by-pass illegitimate obstacles to the due administration of the bankrupt's estate in accordance with the Act is authorized under section 183(1).

[33] The order under appeal falls squarely within the broad jurisdiction recognized by section 183(1). It was rendered having regard to the Trustee's inability to perform the mandate contemplated by s. 68 and the need to temporarily protect the bankrupt's earnings for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy. The order in question is both authorized by the Act and a judicious response to a practical problem whose genesis can be traced to the bankrupt.

Disposition

[34] For the reasons outlined above, the Court dismissed the appeal. There will be no order of costs.

FREEMAN, J.A.:
The respondent LaserWorks Computer Services Inc., a dealer in supplies for laser printers, made a proposal to its creditors under the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the BIA).
A competitor, Datarite, operating through the appellant 3004876 Nova Scotia Limited, acquired the claims of eighteen creditors and voted them over the objections of LaserWorks at the meeting of creditors, defeating the proposal. Only two of the remaining sixteen creditors opposed the proposal.
Acceptance required votes representing a majority in number and two-thirds in value of the class of unsecured creditors present in person or by proxy. The Registrar of Bankruptcy of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy, Tim Hill, found:

> Upon the vote being taken, fourteen creditors with a total claim value of $206,531.65 voted in favour of the proposal. Twenty creditors with a total claim of $140, 370.00 voted against the proposal. Thus 41% of creditors representing 59% of the claims voted pro, and 59% of the creditors with 40.5% of the claims voted con. The proposal was defeated, subject to the resolution of the objections before the court today.

At the hearing into the objections the Registrar, after hearing evidence from the appellant's solicitor Victor Goldberg, who was not counsel on the appeal, disallowed the appellant's votes. He found the proposal had been accepted by the votes of the other creditors. His decision was upheld by Justice Stewart on an appeal to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy.

Issues and Standard of Review
The overriding issue is whether the court's inherent supervisory jurisdiction should be invoked to interfere in a proposal to creditors under the BIA when it appears the statutory process is being used for purposes not contemplated by Parliament.
The appellant submits it was a true appeal before Justice Stewart, and not a hearing de novo, on the authority of Re McCulloch Estate 1992 CanLII 2799 (NS SC), (1992), 13 C.B.R. (3d) 201 Tr. Div.) and Cockfield Brown Inc. (Trustee of) v. Reseau de Television TVA Inc. (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 59 (Que. C.A.) On further appeal to this court the grounds are whether Justice Stewart erred in:
1. Failing to reverse the Registrar's finding that 18 creditors of LaserWorks assigned their rights to the appellant;
2. Sustaining the Registrar's finding that Datarite engaged in an improper purpose in acquiring and voting the claims of the 18 creditors;
3. Sustaining the Registrar's finding that the Appellant's purpose in acquiring and voting the claims was relevant; and
4. Concluding that there was an abuse on a minority of a class of unsecured creditors and that a duty in this respect was owed by the appellant.

An appeal lies to this court under s. 193 of the BIA which reads in part:

> 193. Unless otherwise expressly provided, an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from any order or decision of a judge of the court in the following cases:
> (a) if the point at issue involves future rights;
> ...
> (e) in any other case by leave of a judge of the court of appeal.

The appellants assert future rights are involved and no leave is necessary. The respondents take no issue with this. Neither is issue taken with the jurisdiction of the Registrar and Justice Stewart to deal with the matters in question pursuant to the BIA. The issue is whether they erred.
The appellant's submission with respect to the standard of review is that:

> . . . the Registrar's discretion will not be disturbed on appeal unless he failed to consider or misconstrued a material fact or violated a principle of law. If the Registrar did not appreciate the nature of the evidence before him, it was open to the Supreme Court to substitute its discretion for that of the Registrar. There is also authority that the Registrar's decision should not be disturbed unless it was clearly wrong: Re Achilles reflex, (1993), 23 C.B.R. (3d) 20 B.S.S.C.).

It cites Industrial Acceptance Corp. v. Lalonde, 1952 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1952] 2 S.C.R. 109 p. 120; Re Gilmartin (a bankrupt), [1989] 2 All E.R. 835 (Ch. D.) p. 838; and Re Barrick (1980), 36 C.B.R. (N.S.) 286 (B.C.C.A.) p. 290. In Industrial Acceptance Estey J., writing for the Supreme Court of Canada, held at page 120 that:

> A judgment rendered in the exercise of a judicial discretion under s. 142 ought not to be disturbed by an appellate court, unless the learned judge, in arriving at his conclusion, has omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact, or violated some principle of law.

The respondent LaserWorks urges that this court should only substitute its own discretion when the Registrar is clearly wrong. Apparent failure by the Registrar to appreciate the nature of the evidence before him is too low a threshold:

Digitized by Google

> The court in Re Barrick ((1980), 36 C.B.R. (N.S.) 286 (B.C.C.A.)) substituted its discretion for that of the trial judge only after ruling that he misapplied a legal test. Justice Taggert, at page 290, gives three reasons the Court of Appeal should substitute its discretion for that of the trial judge:
> > In these circumstances, it would seem to me that the learned judge has not applied the correct test, has not given the effect that ought to be given to the trustee's report and has not appreciated the nature of the evidence which was before him. In these circumstances, I think we are justified for substituting our discretion for that of the trial judge.

On that basis the respondent submits the first three grounds of appeal fail.

The Trustee under the Proposal submits that "the Appellant has not satisfied the onus upon it in this appeal to overturn the decision of the Honourable Justice Stewart to decline to substitute her discretion for that of the Registrar."

The respondent also referred to the principles stated by McLachlin, J., in Toneguzzo-Norvel (Guardian Ad Litem of) v. Savein and Burnaby Hospital 1994 CanLII 106 (SCC), (1994), 1 S.C.R. 114 at page 121, which this court has followed consistently:

> It is by now well established that a Court of Appeal must not interfere with a trial judge's conclusions on matters of fact unless there is palpable or overriding error. In principle, a Court of Appeal will only intervene if the judge has made a manifest error, has ignored conclusive or relevant evidence, has misunderstood the evidence, or has drawn erroneous conclusions from it: see P. (D.) v. S. (C.), 1993 CanLII 35 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 141, at pp. 188-89 (per L'Heureux-Dube J.), and all cases cited therein, as well as Geffen v. Goodman Estate, 1991 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353, at pp. 388-89 (per Wilson J.), and Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", 1975 CanLII 146 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at pp. 806-8 (per Ritchie J.). A Court of Appeal is clearly not entitled to interfere merely because it takes a different view of the evidence. The finding of facts and the drawing of evidentiary conclusions from facts is the province of the trial judge, not the Court of Appeal.

These principles apply in bankruptcy matters, and provide guidance when, as here, the Registrar's findings have been upheld by a judge of the Supreme Court.

The Registrar's Decision

The Registrar based his decision on the following findings:

> Before turning to deal with these submissions, it is essential that I make some findings of fact. In large part the facts are uncontested. No affidavits were filed, but counsel agree that I may rely on the minutes of the meeting of creditors, the testimony by Mr. Goldberg upon the section 163(2) examination, and the list provided by Mr. Goldberg in compliance with his undertaking on the examination.
>
> I find that Datarite through its solicitor approached some but not all of the creditors of Laserworks with the intention of obtaining an assignment of those creditors' claims and consequently rights to vote on the proposal. The claims were obtained and the votes utilized to defeat the proposal. This would have the effect under section 57(a) of the BIA of placing LaserWorks into bankruptcy by virtue of a deemed assignment.
>
> I can only conclude that the purpose of Datarite was to effect the bankruptcy of LaserWorks. It is a reasonable supposition that the purpose was to remove a competitor from the marketplace. I find that it was the intention of Datarite to put LaserWorks in bankruptcy.
>
> I further find that the motive was to lessen competition.
> In my view, Datarite was engaged throughout in an improper purpose not contemplated by the BIA, the purpose of which is far removed from the use to which Datarite put it.

It is apparent that the Registrar, in speaking of "purpose", included both motive or intent and the steps taken to give effect to that motive or intent. While the record is somewhat sparse, as counsel have remarked, there was evidence in support of these findings. I am not satisfied that the Registrar failed to appreciate the nature of the evidence before him or that he was clearly wrong, or alternatively that he omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact, or violated some principle of law. The questions before this court relate to the effect of these findings.

The Registrar disallowed the votes of the eighteen creditors represented by the appellant because he considered they had been cast for an improper purpose. In the absence of authority specific to proposals to creditors, he applied jurisprudence related to bankruptcy petitions, stating:

> It has long been held that the court will not grant a petition in bankruptcy where the petition is filed for an improper purpose: Re E. De La Hooke (1934), 15 C.B.R. 485 (Ont. S.C.); Re Pappy's Good Eats Limited (1985), 56 C.B.R. (N.S.) 304 (Ont. S.C.); Dimples Diapers Inc. v. Paperboard Industries

In Hooke the petitioner obtained an assignment of a judgment against the debtor for the sole purpose of filing a petition in bankruptcy and of removing the debtor as a business competitor. In that case, as is the situation in this case, there was no evidence that the debtor had any business dealings with the party seeking to place the debtor in bankruptcy. The petition was dismissed.

In Hooke the court made extensive reference to the decision of the House of Lords in King v. Henderson, [1898] A.C. 720. The comments of James, L.J., at p. 732 are particularly germane here:

> After what Lord Justice Cotton has said, in which I entirely agree, people will probably think twice before they buy debts for the purpose of taking bankruptcy proceedings.

Lord Justice Cotton had commented that the proceedings in bankruptcy were not taken to obtain payment of the debt, but rather the debt was purchased for the purpose of taking the proceedings. I would simply add that in tight of the decision I make here persons should certainly think twice before they purchase debts in order to defeat a proposal.

It is my opinion that the eighteen creditors are tainted with the improper motive of Datarite. In Pappy's Good Eats the petition was filed by a creditor with a genuine claim. The creditor entered into an agreement with three franchisees of the debtor. This agreement provided that the creditor would prosecute the bankruptcy proceedings while the franchisees financed the proceeding in exchange for a share of the dividends. The motive of the franchisees was to bring about a bankruptcy so as to terminate the franchise agreements between them and the debtor.

The court found that there had been an improper use of the bankruptcy legislation. The effect of the agreement was to embroil the creditor in the improper objectives of the franchisees who were intermeddling in the proceeding. This tainted the whole proceeding. Clearly where the object of the intermeddling party is to bring about the bankruptcy of the debtor an improper purpose is present. The court will act to prevent such an abuse of the legislation.

The other cases I have referred to, Dimples Diapers Inc. and Shepard also deal with bankruptcy petitions instigated for an improper collateral purpose. In Dimples that purpose was to recover a trademark and a business opportunity. In Shepard that purpose was to obtain control of certain shares.

While this case does not involve a bankruptcy petition, it does involve the placing of Laserworks into bankruptcy. In my view, it would be wrong to allow Datarite to do in the proposal process what it cannot do by petition. Datarite's intention was to place Laserworks in bankruptcy. The motive was to remove a competitor. That motive reveals an improper purpose. The court will not allow to be done by the back door what cannot be done by the front.

By entering into this arrangement with the numbered company the eighteen creditors have tainted themselves and become embroiled in the improper purpose of Datarite. Their votes cannot stand. If Laserworks has the right to be free of this type of interference the Court must be able to fashion a remedy. This court does have the inherent jurisdiction to supervise the bankruptcy process and consequently the conduct of creditors where that conduct constitutes an abuse of the provisions of the BIA. While creditors can certainly vote in their own best interest, they may not collude with a third party to place a debtor in bankruptcy for an improper purpose. Such activity lacks commercial morality and offends the integrity of the bankruptcy process.

While Datarite was not permitted to vote the claims it had acquired, they remained debts of the insolvent debtor.

Justice Stewart

The first ground of appeal to this court, the issue of whether the claims of 18 creditors were actually assigned to Datarite, does not appear to have been a ground of appeal before Justice Stewart.

On the next two grounds of appeal, whether the Registrar failed to appreciate the evidence before him in concluding that Datarite's purpose in acquiring and voting the 18 claims was an improper one, and whether such purpose was a relevant consideration, Justice Stewart, in upholding the Registrar, took a different route to arrive at the same conclusion. She stated:

> Although stated in the context of voting by debenture holders when the majority had votes to modify the rights of the debenture holders in a clause, the statements of principle by Viscount Haldane of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in British America Nickel Corporation v. M. J. O'Brien, [1927] A.C. 369 at p. 371 are, no less, here applicable:
> > To give a power to modify the terms on which debentures in a company are secured is not uncommon in practice. The business interests of the company may render such a > power expedient, even in the interests of the class of debenture holders as a whole. The provision is usually made in the form of a power, conferred by the instrument constituting the debenture security, upon the majority of the class of holders. It often enables them to modify, by resolution properly passed, the security itself. The provision of such a power to a majority bears some analogy to such a power as that conferred by s. 13 of the English Companies Act of 1908, which enables a majority of the shareholders by special resolution to alter the articles of association. There is, however, a restriction of such powers, when conferred on a majority of a special class in order to enable that majority to bind a minority. They must be exercised subject to a general principle, which is applicable to all authorities conferred on majorities of classes enabling them to bind minorities, namely, that the power given must be exercised for the purpose of benefitting the class as a whole, and not merely individual members only.

And later at p. 373, noting this to be a principle which does not depend on misappropriation or fraud, stated:

> . . . but their Lordships do not think that there is any real difficulty in combining the principle that while usually a holder of shares or debentures may vote as his interest directs, he is subject to the further principle that where his vote is conferred on him as a member of a class he must conform to the interest of the class itself when seeking to exercise the power conferred on him in his capacity of being a member.

The court, applying the principle stated by Viscount Haldane, should not sanction a scheme if it appears that the majority have not voted bona fide in the interests of the class as a whole.

Justice Quilliam in an unreported decision of the High Court of New Zealand, Re: Farmers' Co-Operative Organization Society of New Zealand Limited (M 12/97, 4 August 1987) in addressing the very issue of a company whose proposal had been defeated by the votes cast by some of its direct competitors, in circumstances where the majority had the right to bind the minority by statute relied on the principle enunciated in British American Nickel Corp. Inc. v. O'Brien, supra, during the objection to votes application before him. He concluded the votes should be discounted as their votes were cast out of self-interest and not in the interest of the class of creditors as a whole, or of the company. Unlike the present case, he did not determine there was specific activity of an improper purpose other than recognizing the votes were cast by creditors in direct commercial competition with the company.

The Registrar, on his finding of facts, was not faced with a preexisting creditor voting as it wished for whatever reason. He was faced with a unique set of circumstances where he found the appellant shelf company and Datarite, a competitor of Laserworks, involved a selective, secret arrangement with creditors against Laserworks, an arrangement that would hurt some creditors and favour other creditors, although as competitors rather than as creditors, given its purpose of removing Laserworks from the market place and diverting from it, its asset, the market share, so it could be available to Datarite, all of which would result in the balance of the creditors receiving little, if anything, and Laserworks having been deemed a bankrupt.

Justice Stewart found that Datarite was not entitled to use its votes for motives unrelated to the best interest of the creditor group and only pursuant to its own self interest in removing a potential competitor from the market place without regard to the interests of the other members of its class, the other voting creditors. She concluded:

> The Appellant is not entitled to use its votes to achieve this improper purpose. The Registrar's decision prevents an abuse on a minority of the class of unsecured creditors and in so doing upholds a fundamental and viable in the circumstances principle of class voting. He did not err in concluding improper purpose is relevant.

On the fourth ground she found that while there had been no collusion by the eighteen creditors sufficient to deprive them of the right to vote, the Registrar was justified in determining that in the circumstances Datarite controlled the way the claims were voted. She upheld the Registrar's decision and declined to interfere with it.

Assignment--The First Ground

The appellant submits that the judge erred when she declined to address and reverse the Registrar's finding that 18 unsecured creditors of LaserWorks assigned their rights to the appellant. On a proper appreciation of the evidence, it submits, no assignment took place. It states in its factum:

> The appellant did not take issue with the Registrar's finding that four of the 18 creditors received payment for them prior to the vote .... Each of the four creditors provided executed assignments and proxies to Mr. Goldberg, and each assignment was completed by payment. The 14 remaining creditors did not receive payment for their claims prior to the vote, and the appellant submits that the teamed Registrar failed to > appreciate the evidence in this regard when he concluded that the claims of these 14 creditors had been assigned to the appellant before the vote was taken.

LaserWorks submits that the Registrar did not decide whether or not the claims voted by Datarite were assigned:

> The conclusion of the Registrar with respect to the assignment issue is:
> > Given my findings with respect to the intent and motive of Datarite, I find it unnecessary to consider whether Datarite should have exercised 1 vote or 18.
> The reference to 1 vote or 18 relates to the assignment of claims. If the 18 claims had been assigned to the Appellant, the authorities establish that only one vote could be cast on the proposal. The Registrar found it "unnecessary to consider" this issue. We submit that the Registrar would need to consider the issue before making a decision.

It seems reasonable that the Registrar did not intend to decide whether the claims were assigned because it would not determine the question before him. Even if the appellant were restricted to voting as one creditor, leaving a majority of creditors in favor of the proposal, the value of the claims voted by the appellant was sufficient to defeat the proposal and thus achieve the appellant's objective.

If the claims had been assigned to the appellant, the voting rights would have been merged and the appellant could only cast one vote for the value of the claims it had acquired. If the creditors retained their own claims, the appellant could have voted once for each creditor for whom it held a proxy. There is authority for this proposition and the parties seem in agreement with it. The rationale is clear. Each creditor has a vote, to be exercised in person or by proxy. If the claim is assigned, the assignor ceases to be a creditor. It loses its right to vote in person or to control the vote of the proxy. The assignor becomes a creditor and is able to vote its claim, no matter the amount of the claim. If it acquires the claims of other creditors the amount of its claim increases, but it does not pluralize itself. It remains one creditor, entitled to one vote.

The appellant referred to Toia v. Cie de Cautionnement Alta Inc. (1989), 77 C.B.R. (ICS.) 264 (Que. S.C.). The respondent insurance company paid out 19 claims against a bankrupt under a performance bond; each claimant signed a release and subrogated its claims to the respondent, which filed 19 proofs of claim. The Official Receiver permitted 19 votes but the Quebec Supreme Court reversed this, allowing only one vote. The appellant purports to distinguish Toia because "there the respondent completed the assignments by payment prior to the vote."

In my view it is of small importance whether the appellant bought for cash or on credit. The situation seems clear when creditors authorize votes on their behalf by proxy: each creditor is entitled to its vote and the proxy may cast votes for several creditors. It is equally clear when a creditor assigns its claim to another creditor: the assignee creditor has only one vote. This was the case with the four creditors whose assigned claims were accepted and paid for by the appellant. It is less clear with respect to the remaining fourteen creditors who had executed assignments to the appellant. The appellant says they had not yet been accepted, pending proof of the claims. However they had to be proven before they could be voted, and their values were proved for the purpose of calculating their percentage of the total of the unsecured claims. Any condition on the assignment would appear to have been met.

The intention of the parties must be determined: did the appellant vote those claims on its own behalf, or as an agent exercising the rights of the original creditors by proxy? If it had been necessary for the Registrar to decide this question, there was evidence before him that the original creditors had given control over their claims to the appellant by entering into enforceable contracts to assign them. That is, while the appellant voted the claim in the form of proxies, in fact it had acquired sufficient interest in the claims to vote them in its own right, as assignee, as though the assignments had been fully executed. It is clearly an improper practice for an assignee to purport to vote as the proxy of a creditor which has assigned its claim, thereby ceasing to be a creditor. If Datarite was otherwise entitled to vote at the creditor's meeting, it had one vote for the full value of the claims it had acquired. It was not justified in voting by proxy.

I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

Evidence of Datarite's purpose--the second ground

Mr. Goldberg testified as follows to Datarite's purpose in buying claims and voting against the proposal:

> Q. Can you tell me the benefit the numbered company will get in the bankruptcy of LaserWorks?
> A. Well, the purpose of the numbered company hopefully in buying the claims is that it'll buy the claims at a reduced price and get full payment one day.

The appellant states that Mr. Goldberg's evidence was uncontradicted, and submits:

> It is respectfully submitted that the Registrar was clearly wrong in his appreciation of the evidence. The learned Judge concluded that the Registrar made a finding of credibility with respect to Victor Goldberg's evidence on this issue. However, the Registrar's decision does not indicate that Mr. Goldberg's evidence on this key issue was even considered. The Registrar simply failed to address Mr. Goldberg's evidence on this issue at all. It is therefore open to this Honourable Court to substitute its discretion for that of the > Registrar. It is submitted that the Registrar could only find an improper purpose on the record by overlooking the only piece of direct evidence before him on Datarite's intentions.

Mr. Goldberg was obviously only stating his client's ostensible intentions, not its true ones. The Registrar in fact had commented on Mr. Goldberg's evidence after quoting a passage from the minutes indicating how he had responded to certain questions. He said:

> It is not unfair to say that Mr. Goldberg was obtuse to a very great degree. While this does not necessarily confirm suspicion as to the motives of his client, it does explain the concern expressed by the principals of LaserWorks.

The evidence before the Registrar included the proposal itself, which shows total liabilities of $585,459 of which $247,651 was unsecured, $334, 838 secured and $2,970 preferred. Assets totaled $306,158 including book debts of $170,000, leased vehicles $ 95,958, stock in trade $18,500, cash in the bank (which was the principal secured creditor) $8,000 plus fixtures, furnishings and equipment. Virtually all of the assets would be subject to security. The overall deficiency is shown as $279,301. It is difficult to see a basis for Mr. Goldberg's client's optimism that it might get full payment for the claims it bought at reduced value, or indeed, to see any significant source of dividends for unsecured creditors, on a bankruptcy.

Datarite had not been a creditor of LaserWorks before the proposal. There was evidence, however, that it had been a competitor. The Registrar was entitled to consider the evidence as a whole in making findings of fact and drawing inferences that led him to the conclusion that:

> ... Datarite's intention was to place Laserworks in bankruptcy. The motive was to remove a competitor. That motive reveals an improper purpose...

In my view the Registrar did not fail to appreciate the evidence nor otherwise err in arriving at this conclusion. Neither did Justice Stewart err in upholding him. I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

Is Purpose Relevant? The Third Ground.

(i) The Statute

The appellant submits that the trial judge erred in upholding the Registrar's decision that Datarite engaged in an improper purpose in acquiring and voting the claims of the 18 creditors, and that its purpose was relevant. In view of the conclusion on the second ground that the Registrar did not err in finding improper purpose, the appellant is left with the relevancy argument. It argues that the authority relied on by the Registrar, De La Hooke, Pappy's Good Eats, Dimples Diapers and Shepard, arises under s. 43(7) of the BIA which deals only with bankruptcy petitions:

> 43(7) Where the court is not satisfied with the proof of the facts alleged in the petition or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, it shall dismiss the petition. (emphasis added.)

It cites the discussion of the discretion thus created in Houlden & Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3d) at p. 2-50:

> Section 43(7) permits the court to dismiss a petition if it concludes "that for any other sufficient cause no order ought to be made". Section 43(7) confers a discretion; the exercise of that discretion must be founded on sound judicial reasoning based on credible evidence and must be exercised judicially according to common sense and justice in a manner which does not occasion a miscarriage of justice.

Section 43(7) clearly does not create the supervisory jurisdiction of the court over the bankruptcy regime; it is simply a concrete application of a discretionary power inherent in the scheme of the BIA. Each step in the bankruptcy process, whether initiated by a creditor's petition for a receiving order or a debtor's assignment for the benefit of creditors, is supervised by court officials or the court itself. For example s. 108 in Part V, the Administration of Estates, relates to "any meeting of creditors". At the meeting which gave rise to this appeal the chairman applied s. 108(3):

> 108(3) Where the chairman is in doubt as to whether a proof of claim should be admitted or rejected, he shall mark the proof as objected to and allow the creditor to vote subject to the vote being declared invalid in the event of the objection being sustained.

Section 187(9) provides a broad directive:

> 187(9) No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

The short answer to the question raised by this ground of appeal is that motive or purpose is relevant to a court authorized to remedy substantial injustice.

The appellant takes the narrow position that proposals are outside the discretionary supervisory jurisdiction of the court because they are not specifically included in s. 43(7) or some equivalent provision. This submission cannot be sustained.

Digitized by Google

There is a similarity between a creditor's petition for a receiving order under s. 43 and refusal of a proposal. In either case it is something done by a creditor or creditors that places the debtor in bankruptcy, likely against its will. But a proposal is also similar to an assignment: the debtor has itself resorted to protection under the BIA and its proposal will be deemed to be an assignment unless it succeeds in persuading its creditors to accept it in their own best interests.

The appellant submits that s. 54 is the provision in the proposals Part of the BIA which corresponds with s. 43(7). S. 54 provides:

> 54(1) The creditors may, in accordance with this section, resolve to accept or may refuse the proposal as made or as altered at the meeting or any adjournment thereof.

While s. 43(7) provides an occasion for the exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction, an examination focused on the merits of the petition itself, s. 54(1) does not. Such an examination of a proposal is not necessary at that stage. The validity of the claims voted at the creditor's meeting at which the proposal is accepted or refused is subject to the court's scrutiny under s. 108(3). If the proposal is refused by a regular vote of creditors it vanishes and further examination is unnecessary; the debtor is deemed under s. 57(a) to have made an assignment in bankruptcy and the matter proceeds as on an actual assignment. If the creditors approve the proposal, it is then examined on its merits under s. 59, which provides:

> 59. (1) The court shall, before approving the proposal, hear a report of the trustee in the prescribed form respecting the terms thereof and the conduct of the debtor, and, in addition, shall hear the trustee, the debtor, any opposing, objecting or dissenting creditor and such further evidence as the court may require.
> (2) Where the court is of the opinion that the terms of the proposal are not reasonable or are not calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, the court shall refuse to approve the proposal, and the court may refuse to approve the proposal whenever it is established that the debtor has committed any one of the offences mentioned in sections 198 to 200.

Proposals are therefore just as much a part of the bankruptcy regime, and just as subject to the supervision of the court exercising an equitable jurisdiction under the statute, as petitions and assignments. In Whiteman v. UDC Finance Ltd., [1992] 3 NZLR 684, Hardie Boys J., writing for the New Zealand Court of Appeal with respect to the New Zealand Insolvency Act, which varies in detail but not in principle from our own, said at p. 691 that proposals are merely

> . . . the other side of the coin to a petition for adjudication.

The only distinction between petitions and proposals in the exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction is that under the scheme of the BIA occasions for judicial scrutiny occur at different stages of the process. In the present appeal, court intervention was occasioned by objections to proofs of claims affecting the right to vote at the creditors' meeting considering the proposal. The correct procedure was followed, and the objections were considered by the Registrar who had jurisdiction under s.187(9) to remedy substantial injustice.

Motive or purpose is not relevant to objections to proofs of claim based on statutory exceptions under the BIA. These are established in several sections, including s.109(1), persons who had not duly proved and lodged a claim; s.54(3), a relative of the debtor (who may vote against but not for a proposal); 109(4), the debtor as proxy for a creditor; s.109(6), a creditor who did not deal with the debtor at arm's length (with exceptions); s.110(1), a person with a claim acquired after the bankruptcy unless the entire claim is acquired; s.111, a creditor with a claim on or secured by a current bill of exchange (subject to conditions); s.112, a creditor holding security (subject to conditions); and s. 113(2), a trustee as proxy (subject to restrictions). See also s. 109, the trustee as creditor.

(It will be noted that many of these exceptions arise from circumstances that could give rise to conflict of interest. This will be considered further under the fourth ground of appeal.)

However the statutory exceptions are not a code exhausting the forms in which substantial injustice may manifest itself. Objections will be sustained under s. 108(3) if they result from a crime or a tort against the debtor or a crteditor. In the present appeal, and in the authorities cited by the Registrar, the substantial injustice assumes the guise of tortious behavior, to which motive is relevant. In the s. 108(3) context the commonest torts, or instances of substantial injustice arising from tortious behavior, relate to abuse of process and fraud. However conspiracy to harm was also found in Dimples Diapers.

Tortious or tort-tike behavior falling short of a fully developed tort susceptible of formal proof or definition can nevertheless result in substantial injustice, particularly for persons at a point so vulnerable they must resort to insolvency protection. (See Shepard.) In my view that is why Parliament chose the language it did in s.187(9): to create a discretionary jurisdiction in courts that is not fettered, for example, by the high standards required for establishing such torts as abuse of process in other contexts. What remains to be considered is the threshold level of the substantial injustice which will result in remedial action by the court.

(ii)The Authorities

Digitized by Google

The four cases cited by the Registrar establish that the threshold is crossed when the BIA is used for an improper purpose. An improper purpose is any purpose collateral to the purpose for which the bankruptcy and insolvency legislation was enacted by Parliament.

Farley J. held in Dimples Diapers that:

> . . . the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 has as its purpose the provision of "the orderly and fair distribution of the property of a bankrupt among its creditors on a pari passu basis". (L.W.Houlden and C.H.Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law of Canada, 3rd ed. (looseleaf) (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at p. 1-3 [A&4]....

In the cases cited the improper purpose takes the form of abuse of process or tortious behavior closely analogous to abuse of process. In each case the court reacted to what could be seen as substantial injustice. The remedy of choice arising under s. 43(7) is refusal of the petition. The appropriate remedy in the present case is rejection of the tainted votes.

In a vigorous judgment in Dimples Diapers Farley J. dismissed the bankruptcy petition because it was brought for an improper purpose, to recover the diaper trademark and business opportunity, and awarded damages for abuse of process and conspiracy against three creditors. He held at p. 219:

> ...The tort of abuse of process consists in the misuse of a legal process for any purpose other than that which it was designed to serve. It is immaterial in establishing abuse of process that the process was properly commenced or founded by the defendants and it does not matter that the process be concluded in the instigator's favour. The improper purpose is the gravamen of liability. See Unterreiner v. Wilson reflex, (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 197, 24 C.C.L.T. 54, 142 D.L.R. (3d) 588 (H.C.), at p. 203 [O.R.], appeal dismissed reflex, (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 472, 146 D.L.R. (3d) 322 (C.A.), and J.G.Fleming, The Law of Torts, 7th ed. (Sydney: Law Book, 1987) at pp. 591-592.
> Potts J. In R. v. Cholkan & Co. v. Brinker reflex, (1990), 71 O.R. (2d) 381, 1 C.C.L.T. (2d) 291, 40 C.P.C. (2d) 6 (H.C). at p. 8 [C.P.C.] said:
> > Most recently, Montgomery J. writing for the divisional Court in Bentham v. Rothbart reflex, (1989), 36 O.A.C. 13 (Div. Ct.), stated:
> > The constituent elements of the tort of abuse of process are: (a) a collateral improper purpose such as extortion; and (b) a definitive act or threat in furtherance or a purpose not legitimate in the use of the process.

Montgomery J. was clearly using "extortion" as an example only. Any crime or tort would be an improper purpose.

In de la Hooke the petition was dismissed when petitioning creditors, who had had no business dealings with the debtor, obtained an assignment of a judgment debt he owed for the sole purpose of filing a petition in bankruptcy to remove him as a business competitor who was using a similar trade name. Registrar Cook cited a number of leading English cases relevant to the circumstances of the present appeal. These included King v. Henderson, [1898] A.C. 720 at p. 731 which considered abuse of process or fraud on the court; Ex Partre Griffin; in re Adams (1879), 12 Ch. Div. 480 in which a worthless debt was purchased to take proceedings in bankruptcy to force the debtor to give up a just debt, causing Brett L.J. to remark, "a viler fraud I have never heard of"; Ex parte Harper; In re Pooley (1882), 20 Ch. D. 585 at p. 692 in which buying a debt to force a bankruptcy in order to get rid of a trustee was found "a gross abuse of the bankruptcy laws;" and In re a Debtor [1928] 1 Ch. 199 at p. 211 in which the bankruptcy laws were used for the collateral purpose of extortion.

In Pappy's Good Eats a petition was denied when three franchisees of the debtor, who were not creditors, contracted with the petitioning landlord , who had a $65,000 unsatisfied judgment against the debtor, to pay the landlord's costs to petition the debtor into bankruptcy so they would be relieved of obligations under their franchise agreements. Henry J. held the effect of the agreement was to "embroil the petitioning creditor in the improper objective of the purchasers who as non-creditors have no status in these proceedings and are intermeddling in it. The whole proceeding is inescapably tainted; the petition must be dismissed." He found that "the abuse occurred when the parties agreed or arranged improperly to use the facility of the Act to advance the objectives of the franchisees to cause injury to the debtor."

In Shepard it was found that the purpose of the petitioner was to gain control over certain shares of the debtor, an important business advantage. "It is not appropriate or indeed, correct in law, to have the courts facilitate such an objective when the objective is very clearly the main purpose of the application." This finding is consistent with a finding of substantial injustice resulting from abuse of process.

(iii) The Present Case

It is most significant that the appellant was not a creditor of LaserWorks prior to the proposal. Intermeddling by strangers to the pre-existing debtor creditor relationship for an improper purpose was a determinative factor in Pappy's Good Eats. The practice of buying dubious claims against an insolvent for purposes foreign to the bankruptcy process was denounced in the English cases cited in de la Hooke. The Registrar in the present case understandably looked askance at it. Few legitimate reasons come to mind for buying into a bankrupt estate. When somebody does so, it is a matter of common sense to assume, subject to correction, they intend to use the bankruptcy process for some purpose it was not meant for. In the present case it was readily apparent that mischief was afoot.

The "orderly and fair distribution of the property of a bankrupt among its creditors on a pari passu basis" was not the purpose behind the acts of the appellant. The appellant made separate approaches to each of the eighteen creditors whose claims it succeeded in acquiring. It negotiated a separate deal with each for varying considerations presumably seen to be more advantageous to the creditor than reliance on the proposal. From most of them it obtained an agreement, an executed assignment and a proxy. It purported to vote the proxies of former creditors whose claims had been assigned to it. Its purpose was not an orderly recovery of debts from the debtors assets but to limit competition by the debtor in its own marketplace by rejecting the debtor's proposal and forcing it into bankruptcy.

The appellant was acting on its own making sharp use of the provisions of the BIA for its own advantage. There was no evidence that the co-operating creditors were part of a conspiracy with the appellant to injure the debtor. Otherwise the tort of conspiracy to injure could be found where the predominant purpose of the appellant's conduct is to cause injury to the plaintiff, whether the means used by the defendants are lawful or unlawful: Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd, v. British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 S.C.C. 452.

It is undeniable that the appellant caused injury to the debtor not negligently but deliberately. The debtor made its proposal to avoid bankruptcy; bankruptcy therefore must have been seen by Laserworks as a more injurious alternative than acceptance of the proposal by the creditors. Laserworks had the heavy burden of persuading its creditors that their best interests lay in approving the proposal; it did not have the impossible burden of dissuading a financially stronger competitor bent on using the provisions of the BIA to destroy it as a competitor. The appellant derailed the proposal procedure to force the debtor into bankruptcy. Using bankruptcy to cause injury, thereby eliminating the debtor as an entity capable of competing in the marketplace, is abusive of the purpose of the BIA. It does not qualify as "the orderly and fair distribution of (its) property." Annihilation of an individual business or a company may be an unfortunate consequence of a bankruptcy, an unavoidable side-effect, but it is not the purpose of the BIA. Use of the Act to accomplish such an objective is in my view so abusive of the purpose of the legislation as to engage the supervisory jurisdiction of the courts under s. 187(9). It is a substantial injustice to be remedied.

No distinction in principle is possible between the present case and the four cited by the Registrar. He identified the problem and he applied the remedy. He was upheld on appeal in the Supreme Court. I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

Class voting--The Fourth Ground

In upholding the Registrar Justice Stewart added a string to his bow by introducing the class voting analysis of Viscount Haldane in British American Nickel. In light of the holdings respecting the second and third grounds of appeal, it is not necessary to the outcome to decide this ground.

The appellant submits that the trial judge was wrong in concluding there was an abuse on a minority of a class of unsecured creditors and that a duty in this respect was owed by the appellant:

> . . . There was no abuse on a minority of the unsecured creditors and no duty was imposed on the Appellant to cause votes to be cast in the best interest of the class. Without such a duty the learned Judge was without authority to consider Datarite's motives and the votes in question should have been allowed.

In British America Nickel Viscount Haldane stated that where a power is conferred on a special class, a majority in exercising a power to modify the rights of a minority must exercise that power in the interests of the class as a whole.

> . . . But their Lordships do not think that there is any real difficulty in combining the principle that while usually a holder of shares or debentures may vote as his interest directs, he is subject to the further principle that where his vote is conferred on him as a member of a class he must conform to the interest of the class itself when seeking to exercise the power conferred on him in his capacity of being a member...

In the present case the minority creditors saw their alternative of furthering their best interests by voting in favour of the proposal disappear when the votes amassed by the appellant were exercised, not in the interest of making the most favourable recovery from a combination of a distribution of the assets of LaserWorks and its continuance in business as a customer or potential customer, but in the interests of removing a competitor of Datarite. Justice Stewart was concerned that the other creditors, as well as the debtor, suffered from the abusive use of the provisions of the BIA. Of the sixteen creditors who did not assign their claims to Datarite, fourteen voted in favour of the proposal.

The rationale for Viscount Haldane's conclusion in British America Nickel was carefully reviewed by Hardie Boys J. in Whiteman v. UDC Finance Ltd. The court found it should not intervene in the refusal of a proposal by creditors including several who were being sued by the debtor, and who therefore had a collateral interest in seeing him out of business.
Hardie Boys J. cited the same passage quoted above by Justice Stewart from Vicount Haldane's judgment. It concludes that there is a restriction on powers conferred on a majority of a special class in order to enable that majority to bind a minority:

> ...They must be exercised subject to a general principle, which is applicable to all authorities conferred on majorities of classes enabling them to bind minorities; namely, that the power given must be exercised for the purpose of benefiting the class as a whole, and not merely individual members only.

Hardie Boys J. considered Re Farmers' Co-operative, which was also cited by Justice Stewart, in which votes of several creditors who were competitors of the debtor were disallowed .

> ...In a later development of the same matter, but not now involving the Court's sanction under s. 205, Gallen J. accepted that the Court has an overriding control, not limited to the approval stage under s. 205, and may restrict a right to vote where the equities of a particular situation require it: see [1992] 1 NZLR 348. It is unnecessary for present purposes to decide whether these cases were correctly decided, for even if they were, the principle is not of unlimited application, and does not apply to the exercise of voting rights generally. This is clear from what Viscount Haldane said in the British America Nickel case.
> Immediately after the passage already quoted, his Lordship said
> > Subject to this, the power may be unrestricted. It may be free from the general principle in question when the power arises not in connection with a class, but only under a general title which confers the vote as a right of property attaching to a share.
> Thus in Pender v. Lushington (1877) 6 Ch. D. 70, 75-76 Jessel MR said there is:
> > . . . no obligation on a shareholder of a company to give his vote merely with a view to what other persons may consider the interests of the company at large. He has a right, if he thinks fit, to give his vote from motives or promptings of what he considers his own individual interest.
> While the voting rights conferred by Part XV of the Insolvency Act are not akin to a "right of property attaching to a share", they are rights conferred without reservation. There is no requirement for class voting; there is instead a general right conferred equally on all creditors. The rationale of the principle does not apply. It is well settled that the motive (short of fraud) of a petitioning creditor, no matter how reprehensible, is irrelevant to his right to obtain an order of adjudication: King v. Henderson [1898] AC 720, Re King, ex parte Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd. (No. 2) [1920] VLR 490. The motive of a creditor voting on a proposal, really the other side of the coin to a petition for adjudication, can be no different. That is not to say that there may be no remedy in an extreme case, such as fraud or mistake. But certainly where, as here, there are perfectly legitimate reasons for opposing the proposal, a creditor is not to be denied that right because he may have some other motive as well...

If the exception made for fraud is broadened to "substantial injustice" I would take Hardie Boys J.'s conclusions to be a fair statement of the law in Canada as well, as applied by Canadian courts in the cases cited by the Registrar. The New Zealand court included mistake as well as fraud as an exception. A creditor is not to be deprived of the right to vote for wrongful motives alone; motive must be coupled with a tortious act to support a finding of improper purpose.
A Canadian case supporting a broad interpretation of the right of creditors to vote on proposals is Re Bedard Louis Inc. 1991 CanLII 3533 (QC CA), (1991) 22 C.B.R. (3d) 218. The debtor sued three creditors who had sought to seize his goods before judgment for amounts far exceeding their claims against him. One creditor petitioned for a receiving order, and the Quebec Superior Court rejected the debtor's argument that the petitioner was not a creditor because of the large undecided actions. The debtor was declared bankrupt and later filed a proposal. The trustee refused to let the three creditors vote at a creditors' meeting considering the proposal because of a possible conflict of interest. The Superior Court allowed an appeal against the trustee's decision, and the Quebec Court of Appeal upheld the Superior Court, holding (headnote) that:

> No provision of the Act authorizes the trustee to exclude a creditor whom he considers to have a conflict of interest. The debtor's action for damages against the creditors, which constituted a debt not yet payable, did not strip the creditors of their status of ordinary creditors. By the proposal, the debtor presented the creditors with terms of payment which were different from those provided legally by contract.

Digitized by Google

> The Act was intended to allow the voting of all duly acknowledged creditors. Exceptions to that rule were properly specified in the Act and none of them pertained to a creditor against whom a debtor had filed legal proceedings.

The Proposals Part of the BIA recognizes only two classes of creditors, secured creditors who are presumably protected by the security they hold, and unsecured creditors, all the others. This does not appear to meet Viscount Haldane's criterion of a special class bound to exercise its voting rights for the benefit of the class as a whole. That concept seems surplus to and difficult to reconcile with the scheme of the BIA where, as the Quebec Court of Appeal found in Bedard, all duly acknowledged creditors are entitled to vote as they please, subject to exceptions set out in the Act (and the exception for tortious or criminal behavior.)

As remarked above, those exceptions reflect the manner in which Parliament dealt with conflicts of interest which might arise in the context of voting on proposals. Parliament has obviously legislated on the subject and cannot be assumed to have created by implication an exception for general, unspecified, conflicts of interest. The mere fact that a creditor is also a competitor of the debtor or otherwise in a conflict of interest with the debtor does not give rise to a statutory exception. The scheme for protecting minority creditors adopted under the BIA was not a class voting concept but rather a system of specific exceptions coupled with a discretionary power in the courts to remedy substantial injustice.

It is not necessary to make a final determination on this point. The rational of Justice Stewart's decision is found in her adoption of the Registrar's conclusions as to improper purpose in the following passage:

> The applicant is not entitled to use its votes to achieve this improper purpose. The Registrar's decision prevents an abuse on a minority of the class of unsecured creditors and in so doing upholds a fundamental and viable in the circumstances principle of class voting. He did not err in concluding improper purpose is relevant.

That is, while the Registrar's decision was consistent with considerations of class voting, he was upheld on his findings of improper purpose.

I would dismiss the fourth ground of appeal.

Conclusion

The appellant attempted to abuse the provisions of the BIA by using them to intermeddle for an improper purpose with the proposal of a debtor to its creditors, giving rise to a substantial injustice. This affected not only the debtor but the remaining creditors who supported the proposal. The Registrar made no error in discerning this from the evidence and in exercising the court's discretionary jurisdiction to remedy substantial injustice. He was upheld on appeal to the Supreme Court. The appellant's actions are not to be condoned. I would dismiss the appeal with costs which I would fix costs at $3,000 plus disbursements to the Respondent and $3,000 plus disbursements to the Trustee.

[1] Applying pursuant to s. 197 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("Act"), Rules 41 and 47 of the Rules of Court and the inherent jurisdiction of the Court, Abakhan & Associates Inc. ("Trustee"), the Administrator under the Joint Consumer Proposal of Ronald Manning Dondale and Lynell Marie Dondale ("Proposal") applies for an order granting the Trustee its costs of these proceedings against the Superintendent of Bankruptcy ("Superintendent") subject to the assessment of those costs pursuant to the provisions of the Act. The materials indicate that the Trustee has incurred legal costs of $18,720.06 relating to this matter and that the total amount to be paid under the Proposal is $24,000.00 if all contemplated payments are made.

BACKGROUND

[2] The Trustee was the Administrator of the Joint Consumer Proposal of Mr. and Ms. Dondale. The Proposal contemplated monthly payments over a five year period. The creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale were notified of the Proposal and no objections were filed. Accordingly, the Proposal was deemed to have been accepted.

[3] However, the Official Receiver gave notice to the Trustee under s. 66.22(1) of the Act requiring the Trustee to apply to Court to have the Proposal reviewed. Section 66.22(1) of the Act states:

> Where a consumer proposal is accepted or deemed accepted by the creditors, the administrator shall, if requested by the official receiver or any other interested party within thirty days after the day of acceptance or deemed acceptance, forthwith apply to the court to have the consumer proposal reviewed.

[4] That application was set before the Court by the Trustee. On May 17, 2007, the Superintendent filed a Notice of Intervention pursuant to s. 5(4)(a) of the Act which provides that the Superintendent may: "intervene in any manner or proceeding in court, where the Superintendent considers it expedient to do so, as if the Superintendent were a party thereto". Under Rule 12 of the General Rules under the Act: "The Superintendent may intervene at any application to the court by filing a notice of an intervention with the court."

[5] In opposing the application of the Trustee to have the Proposal approved by the Court, the Superintendent filed the affidavit of Ms. Vogt which contained the following paragraph:

> I swear this Affidavit in support of the application of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy for an Order not approving the Dondale Proposal in the form drafted.

[6] The application arose as a result of the conflict created by the decisions of Registrar Baker in Bankruptcy of Williams, [2005] B.C.J. (Q.L.) No. 154 (B.C.S.C.), and of Registrar Nettie in Re Sztojka, [2005] O.J. (Q.L.) No. 5551 (Ont. S.C.J.), whereby similar paragraphs in consumer proposals were dealt with differently by the two Registrars. The Superintendent favoured the decision reached in Sztojka whereas the Trustee favoured the decision reached in Williams. Preferring the decision in Sztojka, the Superintendent had provided directions to trustees and administrators across Canada that the decision reached in Sztojka should be preferred when dealing with the powers given to either inspectors or administrators of consumer proposals. The type of provision that produced the two conflicting decisions was set out in paragraph 7 of this Proposal:

> (a) The creditors may appoint up to three inspectors responsible for the Consumer Proposal of this consumer debtor. The inspectors may have, in addition to any powers of inspectors under the Act, the power to
> (i) receive any notice of default in the performance of a provision of the Consumer Proposal and waive any such default, and
> (ii) approve any amendment to the Consumer Proposal without calling a meeting of creditors, if the amendment would alter the schedule for the amount of the payments to be made by the consumer debtor, but would not change the total amount to be paid; and
> (b) In the absence of appointed Inspectors the Administrator of this Consumer Proposal shall have the power to extend the time for the making of any payment required to be made pursuant to this Proposal provided that no such extension shall extend beyond the five years following the approval of this Proposal by the court.

[7] Counsel appeared on behalf of the Superintendent and on behalf of the Trustee on the application to approve the Proposal. It was the position of the Superintendent that an Administrator should not be in a position to extend the time for making of payments because s. 66.31 of the Act provides for a deemed annulment of a consumer proposal if a consumer debtor is in default to the extent of three months of payments. It was the position of the Trustee that it was the creditors and not the Superintendent who should determine whether a consumer proposal was acceptable or not. The Proposal was approved (2007 B.C.S.C. 847). The question of costs was not spoken to nor were costs requested in the Motion of the Trustee.

APPLICABLE STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[8] The applicable provisions of the Act are the following:

Digitized by Google

197(1) Subject to this Act and to the General Rules, the costs of and incidental to any proceedings in court under this Act are in the discretion of the court.

197(2) The court in awarding costs may direct that the costs shall be taxed and paid as between party and party or as between solicitor and client, or the court may fix a sum to be paid in lieu of taxation or of taxed costs, but in the absence of any express direction costs shall follow the event and shall be taxed as between party and party.

147(1) For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the supervision by the Superintendent, there shall be payable to the Superintendent for deposit with the Receiver General a levy on all payments, except the costs referred to in subsection 70(2), made by the trustee by way of dividend or otherwise on account of the claims of creditors, whether unsecured, preferred or secured creditors, and including Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province claiming in respect of taxes or otherwise.

[9] Under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules, Rule 3 provides:

In cases not provided for in the Act or these Rules, the court shall apply, within their respective jurisdictions, their ordinary procedure to the extent that that procedure is not inconsistent with the Act or these Rules.

[10] Rule 57(9) of the Rules of Court states:

57(9) Subject to subrule (12), costs of and incidental to a proceeding shall follow the event unless the court otherwise orders.

POSITION OF THE PARTIES ON THIS APPLICATION

[11] The Trustee submits that the Superintendent wished to establish a "test" case that it could apply nationally on the issue which was raised and that the burden of obtaining a decision beyond the decisions reached by Registrars should not fall on the creditors of this consumer proposal who would be deprived of some of the gross receipts of the Proposal if the legal account rendered to the Trustee must be paid out of the gross receipts. The creditors did not oppose the approval of the Proposal and should not bear the burden of the legal costs caused by the intervention of the Superintendent. As well, the intervention of the Superintendent was part of its supervision of the bankruptcy system for which it collects a levy pursuant to s. 147(1) of the Act to fund such supervisory activities.

[12] The Superintendent submits that, to the extent that this was a "test case", it was a test case for both the Superintendent and this particular Trustee. The Superintendent submits that the Superintendent has requested that all Trustees and Administrators across Canada cease including similar provisions and to amend those proposals which contain similar provisions but that this directive was ignored by this Trustee who proceeded rather than amending the Proposal. The Superintendent also submits that creditors opposing the approval of a proposal would not have costs awarded against them where it can be shown that their objection was not frivolous and was made in good faith: Re Rideau Carleton Raceway Holdings Ltd. (1971), 15 C.B.R. (N.S.) 72 (Ont. S.C.) at para. 25; and Re Alberta Western Wholesale Lumber Ltd. (1961), 27 D.L.R. (2d) 598 (B.C.S.C.) and that the same test should apply where the Superintendent intervenes pursuant to s. 5(4)(a) of the Act. The Superintendent submits that it was acting in good faith over a concern for the integrity of the bankruptcy system and in the face of conflicting jurisprudence on the issue. Accordingly, the issues raised by the Superintendent were not frivolous in the circumstances. The Superintendent submits that the Superintendent and the Trustee should bear their own costs.

CASE AUTHORITIES AND DISCUSSION

[13] Under s. 197(1) of the Act, the costs of a proceeding are in the discretion of the Court. Unless there are provisions to the contrary under the Act or under the General Rules established under the Act, the Rules of Court apply. The normal rule in civil litigation in British Columbia is that costs follow the event: Rule 57(9). That same principle applies in bankruptcy matters: Down, Re 2001 BCSC 1303 (CanLII), (2001), 28 C.B.R. (4th) 194 (B.C.S.C.). That costs will follow the event is clearly set out in s. 197(2) of the Act where costs will "follow the event and should be taxed as between party and party" in the absence of any express direction from the Court.

[14] Costs on an "increased costs" basis or on a "Special costs" basis are not available as such costs are not provided for under the Act: Interclaim Holdings Ltd. v. Down 2003 BCCA 201 (CanLII), (2003) 42 C.B.R. (4th) 12 (B.C.C.A.) at para. 25. Accordingly, the discretion is only to order either "party and party" or "solicitor and client" costs or to make no express direction so the "party and party" costs prevail.

[15] Section 197(1) of the Act provides the Court with a wide discretion regarding costs and there appears to be no reason why either Party and Party Costs or Solicitor and Client (full indemnification) costs cannot be awarded subject always to an assessment by the Registrar of the Court of any costs awarded. Accordingly, the question which arises is whether the Superintendent should be dealt with in a manner which is different from those who have traditionally been granted costs or against whom costs have been awarded?

[16] Section 5(4)(a) of the Act creates a statutory right of intervention by the Superintendent. Ordinarily, interventions are allowed when persons or organizations have evidence which may be of assistance to the Court not only in presenting argument but also in adducing evidence. Whether such persons who are not actually parties to proceedings are entitled to or are liable for costs depends upon the circumstances: Janzen v. B.C. (Attorney General), [1993] B.C.J. (Q.L.) No. 2682 (B.C.C.A.); Polglase v. Polglase 1979 CanLII 587 (BC SC), (1979), 18 B.C.L.R. 294 (B.C.S.C.); Hines v. Nova Scotia (Registrar of Motor Vehicles) 1990 CanLII 2601 (NS SC), (1990), 78 D.L.R. (4th) 162 (N.S.S.C.); Evans Forest Products Ltd. v. B.C. (Chief Forester) (1995), 40 C.P.C. (3d) 322 (B.C.S.C.); M. v. H. (1996), 1 C.P.C. (4th) 167 (Ont. G.D.); Hines v. Nova Scotia (Registrar of Motor Vehicles) 1990 CanLII 2601 (NS SC), (1990), 105 N.S.R. (2d) 240 (N.S.S.C.); Holland v. Northwest Fuels Ltd., [2007] B.C.J. (Q.L.) No. 858 (B.C.S.C.).

[17] In Evans Forest Products Ltd. v. British Columbia (Chief Forester) (1995), 40 C.P.C. (3d) 322 (B.C.S.C.), Esson C.J.S.C., as he then was, stated:

> ... The decision in Sierra Club v. Chief Forester [Sierra Club of Canada v. British Columbia (Chief Forester) et al 1994 CanLII 6510 (BC SC), (1994), 94 B.C.L.R. (2d) 331 (B.C.S.C.) appeal dismissed 1995 CanLII 1448 (BC CA), (1995) 7 B.C.L.R. (3d) 375], (supra) establishes that there is no general principle that public interest litigants should be immune from party and party costs. The position of interveners, who generally play a very minor and closely restricted role in the proceeding, is distinguishable from that of a public interest litigant which brings the proceeding. While there is no rule precluding costs being awarded to or against interveners, it has not been the practice to do so. I think that there are good practical reasons for maintaining that as the general practice although, if an intervener were to materially prolong the proceedings, costs might be awarded against it. There may also be circumstances where it would be appropriate to award costs to an intervener but I doubt such circumstances will arise in many cases. (at para. 6)

[18] I am satisfied that the usual provisions as to whether an intervenor will be granted costs or will have an order made against it for costs do no apply. Under s. 5(4) of the Act, it should be noted that the intervention of the Superintendent creates a situation "as if the Superintendent were a party. Because that is the case, the Superintendent is not merely an intervenor as that word is usually used in litigation and in dealing with the question of whether costs should be awarded to or against an intervenor. Rather, the Superintendent takes on a role as if it were a party and, as a party, the usual provisions should apply as to whether costs will be awarded or not.

[19] The phrase "as if ... a party thereto" has not been judicially considered in the context of the Act but similar phrasing in other legislation has been the subject matter of interpretation. United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of American Local 3054 v. Cassin Remco Ltd. (1979), 27 O.R. (2d) 25 (Ont. H.C.) dealt with s. 55(2) of the Labour Relations Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 232, which provided that the purchaser of a business would be bound by an existing collective agreement "as if he had been a party thereto". The issue was whether the purchasers of Cassin Remco were required to honour an award made by the Ontario Labour Relations Board and Steele J. held that the statute deemed the purchaser "to be the original signatory to the collective agreement" (at p. 29) so that the collective agreement was enforced. In Maritime Life Assurance Co. v. Chateau Gardens (Hanover) Inc. (1983), 43 O.R. (2d) 754 (Ont. H.C.J.), the court made a similar holding. In the case at bar, I interpret the phrase "as if ... a party thereto" in a similar manner so that the Superintendent becomes a party to the proceedings as if always a party.

[20] Even if I am wrong in coming to that conclusion, I am satisfied that there is authority for costs to be awarded against an intervenor or interested party who makes submissions in ongoing litigation. In Pacifica Papers Inc. (Re), [2001] B.C.J. (Q.L.) No. 1492 (B.C.C.A.), Hall J.A. dealt with the question of costs where Pacifica Papers Inc. had entered into an agreement whereby Norske Skog would acquire shares in Pacifica and Pacifica would become a wholly owned subsidiary of Norske, where a major shareholder of Pacifica objected to the plan of arrangement that was before the learned chambers judge, and where Norske made submissions at the hearing in favour of the plan. The question which arose was whether Norske was entitled to its costs in connection with the application. In concluding that Norske was entitled to two-thirds of its taxable costs, Hall J.A. concluded that the position of Norske was not that of an intervenor but as an interested party:

> It appears to me that it can fairly be said that here Norske Skog occupied a position more vitally involved in the issue before the Court than would normally be the case with an intervener. Norske Skog had entered into an agreement, (requiring subsequent approvals), to acquire the equity of Pacifica with a view to Pacifica becoming a subsidiary of Norske Skog. In these circumstances, Norske Skog had a clear economic interest in seeing the proposed arrangement proceed to completion. It was no doubt legally possible for it to stand aside from and take no part in these proceedings but it is wholly understandable that Norske Skog would feel it was appropriate for it to participate in and lend assistance to the successful petitioner, Pacifica. I believe its participation in the Chambers proceedings in both courts was quite > appropriate. It might well have sought status as a party but there was no particular necessity for it to do so since it had already been served with process and was undoubtedly an interested party with a stake in the outcome of the proceedings. Given its interest in the outcome of the proceedings, it seems doubtful that a court would refuse to hear submissions from Norske Skog. (at para. 7)

[21] Of similar effect are the decisions in Rigaux v. British Columbia (Commission of Inquiry into the Death of Vaudreuil - Gove Inquiry), [1998] B.C.J. (Q.L.) No. 2419 (B.C.S.C.) where costs were awarded against the Attorney General by Allan J. who stated: "I find that the Attorney General did not limit his role to Amicus Curiae or an intervenor; he was a full participant." (at para. 30) and the decision in Re Welk and Saskatchewan Social Services Appeal Board et al reflex, (1985), 23 D.L.R. (4th) 698 (Sask. Q.B.) where costs were awarded against the Attorney General relating to an application for certiorari to quash an order of the Saskatchewan Social Services Appeal Board and for mandamus to require the Board to re-hear an application for assistance. In concluding that costs should be awarded, Grotsky J. stated:

> In the instant case, counsel for the Attorney-General appearing on behalf of the appearing respondents did not appear on their behalf as intervenants. They were, as they were required to be by the legislation of the province, made parties. They appeared as such. Not as intervenors. (at p. 710)

[22] Whether "as if a party" or as a full participant, the Superintendent would have potentially been entitled to costs if successful in opposing the approval of the Proposal. Accordingly, the next question which arises is whether costs should be awarded against the Superintendent.

[23] Whether this Proposal was approved or not, it was treated by the Superintendent as a test case. The same cannot be said of the Trustee. From the policies in place regarding the operations of the Superintendent, it is clear that the Superintendent must have considered that this was a question of "national interest or importance concerning the bankruptcy process" otherwise it would not have intervened. The policy of the Superintendent regarding an intervention pursuant to s. 5(4)(a) of the Act has been in force since April 1, 1994. That part of the "Program" of the Superintendent is described as follows:

> 2) -- Guiding Principles
> The Superintendent may intervene in court under this paragraph where it is a question of national interest or importance concerning the bankruptcy process or where the Superintendent feels it is in the public interest to do so.
> The intervention of the Superintendent may be as follows:
> a) as regulator to sustain a definite position;
> b) to make sure that proper facts are placed before the court;
> c) as an observer;
>
> 3) -- Criteria for intervention
>
> • To sustain or have the court interpret a policy or Directive of the Superintendent;
>
> • To defend the constitutionality of a section of the Act or its Rules;
> • To clarify the legal interpretation of a section of the Act where it is a matter of general interest;
> • To avoid an abuse of the system. ....

[24] There is no statutory requirement for the Superintendent to intervene under s. 5(4)(a) of the Act. The Superintendent elected to do so and only the Superintendent opposed the approval of the Proposal. None of the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale opposed the Proposal in the first instance or appeared to oppose the approval of the Proposal.

[25] There appear to be no decisions where costs have been awarded against the Superintendent who has intervened under s. 5(4)(a) of the Act. However, I am satisfied that the decisions in Black v. NsC Diesel Power Inc. (Trustee of) 2003 FCA 300 (CanLII), (2003), 243 F.T.R. 159 (F.C.A.) and Marchand Syndicates Inc. v. Canada (Superintendent of Bankruptcy) 2006 FCA 368 (CanLII), (2006), 28 C.B.R. (5th) 5, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [2007] C.S.C.R. No. 16 (Q.L.) are authority for the proposition that costs can be awarded in favour of the Superintendent. If costs are available to the Superintendent where the Superintendent intervenes under s. 5(4) of the Act, there is no reason why costs cannot be available against the Superintendent.

[26] I do not accede to the submission made by the Superintendent that costs should not be awarded where it can be shown that the objection made was not frivolous and was made in good faith. I am satisfied that the two authorities relied upon by the Superintendent are not applicable to the case at bar. First, the discretion provided by s. 197 of the Act is similar to the provisions of Rule 57(9) of the Rules of Court – "costs shall follow the event". In this Proposal, the Superintendent was unsuccessful in the position they advanced and the Trustee was successful. Second, I am satisfied the decisions in Re Rideau and Re Alberta Western Wholesale, both supra, are based on the premise that a creditor should not be penalized twice if the objections are not frivolous and are made in good faith. It is likely that a creditor will not receive full payment of the balance owing by a proposing debtor. To then penalize that creditor again where that creditor objects to the proposal being approved by the Court would have the effect of penalizing that creditor twice. I am satisfied that is the basis for the decisions relied upon by the Superintendent. The question which arises is whether the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale should bear the costs.

[27] If this was a test case at the instigation of the Superintendent or the Trustee, should the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale bear the cost of that test? The answer to that question is "no". For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Superintendent, s. 147(1) of the Act provides that there will be a levy payable on all payments made by trustees by way of a dividend or otherwise to creditors "whether unsecured, preferred or secured". It is out of this fund that the expenses of the Superintendent are paid in whole or in part. The intervention of the Superintendent was part of its supervision of the bankruptcy system and it would be unfair to require the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale to bear the burden of the legal costs caused by the intervention. It would be equally unfair to have the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale bear the burden of the legal costs caused by any test case being advanced by the Trustee.

[28] If the costs should not to be borne by the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale, who should bear the legal costs incurred as a result of the Official Receiver requiring the Trustee to seek Court approval of the Proposal and of the intervention of the Superintendent? In the circumstances, I am satisfied that those legal costs should be borne by the Superintendent in the capacity of the Superintendent as an intervenor pursuant to s. 5(4)(a) of the Act. The next question which arises is whether the costs against the Superintendent should be on a party and party or a solicitor and client basis.

[29] A summary of decisions in which solicitor and client costs have been awarded under the Act is set out by the learned authors of Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, Vol. 3, 3rd Ed. (Thomson-Carswell – Scarborough) 205:

> In court proceedings, the court may decide that it is appropriate to award costs for or against a trustee on a solicitor and client basis. The following cases illustrate some [of] the situations in which the court has decided that it is appropriate to order solicitor and client costs.
> Where a question is of importance in the administration of bankrupt estates generally, the court may direct that the costs be taxed on a solicitor and client basis: British Columbia (Workmen's Compensation Board) v. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Assn. (1962), 4 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17, 38 W.W.R. 426, 33 D.L.R. (2d) 524 (B.C. S.C.).
> If a trustee brings a test case against a party, the court may award costs to a successful respondent on a solicitor and client basis payable out of the bankrupt estate: Alberta (A.G.) v. Nash (1964), 7 C.B.R. (N.S.) 84, 48 W.W.R 420 (Alta. C.A.); Nuraney Holdings Ltd. (Trustee o/) v. Canada (A.G.) (1987), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 191, 19 B.C.L.R. (2d) 173 (B.C. C.A.).
>
> In Re Commonwealth Investors Syndicate Ltd. (1986), 62 C.B.R. (N.S.) 308 (B.C. S.C.), the court found that the trustee had put the applicant to considerable expense by refusing to retire voluntarily as trustee or to return the trust estate to the applicant. It therefore awarded costs against the trustee personally on a solicitor and client basis.
> In Re Liakas reflex, (1993), 25 C.B.R. (3d) 101, 1993 CarswellQue 45 (Que. S.C.), the court found that the trustee had, by his improper requests, put witnesses on a s. 163(1) examination to considerable expense: the trustee was ordered to pay personally the solicitor and client costs of the witnesses.
> In Thorne Riddell Inc. v. Sinclair (1983), 49 C.B.R. (N.S.) 196 (Ont. S.C.), there was an earlier decision squarely against the position being advanced by the trustee. In these circumstances, the court awarded the successful party costs on a solicitor and client basis.
> In Re Century 21 Brenmore Real Estate Ltd. (1980), 33 C.B.R. (N.S.) 170, 6 E.T.R. 205 (Ont. C.A.), the Court of Appeal of Ontario, on an appeal from an order made on a motion for directions, ordered the unsuccessful appellant to pay the costs of the trustee and of counsel appointed to represent ordinary creditors on a solicitor and client basis. Similarly the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Nuraney Holdings Ltd. (Trustee of) v. Canada (A.G.), supra, ordered the Attorney General of Canada, who unsuccessfully appealed an order opposing a proposal, to pay the costs of the trustee on a solicitor and client basis. These cases appear to be correct because the successful appellants had no clients, and the only way in which they could be adequately compensated was by an award of solicitor and client costs.
> If a misleading affidavit has been used to obtain the appointment of an interim receiver, the court, in setting aside the order, may award costs on a solicitor and client basis. However, if more than one solicitor has been involved in the motion to set aside the order, the court will disallow any items of the claim for costs in which there has been duplication or overlapping: Re 539618 Ontario Inc. (1988), 69 C.B.R. (N.S.) 210 (Ont. S.C.).
> Where a trustee has been dragged into prolonged litigation without justification and where the reputation of the trustee is by virtue of the proceedings placed at risk, the court will award the trustee its costs on a solicitor and client basis: Bank of Montreal v. AGT Mobility Inc. 1999 ABQB 338 (CanLII), (1999), 9 C.B.R. (4th) 209, 1999 CarswellAlta 329 (Alta. Q.B.).

In Saskatchewan Economic Development Corp. v. Michalyca Management Ltd. reflex, (1991), 12 C.B.R. (3d) 277, 98 Sask. R. 93, 1991 CarswellSask 28 (Q.B.), an application was brought in the ordinary courts that should have been brought in the bankruptcy court. The court granted costs on a solicitor and client basis.

[30] This is not a case where this Trustee, the Superintendent, a creditor, or a bankrupt has acted inappropriately. Rather, the situation is closer to the decisions reached in Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd. and Nuraney, both supra. Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association Ltd. dealt with the question of costs regarding an application whether the Workmen's Compensation Board was a secured creditor in the estate of a bankrupt. After determining that costs under the Act could be awarded against the Workmen's Compensation Board despite the provisions of provincial legislation that costs could not be awarded against the Crown, Hutcheson J. agreed with the submission made on behalf of the Trustee in Bankruptcy that the question was of such importance not only in the administration of that estate but in the administration of bankrupt estates generally that the court should direct the costs of the Trustee to be taxed as between solicitor and client. The fact that the Superintendent was of the view that there should be an intervention because the matter in dispute was a question of national interest or importance concerning the bankruptcy process leads me to the same conclusion as was reached by Hutcheson J.

[31] Of similar effect is the decision in Nuraney, supra, where Lambert J.A. on behalf of the Court awarded costs to the Trustee against the Attorney General of Canada on a solicitor client basis stating:

> ... Counsel for the Trustee has the trustee has asked for costs in favour of the trustee against the Attorney General of Canada on a solicitor and client basis. He makes that request on the ground that in the course of argument counsel for the Attorney General of Canada said that the appeal had been brought to settle a point of general importance which would have application in many cases in which the Crown was involved.
> The effect of the Attorney General having taken these court proceedings will be that the expense will be borne by the company, and that will delay payments to the creditors who consented to the proposal, unless the costs amount to a more or less complete indemnification. In those circumstances I consider that this is an appropriate case for an award of costs on a solicitor and client basis under s. 168 of the Bankruptcy Act. ....
> In reaching this conclusion I would follow the decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia in Bankruptcy, in Re Clemenshaw (1962) 4 C.B.R. 17, which was upheld on appeal without reference to the question of costs; to the decision of the Supreme Court of Alberta in Bankruptcy, in Re Mackintosh-Marshall Equipment Ltd. (1964) 7 C.B.R. 84, which was varied slightly with respect to costs on appeal in Re Mackintosh-Marshall 7 C.B.R. 92; and to the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Century 21 Brenmore Real Estate Limited (1980) 33 C.B.R. 107.
> I would award costs in favour of the trustee against the Attorney General of Canada on a solictor and client basis. (at pp. 196-7 in 70 C.B.R.)

[32] I agree with the conclusion of the Superintendent that the point to be decided was a point of general importance which would have application in many proposals across Canada. However, it would be inappropriate for the creditors to bear the costs of that point being settled at a level above the level of Registrars. In the circumstances of this case, I exercise the discretion available to me to award the Trustee solicitor and client costs. I am satisfied that anything less would inappropriately penalize the creditors of Mr. and Ms. Dondale on what amounts to a dispute between the Superintendent and this Trustee. Additionally, I take into account that, despite the recent amendments to the Rules of Court, the amounts available to a successful party under the provisions dealing with Party and Party Costs are hopelessly inadequate. In order to protect the position of the creditors under the Proposal, only costs "as between solicitor and client" are adequate.

[33] I direct that the costs of the Trustee will be assessed before the Registrar "as between solicitor and client".

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Prowse:

NATURE OF APPEAL

[1] This is an appeal from the decision of a trial judge, pronounced August 28, 1996, dismissing the action of Jaston& Company Limited and Mulholland Webster (the "appellants") against John Howard McCarthy, Carol Anne McCarthy and Marjory Irene McCarthy (the "McCarthys"). The action was to set aside two transactions pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, now the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, and the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 142. The trial judge held that the appellants lacked standing to bring the action as a result of their failure to comply with s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, as interpreted by this Court in B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. v. Royal Bank 1992 CanLII 1093 (BC CA), (1992), 74 B.C.L.R. (2d) 332. The trial judge also held that, if the appellants had had standing to bring the action, he would have set aside one of the impugned transactions involving the transfer of Mr. McCarthy's shares in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Developments Ltd. to Ms. Carol McCarthy, but he would have declined to set aside a mortgage made by Mr. and Ms. McCarthy in favour of Mrs. Marjory McCarthy ("Mrs. McCarthy Sr.").

[2] In supplemental reasons for judgment pronounced January 17, 1997, the trial judge dismissed an application by the appellants for reconsideration of his previous decision. He also dismissed as an abuse of process the appellants' application for summary judgment pursuant to a second order obtained by them on September 23, 1996 pursuant to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act.

[3] This appeal was heard by a five-member panel for the purpose of reconsidering its earlier decision in B.N.R. Holdings.

[4] As a matter of convenience, I will refer to the Bankruptcy Act as the "BIA".

ISSUES ON APPEAL

[5] The principal issue on this appeal is whether this Court should follow its earlier decision in B.N.R. Holdings concerning the correct interpretation and application of s. 38 of the BIA, or whether it should adopt a more flexible approach to the interpretation of that section applied in such cases as Imprimerie Canadienne Gazette v. Turcotte (1991), 50 Q.A.C. 152 (C.A.); Toyota Canada v. Imperial Richmond 1993 CanLII 7074 (AB QB), (1993), 10 Alta. L.R. (3d) 127 (Q.B.), affirmed 1994 ABCA 261 (CanLII), (1994), 27 C.B.R. (3d) 1 (Alta. C.A.); leave refused reflex, (1995), 29 C.B.R. (3d) 153 (S.C.C.); and DeGroote v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce 1996 CanLII 8277 (ON SC), (1996), 45 C.B.R. (3d) 132 (Ont. C.J.), affirmed under Re Montego Forest Products Ltd. 1998 CanLII 2640 (ON CA), (1998), 37 O.R. (3d) 651 (C.A.); leave refused (8 October 1998), S.C.C. Bulletin, 1998, p. 1477.

[6] In the event this Court decides to overrule its previous decision in B.N.R. Holdings, two further issues arise. The first is whether the trial judge erred in refusing to exercise his discretion under s. 187(5) or 187(9) of the BIA to amend the original order obtained pursuant to s. 38 of the BIA, nunc pro tunc, to specify the action before him as that which the appellants were permitted to take pursuant to that order. The second is whether the trial judge erred in finding that the mortgage made in favour of Mrs. McCarthy Sr. was executed on August 24, 1989 and, thus, was outside the time limits for transactions which could be successfully attacked under s. 95 of the BIA.

BACKGROUND

[7] A detailed recitation of the background giving rise to these proceedings is set forth in the reasons for judgment of the trial judge, reported at 1996 CanLII 2982 (BC SC), (1996) 41 C.B.R. (3d) 212. For the purposes of this appeal, I will refer only to those aspects of that background which are germane to the issues raised on appeal. I begin with the facts relevant to the s. 38 order and the issue of standing.

[8] On September 5, 1990, Mr. McCarthy, a businessman, made a voluntary assignment into bankruptcy pursuant to s. 49(1) of the BIA. His creditors, and the approximate amount owed to them, were as follows:

Preferred Creditors

1. Revenue Canada Taxation $ 33,668.71

Secured Creditors

1. Bank of Montreal 25,000.00
2. Hamilton Delong Ltd. 66,476.25
3. Jaston & Co. 983,173.75
4. Mulholland Webster 50,223.55
5. Toronto Dominion Bank 9,361.47

[9] On December 2, 1991, Mulholland Webster applied pursuant to s. 38 of the BIA for the following relief:

> a) an order authorizing Mulholland Webster to take this proceeding in its own name and at its own expense and risk pursuant to section 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1979 [sic], c. B-3;

Digitized by Google

b) an order that any benefit derived from this proceeding to the extent of the claim of Mulholland Webster and the costs of the proceedings, belong exclusively to Mulholland Webster and the surplus, if any, belongs to the Estate, pursuant to section 38(3) of the Bankruptcy Act as aforesaid; and

c) an order confirming that service of this Notice of Motion and accompanying documentation by regular mail, postage prepaid to the other creditors of John Howard McCarthy pursuant to the mailing list attached as Minutes to this Notice of Motion at least ten clear days prior to the hearing of this application constitutes satisfactory service of same pursuant to Rule 13 of the General Rules under the Bankruptcy Act as aforesaid.

[10] An affidavit deposed to by a legal assistant at Mulholland Webster was filed in support of the motion. She deposed that Mr. McCarthy had made a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy on September 5, 1990 and that Wolrige Mahon Limited had been appointed as the trustee of the estate. She further deposed that the amount owing to Mulholland Webster pursuant to a certificate under the Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1987, c. 25, s. 73, was $50,223.55. She stated that Mr. Fairburn had attended a meeting of creditors at the offices of the trustee on November 19, 1991 at which the trustee advised that he held only $13,000 on account of the bankruptcy. She stated that Mr. Fairburn had concluded that the trustee would be unable to commence legal proceedings against the bankrupt and that Mulholland Webster had decided to "proceed independently" by applying under s. 38 of the BIA.

[11] Two letters from Mulholland Webster to the trustee were attached to the affidavit in support of the s. 38 order. The first letter, dated June 10, 1991, provided as follows:

> As you are aware, we are a judgment creditor of John Howard McCarthy, being owed the sum of $50,222.55 as of March 16, 1990. We have reviewed the documents enclosed with your letter of January 18, 1991, to our office, including the Joint Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Mr. McCarthy and his wife, Carol Anne McCarthy dated October 31, 1987. This discloses substantial assets on the part of Mr. McCarthy at that time.
>
> We also note that the bankruptcy of Mr. McCarthy was precipitated by a guarantee he granted in favour of Jaston & Company Limited dated June 14, 1988. Our preliminary inquiries have revealed that approximately one month prior to that date Mr. McCarthy disposed of his interest in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. to his wife for the stated consideration of $4.00. In addition, we have learned that Mr. and Mrs. McCarthy disposed of a property in Delta for the sum of $250,000.00 in April, 1990, after mortgaging this property in favour of Marjory Irene McCarthy the previous month for the sum of $180,000.00. The timing of these transactions is strongly suggestive of their being planned to avoid the creditors of Mr. McCarthy.
> We hereby request pursuant to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act that you take proceedings under both the Bankruptcy Act and the Fraudulent Conveyance Act for the benefit of the Estate to challenge these transactions without delay. We require your confirmation within ten days of the date of this letter that you will be initiating such proceedings, failing which we will take steps to assume conduct of this bankruptcy at our own expense and risk.

In its second letter to the trustee dated November 4, 1991, Mulholland Webster again requested the trustee to take action.

[12] It is common ground that the trustee either failed or refused to take action to set aside the transactions referred to by Mulholland Webster in its June 10th letter.

[13] The application for a s. 38 order, together with the materials in support of the order, were served on all creditors of Mr. McCarthy. The only creditor who expressed interest in joining with Mulholland Webster to pursue an action against the McCarthys was Jaston.

[14] The application for a s. 38 order was heard by Mr. Justice B.D. Macdonald on February 4, 1992. No one appeared at the hearing on behalf of the trustee, the Superintendent of Bankruptcy or any of the other creditors. Jaston did not appear, but consented to the order, which is in the following terms:

> THIS COURT ORDERS AND AUTHORIZES Mulholland Webster and Jaston & Co. to take this proceeding in their own names and at their own expense and risk pursuant to section 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1979, c. B-3.
> THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that any benefit derived from this proceeding to the extent of the claims of Mulholland Webster and Jaston & Co. and the costs of the proceedings, belong exclusively to Mulholland Webster and Jaston & Co., and the surplus, if any, belongs to the Estate, pursuant to section 38(3) of the Bankruptcy Act as aforesaid.
> THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS AND CONFIRMS that service of this Notice of Motion and accompanying documentation by regular mail, postage prepaid, to the other Creditors of John Howard McCarthy pursuant to the mailing list attached as Minutes to the Notice of Motion filed the 2nd day of > December, 1991 at least ten (10) clear days prior to the original hearing of this application on the 19th day of December, 1991, constitutes satisfactory service of same.

[15] Thereafter, on March 9, 1992, the appellants commenced action against the McCarthys to set aside the two transactions involving the transfer of shares and the mortgage. The action was discontinued on February 5, 1993, because the appellants had failed to obtain an assignment from the trustee before commencing the action.

[16] The assignment was obtained on February 4, 1993. It provided that the trustee assigned to Mulholland Webster and Jaston & Co.:

> . . . our right, title and interest in the choses in action or proceedings which have accrued or will hereafter accrue to the Estate of John Howard McCarthy, as directed in the Order of Mr. Justice B.D. MacDonald, dated February 4th 1992. . . .

[17] On February 5, 1993, the appellants recommenced their action against the McCarthys seeking the following relief:

> a)a declaration and order that the transfers and transactions complained of aforesaid, are fraudulent and void as against the Plaintiffs, including the transfer of shares of the Defendant John Howard McCarthy in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd., and the granting of the mortgage in favour of the Defendant Marjory Irene McCarthy;
> b)an order transferring the shares of the Defendant John Howard McCarthy in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd. to the Plaintiffs and for such other directions as appropriate;
> c)an order that the Defendants forthwith pay to the Plaintiffs the sum of $180,000.00;

The transactions described in the statement of claim accord with those described in the June 10th letter from Mulholland Webster to the trustee quoted at para. 11 of these reasons and appended to the affidavit in support of the s. 38 application.

[18] On April 13, 1993, the McCarthys filed a statement of defence to the action. The critical paragraph of the statement of defence in relation to the issue of standing is para. 3:

> 3.In answer to the whole of the Statement of Claim the Defendants say that the Plaintiffs are without standing to bring these proceedings as the Order obtained by the Plaintiffs pursuant to section 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1979, chapter B-3, did not authorize or empower the Plaintiffs to assert the specific causes of action that are hereby asserted nor did it authorize and direct Wolrige Mahon Limited, the Trustee of the Estate of John Howard McCarthy, a bankrupt to assign such causes of action to the Plaintiffs.

[19] Although counsel for each of the parties indicated at various times during the course of the proceedings which followed that they were going to take steps to resolve the issue of standing, neither took the initiative to do so. Rather, the issue was left to be determined at trial. Following a nine-day trial, the issue was resolved against the appellants.

DECISION AT TRIAL

[20] In dealing with the issue of standing, the trial judge relied on the decision of this Court in B.N.R. Holdings and concluded that the appellants had not brought themselves strictly within s. 38 of the BIA. In particular, the trial judge concluded that the s. 38 order obtained by the appellants did not authorize them to bring the action for the relief they sought in their statement of claim. He noted that the wording of the order authorized the appellants to take "this proceeding" in their own names and at their own expense, and he concluded that "this proceeding" must mean the bankruptcy proceeding in which the s. 38 order was obtained. At para. 10 of his reasons, the trial judge stated:

> The order does not expressly authorize the plaintiffs to take the present action; rather, it authorizes them to take the proceeding in which it was granted — the bankruptcy proceeding. Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that the authorization to take the bankruptcy proceeding, supplemented by the consequent assignment from the trustee, clothes the plaintiffs with authority to take any proceedings the trustee might have taken that the plaintiffs may consider to be for the benefit of the estate, including this action. The assignment, which was of "the choses in action or proceedings which have accrued or will hereafter accrue to the estate" of Mr. McCarthy, is of no effect unless it has been first authorized by an order made pursuant to s. 38(1): B.N.R. Investments [sic] Ltd., supra, at p. 340. I cannot agree that the plaintiffs are authorized to receive an assignment of the present causes of action and to bring this action by virtue of an order authorizing them to take the bankruptcy proceeding. What is required is an express authorization to commence action on the particular claims presented here. That conclusion is supported by a consideration of the words used in the section, by judicial interpretations of the section, and by bankruptcy practice.

The trial judge went on to emphasize that Parliament's intent in enacting s. 38 was to ensure that creditors of a bankrupt obtain an authorization and an assignment "in respect of distinct, identified claims."

[21] The trial judge next dealt with the appellants' alternative submission that, if the s. 38 order was not effective to give them standing, the court should exercise its remedial powers under ss. 187(5) and (9) of the BIA to grant them standing, or to vary the order nunc pro tunc to permit them to bring the action. The trial judge rejected this submission on the basis that lack of standing was not a "formal defect" or an "irregularity" within the meaning of s. 187(9), but was a matter of substance. Further, he refused to amend the order since to do so would be to grant the appellants standing nunc pro tunc which, in his view, would be inconsistent with B.N.R. Holdings.

[22] The trial judge went on to state that, even if he had the power to amend the order nunc pro tunc and thereby effectively grant the appellants standing retroactively, he would decline to exercise it in their favour. He based this decision on the appellants' delay in resolving the issue of standing after it was brought to their attention, and on his view that there was some prospect that the other creditors might have chosen to participate in the proceedings if the s. 38 order had specified the action which the appellants intended to pursue.

[23] Although the trial judge resolved the issue of standing against the appellants, he, nonetheless, went on to deal with the action on its merits. I will discuss his findings with respect to the merits later in my reasons.

DISCUSSION OF THE ISSUES

(1) The Appellants' Standing

(a) Relevant Provisions of the BIA

[24] The relevant provisions of the BIA for the purpose of this discussion are s. 38 and ss. 187(5) and (9).

[25] Section 38 provides:

> 38. (1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk, on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding, and on such other terms and conditions as the court may direct.
> (2) On an order under subsection (1) being made the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject-matter of the proceeding, including any document in support thereof.
> (3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.
> (4) Where, before an order is made under subsection (1), the trustee, with the permission of the inspectors, signifies to the court his readiness to institute the proceeding for the benefit of the creditors, the order shall fix the time within which he shall do so, and in that case the benefit derived from the proceeding, if instituted within the time so fixed, belongs to the estate.

[26] Sections 187(5) and (9) provide:

> 187 Every court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction.
>
> . . .
> (9) No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

(b) The s. 38 Order

[27] The order obtained by the appellants pursuant to s. 38 of the BIA is set out at para. 14 of these reasons. In my view, the trial judge was correct in finding that this order does not comply with s. 38 of the BIA. In particular, it does not correctly set out the proceeding or proceedings which the appellants intended to pursue at their own expense and for their own benefit. Rather, according to its terms, it purports to permit the appellants to take over the bankruptcy proceeding. While the material filed in support of the order makes it clear that the two transactions which the appellants were seeking to set aside were those attacked in the action which they subsequently commenced, this is not evident on the face of the order. The matter is further confused by the wording of the assignment obtained pursuant to the order, which purports to grant the appellants the right to pursue unspecified actions in existence at the time of the assignment, or discovered thereafter.

[28] In summary, I agree with the trial judge that the appellants failed to comply with s. 38 of the BIA by failing to specify adequately in their order the precise proceeding or proceedings which they were seeking to pursue on their own behalf. I also agree with the trial judge that, in the absence of an amendment to the order, it did not grant the appellants standing to commence this action against the McCarthys. Nor could the assignment obtained pursuant to the order grant standing to commence an action which was not specified in the order.

Digitized by Google

[29] The troubling issue which then arises is whether the trial judge erred in concluding that he had no power to amend the order, nunc pro tunc, to permit the appellants to specify this action as that which they intended to pursue. As earlier noted, the trial judge relied on the decision of this Court in B.N.R. Holdings as authority for the proposition that a failure to comply strictly with the requirements of s. 38 rendered the proceedings taken pursuant to the order a nullity.

(c) The Decision in B.N.R. Holdings

[30] The facts in B.N.R. Holdings were somewhat unusual. B.N.R. Ltd. ("B.N.R.") owned and operated a restaurant. The principals of B.N.R., Mr. and Mrs. Bishop, personally guaranteed a loan by the Royal Bank to B.N.R. Within a short period of time, B.N.R. went into bankruptcy and a trustee was appointed. The trustee was discharged in March 1982 leaving B.N.R. an undischarged bankrupt. In April, 1985, B.N.R. was struck from the register of companies for failure to file annual reports.

[31] In November 1985, B.N.R. and Mr. and Mrs. Bishop commenced an action in contract and in tort against the bank, the trustee and the former lessor of the restaurant premises. No order had been obtained under s. 38. The defendants applied to strike their statement of claim, and Mr. and Mrs. Bishop applied for an order under s. 38 of the BIA, nunc pro tunc, to allow them to proceed with the action. The trial judge concluded that it was appropriate to make the latter order on the basis that there was no prejudice to the defendants.

[32] This Court allowed the defendants' appeal. Mr. Justice Seaton, speaking for the Court, succinctly summarized the issue before the Court as follows, at p. 333:

> The narrow question of law raised by this appeal [from 14 C.B.R. (3d) 233, [1992] B.C.W.L.D. 556] is whether the leave contemplated by s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, can be given after the trustee has been discharged, the company has been struck from the register and the action that was started years ago without regard for the section is plodding towards trial.

In concluding that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order nunc pro tunc, it is apparent that Mr. Justice Seaton considered himself bound by an earlier decision of this Court. At p. 339 of the decision, he stated:

> In Sigurdson v. Reid 1980 CanLII 381 (BC CA), (1980), 26 B.C.L.R. 336, 37 C.B.R. (N.S.) 146, 118 D.L.R. (3d) 555, this court decided that an action commenced without leave under s. 215 (then s. 186) of the Bankruptcy Act was a nullity and leave could not be granted nunc pro tunc. The court adopted with approval the language of Henry J. in Re Pelee Motor Inn Ltd. (1979), 30 C.B.R. (N.S.) 216, at p. 217 (Ont. H.C.):
> The situation therefore is embraced by s. 186, and according to the plain words of the section leave is required. Not only that, but it is also clear that no action lies unless leave is acquired, and hence it is a condition precedent to the right to issue the writ that leave be given before that time.

[33] Seaton J.A. noted that, while the Pelee decision had not been followed in later decisions in Ontario, that did not make the Sigurdson decision any less authoritative in British Columbia. He went on, at p. 340, to discuss the necessary steps to be taken under s. 38 of the BIA:

> Section 38 offers an avenue by which a creditor can present a claim of the bankrupt and thereby recover its own claim against the bankrupt. The steps to be taken are clear:
> (1) The creditor must request the trustee to take proceedings,
> (2) The trustee must refuse or neglect to take the proceedings,
> (3) The creditor must apply to the court for an order authorizing it to take proceedings in its own name,
> (4) Notice of the contemplated proceedings must be given to the other creditors,
> (5) The trustee must assign and transfer the claim to the creditor.
> These are not just procedural steps. The assignment is essential — it is the foundation for the action. Clearly each of the other steps must precede the assignment.
> [Emphasis added]

[34] Mr. Justice Seaton also cited with approval a passage from L.W. Houlden & C.H. Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law of Canada, 3rd ed., vol. 1 (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) stating that, since the right of a creditor to take proceedings in the name of the trustee is purely statutory, a creditor must bring himself strictly within s. 38 in order to do so.

(d) Other Appellate Authorities Considering s. 38

[35] Since B.N.R. Holdings was decided, the Alberta Court of Appeal and the Ontario Court of Appeal have considered the interpretation and application of s. 38 of the BIA in Toyota Canada and Re Montego Forest Products, supra, respectively. In each of those decisions, the courts rejected the strict interpretation adopted in B.N.R. Holdings in favour of a more flexible approach. An earlier decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, Imprimerie, supra, which was not referred to in B.N.R. Holdings, also adopted a more flexible approach to the application of s. 38.

[36] In Imprimerie, the trustee elected not to continue a paulian action (to attack a fraudulent transfer) commenced prior to the bankruptcy against a party who subsequently went bankrupt. The creditor who had originally commenced the action, sought an order under s. 38 permitting it to continue with the action. The trial judge dismissed the application. Several issues were raised on appeal, one of which was whether leave of the court was required under s. 38 to permit the creditor to continue with the action. Mr. Justice Fish, speaking for the court, concluded that leave was required. In so doing, he followed an earlier decision of that court which held that s. 38 of the BIA required the pursuing creditor to satisfy two conditions precedent: the first was to ask the trustee to take proceedings; the second, if the trustee refused or failed to act, was to obtain the court's authorization. In other words, the court identified only two of the five steps set out in B.N.R. Holdings and referred to in para. 32 of these reasons as conditions precedent to a valid action.

[37] Subsequent to the Imprimerie decision, on facts more closely resembling those in this appeal, the Quebec Court of Appeal indicated that there was room for even greater flexibility in the interpretation and application of s. 38.

[38] In Banque Royale du Canada v. Dupont (syndic), [1993] A.Q. No. 3 (Q.C.A.), the bank commenced an action to have a transfer of property by a husband to his wife shortly before the husband went into bankruptcy declared invalid. The bank failed to obtain leave under s. 38 prior to commencing its action. The bankrupt applied to dismiss the action on the basis that the failure to obtain leave under s. 38 of the BIA precluded the bank from pursuing its claim. The trial judge stayed the application for dismissal so that it could be tried at the same time as the bank's application for leave under s. 38.

[39] The Court of Appeal dismissed the bankrupt's appeal. In so doing, the court stated that the Imprimerie decision did not decide the question of whether the court could remedy the default where a creditor failed to obtain authorization from the court under s. 38 prior to commencing proceedings. In other words, the court left open the possibility that failure to comply with this aspect of s. 38 did not automatically render the proceeding taken in the absence of such authorization a nullity.

[40] In Toyota Canada, supra, the Alberta Court of Appeal considered the interpretation and application of s. 38. There, a creditor of the bankrupt obtained an order under s. 38 of the BIA without notice to the other creditors. It was a term of the order that the other creditors be given 60 days after service of the order upon them to participate in the action. The order and subsequent assignment from the trustee were obtained the last day before the limitation period for the action expired.

[41] The defendants sought to set aside the order and strike the statement of claim on the basis that there had not been strict compliance with s. 38 of the BIA. The principal breach of s. 38 relied on by the appellants was the failure of the pursuing creditor to give notice of the application to the other creditors before commencing the action. The appellants relied on the decision of this Court in B.N.R. Holdings for the proposition that this failure to comply strictly with s. 38 was fatal to the action.

[42] Madam Justice Conrad, speaking for the court, identified two issues: (1) whether s. 38 required notice to other creditors to be given before the action is commenced, and (2) if so, whether failure to do so was fatal to the action, or simply a procedural irregularity which could be cured. In addressing these issues, she referred to the general approach to the interpretation of the Bankruptcy Act adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada in Mercure v. A. Marquette & Fils, 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547, at 556:

> Before going on to another point it is perhaps not inappropriate to recall that the Bankruptcy Act, while not business legislation in the strict sense, clearly has its origins in the business world. Interpretation of it must take these origins into account. It concerns relations among businessmen, and to interpret it using an overly narrow, legalistic approach is to misinterpret it. It seems to me that appellant is urging the Court to so interpret it.
> [Emphasis added]

[43] In the result, Madam Justice Conrad concluded that s. 38 did not require that notice be given to the other creditors before commencement of the action and that, while notice must be given, its timing was flexible. In so doing she expressed her preference for the approach taken by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Imprimerie to that taken by this Court in B.N.R. Holdings.

[44] In the event she was wrong in her interpretation of the notice provision, Madam Justice Conrad concluded that failure to give notice prior to the commencement of the action was merely a procedural irregularity which could be cured under s. 187(9) of the BIA. She would have applied the curative provision on the basis that none of the creditors had suffered prejudice.

[45] In Re Montego Forest Products, the Ontario Court of Appeal also declined to follow the approach to the interpretation and application of s. 38 adopted by this Court in B.N.R. Holdings. In that case, Montego Forest Products was petitioned into bankruptcy in 1990 by one of its secured creditors, C.I.B.C. In 1992, Montego and its principal shareholder, Roger DeGroote, together with others, commenced an action, against the C.I.B.C. and the trustee in bankruptcy claiming damages for breach of contract, trespass, conversion, and improvident realization of the assets of Montego. The trustee had neither refused nor failed to take action and no order had been obtained under s. 38 of the BIA. The action was defended on the merits and the defendants did not take exception to the failure of the plaintiffs to obtain a s. 38 order until May, 1996. At that time, the defendants applied to have the action dismissed on the basis that it was a nullity. Madam Justice Lax held that the failure to obtain an order under s. 38 was an irregularity which could be cured by making an order under s. 38, nunc pro tunc, granting Montego leave to continue the action on its own behalf and on behalf of other creditors. The defendants appealed.

[46] The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. In so doing, the court set forth the issue and its resolution at 653-4 of the decision:

> Reduced to its essentials, the argument before this court was whether - as the appellants urged - the failure to obtain a s. 38 order before the commencement of the action was a foundational defect that rendered the action a nullity or whether - as the respondents urged - such failure constituted only an irregularity that could be cured by the making of a s. 38 order nunc pro tunc. This question has been addressed, with differing results, by appellate courts in Alberta and British Columbia. The Alberta Court of Appeal has held that non-compliance with s. 38 is a procedural irregularity which can be cured after the event: Toyota Canada Inc. v. Imperial Richmond Holdings Ltd. [citation given]. The British Columbia Court of Appeal has held that a s. 38 order is the foundation for the action and that failure to obtain such an order cannot be cured after the event: B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. v. Royal Bank [citation given]. We respectfully prefer the view of the Alberta Court of Appeal, and adopt the conclusion of Lax J. that the commencement of an action without the consent or refusal of the trustee and without a s. 38 order is an irregularity only, which may be cured through the mechanism of an order nunc pro tunc.
> Counsel for the appellants submitted that this result would open the door to a plethora of actions instituted without a s. 38 order in the confident expectation that the court would bestow its approval retroactively. We do not consider that concern to be realistic. It is not every case that will lend itself to the granting of a s. 38 order nunc pro tunc. Circumstances alter cases: the facts presented in many cases may not engage the discretion of the court to make such an order, whereas the facts presented in others may invite the exercise of that discretion. The present case falls into the latter category. This action (to which, it should be recalled, the trustee was a party from its inception [as a defendant]) proceeded for more than four years without objection by the appellants. Such objection was first raised the day before the scheduled pretrial conference, on the eve of the expiry, of the limitation period. In the words of Lax J., it was first put forward "only after much time and money had been expended by all parties to the litigation . . . [despite the fact that] the defendant Peat, as trustee of the bankrupt's estate, must have known of the absence of a s. 38 order". In these circumstances, it was open to Lax J. to exercise her discretion as she did, and we are not persuaded that she made any error in so doing.

(e) Conclusion - Nullity or Irregularity

[47] It is apparent from the authorities to which I have referred that the courts are moving away from a strict approach to the interpretation and application of s. 38 toward a more flexible approach more in keeping with that espoused by the Supreme Court of Canada in Marquette & Fils, supra. This trend has resulted in the courts treating some or all of the steps set forth in s. 38 as being of a procedural, rather than a substantive nature. As a consequence, failure to comply, or incomplete compliance, with those steps has been treated as an irregularity which the court has the power to cure in appropriate circumstances. In my view, this is a salutary development since it permits the court to decide actions on their merits in circumstances in which the court is satisfied that non-compliance with s. 38 has not resulted in prejudice to any party or to other creditors of the bankrupt.

[48] The purpose of s. 38 of the BIA is to permit a creditor, or creditors, of the bankrupt to pursue actions in their own name and at their own expense and risk where the trustee has refused or failed to do so. A narrow interpretation of s. 38, which treats each of the steps set forth in it as a condition precedent to a valid action, is contrary to this purpose since it renders actions which have not been taken in strict compliance with s. 38 a nullity, without regard to whether anyone has been prejudiced by the non-compliance.

[49] In my view, the approach to the interpretation of s. 38 expressed by Mr. Justice Whalen in the following passages from Penfold v. Provenzano 1996 CanLII 8035 (ON SC), (1996), 42 C.B.R. (3d) 148, at paras. 16 and 18 (Ont. Gen. Div.), quoted with approval by Madam Justice Lax at para. 17 of DeGroote, supra, is apposite:

> To begin with, I agree the interpretation of Section 38 should be large and liberal, in favour of its intended purposes and beneficiaries. Section 12 of the Interpretation Act, 1985, R.S.C. I-21 provides:
> 12. Every enactment is deemed remedial and shall be given such fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation as best ensures the attainment of its objects.
> * * *

> If the creditors seeking the benefit of Section 38 fail, then they do so at their own risk, without consequence to the trustee or bankrupt. Therefore, a liberal interpretation of Section 38 accommodates the purposes intended and without prejudice to the bankrupt (in this case, the defendants). The contrasting, narrow approach proposed in the B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. case is interpretively inconsistent with these purposes.

[50] I also agree with the view expressed by the trial judge in Toyota Canada that the purpose of s. 38 is to protect the rights of creditors of the bankrupt to sue in the event of a refusal or failure of the trustee to act. In addition, s. 38 endeavours to treat all creditors equally by providing that they be given notice so that they may decide whether they wish to participate in the action.

[51] Nor am I persuaded that treating a failure to comply with s. 38 as an irregularity capable of being cured will operate as an open invitation to creditors to ignore s. 38. Non-compliance will invariably jeopardize the right of the creditor to continue with the action in the event that the failure has resulted in significant prejudice to a party to the action or to another creditor.

[52] In this case, all of the concerns raised by counsel for the McCarthys as to the dire consequences which will flow from taking a more liberal approach to the interpretation and application of s. 38 turn on potential prejudice to others. These concerns are matters well suited to resolution by the exercise of the trial judge's discretion in deciding whether the curative provisions of the BIA should be applied.

[53] In the result, I am persuaded that the preferred approach to the interpretation and application of s. 38 is the more liberal and flexible approach adopted by the Courts of Appeal in Quebec, Alberta and Ontario. Of those decisions, the facts in Re Montego Forest Products most closely resemble those here.

[54] In this case, the trial judge adopted the approach to the interpretation of s. 38 established by this Court in B.N.R. Holdings, as he was bound to do. Because I am of the view that this approach should no longer be applied, I would set aside the finding of the trial judge that the failure of the appellants to comply strictly with s. 38 deprived them of standing to bring the action. Rather, I conclude that the non-compliance in this case amounted to an irregularity within the meaning of s. 187(9) which was capable of being cured by a variation of the order under s. 187(5).

[55] The next question which then arises is whether the trial judge erred in his alternative finding that, assuming he had a discretion to cure the irregularity, he would not have exercised it in favour of the appellants.

(f) Application of s. 187(5) and (9)

[56] The appellants relied on a combination of s. 187(5) and (9) of the BIA in asking the trial judge to cure the defect by amending the s. 38 order obtained before Mr. Justice Macdonald nunc pro tunc. The application of these curative provisions in any particular case is discretionary.

[57] In deciding whether the trial judge erred in the exercise of his discretion, the standard of review which this Court must apply is that set forth in such cases as Elsom v. Elsom, 1989 CanLII 100 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1367, where Mr. Justice Gonthier, speaking for the court, stated that an appellate court should not interfere with the exercise of a trial judge's discretion unless the trial judge has misdirected himself or unless his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice.

[58] In this case, the trial judge gave two reasons for refusing to exercise his discretion in favour of the appellants. First, he relied on the appellants' delay in seeking to resolve the issue of standing despite early notice that this was an issue. Second, he found that other creditors of Mr. McCarthy may have been prejudiced by the fact that the appellants had not specified in the order the precise action they were seeking to pursue.

[59] In my view, the second reason given by the trial judge for refusing to exercise his discretion in favour of the appellants is flawed. The materials before the trial judge were such that it could not reasonably be said that any of the creditors were prejudiced by the failure of the appellants to specify the precise action they intended to commence pursuant to the s. 38 order. As noted earlier, the two transactions that the appellants were seeking to pursue were identified in the materials filed in support of the order. Those materials were served on the creditors, together with an invitation to contact the solicitor for the appellants if they had any questions. Of the creditors served, only Jaston expressed any interest in participating in an action against the McCarthys. The action commenced by the appellants claimed relief limited to setting aside the transactions referred to in the materials served on the creditors. I am unable to see how any of them could have been misled in these circumstances. Even if the order requested and granted could be viewed as enabling the appellants to commence actions beyond setting aside the two transactions referred to in the materials filed in support of it, application of the curative provision would have narrowed the scope of the order to restrict the action to those transactions. This could only have operated to the benefit of the creditors.

[60] The fact that the creditors did not express any interest in participating in the action when served with notice of the second order under s. 38 (which correctly identified the action the appellants were seeking to pursue) also lends support to the conclusion that they were not prejudiced by the defect in the original order.

Digitized by Google

[61] Since I have concluded that the trial judge erred in one of the two bases upon which he declined to exercise his discretion in favour of the appellants, it is open to this Court to make the order that the trial judge should have made. While I agree with the chambers judge that it would have been preferable for the appellants to have taken steps to clarify the issue of standing prior to trial, it was also open to the McCarthys to do so. Delay in moving to resolve that issue is not, in itself, a sufficient basis for refusing to amend the order. Prejudice to one of the parties or to the creditors would be a proper basis for refusing to do so. In this case, however, I am unable to find that there would be any prejudice to a party or to any of the creditors in varying the original order nunc pro tunc to specify the cause of action which was in fact pursued. On the other hand, there would be serious prejudice to the appellants in refusing to do so, given the findings of the trial judge in their favour on the merits of the action, at least in relation to the impugned share transaction.

[62] In the result, I would make an order that the order of Macdonald J. be amended, nunc pro tunc, to provide, in part, as follows:

> THIS COURT ORDERS that Mulholland Webster and Jaston & Company Limited be and are hereby authorized to take proceedings in their own names and at their own expense and risk, for the purpose of setting aside the transfer by John Howard McCarthy to Carol Anne McCarthy of his shares in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd., as a fraudulent conveyance pursuant to the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 142, as amended, and ancillary relief in relation thereto.
> THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that Mulholland Webster and Jaston & Company Limited be and are hereby authorized to take proceedings in their own names and at their own expense and risk, for the purpose of setting aside a mortgage granted by John Howard McCarthy and Carol Anne McCarthy to Marjory Irene McCarthy, which mortgage is dated August 24, 1989 and was registered in the Vancouver Land Registry office on March 9, 1990, pursuant to s. 95 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3.
> THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that any benefit derived from the proceedings taken pursuant to the preceding two paragraphs, to the extent of their claims and the costs, belong exclusively to Mulholland Webster and Jaston& Company Limited, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate of John Howard McCarthy, in bankruptcy.

Once the amended order is entered, the appellants should seek an assignment from the trustee consistent with the wording of the order.

(2) The Merits of the Action

[63] The trial judge found that the transaction whereby Mr. McCarthy transferred all of his shares in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd. to Ms. McCarthy was a fraudulent conveyance contrary to the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. This finding is not challenged on appeal.

[64] The appellants, however, submitted that the trial judge erred in finding that a mortgage granted by Mr. and Ms. McCarthy to Mrs. McCarthy Sr. in the amount of $180,000 did not amount to a fraudulent preference contrary to s. 95 of the BIA. In particular, the appellants submitted that the trial judge erred in finding that the mortgage was executed on August 24, 1989 rather than on March 9, 1990. If the mortgage had been executed on the latter date, it would have fallen within the one-year period during which transactions between related parties could successfully be attacked by virtue of a combination of ss. 95 and 96 of the BIA. Those sections provide, in part, as follows:

> 95. (1) Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any insolvent person in favour of any creditor or of any person in trust for any creditor with a view to giving that creditor a preference over the other creditors is, where it is made, incurred, taken or suffered within the period beginning on the day that is three months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date the insolvent person became bankrupt, both dates included, deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.
> (2) Where any conveyance, transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding mentioned in subsection (1) has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, or over any one or more of them, it shall be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been made, incurred, taken, paid or suffered with a view to giving the creditor a preference over other creditors, whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be admissible to support the transaction.
> 96. Where the conveyance, transfer, charge, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding mentioned in section 95 is in favour of a person related to the insolvent person, the period referred to in subsection 95(1) shall be one year instead of three months.

[65] Counsel for the appellants referred to evidence from which the trial judge could have inferred that the mortgage was executed on March 9, 1990, including the fact that the mortgage was registered on that date. Counsel also submitted that the trial judge's negative findings regarding the credibility of Mr. and Ms. McCarthy with respect to other aspects of their testimony should have raised grave suspicions in his mind concerning their credibility with respect to the impugned mortgage transaction, so as to give rise to a prima facie case of fraud.

[66] The trial judge dealt with each of the arguments raised by the appellants in support of their position that the mortgage had been executed on March 9, 1990. After a thorough review of the evidence in that regard, including documents supporting Mr. and Mrs. McCarthy's evidence about the date the mortgage was executed, he concluded that it was executed on the date on its face, namely, August 24, 1989. Evidence of the solicitor before whom Mr. and Mrs. McCarthy executed the mortgage regarding his usual practice in attending to the execution of mortgages supported this conclusion.

[67] Counsel for the appellants drew our attention to a second date stamp on the mortgage bearing the date March 9, 1990. This date stamp was not put to any witness at trial, nor was it drawn to the attention of the trial judge. Its significance, therefore, is unknown. It is not improbable that it was placed on the document at the time the document was accepted for registration. In any event, it does not provide a reliable basis for overturning the decision of the trial judge on this issue.

[68] As has been stated on many occasions, it is not the function of this Court to substitute findings of fact or credibility for those of a trial judge in the absence of palpable and overriding error. In my view, the finding of the trial judge with respect to the date the mortgage was executed was supported by the evidence and cannot be said to be the product of palpable and overriding error.

[69] In the result, I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

CONCLUSION

[70] I would allow the appeal to the extent of setting aside the order dismissing the action, amending the order of Mr. Justice Macdonald dated February 4, 1992, nunc pro tunc, as set forth in para. 62 of these reasons, and making a further order including the following provisions:

(a) a declaration and order that the transfer of the shares of John Howard McCarthy in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and in Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd. to Carol Anne Mccarthy are fraudulent transfers pursuant to the Fraudulent Conveyance Act and void and of no effect as against Jaston & Company Limited and Mulholland Webster;

(b) an accounting of the assets of McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd. subsequent to May 1, 1988, and their disposition thereafter;

(c) such further and other orders as are necessary to give effect to the orders set forth in paras. (a) and (b).

[71] Subsequent to the hearing of this appeal, counsel provided submissions with respect to what further directions, if any, should be provided to the Supreme Court for the purpose of giving effect to the judgment of this Court. In my view, it would be preferable to leave the specific form of order arising from the setting aside of these transactions to the Supreme Court to be dealt with on the basis of further submissions before that court.

[72] With respect to the issue of costs, there was divided success. Further, it was the failure of the appellants to obtain the proper form of order in the first instance which gave rise to the issue of standing at trial and led to the necessity of this appeal. For that reason, I would order each party to bear its own costs, both of the trial and of the appeal.

Wise Stores Inc. ("Wise") acquired Peoples Department Stores Inc. ("Peoples") from Marks and Spencer Canada Inc. ("M & S"). L.W., R.W. and H.W. (the "Wise brothers") were majority shareholders, officers and directors of Wise, and the only directors of Peoples. Because of covenants imposed by M & S, Peoples could not be merged with Wise until the purchase price had been paid. Almost from the outset, the joint operation of Wise and Peoples did not function smoothly.

Parallel bookkeeping, combined with shared warehousing arrangements, caused serious problems for both companies. As a result, their inventory records were increasingly incorrect. The situation, already unsustainable, was worsening. L.W. consulted the vice-president of administration and finance of both Wise and Peoples in an attempt to find a solution. On his recommendation, the Wise brothers agreed to implement a joint inventory procurement policy whereby the two firms would divide responsibility for purchasing. Peoples would make all purchases from North American suppliers and Wise would, in turn, make all purchases from overseas suppliers. Peoples would then transfer to Wise what it had purchased for Wise, charging Wise accordingly, and vice versa. The new policy was implemented on February 1, 1994. Before the end of the year, both Wise and Peoples declared bankruptcy. Peoples' trustee filed a petition against the Wise brothers. The trustee claimed that they had favoured the interests of Wise over Peoples to the detriment of Peoples' creditors, in breach of their duties as directors under s. 122(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act ("CBCA"). In the alternative, the trustee claimed that the Wise brothers had in the year preceding the bankruptcy been privy to transactions in which Peoples' assets had been transferred to Wise for conspicuously less than fair market value within the meaning of s. 100 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"). The trial judge found the Wise brothers liable on both grounds. The Court of Appeal set aside the trial judge's decision.
Held: The appeal should be dismissed. The Wise brothers did not breach their duties under s. 122(1) of the CBCA, nor were the impugned transactions in violation of s. 100 of the BIA.

The fiduciary duty under s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA requires directors and officers to act in good faith and honestly vis-à-vis the corporation. Here, the trial judge found that there was no fraud or dishonesty in the Wise brothers' attempts to solve the mounting inventory problems of Peoples and Wise. The Wise brothers considered the serious inventory management problem and implemented a joint inventory procurement policy they hoped would solve it. In the absence of evidence of a personal interest or improper purpose in the new policy, and in light of the evidence of a desire to make both Wise and Peoples "better" corporations, the directors did not breach their fiduciary duty under s. 122(1)(a). An honest and good faith attempt to redress a corporation's financial problems does not, if unsuccessful, qualify as such a breach. The fiduciary duty does not change when a corporation is in the nebulous "vicinity of insolvency". At all times, they owe their fiduciary obligations to the corporation, and the corporations' interests are not to be confused with the interests of the creditors or those of any other stakeholder. There is no need to read the interests of creditors into the fiduciary duty set out in s. 122(1)(a) in light of the availability under the CBCA both of the oppression remedy (s. 241(2)(c)) and of an action based on the duty of care (s. 122(1)(b)).

Directors and officers will not be held to be in breach of the duty of care under s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA if they act prudently and on a reasonably informed basis. The standard of care is an objective one. The decisions of directors and officers must be reasonable business decisions in light of all the circumstances, including the prevailing socio-economic conditions, about which they knew or ought to have known. While courts are ill-suited and should be reluctant to second-guess the application of business expertise to the considerations that are often involved in corporate decision-making, they are capable, on the facts of any case, of determining whether an appropriate degree of prudence and diligence was brought to bear in reaching what is claimed to be a reasonable business decision. In this case, in adopting the joint inventory procurement policy, the directors did not breach their duty of care in respect of Peoples' creditors. The implementation of the new policy was a reasonable business decision made with a view to rectifying a serious and urgent business problem in circumstances in which no solution may have been possible. The trial judge's conclusion that the new policy led inexorably to Peoples' failure and bankruptcy was factually incorrect and constituted a palpable and overriding error. Many factors other than the new policy contributed more directly to Peoples' bankruptcy.
Section 44(2) of the CBCA as it then read (the provision has since been repealed) cannot exempt directors and officers from potential liability under s. 122(1) for any financial assistance given by subsidiaries to the parent corporation. Nor can the Wise brothers successfully invoke good faith reliance on the opinion of the vice-president of administration and finance under s. 123(4)(b) of the CBCA. As a non-professional employee, the vice-president did not belong to any of the professional groups named in s. 123(4)(b). He was not an accountant, was not subject to the regulatory overview of any professional organization and did not carry independent insurance coverage for professional negligence.
The trustee's claim under s. 100 of the BIA must fail. The relevant transactions are those spanning the period from February to December 1994 when the new procurement policy was in effect. With regard to all the circumstances of this case, a disparity of slightly more than six percent between fair market value and the consideration received does not constitute a conspicuous difference.

While, in light of this conclusion, there is no need to consider whether the Wise brothers would have been "privy" to the transactions, the disagreement between the trial judge and the Court of Appeal on the interpretation of "privy" in s. 100(2) of the BIA warrants the following comments. Since the provision's remedial purpose is to reverse the effects of a transaction that stripped value from the estate of a bankrupt person, the word "privy" should be given a broad reading to include those who benefit directly or indirectly from, and have knowledge of, a transaction occurring for less than fair market value. This rationale is particularly apt when those who benefit are the controlling minds behind the transaction.

I. Introduction

1 The principal question raised by this appeal is whether directors of a corporation owe a fiduciary duty to the corporation's creditors comparable to the statutory duty owed to the corporation. For the reasons that follow, we conclude that directors owe a duty of care to creditors, but that duty does not rise to a fiduciary duty. We agree with the disposition of the Quebec Court of Appeal. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

2 As a result of the demise in the mid-1990s of two major retail chains in eastern Canada, Wise Stores Inc. ("Wise") and its wholly-owned subsidiary, Peoples Department Stores Inc. ("Peoples"), the indebtedness of a number of Peoples' creditors went unsatisfied. In the wake of the failure of the two chains, Caron Bélanger Ernst & Young Inc., Peoples' trustee in bankruptcy ("trustee"), brought an action against the directors of Peoples. To address the trustee's claims, the extent of the duties imposed by s. 122(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44 ("CBCA"), upon directors with respect to creditors must be determined; we must also identify the purpose and reach of s. 100 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA").

3 In our view, it has not been established that the directors of Peoples violated either the fiduciary duty or the duty of care imposed by s. 122(1) of the CBCA. As for the trustee's submission regarding s. 100 of the BIA, we agree with the Court of Appeal that the consideration received in the impugned transactions was not "conspicuously" less than fair market value. The BIA claim fails on that basis.

II. Background

4 Wise was founded by Alex Wise in 1930 as a small clothing store on St-Hubert Street in Montreal. By 1992, through expansion effected by a mix of internal growth and acquisitions, it had become an enterprise operating at 50 locations with annual sales of approximately $100 million, and it had been listed on the Montreal Stock Exchange in 1986. The stores were, for the most part, located in urban areas in Quebec. The founder's three sons, Lionel, Ralph and Harold Wise ("Wise brothers"), were majority shareholders, officers, and directors of Wise. Together, they controlled 75 percent of the firm's equity.

5 In 1992, Peoples had been in business continuously in one form or another for 78 years. It had operated as an unincorporated division of Marks & Spencer Canada Inc. ("M & S") until 1991, when it was incorporated as a separate company. M & S itself was wholly owned by the large British firm, Marks & Spencer plc. ("M & S plc."). Peoples' 81 stores were generally located in rural areas, from Ontario to Newfoundland. Peoples had annual sales of about $160 million, but was struggling financially. Its annual losses were in the neighbourhood of $10 million.

6 Wise and Peoples competed with other chains such as Canadian Tire, Greenberg, Hart, K-Mart, M-Stores, Metropolitan Stores, Rossy, Woolco and Zellers. Retail competition in eastern Canada was intense in the early 1990s. In 1992, M-Stores went bankrupt. In 1994, Greenberg and Metropolitan Stores followed M-Stores into bankruptcy. The 1994 entry of Wal-Mart into the Canadian market, with its acquisition of over 100 Woolco stores from Woolworth Canada Inc., exerted significant additional competitive pressure on retail stores.

7 Lionel Wise, the eldest of the three brothers and Wise's executive vice-president, had expressed an interest in acquiring the ailing Peoples chain from M & S as early as 1988. Initially, M & S did not share Wise's interest for the sale, but by late 1991, M & S plc., the British parent company of M & S, had decided to divest itself of all its Canadian operations. At this point, M & S incorporated each of its three Canadian divisions to facilitate the anticipated divestiture thereof.

8 The new-found desire to sell coincided with Wise's previously expressed interest in acquiring its larger rival. Although M & S had initially hoped to sell Peoples for cash to a large firm in a solid financial condition, it was unable to do so. Consequently, negotiations got underway with representatives of Wise. A formal share purchase agreement was drawn up in early 1992 and executed in June 1992, with July 16, 1992 as its closing date.

9 Wise incorporated a company, 2798832 Canada Inc., for the purpose of acquiring all of the issued and outstanding shares of Peoples from M & S. The $27- million share acquisition proceeded as a fully leveraged buyout. The portion of the purchase price attributable to inventory was discounted by 30 percent. The discount was designed to inject equity into Peoples in the fiscal year following the sale and to make use of some of the tax losses that had accumulated in prior years.

10 The amount of the down payment due to M & S at closing, $5 million, was borrowed from the Toronto Dominion Bank ("TD Bank"). According to the terms of the share purchase agreement, the $22-million balance of the purchase price would be carried by M & S and would be repaid over a period of eight years. Wise guaranteed all of 2798832 Canada Inc.'s obligations pursuant to the terms of the share purchase agreement.

11 To protect its interests, M & S took the assets of Peoples as security (subject to a priority in favour of the TD Bank) and negotiated strict covenants concerning the financial management and operation of the company. Among other requirements, 2798832 Canada Inc. and Wise were obligated to maintain specific financial ratios, and Peoples was not permitted to provide financial assistance to Wise. In addition, the agreement provided that Peoples could not be amalgamated with Wise until the purchase price had been paid. This prohibition was presumably intended to induce Wise to refinance and pay the remainder of the purchase price as early as possible in order to overcome the strict conditions imposed upon it under the share purchase agreement.

12 On January 31, 1993, 2798832 Canada Inc. was amalgamated with Peoples. The new entity retained Peoples' corporate name. Since 2798832 Canada Inc. had been a wholly-owned subsidiary of Wise, upon amalgamation the new Peoples became a subsidiary directly owned and controlled by Wise. The three Wise brothers were Peoples' only directors.

13 Following the acquisition, Wise had attempted to rationalize its operations by consolidating the overlapping corporate functions of Wise and Peoples, and operating as a group. The consolidation of the administration, accounting, advertising and purchasing departments of the two corporations was completed by the fall of 1993. As a consequence of the changes, many of Wise's employees worked for both firms but were paid solely by Wise. The evidence at trial was that because of the tax losses carried-forward by Peoples, it was advantageous for the group to have more expenses incurred by Wise, which, if the group was profitable as a whole, would increase its after-tax profits. Almost from the outset, the joint operation of Wise and Peoples did not function smoothly. Instead of the expected synergies, the consolidation resulted in dissonance.

14 After the acquisition, the total number of buyers for the two companies was nearly halved. The procurement policy at that point required buyers to deal simultaneously with suppliers on behalf of both Peoples and Wise. For the buyers, this nearly doubled their administrative work. Separate invoices were required for purchases made on behalf of Wise and Peoples. These invoices had to be separately entered into the system, tracked and paid.

15 Inventory, too, was separately recorded and tracked in the system. However, the inventory of each company was handled and stored, often unsegregated, in shared warehouse facilities. The main warehouse for Peoples, on Cousens Street in Ville St-Laurent, was maintained for and used by both firms. The Cousens warehouse saw considerable activity, as it was the central distribution hub for both chains. The facility was open 18 hours a day and employed 150 people on two shifts who handled a total of approximately 30,000 cartons daily through 20 loading docks. It was abuzz with activity.

16 Before long, the parallel bookkeeping combined with the shared warehousing arrangements caused serious problems for both Wise and Peoples. The actual situation in the warehouse often did not mirror the reported state of the inventory in the system. The goods of one company were often inextricably commingled and confused with the goods of the other. As a result, the inventory records of both companies were increasingly incorrect. A physical inventory count was conducted to try to rectify the situation, to little avail. Both Wise and Peoples stores experienced numerous shipping disruptions and delays. The situation, already unsustainable, was worsening.

17 In October 1993, Lionel Wise consulted David Clément, Wise's (and, after the acquisition, Peoples') vice-president of administration and finance, in an attempt to find a solution. In January 1994, Clément recommended and the three Wise brothers agreed that they would implement a joint inventory procurement policy ("new policy") whereby the two firms would divide responsibility for purchasing. Peoples would make all purchases from North American suppliers and Wise would, in turn, make all purchases from overseas suppliers. Peoples would then transfer to Wise what it had purchased for Wise, charging Wise accordingly, and vice versa. The new policy was implemented on February 1, 1994. It was this arrangement that was later criticized by certain creditors and by the trial judge.

18 Approximately 82 percent of the total inventory of Wise and Peoples was purchased from North American suppliers, which inevitably meant that Peoples would be extending a significant trade credit to Wise. The new policy was known to the directors, but was neither formally implemented in writing nor approved by a board meeting or resolution.

19 On April 27, 1994, Lionel Wise outlined the details of the new policy at a meeting of Wise's audit committee. A partner of Coopers & Lybrand was M & S's representative on Wise's board of directors and a member of the audit committee. He attended the April 27th meeting and raised no objection to the new policy when it was introduced.

20 By June 1994, financial statements prepared to reflect the financial position of Peoples as of April 30, 1994 revealed that Wise owed more than $18 million to Peoples. Approximately $14 million of this amount resulted from a notional transfer of inventory that was cancelled following the period's end. M & S was concerned about the situation and started an investigation, as a result of which M & S insisted that the new procurement policy be rescinded.

Digitized by Google

Wise agreed to M & S's demand but took the position that the former procurement policy could not be reinstated immediately. An agreement was executed on September 27, 1994, effective July 21, 1994, and it provided that the new policy would be abandoned as of January 31, 1995. The agreement also specified that the inventory and records of the two companies would be kept separate, and that the amount owed to Peoples by Wise would not exceed $3 million.

21 Another result of the negotiations was that M & S accepted an increase in the amount of the TD Bank's priority to $15 million and a new repayment schedule for the balance of the purchase price owed to M & S. The parties agreed to revise the schedule to provide for 37 monthly payments beginning in July 1995. Each of the Wise brothers also provided a personal guarantee of $500,000 in favour of M & S.

22 In September 1994, in light of the fragile financial condition of the companies and the competitiveness of the retail market, the TD Bank announced its intention to cease doing business with Wise and Peoples as of the end of December 1994. Following negotiations, however, the bank extended its financial support until the end of July 1995. The Wise brothers promised to extend personal guarantees in favour of the TD Bank, but this did not occur.

23 In December 1994, three days after the Wise brothers presented financial statements showing disappointing results for Peoples in its third fiscal quarter, M & S initiated bankruptcy proceedings against both Wise and Peoples. A notice of intention to make a proposal was filed on behalf of Peoples the same day. Nonetheless, Peoples later consented to the petition by M & S, and both Wise and Peoples were declared bankrupt on January 13, 1995, effective December 9, 1994. The same day, M & S released each of the Wise brothers from their personal guarantees. M & S apparently preferred to proceed with an uncontested petition in bankruptcy rather than attempting to collect on the personal guarantees.

24 The assets of Wise and Peoples were sufficient to cover in full the outstanding debt owed to the TD Bank, satisfy the entire balance of the purchase price owed to M & S, and discharge almost all the landlords' lease claims. The bulk of the unsatisfied claims were those of trade creditors.

25 Following the bankruptcy, Peoples' trustee filed a petition against the Wise brothers. In the petition, the trustee claimed that they had favoured the interests of Wise over Peoples to the detriment of Peoples' creditors, in breach of their duties as directors under s. 122(1) of the CBCA. The trustee also claimed that the Wise brothers had, in the year preceding the bankruptcy, been privy to transactions in which property had been transferred for conspicuously less than fair market value within the meaning of s. 100 of the BIA.

26 Pursuant to art. 2501 of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 ("C.C.Q."), the trustee named Chubb Insurance Company of Canada ("Chubb"), which had provided directors' insurance to Wise and its subsidiaries, as a defendant in addition to the Wise brothers.

27 The trial judge, Greenberg J., relying on decisions from the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, held that the fiduciary duty and the duty of care under s. 122(1) of the CBCA extend to a company's creditors when a company is insolvent or in the vicinity of insolvency. Greenberg J. found that the implementation, by the Wise brothers qua directors of Peoples, of a corporate policy that affected both companies, had occurred while the corporation was in the vicinity of insolvency and was detrimental to the interests of the creditors of Peoples. The Wise brothers were therefore found liable and the trustee was awarded $4.44 million in damages. As Chubb had provided insurance coverage for directors, it was also held liable. Greenberg J. also considered the alternative grounds under the BIA advanced by the trustee and found the Wise brothers liable for the same $4.44 million amount on that ground as well. All the parties appealed.

28 The Quebec Court of Appeal, per Pelletier J.A., with Robert C.J.Q. and Nuss J.A. concurring, allowed the appeals by Chubb and the Wise brothers: 2003 CanLII 47928 (QC CA), [2003] R.J.Q. 796, [2003] Q.J. No. 505 (QL). The Court of Appeal expressed reluctance to follow Greenberg J. in equating the interests of creditors with the best interests of the corporation when the corporation was insolvent or in the vicinity of insolvency, stating that an innovation in the law such as this is a policy matter more appropriately dealt with by Parliament than the courts. In considering the trustee's claim under s. 100 of the BIA, Pelletier J.A. held that the trial judge had committed a palpable and overriding error in concluding that the amounts owed by Wise to Peoples in respect of inventory "were neither collected nor collectible" (para. 125 QL). He found that the consideration received for the transactions had been approximately 94 percent of fair market value, and he was not convinced that this disparity could be characterized as being "conspicuously" less than fair market value. Moreover, he did not accept the broad meaning the trial judge gave to the word "privy". Pelletier J.A. declined to exercise his discretion under s. 100(2) of the BIA to make an order in favour of the trustee. In view of his conclusion that the Wise brothers were not liable, Pelletier J.A. allowed the appeal with respect to Chubb.

III. Analysis

29 At the outset, it should be acknowledged that according to art. 300 C.C.Q. and s. 8.1 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, the civil law serves as a supplementary source of law to federal legislation such as the CBCA. Since the CBCA does not entitle creditors to sue directors directly for breach of their duties, it is appropriate to have recourse to the C.C.Q. to determine how rights grounded in a federal statute should be addressed in Quebec, and more specifically how s. 122(1) of the CBCA can be harmonized with the principles of civil liability: see R. Crête and S. Rousseau, Droit des sociétés par actions: principes fondamentaux (2002), at p. 58.

30 This case came before our Court on the issue of whether directors owe a duty to creditors. The creditors did not bring a derivative action or an oppression remedy application under the CBCA. Instead, the trustee, representing the interests of the creditors, sued the directors for an alleged breach of the duties imposed by s. 122(1) of the CBCA. The standing of the trustee to sue was not questioned.

31 The primary role of directors is described in s. 102(1) of the CBCA:

102. (1) Subject to any unanimous shareholder agreement, the directors shall manage, or supervise the management of, the business and affairs of a corporation.

As for officers, s. 121 of the CBCA provides that their powers are delegated to them by the directors:

121. Subject to the articles, the by-laws or any unanimous shareholder agreement,

(a) the directors may designate the offices of the corporation, appoint as officers persons of full capacity, specify their duties and delegate to them powers to manage the business and affairs of the corporation, except powers to do anything referred to in subsection 115(3);

(b) a director may be appointed to any office of the corporation; and

(c) two or more offices of the corporation may be held by the same person.

Although the shareholders are commonly said to own the corporation, in the absence of a unanimous shareholder agreement to the contrary, s. 102 of the CBCA provides that it is not the shareholders, but the directors elected by the shareholders, who are responsible for managing it. This clear demarcation between the respective roles of shareholders and directors long predates the 1975 enactment of the CBCA: see Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate Co. v. Cuninghame, [1906] 2 Ch. 34 (C.A.); see also art. 311 C.C.Q.

32 Section 122(1) of the CBCA establishes two distinct duties to be discharged by directors and officers in managing, or supervising the management of, the corporation:

122. (1) Every director and officer of a corporation in exercising their powers and discharging their duties shall

(a) act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation; and

(b) exercise the care, diligence and skill that a reasonably prudent person would exercise in comparable circumstances.

The first duty has been referred to in this case as the "fiduciary duty". It is better described as the "duty of loyalty". We will use the expression "statutory fiduciary duty" for purposes of clarity when referring to the duty under the CBCA. This duty requires directors and officers to act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation. The second duty is commonly referred to as the "duty of care". Generally speaking, it imposes a legal obligation upon directors and officers to be diligent in supervising and managing the corporation's affairs.

33 The trial judge did not apply or consider separately the two duties imposed on directors by s. 122(1). As the Court of Appeal observed, the trial judge appears to have confused the two duties. They are, in fact, distinct and are designed to secure different ends. For that reason, they will be addressed separately in these reasons.

A. The Statutory Fiduciary Duty: Section 122(1)(a) of the CBCA

34 Considerable power over the deployment and management of financial, human, and material resources is vested in the directors and officers of corporations. For the directors of CBCA corporations, this power originates in s. 102 of the Act. For officers, this power comes from the powers delegated to them by the directors. In deciding to invest in, lend to or otherwise deal with a corporation, shareholders and creditors transfer control over their assets to the corporation, and hence to the directors and officers, in the expectation that the directors and officers will use the corporation's resources to make reasonable business decisions that are to the corporation's advantage.

35 The statutory fiduciary duty requires directors and officers to act honestly and in good faith vis-à-vis the corporation. They must respect the trust and confidence that have been reposed in them to manage the assets of the corporation in pursuit of the realization of the objects of the corporation. They must avoid conflicts of interest with the corporation. They must avoid abusing their position to gain personal benefit. They must maintain the confidentiality of information they acquire by virtue of their position. Directors and officers must serve the corporation selflessly, honestly and loyally: see K. P. McGuinness, The Law and Practice of Canadian Business Corporations (1999), at p. 715.

36 The common law concept of fiduciary duty was considered in K.L.B. v. British Columbia, 2003 SCC 51 (CanLII), [2003] 2 S.C.R. 403, 2003 SCC 51. In that case, which involved the relationship between the government and foster children, a majority of this Court agreed with McLachlin C.J. who stated, at paras. 40-41 and 49:

Fiduciary duties arise in a number of different contexts, including express trusts, relationships marked by discretionary power and trust, and the special responsibilities of the Crown in dealing with aboriginal interests. . . .

Digitized by Google

What . . . might the content of the fiduciary duty be if it is understood . . . as a private law duty arising simply from the relationship of discretionary power and trust between the Superintendent and the foster children? In Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd., 1989 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574, at pp. 646-47, La Forest J. noted that there are certain common threads running through fiduciary duties that arise from relationships marked by discretionary power and trust, such as loyalty and "the avoidance of a conflict of duty and interest and a duty not to profit at the expense of the beneficiary". However, he also noted that "[t]he obligation imposed may vary in its specific substance depending on the relationship" (p. 646). . . .

. . . concern for the best interests of the child informs the parental fiduciary relationship, as La Forest J. noted in M. (K.) v. M. (H.), supra, at p. 65. But the duty imposed is to act loyally, and not to put one's own or others' interests ahead of the child's in a manner that abuses the child's trust. . . . The parent who exercises undue influence over the child in economic matters for his own gain has put his own interests ahead of the child's, in a manner that abuses the child's trust in him. The same may be said of the parent who uses a child for his sexual gratification or a parent who, wanting to avoid trouble for herself and her household, turns a blind eye to the abuse of a child by her spouse. The parent need not, as the Court of Appeal suggested in the case at bar, be consciously motivated by a desire for profit or personal advantage; nor does it have to be her own interests, rather than those of a third party, that she puts ahead of the child's. It is rather a question of disloyalty — of putting someone's interests ahead of the child's in a manner that abuses the child's trust. Negligence, even aggravated negligence, will not ground parental fiduciary liability unless it is associated with breach of trust in this sense. [Emphasis added.]

37 The issue to be considered here is the "specific substance" of the fiduciary duty based on the relationship of directors to corporations under the CBCA.

38 It is settled law that the fiduciary duty owed by directors and officers imposes strict obligations: see Canadian Aero Service Ltd. v. O'Malley, 1973 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1974] S.C.R. 592, at pp. 609-10, per Laskin J. (as he then was), where it was decided that directors and officers may even have to account to the corporation for profits they make that do not come at the corporation's expense:

The reaping of a profit by a person at a company's expense while a director thereof is, of course, an adequate ground upon which to hold the director accountable. Yet there may be situations where a profit must be disgorged, although not gained at the expense of the company, on the ground that a director must not be allowed to use his position as such to make a profit even if it was not open to the company, as for example, by reason of legal disability, to participate in the transaction. An analogous situation, albeit not involving a director, existed for all practical purposes in the case of Phipps v. Boardman [[1967] 2 A.C. 46], which also supports the view that liability to account does not depend on proof of an actual conflict of duty and self-interest. Another, quite recent, illustration of a liability to account where the company itself had failed to obtain a business contract and hence could not be regarded as having been deprived of a business opportunity is Industrial Development Consultants Ltd. v. Cooley [[1972] 2 All E.R. 162], a judgment of a Court of first instance. There, the managing director, who was allowed to resign his position on a false assertion of ill health, subsequently got the contract for himself. That case is thus also illustrative of the situation where a director's resignation is prompted by a decision to obtain for himself the business contract denied to his company and where he does obtain it without disclosing his intention. [Emphasis added.]

A compelling argument for making directors accountable for profits made as a result of their position, though not at the corporation's expense, is presented by J. Brock, "The Propriety of Profitmaking: Fiduciary Duty and Unjust Enrichment" (2000), 58 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 185, at pp. 204-5.

39 However, it is not required that directors and officers in all cases avoid personal gain as a direct or indirect result of their honest and good faith supervision or management of the corporation. In many cases the interests of directors and officers will innocently and genuinely coincide with those of the corporation. If directors and officers are also shareholders, as is often the case, their lot will automatically improve as the corporation's financial condition improves. Another example is the compensation that directors and officers usually draw from the corporations they serve. This benefit, though paid by the corporation, does not, if reasonable, ordinarily place them in breach of their fiduciary duty. Therefore, all the circumstances may be scrutinized to determine whether the directors and officers have acted honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation.

40 In our opinion, the trial judge's determination that there was no fraud or dishonesty in the Wise brothers' attempts to solve the mounting inventory problems of Peoples and Wise stands in the way of a finding that they breached their fiduciary duty. Greenberg J. stated:

We hasten to add that in the present case, the Wise Brothers derived no direct personal benefit from the new domestic inventory procurement policy, albeit that, as the controlling shareholders of Wise Stores, there was an indirect benefit to them. Moreover, as was conceded by the other parties herein, in deciding to implement the new domestic inventory procurement policy, there was no dishonesty or fraud on their part.

((1998), 23 C.B.R. (4th) 200, at para. 183)
The Court of Appeal relied heavily on this finding by the trial judge, as do we. At para. 83 QL, Pelletier J.A. stated that:
[translation] In regard to fiduciary duty, I would like to point out that the brothers were driven solely by the wish to resolve the problem of inventory procurement affecting both the operations of Peoples Inc. and those of Wise. [This is a] motivation that is in line with the pursuit of the interests of the corporation within the meaning of paragraph 122(1)(a) C.B.C.A. and that does not expose them to any justified criticism.
41 As explained above, there is no doubt that both Peoples and Wise were struggling with a serious inventory management problem. The Wise brothers considered the problem and implemented a policy they hoped would solve it. In the absence of evidence of a personal interest or improper purpose in the new policy, and in light of the evidence of a desire to make both Wise and Peoples "better" corporations, we find that the directors did not breach their fiduciary duty under s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA. See 820099 Ontario Inc. v. Harold E. Ballard Ltd. (1991), 3 B.L.R. (2d) 123 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)) (aff'd reflex, (1991), 3 B.L.R. (2d) 113 (Ont. Div. Ct.)), in which Farley J., at p. 171, correctly observes that in resolving a conflict between majority and minority shareholders, it is safe for directors and officers to act to make the corporation a "better corporation".
42 This appeal does not relate to the non-statutory duty directors owe to shareholders. It is concerned only with the statutory duties owed under the CBCA. Insofar as the statutory fiduciary duty is concerned, it is clear that the phrase the "best interests of the corporation" should be read not simply as the "best interests of the shareholders". From an economic perspective, the "best interests of the corporation" means the maximization of the value of the corporation: see E. M. Iacobucci, "Directors' Duties in Insolvency: Clarifying What Is at Stake" (2003), 39 Can. Bus. L.J. 398, at pp. 400-1. However, the courts have long recognized that various other factors may be relevant in determining what directors should consider in soundly managing with a view to the best interests of the corporation. For example, in Teck Corp. v. Millar (1972), 33 D.L.R. (3d) 288 (B.C.S.C.), Berger J. stated, at p. 314:
A classical theory that once was unchallengeable must yield to the facts of modern life. In fact, of course, it has. If today the directors of a company were to consider the interests of its employees no one would argue that in doing so they were not acting bona fide in the interests of the company itself. Similarly, if the directors were to consider the consequences to the community of any policy that the company intended to pursue, and were deflected in their commitment to that policy as a result, it could not be said that they had not considered bona fide the interests of the shareholders.
I appreciate that it would be a breach of their duty for directors to disregard entirely the interests of a company's shareholders in order to confer a benefit on its employees: Parke v. Daily News Ltd., [1962] Ch. 927. But if they observe a decent respect for other interests lying beyond those of the company's shareholders in the strict sense, that will not, in my view, leave directors open to the charge that they have failed in their fiduciary duty to the company.

The case of Re Olympia & York Enterprises Ltd. and Hiram Walker Resources Ltd. reflex, (1986), 59 O.R. (2d) 254 (Div. Ct.), approved, at p. 271, the decision in Teck, supra. We accept as an accurate statement of law that in determining whether they are acting with a view to the best interests of the corporation it may be legitimate, given all the circumstances of a given case, for the board of directors to consider, inter alia, the interests of shareholders, employees, suppliers, creditors, consumers, governments and the environment.
43 The various shifts in interests that naturally occur as a corporation's fortunes rise and fall do not, however, affect the content of the fiduciary duty under s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA. At all times, directors and officers owe their fiduciary obligation to the corporation. The interests of the corporation are not to be confused with the interests of the creditors or those of any other stakeholders.
44 The interests of shareholders, those of the creditors and those of the corporation may and will be consistent with each other if the corporation is profitable and well capitalized and has strong prospects. However, this can change if the corporation starts to struggle financially. The residual rights of the shareholders will generally become worthless if a corporation is declared bankrupt. Upon bankruptcy, the directors of the corporation transfer control to a trustee, who administers the corporation's assets for the benefit of creditors.
45 Short of bankruptcy, as the corporation approaches what has been described as the "vicinity of insolvency", the residual claims of shareholders will be nearly exhausted. While shareholders might well prefer that the directors pursue high-risk alternatives with a high potential payoff to maximize the shareholders' expected residual claim, creditors in the same circumstances might prefer that the directors steer a safer course so as to maximize the value of their claims against the assets of the corporation.
46 The directors' fiduciary duty does not change when a corporation is in the nebulous "vicinity of insolvency". That phrase has not been defined; moreover, it is incapable of definition and has no legal meaning. What it is obviously intended to convey is a deterioration in the corporation's financial stability. In assessing the actions of directors it is evident that any honest and good faith attempt to redress the corporation's financial problems will, if successful, both retain value for shareholders and improve the position of creditors. If unsuccessful, it will not qualify as a breach of the statutory fiduciary duty.

47 For a discussion of the shifting interests and incentives of shareholders and creditors, see W. D. Gray, "Peoples v. Wise and Dylex: Identifying Stakeholder Interests upon or near Corporate Insolvency — Stasis or Pragmatism?" (2003), 39 Can. Bus. L.J. 242, at p. 257; E. M. Iacobucci and K. E. Davis, "Reconciling Derivative Claims and the Oppression Remedy" (2000), 12 S.C.L.R. (2d) 87, at p. 114. In resolving these competing interests, it is incumbent upon the directors to act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation. In using their skills for the benefit of the corporation when it is in troubled waters financially, the directors must be careful to attempt to act in its best interests by creating a "better" corporation, and not to favour the interests of any one group of stakeholders. If the stakeholders cannot avail themselves of the statutory fiduciary duty (the duty of loyalty, supra) to sue the directors for failing to take care of their interests, they have other means at their disposal.

48 The Canadian legal landscape with respect to stakeholders is unique. Creditors are only one set of stakeholders, but their interests are protected in a number of ways. Some are specific, as in the case of amalgamation: s. 185 of the CBCA. Others cover a broad range of situations. The oppression remedy of s. 241(2)(c) of the CBCA and the similar provisions of provincial legislation regarding corporations grant the broadest rights to creditors of any common law jurisdiction: see D. Thomson, "Directors, Creditors and Insolvency: A Fiduciary Duty or a Duty Not to Oppress?" (2000), 58 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 31, at p. 48. One commentator describes the oppression remedy as "the broadest, most comprehensive and most open-ended shareholder remedy in the common law world": S. M. Beck, "Minority Shareholders' Rights in the 1980s", in Corporate Law in the 80s (1982), 311, at p. 312. While Beck was concerned with shareholder remedies, his observation applies equally to those of creditors.

49 The fact that creditors' interests increase in relevancy as a corporation's finances deteriorate is apt to be relevant to, inter alia, the exercise of discretion by a court in granting standing to a party as a "complainant" under s. 238(d) of the CBCA as a "proper person" to bring a derivative action in the name of the corporation under ss. 239 and 240 of the CBCA, or to bring an oppression remedy claim under s. 241 of the CBCA.

50 Section 241(2)(c) authorizes a court to grant a remedy if

(c) the powers of the directors of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been exercised in a manner that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer . . . .

A person applying for the oppression remedy must, in the court's opinion, fall within the definition of "complainant" found in s. 238 of the CBCA:

(a) a registered holder or beneficial owner, and a former registered holder or beneficial owner, of a security of a corporation or any of its affiliates,
(b) a director or an officer or a former director or officer of a corporation or any of its affiliates,
(c) the Director, or
(d) any other person who, in the discretion of a court, is a proper person to make an application under this Part.

Creditors, who are not security holders within the meaning of para. (a), may therefore apply for the oppression remedy under para. (d) by asking a court to exercise its discretion and grant them status as a "complainant".

51 Section 241 of the CBCA provides a possible mechanism for creditors to protect their interests from the prejudicial conduct of directors. In our view, the availability of such a broad oppression remedy undermines any perceived need to extend the fiduciary duty imposed on directors by s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA to include creditors.

52 The Court of Appeal, at paras. 98-99 QL, referred to 373409 Alberta Ltd. (Receiver of) v. Bank of Montreal, 2002 SCC 81 (CanLII), [2002] 4 S.C.R. 312, 2002 SCC 81, as an indication by this Court that the interests of creditors do not have any bearing on the assessment of the conduct of directors. However, the receiver in that case was representing the corporation's rights and not the creditors' rights; therefore, the case has no application in this appeal. 373409 Alberta involved an action taken by the receiver on behalf of the corporation against a bank for the tort of conversion. The sole shareholder, director and officer of 373409 Alberta Ltd., who was also the sole shareholder, director and officer of another corporation, Legacy Holdings Ltd., had deposited a cheque payable to 373409 Alberta Ltd. into the account of Legacy. While it was recognized, at para. 22, that the diversion of money from 373409 Alberta Ltd. to Legacy "may very well have been wrongful vis-à-vis [373409 Alberta Ltd.]'s creditors" (none of whom were involved in the action), no fraud had been committed against the corporation itself and the bank, acting on proper authority, had not wrongfully interfered with the cheque by carrying out the deposit instructions. The statutory duties of the directors were not at issue, nor were they considered, and no assessment of the creditors' rights was made. With respect, Pelletier J.A.'s broad reading of 373409 Alberta was misplaced.

53 In light of the availability both of the oppression remedy and of an action based on the duty of care, which will be discussed below, stakeholders have viable remedies at their disposal. There is no need to read the interests of creditors into the duty set out in s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA. Moreover, in the circumstances of this case, the Wise brothers did not breach the statutory fiduciary duty owed to the corporation.

B. The Statutory Duty of Care: Section 122(1)(b) of the CBCA

54 As mentioned above, the CBCA does not provide for a direct remedy for creditors against directors for breach of their duties and the C.C.Q. is used as suppletive law.

55 In Quebec, directors have been held liable to creditors in respect of either contractual or extra-contractual obligations. Contractual liability arises where the director personally guarantees a contractual obligation of the company. Liability also arises where the director personally acts in a manner that triggers his or her extra-contractual liability. See P. Martel, "Le 'voile corporatif' — l'attitude des tribunaux face à l'article 317 du Code civil du Québec" (1998), 58 R. du B. 95, at pp. 135-36; Brasserie Labatt ltée v. Lanoue, [1999] Q.J. No. 1108 (QL) (C.A.), per Forget J.A., at para. 29. It is clear that the Wise brothers cannot be held contractually liable as they did not guarantee the debts at issue here. Extra-contractual liability is the remaining possibility.

56 To determine the applicability of extra-contractual liability in this appeal, it is necessary to refer to art. 1457 C.C.Q.:

Every person has a duty to abide by the rules of conduct which lie upon him, according to the circumstances, usage or law, so as not to cause injury to another.

Where he is endowed with reason and fails in this duty, he is responsible for any injury he causes to another person by such fault and is liable to reparation for the injury, whether it be bodily, moral or material in nature.

He is also liable, in certain cases, to reparation for injury caused to another by the act or fault of another person or by the act of things in his custody. [Emphasis added.]

Three elements of art. 1457 C.C.Q. are relevant to the integration of the director's duty of care into the principles of extra-contractual liability: who has the duty ("every person"), to whom is the duty owed ("another") and what breach will trigger liability ("rules of conduct"). It is clear that directors and officers come within the expression "every person". It is equally clear that the word "another" can include the creditors. The reach of art. 1457 C.C.Q. is broad and it has been given an open and inclusive meaning. See Regent Taxi & Transport Co. v. Congrégation des Petits Frères de Marie, 1929 CanLII 95 (SCC), [1929] S.C.R. 650, per Anglin C.J., at p. 655 (rev'd on other grounds, [1932] 2 D.L.R. 70 (P.C.)):

. . . to narrow the prima facie scope of art. 1053 C.C. [now art. 1457] is highly dangerous and would necessarily result in most meritorious claims being rejected; many a wrong would be without a remedy.

This liberal interpretation was also affirmed and treated as settled by this Court in Lister v. McAnulty, 1944 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1944] S.C.R. 317, and Hôpital Notre-Dame de l'Espérance v. Laurent, 1977 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 605.

57 This interpretation can be harmoniously integrated with the wording of the CBCA. Indeed, unlike the statement of the fiduciary duty in s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA, which specifies that directors and officers must act with a view to the best interests of the corporation, the statement of the duty of care in s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA does not specifically refer to an identifiable party as the beneficiary of the duty. Instead, it provides that "[e]very director and officer of a corporation in exercising their powers and discharging their duties shall . . . exercise the care, diligence and skill that a reasonably prudent person would exercise in comparable circumstances." Thus, the identity of the beneficiary of the duty of care is much more open-ended, and it appears obvious that it must include creditors. This result is clearly consistent with the civil law interpretation of the word "another". Therefore, if breach of the standard of care, causation and damages are established, creditors can resort to art. 1457 to have their rights vindicated. The only issue thus remaining is the determination of the "rules of conduct" likely to trigger extracontractual liability. On this issue, art. 1457 is explicit.

58 The first paragraph of art. 1457 does not set the standard of conduct. Instead, it incorporates by reference s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA. The statutory duty of care is a "duty to abide by [a] rul[e] of conduct which lie[s] upon [them], according to the . . . law, so as not to cause injury to another". Thus, for the purpose of determining whether the Wise brothers can be held liable, only the CBCA is relevant. It is therefore necessary to outline the requirements of the duty of care embodied in s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA.

59 That directors must satisfy a duty of care is a long-standing principle of the common law, although the duty of care has been reinforced by statute to become more demanding. Among the earliest English cases establishing the duty of care were Dovey v. Cory, [1901] A.C. 477 (H.L.); In re Brazilian Rubber Plantations and Estates, Ltd., [1911] 1 Ch. 425; and In re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co., [1925] 1 Ch. 407 (C.A.). In substance, these cases held that the standard of care was a reasonably relaxed, subjective standard. The common law required directors to avoid being grossly negligent with respect to the affairs of the corporation and judged them according to their own personal skills, knowledge, abilities and capacities. See McGuinness, supra, at p. 776: "Given the history of the case law in this area, and the prevailing standards of competence displayed in commerce generally, it is quite clear that directors were not expected at common law to have any particular business skill or judgment."

60 The 1971 report entitled Proposals for a New Business Corporations Law for Canada (1971) ("Dickerson Report") culminated the work of a committee headed by R. W. V. Dickerson which had been appointed by the federal government to study the need for new federal business corporations legislation. This report preceded the enactment of the CBCA by four years and influenced the eventual structure of the CBCA.

61 The standard recommended by the Dickerson Report was objective, requiring directors and officers to meet the standard of a "reasonably prudent person" (vol. II, at. p. 74):

9.19

(1) Every director and officer of a corporation in exercising his powers and discharging his duties shall

(b) exercise the care, diligence and skill of a reasonably prudent person.

The report described how this proposed duty of care differed from the prevailing common law duty of care (vol. I, at p. 83):

242. The formulation of the duty of care, diligence and skill owed by directors represents an attempt to upgrade the standard presently required of them. The principal change here is that whereas at present the law seems to be that a director is only required to demonstrate the degree of care, skill and diligence that could reasonably be expected from him, having regard to his knowledge and experience — Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co., [1925] Ch. 425 — under s. 9.19(1)(b) he is required to conform to the standard of a reasonably prudent man. Recent experience has demonstrated how low the prevailing legal standard of care for directors is, and we have sought to raise it significantly. We are aware of the argument that raising the standard of conduct for directors may deter people from accepting directorships. The truth of that argument has not been demonstrated and we think it is specious. The duty of care imposed by s. 9.19(1)(b) is exactly the same as that which the common law imposes on every professional person, for example, and there is no evidence that this has dried up the supply of lawyers, accountants, architects, surgeons or anyone else. It is in any event cold comfort to a shareholder to know that there is a steady supply of marginally competent people available under present law to manage his investment. [Emphasis added.]

62 The statutory duty of care in s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA emulates but does not replicate the language proposed by the Dickerson Report. The main difference is that the enacted version includes the words "in comparable circumstances", which modifies the statutory standard by requiring the context in which a given decision was made to be taken into account. This is not the introduction of a subjective element relating to the competence of the director, but rather the introduction of a contextual element into the statutory standard of care. It is clear that s. 122(1)(b) requires more of directors and officers than the traditional common law duty of care outlined in, for example, Re City Equitable Fire Insurance, supra.

63 The standard of care embodied in s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA was described by Robertson J.A. of the Federal Court of Appeal in Soper v. Canada, 1997 CanLII 6352 (FCA), [1998] 1 F.C. 124, at para. 41, as being "objective subjective". Although that case concerned the interpretation of a provision of the Income Tax Act, it is relevant here because the language of the provision establishing the standard of care was identical to that of s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA. With respect, we feel that Robertson J.A.'s characterization of the standard as an "objective subjective" one could lead to confusion. We prefer to describe it as an objective standard. To say that the standard is objective makes it clear that the factual aspects of the circumstances surrounding the actions of the director or officer are important in the case of the s. 122(1)(b) duty of care, as opposed to the subjective motivation of the director or officer, which is the central focus of the statutory fiduciary duty of s. 122(1)(a) of the CBCA.

64 The contextual approach dictated by s.122(1)(b) of the CBCA not only emphasizes the primary facts but also permits prevailing socio-economic conditions to be taken into consideration. The emergence of stricter standards puts pressure on corporations to improve the quality of board decisions. The establishment of good corporate governance rules should be a shield that protects directors from allegations that they have breached their duty of care. However, even with good corporate governance rules, directors' decisions can still be open to criticism from outsiders. Canadian courts, like their counterparts in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, have tended to take an approach with respect to the enforcement of the duty of care that respects the fact that directors and officers often have business expertise that courts do not. Many decisions made in the course of business, although ultimately unsuccessful, are reasonable and defensible at the time they are made. Business decisions must sometimes be made, with high stakes and under considerable time pressure, in circumstances in which detailed information is not available. It might be tempting for some to see unsuccessful business decisions as unreasonable or imprudent in light of information that becomes available ex post facto. Because of this risk of hindsight bias, Canadian courts have developed a rule of deference to business decisions called the "business judgment rule", adopting the American name for the rule.

65 In Maple Leaf Foods Inc. v. Schneider Corp. 1998 CanLII 5121 (ON CA), (1998), 42 O.R. (3d) 177, Weiler J.A. stated, at p. 192:

The law as it has evolved in Ontario and Delaware has the common requirements that the court must be satisfied that the directors have acted reasonably and fairly. The court looks to see that the directors made a reasonable decision not a perfect decision. Provided the decision taken is within a range of reasonableness, the court ought not to substitute its opinion for that of the board even though subsequent events may have cast doubt on the board's determination. As long as the directors have selected one of several reasonable alternatives, deference is accorded to the board's decision. This formulation of deference to the decision of the Board is known as the "business judgment rule". The fact that alternative transactions were rejected by the directors is irrelevant unless it can be shown that a particular alternative was definitely available and clearly more beneficial to the company than the chosen transaction. [Emphasis added; italics in original; references omitted.]

66 In order for a plaintiff to succeed in challenging a business decision he or she has to establish that the directors acted (i) in breach of the duty of care and (ii) in a way that caused injury to the plaintiff: W. T. Allen, J. B. Jacobs and L. E. Strine, Jr., "Function Over Form: A Reassessment of Standards of Review in Delaware Corporation Law" (2001), 26 Del. J. Corp. L. 859, at p. 892.

67 Directors and officers will not be held to be in breach of the duty of care under s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA if they act prudently and on a reasonably informed basis. The decisions they make must be reasonable business decisions in light of all the circumstances about which the directors or officers knew or ought to have known. In determining whether directors have acted in a manner that breached the duty of care, it is worth repeating that perfection is not demanded. Courts are ill-suited and should be reluctant to second-guess the application of business expertise to the considerations that are involved in corporate decision making, but they are capable, on the facts of any case, of determining whether an appropriate degree of prudence and diligence was brought to bear in reaching what is claimed to be a reasonable business decision at the time it was made.

68 The trustee alleges that the Wise brothers breached their duty of care under s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA by implementing the new procurement policy to the detriment of Peoples' creditors. After considering all the evidence, we agree with the Court of Appeal that the implementation of the new policy was a reasonable business decision that was made with a view to rectifying a serious and urgent business problem in circumstances in which no solution may have been possible. The trial judge's conclusion that the new policy led inexorably to Peoples' failure and bankruptcy was factually incorrect and constituted a palpable and overriding error.

69 In fact, as noted by Pelletier J.A., there were many factors other than the new policy that contributed more directly to Peoples' bankruptcy. Peoples had lost $10 million annually while being operated by M & S. Wise, which was only marginally profitable and solvent with annual sales of $100 million (versus $160 million for Peoples), had hoped to improve the performance of its new acquisition. Given that the transaction was a fully leveraged buyout, for Wise and Peoples to succeed, Peoples' performance needed to improve dramatically. Unfortunately for both Wise and Peoples, the retail market in eastern Canada had become very competitive in the early 1990s, and this trend continued with the arrival of Wal-Mart in 1994. At paras. 152 and 154 QL, Pelletier J.A. stated:

[translation] In reality, it was that particularly unfavourable financial situation in which the two corporations found themselves that caused their downfall, and it was M. & S. that, to protect its own interests, sounded the charge in December, rightly or wrongly judging that Peoples Inc.'s situation would only worsen over time. It is crystal-clear that the bankruptcy occurred at the most propitious time for M. & S.'s interests, when inventories were high and suppliers were unpaid. In fact, M. & S. recovered the entire balance due on the selling price and almost all of the other debts it was owed.

. . . the trial judge did not take into account the fact that the brothers derived no direct benefit from the transaction impugned, that they acted in good faith and that their true intention was to find a solution to the serious inventory management problem that each of the two corporations was facing. Because of an assessment error, he also ignored the fact that Peoples Inc. received a sizable consideration for the goods it delivered to Wise. Lastly, I note that the act for which the brothers were found liable, i.e. the adoption of a new joint inventory procurement policy, is not as serious as the trial judge made it out to be and that, in opposition to his view, the act was also not the true cause of the bankruptcy of Peoples Inc. [Emphasis added.]

70 The Wise brothers treated the implementation of the new policy as a decision made in the ordinary course of business and, while no formal agreement evidenced the arrangement, a monthly record was made of the inventory transfers. Although this may appear to be a loose business practice, by the autumn of 1993, Wise had already consolidated several aspects of the operations of the two companies. Legally they were two separate entities. However, the financial fate of the two companies had become intertwined. In these circumstances, there was little or no economic incentive for the Wise brothers to jeopardize the interests of Peoples in favour of the interests of Wise. In fact, given the tax losses that Peoples had carried forward, the companies had every incentive to keep Peoples profitable in order to reduce their combined tax liabilities.

71 Arguably, the Wise brothers could have been more precise in pursuing a resolution to the intractable inventory management problems, having regard to all the troublesome circumstances involved at the time the new policy was implemented. But we, like the Court of Appeal, are not satisfied that the adoption of the new policy breached the duty of care under s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA. The directors cannot be held liable for a breach of their duty of care in respect of the creditors of Peoples.

72 The Court of Appeal relied on two additional provisions of the CBCA that in its view could rescue the Wise brothers from a finding that they breached the duty of care: ss. 44(2) and 123(4).

73 Section 44 of the CBCA, which was in force at the time of the impugned transactions but has since been repealed, permitted a wholly-owned subsidiary to give financial assistance to its holding body corporate:

44. (1) Subject to subsection (2), a corporation or any corporation with which it is affiliated shall not, directly or indirectly, give financial assistance by means of a loan, guarantee or otherwise

(2) A corporation may give financial assistance by means of a loan, guarantee or otherwise

(c) to a holding body corporate if the corporation is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the holding body corporate;

74 While s. 44(2) as it then read qualified the prohibition under s. 44(1), it did not serve to supplant the duties of the directors under s. 122(1) of the CBCA. The Court of Appeal erred in concluding that s. 44(2) served as a blanket legitimization of financial assistance given by wholly-owned subsidiaries to parent corporations. In our opinion, it is incumbent upon directors and officers to exercise their powers in conformity with the duties of s. 122(1).

75 Although s. 44(2) authorized certain forms of financial assistance between corporations, this cannot exempt directors and officers from potential liability under s. 122(1) for any financial assistance given by subsidiaries to the parent corporation.

76 When faced with the serious inventory management problem, the Wise brothers sought the advice of the vice-president of finance, David Clément. The Wise brothers claimed as an additional argument that in adopting the solution proposed by Clément, they were relying in good faith on the judgment of a person whose profession lent credibility to his statement, in accordance with the defence provided for in s. 123(4)(b) (now s. 123(5)) of the CBCA. The Court of Appeal accepted the argument. We disagree.

77 The reality that directors cannot be experts in all aspects of the corporations they manage or supervise shows the relevancy of a provision such as s. 123(4)(b). At the relevant time, the text of s. 123(4) read:

123. . . .

(4) A director is not liable under section 118, 119 or 122 if he relies in good faith on

(a) financial statements of the corporation represented to him by an officer of the corporation or in a written report of the auditor of the corporation fairly to reflect the financial condition of the corporation; or

(b) a report of a lawyer, accountant, engineer, appraiser or other person whose profession lends credibility to a statement made by him.

78 Although Clément did have a bachelor's degree in commerce and 15 years of experience in administration and finance with Wise, this experience does not correspond to the level of professionalism required to allow the directors to rely on his advice as a bar to a suit under the duty of care. The named professional groups in s. 123(4)(b) were lawyers, accountants, engineers, and appraisers. Clément was not an accountant, was not subject to the regulatory overview of any professional organization and did not carry independent insurance coverage for professional negligence. The title of vice-president of finance should not automatically lead to a conclusion that Clément was a person "whose profession lends credibility to a statement made by him". It is noteworthy that the word "profession" is used, not "position". Clément was simply a non-professional employee of Wise. His judgment on the appropriateness of the solution to the inventory management problem must be regarded in that light. Although we might accept for the sake of argument that Clément was better equipped and positioned than the Wise brothers to devise a plan to solve the inventory management problems, this is not enough. Therefore, in our opinion, the Wise brothers cannot successfully invoke the defence provided by s. 123(4)(b) of the CBCA but must rely on the other defences raised.

C. The Claim Under Section 100 of the BIA

79 The trustee also claimed against the Wise brothers under s. 100 of the BIA. That section reads:

100. (1) Where a bankrupt sold, purchased, leased, hired, supplied or received property or services in a reviewable transaction within the period beginning on the day that is one year before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included, the court may, on the application of the trustee, inquire into whether the bankrupt gave or received, as the case may be, fair market value in consideration for the property or services concerned in the transaction.

(2) Where the court in proceedings under this section finds that the consideration given or received by the bankrupt in the reviewable transaction was conspicuously greater or less than the fair market value of the property or services concerned in the transaction, the court may give judgment to the trustee against the other party to the transaction, against any other person being privy to the transaction with the bankrupt or against all those persons for the difference between the actual consideration given or received by the bankrupt and the fair market value, as determined by the court, of the property or services concerned in the transaction.

80 The provision has two principal elements. First, subs. (1) requires the transaction to have been conducted within the year preceding the date of bankruptcy. Second, subs. (2) requires that the consideration given or received by the bankrupt be "conspicuously greater or less" than the fair market value of the property concerned.

81 The word "may" is found in both ss. 100(1) and 100(2) of the BIA with respect to the jurisdiction of the court. In Standard Trustco Ltd. (Trustee of) v. Standard Trust Co. 1995 CanLII 3508 (ON CA), (1995), 26 O.R. (3d) 1, a majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal held that, even if the necessary preconditions are present, the exercise of jurisdiction under s. 100(1) to inquire into the transaction, and under s. 100(2) to grant judgment, is discretionary. Equitable principles guide the exercise of discretion. We agree.

82 Referring to s. 100(2) of the BIA, in Standard Trustco, supra, at p. 23, Weiler J.A. explained that:

When a contextual approach is adopted it is apparent that although the conditions of the section have been satisfied the court is not obliged to grant judgment. The court has a residual discretion to exercise. The contextual approach indicates that the good faith of the parties, the intention with which the transaction took place, and whether fair value was given and received in the transaction are important considerations as to whether that discretion should be exercised.

We agree with Weiler J.A. and adopt her position; however, this appeal does not turn on the discretion to ultimately impose liability. In our view, the Court of Appeal did not interfere with the trial judge's exercise of discretion in reviewing the facts and finding a palpable and overriding error.

83 Within the year preceding the date of bankruptcy, Peoples had transferred inventory to Wise for which the trustee claimed Peoples had not received fair market value in consideration. The relevant transactions involved, for the most part, transfers completed in anticipation of the busy holiday season. Given the non-arm's length relationship between Wise and its wholly-owned subsidiary Peoples, there is no question that these inventory transfers could have constituted reviewable transactions.

84 We share the view of the Court of Appeal that it is not only the final transfers that should be considered. In fairness, the inventory transactions should be considered over the entire period from February to December 1994, which was the period when the new policy was in effect.

85 In Skalbania (Trustee of) v. Wedgewood Village Estates Ltd. 1989 CanLII 2747 (BC CA), (1989), 37 B.C.L.R. (2d) 88 (C.A.), the test for determining whether the difference in consideration is "conspicuously greater or less" was held to be not whether it is conspicuous to the parties at the time of the transaction, but whether it is conspicuous to the court having regard to all the relevant factors. This is a sound approach. In that case, a difference of $1.18 million between fair market value and the consideration received by the bankrupt was seen as conspicuous, where the fair market value was $6.6 million, leaving a discrepancy of more than 17 percent. While there is no particular percentage that definitively sets the threshold for a conspicuous difference, the percentage difference is a factor.

86 As for the factors that would be relevant to this determination, the court might consider, inter alia: evidence of the margin of error in valuing the types of assets in question; any appraisals made of the assets in question and evidence of the parties' honestly held beliefs regarding the value of the assets in question; and other circumstances adduced in evidence by the parties to explain the difference between the consideration received and fair market value: see L. W. Houlden and G. B. Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed. (loose-leaf)), vol. 2, at p. 4-114.1.

87 Over the lifespan of the new policy, Peoples transferred to Wise inventory valued at $71.54 million. As of the date of bankruptcy, it had received $59.50 million in property or money from Wise. As explained earlier, the trial judge adjusted the outstanding difference down to a balance of $4.44 million after taking into account, inter alia, the reallocation of general and administrative expenses, and adjustments necessitated by imported inventory transferred from Wise to Peoples. Neither party disputed these figures before this Court. We agree with the Court of Appeal's observation that these findings directly conflict with the trial judge's assertion that Peoples had received no consideration for the inventory transfers on the basis that the outstanding accounts were "neither collected nor collectible" from Wise. Like Pelletier J.A., we conclude that the trial judge's finding in this regard was a palpable and overriding error, and we adopt the view of the Court of Appeal.

88 We are not satisfied that, with regard to all the circumstances of this case, a disparity of slightly more than 6 percent between fair market value and the consideration received constitutes a "conspicuous" difference within the meaning of s. 100(2) of the BIA. Accordingly, we hold that the trustee's claim under the BIA also fails.

89 In addition to permitting the court to give judgment against the other party to the transaction, s. 100(2) of the BIA also permits it to give judgment against someone who was not a party but was "privy" to the transaction. Given our finding that the consideration for the impugned transactions was not "conspicuously less" than fair market value, there is no need to consider whether the Wise brothers would have been "privy" to the transaction for the purpose of holding them liable under s. 100(2). Nonetheless, the disagreement between the trial judge and the Court of Appeal on the interpretation of "privy" in s. 100(2) of the BIA warrants the following observations.

90 The trial judge in this appeal had little difficulty finding that the Wise brothers were privy to the transaction within the meaning of s. 100(2). Pelletier J.A., however, preferred a narrow construction in finding that the Wise brothers were not privy to the transactions. He held, at para. 135 QL, that:

[translation] . . . the legislator wanted to provide for the case in which a person other than the co-contracting party of the bankrupt actually received all or part of the benefit resulting from the lack of equality between the respective considerations.

To support this direct benefit requirement, Pelletier J.A. also referred to the French version which uses the term ayant intérêt. While he conceded that the respondent brothers received an indirect benefit from the inventory transfers as shareholders of Wise, Pelletier J.A. found this too remote to be considered "privy" to the transactions (paras. 139-40 QL).

91 The primary purpose of s. 100 of the BIA is to reverse the effects of a transaction that stripped value from the estate of a bankrupt person. It makes sense to adopt a more inclusive understanding of the word "privy" to prevent someone who might receive indirect benefits to the detriment of a bankrupt's unsatisfied creditors from frustrating the provision's remedial purpose. The word "privy" should be given a broad reading to include those who benefit directly or indirectly from and have knowledge of a transaction occurring for less than fair market value. In our opinion, this rationale is particularly apt when those who benefit are the controlling minds behind the transaction.

92 A finding that a person was "privy" to a reviewable transaction does not of course necessarily mean that the court will exercise its discretion to make a remedial order against that person. For liability to be imposed, it must be established that the transaction occurred: (a) within the past year; (b) for consideration conspicuously greater or less than fair market value; (c) with the person's knowledge; and (d) in a way that directly or indirectly benefited the person. In addition, after having considered the context and all the above factors, the judge must conclude that the case is a proper one for holding the person liable. In light of these conditions and of the discretion exercised by the judge, we find that a broad reading of "privy" is appropriate.

By the Court:

[1] The Applicants apply for an Order seeking leave to bring action against Grant Morash and Deloitte & Touche Inc. pursuant to Section 215 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, RSC 1985 CB-3 as amended.

[2] Facts: On May 4, 1984, the Applicant Francis MacLean (MacLean) made an Assignment in Bankruptcy.

[3] On April 30, 1984, four days before the Assignment, MacLean deposited $3,000.00 in his solicitor's trust account. He testified that he had borrowed the money from a friend, a Mr. Monahan. There is no written record of the loan from Monahan who MacLean says was a good friend. Monahan is now deceased. MacLean testified that he told his lawyer that the $3000.00 was from his sister.

[4] In his Statement of Affairs, also filed on May 4, 1984, MacLean did not disclose the existence of the $3,000.00. He did disclose that he held real estate valued at $3,000.00 as an "Heir of the Estate of Francis MacLean" (his father who died in 1969). The land in question is shown on a survey plan dated July 4, 1963. The land consists of two lots and the remainder of the parcel. Lot 1 was owned by MacLean's father; lot 2 by a Mr. MacPherson and the remaining lands jointly by MacLean Sr. and MacPherson. MacLean Sr. had three heirs. In 1984, MacLean therefore had a 1/3 interest in Lot 1 and a 1/6 interest in the remaining lands. A factual issue in this proceeding is whether MacLean ever disclosed his 1/6 interest in the remaining lands to the Trustee.

[5] In that regard, Exhibit 3, the Trustee's caveat dated May 4, 1984 is significant. The caveat is attached to a deed dated July 6, 1963, to MacLean Sr. conveying Lot 1 only. This suggests that MacLean was content to let the Trustee look at Lot 1 only. I attach little significance to MacLean's contention that he showed the Trustee the survey plan. A close examination of the plan would have revealed MacLean's 1/6 interest in the remaining lands. At the time, I am satisfied that MacLean considered his 1/6 interest to be of negligible value and therefore was content to deal with Lot 1 only.

[6] The record of the First Meeting of Creditors held on May 25, 1984 contains the following paragraph at page one:

> "THE TRUSTEE EXPLAINED that this was property of the estate of Mr. MacLean's father in which Mr. MacLean holds a 1/3 interest. The $3,000 was an offer received from Mr. MacLean's sister, who also holds a 1/3 interest in the property. The offer was being held in trust subject to a decision by the inspector of the estate."

[7] The second page of the Creditor's Meeting notes that one of the creditors asked whether the sister's $3,000.00 offer was reasonable. Mr. MacLean is recorded as saying that the property was assessed at approximately $18,000.00 and that he believed there was an appraisal done. Another creditor noted that there would probably be legal problems in trying to sell the property if the other parties holding an interest did not want to sell.

[8] By cheque dated December 21, 1984, MacLean's solicitor transferred $3,150.00 to the Trustee. The cheque appears to have been cashed by the Trustee on January 7, 1985.

[9] Exhibit 4 is a letter dated January 28, 1985, from MacLean's lawyer to the Trustee. The letter reads:

> "Re: Francis and Evelyn MacLean
> Enclosed please find a Deed which Francis spoke to me about yesterday. Would you please have it executed and returned to me for recording at your earliest convenience."

[10] Attached to the letter is a deed from the Trustee to Ann Patricia MacLean, MacLean's sister. The deed purports to convey Lot 1 only but was never executed. I have no evidence regarding whether the letter was ever sent to the Trustee. The letter and the deed were shown to MacLean in cross-examination. MacLean professed to have had no knowledge of the letter or the deed until shown them by his present lawyer a few days before this hearing. Exhibit 4 was obviously prepared at MacLean's direction. It is further evidence that MacLean did not disclose his interest in the remaining lands to the Trustee.

[11] In paragraph 9 of his August 24, 2003 affidavit, MacLean says the following about the $3,150.00 payment to the Trustee: "That payment was to maintain the interests which I had in the lands at Northside East Bay..." In other words, he now takes the position that he believed that the payment kept the real estate outside the bankruptcy. That is inconsistent with (1) the recorded 1984 offer by MacLean's sister; (2) the fact that MacLean told his lawyers in 1984 that the money was for his sister; (3) that MacLean had his lawyer prepare a deed from the Trustee to his sister and; (4) that there is no deed from the Trustee back to MacLean.

[12] From the foregoing, I have no difficulty concluding that in 1984, the $3,000.00 MacLean borrowed from Monahan thereby became MacLean's money. MacLean should have disclosed the existence of this $3,000.00 to the Trustee. Had he done so, $3,000.00 would have become part of the bankrupt estate for distribution among the creditors. MacLean would then have had no money to buy his interest in the real estate from the Trustee. In any event, I am satisfied that there was never any agreement by the Trustee to take the $3,000.00 in lieu of

MacLean's interest in the real estate. I am also satisfied that MacLean did not disclose his 1/6 interest in the remaining lands to the Trustee.

[13] On May 17, 1985, MacLean was discharged from bankruptcy and the Trustee was also discharged.

[14] The original Trustee, Touche Ross was succeeded by Deloitte Touche Inc. Grant Morash (Morash) was a partner in both. The actual Trustee in 1984-85, Mr. Veinotte, was deceased by 1998. In September 1998, Morash received a letter from G.S. Khattar, Q.C. Mr. Khattar was attempting to resolve title problems with the remaining lands on behalf of several occupiers of those lands. Morash experienced some difficulty finding records of the 1984 MacLean bankruptcy. I am satisfied that he was eventually able to do so. I am also satisfied that Morash then correctly concluded that MacLean had not disclosed this interest in the remaining lands to the Trustee in 1984. As a result of that information, Deloitte Touche Inc. agreed to have the MacLean bankruptcy reopened and have itself reappointed as Trustee of that Estate. The sole purpose of re-opening the estate was to execute a quit claim deed regarding the remaining lands to Mr. Khattar in trust. I accept Mr. Morash's evidence as summarized in Paragraph 8 of his affidavit:

> "THAT throughout this matter, Deloitte & Touche Inc. acted as an accommodation to Khattar & Khattar to dispose of the remaining asset of the Estate of Francis T. MacLean, namely an undivided portion of land in which the discharged bankrupt Francis T. MacLean had an interest. As is the general practice, our Trustee's Deed recited in paragraph 5 to this my Affidavit contains no covenants as to title, except he standard covenant that the Trustee has done nothing to encumber the lands being conveyed."

[15] MacLean complains that he received no notice that his bankruptcy had been re-opened. In the circumstances, I cannot fault Morash for not having done so.

[16] Issues:

(1) Have the MacLeans established that there is a factual basis to support the proposed claims against the Respondents pursuant to Section 215 of the Act?

(2) Can leave be granted pursuant to Section 215 of the Act given that the Respondents cannot be held liable for the proposed claims against them due to the operation of Section 41(8) of the Act?

The Law and Analysis

Issue #1: Is there a factual basis to support the proposed claims?

[17] Section 215 of the Act states that:

> "215 Except by leave of the court, no action lies against the Superintendent, an official receiver, an interim receiver or a trustee with respect to any report made under, or any action taken pursuant to, this Act."

[18] The decision in Mancini (trustee of) v. Falconi, 1993 CarswellOnt 1861 (C.A.) Per Osborne J.A.) summarizes the fundamental principles taken from the decided cases considering Section 215 of the Act:

(1) Leave to sue a trustee should not be permitted if the action is frivolous or vexatious. Manifestly unmeritorious claims should not be permitted to proceed.

(2) An action should not be allowed to proceed if the evidence filed in support of the motion, including the intended action as pleaded in draft form, does not disclose a cause of action against the trustee. The evidence will typically be presented by way of affidavit and must supply facts to support the claim asserted ...

(3) The court is not required to make a final assessment of the merits of the claim before granting leave ..."

[19] The court in Mancini also held that "the sufficiency of the evidence must be measured in the context of the purpose of s.186 [as it then was] which ... is to prevent the trustee from having to respond to actions which are frivolous or vexatious or from claims which do not disclose a cause of action." Furthermore, if the applicant has no chance of success in the proposed action, the court will not grant leave.

[20] Slander of Title: The MacLeans allege at paragraph 41 of the Statement of Claim that the Respondents slandered their title to the property described in Schedule "A" of the Deed to G.S. Khattar "in trust" (Exhibit 'E' to the Affidavit of Morash). Slander of the title requires that the following elements be proved: (1) that the defendant published words in disparagement of the plaintiff's property, (2) that such words were false, (3) that such words were published with actual malice, (4) that the plaintiff sustained special damage as a result. The MacLeans have failed to establish a factual basis for the proposed claim in slander of title on these four grounds.

[21] Falsity: In his Affidavit dated August 22, 2003, Francis MacLean relies on the following recitals to the Trustee's Deed given by Morash to G.S. Khattar "in trust" (Exhibit 'E' to the Affidavit of Morash):

Digitized by Google

> "Whereas a review of the estate file has disclosed that the Trustee in Bankruptcy did not deal with the remainder of the lands hereinafter described in Schedule "A" which lands had not been disclosed in the bankrupt's Statement of Affairs."

[22] The documents and information available to Mr. Morash for review support the fact that the original Trustee in bankruptcy, Mr. Veinotte, did not deal with certain lands which had not been disclosed in the Statement of Affairs, namely the "remaining lands" as described in the Plaintiff's Affidavit. As such, there were no false words published by the Trustee.

[23] Malice: Malice is an essential element of liability in an action for slander of title. Fridman states that "... a plaintiff will not succeed in an action for injurious falsehood unless he pleads and proves that the defendant acted maliciously, in the sense of acting for some improper purpose, with the intention of causing injury to the plaintiff, in other words, out of spite or ill-will."

[24] In Nicholas v. Anderson, 1998 Carswell Ont 3815 (C.A.) (per curiam), the applicant Nicholas was an employee prosecuted by her employer's trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee had charged her with fraud in connection with the disappearance of inventory. Nicholas sought leave nunc pro tunc to bring an action against the trustee for malicious prosecution. The Supreme Court dismissed the motion and Nicholas appealed. The Court of Appeal denied the appeal and upheld the decision of the motions court judge that the applicant had failed to establish sufficient facts to support her allegation of malice: "After reviewing the evidence and all of the other evidence, Blair J. was not satisfied that Anderson's acts constituted anything other than the normal conduct of a receiver or Trustee in bankruptcy...."

[25] In the current application, the MacLeans do not allege any facts that establish, or even point to, the existence of ill-will on the part of the Respondents. Neither does the statement of claim filed by the MacLeans (Exhibit "M" of the Affidavit of Francis MacLean) allege malice on the Respondents' part. The MacLeans have failed to show that the Respondents' actions were anything other than the normal conduct of a trustee in a similar situation. The MacLeans have failed to establish a factual basis for an essential element of the proposed claim in slander of title.

[26] Special Damage: An action for slander of title also requires that the plaintiff suffer special damage resulting from the publication. In Cross v. Bain, Pooler & Co., 1937 CarswellOnt 156 (H.C.) (Per Greene J.), the plaintiff appealed from an order of the Master directing the delivery of particulars regarding allegations of special damage in the statement of claim. The Court dismissed the appeal, finding that the defendant was entitled to know the name of the intended purchaser: "... the plaintiff is not allowed to set up a claim for general damage. Where the plaintiff is confined to special damage, the defendant is entitled to know what claim he has to meet." In Gordon v. McGibbon (1875), 16 N.B.R. 49 (C.A.), the Court found that "[t]o maintain an action of that character [i.e. slander of title], the words must be followed as a natural and legal consequence by a pecuniary damage to the plaintiffs, which must be specially alleged and proved."

[27] The MacLeans do not allege or plead special damage as a result of the actions of the Respondents in their application or in their statement of claim (Exhibit "M" of the Affidavit of Francis MacLean). At paragraphs 63 and 64 of the statement of claim, the MacLeans claim general and punitive damages only. No evidence to support a claim of special damage has been advanced. Furthermore, no special damages could arise from the actions of the Respondents given that the Trustee's Deed granted to G.S. Khattar "in trust" contained no warranty of title.

[28] I am therefore satisfied that the MacLeans have failed to establish a factual basis for key elements of the proposed claim, and should therefore be denied leave to bring an action for slander of title.

[29] Negligence: At paragraph 63 of the Statement of Claim, the MacLeans allege negligence on the part of Morash and Deloitte & Touche in not properly reviewing Francis T. MacLean's bankruptcy file. Negligence "... is the breach of that duty to take care, which the law requires ... in regard to another's person or his property." Fridman states the following elements are required to establish liability in negligence:

> "... To establish such liability, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show: (i) that he was owed a duty of care by the defendant; (ii) that the defendant should have observed a particular standard of care in order to perform or fulfil that duty; (iii) that he broke his duty of care by failing to fulfil or observe the relevant standard of care; (iv) that such breach of duty caused damage or loss to the plaintiff; (v) that such damage was not too remote a consequence of the breach so as to render the defendant not liable for its occurrence.
> Before there can be liability for negligence, before there is any need to consider whether the conduct of the defendant falls short of the standards that are to be applied to his behaviour, it must be established that he was under a duty to the particular plaintiff to take care in respect of the risk involved, and that such a duty was imposed by statute or the common law."

Digitized by Google

[30] These elements of liability were quoted with approval by Roscoe J. of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court in Wilson v. MacInnis (1992), 1992 CarswellNS 5 at para. 5.

[31] The MacLeans' application fails to present material facts in support of a key element of liability required to be proven to support a claim of negligence. The MacLeans have not presented any facts, either in the present application or in their statement of claim, in support of the damage suffered by them as a result of the alleged negligence. The existence of a Trustee's Deed respecting property to which the MacLean's claim an interest should not be viewed as sufficient support for a claim of damages. As indicated by Morash in his Affidavit sworn October 20, 2003, the Deed contained no covenants or representations as to title. A Trustee's Deed serves only to warrant that the trustee has not encumbered the property.

[32] In MacDulloch v. Price Waterhouse Ltd., 1992 CarswellNS 48 (S.C. T.D.), the executor of a bankrupt estate sued the trustee in bankruptcy for negligent mismanagement. The defendant trustee brought an application to strike out the statement of claim on the grounds that the pleading disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The Court granted the application to strike out the statement of claim because "it alleges negligent mismanagement without pleading any material facts and thus there are no facts in the statement of claim which if proved could give rise to a cause of action. A party is entitled to know the case which has to be met and this document is totally deficient in that respect."

[33] Both the MacLeans' application and the Statement of Claim fail to adequately set out the claim of negligence against the Respondents and the material facts in support of that claim. As such, the proposed claim has no hope of success and the application for leave to bring the action should therefore be denied.

Issue #2: Can leave be granted notwithstanding Section 41(8) of the Act?

[34] Section 41(8) of the Act reads as follows:

> "(8) The discharge of a trustee discharges him from all liability
> (a) in respect of any act done or default made by him in the administration of the property of the bankrupt, and
> (b) in relation to his conduct as trustee,
> but any discharge may be revoked by the court on proof that it was obtained by fraud or by suppression or concealment of any material fact."

[35] As outlined in the Affidavits of Morash and G. Alan Gladwin dated October 20, 2003, Morash and Deloitte & Touche were discharged on December 17, 1999. As a result, the Respondents argue that they are discharged from all liability in respect of the claims proposed in the MacLeans' Statement of Claim.

[36] A court can revoke the discharge of the trustee only upon proof that the discharge was obtained by fraud or by suppression or concealment of a material fact. In Alec Smith Decorating Ltd. v. Parkland School Division No. 63, 1982 CarswellSask 63 (Q.B.), the plaintiff sought to add Touche Ross Limited, as the trustee of a bankrupt estate, as a party to a mechanics' lien action. The court found that, in view of Section 23(8) of the Act (as it then was), the trustee could not be made a party because there was no suggestion that the discharge was obtained by fraud or by suppression or concealment of a material fact.

[37] The MacLeans have made no application to have the Respondents' discharge revoked. A court cannot revoke the discharge of a trustee where no application to do so has been brought. In Mann v. KPMG Inc. 2001 CarswellSask 207 (C.A), the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal overturned a decision by the Court of Queen's Bench (in Chambers) granting leave to sue the trustee nunc pro tunc under Section 215 and revoking the trustee's discharge under Section 41(8). The Court of Appeal set aside the decision of the chambers judge for three reasons:

> "First, there was no application to that end before the court. Second, the issues touching the matter were not fully developed, for the applications were not directed toward that end. And third, the legal basis for setting aside the discharge, namely 'fraud' or 'concealment' of a material fact by the trustee, was not established. In short, we are of the view the order setting aside the discharge of KPMG was excessive."

[38] The same reasons applied by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal are correctly applied to the current application and the discharge of the Respondents should not be revoked without a proper application for such discharge by the MacLeans and a hearing directed toward the issue. Unless the Respondents' discharge is revoked, the MacLeans have no chance of success in their proposed action.

[39] I am therefore refusing to grant leave to bring action against the Respondents pursuant to Section 215 of the Act.

[40] Costs: The Respondents have been successful and are therefore entitled to their costs. This was a fairly complicated matter which required extensive briefs and consumed over three hours of court time. I am therefore awarding costs of $2,000.00 in total for both Respondents (rather than to each Respondent) with reasonable disbursements to be taxed. The Respondents are not entitled to costs of travel and accommodation for Counsel from Halifax to Sydney. These costs are awarded in any event payable forthwith.

Order accordingly.

On appeal from the decision of Madam Justice Ruth E. Mesbur dated November 2, 1999

CHARRON J.A.:

[1] This is an appeal with leave under s. 193(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). The Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada ("SOCAN") appeals from the dismissal of its application under s. 215 of the BIA to commence an action against Norman E. Armitage ("the trustee"), a trustee responsible for administering a court-approved bankruptcy proposal made by Coultis Broadcasting Limited ("Coultis") under the BIA. This appeal turns on whether the motions court judge properly applied the threshold test for granting leave under s. 215. A subsidiary issue is raised on the appropriateness of bringing a s. 215 application for leave to commence an action rather than a s. 37 appeal to the bankruptcy court against an act or decision made by the trustee.

A. The s. 215 leave application

1. The threshold test under s.215

Digitized by Google

[2] Section 215 of the BIA provides that no action lies against a trustee with respect to any action taken pursuant to the BIA except with leave of the court. It is common ground between the parties that the evidence required to support an order under s. 215 must be sufficient to establish that there is a factual basis for the proposed claim and that the proposed claim discloses a cause of action. However, the evidence does not have to be sufficient to enable the motions judge to make a final assessment of the merits of the proposed claim. The sufficiency of the evidence must be measured in the context of the purpose of s. 215 which is to prevent the trustee from having to respond to actions which are frivolous or vexatious or which do not disclose a cause of action: see Mancini (Bankrupt) et al. v. Falconi et al. reflex, (1993), 61 O.A.C. 332 at 337.

2. The evidence relied upon by SOCAN

[3] SOCAN is both an ordinary and a post-proposal creditor of Coultis under the terms of the proposal. Its proposed action against the trustee is for negligence and for breach of fiduciary and other duties arising from the performance of the trustee's obligations under the terms of the proposal and the provisions of the BIA. SOCAN's proposed action is essentially based on an allegation that the trustee failed to receive payments for post-proposal creditors and to remit them to these creditors in breach of his duty to do so. SOCAN alleges in the affidavit evidence that certain payments were made to ordinary creditors by the debtor and by the trustee contrary to the obligation to make priority payment to post-proposal creditors.

[4] The crux of SOCAN's contention is that the trustee had an obligation under the terms of the proposal to receive those monies from the debtor and to make those payments to the post-proposal creditors in priority to the claims of ordinary creditors. In support of this contention, SOCAN relies mainly on the interplay of paragraphs 6 and 9 of the proposal:

> 6. THAT claims arising in respect of goods supplied, services rendered or other consideration given after the date of filing of the Notice of Intention to Make a Proposal shall be paid in full in priority to the claims of ordinary creditors.
> 9. THAT Norman Armitage, of the City of Niagara Falls, in the Province of Ontario, shall be the Trustee under this Proposal and the moneys payable under this Proposal shall be paid to the Trustee who shall make distribution referred to in paragraphs 2 to 6 of this Proposal. [Emphasis added.]

[5] The terms referred to in paragraph 9 provided as follows. Paragraphs 2 to 5 provided for priority payment of preferred claims, the fees and expenses of the trustee, amounts payable under the Income Tax Act and certain amounts payable to employees. Paragraph 6 deals with post-proposal creditors which include SOCAN. Paragraph 7 then provides for a scheme of periodic payments to the ordinary creditors, "being those persons with claims not referred to in paragraphs 2 to 6 of this Proposal". SOCAN therefore contends that it is clear from these terms that the priority payments to post-proposal creditors under paragraph 6 were included in the trustee's obligation to distribute monies pursuant to paragraph 9.

[6] SOCAN further relies on s. 60(2) of the BIA which provides that "[a]ll monies payable under the proposal shall be paid to the trustee and, after payment of all proper fees and expenses mentioned in subsection (1), shall be distributed by him to the creditors."

3. The trustee's position

[7] The trustee's position is that SOCAN's real quarrel is with the debtor and that the trustee had no obligation to receive monies from the debtor for payment to the post-proposal creditors or to monitor the debtor's business to ensure that post-proposal creditors were being paid in accordance with the terms of the proposal. He states that his obligations under paragraph 6 ended at the time the proposal was approved by the court and that his sole ongoing duty related to the payments made to the ordinary creditors under paragraph 7.

4. The motions court judge's decision

[8] The motions judge agreed with the trustee's position. In her reasons for decision, she stated that, if the trustee had an ongoing duty as contended by SOCAN, "then the facts as set out by SOCAN might well support a claim for negligence or other breach of that duty". She held, however, that the terms of the proposal and the provisions of s. 60(2) of the BIA both supported the trustee's position that his ongoing obligations extended only to the payment of monies under paragraph 7 to the ordinary creditors. She therefore concluded that "in the absence of clear duties on his part to perform the functions SOCAN suggests he should have", the facts did not disclose a reasonable cause of action and, consequently, she dismissed the application.

5. The argument on appeal

Digitized by Google

[9] SOCAN submits that the motions court judge should have granted the application based on her finding that the affidavit evidence filed in support of the application could "well support" an action in negligence and breach of fiduciary duty. It is argued that her subsequent finding, that the trustee did not owe a duty to SOCAN as contended, was a question which could not be finally determined on this threshold application. The decision was based firstly on an interpretation of the proposal, the terms of which could reasonably support SOCAN's position, and secondly, on an interpretation of relevant provisions of the BIA on the scope of a trustee's personal liability, a matter that is not fully settled at law. In these circumstances, SOCAN submits that the motions court judge, in making what was in essence a final determination of the merits of the proposed action, exceeded her jurisdiction on this s. 215 application.

[10] Counsel for the trustee did not make any serious attack on the motions court judge's observation that, if the trustee had duties as contended by SOCAN, "then the facts as set out by SOCAN might well support a claim for negligence or other breach of that duty". His submissions on the sufficiency of the evidentiary foundation were essentially directed at the scope of a trustee's duties rather than on the specific factual allegations related to the breach. Counsel for the trustee made additional submissions on the quantum of damages resulting from the alleged breach in an effort to show that they would be minimal, but I did not understand his position to be that the s. 215 application should be dismissed for lack of an evidentiary foundation with respect to damages. Hence the question raised by this appeal, whether the test under s. 215 was met, really turns on the appropriateness of the motions court judge's finding on a threshold application that the trustee did not have the obligations contended by SOCAN.

6. Conclusion

[11] I agree with SOCAN's position that the motions court judge, in disposing of this leave application, made final determinations on the merits of the proposed claim and, in doing so, she exceeded her jurisdiction.On its face, the proposal supported SOCAN's position that the payments to the post-proposal creditors under paragraph 6 would form part of the monies received by the trustee and distributed by him pursuant to the direction contained in paragraph 9. There is no question that a binding contract results from the acceptance of a debtor's proposal by the creditors and its approval by the court. Counsel for the trustee submits however that the trustee is not a party to this contract. While counsel for the trustee is correct in this assertion, it does not follow that the trustee is at liberty to disregard the terms of the proposal. The trustee is bound, rather, to act so as to give effect to its terms. See, for example, Bruncor Leasing Inc. v. Zutphen Bros. Construction Ltd (trustee of) 1994 CanLII 4011 (NS CA), (1994), 26 C.B.R. (3d) 258; 116 D.L.R. (4th) 692 (N.S.C.A.). Further, it is not clear that s. 60(2) provides support solely for the trustee's position that his ongoing obligations extended only to the payment of monies under paragraph 7 to the ordinary creditors as found by the motions court judge.

[12] I therefore find that, on the motions court judge's own assessment of the sufficiency of the factual record, leave should have been granted under s. 215.

B. The failure to bring a s. 37 application

[13] Section 37 of the BIA provides as follows:

> 37. Appeal to court against trustee – Where the bankrupt or any of the creditors or any other person is aggrieved by any act or decision of the trustee, he may apply to the court and the court may confirm, reverse or modify the act or decision complained of and make such order in the premises as it thinks just.

[14] The trustee submits that, regardless of the sufficiency of the record, leave under s. 215 should not have been granted in this case because of SOCAN's failure to proceed under s. 37. He submits that where the allegations relate entirely to the acts of a trustee within the BIA, it is generally inappropriate to grant leave under s. 215 to commence an action in the regular courts. Rather, the appropriate route is to proceed under s. 37 of the BIA and apply for a trial in the Bankruptcy Court. He submits that leave should only be granted under s. 215 where the applicant demonstrates that the issue can be dealt with more advantageously in the ordinary courts without disadvantage to the administration of the estate. In support of his argument, counsel for the trustee relies generally on some of the case law annotated under the relevant provisions of the BIA in Houlden & Morawetz, The 2000 Annotated Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, (Toronto: Carswell, 1999).

[15] In order to give effect to the trustee's submission on this point, this court would essentially have to find that s. 215 and s. 37 are mutually exclusive. It is not at all clear that the case law referred to by counsel would support such a finding. Furthermore, it is not clear that SOCAN's proposed claim falls entirely within the scope of a s. 37 proceeding. In particular, I note that SOCAN claims damages. Although the trustee's position appears to be otherwise on appeal, it is apparent from the record that counsel for the parties before the motions judge were in agreement that s. 215 was the appropriate procedure where the claim was one for damages. I note further that some of the allegations do not necessarily relate to "an act or a decision of the trustee" but rather to inaction on his part. It has been held that s. 37 has no application in such circumstances: see e.g. Re Holley reflex, (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 225 (C.A.). In any event, and more importantly, it would be unfair to dispose of this appeal on this subsidiary issue when it is apparent from the record that counsel before the motions court judge were in agreement that the application turned on the sufficiency of the evidentiary foundation for the claim. For these reasons, I would not give effect to the trustee's submission on this point.

C. Disposition

[16] I would therefore allow the appeal, set aside the judgment below and substitute an order under s. 215 of the BIA granting SOCAN leave to commence its action against the trustee.

Supreme Court of Canada
Validity of Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alta.), [1960] S.C.R. 571
Date: 1960-05-16

Validity of the Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alta.)

1960: February 3, 4; 1960: May 16.

Present: Kerwin C.J. and Taschereau, Locke, Cartwright, Fauteux, Abbott, Martland, Judson and Ritchie JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF ALBERTA, APPELLATE DIVISION.

Constitutional law—Validity of The Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alta.), c. 61—Whether bankruptcy and insolvency legislation— The B.N.A. Act, 1867, s. 91(21)—The Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14.

The Orderly Payment of Debts Act, 1959 (Alta.), c. 61, applies, with certain exceptions, to contract and judgment debts not in excess of $1,000 and, with the consent of the creditors, to judgment debts in excess of $1,000. Proceedings are instituted by the debtor applying to the clerk of the Court for a consolidation order. This application of the debtor must be supported by an affidavit setting forth, inter alia, particulars of his debts, of the nature and extent of his property, his and his wife's income and his dependants. The clerk settles the amount proposed to be paid by the debtor periodically or otherwise. The consolidation order, when made, becomes a judgment of the Court in favour of each creditor. After the making of the order, no process can be issued against the debtor, except as permitted by the Act or by leave of the Court.

On a reference as to the validity of the Act, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta held that it was ultra vires the Legislature of the Province. The appeal of the Attorney-General for Alberta to this Court was supported by the Attorneys-General for Ontario and Saskatchewan.

Held: The Act was ultra vires.

Per Kerwin C.J. and Taschereau, Fauteux, Abbott, Judson and Ritchie JJ.: The Act was ultra vires as it was in pith and substance bankruptcy and insolvency legislation. The provisions of the Act could be read in no other way than showing that they referred to a debtor who was unable to pay his debts as they matured. A debtor under the Act -was one who ceased to meet his liabilities as they became due and, therefore, fell within s. 21(1) (j) of the Bankruptcy Act. The impugned legislation was not legislation for the recovery of debts.

Per Locke, Cartwright and Martland JJ.: While the Act does not declare in terms that the debtor must be insolvent in the sense that he is unable to pay his debts as they become due, it must be so construed. It is, therefore, a clear invasion of the legislative field of insolvency and is, accordingly, beyond the powers of the Legislature. Compositions and schemes of arrangement have for more than 100 years past been treated as subject-matters falling within the scope of statutes relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. The provisions of the impugned Act are in conflict with those in the legislation passed by Parliament dealing with the same matters in the Bankruptcy Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The language of s. 91 of the B.N.A. Act, 1867, is that the exclusive legislative power of the Parliament extends to all matters in relation to, inter alia, bankruptcy and insolvency, and the provinces are excluded from that field. A.G. for Ontario v. A.G. of Canada, [1894] A.C. 189, distinguished.

Per: Cartwright and Martland JJ.: In all the decisions of the Judicial Committee or of this Court, upholding provincial legislation impugned as affecting the rights and obligations of an insolvent entity and its creditors, two conditions have been found to exist: (1) that the legislation was not in truth and substance primarily in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency but rather in relation to one or more of the matters found in s. 92; and (2) that it was not in conflict with existing valid legislation of Parliament enacted in exercise of the power contained in s. 91(21), in so far as it affected the rights and obligations of an insolvent and its creditors. Neither of these conditions. exists in this case.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta, Appellate Division1, on a reference by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. Appeal dismissed.

The judgment of Kerwin C.J. and of Taschereau, Fauteux, Abbott, Judson and Ritchie JJ. was delivered by
THE CHIEF JUSTICE:—Under the provisions of The Constitutional Questions Act, R.S.A. 1955, c. 55, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the Province of Alberta referred to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of the Province2 the following question for hearing and consideration:

> Is The Orderly Payment of Debts Act, being Chapter 61 of the Statutes of Alberta, 1959, intra vires the Legislature of Alberta, either in whole or in part, and if so, in what part or parts, and to what extent?

That Court directed that argument of the question be set down for hearing at its sittings to be held in Calgary commencing. June 1, 1959, and that a copy of that direction and of the Order-in-Council and of the Act be served upon

George H. Steer, Esq., Q.C., was appointed as counsel to argue the case on behalf of creditors or other persons who might be opposed to the provisions of the Act. At the hearing counsel for the Attorney General for the Province and one counsel for three credit associations appeared to uphold the Act while Mr. Steer presented argument against its validity. No one else appeared, although the others mentioned above were duly notified. Judgment was reserved and the Court consisting of the Chief Justice, H. J. Macdonald, M. M. Porter and H. G. Johnson, J.J.A., unanimously decided that the Act was wholly ultra vires the Legislature of the Province.
The Attorney General for Alberta appealed to this Court. In accordance with the Rules notice was duly served upon the Attorney General of Canada and by direction notice was also served upon the Attorney General for each of the other provinces. Before us counsel for the Attorney General for Ontario and for the Attorney General for Saskatchewan supported the appeal. No one else appeared except Mr. Steer On behalf of the three provinces it was submitted, as apparently it was argued in the Appellate Division, that the Act was within the legislative competence of the Province of Alberta under Heads 13, 14 and 16 of s. 92 of the British North America Act, 1867:

> 13 Property and Civil Rights in thet Province.
> 14 The Administration of Justice in the Province, including the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and of Criminal Jurisdiction and including Procedure in Civil Matters in those Courts.
> 16 Generally all Matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province.

Mr. Steer contended that the subject matter of the Act dealt with bankruptcy and insolvency and was therefore within the sole competence of the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada under Head 21 of s. 91 of the British North America Act. He also contended it was ultra vires because it encroached upon the following heads of s. 91 of that Act:

> 15. Banking, incorporation of Banks and the issue of Paper Money.
> 18. Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes.
> 19. Interest.

and because it gives to the clerk of a District Court the powers of a judge contrary to the provisions of s. 96 of the British North America Act.
I agree with the Appellate Division that the Act is ultra vires on the ground that in pith and substance it is bankruptcy and insolvency legislation and that it is therefore unnecessary to consider the other grounds of attack.
Section 3 of The Orderly Payment of Debts Act provides:

> 3. (1) This Act applies only
> (a) to a judgment for the payment of money where the amount of the judgment does not exceed one thousand dollars,
> (b) to a judgment for the payment of money in excess of one thousand dollars if the creditor consents to come under this Act, and

(c) to a claim for money, demand for debt, account, covenant or otherwise, not in excess of one thousand dollars.

(2) This Act does not apply to a debt due, owing or payable to the Crown or a municipality or relating to the public revenue or one that may be levied and collected in the form of taxes or, unless the creditor consents to come under this Act,

(a) to a claim for wages that may be heard before, or a judgment therefor by, a magistrate under The Masters and Servants Act,

(b) to a claim for a lien or a judgment thereon under The Mechanics Lien Act, or

(3) This Act does not apply to debts incurred by a trader or merchant in the usual course of his business.

Provision is then made whereby a debtor may apply to the clerk of the District Court of the judicial district in which he resides for a consolidation order, showing by affidavit all his creditors together with the amount he owes to each one, his income from all sources and, if he is married, the amount of the income of his wife, the number of persons dependent upon him, the amount payable for board or lodging or rent or as payment on home property and whether any of his creditors' claims are secured, and if so, the nature and particulars of the security held by each. The clerk is to settle an amount proposed to be paid by the debtor into court periodically or otherwise on account of the claims of his creditors and provide for hearing objections by the latter.

After such a hearing, if necessary, a consolidation order is to be made, which order is a judgment of the Court in favour of each creditor, and provision is made for a review by the Court of any such order.

Sections 12, 13 and 14 are important and read as follows:

12. The court may, in deciding any matter brought before it, impose such terms on a debtor with respect to the custody of his property or any disposition thereof or of the proceeds thereof as it deems proper to protect the registered creditors and may give such directions for the purpose as the circumstances require.

13. Upon the making of a consolidation order no process shall be issued in any court against the debtor at the instance of a registered creditor or a creditor to whom this Act applies

(a) except as permitted by this Act or the regulations, or

(b) except by leave of the court.

14. (1) The clerk may at any time require of, and take from, the debtor an assignment to himself as clerk of the court of any moneys due, owing or payable or to become due, owing or payable to the debtor or earned or to be earned by the debtor.

(2) Unless otherwise agreed upon the clerk shall forthwith notify the person owing or about to owe the moneys of the assignment and all moneys collected thereon shall be applied to the credit of the claims against the debtor under the consolidation order.

(3) The clerk may issue a writ of execution in respect of a consolidation order and cause it to be filed with the sheriff of a judicial district and at any land titles office.

While the Act applies only to claims or judgments which do not exceed one thousand dollars, unless in the case of a judgment for the payment of money in excess of one thousand dollars the creditor consents to come under the Act, I can read these provisions in no other way than showing that they refer to a debtor who is unable to pay his debts as they mature. Why else is authority given the Court to impose terms with respect to the custody of his property or any disposition thereof or of the proceeds thereof as it deems proper to protect the registered creditors (s. 12) ? And why else may no process be issued in any court against the debtor at the instance of a registered creditor or a creditor to whom the Act applies, except as stated (s. 13)? Section 14 authorizing the clerk to require an assignment to him by the debtor of any monies due, owing or payable or to become due, owing or payable to the debtor, or earned or to be earned by the debtor is surely consonant only with the position of an insolvent debtor. In fact a debtor under the Act is ceasing to meet his liabilities generally as they become due and therefore falls within s. 20(1) (j) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14.

In *Attorney General for British Columbia v. Attorney General for Canada et al.*3, Lord Thankerton speaking for the Judicial Committee states at p. 402:

> In a general sense, insolvency means inability to meet one's debts or obligations; in a technical sense, it means the condition or standard of inability to meet debts or obligations, upon the occurrence of which the statutory law enables a creditor to intervene, with the assistance of a Court, to stop individual action by creditors and to secure administration of the debtor's assets in the general interest of creditors; the law also generally allows the debtor to apply for the same administration. The justification for such proceeding by a creditor generally consists in, an act of bankruptcy by the debtor, the conditions of which are defined and prescribed by the statute law.

This was said in an appeal affirming the decision of the majority of this Court in the Reference as to the Validity of The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act of the Dominion, as amended4.

In *Canadian Bankers' Association v. Attorney General of Saskatchewan*5, this Court held that The Moratorium Act of Saskatchewan was ultra vires as being in relation to insolvency. There the decision of the Judicial Committee in *Abitibi Power and Paper Company v. The Montreal Trust Company*6 was relied upon, but, for the reasons given by Mr. Justice Locke, it was held that it had no application. As was pointed out, the Judicial Committee in the 1943 case held that the purpose of the impugned legislation was to stay proceedings in the action brought under the mortgage granted by the Abitibi Company until the interested parties should have an opportunity of considering such plan for the re-organization of the company as might be submitted by a Royal Commission appointed for that purpose. For the same reason that decision is inapplicable here. The older decision of the Privy Council in *Attorney General for Ontario v. The Attorney General of Canada*7, dealing with The Ontario Assignments and Preference Act, is quite distinguishable, although in my view it is doubtful whether in view of later pronouncements of the Judicial Committee it would at this date be decided in the same sense, even in the absence of Dominion legislation upon the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency.

The Act in question is not legislation for the recovery of debts. It has no analogy to provincial bulk sales legislation because there the object is to make sure that when a person sells his stock of goods, wares, merchandise and chattels, ordinarily the subject of trade and commerce, the creditors will not be placed in any difficulty because of the disappearance of the proceeds of the sale. It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the validity of s. 156 of The Division Courts Act of Ontario, R.S.O. 1950, apparently introduced for the first time in 1950 by c. 16 of the statutes of that year, which provides for a consolidation order.

The debtor under The Orderly Payment of Debts Act is not in the same position as the appellant in *L'Union St. Jacques de Montréal v. Bélisle*8, and the appellant can gain no comfort from *Ladore v. Bennett*9, because there it was held that the City of Windsor (Amalgamation) Act, 1935 and Amendment were in pith and substance Acts passed in relation to "municipal institutions in the Province" and did not encroach upon the exclusive legislative power of the Dominion Parliament in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency, interest, or private rights outside the Province. This was a decision of the Judicial Committee affirming that of the Court of Appeal for Ontario10, which latter, in the meantime, had been applied by the Court of Appeal for British Columbia in *Day v. Corporation of the City of Vancouver, McGavin and McMullen*11. The legislation in question in each of these cases was quite different from the effort by Alberta in *Board of Trustees of the Lethbridge Northern Irrigation District v. I.O.F.*12.

The appeal should be dismissed.

LOCKE J.:—The Orderly Payment of Debts Act was passed by the Legislature of Alberta and appears as c. 61 of the Statutes of 1959. By s. 22 it is declared that the Act is to come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation. We are informed that, pending the determination of this reference, it has not been proclaimed.

In my opinion of the various grounds upon which it is contended that the Act is ultra vires the legislature it is necessary to consider only that as to whether it infringes upon the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament to make laws in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency under head 21 of s. 91.

While "bankruptcy" and "insolvent person" are defined in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14, it is rather the meaning that these words commonly bear that is to be given to them in construing the words in s. 91. In *Parker v. Gossage*13, Parke B. said that an insolvent in the ordinary acceptation of the word is a person who cannot pay his debts. In *Reg. v. Saddlers Company*14, Willes J. adopted what had been said by Baron Parke as to the meaning assigned to the term "insolvent" and said that the words "in insolvent circumstances" had always been held to mean not merely being behind the world, if an account were taken, but insolvency to the extent of being unable to pay just debts in the ordinary course of trade and business.

In *Attorney General of British Columbia v. Attorney General of Canada*15, referring to the words in head 21, Lord Thankerton said that, in a generar sense, insolvency means inability to meet one's debts or obligations.

When the Bankruptcy Act was first enacted in 1919 (c. 36) "insolvent person" and "insolvent" were declared to include a person who is for any reason unable to meet his obligations as they respectively become due, or who has ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business, thus substantially adopting what had been said by Parke B. and Willes J. The meaning commonly borne by the terms employed in head 21 of s. 91 did not differ in 1867 from their present day meaning.

The statute to be considered does not refer in terms either to bankruptcy or insolvency and this, while not decisive, is a matter to be considered in determining the question as to what is its true nature.

The Act is declared by s. 3 to apply to a judgment not in excess of one thousand dollars, to a judgment in excess of that amount if the creditor consents to come under the Act and to a claim for money, demand for debt, account, covenant or otherwise, not in excess of one thousand dollars. Debts due to the Crown or to a municipality or relating to the public revenue, claims for wages that might be heard before a magistrate under the Masters and Servants Act, claims for a lien or a judgment thereon under the Mechanics Lien Act, claims for a lien under the Garagemen's Lien Act and debts incurred by a trader or merchant in the usual course of business are exempted from the operation of the Act.

As is the case of a proposal made by a debtor under the provisions of s. 27 of the Bankruptcy Act or s. 7 of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 1ll, proceedings under this statute are initiated by the debtor who may apply to the clerk of the district court of the judicial district in which he resides for what is called a consolidation order. With the application the debtor is required to file an affidavit in the prescribed form setting forth, inter alia, particulars of the debts owing by him, of the nature and extent of his property, the amount of the income of himself and his wife and the number of persons dependent upon him.

Section 5 requires the clerk to file the affidavit and the particulars in a register and:

> upon reading the affidavit and hearing the debtor settle an amount proposed to be paid by the debtor into court, periodically or otherwise, on account of the claims of his creditors and enter particulars thereof in the register or, if so proposed, enter in the register a statement that the present circumstances of the debtor do not warrant the fixing of any amount.

The clerk is then required to give notice of the application to each of the creditors and fix a date on which he will hear objections. If no objections are received within twenty days after the notices are mailed, the clerk is required to note the fact in the register and issue a consolidation order.

By s. 7 it is provided that any creditor may within the time limited file an objection with the clerk either to the amount entered in the register as the amount owing to him or to any other creditor or to the amount "fixed to be paid into court by the debtor or the times of payment thereof or to the statement fixing no amount." Upon such objection being filed the clerk is required to notify the debtor and any other creditor whose claim is objected to.

By s. 8 the clerk is empowered to bring in and add to the register the name of any creditor of the debtor of whom he has notice and who is not disclosed in the affidavit of the debtor.

Section 9 reads:

> (1) At the time appointed for the hearing the clerk shall consider all objections filed with him in accordance with this Act and
> (a) if an objection is to the claim of a creditor and the parties are brought to agreement or if the creditor's claim is a judgment of a court and the only objection is to the amount paid thereon, he may dispose of the objection in a summary manner and determine the amount owing to the creditor.
> (b) if an objection is to the proposed terms or method of payment of the claims by the debtor or that terms of payment are not but should be fixed, he may dispose of the objection summarily and determine as the circumstances require the terms and method of payment of the claims, or that no terms be presently fixed, or
> (c) in any case he may on notice of motion refer any objection to be disposed of by the court or as the court otherwise directs.
> (2) The clerk shall enter in the register his decision or the decision of the court, as the case may be, and shall issue a consolidation order.

Section 10 provides that the consolidation order shall state the amount owing to each creditor, the amount to be paid into court by the debtor and the times of payment, and declares that a consolidation order is a judgment of the court in favour of each creditor for the amount stated and is an order of the court for the payment by the debtor of the amounts specified.

Section 11 provides that on notice of motion a judge of the district court may review a consolidation order made by the clerk and vary it or set it aside. Under the provisions of s. 12 the judge may impose such terms on a debtor with respect to the custody of his property or any disposition thereof as he deems proper to protect the registered creditors and give such directions for that purpose as the circumstances require.

Section 13 declares that upon the making of a consolidation order no process shall be issued in any court against the debtor at the instance of a registered creditor or a creditor to whom the Act applies, except as permitted by the Act or the regulations, or by leave of the court.

Section 14 enables the clerk at any time to require the debtor to assign to him any moneys owing to or to become owing or to be earned by the debtor and authorizes him to issue a writ of execution "in respect of a consolidation order" and to file it with the sheriff or at any land titles office.

Section 15 permits an application to be made by a creditor whose claim is not entered in the consolidation order to have it entered in the register and provides the manner of settlement of any dispute as to its amount.

Section 16 declares that a registered creditor holding security for his claim may, at any time, elect to rely upon his security and if the security is realized any excess above the amount of the creditor's claim is to be paid to the clerk and applied in payment of other judgments against the debtor.

By s. 17 provision is made, inter alia, for an application by any registered creditor where a debtor defaults in complying with an order for payment or any other order or direction of the court, or where any other proceeding for the recovery of money has been brought against the debtor, or where a judgment is recovered against him for an amount in excess of one thousand dollars and the judgment creditor refuses to permit his name to be added to the register for leave to take proceedings on behalf of all of the registered creditors to enforce the consolidation order. The section further provides for an ex parte application to the court where a debtor is about to abscond or has absconded or, with intent to defraud his creditors, is about to remove his property from Alberta.

Section 18 provides that the debtor or any registered creditor may at any time apply ex parte to the clerk for a further examination of the debtor as to his financial circumstances and, after notice has been given to all parties to the consolidation order, vary the order as to the time, amount and method of payment.

Section 19 requires the clerk to distribute the moneys paid into court on account of the debts of a debtor at least once every three months pro rata among the registered creditors.

While, according to s. 3, the Act applies only to judgments or claims which do not exceed one thousand dollars, the total of such claims is not mentioned so that the Act can be applied irrespective of the aggregate amount of the debts. While the debtor may be required by the clerk under the provisions of s. 14 to assign any moneys due, owing, payable, or to become due or earned by the debtor, there is no express provision for the conveyance of the debtor's other assets to the clerk, though the powers of the district court judge under s. 12 would permit such an order to be made.

Persons engaged in farming in Alberta, as that expression is defined in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, who are entitled to make a proposal to their creditors under the terms of s. 7 of that Act are among those to whom the Orderly Payment of Debts Act will be applicable.

The language of s. 5 is that the clerk, upon an application being filed, after reading the affidavit required by s. 4 and hearing the debtor (apparently ex parte) shall "settle an amount proposed to be paid by the debtor into court periodically or otherwise on account of the claims of his creditors" or, "if so proposed" (presumably by the debtor) enter in the register a statement that the present circumstances of the debtor do not warrant the fixing of any amount. This language, while lacking in clarity, appears to indicate that, at least in the first instance, the clerk is to accept the debtor's estimate as to what, if anything, he can pay to his creditors and record this in the court records. Providing no objections are received within twenty days, this estimate appears to be conclusive by virtue of s. 6 and a consolidation order will issue.

Where objections are filed, they are to be dealt with under s. 9 which gives to the clerk power to settle the amount payable under any judgment if the amount is in dispute and, where the proposed scheme of payment is objected to, he may dispose of the objection summarily and decide upon the terms of the consolidation order.

This procedure may be compared with that provided for dealing with proposals which may be made to a trustee in bankruptcy by an insolvent person under the provisions of Part 111 of the Bankruptcy Act where the proposal is submitted to a meeting of the creditors and, if accepted by them and approved by the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under the terms of s. 34, becomes binding upon the parties concerned. Under the Act in question, where the proposal is objected to by a creditor whose claim does not exceed one thousand dollars, the wishes of the creditors may be disregarded by the clerk. The provisions of s. 13 which prohibit the taking of any proceedings by a registered creditor or a creditor to whom the Act applies are, after a consolidation order has been made as to these creditors, similar in their effect to the provisions of s. 40 of the Bankruptcy Act and s. 11 of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act relating to bankruptcy and to proposals. While s. 4 details certain information that is to be contained in the debtor's affidavit, the form of the affidavit which may be prescribed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council by regulation is not before us. Whether that affidavit is to contain a statement that the debtor is unable to meet his debts as they become due, or whether the clerk who is required to act by s. 5 is to do so upon the unsworn statement of the debtor that he is in insolvent circumstances, does not appear.

While the Act does not require that the debtor who applies must be insolvent in the sense that he is unable to pay his debts as they become due, it must, in my opinion, be so construed since it is quite impossible to believe that it was intended that the provisions of the Act might be resorted to by persons who were able to pay their way but do not feel inclined to do so. In my opinion, this is a clear invasion of the legislative field of insolvency and is, accordingly, beyond the powers of the legislature.

There have been bankruptcy laws in England since 1542 dealing with the estates of insolvent persons, and the terms of statutes in force in England prior to 1867 may be looked at as an aid in deciding what subject matters were generally regarded as included in these terms.

The Bankruptcy Consolidation Act of 1849, 12-13 Vict., c. 106, which consolidated the law relating to bankrupts, contained in ss. 201 to 223 provisions by which a trader unable to meet his engagements with his creditors might petition the court to approve a composition or scheme of arrangement for the payment of his debts and declared the manner in which such a proposal might be submitted to the creditors and, if approved, to the court for its approval.

The manner in which disputes between the official assignee and the creditors as to the carrying out of a deed of composition or arrangement were to be settled was further dealt with in 1861 in s. 136 of an Act to amend the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency in England, 24-25 Vict., c. 134.

Compositions and schemes of arrangement have thus for more than 100 years past been treated as subject matters falling within the scope of the statutes relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. The provisions dealing with this subject at the present day in England are to be found in the Bankruptcy Act of 1914 as amended (see Williams on Bankruptcy, 17th ed., p. 92). When the Bankruptcy Act was enacted in Canada in 1919 it contained in s. 13 provisions whereby an insolvent debtor who wished to make a proposal to his creditors for a composition in satisfaction of his debts or an extension of time for payment thereof or a scheme of arrangement of his affairs might, either before or after the making of a receiving order against him or the making of an authorized assignment by him, require in writing an authorized trustee to convene a meeting of his creditors for the consideration of such proposal and provisions whereby the scheme, if approved, might become binding upon the parties concerned. Similar provisions for dealing with such a proposal, a term which is defined to include a proposal for a composition, an extension of time, or for a scheme of arrangement, are contained in the Bankruptcy Act as it is today.

These provisions are made applicable to proposals by farmers in Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act above mentioned. The Act under consideration appears to be an attempt to substitute for the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act relating to proposals for an extension of time or a scheme of arrangement which are submitted to the interested creditors for their approval and, if approved, thereafter to the judge in bankruptcy, a scheme whereby the propriety of accepting such a proposal is to be determined by the clerk of the district court and with regard, apparently, only to the claims of those creditors the debts owing to whom are less than one thousand dollars in amount and those to whom greater amounts are owing who consent to come under the Act, leaving other creditors whose claims are greater to resort to such remedies as they may be advised to take for the enforcement of their claims. The provisions of the provincial Act thus conflict with those in the legislation passed by Parliament dealing with the same matters.

In *Attorney General of British Columbia v. Attorney General of Canada*16, where the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act 1934 of the Parliament of Canada, as amended by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act Amendment Act 1935 was considered, Lord Thankerton said in part:

> it cannot be maintained that legislative provision as to compositions, by which bankruptcy is avoided, but whch assumes insolvency, is not properly within the sphere of bankruptcy legislation.

and referred to the judgment of this Court in the matter of the *Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act*17, where Sir Lyman Duff, delivering the judgment of the majority, said that the history of the law seems to show clearly that legislation in respect of compositions and arrangements is a natural and ordinary component of a system of bankruptcy and insolvency law.

Some support for the validity of this legislation is sought in the judgment of the Judicial Committee in *Attorney General of Ontario v. Attorney General of Canada*18. The question in that appeal was as to whether s. 9 of c. 124, R.S.O. 1887, was within the powers of the legislature. The Act was entitled "An Act respecting assignments and preferences by insolvent persons." A majority of the members of the Court of Appeal who considered the question had found the section to be ultra vires. In an earlier case, *Clarkson v. Ontario Bank*19, Haggarty C.J.O. and Osier J.A. had held the Act as a whole to be ultra vires as legislation relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, while Burton and Patterson JJ.A. considered it to be intra vires as being in relation to property and civil rights in the province.

Prior to the passing of that statute the Insolvency Act of 1875 (c. 16) had been repealed by Parliament by c. 1 of the Statutes of 1880 and there was no Bankruptcy or Insolvency Act of the Dominion.

The judgment allowing the appeal was delivered by Herschell L.C. The Act, the first two sections of which dealt with fraudulent preferences by insolvents or those knowing themselves to be on the eve of insolvency, permitted a debtor-solvent or otherwise—to make an assignment of his exigible assets to a sheriff for the purpose of realization and distribution pro rata among his creditors. Section 9 provided that such an assignment should take precedence of all judgments and all executions not completely executed by payment. There were no provisions permitting proposals for a composition or extension of time for payment of debts. It was said that the effect to be given to judgments and executions and the manner and the extent to which they might be enforced was prima facie within the legislative powers of the legislature and that the validity of the assignment and the application of s. 9 did not depend on whether the assignor was or was not insolvent. Such an assignment, their Lordships said, did not infringe on the exclusive legislative power of Parliament under head 21. The concluding portion of the judgment reads (pp. 200-201):

> Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the provincial legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament. But it does not follow that such subjects, as might properly be treated as ancillary to such a law and therefore within the powers of the Dominion Parliament, are excluded from the legislative authority of the provincial legislature when there is no bankruptcy or insolvency legislation of the Dominion Parliament in existence.

As Parliament has dealt with the matter, the concluding portion of this judgment would be fatal to the appellant's contention, even if the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency were one in relation to which the province might legislate in the absence of legislation by the Dominion. But the language of s. 91 is that the exclusive legislative power of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters in relation to, inter alia, bankruptcy and insolvency, and the provinces are excluded from that field. As Lord Watson said in *Union Colliery v. Bryden*20:

> The abstinence of the Dominion Parliament from legislating to the full limit of its power could not have the effect of transferring to any provincial legislature the legislative power which had been assigned to the Dominion by s. 91 of the Act of 1867.

Neither *Ladore v. Bennett*21 nor *Abitibi Power and Paper Co. v. Montreal Trust Co.22,* affect the question, in my opinion. In the former case the legislation, while it affected the rights of persons who had claims against insolvent municipalities, was found to be in pith and substance in relation to municipal institutions in the province and, as such, was intra vires the legislature under s. 92(8). In the latter case the purpose of the impugned legislation was to stay proceedings in an action brought under a mortgage until the interested parties should have an opportunity of considering a plan for the reorganization of the company, and the true nature of the legislation was held to be to regulate property and civil rights within the province.

I would dismiss this appeal.

The judgment of Cartwright and Martland JJ. was delivered by CARTWRIGHT J.:—I agree with the conclusion of my brother Locke, that in its true nature and character The Orderly Payment of Debts. Act is legislation in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects specified in head 21 of s. 91 of the British North America Act, and is wholly ultra vires of the Legislature of the Province of Alberta, and I am in substantial agreement with his reasons.

I wish, however, to add some observations as to some of the decisions relied upon by counsel who supported the appeal.

The first of these is the judgment of the Judicial Committee in *Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada*23. The decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario in that case is reported in24. The question referred to the Court was:

> Had the Legislature of Ontario jurisdiction to enact the 9th section of the Eevised Statutes of Ontario, ch. 124, and entitled 'An Act respecting Assignments and Preferences by Insolvent Persons?'

The Court consisted of four judges. Hagarty C.J.O. and Burton J.A. answered in the negative; Maclennan J.A. answered in the affirmative; Osier J.A. made no answer. In the result the decision was that the section was ultra vires of the Legislature. On appeal to the Judicial Committee this decision was reversed and the question was answered in the affirmative.

In the earlier case of *Clarkson v. Ontario Bank*25*,* Hagarty C.J.O. had reached the conclusion that the whole Act was ultra vires of the Provincial Legislature; in the later case, the learned Chief Justice adhered to the opinion he had expressed in Clarkson's case and speaking of s. 9, to which alone the question put to the Court had reference, he said at p. 493:

> I find it impossible to separate it from the rest of the Act, or to give any opinion as to its effect, standing by itself, unless I arrived at a judgment the opposite to that expressed in 1888 to which I still fully adhere.

In the Judicial Committee, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Herschell, who gave the judgment of their Lordships, referred to certain other sections of the Act in order to explain the meaning of section 9 but did not deal with the question of the validity of those other sections or of the Act as a whole. At pp. 198 and 199, he said:

> Their Lordships proceed now to consider the nature of the enactment said to be ultra vires. It postpones judgments and executions not completely executed by payment to an assignment for the benefit of creditors under the Act. Now there can be no doubt that the effect to be given to judgments and executions and the manner and extent to which they may be made available for the recovery of debts are prima facie within the legislative powers of the provincial parliament. Executions are a part of the machinery by which debts are recovered, and are subject to regulation by that parliament. A creditor has no inherent right to have his debt satisfied by means of a levy by the sheriff, or to any priority in respect of such levy. The execution is a mere creature of the law which may determine and regulate the rights to which it gives rise. The Act of 1887 which abolished priority as amongst execution > creditors provided a simple means by which every creditor might obtain a share in the distribution of moneys levied under an execution by any particular creditor. The other Act of the same year, containing the section which is impeached, goes a step further, and gives to all creditors under an assignment for their general benefit a right to a rateable share of the assets of the debtor, including those which have been seized in execution.

> But it is argued that inasmuch as this assignment contemplates the insolvency of the debtor, and would only be made if he were insolvent, such a provision purports to deal with insolvency, and therefore is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. Now it is to be observed that an assignment for the general benefit of creditors has long been known to the jurisprudence of this country and also of Canada, and has its force and effect at common law quite independently of any system of bankruptcy or insolvency, or any legislation relating thereto. So far from being regarded as an essential part of the bankruptcy law, such an assignment was made an act of bankruptcy on which an adjudication might be founded, and by the law of the Province of Canada which prevailed at the time when the Dominion Act was passed, it was one of the grounds for an adjudication of insolvency.
> Moreover, the operation of an assignment for the benefit of creditors was precisely the same, whether the assignor was or was not in fact insolvent.

Viewing the impugned section in this way their Lordships were able to hold that, at all events in one aspect, its true subject matter fell within heads 13 and 14 of s. 92 of the B.N.A. Act (although in another aspect that subject matter would fall within head 21 of s. 91) and so could stand while there was no bankruptcy or insolvency legislation of the Dominion Parliament in existence in relation to the same subject matter.

In Ladore v. Bennett[26], their Lordships held that the impugned legislation was in its true nature and character in relation to the subject matter comprised in head 8 of s. 92, Municipal Institutions in the Province, and that the fact that the municipal institutions dealt with in the legislation had become insolvent did riot remove the subject matter from the ambit of provincial legislative power.

In Abitibi Power & Paper Co. v. Montreal Trust Co.[27], their Lordships regarded the subject matter of the legislation there in question as falling within heads 13 and 14 of s. 92. The Montreal Trust Co., as trustee for the bondholders, had commenced an action in the Supreme Court of. Ontario on September 8, 1932, against the Abitibi Company for the enforcement of the security of a deed of trust and bond mortgage. On September 26, 1932, the Abitibi Company was adjudicated bankrupt. On December 7, 1932, leave to continue this action was granted pursuant to s. 21 of the Dominion Winding Up Act. The bond-holders made no claim in the winding-up, and in their Lordships' view, once leave had been granted "the action proceeded as a provincial action, subject to the provincial law regulating the rights in such an action and subject to the sovereign power of the legislature to alter those rights in respect of property within the province". The judgment of their Lordships continues as follows at pp. 547 and 548:

> It could not be denied that the action proceeded subject to the possibility of being stayed under the ordinary rules of procedure as, for instance, for security for costs, default in pleading or discovery, or any special circumstances which the court might think demanded a stay. Middleton J.A. appreciated this position, but he expressed the opinion that the action would proceed in accordance with the orders and rules of practice that were in existence at the date of the application. The limitation to existing rules is significant. Their Lordships can see no ground for such a restriction. If the rules of procedure were subsequently altered before the action came to an end, it must proceed thereafter subject to the rules as amended. The province, therefore, could enact rules in the course of the action imposing a further ground of stay, and, if it can thus impose what may be a general moratorium, there is no reason why its sovereign power should be so limited as not to enable it to impose, if it so desired, a moratorium limited to a special class of action or suitor, or to one particular action or suitor.

I do not propose to refer in detail to the other authorities relied upon in support of the appeal but, after examining all of them, I think I am right in saying that in every decision of the Judicial Committee or of this Court in which provincial legislation, impugned on the ground that it affected the rights and obligations of an insolvent entity and its creditors and thereby trenched on the subject matter comprised in head 21 of s. 91, has been upheld it appears that in the view of the court two conditions were found to exist; (i) that the impugned legislation was not in truth and substance primarily in relation to Bankruptcy and Insolvency but rather in relation to one or more of the matters enumerated in s. 92; and (ii) that in so far as it affected the rights and obligations of an insolvent and its creditors it did not conflict with existing valid legislation of Parliament enacted in exercise of the power contained in head 21 of s. 91.

In the case at bar, as is shown in the reasons of my brother Locke, neither of these conditions exists.
I would dismiss the appeal.
Appeal dismissed.
