on appeal from the new brunswick court of appeal

Income tax -- Enforcement -- Confidentiality -- Evidence gained from Income Tax Act investigations protected unless required in proceedings relating to administration or enforcement of the Act -- Taxpayer petitioned into bankruptcy by Revenue Canada -- Trustee in bankruptcy seeking declaration that assets held by taxpayer's wife rightfully assets of bankrupt's estate -- Testimony of Revenue Canada officials from income tax investigation admitted into evidence -- Whether a civil action commenced by the trustee for a declaration that certain property belongs to the bankrupt's estate is a proceeding relating to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act -- Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, s. 241(1)(a), (b), (c), (2)(a), (b), (3), (4)(c).

A taxpayer unable to pay his taxes owing was petitioned into bankruptcy by Revenue Canada. The respondent trustee in bankruptcy commenced an action against the appellant (the bankrupt's wife) seeking a declaration that certain assets registered in her name were the property of the bankrupt's estate or were held in trust for that estate.

At trial, the trustee sought to introduce testimony from two Revenue Canada officials who had participated in the investigation into the bankrupt's affairs. Appellant argued that that testimony was barred because s. 241 of the Income Tax Act prohibits Revenue Canada officials from disclosing information obtained from a taxpayer for the purposes of that Act. The trial judge ruled that this testimony fell within the exception in s. 241(3) which provides that the prohibition does not apply in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act. Both officials testified, and the court granted the declaration in part. The New Brunswick Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge's interpretation of s. 241 and dismissed the appeal. At issue here was whether a civil action commenced by the trustee for a declaration that certain property is property of the bankrupt's estate is a proceeding "relating to the . . . enforcement of" the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3) of the Act.

Held (L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: Section 241 involves a balancing of competing interests: the privacy interest of the taxpayer with respect to his or her financial information, and the interest of the Minister in being allowed to disclose taxpayer information to the extent necessary for the effective administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act and other federal statutes referred to in s. 241(4). Only in exceptional or prescribed situations does the privacy interest give way to the interest of the state. By instilling confidence in taxpayers that the personal information they disclose will not be communicated in other contexts, Parliament encourages voluntary disclosure of this information. Parliament, however, has also recognized that the possession of personal information is useless if it cannot be used to assist in tax collection, when required, including tax collection by way of judicial enforcement.

Section 241(3) contemplates not only administrative and enforcement proceedings brought under the Income Tax Act itself but also other proceedings. Both the text and the context of s. 241 buttress this conclusion. The connecting phrases used by Parliament in s. 241(3) ("in respect of" and "relating to") are of the widest possible scope and suggest that a wide rather than narrow view should be taken when considering whether a proposed disclosure is in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. This breadth of meaning is confirmed by the French version of the section.

Section 222 clearly states that the Minister may resort generally to the courts to institute civil proceedings to collect taxes as debts in addition to the procedures specified in the Income Tax Act. In order to take full advantage of this power, the Minister must be able to disclose in court otherwise confidential information in order to prove the cause of action in debt. Absent the ability to disclose as required to prove a debt, s. 222 would be deprived of part of its meaning.

Glover v. Glover (No. 1) must be read to mean that the confidentiality provisions apply to any legal proceeding of a civil character which is not covered by the exception provided in s. 241(3). Sections 241(1) and (2) apply to civil proceedings not related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. Glover does not inform the issue already set out: the essential question is whether or not the bankruptcy proceedings taken herein are related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

The proceedings taken here were related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act even though they were taken by the trustee in bankruptcy. A contrary interpretation is not supported by the wording of s. 241(3) and is somewhat inconsistent with the power given to creditors in s. 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. At the policy level, the Minister should not be inhibited from recourse to the bankruptcy process in light of the advantages and protection that this process can entail. If the Minister cannot disclose confidential information in bankruptcy to prove a claim asserted, the bankruptcy procedure will in many cases not be available for income tax enforcement.

The difference in nature between bankruptcy proceedings and proceedings under s. 160, where disclosure was admitted to be available by appellant, was not relevant. The important point was that disclosure made during bankruptcy proceedings was made in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act within the meaning of s. 241(3). The fact that the Minister chose to collect taxes by petitioning the taxpayer into bankruptcy did not disentitle Revenue Canada from disclosing the confidential information.

Arguments raising the possibility of difficult questions as to competence and compellability were not persuasive.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. (dissenting): The s. 241(3) exemption applies only in the case of proceedings specifically provided for in the Income Tax Act. These proceedings are, for the most part, set out in Part XV of the Act which establishes "Administration and Enforcement" provisions. A trial to determine title between an individual and a trustee in bankruptcy is not a proceeding provided for in Part XV, or elsewhere in the Act. Accordingly, Revenue Canada officials should have been barred from disclosing information obtained in the course of their investigation of the bankrupt's affairs.

This Court gave the phrase "in respect of" a wide interpretation in the circumstances of the Indian Act as it related to taxation of personal property. The wide interpretation given the phrase in that context is not determinative of its application in s. 241(3). The context of s. 241(3), and jurisprudence of this Court treating the section, suggest that the phrase should be construed narrowly, not broadly.

The proceedings at issue on this appeal are not proceedings so connected to the administration of the Act that they fall within the contemplation of the exemption in s. 241(3). Part XV of the Act provides the Minister of Revenue with a system of debt collection proceedings that mirrors ordinary creditors' remedies. It does not, however, deal with bankruptcy, except to the extent of providing the Minister with the power to collect money owed to a secured creditor by a trustee in bankruptcy, notwithstanding the Bankruptcy Act. This legislative silence is significant. Bankruptcy is a particular process which has specific and salutary aims and which involves all of the creditors of a particular debtor. Concern for the confidentiality of information that is not public is very much at issue.

The proceeding at issue here is not an action under s. 222. The action is brought by a trustee in bankruptcy and not by the Crown as the section appears to contemplate. Under s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, all collection proceedings are stayed when the debtor is declared bankrupt. Until that point the Minister arguably may prove its debt by disclosure of information obtained for the purposes of the Act. But once a debtor is declared bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy has been put in place to pursue the bankruptcy, the proceeding is no longer capable of being accurately characterized as a proceeding relating to the administration of the Act. The stay operates until the trustee in bankruptcy is discharged. The practical effect of the proceedings permitting the Minister to realize upon an outstanding debt does not operate to make the proceeding one relating to the administration of the Act.

Part XV of the Act makes no specific provision for disclosure in the context of bankruptcy. When the Minister has recourse to this procedure, its actions are governed by the Bankruptcy Act and no longer by the Income Tax Act. In so proceeding the Minister loses the capacity to deploy the special information gathering techniques, which accrue only by virtue of the Income Tax Act, either to its own advantage, or to those of its fellow creditors.

The Minister was not permitted to disclose confidential information in the case at bar even though a superior court judge is a person, as provided in s. 241(4)(c), "legally entitled" to the information. A party should not be able to avail itself of the s. 241(4)(c) exemption if it cannot bring the proceeding within the terms of s. 241(3).

IACOBUCCI J. -- This appeal concerns the interpretation to be given to s. 241(3) of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63 (the Income Tax Act), which permits in certain circumstances the disclosure of otherwise confidential information obtained from a taxpayer by officials of the Department of National Revenue. More specifically, the appeal concerns an action by a trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, for a declaration that certain property is the property of a taxpayer bankrupt's estate. The issue is whether such an action is a proceeding "relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act.

I.Facts

Raymond Slattery, who is not a party to this action, fell into arrears in paying income tax, resulting in a lengthy investigation by Revenue Canada. Unable to collect the taxes owing, Revenue Canada petitioned Slattery into bankruptcy. The respondent, Doane Raymond Limited (the Trustee), was appointed as trustee in bankruptcy of the Raymond Slattery estate. In the bankruptcy, Revenue Canada proved a claim of just over $1 million and other creditors proved claims of over $3 million; however, since Revenue Canada is the only preferred creditor, it appears that the assets of the estate will not be sufficient to satisfy the claims of any other creditors.

The trustee commenced an action against the appellant, Marguerite Slattery, who is the wife of the bankrupt Slattery. The action sought a declaration that certain assets registered in Marguerite Slattery's name were, in fact, the property of the bankrupt's estate or were held in trust for that estate.

At trial, the trustee sought to introduce testimony from two Revenue Canada officials who had participated in the investigation into Raymond Slattery's affairs. Counsel for Marguerite Slattery objected on the ground that such testimony was barred by s. 241 of the Income Tax Act, which prohibits Revenue Canada officials from disclosing information which has been obtained from a taxpayer for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. The trial judge ruled that the testimony was not barred by s. 241 because it fell within the exception contained in s. 241(3), which exception provides that the prohibition does not apply "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act. Both officials testified, and the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench granted the declaration sought in part.

Marguerite Slattery appealed. She argued that the trial judge had erred in permitting the Revenue Canada officials to testify. The New Brunswick Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge's interpretation of s. 241 of the Income Tax Act, and dismissed the appeal.

II.Relevant Statutory Provisions

Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, s. 241:

241. (1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or authorized person shall

(a) knowingly communicate or knowingly allow to be communicated to any person any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act,

(b) knowingly allow any person to inspect or to have access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, or

(c) knowingly use, other than in the course of his duties in connection with the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

(2) Notwithstanding any other Act or law, no official or authorized person shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings,

(a) to give evidence relating to any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, or (b) to produce any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information, under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, or in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

(4) An official or authorized person may ...

(c) communicate or allow to be communicated information obtained under this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, or allow inspection of or access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, to or by any person otherwise legally entitled thereto.

III.Judgments Below

1.New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench (Jones J.)

The judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench consists of an oral ruling during the trial on the admissibility of testimony from the Revenue Canada officials. Jones J. held that the proceedings in the case at bar fell within the exception in s. 241(3) of the Income Tax Act. In interpreting the phrase "in respect of proceedings relating to the... enforcement of this Act", the trial judge commented upon two possible approaches, namely, the one set out in Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, 1981 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 561, in which the exception in s. 241(3) was held not to apply in any legal proceedings of a civil character, and a second approach taken in Canadian Pacific Tobacco Co. v. Stapleton (1952), 86 C.L.R. 1 (Aust. H.C.), which was more supportive of the trustee's position.

The trial judge held that "relating to" in s. 241(3) has a broad meaning. He suggested that, although s. 241(3) does not apply to civil proceedings unrelated to the Income Tax Act, some civil proceedings nonetheless fall within the exemption. He concluded that the action by the Trustee was of this latter kind, stating:

> Now I know there can be civil legal proceedings strictly under the Income Tax Act, nevertheless, it is my finding that on the interpretation that I make of the words "relating to the enforcement of the Act" that -- and bearing in mind the circumstances in this case, the fact that it is -- this is a civil action by trustee in bankruptcy, major -- while the primary creditor is Revenue Canada, and the purpose for which -- came out in evidence before me yesterday morning, this action is pursued, I would find that it comes within the meaning of s. 241.3 and I would, therefore allow the plaintiff to continue with questions along that -- along the line which he was pursuing, or at least I would say that Sections 241.1 and 241.2 would not apply in this proceeding.

Accordingly, the trial judge permitted the Revenue Canada officials to testify.

2.New Brunswick Court of Appeal 1991 CanLII 4083 (NB CA), (1991), 120 N.B.R. (2d) 4 (Hoyt, Ayles and Ryan JJ.A.)

The reasons of the court were delivered by Hoyt J.A. (as he then was). During a brief review of the facts, Hoyt J.A. noted the importance of the testimony given by the Revenue Canada officials to the decision reached by the trial judge. He also noted that the purpose of the trustee's action was to ensure that the assets of the estate were collected, so that the bankrupt's creditors, including Revenue Canada, could be paid. In determining whether such proceedings were "proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act", Hoyt J.A. held at pp. 11-12:

> A taxpayer who, like Mr. Slattery, circumvents tax collection procedures found in the Act is not thereby immune from other proceedings that the Minister may take to collect unpaid taxes and thus enforce the Act. Although Mr. Slattery is not a defendant in this proceeding, the trial judge has found, correctly in my view, that this situation arose because Mr. Slattery attempted to avoid paying outstanding taxes owed to Revenue Canada by implicating Mrs. Slattery with, it must be noted, her acquiescence.

Hoyt J.A. held at p. 12 that to "accept the appellant's submission could prevent the Minister from enforcing the Income Tax Act in proceedings other than those brought specifically under that Act". He distinguished Glover, supra, by stating that the present action could not be characterized as a non-Income Tax Act legal proceeding. Although this proceeding was not instituted under the Income Tax Act, he found it to be related to the enforcement of that Act.

As a result, the Court of Appeal held that the Revenue Canada officials had properly been permitted to testify and the appeal was dismissed.

IV.Issue

The question raised by this appeal is whether a civil action commenced by the trustee for a declaration that certain property is property of the bankrupt's estate is a proceeding "relating to the ... enforcement of" the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3) of that Act. If it is, the prohibitions contained in s. 241 of the Income Tax Act against Revenue Canada officials' communicating or giving evidence of information obtained from the taxpayer do not apply. The respondent trustee in its factum also argues that the disclosure could be permitted by the exception contained in s. 241(4)(c), by suggesting that a bankruptcy judge is a "person otherwise legally entitled" to such information. As a result of my conclusion, I need not discuss this argument further.

An analysis of the history of s. 241, its underlying purposes and policy, its text and context, applicable judicial authority, and the nature of the proceedings involved herein, leads me to conclude that the courts below were correct in their holdings and that this appeal should be dismissed.

V.Analysis

1. History of s. 241

At the outset, it is worth noting that the taxation of income in Canada has been and is based on a self assessment and self reporting system. Confidentiality of taxpayer information has been an important part of our income tax collection system.

Legislated confidentiality of information obtained from taxpayers has moved through two distinct stages in Canada. The first stage began with s. 11 of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, S.C. 1917, c. 28. That section was a simple prohibition against disclosure by a person employed in the service of the Crown to a person, not legally entitled thereto, of any information obtained under the Act. Section 11 read as follows:

> 11. No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto, any information obtained under the provisions of this Act, or allow such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this Act. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

Digitized by Google

Section 11 was re-enacted as s. 81 of the 1927 Income War Tax Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 97, with the only modification being that the section was divided into two subsections, with the penalty portion becoming s. 81(2). In 1948, s. 81 became s. 121 of The Income Tax Act, slight changes in wording took place, and the subsections reverted to a consolidated form once more (S.C. 1948, c. 52). In 1952, the last change of the first stage occurred, and s. 121 became s. 133 in the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148. Viewed as a whole, this stage of legislative history is distinguishable because the extent of confidentiality protection afforded to taxpayers by the plain language of the statute had two features. First, the prohibition against disclosure was directed only at persons in the service of the Crown. Second, the success of that prohibition depended almost entirely upon the meaning ascribed to the statutory phrase "a person, not legally entitled thereto", which phrase offered the only exception to the otherwise blanket statutory prohibition.

The second legislative stage began in 1966 when the confidentiality section was entirely modified by two amendments (S.C. 1966-67, c. 47, s. 17, and S.C. 1966-67, c. 91, s. 22). These amendments extended the general rule of non-disclosure to everyone, and at the same time spelled out specific exceptions for prescribed situations. (See Stephen J. Toope and Alison L. Young, "The Confidentiality of Tax Returns Under Canadian Law" (1982), 27 McGill L.J. 479.) The following is a succint summary of the 1966 amendments at p. 489:

> The general effect of these provisions is to make the section easier to apply. There is now a general prohibition against release of tax information to anyone. The subsections which follow the general prohibition set up exceptions to the rule, and the circumstances in which ministerial discretion may operate seem to be clear. The organization of the section is, in this respect, more amenable to application by common law courts as it resembles a set of rules rather than an abstract principle.

As will be noted again below, the 1966 amendments were described by the Ontario Court of Appeal as "a comprehensive code designed to protect the confidentiality of all information given to the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act" -- Glover v. Glover (No. 1) (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392, at p. 396. The amendments were initially embodied in s. 133, but in 1970, s. 133 became s. 241 of the Income Tax Act, as it remains today. Since then, the section has been only slightly modified.

2. Purposes and Policy Underlying s. 241

In my view, s. 241 involves a balancing of competing interests: the privacy interest of the taxpayer with respect to his or her financial information, and the interest of the Minister in being allowed to disclose taxpayer information to the extent necessary for the effective administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act and other federal statutes referred to in s. 241(4).

Section 241 reflects the importance of ensuring respect for a taxpayer's privacy interests, particularly as that interest relates to a taxpayer's finances. Therefore, access to financial and related information about taxpayers is to be taken seriously, and such information can only be disclosed in prescribed situations. Only in those exceptional situations does the privacy interest give way to the interest of the state.

As alluded to already, Parliament recognized that to maintain the confidentiality of income tax returns and other obtained information is to encourage the voluntary tax reporting upon which our tax system is based. Taxpayers are responsible for reporting their incomes and expenses and for calculating the tax owed to Revenue Canada. By instilling confidence in taxpayers that the personal information they disclose will not be communicated in other contexts, Parliament encourages voluntary disclosure of this information. The opposite is also true: if taxpayers lack this confidence, they may be reluctant to disclose voluntarily all of the required information (Edwin C. Harris, Canadian Income Taxation (4th ed. 1986), at pp. 26-27).

Parliament has also recognized, however, that if personal information obtained cannot be used to assist in tax collection when required, including tax collection by way of judicial enforcement, the possession of such information will be useless. Disclosure of information obtained through tax returns or collected in the course of tax investigations may be necessary during litigation in order to ensure that all relevant information is before the court, and thereby to assist in the correct disposition of litigation. But this necessity is sanctioned by Parliament in a very limited number of situations. Disclosure is authorized in criminal proceedings and other proceedings as set out in s. 241(3). Certain other situations are specified in s. 241(4), which have been described by the Ontario Court of Appeal as being "largely of an administrative nature" (Glover v. Glover (No. 1), supra, at p. 397).

3. The Text and Context of s. 241(3)

As already noted, s. 241(3) provides, inter alia, that the confidentiality provisions in s. 241(1) and (2) do not apply "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act. The appellant argues that the only proceedings covered by this exception are those which are expressly provided for in Part XV of the Act, entitled "Administration and Enforcement". The appellant's argument would require the words in s. 241(3) to be read as meaning that the confidentiality provisions do not apply "in respect of proceedings taken pursuant to the administration or enforcement provisions" of the Income Tax Act. Neither the text nor context of s. 241 supports this argument.

Digitized by Google

The connecting phrases used by Parliament in s. 241(3) are very broad. The confidentiality provisions are stated not to apply in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

The phrase "in respect of" was considered by this Court in Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 39:

> The words "in respect of" are, in my opinion, words of the widest possible scope. They import such meanings as "in relation to", "with reference to" or "in connection with". The phrase "in respect of" is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters. [Emphasis added.]

In my view, these comments are equally applicable to the phrase "relating to". The Pocket Oxford Dictionary (1984) defines the word "relation" as follows:

> ... what one person or thing has to do with another, way in which one stands or is related to another, kind of connection or correspondence or contrast or feeling that prevails between persons or things;...

So, both the connecting phrases of s. 241(3) suggest that a wide rather than narrow view should be taken when considering whether a proposed disclosure is in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

This breadth of meaning is confirmed when one examines the French version of the section. The French version of s. 241(3) reads as follows:

241. ...

The phrase "ayant trait à" is defined in the Larousse dictionary Dictionnaire de la langue française (1989) as: "Avoir trait à : avoir un rapport avec". The dictionary Le Robert Méthodique (1988) defines the phrase as: "Avoir trait à: Se rapporter à... V. Rapport". And the same dictionary defines the word "rapport" as meaning "Lien, relation". Consequently, the French version of s. 241(3) is as broad as the English version.

The next question to ask considers what type of administration or enforcement proceedings are contemplated by s. 241(3): only proceedings brought under the Income Tax Act itself, or both such proceedings and others? To answer this question, one must look first to the wording of s. 241(3). That provision contains no language which confines the concept of proceedings relating to administration or enforcement to the boundaries of the Income Tax Act. This conclusion is buttressed when one considers the context of s. 241.

Section 241 is found in Part XV of the Income Tax Act, which deals with administration and enforcement as previously noted. It is obvious, but the fact must nonetheless be highlighted, that the collection of money owing to Revenue Canada is an important part of the Act's enforcement. This proposition is confirmed by s. 222 of the Act which reads as follow:

> 222. All taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts payable under this Act are debts due to Her Majesty and recoverable as such in the Federal Court of Canada or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act. [Emphasis added.]

Section 222 is a clear statement that, in addition to the procedures specified in the Income Tax Act, the Minister may resort generally to the courts to institute civil proceedings to collect taxes as debts. But, in order to take full advantage of this power, the Minister must be able to disclose in court otherwise confidential information in order to prove the cause of action in debt. It must therefore be possible to disclose such information to establish the amount owed and to prove related matters. Absent the ability to disclose as required to prove a debt, s. 222 would be deprived of part of its meaning. The absurdity of such a result strongly suggests that the collection proceedings specified in s. 222 are proceedings "relating to the... enforcement" of the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3).

This legislative interpretation accords with the necessary balancing of privacy and state interests which takes place in s. 241. Confidentiality of tax information is necessary in order to promote the privacy interests of taxpayers and the success of voluntary tax reporting. But the success of the voluntary tax reporting system will be of no import if Revenue Canada cannot effectively collect taxes owed by taxpayers. In order to collect taxes owed, Revenue Canada should be able to resort to various procedures and proceedings to pursue the amounts owed and in doing so should also be able to disclose in court the information necessary to prove a cause of action in debt. As Décary J.A. said in Diversified Holdings Ltd v. Canada, reflex, [1991] 1 F.C. 595 (C.A.), at p. 599:

> In the instant case, the documents are part of a process, the collection proceedings, which is in itself in the public domain and which involves by its very nature the publication of information that would otherwise have remained confidential. One cannot seize a property pursuant to a certificate which has the force and effect of a judgment (see subsection 223(2) of the Act) without revealing to some extent information given to the Minister.

4. Judicial Interpretation of s. 241

I do not find it necessary to discuss all the cases which were decided under s. 241's predecessor sections or which deal with actions related to those predecessor sections. However, both the appellant and respondent cited, in support of their respective positions, the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Glover v. Glover (No. 1), supra, which was affirmed by this Court in a short judgment (Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, supra). Accordingly, some comment on this case is required.

In Glover, a trial judge ordered Revenue Canada to disclose the address of a taxpayer who had abducted his children in violation of a court order which granted custody to the children's mother. The question was whether the judge who ordered disclosure of the information was a person "legally entitled thereto". That phrase had been carried over from s. 241's predecessor provision and was restated in s. 241(4)(c) as an enumerated exception. The Ontario Court of Appeal set aside the trial judge's order, holding that the judge did not come within the s. 241(4)(c) exception.

In the course of his reasons, MacKinnon A.C.J.O. on behalf of a unanimous court made some general comments on the interpretation of s. 241. He stated at p. 396 that "[s]ection 241, in my view, is a comprehensive code designed to protect the confidentiality of all information given to the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act". In his opinion, at p. 397, s. 241(3) was:

... a clear statement of parliamentary policy that no information obtained for the purpose of the Act shall be communicated and no official or authorized person shall be required to give evidence relating to such information in any non-Income Tax Act civil legal proceedings.

The mother appealed the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal to this Court, which dismissed the appeal with brief reasons in which Laskin C.J. said at p. 562:

Sympathetic though one is inclined to be to the appellant's plight, the statutory provisions above-mentioned for non-disclosure, in connection with any legal proceedings of a civil character, do not give any power to a court to qualify them, nor do the exceptions set out in s. 241(4)(c) assist the appellant.

I agree with the respondent that, in Glover, the proceedings in question had no connection whatsoever with the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. As a result, this Court's decision must be read to mean that the confidentiality provisions apply to any legal proceeding of a civil character which is not covered by the exception provided in s. 241(3). In other words, ss. 241(1) and (2) apply to civil proceedings which are not related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. In my view, Glover does not inform the issue already set out: the essential question is whether or not the bankruptcy proceedings taken herein are related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. As I will now discuss, I think they are.

V. Are the Present Proceedings Covered by s. 241(3)?

In determining whether the present bankruptcy proceedings are covered by the exception in s. 241(3) of the Income Tax Act, I think it worthwhile to note briefly some of the features of the bankruptcy process.

It has been stated that among the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act are a desire to permit an effective and fair distribution of the assets of a bankrupt person, and a desire to protect creditors of insolvent persons. See Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1993), at pp. 1-3, 1-4; see also Marc Chabot, Faillite et Insolvabilité (1987), at p. 8. Indeed, it has been asserted that not only are the interests of debtors and creditors protected under the Bankruptcy Act, but so is the public interest. See Professor Albert Bohémier, Faillite et Insolvabilité, vol. 1, (1992), at pp. 48-56. Thus, there are many who would advocate resort to bankruptcy proceedings as an effective and fair means of debt collection. I need not join the debate as to whether or to what extent these assertions are true. I will simply note that the bankruptcy process is aimed at the proper protection of debtor, creditor and public interests.

In the case on appeal, the Minister of National Revenue petitioned Raymond Slattery into bankruptcy. Mr. Slattery filed a statement of affairs stating that he had virtually no assets. The trustee then commenced the present action in the Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick seeking a declaration that certain assets held in the name of the appellant, Marguerite Slattery, were in reality property of the bankrupt's estate.

The appellant admits that, if the Minister through Revenue Canada had instituted proceedings under the Income Tax Act, such proceedings would be enforcement proceedings covered by the exception in s. 241(3). However, the appellant argues that because the proceedings herein were taken by the trustee, they cannot qualify as such. In my view, this argument fails for several reasons.

First, the appellant's argument is not supported by the wording of s. 241(3). As mentioned earlier, in my opinion the exception authorizing Revenue Canada to disclose tax related information in proceedings is very broad; that is, it operates in respect of proceedings relating to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act. The practical purpose and result of the present proceedings will be to increase the estate of the bankrupt taxpayer, Raymond Slattery. The ultimate purpose and result of these same proceedings will be the payment of taxes owed, inasmuch as Revenue Canada is a preferred beneficiary under the scheme of distribution established by s. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act. I find it quite clear that, under the terms of s. 241(3), such a proceeding has a "relation" or "connection" with the enforcement of the Income Tax Act. Neither the fact that the bankruptcy proceedings involve other creditors of the bankrupt, nor the fact that the proceedings were commenced by the trustee, detracts from the "relation" or "connection" between the proceedings and the enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

Second, the appellant's argument is also somewhat inconsistent with the power given to creditors in s. 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 38(1) provides for the following:

> 38. (1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk....

If we accept the appellant's proposition, a potential contradiction obviously results. That is, if a trustee initiated proceedings, confidential information obtained by Revenue Canada could not be disclosed in order to prove the fraudulent scheme, whereas if the trustee refused to act and Revenue Canada took the same proceedings, the information could arguably be disclosed. This result makes no sense since, in either case, the proceedings would be under the Bankruptcy Act and would be taken in furtherance of enforcing the Income Tax Act. The intervention of the trustee does not change the character of the bankruptcy proceedings, in so far as that character relates to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

Third, at the level of policy, I see no valid reason why the Minister should be inhibited from recourse to the bankruptcy process in light of the advantages and protection that this process can entail. If the Minister cannot disclose confidential information in bankruptcy to prove a claim asserted, the bankruptcy procedure will in many cases not be available for income tax enforcement. Again, the sense of this result is not apparent.

Without wishing to rule in any way on the matter, it is alleged that Revenue Canada had and still has at its disposal some Income Tax Act remedies against the appellant, which are unaffected by the stay of proceedings provided for by s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, which reads as follows:

> 69. (1) On the filing of a proposal made by an insolvent person or on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the debtor or his property or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the trustee has been discharged or until the proposal has been refused, unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

(See D. Scott Brown, "Bankruptcy and Income Tax: A Revenue Canada Perspective" in 1990 Conference Report: Report of Proceedings of the Forty-Second Tax Conference, at p. 18:11).

One of these allegedly unaffected remedies is found in s. 160 of the Income Tax Act which provides:

> 160. (1) Where a person has, on or after the 1st day of May, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to
> (a) his spouse or a person who has since become his spouse,
> the following rules apply:
> ...
> (e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of
> (i) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and
> (ii) the aggregate of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year.

D. Scott Brown, in the article cited above, comments on the scope of s. 160 as follows (at p. 18:13):

> The provisions of section 160 enable the minister to assess a transferee in respect of a transfer of property that, but for that provision, would require recourse under the settlement provisions of sections 91, 92, or 93 of the Bankruptcy Act, or alternatively under a provincial fraudulent conveyance statute. Generally, section 160 provides a very effective remedy against this type of transfer. In fact, the result of any direct or indirect transfer to a spouse... will be that the transferee and the transferor will be held jointly and severally liable under section 160 to pay the lesser of (1) the difference between the fair market value of the property and the amount paid for the property, and (2) the amount of the tax due by the transferor in the year of the transfer or any prior year.

It was apparently acknowledged by the appellant that the Minister could have used s. 160 in an attempt to recover some of the taxes owed by Raymond Slattery, but did not do so. The appellant agrees that, in the context of s. 160, the Minister could have disclosed the confidential tax information, but the appellant argues that the bankruptcy proceedings are different in nature. However, whether or not they are different in nature is beside the point. The important point is whether or not the disclosure within the bankruptcy proceedings occurred "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act. The possible existence of an alternative enforcement procedure which would clearly permit disclosure is further support for the respondent's position. Although the Minister chose to collect taxes by petitioning the taxpayer into bankruptcy, in my view, this did not disentitle Revenue Canada from disclosing the confidential information. The disclosure occurred in respect of proceedings which can be clearly characterized as relating to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3) of that Act.

Finally, counsel for the appellant argued that to characterize the bankruptcy proceedings as "proceedings relating to the... enforcement of" the Income Tax Act would open up difficult questions relating to competence and compellability as those issues might affect Revenue Canada in a variety of possible actions. I find this argument unpersuasive, particularly in light of the circumstances of this case. Those circumstances include Revenue Canada's act of petitioning the taxpayer into bankruptcy, the active involvement of Revenue Canada in the bankruptcy proceedings, the collaboration between officials and the trustee, and the reality that Revenue Canada was entitled to volunteer and did, in fact, volunteer to disclose the otherwise confidential information in order to enforce the Income Tax Act.

VI.Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that the proceedings taken by the trustee are "proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement" of the Income Tax Act as set out in s. 241(3). Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The reasons of L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. were delivered by MCLACHLIN J. (dissenting) -- I have had the benefit of reading the reasons of my colleague, Justice Iacobucci. I respectfully disagree with his conclusion regarding the scope of the s. 241(3) exemption from non-disclosure of information obtained by the Minister of Revenue for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63.

Section 241(3) provides that the general prohibition on disclosure of such information, as set out in ss. 241(1) and (2), does not apply, inter alia, "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act ...." The sole question on this appeal is whether the proceedings at issue are of this type.

These proceedings should be carefully described. Raymond Slattery fell into arrears paying income taxes. Revenue Canada conducted a lengthy investigation into his affairs. They petitioned Mr. Slattery into bankruptcy. In bankruptcy proceedings Revenue Canada proved a claim against Mr. Slattery of over $1,000,000. At a subsequent trial to determine title between the appellant and the bankrupt's estate, the trustee in bankruptcy sought to introduce testimony from two Revenue Canada officials who had participated in the earlier investigation of Mr. Slattery's affairs. This testimony was admitted on the ground that the trial was a proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. The ruling was upheld on appeal.

My colleague Iacobucci J. would uphold these decisions. Focusing in part on the fact that the trial would ultimately result in the collection of unpaid taxes, he finds that the trial was a proceeding "relating to" the administration or enforcement of the Act.

In my view, the s. 241(3) exemption applies only in the case of proceedings specifically provided for in the Income Tax Act. These proceedings are, for the most part, set out in Part XV of the Act which, as the title of the Part indicates, establishes "Administration and Enforcement" provisions. A trial to determine title between an individual and a trustee in bankruptcy is not a proceeding provided for in Part XV, or elsewhere in the Act. Accordingly, in my view, Revenue Canada officials should have been barred from disclosing information obtained in the course of their investigation of the bankrupt's affairs.

The Scope of s. 241

Iacobucci J. has discussed the character of the provisions which govern the disclosure of information obtained for the purposes of the Act. He notes, at p. 444, that "[o]nly in those exceptional situations does the privacy interest [of citizens] give way to the interest of the state." These words, as my colleague notes, reflect the balance which Parliament has established between the competing interests at play: the interest in ensuring voluntary disclosure to the Minister of Revenue, which is served by the general rule of confidentiality, and the state's interest the collection of tax debts.

But having noted the primacy of privacy concerns under the Income Tax Act, Iacobucci J. goes on to interpret the disclosure clause of s. 241 broadly. He finds that the connecting phrases used in s. 241(3) are "very broad". Relying on Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, he interprets these connecting phrases to encompass proceedings which have any connection with the administration of the Act.

I do not share the view that Nowegijick informs the issue. That case does not concern s. 241 or any of its predecessor sections. Rather, Nowegijick discusses the phrase "in respect of" as it is employed in s. 87 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, in relation to taxation of personal property. Giving the phrase the "widest possible scope" in that context is not determinative of its application in s. 241(3). Instead, the context of s. 241(3), and jurisprudence of this Court treating the section, suggests that the phrase should be construed narrowly, not broadly. As Wilson J. noted in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627, at p. 650:

Digitized by Google

... the taxpayer's privacy interest is protected as much as possible since s. 241 of the Act protects the taxpayer from disclosure of his records or the information contained therein to other persons or agencies. [Emphasis added.]

The structure of s. 241 subsequent to its 1966 amendment (S.C. 1966-67, c. 47, s. 17 and S.C. 1966-67, c. 91, s. 22) bears out the interpretation given the section by Wilson J. Prior to 1966, the Minister of Revenue was barred from disclosing information obtained under the Act to persons "not legally entitled thereto ...." This phrase did not constitute a serious hurdle to disclosure. As noted by Stephen J. Toope and Alison L. Young, in "The Confidentiality of Tax Returns Under Canadian Law" (1982), 27 McGill L.J. 479, at p. 487, "the [former] section created a carte blanche for the Minister to consider almost anyone to be `legally entitled' to the information as long as they could show some vague need." After 1966, the prohibition was extended to "any person", unless a specific exemption had been provided. The exemptions are few, and are set out in ss. 241(3) and (4). Disclosure is permitted in specific criminal proceedings, in proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act, and, by virtue of s. 241(4), as might be required to facilitate specific government programs and the internal working of the Ministry of specific features of the Act. In s. 241(4)(c), disclosure to persons "otherwise legally entitled thereto" is again permitted, but the phrase is no longer the animating concern of the section. Rather, it must be understood as one element in a group of narrow and particular exemptions largely administrative in nature: see Glover v. Glover (No. 1) (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392, at p. 398.

The appellant submits that the proceedings at issue on this appeal are not proceedings relating to the administration of the Act in which the Minister can disclose information obtained for the purposes of the Act since they are not specifically provided for in Part XV of the Act. I agree with the substance of this submission. We are not here concerned with the capacity of the Ministry to undertake, or to involve itself in, proceedings which may bear some connection to the enforcement of the Act. The concern is whether these are the sort of proceedings which are so connected to the administration of the Act that they fall within the contemplation of the exemption in s. 241(3) and thereby allow the Ministry to disclose information which it has only by virtue of special investigative powers provided for in the Act (see ss. 231.1 to 231.5).

Part XV of the Act provides the Minister of Revenue with a system of debt collection proceedings that mirrors ordinary creditors' remedies. Taxes owing may be recovered by registering the amount in court and enforcing it as a judgment (s. 223(3)), registering the amount as a charge on land (s. 223(5)), garnishing sums destined to the tax debtor from third parties (s. 224(1)), deducting the amount from or setting it off against other sums payable by the Crown to the tax debtor (s. 224.1), seizing and selling the debtor's chattels (s. 225(1)) and prosecuting the tax debtor for offences under the Act and obtaining compliance orders (ss. 238 and 239). But Part XV does not deal with bankruptcy, except to the extent of providing the Minister the power to collect money owed to a secured creditor by a trustee in bankruptcy, notwithstanding the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3: see Income Tax Act, s. 224 (1.2) (added by S.C. 1987, c. 46, s. 66).

In the context of Part XV this legislative silence is significant. Bankruptcy is a particular process with specific and salutary aims. Above all, however, bankruptcy is a process that involves all of the creditors of a particular debtor. Concern for the confidentiality of information that is not public is very much at issue.

My colleague is of the view that the bankruptcy process is available to the Minister by virtue of s. 222 of the Act, which provides that the Minister may resort to a court of competent jurisdiction to collect tax debts. I concur in this interpretation of the plain wording of s. 222, but I am not persuaded that the proceeding that is at issue here is an action under s. 222.

In the first place, the action is not brought by Her Majesty, as the section appears to contemplate. It is brought by a trustee in bankruptcy. Iacobucci J. is of the view that this does not take the proceedings out the s. 241(3) exemption. I disagree. Under s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, all collection proceedings are stayed once the debtor is declared bankrupt. Until that point the Minister arguably may prove its debt by disclosure of information obtained for the purposes of the Act. But once a debtor is declared bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy has been put in place to pursue the bankruptcy, the proceeding is no longer capable of being accurately characterized as a proceeding relating to the administration of the Act. The stay operates until the trustee in bankruptcy is discharged. The trustee has a statutory duty to take possession of the bankrupt's property. It has a statutory power to institute legal proceedings. Persons in possession of a bankrupt's property have a statutory duty to deliver it to the trustee. (See Bankruptcy Act, ss. 16(3), (4), 19(1), (2), and 17(1).) The trustee is a fiduciary of the estate of the bankrupt and institutes an action to the benefit of the state as a whole. The trustee does not act a mere agent of the creditors, or as an agent of particular creditors. In such a legal context, I do not think that it can be said that the fact that the practical effect of the proceedings will permit the Minister to realize on an outstanding debt suffices to make the proceeding one that relates to the administration of the Act.

The fact that Part XV of the Act makes no specific provision for disclosure in the context of bankruptcy suggests that when the Minister has recourse to this procedure, its actions are governed by the Bankruptcy Act and no longer by the Income Tax Act. In so proceeding the Minister loses the capacity to deploy the special information gathering techniques, which accrue only by virtue of the Income Tax Act, either to its own advantage, or to those of its fellow creditors. The broad powers to compel appearance and disclosure which are exercisable by the trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act (see ss. 163 through 167) should be interpreted in light of this fact. Information available from public sources is not unavailable in such proceedings simply because it has passed through the hands of Revenue Canada. But information that issues from the Minister, by virtue of any special investigative powers, must remain confidential.

Section 241(4)(c)

The respondent also argues that the Minister was permitted to disclose confidential information in the case at bar since a superior court judge is a person, as provided in s. 241(4)(c), "legally entitled" to the information. In my view the decisions of this Court and of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Glover, supra, dispense with this argument. The issue in those cases was whether the judge in child custody proceedings was a "person ... legally entitled" to the information. The Ontario Court of Appeal, in a decision that was affirmed in this Court, held (at p. 397) that the s. 241(4) exemptions were administrative in nature, and that if a court could at any time by its own order entitle itself to receive otherwise confidential taxpayer information "it would emasculate the effect of s. 241(2) and render s. 241(3) unnecessary". The point of these judgments is that a party should not be able to avail itself of the s. 241(4)(c) exemption if it cannot bring the proceeding within the terms of s. 241(3). I have found above that this respondent cannot.

Disposition

The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge's findings in declaring some of the property of the appellant to be the property of the bankrupt's estate depended largely upon the testimony and evidence of the Revenue Canada officials. This information was gathered in the course of an investigation undertaken according to special investigatory powers available to Revenue Canada under the Act. Section 241 forbad its disclosure in the bankruptcy proceedings. I would allow the appeal and set aside the judgments below. I would grant costs to the appellant.

FREEMAN, J.A.:

The respondent LaserWorks Computer Services Inc., a dealer in supplies for laser printers, made a proposal to its creditors under the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the BIA).

A competitor, Datarite, operating through the appellant 3004876 Nova Scotia Limited, acquired the claims of eighteen creditors and voted them over the objections of LaserWorks at the meeting of creditors, defeating the proposal. Only two of the remaining sixteen creditors opposed the proposal.

Acceptance required votes representing a majority in number and two-thirds in value of the class of unsecured creditors present in person or by proxy. The Registrar of Bankruptcy of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy, Tim Hill, found:

> Upon the vote being taken, fourteen creditors with a total claim value of $206,531.65 voted in favour of the proposal. Twenty creditors with a total claim of $140, 370.00 voted against the proposal. Thus 41% of creditors representing 59% of the claims voted pro, and 59% of the creditors with 40.5% of the claims voted con. The proposal was defeated, subject to the resolution of the objections before the court today.

At the hearing into the objections the Registrar, after hearing evidence from the appellant's solicitor Victor Goldberg, who was not counsel on the appeal, disallowed the appellant's votes. He found the proposal had been accepted by the votes of the other creditors. His decision was upheld by Justice Stewart on an appeal to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Bankruptcy.

Issues and Standard of Review

The overriding issue is whether the court's inherent supervisory jurisdiction should be invoked to interfere in a proposal to creditors under the BIA when it appears the statutory process is being used for purposes not contemplated by Parliament.

The appellant submits it was a true appeal before Justice Stewart, and not a hearing de novo, on the authority of Re McCulloch Estate 1992 CanLII 2799 (NS SC), (1992), 13 C.B.R. (3d) 201 Tr. Div.) and Cockfield Brown Inc. (Trustee of) v. Reseau de Television TVA Inc. (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 59 (Que. C.A.) On further appeal to this court the grounds are whether Justice Stewart erred in:

1. Failing to reverse the Registrar's finding that 18 creditors of LaserWorks assigned their rights to the appellant;
2. Sustaining the Registrar's finding that Datarite engaged in an improper purpose in acquiring and voting the claims of the 18 creditors;
3. Sustaining the Registrar's finding that the Appellant's purpose in acquiring and voting the claims was relevant; and

4. Concluding that there was an abuse on a minority of a class of unsecured creditors and that a duty in this respect was owed by the appellant.

An appeal lies to this court under s. 193 of the BIA which reads in part:

> 193. Unless otherwise expressly provided, an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from any order or decision of a judge of the court in the following cases:
> (a) if the point at issue involves future rights;

The appellants assert future rights are involved and no leave is necessary. The respondents take no issue with this. Neither is issue taken with the jurisdiction of the Registrar and Justice Stewart to deal with the matters in question pursuant to the BIA. The issue is whether they erred.

The appellant's submission with respect to the standard of review is that:

> . . . the Registrar's discretion will not be disturbed on appeal unless he failed to consider or misconstrued a material fact or violated a principle of law. If the Registrar did not appreciate the nature of the evidence before him, it was open to the Supreme Court to substitute its discretion for that of the Registrar. There is also authority that the Registrar's decision should not be disturbed unless it was clearly wrong: Re Achilles reflex, (1993), 23 C.B.R. (3d) 20 B.S.S.C.).

It cites Industrial Acceptance Corp. v. Lalonde, 1952 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1952] 2 S.C.R. 109 p. 120; Re Gilmartin (a bankrupt), [1989] 2 All E.R. 835 (Ch. D.) p. 838; and Re Barrick (1980), 36 C.B.R. (N.S.) 286 (B.C.C.A.) p. 290. In Industrial Acceptance Estey J., writing for the Supreme Court of Canada, held at page 120 that:

> A judgment rendered in the exercise of a judicial discretion under s. 142 ought not to be disturbed by an appellate court, unless the learned judge, in arriving at his conclusion, has omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact, or violated some principle of law.

The respondent LaserWorks urges that this court should only substitute its own discretion when the Registrar is clearly wrong. Apparent failure by the Registrar to appreciate the nature of the evidence before him is too low a threshold:

Digitized by Google

The court in Re Barrick ((1980), 36 C.B.R. (N.S.) 286 (B.C.C.A.)) substituted its discretion for that of the trial judge only after ruling that he misapplied a legal test. Justice Taggert, at page 290, gives three reasons the Court of Appeal should substitute its discretion for that of the trial judge:

> In these circumstances, it would seem to me that the learned judge has not applied the correct test, has not given the effect that ought to be given to the trustee's report and has not appreciated the nature of the evidence which was before him. In these circumstances, I think we are justified for substituting our discretion for that of the trial judge.

On that basis the respondent submits the first three grounds of appeal fail.

The Trustee under the Proposal submits that "the Appellant has not satisfied the onus upon it in this appeal to overturn the decision of the Honourable Justice Stewart to decline to substitute her discretion for that of the Registrar."

The respondent also referred to the principles stated by McLachlin, J., in Toneguzzo-Norvel (Guardian Ad Litem of) v. Savein and Burnaby Hospital 1994 CanLII 106 (SCC), (1994), 1 S.C.R. 114 at page 121, which this court has followed consistently:

> It is by now well established that a Court of Appeal must not interfere with a trial judge's conclusions on matters of fact unless there is palpable or overriding error. In principle, a Court of Appeal will only intervene if the judge has made a manifest error, has ignored conclusive or relevant evidence, has misunderstood the evidence, or has drawn erroneous conclusions from it: see P. (D.) v. S. (C.), 1993 CanLII 35 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 141, at pp. 188-89 (per L'Heureux-Dube J.), and all cases cited therein, as well as Geffen v. Goodman Estate, 1991 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353, at pp. 388-89 (per Wilson J.), and Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", 1975 CanLII 146 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at pp. 806-8 (per Ritchie J.). A Court of Appeal is clearly not entitled to interfere merely because it takes a different view of the evidence. The finding of facts and the drawing of evidentiary conclusions from facts is the province of the trial judge, not the Court of Appeal.

These principles apply in bankruptcy matters, and provide guidance when, as here, the Registrar's findings have been upheld by a judge of the Supreme Court.

The Registrar's Decision

The Registrar based his decision on the following findings:

> Before turning to deal with these submissions, it is essential that I make some findings of fact. In large part the facts are uncontested. No affidavits were filed, but counsel agree that I may rely on the minutes of the meeting of creditors, the testimony by Mr. Goldberg upon the section 163(2) examination, and the list provided by Mr. Goldberg in compliance with his undertaking on the examination.
> I find that Datarite through its solicitor approached some but not all of the creditors of Laserworks with the intention of obtaining an assignment of those creditors' claims and consequently rights to vote on the proposal. The claims were obtained and the votes utilized to defeat the proposal. This would have the effect under section 57(a) of the BIA of placing LaserWorks into bankruptcy by virtue of a deemed assignment.
> I can only conclude that the purpose of Datarite was to effect the bankruptcy of LaserWorks. It is a reasonable supposition that the purpose was to remove a competitor from the marketplace. I find that it was the intention of Datarite to put LaserWorks in bankruptcy.
> I further find that the motive was to lessen competition.
> In my view, Datarite was engaged throughout in an improper purpose not contemplated by the BIA, the purpose of which is far removed from the use to which Datarite put it.

It is apparent that the Registrar, in speaking of "purpose", included both motive or intent and the steps taken to give effect to that motive or intent. While the record is somewhat sparse, as counsel have remarked, there was evidence in support of these findings. I am not satisfied that the Registrar failed to appreciate the nature of the evidence before him or that he was clearly wrong, or alternatively that he omitted the consideration of or misconstrued some fact, or violated some principle of law. The questions before this court relate to the effect of these findings.

The Registrar disallowed the votes of the eighteen creditors represented by the appellant because he considered they had been cast for an improper purpose. In the absence of authority specific to proposals to creditors, he applied jurisprudence related to bankruptcy petitions, stating:

> It has long been held that the court will not grant a petition in bankruptcy where the petition is filed for an improper purpose: Re E. De La Hooke (1934), 15 C.B.R. 485 (Ont. S.C.); Re Pappy's Good Eats

Limited (1985), 56 C.B.R. (N.S.) 304 (Ont. S.C.); Dimples Diapers Inc. v. Paperboard Industries Corporation reflex, (1992), 15 C.B.R. (3d) 204 (Ont. G.D.); Re Shepard reflex, (1996), 40 C.B.R. (3d) 145 (Man. Q.B.).

In Hooke the petitioner obtained an assignment of a judgment against the debtor for the sole purpose of filing a petition in bankruptcy and of removing the debtor as a business competitor. In that case, as is the situation in this case, there was no evidence that the debtor had any business dealings with the party seeking to place the debtor in bankruptcy. The petition was dismissed.

In Hooke the court made extensive reference to the decision of the House of Lords in King v. Henderson, [1898] A.C. 720. The comments of James, L.J., at p. 732 are particularly germane here:

> After what Lord Justice Cotton has said, in which I entirely agree, people will probably think twice before they buy debts for the purpose of taking bankruptcy proceedings.

Lord Justice Cotton had commented that the proceedings in bankruptcy were not taken to obtain payment of the debt, but rather the debt was purchased for the purpose of taking the proceedings. I would simply add that in tight of the decision I make here persons should certainly think twice before they purchase debts in order to defeat a proposal.

It is my opinion that the eighteen creditors are tainted with the improper motive of Datarite. In Pappy's Good Eats the petition was filed by a creditor with a genuine claim. The creditor entered into an agreement with three franchisees of the debtor. This agreement provided that the creditor would prosecute the bankruptcy proceedings while the franchisees financed the proceeding in exchange for a share of the dividends. The motive of the franchisees was to bring about a bankruptcy so as to terminate the franchise agreements between them and the debtor.

The court found that there had been an improper use of the bankruptcy legislation. The effect of the agreement was to embroil the creditor in the improper objectives of the franchisees who were intermeddling in the proceeding. This tainted the whole proceeding. Clearly where the object of the intermeddling party is to bring about the bankruptcy of the debtor an improper purpose is present. The court will act to prevent such an abuse of the legislation.

The other cases I have referred to, Dimples Diapers Inc. and Shepard also deal with bankruptcy petitions instigated for an improper collateral purpose. In Dimples that purpose was to recover a trademark and a business opportunity. In Shepard that purpose was to obtain control of certain shares.

While this case does not involve a bankruptcy petition, it does involve the placing of Laserworks into bankruptcy. In my view, it would be wrong to allow Datarite to do in the proposal process what it cannot do by petition. Datarite's intention was to place Laserworks in bankruptcy. The motive was to remove a competitor. That motive reveals an improper purpose. The court will not allow to be done by the back door what cannot be done by the front.

By entering into this arrangement with the numbered company the eighteen creditors have tainted themselves and become embroiled in the improper purpose of Datarite. Their votes cannot stand. If Laserworks has the right to be free of this type of interference the Court must be able to fashion a remedy. This court does have the inherent jurisdiction to supervise the bankruptcy process and consequently the conduct of creditors where that conduct constitutes an abuse of the provisions of the BIA. While creditors can certainly vote in their own best interest, they may not collude with a third party to place a debtor in bankruptcy for an improper purpose. Such activity lacks commercial morality and offends the integrity of the bankruptcy process.

While Datarite was not permitted to vote the claims it had acquired, they remained debts of the insolvent debtor.

Justice Stewart

The first ground of appeal to this court, the issue of whether the claims of 18 creditors were actually assigned to Datarite, does not appear to have been a ground of appeal before Justice Stewart.

On the next two grounds of appeal, whether the Registrar failed to appreciate the evidence before him in concluding that Datarite's purpose in acquiring and voting the 18 claims was an improper one, and whether such purpose was a relevant consideration, Justice Stewart, in upholding the Registrar, took a different route to arrive at the same conclusion. She stated:

> Although stated in the context of voting by debenture holders when the majority had votes to modify the rights of the debenture holders in a clause, the statements of principle by Viscount Haldane of the Judicial

Committee of the Privy Council in British America Nickel Corporation v. M. J. O'Brien, [1927] A.C. 369 at p. 371 are, no less, here applicable:

> To give a power to modify the terms on which debentures in a company are secured is not uncommon in practice. The business interests of the company may render such a power expedient, even in the interests of the class of debenture holders as a whole. The provision is usually made in the form of a power, conferred by the instrument constituting the debenture security, upon the majority of the class of holders. It often enables them to modify, by resolution properly passed, the security itself. The provision of such a power to a majority bears some analogy to such a power as that conferred by s. 13 of the English Companies Act of 1908, which enables a majority of the shareholders by special resolution to alter the articles of association. There is, however, a restriction of such powers, when conferred on a majority of a special class in order to enable that majority to bind a minority. They must be exercised subject to a general principle, which is applicable to all authorities conferred on majorities of classes enabling them to bind minorities, namely, that the power given must be exercised for the purpose of benefitting the class as a whole, and not merely individual members only.

And later at p. 373, noting this to be a principle which does not depend on misappropriation or fraud, stated:

> . . . but their Lordships do not think that there is any real difficulty in combining the principle that while usually a holder of shares or debentures may vote as his interest directs, he is subject to the further principle that where his vote is conferred on him as a member of a class he must conform to the interest of the class itself when seeking to exercise the power conferred on him in his capacity of being a member.

The court, applying the principle stated by Viscount Haldane, should not sanction a scheme if it appears that the majority have not voted bona fide in the interests of the class as a whole.

Justice Quilliam in an unreported decision of the High Court of New Zealand, Re: Farmers' Co-Operative Organization Society of New Zealand Limited (M 12/97, 4 August 1987) in addressing the very issue of a company whose proposal had been defeated by the votes cast by some of its direct competitors, in circumstances where the majority had the right to bind the minority by statute relied on the principle enunciated in British American Nickel Corp. Inc. v. O'Brien, supra, during the objection to votes application before him. He concluded the votes should be discounted as their votes were cast out of self-interest and not in the interest of the class of creditors as a whole, or of the company. Unlike the present case, he did not determine there was specific activity of an improper purpose other than recognizing the votes were cast by creditors in direct commercial competition with the company.

The Registrar, on his finding of facts, was not faced with a preexisting creditor voting as it wished for whatever reason. He was faced with a unique set of circumstances where he found the appellant shelf company and Datarite, a competitor of Laserworks, involved a selective, secret arrangement with creditors against Laserworks, an arrangement that would hurt some creditors and favour other creditors, although as competitors rather than as creditors, given its purpose of removing Laserworks from the market place and diverting from it, its asset, the market share, so it could be available to Datarite, all of which would result in the balance of the creditors receiving little, if anything, and Laserworks having been deemed a bankrupt.

Justice Stewart found that Datarite was not entitled to use its votes for motives unrelated to the best interest of the creditor group and only pursuant to its own self interest in removing a potential competitor from the market place without regard to the interests of the other members of its class, the other voting creditors. She concluded:

> The Appellant is not entitled to use its votes to achieve this improper purpose. The Registrar's decision prevents an abuse on a minority of the class of unsecured creditors and in so doing upholds a fundamental and viable in the circumstances principle of class voting. He did not err in concluding improper purpose is relevant.

On the fourth ground she found that while there had been no collusion by the eighteen creditors sufficient to deprive them of the right to vote, the Registrar was justified in determining that in the circumstances Datarite controlled the way the claims were voted. She upheld the Registrar's decision and declined to interfere with it.

Assignment--The First Ground

The appellant submits that the judge erred when she declined to address and reverse the Registrar's finding that 18 unsecured creditors of LaserWorks assigned their rights to the appellant. On a proper appreciation of the evidence, it submits, no assignment took place. It states in its factum:

> The appellant did not take issue with the Registrar's finding that four of the 18 creditors received payment for them prior to the vote .... Each of the four creditors provided executed assignments and proxies to Mr. Goldberg, and each assignment was completed by payment. The 14 remaining creditors did not receive payment for their claims prior to the vote, and the appellant submits that the teamed Registrar failed to appreciate the evidence in this regard when he concluded that the claims of these 14 creditors had been assigned to the appellant before the vote was taken.

LaserWorks submits that the Registrar did not decide whether or not the claims voted by Datarite were assigned:

> The conclusion of the Registrar with respect to the assignment issue is:
> > Given my findings with respect to the intent and motive of Datarite, I find it unnecessary to consider whether Datarite should have exercised 1 vote or 18.
> The reference to 1 vote or 18 relates to the assignment of claims. If the 18 claims had been assigned to the Appellant, the authorities establish that only one vote could be cast on the proposal. The Registrar found it "unnecessary to consider" this issue. We submit that the Registrar would need to consider the issue before making a decision.

It seems reasonable that the Registrar did not intend to decide whether the claims were assigned because it would not determine the question before him. Even if the appellant were restricted to voting as one creditor, leaving a majority of creditors in favor of the proposal, the value of the claims voted by the appellant was sufficient to defeat the proposal and thus achieve the appellant's objective.

If the claims had been assigned to the appellant, the voting rights would have been merged and the appellant could only cast one vote for the value of the claims it had acquired. If the creditors retained their own claims, the appellant could have voted once for each creditor for whom it held a proxy. There is authority for this proposition and the parties seem in agreement with it. The rationale is clear. Each creditor has a vote, to be exercised in person or by proxy. If the claim is assigned, the assignor ceases to be a creditor. It loses its right to vote in person or to control the vote of the proxy. The assignor becomes a creditor and is able to vote its claim, no matter the amount of the claim. If it acquires the claims of other creditors the amount of its claim increases, but it does not pluralize itself. It remains one creditor, entitled to one vote.

The appellant referred to Toia v. Cie de Cautionnement Alta Inc. (1989), 77 C.B.R. (ICS.) 264 (Que. S.C.). The respondent insurance company paid out 19 claims against a bankrupt under a performance bond; each claimant signed a release and subrogated its claims to the respondent, which filed 19 proofs of claim. The Official Receiver permitted 19 votes but the Quebec Supreme Court reversed this, allowing only one vote. The appellant purports to distinguish Toia because "there the respondent completed the assignments by payment prior to the vote."

In my view it is of small importance whether the appellant bought for cash or on credit. The situation seems clear when creditors authorize votes on their behalf by proxy: each creditor is entitled to its vote and the proxy may cast votes for several creditors. It is equally clear when a creditor assigns its claim to another creditor: the assignee creditor has only one vote. This was the case with the four creditors whose assigned claims were accepted and paid for by the appellant. It is less clear with respect to the remaining fourteen creditors who had executed assignments to the appellant. The appellant says they had not yet been accepted, pending proof of the claims. However they had to be proven before they could be voted, and their values were proved for the purpose of calculating their percentage of the total of the unsecured claims. Any condition on the assignment would appear to have been met.

The intention of the parties must be determined: did the appellant vote those claims on its own behalf, or as an agent exercising the rights of the original creditors by proxy? If it had been necessary for the Registrar to decide this question, there was evidence before him that the original creditors had given control over their claims to the appellant by entering into enforceable contracts to assign them. That is, while the appellant voted the claim in the form of proxies, in fact it had acquired sufficient interest in the claims to vote them in its own right, as assignee, as though the assignments had been fully executed. It is clearly an improper practice for an assignee to purport to vote as the proxy of a creditor which has assigned its claim, thereby ceasing to be a creditor. If Datarite was otherwise entitled to vote at the creditor's meeting, it had one vote for the full value of the claims it had acquired. It was not justified in voting by proxy.

I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

Evidence of Datarite's purpose--the second ground

Mr. Goldberg testified as follows to Datarite's purpose in buying claims and voting against the proposal:

Digitized by Google

> Q. Can you tell me the benefit the numbered company will get in the bankruptcy of LaserWorks?
> A. Well, the purpose of the numbered company hopefully in buying the claims is that it'll buy the claims at a reduced price and get full payment one day.

The appellant states that Mr. Goldberg's evidence was uncontradicted, and submits:

> It is respectfully submitted that the Registrar was clearly wrong in his appreciation of the evidence. The learned Judge concluded that the Registrar made a finding of credibility with respect to Victor Goldberg's evidence on this issue. However, the Registrar's decision does not indicate that Mr. Goldberg's evidence on this key issue was even considered. The Registrar simply failed to address Mr. Goldberg's evidence on this issue at all. It is therefore open to this Honourable Court to substitute its discretion for that of the Registrar. It is submitted that the Registrar could only find an improper purpose on the record by overlooking the only piece of direct evidence before him on Datarite's intentions.

Mr. Goldberg was obviously only stating his client's ostensible intentions, not its true ones. The Registrar in fact had commented on Mr. Goldberg's evidence after quoting a passage from the minutes indicating how he had responded to certain questions. He said:

> It is not unfair to say that Mr. Goldberg was obtuse to a very great degree. While this does not necessarily confirm suspicion as to the motives of his client, it does explain the concern expressed by the principals of LaserWorks.

The evidence before the Registrar included the proposal itself, which shows total liabilities of $585,459 of which $247,651 was unsecured, $334, 838 secured and $2,970 preferred. Assets totaled $306,158 including book debts of $170,000, leased vehicles $ 95,958, stock in trade $18,500, cash in the bank (which was the principal secured creditor) $8,000 plus fixtures, furnishings and equipment. Virtually all of the assets would be subject to security. The overall deficiency is shown as $279,301. It is difficult to see a basis for Mr. Goldberg's client's optimism that it might get full payment for the claims it bought at reduced value, or indeed, to see any significant source of dividends for unsecured creditors, on a bankruptcy.

Datarite had not been a creditor of LaserWorks before the proposal. There was evidence, however, that it had been a competitor. The Registrar was entitled to consider the evidence as a whole in making findings of fact and drawing inferences that led him to the conclusion that:

> ... Datarite's intention was to place Laserworks in bankruptcy. The motive was to remove a competitor. That motive reveals an improper purpose...

In my view the Registrar did not fail to appreciate the evidence nor otherwise err in arriving at this conclusion. Neither did Justice Stewart err in upholding him. I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

Is Purpose Relevant? The Third Ground.

(i) The Statute

The appellant submits that the trial judge erred in upholding the Registrar's decision that Datarite engaged in an improper purpose in acquiring and voting the claims of the 18 creditors, and that its purpose was relevant. In view of the conclusion on the second ground that the Registrar did not err in finding improper purpose, the appellant is left with the relevancy argument. It argues that the authority relied on by the Registrar, De La Hooke, Pappy's Good Eats, Dimples Diapers and Shepard, arises under s. 43(7) of the BIA which deals only with bankruptcy petitions:

> 43(7) Where the court is not satisfied with the proof of the facts alleged in the petition or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, it shall dismiss the petition. (emphasis added.)

It cites the discussion of the discretion thus created in Houlden & Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3d) at p. 2-50:

> Section 43(7) permits the court to dismiss a petition if it concludes "that for any other sufficient cause no order ought to be made". Section 43(7) confers a discretion; the exercise of that discretion must be founded on sound judicial reasoning based on credible evidence and must be exercised judicially according to common sense and justice in a manner which does not occasion a miscarriage of justice.

Section 43(7) clearly does not create the supervisory jurisdiction of the court over the bankruptcy regime; it is simply a concrete application of a discretionary power inherent in the scheme of the BIA. Each step in the bankruptcy process, whether initiated by a creditor's petition for a receiving order or a debtor's assignment for the benefit of creditors, is supervised by court officials or the court itself. For example s. 108 in Part V, the Administration of Estates, relates to "any meeting of creditors". At the meeting which gave rise to this appeal the chairman applied s. 108(3):

Digitized by Google

> 108(3) Where the chairman is in doubt as to whether a proof of claim should be admitted or rejected, he shall mark the proof as objected to and allow the creditor to vote subject to the vote being declared invalid in the event of the objection being sustained.

Section 187(9) provides a broad directive:

> 187(9) No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

The short answer to the question raised by this ground of appeal is that motive or purpose is relevant to a court authorized to remedy substantial injustice.

The appellant takes the narrow position that proposals are outside the discretionary supervisory jurisdiction of the court because they are not specifically included in s. 43(7) or some equivalent provision. This submission cannot be sustained.

There is a similarity between a creditor's petition for a receiving order under s. 43 and refusal of a proposal. In either case it is something done by a creditor or creditors that places the debtor in bankruptcy, likely against its will. But a proposal is also similar to an assignment: the debtor has itself resorted to protection under the BIA and its proposal will be deemed to be an assignment unless it succeeds in persuading its creditors to accept it in their own best interests.

The appellant submits that s. 54 is the provision in the proposals Part of the BIA which corresponds with s. 43(7). S. 54 provides:

> 54(1) The creditors may, in accordance with this section, resolve to accept or may refuse the proposal as made or as altered at the meeting or any adjournment thereof.

While s. 43(7) provides an occasion for the exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction, an examination focused on the merits of the petition itself, s. 54(1) does not. Such an examination of a proposal is not necessary at that stage. The validity of the claims voted at the creditor's meeting at which the proposal is accepted or refused is subject to the court's scrutiny under s. 108(3). If the proposal is refused by a regular vote of creditors it vanishes and further examination is unnecessary; the debtor is deemed under s. 57(a) to have made an assignment in bankruptcy and the matter proceeds as on an actual assignment. If the creditors approve the proposal, it is then examined on its merits under s. 59, which provides:

> 59. (1) The court shall, before approving the proposal, hear a report of the trustee in the prescribed form respecting the terms thereof and the conduct of the debtor, and, in addition, shall hear the trustee, the debtor, any opposing, objecting or dissenting creditor and such further evidence as the court may require.
> (2) Where the court is of the opinion that the terms of the proposal are not reasonable or are not calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, the court shall refuse to approve the proposal, and the court may refuse to approve the proposal whenever it is established that the debtor has committed any one of the offences mentioned in sections 198 to 200.

Proposals are therefore just as much a part of the bankruptcy regime, and just as subject to the supervision of the court exercising an equitable jurisdiction under the statute, as petitions and assignments. In Whiteman v. UDC Finance Ltd., [1992] 3 NZLR 684, Hardie Boys J., writing for the New Zealand Court of Appeal with respect to the New Zealand Insolvency Act, which varies in detail but not in principle from our own, said at p. 691 that proposals are merely

> . . . the other side of the coin to a petition for adjudication.

The only distinction between petitions and proposals in the exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction is that under the scheme of the BIA occasions for judicial scrutiny occur at different stages of the process. In the present appeal, court intervention was occasioned by objections to proofs of claims affecting the right to vote at the creditors' meeting considering the proposal. The correct procedure was followed, and the objections were considered by the Registrar who had jurisdiction under s.187(9) to remedy substantial injustice.

Motive or purpose is not relevant to objections to proofs of claim based on statutory exceptions under the BIA. These are established in several sections, including s.109(1), persons who had not duly proved and lodged a claim; s.54(3), a relative of the debtor (who may vote against but not for a proposal); 109(4), the debtor as proxy for a creditor; s.109(6), a creditor who did not deal with the debtor at arm's length (with exceptions); s.110(1), a person with a claim acquired after the bankruptcy unless the entire claim is acquired; s.111, a creditor with a claim on or secured by a current bill of exchange (subject to conditions); s.112, a creditor holding security (subject to conditions); and s. 113(2), a trustee as proxy (subject to restrictions). See also s. 109, the trustee as creditor.

(It will be noted that many of these exceptions arise from circumstances that could give rise to conflict of interest. This will be considered further under the fourth ground of appeal.)

However the statutory exceptions are not a code exhausting the forms in which substantial injustice may manifest itself. Objections will be sustained under s. 108(3) if they result from a crime or a tort against the debtor or a crteditor. In the present appeal, and in the authorities cited by the Registrar, the substantial injustice assumes the guise of tortious behavior, to which motive is relevant. In the s. 108(3) context the commonest torts, or instances of substantial injustice arising from tortious behavior, relate to abuse of process and fraud. However conspiracy to harm was also found in Dimples Diapers.

Tortious or tort-tike behavior falling short of a fully developed tort susceptible of formal proof or definition can nevertheless result in substantial injustice, particularly for persons at a point so vulnerable they must resort to insolvency protection. (See Shepard.) In my view that is why Parliament chose the language it did in s.187(9): to create a discretionary jurisdiction in courts that is not fettered, for example, by the high standards required for establishing such torts as abuse of process in other contexts. What remains to be considered is the threshold level of the substantial injustice which will result in remedial action by the court.

(ii)The Authorities

The four cases cited by the Registrar establish that the threshold is crossed when the BIA is used for an improper purpose. An improper purpose is any purpose collateral to the purpose for which the bankruptcy and insolvency legislation was enacted by Parliament.

Farley J. held in Dimples Diapers that:

> . . . the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 has as its purpose the provision of "the orderly and fair distribution of the property of a bankrupt among its creditors on a pari passu basis". (L.W.Houlden and C.H.Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law of Canada, 3rd ed. (looseleaf) (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at p. 1-3 [A&4]....

In the cases cited the improper purpose takes the form of abuse of process or tortious behavior closely analogous to abuse of process. In each case the court reacted to what could be seen as substantial injustice. The remedy of choice arising under s. 43(7) is refusal of the petition. The appropriate remedy in the present case is rejection of the tainted votes.

In a vigorous judgment in Dimples Diapers Farley J. dismissed the bankruptcy petition because it was brought for an improper purpose, to recover the diaper trademark and business opportunity, and awarded damages for abuse of process and conspiracy against three creditors. He held at p. 219:

> ...The tort of abuse of process consists in the misuse of a legal process for any purpose other than that which it was designed to serve. It is immaterial in establishing abuse of process that the process was properly commenced or founded by the defendants and it does not matter that the process be concluded in the instigator's favour. The improper purpose is the gravamen of liability. See Unterreiner v. Wilson reflex, (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 197, 24 C.C.L.T. 54, 142 D.L.R. (3d) 588 (H.C.), at p. 203 [O.R.], appeal dismissed reflex, (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 472, 146 D.L.R. (3d) 322 (C.A.), and J.G.Fleming, The Law of Torts, 7th ed. (Sydney: Law Book, 1987) at pp. 591-592.
> Potts J. In R. v. Cholkan & Co. v. Brinker reflex, (1990), 71 O.R. (2d) 381, 1 C.C.L.T. (2d) 291, 40 C.P.C. (2d) 6 (H.C). at p. 8 [C.P.C.] said:
> > Most recently, Montgomery J. writing for the divisional Court in Bentham v. Rothbart reflex, (1989), 36 O.A.C. 13 (Div. Ct.), stated:
> > The constituent elements of the tort of abuse of process are: (a) a collateral improper purpose such as extortion; and (b) a definitive act or threat in furtherance or a purpose not legitimate in the use of the process.

Montgomery J. was clearly using "extortion" as an example only. Any crime or tort would be an improper purpose.

In de la Hooke the petition was dismissed when petitioning creditors, who had had no business dealings with the debtor, obtained an assignment of a judgment debt he owed for the sole purpose of filing a petition in bankruptcy to remove him as a business competitor who was using a similar trade name. Registrar Cook cited a number of leading English cases relevant to the circumstances of the present appeal. These included King v. Henderson, [1898] A.C. 720 at p. 731 which considered abuse of process or fraud on the court; Ex Partre Griffin; in re Adams (1879), 12 Ch. Div. 480 in which a worthless debt was purchased to take proceedings in bankruptcy to force the debtor to give up a just debt, causing Brett L.J. to remark, "a viler fraud I have never heard of"; Ex parte Harper; In re Pooley (1882), 20 Ch. D. 585 at p. 692 in which buying a debt to force a bankruptcy in order to get rid of a trustee was found "a gross abuse of the bankruptcy laws;" and In re a Debtor [1928] 1 Ch. 199 at p. 211 in which the bankruptcy laws were used for the collateral purpose of extortion.

In Pappy's Good Eats a petition was denied when three franchisees of the debtor, who were not creditors, contracted with the petitioning landlord , who had a $65,000 unsatisfied judgment against the debtor, to pay the landlord's costs to petition the debtor into bankruptcy so they would be relieved of obligations under their franchise agreements. Henry J. held the effect of the agreement was to "embroil the petitioning creditor in the improper objective of the purchasers who as non-creditors have no status in these proceedings and are intermeddling in it. The whole proceeding is inescapably tainted; the petition must be dismissed." He found that "the abuse occurred when the parties agreed or arranged improperly to use the facility of the Act to advance the objectives of the franchisees to cause injury to the debtor."
In Shepard it was found that the purpose of the petitioner was to gain control over certain shares of the debtor, an important business advantage. "It is not appropriate or indeed, correct in law, to have the courts facilitate such an objective when the objective is very clearly the main purpose of the application." This finding is consistent with a finding of substantial injustice resulting from abuse of process.

(iii) The Present Case

It is most significant that the appellant was not a creditor of LaserWorks prior to the proposal. Intermeddling by strangers to the pre-existing debtor creditor relationship for an improper purpose was a determinative factor in Pappy's Good Eats. The practice of buying dubious claims against an insolvent for purposes foreign to the bankruptcy process was denounced in the English cases cited in de la Hooke. The Registrar in the present case understandably looked askance at it. Few legitimate reasons come to mind for buying into a bankrupt estate. When somebody does so, it is a matter of common sense to assume, subject to correction, they intend to use the bankruptcy process for some purpose it was not meant for. In the present case it was readily apparent that mischief was afoot.

The "orderly and fair distribution of the property of a bankrupt among its creditors on a pari passu basis" was not the purpose behind the acts of the appellant. The appellant made separate approaches to each of the eighteen creditors whose claims it succeeded in acquiring. It negotiated a separate deal with each for varying considerations presumably seen to be more advantageous to the creditor than reliance on the proposal. From most of them it obtained an agreement, an executed assignment and a proxy. It purported to vote the proxies of former creditors whose claims had been assigned to it. Its purpose was not an orderly recovery of debts from the debtors assets but to limit competition by the debtor in its own marketplace by rejecting the debtor's proposal and forcing it into bankruptcy.
The appellant was acting on its own making sharp use of the provisions of the BIA for its own advantage. There was no evidence that the co-operating creditors were part of a conspiracy with the appellant to injure the debtor. Otherwise the tort of conspiracy to injure could be found where the predominant purpose of the appellant's conduct is to cause injury to the plaintiff, whether the means used by the defendants are lawful or unlawful: Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd, v. British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 S.C.C. 452.
It is undeniable that the appellant caused injury to the debtor not negligently but deliberately. The debtor made its proposal to avoid bankruptcy; bankruptcy therefore must have been seen by Laserworks as a more injurious alternative than acceptance of the proposal by the creditors. Laserworks had the heavy burden of persuading its creditors that their best interests lay in approving the proposal; it did not have the impossible burden of dissuading a financially stronger competitor bent on using the provisions of the BIA to destroy it as a competitor. The appellant derailed the proposal procedure to force the debtor into bankruptcy. Using bankruptcy to cause injury, thereby eliminating the debtor as an entity capable of competing in the marketplace, is abusive of the purpose of the BIA. It does not qualify as "the orderly and fair distribution of (its) property." Annihilation of an individual business or a company may be an unfortunate consequence of a bankruptcy, an unavoidable side-effect, but it is not the purpose of the BIA. Use of the Act to accomplish such an objective is in my view so abusive of the purpose of the legislation as to engage the supervisory jurisdiction of the courts under s. 187(9). It is a substantial injustice to be remedied.
No distinction in principle is possible between the present case and the four cited by the Registrar. He identified the problem and he applied the remedy. He was upheld on appeal in the Supreme Court. I would dismiss this ground of appeal.

Class voting--The Fourth Ground

In upholding the Registrar Justice Stewart added a string to his bow by introducing the class voting analysis of Viscount Haldane in British American Nickel. In light of the holdings respecting the second and third grounds of appeal, it is not necessary to the outcome to decide this ground.
The appellant submits that the trial judge was wrong in concluding there was an abuse on a minority of a class of unsecured creditors and that a duty in this respect was owed by the appellant:

> . . . There was no abuse on a minority of the unsecured creditors and no duty was imposed on the Appellant to cause votes to be cast in the best interest of the class. Without such a duty the learned

Digitized by Google

> Judge was without authority to consider Datarite's motives and the votes in question should have been allowed.

In British America Nickel Viscount Haldane stated that where a power is conferred on a special class, a majority in exercising a power to modify the rights of a minority must exercise that power in the interests of the class as a whole.

> . . . But their Lordships do not think that there is any real difficulty in combining the principle that while usually a holder of shares or debentures may vote as his interest directs, he is subject to the further principle that where his vote is conferred on him as a member of a class he must conform to the interest of the class itself when seeking to exercise the power conferred on him in his capacity of being a member...

In the present case the minority creditors saw their alternative of furthering their best interests by voting in favour of the proposal disappear when the votes amassed by the appellant were exercised, not in the interest of making the most favourable recovery from a combination of a distribution of the assets of LaserWorks and its continuance in business as a customer or potential customer, but in the interests of removing a competitor of Datarite. Justice Stewart was concerned that the other creditors, as well as the debtor, suffered from the abusive use of the provisions of the BIA. Of the sixteen creditors who did not assign their claims to Datarite, fourteen voted in favour of the proposal.

The rationale for Viscount Haldane's conclusion in British America Nickel was carefully reviewed by Hardie Boys J. in Whiteman v. UDC Finance Ltd. The court found it should not intervene in the refusal of a proposal by creditors including several who were being sued by the debtor, and who therefore had a collateral interest in seeing him out of business.

Hardie Boys J. cited the same passage quoted above by Justice Stewart from Vicount Haldane's judgment. It concludes that there is a restriction on powers conferred on a majority of a special class in order to enable that majority to bind a minority:

> ...They must be exercised subject to a general principle, which is applicable to all authorities conferred on majorities of classes enabling them to bind minorities; namely, that the power given must be exercised for the purpose of benefiting the class as a whole, and not merely individual members only.

Hardie Boys J. considered Re Farmers' Co-operative, which was also cited by Justice Stewart, in which votes of several creditors who were competitors of the debtor were disallowed .

> ...In a later development of the same matter, but not now involving the Court's sanction under s. 205, Gallen J. accepted that the Court has an overriding control, not limited to the approval stage under s. 205, and may restrict a right to vote where the equities of a particular situation require it: see [1992] 1 NZLR 348. It is unnecessary for present purposes to decide whether these cases were correctly decided, for even if they were, the principle is not of unlimited application, and does not apply to the exercise of voting rights generally. This is clear from what Viscount Haldane said in the British America Nickel case.
> Immediately after the passage already quoted, his Lordship said
> > Subject to this, the power may be unrestricted. It may be free from the general principle in question when the power arises not in connection with a class, but only under a general title which confers the vote as a right of property attaching to a share.
> Thus in Pender v. Lushington (1877) 6 Ch. D. 70, 75-76 Jessel MR said there is:
> > . . . no obligation on a shareholder of a company to give his vote merely with a view to what other persons may consider the interests of the company at large. He has a right, if he thinks fit, to give his vote from motives or promptings of what he considers his own individual interest.
> While the voting rights conferred by Part XV of the Insolvency Act are not akin to a "right of property attaching to a share", they are rights conferred without reservation. There is no requirement for class voting; there is instead a general right conferred equally on all creditors. The rationale of the principle does not apply. It is well settled that the motive (short of fraud) of a petitioning creditor, no matter how reprehensible, is irrelevant to his right to obtain an order of adjudication: King v. Henderson [1898] AC 720, Re King, ex parte Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd. (No. 2) [1920] VLR 490. The motive of a creditor voting on a proposal, really the other side of the coin to a petition for adjudication, can be no different. That is not to say that there may be no remedy in an extreme case, such as fraud or mistake. But certainly where, as here, there are perfectly legitimate reasons for opposing the proposal, a creditor is not to be denied that right because he may have some other motive as well...

If the exception made for fraud is broadened to "substantial injustice" I would take Hardie Boys J.'s conclusions to be a fair statement of the law in Canada as well, as applied by Canadian courts in the cases cited by the Registrar. The New Zealand court included mistake as well as fraud as an exception. A creditor is not to be deprived of the right to vote for wrongful motives alone; motive must be coupled with a tortious act to support a finding of improper purpose.

A Canadian case supporting a broad interpretation of the right of creditors to vote on proposals is Re Bedard Louis Inc. 1991 CanLII 3533 (QC CA), (1991) 22 C.B.R. (3d) 218. The debtor sued three creditors who had sought to seize his goods before judgment for amounts far exceeding their claims against him. One creditor petitioned for a receiving order, and the Quebec Superior Court rejected the debtor's argument that the petitioner was not a creditor because of the large undecided actions. The debtor was declared bankrupt and later filed a proposal. The trustee refused to let the three creditors vote at a creditors' meeting considering the proposal because of a possible conflict of interest. The Superior Court allowed an appeal against the trustee's decision, and the Quebec Court of Appeal upheld the Superior Court, holding (headnote) that:

> No provision of the Act authorizes the trustee to exclude a creditor whom he considers to have a conflict of interest. The debtor's action for damages against the creditors, which constituted a debt not yet payable, did not strip the creditors of their status of ordinary creditors. By the proposal, the debtor presented the creditors with terms of payment which were different from those provided legally by contract.
> The Act was intended to allow the voting of all duly acknowledged creditors. Exceptions to that rule were properly specified in the Act and none of them pertained to a creditor against whom a debtor had filed legal proceedings.

The Proposals Part of the BIA recognizes only two classes of creditors, secured creditors who are presumably protected by the security they hold, and unsecured creditors, all the others. This does not appear to meet Viscount Haldane's criterion of a special class bound to exercise its voting rights for the benefit of the class as a whole. That concept seems surplus to and difficult to reconcile with the scheme of the BIA where, as the Quebec Court of Appeal found in Bedard, all duly acknowledged creditors are entitled to vote as they please, subject to exceptions set out in the Act (and the exception for tortious or criminal behavior.)

As remarked above, those exceptions reflect the manner in which Parliament dealt with conflicts of interest which might arise in the context of voting on proposals. Parliament has obviously legislated on the subject and cannot be assumed to have created by implication an exception for general, unspecified, conflicts of interest. The mere fact that a creditor is also a competitor of the debtor or otherwise in a conflict of interest with the debtor does not give rise to a statutory exception. The scheme for protecting minority creditors adopted under the BIA was not a class voting concept but rather a system of specific exceptions coupled with a discretionary power in the courts to remedy substantial injustice.

It is not necessary to make a final determination on this point. The rational of Justice Stewart's decision is found in her adoption of the Registrar's conclusions as to improper purpose in the following passage:

> The applicant is not entitled to use its votes to achieve this improper purpose. The Registrar's decision prevents an abuse on a minority of the class of unsecured creditors and in so doing upholds a fundamental and viable in the circumstances principle of class voting. He did not err in concluding improper purpose is relevant.

That is, while the Registrar's decision was consistent with considerations of class voting, he was upheld on his findings of improper purpose.

I would dismiss the fourth ground of appeal.

Conclusion

The appellant attempted to abuse the provisions of the BIA by using them to intermeddle for an improper purpose with the proposal of a debtor to its creditors, giving rise to a substantial injustice. This affected not only the debtor but the remaining creditors who supported the proposal. The Registrar made no error in discerning this from the evidence and in exercising the court's discretionary jurisdiction to remedy substantial injustice. He was upheld on appeal to the Supreme Court. The appellant's actions are not to be condoned. I would dismiss the appeal with costs which I would fix costs at $3,000 plus disbursements to the Respondent and $3,000 plus disbursements to the Trustee.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE
MADAM JUSTICE CONRAD

[1] After a spectacular run in the market, the shares of Bre-X Minerals Ltd. ("Bre-X") took an equally dramatic fall, resulting in bankruptcy. The Trustee in Bankruptcy for Bre-X (the "Trustee") appealed an order refusing to declare that the Trustee has the authority and power to waive solicitor-client privilege on behalf of Bre-X.

Issues and Conclusions

[2] Principally, the issues in this appeal are:

1. Does a trustee have the right to documents protected by solicitor-client privilege and does it have the power to waive solicitor-client privilege for a bankrupt?
2. If not, is this an occasion which justifies an exception to the privilege?

[3] Solicitor-client privilege is the privilege of the bankrupt. It is a personal right and a protection which must be zealously protected. The privilege does not vest in a trustee upon bankruptcy, nor does the trustee have the authority to waive this privilege. Once privilege attaches to a document it need not be produced unless a governing statute says that it is subject to production whether or not privilege applies. While solicitor-client privilege is not an absolute right and exceptions apply, the Trustee in the within action has failed to demonstrate any basis for a court-sanctioned exception to the privilege. I would dismiss the appeal.

Background

[4] Bre-X made an assignment in bankruptcy on November 7, 1997. Prior to the assignment, Bennett Jones Verchere ("BJV") acted as corporate and securities counsel to Bre-X providing advice and information to Bre-X, its officers and directors. Bre-X remains a subsisting corporate entity but, at present, has no directors or officers. BJV has not acted for Bre-X since May of 1997.

[5] In August of 1998, the Trustee filed a notice of motion seeking a declaration that it had the power and authority to waive the solicitor-client privilege of Bre-X. The notice of motion references affidavit materials as well as ss. 34, 67(1), 71(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA" and the rules thereunder. Specifically, the Trustee sought a declaration that would confirm its power and authority to waive "any applicable solicitor-client privilege of Bre-X with respect to advice, information, opinions given to Bre-X by Bennett Jones Verchere ..." BJV has conceded that its documents, records, files and solicitors are producible in respect of Bre-X's affairs and property, but it submits that professional advice, opinions and assistance provided to Bre-X are privileged and not compellable. For the purposes of the application, the parties agreed that the advice and information at issue constitute privileged communications between solicitor and client.

[6] The Trustee argues, inter alia, that the information subject to solicitor-client privilege is critical to the proper administration of the bankrupt's estate. During argument, counsel conceded that a trustee may not automatically have the right to waive privilege. The Trustee, however, argues that in this case, a court sanctioned exception should be allowed because the information is critical to the administration of the bankrupt's estate and because Bre-X no longer has any officers or directors who could direct such a waiver and demand production.

[7] The evidence in support of the application is minimal, and consists of the following allegations set out in the supporting affidavit of R. Ross Nelson, licensed Trustee:

> 7. In the course of its administration of the bankruptcy estate of Bre-X, and for use in the attempted realization by the Trustee of assets of Bre-X and to potentially realize upon claims against other parties, the Trustee is desirous of obtaining and using some information that may have been provided by Bennett Jones Verchere to Bre-X.
> 8. The Trustee views the receipt of such information as being a very important element to the administration of the Estate and to the realization of Bre-X property and to claims made against other parties.
> 9. Bennett Jones Verchere have taken the position that such information is the subject of Bre-X solicitor-client privilege with Bennett Jones Verchere, and that Bennett Jones Verchere cannot divulge that information without a waiver and consent by Bre-X or some authorized party on behalf of Bre-X.
> 10. Although Bre-X exists as a corporate entity, it has no officers or directors, and has no one to make corporate decisions for Bre-X, and has no one to exercise a will or directing mind on behalf of Bre-X.
> 11. In the current circumstances, it appears that if the Trustee is unable to waive such privilege on behalf of Bre-X, and if there is no other person who has the ability to waive such privilege on behalf of Bre-X, then in that case the Trustee's ability to administer the bankrupt estate, and the Trustee's ability to put forward its best case to realize upon property of Bre-X and/or prosecute claims against third parties, will be severely prejudiced, if not entirely negated.

Digitized by Google

12. If the Trustee has the ability and authority to waive solicitor-client privilege on behalf of Bre-X, the Trustee would propose to assess the merits of waiving that privilege and make a decision accordingly.

[8] The application is a very general one. The affidavit evidence does not specify any particular information which the Trustee expects to obtain from BJV, nor does it identify any specific action or potential actions which turn on the information sought. As well, the evidence does not demonstrate how any interest (neither the creditors' nor Bre-X's) may be affected by the disclosure or non-disclosure of privileged communications between Bre-X and BJV. Overall, the Trustee seeks a blanket exemption to solicitor-client privilege based on general evidence that such information would benefit the administration of the estate. The parties have agreed for the purposes of this application that solicitor-client privilege exists. The only issues are whether a Trustee has the right to waive this privilege for Bre-X and, if not, whether a court is justified in permitting an exception to the privilege.

Decision of the Chambers Judge

[9] Relying upon Re Chilcott and Clarkson Co. Ltd. reflex, (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 545 (C.A.), the learned Chambers Judge, in a well-reasoned judgment, refused to grant the declaration sought by the Trustee. In Re Chilcott, the trustee in bankruptcy sought to compel a solicitor to disclose privileged communications that might reveal the whereabouts of some of the bankrupt's property. The bankrupt did not waive his privilege and, at the time, was facing criminal charges for fraud allegedly associated with the bankruptcy.

[10] The Ontario Court of Appeal varied the lower court's decision to compel evidence from the solicitor to avoid disclosure of any privileged communications. Specifically, the court confirmed that the privilege could not be waived by the trustee, as the privilege resides with the bankrupt. The Ontario Court of Appeal also limited the earlier decision of Re Cirone (1965), 8 C.B.R. (N.S.) 237 (Ont. S.C.) to its particular facts. In Re Cirone, the Ontario Supreme Court permitted a waiver of solicitor-client privilege by a trustee in circumstances where allegations of fraudulent preference had been made against the solicitor who refused to disclose certain communications. The Chambers Judge in the within action wholly adopted the reasoning of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Chilcott.

[11] In addition, the Chambers Judge rejected the Trustee's analogies between this case and wills cases in which waiver of privilege by a third party may be permitted. Although he accepted the established nature of the exception in wills cases and acknowledged a superficial attraction in the analogy, he distinguished the estates cases. Namely, estates cases focus on the ascertainment of a deceased's intentions by disclosure of information protected by solicitor-client privilege. Waiver, in this situation, does not offend the rationale for this privilege.

[12] The Chambers Judge denied the application and held that the Trustee does not have the legal right, power or authority to waive Bre-X's solicitor-client privilege. He confirmed that BJV could be compelled to produce its solicitors and their files, documents and records respecting the assets, affairs and transactions of Bre-X for examination, to the extent that solicitor-client privilege would not be compromised.

[13] The Trustee's submissions in support of waiver of privilege may be distilled into two main categories. First, the Trustee submits that the case law, but for Re Chilcott, supports a waiver of privilege in this appeal. Second, the Trustee submits that exceptions to solicitor-client privilege exist and that the circumstances of the within appeal (e.g., the absence of directors to effect a waiver) justify an exception.

[14] For the reasons that follow, I am of the view that the powers conferred on a trustee in bankruptcy do not include the general power to waive solicitor-client privilege and documents subject to that privilege need not be produced. There are no facts that justify an exception to the privilege here.

Analysis

1. Does a trustee have the power to waive solicitor-client privilege for a bankrupt?

a) Solicitor-Client Privilege

[15] A basic understanding of the history and role of solicitor-client privilege is critical to the determination of both issues in this appeal. The case law specifically considering a trustee's power and authority to waive solicitor-client privilege is not extensive and is somewhat inconsistent. A broader appreciation, however, of the nature of solicitor-client privilege and its role in our legal system readily reveals the almost absolute protection afforded by this privilege.

[16] Solicitor-client privilege, one of the oldest forms of common law privilege, protects the sanctity of the confidence between client and lawyer. The current rationale for solicitor-client privilege has remained unchanged for some time. The basis for this privilege was articulated aptly in Greenough* v. *Gaskell (1833), 1 My. & K. 98 at 103, 39 E.R. 618 at 620-21:

> The foundation of this rule is not difficult to discover. It is not (as has sometimes been said) on account of any particular importance which the law attributes to the business of legal professors, or any particular disposition to > afford them protection, though certainly it may not be very easy to discover why a like privilege has been refused to others, and especially to medical advisers.

> But it is out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden, and to the administration of justice, which cannot go on, without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the Courts, and in those matters affecting rights and obligations which form the subject of all judicial proceedings. If the privilege did not exist at all, every one would be thrown upon his own legal resources; deprived of all professional assistance, a man would not venture to consult any skilful person, or would only dare to tell his counsellor half his case.

[17] The Supreme Court has consistently commented that solicitor-client privilege is an important cornerstone to the effective representation of clients by counsel. That court has gone as far as to characterize solicitor-client privilege as a "fundamental civil and legal right...": Solosky* v. *The Queen, 1979 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821 at 839.

[18] It should be emphasized that solicitor-client privilege is not merely a rule of evidence but a substantive rule, which protects the client's fundamental right to confidentiality. The Supreme Court stated in Descôteaux* v. Mierzwinski, 1982 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 860 at 875:

1. The confidentiality of communications between solicitor and client may be raised in any circumstances where such communications are likely to be disclosed without the client's consent.
2. Unless the law provides otherwise, when and to the extent that the legitimate exercise of a right would interfere with another person's right to have his communications with his lawyer kept confidential, the resulting conflict should be resolved in favour of protecting the confidentiality.
3. When the law gives someone the authority to do something which, in the circumstances of the case, might interfere with that confidentiality, the decision to do so and the choice of means of exercising that authority should be determined with a view to not interfering with it except to the extent absolutely necessary in order to achieve the ends sought by the enabling legislation.
4. Acts providing otherwise in situations under paragraph 2 and enabling legislation referred to in paragraph 3 must be interpreted restrictively.

At 871, the court further noted:

> There is no denying that a person has a right to communicate with a legal adviser in all confidence, a right that is "founded upon the unique relationship of solicitor and client" (Solosky, supra). It is a personal and extra-patrimonial right which follows a citizen throughout his dealings with others.

Thus, this privilege casts a wide protective net over communications between solicitors and their clients and is protected zealously by the courts.

[19] Due to its critical function in our legal system, solicitor-client privilege is distinct from other forms of evidentiary privilege. Solicitor-client privilege has attained the status of a class privilege, and is not assessed on a case-by-case basis like other forms of relational privilege. A consideration of other forms of relational privilege (e.g., priest/penitent, therapist/patient and so on) that are decided on a case-by-case basis is, however, useful. In particular, the Wigmore criteria, used to assess claims of privilege on a case-by-case basis, reveal the basic rationale for relational privilege and demonstrate why solicitor-client privilege constitutes an entrenched class of privilege.

[20] The Wigmore criteria were quoted, perhaps most notably, by the Supreme Court in Slavutych* v. Baker, 1975 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1976] 1 S.C.R. 254. In Slavutych, the Supreme Court considered whether any privilege attached to a professor's comments about a colleague who was being considered for tenure. The professor was told by his superior that his comments and the evaluation form were part of a confidential review process. The professor's comments on the form were subsequently used in dismissal proceedings against him. When considering whether the professor's comments were privileged, the Supreme Court adopted the Wigmore criteria as the test for privilege at 260:

(1) The communications must originate in a confidence that they will not be disclosed.
(2) This element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relation between the parties.
(3) The relation must be one which in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered.
(4) The injury that would inure to the relation by the disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit thereby gained for the correct disposal of litigation.

When assessing claims of relational privilege on a case-by-case basis, these four fundamental conditions must be met before privilege will be held to arise. These stringent conditions limit the circumstances in which privilege may be claimed.

[21] Solicitor-client privilege is presumed to meet all four criteria. As noted in R.* v. *Gruenke, 1991 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 263 at 289: "[t]he prima facie protection for solicitor-client communications is based on the fact that the relationship and the communications between solicitor and client are essential to the effective operation of the legal system." Thus, it is essential that clients enjoy confidentiality in their pursuit of legal advice, otherwise clients might avoid seeking assistance from lawyers or might not disclose all necessary information to their lawyers when attempting to get advice. There is no question that this confidential relationship ought to be "sedulously fostered", as effective representation is a cornerstone of our legal system. The injury that would result from an erosion of solicitor-client privilege is great, including the collapse of effective legal representation.

[22] Once solicitor-client privilege is established (i.e., the communication was in fact confidential, in the context of a professional relationship and in the course of seeking advice), the categorical circumstances in which disclosure of privileged information by a person other than the client will be permitted are very limited. Communications which are criminal or which seek to facilitate criminal activities are exempted: Solosky. Similarly, privilege may be set aside when the safety of the public is at risk from non-disclosure of the communications: Smith* v. Jones, 1999 CanLII 674 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 455. In addition, the continued existence of solicitor-client privilege is not required where the client no longer has an interest to protect and where non-disclosure would compromise the ability of an accused to defend himself: Smith. Finally, while the duty of confidentiality survives the death of the client, the privilege enures to the client's successor in title (e.g., heirs) and may be waived by a successor in interest to the client: Geffen v. *Goodman Estate, 1991 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353 at 384. The within appeal does not fall within any of these categories nor is the Trustee's situation analogous to any of these exceptional circumstances.

[23] The Trustee strongly urges an analogy between this action and estates cases in which disclosure is permitted. Disclosure in estates cases has been allowed to promote the deceased client's wishes and true testamentary intentions through disclosure of privileged communications. The interests that solicitor-client privilege seeks to protect are not compromised where the waiver will disclose the testator's intentions: Sopinka, Lederman and Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada, (Toronto: Butterworths, 1990) at 753-54. The rationale for disclosure is not only that disclosure is consistent with what the testator would have wanted, but also that the client's communication is presumed to have been intended to remain a secret only during the testator's lifetime: Wigmore, Evidence in Trials at Common Law, vol. 8, 4th ed. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1961) at para. 2314; Geffen at 385. Thus, the exception in Geffen allows the testator's intention to be carried out but should not be misinterpreted as authority for a widespread, case-by-case assessment of requests for waiver of privilege by third parties. The presumption described by Wigmore does not apply in the circumstances of this appeal.

b) The Powers of a Trustee in Bankruptcy

[24] Solicitor-client privilege is the privilege of the client - in this case, Bre-X. Subject to an exception, the only basis upon which a trustee could claim the right or power to waive the bankrupt's solicitor-client privilege and demand disclosure would be statutory. It is important to understand the powers of a trustee when resolving the question of privilege. A trustee has no inherent authority over the bankrupt's affairs. Rather, the trustee's rights are statutory and it is empowered to assume conduct of the bankrupt's affairs and take possession of his property pursuant to authority granted by the BIA which provides, in part:

> 16. (3) The trustee shall, as soon as possible, take possession of the deeds, books, records and documents and all property of the bankrupt and make an inventory, and for the purpose of making an inventory the trustee is entitled to enter, subject to subsection (3.1), on any premises on which the deeds, books, records, and documents or property of the bankrupt may be, notwithstanding that they may be in the possession of a sheriff, a secured creditor or other claimant thereto.
> (5) No person is, as against the trustee, entitled to withhold possession of the books of account belonging to the bankrupt or any papers or documents, including material in electronic form, relating to the accounts or to any trade dealings of the bankrupt or to set up any lien or right of retention thereon.
> 18. The trustee may when necessary in the interests of the estate of the bankrupt
> (a) take conservatory measures and summarily dispose of property that is perishable or likely to depreciate rapidly in value; and
> 20. (1) The trustee may, with the permission of the inspectors, divest all or any part of the trustee's right, title or interest in any real property of the bankrupt...
> 21. The trustee may initiate such criminal proceedings as may be authorized by the creditors, the inspectors or the court against any person believed to have committed an offence under this Act.
> 67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise
> (a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,
> (b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

but it shall comprise

(c) all property wherever situated of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy or that may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge, and

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit.

71. (2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee, the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

163. (1) The trustee, on ordinary resolution passed by the creditors or on the written request or resolution of a majority of the inspectors, may, without an order, examine under oath before the registrar of the court or authorized person, the bankrupt, any person reasonably thought to have knowledge of the affairs of the bankrupt or any person who is or has been an agent, clerk, servant, officer, director or employee of the bankrupt, respecting the bankrupt, his dealings or property and may order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in his possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, his dealings or property.

164. (1) Where a person has, or is believed or suspected to have, in his possession or power any of the property of the bankrupt, or any book, document or paper of any kind relating in whole or in part to the bankrupt, his dealings or property, or showing that he is indebted to the bankrupt, he may be required by the trustee to produce the book, document or paper for the information of the trustee, or to deliver to him any property of the bankrupt in his possession.

167. Any person being examined is bound to answer all questions relating to the business or property or the bankrupt, to the causes of his bankruptcy and the disposition of his property.

There are many other provisions which confer broad powers upon the trustee, but notably absent is the delegation of any power to waive privilege, such as contained in the British legislation. While these sections allow for the examination of a solicitor and disclosure of information relating to the bankrupt's transactions, the sections omit any reference to privileged communications.

[25] British insolvency legislation (the Insolvency Act, 1986, c. 45 (U.K.)) explicitly refers to privileged communications:

311(1). The trustee shall take possession of all books, papers and other records which relate to the bankrupt's estate or affairs and which belong to him or are in his possession or under his control (including any which would be privileged from disclosure in any proceedings).

[26] This provision expressly permits the production of privileged documents, unlike the Canadian statute where neither production of privileged documents nor waiver of privilege is mentioned. A cursory review of Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 3(1), 4th ed. (London: Butterworths, 1980) and vol. 3(2), 4th ed. (London: Butterworths, 1980), and British case authorities reveals that even where the privileged document is expressly producible notwithstanding the privilege, the provision merely entitles the trustee to take possession. The protection afforded by solicitor-client privilege, however, is not displaced and the section does not confer any authority to waive the privilege upon the trustee.

[27] The British legislation may be contrasted with comparable American provisions. The Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 542(e) provides:

Subject to any applicable privilege, after notice and a hearing, the court may order an attorney, accountant, or other person that holds recorded information, including books, documents, records and papers relating to the debtor's property or financial affairs, to turn over or disclose such recorded information to the trustee.

The American legislation recognizes that the privilege protects communications from disclosure and cannot be waived by the trustee.

[28] The Canadian legislation is silent regarding solicitor-client privilege, and thus it is necessary to determine whether the documents must be produced notwithstanding the privilege. Keeping in mind the importance and purpose of the privilege, it is my view that, absent specific language such as that contained in the British statute, once the privilege attaches disclosure of the communication cannot be compelled. That is the essence of the privilege. The purpose of the privilege is a recognition of the importance of confidentiality to the judicial system generally. If the document must be disclosed to a trustee in bankruptcy, then confidentiality and the judicial system it supports is undermined. And it is not corrected by saying that the trustee cannot use the information. Indeed, if the trustee cannot use the information then there is no purpose in the disclosure. If it can, then the foundation for the privilege is damaged.

Digitized by Google

[29] There may be occasions where the trustee inadvertently comes into possession of privileged information. Even then, a trustee cannot waive the privilege and make use of the documents unless they fall within an exception.

[30] Parliament did not include a clause making privileged communications producible. In addition to excluding any reference to solicitor-client privilege, Parliament does not confer all the bankrupt's property and personal rights in the trustee. Section 2(1) of the BIA defines "property" to include:

> money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;

The "property" that vests in the trustee includes almost "every conceivable type of asset": Chetty* v. *Burlingham Associates Inc. 1995 CanLII 3939 (SK CA), (1995), 121 D.L.R. (4th) 297 at 300 (Sask. C.A.). Some types of property, however, are specifically excluded (e.g., property held in trust for another person, pursuant to s. 67(1)) or do not fall within the confines of the definition.

[31] Notably, personal property and personal rights are very different and the cases interpreting the BIA distinguish the two. For example, "things in action", such as a cause of action for custody or divorce, are matters personal to the bankrupt and are not captured by s. 2(1) of the BIA: Gano* v. Alberta Motor Association Insurance Co. (1997), 202 A.R. 118 (Q.B.). Tax refunds for the support of disabled person are the "property of the bankrupt": Re Neufeld (Bankrupt) (1993), 144 A.R. 182 (Q.B.). Nor does a cause of action for damage to the reputation of a bankrupt vest in a trustee: Egan v. Grayson (1956), 8 D.L.R. (2d) 125 (Alta. S.C.); Rahall v. *McLennan (1996), 190 A.R. 183 (Q.B.). In my view, solicitor-client privilege is a personal right, at least as fundamental and individual as damages to reputation, which falls into a category of interests which are not transferred to or conferred upon a trustee by the BIA. As noted by Yoine Goldstein in "Bankruptcy as it Affects Third Parties: Some Aspects", [1985] Meredith Mem. Lect. 198 at 227: "I can think of nothing more attached to the person and nothing less pecuniary, than a communication to a person bound by professional secrecy ..."

[32] The distinction between property rights and personal rights, such as privilege, however, is far from absolute. For example, the BIA dictates that trustees take possession of all property of the bankrupt, including books, records and documents. The trustee argues that if a privileged communication has been reduced to writing (for example, in the form of an opinion letter) the tangible letter is property that must be produced. But the very essence of the solicitor-client privilege (the personal right of the bankrupt) protects the privileged communication from being communicated. The BIA does not diminish the personal right of privilege enjoyed by the bankrupt in respect of that communication. Once privilege attaches to the communication, I am of the view that it need not be produced unless the statute specifically provides. Moreover, in cases where production of privileged material occurs inadvertently, the privilege remains extant and the bankrupt's right to privilege with respect to that document is maintained.

[33] Section 16 of the BIA and other related provisions are neither sufficiently broad nor explicit enough to empower the trustee to take possession of and use privileged communications, advice or opinions which may fall under the BIA's definition of "property". Certainly a privileged communication is not property divisible amongst creditors such as that contemplated in s. 67. In short, while there may be a physical record or document which records the communication, the essence of the document is still the privileged communication, a personal right and not property contemplated or falling under the BIA. The personal right of privilege attaches to the document and, in my view, that personal right, retained by the bankrupt, precludes disclosure of the communication to the trustee whatever form the communication takes. If disclosure of the physical document was permitted, the personal privilege right would be totally defeated. Had a transfer of solicitor-client privilege, or production of privileged communications (whatever their form) been intended, Parliament would have so provided in the BIA. This was not done.

[34] In the case of a company, the privilege is solely the right of the company. There may also be situations where questions of privilege will arise with respect to individuals such as directors, officers and managers of the corporation who seek advice from the corporate solicitor as to their own obligations, which may become intertwined with corporate opinions. This variant on the issues that may arise out a trustee's attempt to disclose privileged information is not before us and I need not address the issue.

[35] In my view, there is no attempt in the legislation to displace the common law confidentiality rights enjoyed by a bankrupt with respect to its communications with solicitors. The privilege itself is not property under the BIA. Nor is the right to waive a power attaching to property divisible amongst creditors under s. 67. The essence of the privilege, whatever its form, is the confidential communication to which privilege attaches. An explicit delegation would be required in order for trustees to have a categorical right to waive privilege for bankrupts and even for trustees to have an enhanced ability to seek the authority to waive from the courts on a case-by-case basis. Thus, the personal right of privilege is not altered by the BIA.

c) Jurisprudence

[36] The Trustee submits that diverging and inconsistent views regarding the ability of a trustee to waive a bankrupt's privilege exist among courts in Canada. It suggests that, notwithstanding Re Chilcott, the continuing rule in the jurisprudence is that a bankruptcy trustee can waive a bankrupt's solicitor-client privilege. It is true that there is a dearth of authority on this issue and that some of the earlier authorities are inconsistent with Re Chilcott. In my view, however, the approach of the court in Re Chilcott is compelling.

[37] As noted earlier, in that case, a solicitor acted on behalf of the bankrupt prior to the bankruptcy and advised the bankrupt on financial and other corporate matters. The trustee sought to examine the solicitor regarding privileged communications with the bankrupt. Although the court accepted that the solicitor could be compelled to disclose information about the bankrupt's property, affairs and transactions, the court held that information on any topic necessarily involving disclosure of communications made between the solicitor and the bankrupt for the purpose of giving legal advice could not be disclosed. Ultimately, the court refused to speculate on circumstances in which a trustee might properly waive a bankrupt's privilege, but it concluded that the goal of protecting creditors' rights, standing alone, could not defeat solicitor-client privilege.

[38] In my view, Re Chilcott correctly balances the importance of solicitor-client privilege against creditors' rights and is relevant and applicable to the case at bar. The fact that the bankrupt was an individual in Re Chilcott, as compared to the corporate bankrupt involved in the within action, is not a relevant distinguishing factor. If anything, the bankrupt's refusal to waive privilege and the specific fraud allegations advanced against him in Re Chilcott resulted in a stronger case for disclosure than the Trustee has put before this Court.

[39] In support of its submissions, the Trustee relies on the Alberta case of Re Abacus Cities Ltd. (1981), 40 C.B.R. (N.S.) 172 (Alta. Q.B.). In Abacus Cities, a trustee sought the court's advice and direction regarding his authority over privilege applicable to communications between a bankrupt corporation and the bankrupt's solicitors where an officer of the bankrupt had been charged with fraud. The trustee's query arose when the Attorney General of Ontario, during a preliminary hearing into the fraud charges, asked the trustee to waive the bankrupt's solicitor-client privilege regarding certain communications relevant to the fraud charges. As the matter arose out of a bankruptcy action commenced in Ontario, the Alberta court declined to make a decision regarding the admissibility of evidence in Ontario proceedings and the existence of solicitor-client privilege. The judge did, however, comment upon the trustee's ability to waive privilege. Following Re Cirone, he accepted that the privilege belonged to the bankrupt, but held that the trustee could step into the shoes of the bankrupt to waive the privilege. In particular, the court specified that the trustee was authorized to waive the bankrupt's privilege after considering issues of public interest and if such a waiver would not be prejudicial to the interests that the trustee represented.

[40] With respect, I do not accept that a trustee steps into the shoes of the bankrupt for all purposes, including the purpose of waiving solicitor-client privilege. A trustee's powers are prescribed by statute. The BIA does not confer any authority over privilege and does not provide that the trustee steps into the shoes of the bankrupt for all purposes. Moreover, a proper consideration of the public interest must include a careful examination of the rationale for solicitor-client privilege, including the overriding need to guard this privilege in order to ensure the integrity of our legal process and a client's right to effective representation by counsel. In addition, I note that Re Abacus relied heavily upon Re Cirone, but was decided before Re Cirone was limited to its facts by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Chilcott. Finally, in both Re Abacus and Re Cirone, fraudulent behaviour was involved (fraud being a potential exception to the privilege) and that these cases may, on that basis alone, be distinguished from the within appeal.

[41] The Trustee also refers to Re Amonson (1985), 57 C.B.R. (N.S.) 314 (Alta. Q.B.). In my view, this case does not assist the Trustee. In that case the court followed the reasoning of the Ontario Supreme Court in Re Chilcott, without reference to the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in that case. In Re Amonson, the court again considered whether a solicitor was a compellable witness in bankruptcy proceedings and whether the trustee could waive solicitor-client privilege. Although the court agreed with the decision at first instance in Re Chilcott, the court in Re Amonson did not eventually permit a blanket waiver. Ultimately, the court remained reticent about waiver of a bankrupt's privilege and concluded at 317 that "care should be taken with respect to the solicitor-client privilege concerning the giving of the legal advice unless this advice was in furtherance of a criminal purpose."

[42] Similarly, Wolch's Guaranteed Foods Ltd. (Trustee of) v. Wolch 1994 CanLII 8935 (AB QB), (1994), 24 C.B.R. (3d) 268 (Alta. Q.B.) does not support the Trustee's position in the within action. In this case, the Registrar considered, inter alia, whether a trustee could waive the solicitor-client privilege of a bankrupt, but ultimately concluded that the case did not require him to generally determine whether a trustee was entitled to waive a bankrupt's privilege. On the specific facts before him, the Registrar held that waiver was not warranted, in part, because wide disclosure about the bankrupt's property had already been made. Thus, there was no true necessity for the waiver.

[43] The Trustee appears to argue that Wolch contemplates the possibility of trustees being able to waive a bankrupt's privilege because the Registrar declined to make a final determination on the issue. In my view, the ultimate result of Wolch supports the respondent's position that privilege should not be waived and the case indicates a preference for the Ontario Court of Appeal's reasoning in Re Chilcott. Namely, at 273, the Registrar stated: "...there is no authority for holding a trustee can waive the bankrupt's privilege."

[44] Finally, while not referred to by counsel in argument, this Court discussed release of information by a solicitor to a trustee in bankruptcy in the case of Clark* v. *Law Society of Alberta, 2000 ABCA 242 (CanLII), [2000] 11 W.W.R. 520 (Alta. C.A.). In that case, a lawyer disclosed information about assets of the bankrupt to a trustee and the Law Society took disciplinary action. This Court granted relief to the lawyer. During the course of its reasons, this Court noted that the BIA conferred broad powers on a trustee to demand information about property, but held that the scope of these powers was not at issue because the lawyer had properly disclosed information (not privileged), as is clearly required by the BIA. The Court specifically declined to rule on the question of solicitor-client privilege, noting only that had privileged information been divulged, other problems might have arisen.

[45] In my view, the state of the law regarding a trustee's ability to waive a bankrupt's privilege is not as ambiguous as the Trustee submits, nor is it evolving towards an exception favouring trustees generally. If anything, the common law is evolving in the contrary direction. While a small number of the cases put before us permitted disclosure, many of them predate Re Chilcott. Moreover, some deal with accepted exceptions, namely, criminal behaviour, which distinguishes them factually from the within appeal. Overwhelmingly, jurisprudence reiterates that solicitor-client privilege must be guarded zealously and there are no common law developments which support an erosion of that privilege in favour of trustees in bankruptcy.

2. Is this an occasion which justifies an exception to the privilege?

[46] Finally, it is necessary to address the Trustee's submissions relating to the existing exceptions at common law which might permit disclosure of Bre-X's privileged information by this Court. The bases for solicitor-client privilege must be weighed against the potential benefits to be derived from an exception displacing the privilege of bankrupts.

[47] In my view, the fact that disclosure is sought in a bankruptcy context, where creditors' financial recovery might be enhanced by disclosure, is insignificant compared to the benefits derived from protection of a bankrupt's solicitor-client privilege. Insolvent entities and persons in financial difficulty frequently need legal advice, perhaps even more so than those who enjoy financial stability. The ability of these individuals or corporations to obtain fully informed and reliable legal advice should not be compromised by threat of disclosure in the possible event of a bankruptcy. In my view, creditors may benefit more from the provision of good legal advice to persons on the brink of insolvency than they would from disclosure of solicitor-client communications between these debtors and their lawyers.

[48] It is not helpful to simply say that in the public's interest trustees obtain all information that will help maximize asset recovery without also recognizing the public interest in solicitor-client privilege. Frequently, contrary public interests may compete with the public interest in solicitor-client privilege, but most often, the public interest in and the rationale for solicitor-client privilege prevail. As noted in A. (L.L.)* v. *B. (A.), 1995 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 536 at 562, a class privilege such as solicitor-client privilege is not easily displaced:

> A class privilege entails a prima facie presumption that such communications are inadmissible or not subject to disclosure in criminal or civil proceedings and the onus lies on the party seeking disclosure of the information to show that an overriding interest commands disclosure.

The potential benefits that may result from trustees generally being able to waive privilege for bankrupt persons simply cannot be viewed as "overriding" when compared to the interests protected and enhanced by solicitor-client privilege.

[49] This begs the question - what interests will override solicitor-client privilege? In short, very, very few interests are more important than those protected by this privilege. The almost absolute nature of solicitor-client privilege was reiterated in the recent case of R.* v. *McClure 2001 SCC 14 (CanLII), (2001), 195 D.L.R. (4th) 513 (S.C.C.). In that case, an accused was charged with sexual offences. The Supreme Court considered whether to waive solicitor-client privilege over the litigation file of the lawyer representing the alleged victim in a related civil suit in order to allow the accused to explore and confirm potential defences in the criminal prosecution.

[50] The Supreme Court noted that the occasions when this privilege will yield to other interests are rare and stated at 524 "solicitor-client privilege must be as close to absolute as possible to ensure public confidence and retain relevance. As such, it will only yield in certain clearly defined circumstances, and does not involve a balancing of interests on a case-by-case basis." Ultimately, the court held that the file ought not to be produced, principally because the accused had not demonstrated that any useful information was in the litigation file and the necessity for disclosure was questionable.

[51] In my view, the Supreme Court's recent decision in McClure narrows the exceptions to solicitor-client privilege significantly, particularly given that court's criticism of case-by-case assessment of requests to set aside privilege. The Trustee, however, argues that exceptions may arise on a case-by-case basis where a principled basis for waiver exists. Even if principled exceptions were permissible on a case-by-case basis, the Trustee has not demonstrated that the facts of this case merit any exception. The rationale for rejecting a categorical right by trustees to waive the solicitor-client privilege of bankrupts applies equally to the Trustee's request in this appeal for a principled exception.

[52] In short, no overriding rationale for disclosure exists in the within action. There is simply no pressing objective that, in principle, surpasses in importance the interests protected by solicitor-client privilege, and thus no principled exception is justified. The factors that militate against disclosure and which reinforce the rationale for continued privilege include: the absence of any identity of interest between the bankrupt and the Trustee, the inability to displace any of the Wigmore justifications for continued privilege, the minimal importance of the creditors' likely financial recovery relative to the interests protected by solicitor-client privilege, and the absence of a demonstrated need for the waiver sought.

a) Identity of Interest

[53] Because the evidence does not directly demonstrate what benefits the bankrupt or its estate will reap from disclosure, the materials before us invite a rather hypothetical debate about the potential identity and conflicts of interest between the Trustee and Bre-X (and trustees and bankrupts more generally). During oral submissions, the appellant and respondent took opposite positions on this point. The Trustee submits that the bankrupt could only benefit from proper administration of its estate. Conversely, the respondent suggested that a trustee in bankruptcy and the bankrupt likely never enjoy a unity of interest since a trustee's principal obligation is to the creditors.

[54] The potential unity of interest that may hypothetically exist between a bankrupt and its trustee provides an interesting topic for debate and discussion, but this much is clear. The Trustee has not proven, with sufficient affidavit evidence, that disclosure of Bre-X's privileged communications with BJV will further the interests and intentions of the bankrupt. The trustee has simply asserted that a fishing expedition is something he is "desirous" of.

[55] Furthermore, there is no obvious analogy between the Trustee's objectives in this case and the desire to determine a deceased person's intentions in estates cases. For example, in Geffen, the Supreme Court considered whether disclosure of privileged information (in order to obtain evidence from a solicitor regarding advice given to a client pertaining to the creation of a trust of which the client was a settlor) was justified. The action arose after the settlor/client's death, when her executor brought an action seeking to set aside the trust for undue influence. At trial, the solicitor, who advised the settlor prior to the creation of the trust, was permitted to give evidence regarding privileged communications with his client.

[56] The Supreme Court considered the disclosure of privileged information permitted by the trial judge. The primary basis upon which the evidence was initially allowed was the accepted exception in wills cases. Namely, solicitors may be permitted to give evidence in wills cases to determine the validity of the will or intent of a testator. The Supreme Court accepted this exception and further elaborated upon the bases for the exception.

[57] Traditionally, the exception for wills cases was rationalized on the grounds that the testator intended to disclose his intentions through the will and that communications with the solicitor were only intended to remain secret during his lifetime. The Supreme Court also appeared to justify the exception on the basis that the interests of the client and the claimants in wills cases were the same. In other words, both client and claimants wished to ensure the full expression of the client's intentions. Ultimately, the court permitted the disclosure of the privileged communications in Geffen because, as stated at 387:

> [T]he considerations which support the admissibility of communications between solicitor and client in the wills context apply with equal force to the present case. The general policy which supports privileging such communications is not violated. The interests of the now deceased client are furthered in the sense that the purpose of allowing the evidence to be admitted is precisely to ascertain what her true intentions were. And the principle of extending the privilege to the heirs or successors in title of the deceased is promoted by focussing the inquiry on who those heirs or successors properly are.

[58] The court's decision in Geffen is based largely upon the obvious analogy between the disclosure of the settlor's intention and confirmation of a testator's intention in estates cases. Namely, both in estates cases and in Geffen, solicitor-client privilege was not violated by disclosure because of the identity of interest between the claimant and client and, to a lesser degree, because of the deceased's presumed wish to have his intentions disclosed to his beneficiaries and other claimants.

[59] No similar identity of interest can be assumed to exist between a trustee in bankruptcy and a bankrupt. While such a commonality may occasionally arise, any presumption that bankrupts and their trustees enjoy an identity of interest is obviously unwarranted. A trustee acts in the interests of the creditors, which are not identical to, and frequently conflict with, the interests of the bankrupt person. While a trustee is afforded broad powers to deal with a bankrupt's assets, the bankrupt still exists, whether as a person or a corporation. The interests of the two are not the same. Moreover, if they are identical, the bankrupt might well agree to waive the privilege.

[60] Further, as noted earlier, in estates cases, the deceased person is presumed to have intended necessary disclosure of his intention after his death. No similar presumption may be advanced in this case. No one would suggest that a bankrupt anticipates or intends that privileged communications with his solicitor will be disclosed in the event of his insolvency and bankruptcy. Certainly, the directors of Bre-X did not waive the company's privilege prior to resigning. In the absence of any contrary evidence, we may assume that Bre-X intended to engage in fully confidential communications with its solicitor, without any intention to disclose such communications. Disclosure may compromise Bre-X's legitimate expectation of and entitlement to confidentiality. In addition, no identity of interest between the Trustee, who desires waiver, and Bre-X has been proven.

b) Creditors' Interests

[61] Any decision about an exception invites a closer look at the interests of the estate and creditors which the trustee seeks to protect and enhance. Namely, how important are creditors' rights in the broader context of solicitor-client privilege? As noted earlier, it is obvious that a bankrupt's creditors might occasionally benefit from disclosure of privileged communications between the bankrupt and his solicitors. The mere fact that there might be a benefit is not a compelling reason to disclose information that is otherwise privileged.

[62] By way of illustration, the disclosure of privileged discussions between the accused and his counsel in criminal cases might frequently promote convictions where evidence regarding the offence would be revealed by disclosure of privileged communications. There is a public interest in prosecuting criminals, yet the accused's solicitor-client privilege may prevent disclosure of material evidence and will be protected notwithstanding the possibility that a guilty party may not be convicted. The benefits of disclosure alone, whether in a civil or criminal context, are always outweighed compared to the societal benefit resulting from a legal system in which clients may freely seek advice from solicitors.

[63] As noted earlier, there is simply no competition between creditors' rights and the collective benefits derived from effective legal representation within our legal system. Confidentiality is essential to the solicitor-client relationship and, using Wigmore's language, ought clearly to be sedulously fostered. Potentially insolvent corporations must not be discouraged from seeking legal advice due to the possibility of disclosure of their solicitor-client communications. Particularly during periods of financial instability, corporations and their creditors benefit from appropriate and complete legal advice that may assist the corporation (and by extension, its creditors). One expects that persons in financial difficulty would be reluctant to avail themselves of legal advice where a real possibility of disclosure existed. Thus, disclosure would compromise the effective provision of legal advice to clients experiencing financial difficulty. A great injury to individuals and corporations in financial difficulty, as well as the shareholders and other creditors of such persons, would result from an erosion of solicitor-client privilege. This injury to the legal system and its ability to provide legal advice to persons in dire financial straits vastly outweighs the occasional benefits that might flow to the estate of the bankrupt.

c) No Necessity for Waiver by the Trustee

[64] Finally, I must deal with the argument that disclosure of Bre-X's privileged communications with BJV is required because of Bre-X's alleged inability to waive its own privilege. The Supreme Court emphasized in McClure that solicitor-client privilege will not be set aside except in cases of dire need. When commenting on whether the accused's stated desire to review his alleged sexual assault victim's civil litigation file constituted a case of dire need, the court firmly stated at 527: "Before the test [for waiver of privilege] is even considered, the accused must establish that the information he is seeking in the solicitor-client file is not available from any other source and he is otherwise unable to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt in any other way." While this case was decided after this appeal was heard, it merely confirms my decision and in particular reiterates that waiver will only be permitted if there is no other way to obtain the information sought and if the information itself is demonstrably important and necessary.

[65] The Trustee submits that an exception is necessary because all Bre-X's officers and directors resigned in 1997. That argument is difficult to entertain when one realizes that privilege continues even after death (with some exceptions): Bullivant* v. A.-G. for Victoria, [1901] A.C. 196 at 206 (H.L.); Langworthy v. McVicar (1913), 25 O.W.R. 297 at 298 (M.C.); Stewart v. *Walker (1903), 6 O.L.R. 495 at 497 (C.A.). If privilege continues after death, surely the privilege of a corporation survives the mere resignation of its officers and directors. Moreover, the argument that there is no one to waive privilege is not persuasive because there are still Bre-X shareholders and a meeting could be called to deal with the issue of privilege, whether by the election of directors or otherwise. In the end, Bre-X retains the capacity in law to waive privilege, and no appropriate steps have been taken to perfect that capacity. This capacity for waiver seriously undermines the Trustee's request for an exception to Bre-X's privilege.

[66] Furthermore, the BIA provides the Trustee with broad powers to take possession of property and obtain information regarding the bankrupt. For example, the Trustee has the discretion to examine witnesses, including BJV. Section 163(1) of the BIA provides:

> The trustee, on ordinary resolution passed by the creditors or on the written request or resolution of a majority of the inspectors, may, without an order, examine under oath before the registrar of the court or other authorized person, the bankrupt, any person reasonably thought to have knowledge of the affairs of the bankrupt or any person who is or has been an agent, clerk, servant, officer, director or employee of the bankrupt, respecting the bankrupt, his dealings or property and may order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in his possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, his dealings or property.

While privilege may arise in respect of certain communications, the Trustee is still entitled to examine BJV and any former employee, officer or director of Bre-X. That option has not been exhausted in this case.

[67] Thus, we know that the Trustee is equipped with a broad range of powers to obtain information from and about the bankrupt. Yet, there is no unequivocal evidence which demonstrates that the Trustee cannot obtain the information he seeks without setting aside solicitor-client privilege. There is no evidence that all available options have been exhausted. Thus, even if a case-by-case review is available, until the Trustee adduces evidence on these points, this Court cannot conclude that the disclosure sought is necessary.

[68] Finally, I do not accept that the information sought will demonstrably assist the administration of the estate. Even if the lack of a directing mind to grant the waiver were a valid reason for an exception and the information could not be obtained without disclosure of privilege communications, this Court has not been advised, with any degree of precision, what information the Trustee seeks. There are no specific questions which BJV has thus far refused to answer. In the absence of specifics, this Court is not in a position to decide whether the information will truly be beneficial to the creditors and to the Trustee's administration of the estate. The information will not be disclosed so that the Trustee can go on a fishing expedition. A benefit must be anticipated and the likelihood of that benefit must be more than speculative.

Conclusion

[69] In summary, the jurisprudence regarding solicitor-client privilege creates an extremely high threshold for disclosure of these communications. The Supreme Court has repeatedly reiterated the fundamental role which solicitor-client privilege plays in the trial process and the importance of the confidentiality right enjoyed by clients seeking advice from counsel. Accordingly, the privilege will only be displaced in exceptional circumstances, which overcome the important goals protected by solicitor-client privilege. In this case, the pecuniary interests of creditors of the bankrupt do not trump the interests protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[70] Overall, no authority at common law, nor any provisions in insolvency legislation, nor any principle underlying solicitor-client privilege relax the application of solicitor-client privilege in the bankruptcy context. The BIA does not contain provisions forcing production of information notwithstanding solicitor-client privilege. There is no demonstrated identity of interest between the bankrupt and the Trustee. Furthermore, the evidence in this case, at best, expresses a hope that creditors might benefit from the disclosure of certain privileged communications, but the evidence does not specify what benefits are anticipated. Moreover, the mere resignation of the directors of the bankrupt does not, by itself, prove that the disclosure is necessary as other means to obtain the information may exist. Ultimately, the privilege cloaking communications between a bankrupt and his solicitor constitutes a personal and fundamental right over which a trustee in bankruptcy has no authority and may only be displaced in the most exceptional circumstances.

[71] In the end, the relief sought by the Trustee would involve a significant relaxation of the rules of solicitor-client privilege. Given the somewhat common circumstances of this bankruptcy, in order to permit the Trustee to waive Bre-X's privilege, this Court would necessarily have to recognize a wide range of circumstances in which trustees in bankruptcy were entitled to waive bankrupts' solicitor-client privilege. I am not prepared to permit, nor has the Trustee advanced any reasonable basis for, such a massive erosion of solicitor-client privilege.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE
MR. JUSTICE LoVECCHIO DISSENTING IN PART

[73] I have had the benefit of reading the reasons of my colleague, Madam Justice Conrad. Although I agree with her conclusion, my road to that conclusion follows a slightly different path.

BACKGROUND:

[74] While the Bre-X story has been the subject matter of several books and lawsuits, the background facts for the application heard by the Chambers Judge are relatively simple. Prior to November 7, 1997, Bre-X retained Bennett Jones Verchere as corporate and securities counsel. Pursuant to this retainer, Bennett Jones Verchere provided advice and information to Bre-X. As a result of this solicitor-client relationship, some of these communications became privileged.

[76] Bennett Jones Verchere argues that the professional advice and opinions are subject to solicitor-client privilege, and are not compellable. The trustee filed a Notice of Motion, seeking a declaration that it has the right to all files, documents, and records of Bennett Jones Verchere concerning the assets and affairs of Bre-X and that it has the right to waive Bre-X's solicitor-client privilege.

[77] On November 23, 1998, the Chambers Judge ordered that Bennett Jones Verchere are compellable witnesses together with their non-privileged files, documents, and records respecting the assets, business affairs, and transactions of Bre-X. Further, the Chambers Judge ordered that the Trustee did not have the right or power to waive the solicitor-client privilege of Bre-X.

[78] The Notice of Motion for Leave to Appeal only mentioned the order of the Chambers Judge with respect to waiver of solicitor-client privilege. While no mention is made in the Notice of Motion for Leave to Appeal respecting the denial by the Chambers Judge of the Trustees request for the production of privileged documents, in my view, a consideration of that decision is a necessary part of the analysis of this appeal.

ISSUES:

[79] The issues in this appeal are as follows:

1. Does a trustee have the right to obtain from the bankrupt's solicitor possession of all of the files, documents, and records respecting the assets, business affairs, and transactions of the bankrupt, including those that are subject to solicitor-client privilege?
2. Does a trustee have the inherent power or right to waive the solicitor-client privilege of the bankrupt?
3. If the trustee does not have the inherent power or right to waive the bankrupt's privilege, should the court exercise its overriding jurisdiction and grant this right or power to the trustee?

DECISION ISSUE 1:

[80] For the reasons outlined below, Bennett Jones Verchere may not object to the transfer of their entire files, documents, and records of Bre-X respecting the assets, business affairs, and transactions of Bre-X to the trustee, including those that are subject to solicitor-client privilege. However, in view of my decision respecting Issues 2 and 3, proper safeguards would have to be established respecting the transfer of possession to the trustee of materials on the Bre-X file that are privileged.

ANALYSIS:

[81] In the administration of the bankrupt's estate, the trustee is given very wide powers. The sections of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[1] that are relevant to this appeal are as follows:

> 16(3) The trustee shall, as soon as possible, take possession of the deeds, books, records and documents and all property of the bankrupt...
> 163(1) The trustee, on ordinary resolution passed by the creditors or on the written request or resolution of a majority of the inspectors, may, without an order, examine under oath before the registrar of the court or other authorized person, the bankrupt, any person reasonably thought to have knowledge of the affairs of the bankrupt or any person who is or has been an agent, clerk, servant, officer, director or employee of the bankrupt, respecting the bankrupt, his dealings or property and may order any person liable to be so examined to produce any books, documents, correspondence or papers in his possession or power relating in all or in part to the bankrupt, his dealings or property.

164(1) Where a person has, or is believed or suspected to have, in his possession or power any of the property of the bankrupt, or any book, document or paper of any kind relating in whole or in part to the bankrupt, his dealings or property, or showing that he is indebted to the bankrupt, he may be required by the trustee to produce the book, document or paper for the information of the trustee, or to deliver to him any property of the bankrupt in his possession.

167 Any person being examined is bound to answer all questions relating to the business or property or the bankrupt, to the causes of his bankruptcy and the disposition of his property.

[82] These sections quite clearly allow for the examination of a solicitor. A solicitor may be compelled to disclose all information relating to the transactions of the bankrupt and the location of the bankrupt's property. Further, these sections allow for the trustee to obtain possession of all of the property of the bankrupt.

[83] However, there is an omission in these sections: no reference is made to the delivery of privileged communications. This omission raises a question. Does the omission mean that privileged documents need not be delivered to the trustee? That is clearly the effect of the ruling of the Chambers Judge.

[84] With respect to the examinations of solicitors, Holden & Morawetz in Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law in Canada[2] note:

> In the examination, the solicitor can be compelled to disclose all information regarding the bankrupt's affairs, transactions, whereabouts of his property, etc., which do not require the disclosure of communications made to the solicitor for the purpose of receiving legal advice or assistance[3]

Such an examination is limited to the goal of assisting the trustee in the administration of the estate by realizing property of the bankrupt and distributing the proceeds of this property to the bankrupt's creditors.[4] However, privileged communications are subject to solicitor-client privilege, and unless this privilege is waived by the bankrupt, this information may not be disclosed. This is a reference to communications. Such communications could be oral or written and in the case of written, the analysis is more complicated. It is axiomatic that a solicitor would have on their client's file a copy of any written opinions or advice given to a client.

[85] Under s. 164 of the BIA, the solicitor may be compelled to provide the trustee with all "property" of the bankrupt and documents relating to the bankrupt's property. I believe it is settled law that a solicitor's file is really the property of the client and the definition of property in the BIA is so broad, it must be seen as encompassing the solicitor's file.

[86] As a result, a potential problem exists if a solicitor could be compelled to deliver privileged communications (by this I mean the file copy of written communications which by any test are privileged) to the trustee and the trustee did not have the power to waive the privilege associated with the document just received. The problem is ensuring the confidentiality of the privileged communications when the documents are in the hands of the trustee, particularly when one concludes (as the Chambers Judge did and as will be noted below, I do) that the trustee does not have the power to waive the privilege. The Chambers Judge sidestepped the problem by only ordering the delivery to the trustee of the non-privileged materials.

> 311(1) The trustee shall take possession of all books, papers and other records which relate to the bankrupt's estate or affairs and which belong to him or are in his possession or under his control (including any which would be privileged from disclosure in any proceedings).[5]

[88] This legislation highlights that we are really dealing with two different issues: the trustee obtaining physical possession of the file and waiver. I do not accept that merely because the trustee may obtain possession of the solicitors file, this alone would give the trustee the power to waive the privilege. That is a different issue. I also note that the obtaining of possession relates only to materials of the bankrupt and would not extend to materials associated with advice given solely to the directors or officers of Bre-X as opposed to the company itself.

[89] In addition, even though the trustee is entitled to possession of these privileged documents, their use would be limited to the affairs and property of the bankrupt.[6] The trustee must not use these documents to aid third parties in any action against Bre-X or any other party.

[90] Put simply, the focus of the trustee in examining the solicitor's files, privileged and non-privileged, must be the property and affairs of the bankrupt. Further, the trustee, as an officer of the court, must strictly ensure the sanctity of the solicitor-client privilege of Bre-X. In other words, the trustee must not disclose the contents of these privileged communications to any third party. The trustee must take the greatest of care in its use of these important documents.

[91] Given my decision below, rather than not order the production of the privileged, I would have ordered the delivery of all materials, both privileged and non-privileged, as they are property of the bankrupt. However, I would have ordered that Bennett Jones Verchere separate the privileged materials from the non-privileged materials and deliver these privileged materials separately and I would have ordered them sealed.

DECISION ISSUE 2:

[92] For the reasons that follow, a trustee does not have the inherent right or power to waive the solicitor-client privilege of a bankrupt.

ANALYSIS:

[93] This appeal deals solely with the question of whether the trustee has the power to waive the solicitor-client privilege of the bankrupt. Consequently, questions of whether a trustee should or would exercise such a power are not relevant to this appeal. That is a decision the trustee would make were the Court to find that the trustee was entitled to make such a decision.

[94] The starting point for this analysis includes an examination of the bankrupt and its status and capacity. Notwithstanding its status as a bankrupt, it is clear that Bre-X continues to exist as a corporate entity. Stated another way, although all of the assets of Bre-X passed to the trustee through operation of the BIA, this does not destroy the corporate entity or totally restrict its ability to function as a corporation.[7]

[95] As Bre-X continues to exist as a corporation, it continues to possess the power to waive its solicitor-client privilege.[8] Bre-X has not waived the privilege because of its particular situation. Bre-X, like most bankrupts, has no officers or directors at present. Because of this fact, Bre-X has no present corporate means to authorize such a waiver. This obstacle could be removed by holding a shareholders' meeting and electing directors. I recognize for practical purposes that it is unlikely this would be done.

[96] As a result of this situation, the trustee wishes to waive the solicitor-client privilege of Bre-X.

[97] Subject to the third issue, the only basis upon which a trustee could claim the right or power to waive the bankrupt's solicitor-client privilege would be statutory. This may explicitly appear in the BIA. Alternatively, the trustee may obtain this privilege, and therefore the right to waive it, under s. 71(2) of the BIA.

a. Explicit Provision

[98] It may be argued by the trustee that the fact alone that it will receive possession of privileged documents from the solicitor through the operation of s. 164 is sufficient to waive privilege. However, for the reasons that follow, this argument must fail.

[99] The trustee may come into possession of privileged documents through the operation of the BIA, as discussed in detail above. This mandated possession alone is not sufficient to allow the trustee to waive the privilege of the bankrupt. An analogous situation occurs in the context of medical reports:

> So where a statute requires disclosure, e.g., of a report, no voluntariness is said to be present and no implied waiver occurs. For example, where a medical report is disclosed pursuant to the Ontario Evidence Act, the attendant communications (e.g., surveillance films used to produce the report) remain privileged as there has been voluntariness in the disclosure of the report and no implied waiver of the attendant materials.[9]

Similarly, under the BIA, the transfer of possession of some privileged communications of the bankrupt and third persons, such as the solicitor, may be compelled. Such a transfer is likewise involuntary and therefore, cannot constitute waiver of the solicitor-client privilege.

[100] The BIA is silent on the ability of the trustee to waive the solicitor-client privilege of the bankrupt. There is nothing in the BIA which gives the trustee the right or power to waive this privilege. The issue is simply not addressed in the BIA.

[101] The rules of statutory interpretation shed light upon this omission in the BIA. The doctrine of "implied exclusion" or expressio unius est exclusio alterius provides:

> An implied exclusion argument lies whenever there is a reason to believe that if the legislature had meant to include a particular thing within the ambit of its legislation, it would have referred to that thing expressly. Because of this expectation, the legislature's failure to mention the thing becomes grounds for inferring that it was deliberately excluded. Although there was no express exclusion, exclusion is implied. The force of the implication depends on the strength and legitimacy of the expectation of express reference. The better the reason for anticipating express reference to a thing, the more telling the silence of the legislature.[10]

This rule of statutory interpretation has been applied by the Supreme Court of Canada in Canada (Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act)* v. *Newfoundland Telephone Co..[11]

[102] If Parliament had meant to exclude solicitor-client privilege, it would have referred to this expressly. The fact that privilege is not mentioned in the BIA leads to the implication that this omission was deliberate. Therefore, it is reasonable to conclude that Parliament intended that the ability to waive solicitor-client privilege remain with the bankrupt under the BIA.

b. Section 71(2)

> 71(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

[104] Section 71(2) provides that the "property" of Bre-X vested in the trustee upon bankruptcy. If solicitor-client privilege constitutes "property" under the BIA, then the trustee is vested with this privilege and consequently, has the power to waive it.

> 2(1) "property" includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property;

[106] Prima facie, the "property" that vests in the trustee includes almost "every conceivable type of asset."[12] Some property is then excluded from sale and division among the creditors.[13] For example, s. 67(1) of the BIA excludes property held in trust for another person or property that is exempt according to provincial legislation.

[107] In Gano* v. *Alberta Motor Association Insurance Co., Master Funduk notes that there is a third category of property that is not available for distribution: matters very personal to the bankrupt.[14] These "personal rights" are not "property" under the BIA, based upon the purpose of the BIA:

> Husky Oil Operations Ltd.* v. *Minister of National Revenue et al., 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453; 188 N.R. 1; 137 Sask. R. 81; 107 W.A.C. 81, says that there are two fundamental purposes underlying the B.I.A. One is to ensure the equitable distribution of a bankrupt's assets among his creditors and the second is the financial rehabilitation of the bankrupt. Given those purposes it becomes quickly apparent that certain "things in action" simply do not fit into the objectives of the B.I.A. even though in law they are "things in action". For example, a bankrupt has a cause of action for divorce. It would be stupid to suggest that that cause of action is "property" of the bankrupt available for distribution among his creditors. A bankrupt has a cause of action for voiding his marriage because his wife was still married to someone else at the time of the marriage to the bankrupt. A bankrupt has a cause of action for custody of his children. None of these would be "things in action" within the scope of the B.I.A. They are all matters very personal to the bankrupt.[15]

[108] Various other authorities reveal that such "personal rights" are not "property" under the BIA. In Neufeld (Bankrupt), Re, the Court concluded that tax refunds received by the bankrupt for the support of a disabled person are not the "property" of the bankrupt and therefore, do not vest in the trustee.[16] A right of action for injury to character and reputation remains vested in the bankrupt.[17] Punitive damages are not "property" of the bankrupt.[18] All of these relate to matters very personal to the bankrupt and as such, are not included as "property" under the BIA.

[109] The right of privileged communications with a solicitor must be equally personal. In fact, one author noted that "I can think of nothing more attached to the person and nothing less pecuniary, than a communication to a person bound by professional secrecy".[19]

[110] There is ample case authority to support this proposition that the solicitor-client privilege constitutes a "personal right".[20] The Supreme Court of Canada noted that:

> There is no denying that a person has a right to communicate with a legal adviser in all confidence, a right that it "founded upon the unique relationship of solicitor and client" (Solosky, supra). It is a personal and extra-patrimonial right which follows a citizen throughout his dealings with others.[21]

[111] In my view, matters that are very personal in nature are not included within the definition of "property" in the BIA. This conclusion is based upon the fundamental purpose of the BIA, as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Husky Oil Operations Ltd.* v. *Minister of National Revenue et al.. Further, the right of solicitor-client privilege has been affirmed by the Supreme Court and other authorities as a "personal" right. As a result, one must conclude that the solicitor-client privilege is a personal right and as such, is not "property" that vests in the trustee. The solicitor-client privilege remains with the bankrupt. Therefore, the trustee has no power to waive the solicitor-client privilege.

Digitized by Google

[112] Many authorities support this result.[22] Further, Laprairie Shopping Centre Ltd., Re[23] and Stikeman, Elliott* c. *164461 Canada Inc. (syndic)[24] support the above analysis. However, because of their roots in the civil law, these two cases should be viewed with caution in this common law jurisdiction.

DECISION ISSUE 3:

[113] The Court should not exercise its overriding jurisdiction and grant the right or power in the circumstances of this case.

ANALYSIS:

[114] Although the trustee has no right to waive the bankrupt's privilege, the court may, in appropriate circumstances, apply its inherent jurisdiction to grant this right to the trustee.

[115] In a recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Court reinforced the importance of solicitor-client privilege:

> Solicitor-client privilege describes the privilege that exists between a client and his or her lawyer. This privilege is fundamental to the justice system in Canada. The law is a complex web of interests, relationships and rules. The integrity of the administration of justice depends upon the unique role of the solicitor who provides legal advice to clients within this complex system. At the heart of this privilege lies the concept that people must be able to speak candidly with their lawyers and so enable their interest to be fully represented.[25]

[116] As noted by Madam Justice Conrad in her reasons for judgment, solicitor-client privilege "protects the sanctity of the confidence between client and lawyer." Without such privilege, there could not be effective representation of clients by counsel. The Supreme Court of Canada in Solosky* v. *The Queen has gone so far as to classify solicitor-client privilege as a "fundamental civil and legal right".[26]

[117] Given the sanctity of solicitor-client privilege, it will not be disregarded lightly. Very few interests will prove important enough to override solicitor-client privilege. The Supreme Court in R.* v. *McClure has recently further narrowed the exceptions to solicitor-client privilege. The Court noted that "solicitor-client privilege must be as close to absolute as possible to ensure public confidence and retain relevance. As such, it will only yield in certain clearly defined circumstances and does not involve a balancing of interest on a case-by-case basis."[27] Unless there are extremely pressing considerations, solicitor-client privilege will not be ignored.

[118] No reason exists for making an exception in this action as no evidence was presented on the basis of which any of the exceptions set out in R.* v. *McClure could be applied.

Conclusion

[119] As the trustee has not appealed the part of the Order which in effect declined to order the delivery of the privileged documents to the trustee, even on my analysis, the appeal should be dismissed and the order of the Chambers Judge confirmed.

Appeal Heard: January 17, 1996
Judgment Delivered: February 5, 1996
THE COURT: Appeal dismissed other than requiring that the solicitor and client costs awarded to the trustee be taxed per reasons for judgment of Hallett, J.A.; Jones and Roscoe, JJ.A. concurring.
HALLETT, J.A.:

This is an appeal by Montreal Trust Company of Canada from a decision of Justice Michael MacDonald dismissing Montreal Trust's application under s. 37 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 for an order that a right of action of Dr. Hoque, the bankrupt, against his secured creditors remained in his estate in bankruptcy and had not been transferred to him by Coopers & Lybrand Limited, the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Dr. Hoque. Alternatively, Montreal Trust sought an order that if the right of action had been transferred that the conveyance and assignment ought to be declared null and void and of no force and effect.

Section 37 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act provides:

> "Where the bankrupt or any of the creditors or any other person is aggrieved by any act or decision of the trustee, he may apply to the court, and the court may confirm, reverse or modify the act or decision complained of and make such order in the premises as it thinks just."

In short, Montreal Trust asserts that the trustee acted unreasonably by failing to offer to Montreal Trust an opportunity to either settle the claim Dr. Hoque proposed to make against Montreal Trust or offer to assign the cause of action to Montreal Trust for a price.

The facts disclose that the trustee agreed to assign the cause of action to Dr. Hoque without considering that Montreal Trust might have been a potential purchaser. Montreal Trust asserts that the trustee accordingly failed to perform the duties required of a trustee to realize on the assets in a way that would be most beneficial to the general body of creditors. Justice MacDonald found that the trustee, with the approval of the inspectors, acted reasonably in disposing of the cause of action by agreeing to transfer it to Dr. Hoque for valuable consideration.

There were several issues raised on the application to Justice MacDonald but this appeal has been narrowed to one issue and that is whether the trustee acted reasonably in failing to contact Montreal Trust as a potential purchaser of the cause of action.

The Facts

Dr. Hoque had very substantial real estate holdings. A number of buildings owned by his companies were mortgaged to Montreal Trust. Through one of his companies he became involved in the development of a condominium project which caused a considerable drain on his cash resources. There were problems with the construction and the condominiums were not selling due to a general down turn in the economy and in the real estate market in particular. Dr. Hoque had been a guarantor of loans made by Montreal Trust to his various companies. The mortgages went in arrears. Over a period of time Dr. Hoque attempted to refinance properties but eventually all avenues of refinancing seemed to be closed and in early 1993 he made an assignment in bankruptcy. Montreal Trust commenced foreclosure proceedings.

It is clear from the extensive affidavit evidence that was filed before Justice MacDonald that by November 1993 the trustee was preparing his formal Report to the Registrar in Bankruptcy in connection with Dr. Hoque's application for discharge. The trustee, with the approval of the inspectors, was recommending to the Registrar of Bankruptcy that Dr. Hoque only be discharged on the condition that, if he were to be successful in his lawsuits, particularly the one contemplated against Montreal Trust, he would be required to pay the lesser of 20% of his net recovery or $200,000 to the trustee for the benefit of the creditors. Dr. Hoque supported this recommendation. It is clear from the evidence that earlier in the year the trustee and the inspectors had given consideration to either defending the foreclosure proceedings that had been commenced by Montreal Trust or commencing a separate proceeding against Montreal Trust based on the allegations made by Dr. Hoque that Montreal Trust's manner of dealing with his mortgages was the cause of the collapse of his real estate ventures. The trustee and inspectors had taken advice from counsel; he advised them that the costs of pursuing the matter would be in the order of $200,000 to $250,000. There were no funds in the estate. None of the major creditors were prepared to fund the lawsuit and the decision was made that the best way to recover anything for the creditors would be to assign the causes of action to Dr. Hoque and to make the recommendation that was eventually made by the trustee to the Registrar.

On November 9th, 1993, the Registrar in Bankruptcy heard the application for discharge. It was opposed by Montreal Trust on the ground that there were missing funds which the police were investigating and, accordingly, Dr. Hoque should not be discharged. Alternatively, if he were to be discharged, Montreal Trust took the position that it should be conditional upon his being required to pay the lesser of 60% of recovery on potential lawsuits or $600,000.

Digitized by Google

The Registrar in Bankruptcy did not agree with the recommendation of either the trustee or Montreal Trust. He ordered that Dr. Hoque would be granted an absolute discharge provided he consented to judgment in the amount of $68,000 which was to be paid over a period of five years. Dr. Hoque agreed and on December 15, 1993, an absolute order of discharge was signed by the Registrar.

On March 29th, 1994, Mr. Bruce Clarke, the solicitor acting for Dr. Hoque with respect to the dealings with the trustee, wrote the trustee advising that if the trustee transferred the causes of action to Dr. Hoque be would agree to pay out the consent judgment as soon as he received funds from the litigation. Subsequent to this the trustee contacted the inspectors who authorized the trustee to agree to the assignment to Dr. Hoque. As a result the trustee requested from Mr. Clarke that he be provided with a letter signed by Dr. Hoque confirming his agreement that if he received funds from the litigation he would pay out the consent judgment prior to the expiry of the five year period.

In September of 1994, another solicitor acting for Dr. Hoque commenced an action on his behalf against Montreal Trust. Dr. Hoque had not provided the requested letter to the trustee and, accordingly, the formal assignment of the causes of action had not been executed.

On or about December 20th, 1994, Mr. Clarke advised the trustee that Dr. Hoque intended to bring an application under s. 172(3) of the Act for a modification of the discharge Order.

On February 9th, 1995, the trustee was asked by counsel for Montreal Trust to advise them of the status of the purported transfer to Dr. Hoque of the causes of action. The trustee advised counsel for Montreal Trust that, although a resolution had been passed authorizing the assignment to Dr. Hoque, the assignment documents had not been executed.

On March 1st, 1995, counsel for Montreal Trust requested the trustee to revoke what counsel referred to as the offer to assign the causes of action to Dr. Hoque. The letter also advised the trustee that Montreal Trust was prepared to pay an amount (to be negotiated) for any rights of action which were vested in the estate.

The trustee and the inspectors met and discussed the contents of this letter with the solicitor for the bankrupt estate. The solicitor was instructed to write Montreal Trust advising that the estate did not wish to become embroiled in a dispute between Montreal Trust and Dr. Hoque.

On March 7th Montreal Trust applied to the Registrar in Bankruptcy for an order declaring that the assignment and conveyance from the trustee to Dr. Hoque of certain causes of action was of no force and effect and requested that Dr. Hoque's application for variation of the order for discharge be moved to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. The Registrar refused to transfer the matter to the Supreme Court.

On March 8th the trustee received the letter from Dr. Hoque confirming his agreement with respect to the immediate payment of the net proceeds from the lawsuit.

On March 21st, Justice Bateman, then of the Supreme Court, refused Montreal Trust's application to determine the status and ownership of the causes of action and refused to grant an order that the variation hearing with respect to the earlier discharge Order be heard in the Supreme Court and refused to stay the application before the Registrar for a variation. The application by Dr. Hoque to vary the terms of the discharge Order was heard by the Registrar. Montreal Trust and the trustee successfully opposed the variation.

Montreal Trust continued to pursue its application in the Supreme Court to determine the status and ownership of the causes of action and the matter was set down for hearing.

On July 12th, 1995, Justice MacDonald heard the application. Extensive affidavit evidence was filed, in particular, the affidavits of the trustee representative, Mr. Mark Rosen, who was the chartered accountant administering the estate; the affidavits of counsel and associate counsel for Montreal Trust which set out relevant facts that were not in dispute; the affidavit of Dr. Hoque and the affidavit of Herb A. MacIntosh setting out that as of July 5th, 1995, Montreal Trust was owed $3,905,126 as a creditor of the estate in bankruptcy of Dr. Hoque. Viva voce evidence of Mr. Rosen and Dr. Hoque was heard by Justice MacDonald.

The Decision Appealed From

Justice MacDonald directed his mind to the issue raised by Montreal Trust that the trustee breached its duty to the creditors of the bankrupt estate by failing to contact Montreal Trust with respect to either settling the potential lawsuit or paying for an assignment of it before agreeing to assign the cause of action to Dr. Hoque. On the application, counsel for Montreal Trust argued that it was unreasonable for the trustee to have so acted. Justice MacDonald concluded that the decision of the trustee (with the approval of the inspectors) to assign the cause of action to Dr. Hoque was a legitimate business decision; that the trustee and the inspectors acted reasonably and that the sale was not contrary to the interests of the creditors generally. He dismissed the application and ordered that Montreal Trust pay to Dr. Hoque party and party costs which he fixed in the amount of $1,500 plus disbursements of $294.05 and that Montreal Trust pay the trustee's solicitor/client costs of $3,400 plus disbursements of $38. He did not agree that Montreal Trust should pay the trustee's fees of $3,043.08 but directed that they be paid from the estate.

The Position of the Appellant on the Appeal

On this appeal Montreal Trust asserts that Justice MacDonald erred in finding that the trustee had acted reasonably in the disposition of the cause of action to Dr. Hoque and erred in law when he found that the disposition was not contrary to the interests of the creditors generally. The notice of appeal further asserts that Justice MacDonald erred by failing to order that the trustee liquidate the cause of action and consider Montreal Trust as a potential purchaser when liquidating that asset. It is further asserted in the notice of appeal that Justice MacDonald erred in mixed law and fact in finding that the trustee and/or the inspectors took into account business considerations in reaching their decision when the evidence disclosed that the cause of action was not offered to Montreal Trust because the trustee found such a proposition to be morally repugnant. Finally and alternatively, the notice of appeal asserts that Justice MacDonald erred in law in finding that the principles set out in Re Katz (1991), 6 C.B.R. (2d) 311 (Ont. Ct. Gen. Div.) do not apply to the circumstances of the case.

Montreal Trust requests that the judgment of MacDonald J. be reversed and that this Court find that the causes of action which lay against the secured creditors of Dr. Hoque remain vested in Dr. Hoque's estate in bankruptcy and that the trustee conduct a sale of the cause of action against Montreal Trust and that each of Dr. Hoque and Montreal Trust shall be entitled to purchase the asset from the estate and further that the trustee have its costs paid out of the estate and Montreal Trust have its costs against Dr. Hoque.

Montreal Trust also appeals the manner in which Justice MacDonald decided the cost issues asserting that he erred in law in ordering Montreal Trust to pay the costs of the estate's solicitor on a solicitor/client basis and erred in law in awarding a fixed sum for solicitor/client costs rather than requiring the taxation of the account. Montreal Trust requests that this aspect of the judgment be reversed and that the Court order that the cost of the estate solicitor be paid out of the estate or, alternatively, that Montreal Trust pay the costs of the estate solicitor on a party and party basis in an amount to be fixed by taxation or otherwise agreed to by the parties.

In summary, counsel for Montreal Trust argues that the trustee ought to have realized that Montreal Trust might be interested in either settling the potential action or be prepared to pay for an assignment of it simply to avoid the cost of having to defend and, therefore, the trustee did not give careful consideration to the disposition of the cause of action. With respect to the award of costs, counsel argues that there was no basis for Justice MacDonald departing from the general principle that party and party costs be awarded as Montreal Trust had raised a legitimate issue that needed to be resolved.

The Position of the Respondent Trustee

Counsel for the trustee argues that Justice MacDonald gave careful consideration to the evidence and the law in finding that the trustee acted reasonably in disposing of the cause of action. Counsel asserts it was a legitimate business decision and considering all the circumstances there was no reason for the trustee to believe that Montreal Trust might be interested in paying for an assignment of the cause of action not having exhibited any interest in doing so until March 1st, 1995. He asserts that this Court should not interfere with the findings of the trial judge (Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", 1975 CanLII 146 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802). He also asserts that costs are in the discretion of the trial court and the exercise of that discretion should be left alone by an appeal court.

The Position of Dr. Hoque

On behalf of Dr. Hoque it is argued that this was a reasonable business decision and that the law dictates that a court, reviewing a decision made by a trustee in bankruptcy with the approval of the inspectors, should show deference to the business acumen of the trustees and the inspectors who are familiar with the practicalities of administering the bankrupt estate.

Disposition of the Appeal

As early as January 1993 Montreal Trust, as a result of having received correspondence from Dr. Hoque's Toronto solicitor, was well aware of the potential lawsuit against it by Dr. Hoque.

It is clear from the evidence that the trustee did not think of Montreal Trust as a potential purchaser of the lawsuit when, later in 1993, the trustee worked out the agreement with Dr. Hoque whereby the latter would obtain an assignment of the cause of action and would support the trustee's recommendation to the Registrar that he be discharged from bankruptcy on the condition that 20% of the proceeds of the litigation or $200,000, whichever was the lesser, would, if recovered by Dr. Hoque, be paid to the trustee.

There is no evidence that, at the time the decision was made to make a deal with Dr. Hoque, the trustee was influenced by his subsequently stated opinion that the sale of lawsuits to defendants was morally repugnant.

As noted in the recitation of the facts, Montreal Trust opposed the discharge but, as an alternate position, supported the concept that Dr. Hoque would be able to proceed with any potential lawsuits provided he pay 60% of any net recovery or $600,000 whichever was the lesser, to the trustee. Montreal Trust did not indicate any interest in acquiring the lawsuit at that time yet it was well aware of the intention of the trustee to assign the cause of action to Dr. Hoque.

The decision of the Registrar in Bankruptcy in December of 1993 impacted on the agreement between the trustee and Dr. Hoque. In March 1994 Dr. Hoque's solicitor wrote the trustee putting forward a proposition for earlier payment of the $68,000 provided the lawsuits were assigned to Dr. Hoque. This offer was eventually accepted by the trustee, with the authorization of the inspectors, in the latter part of the summer of 1994. After that, there only remained a matter of formalizing the agreement which required that Dr. Hoque provide the letter requested, evidencing his obligation, and upon receipt of that letter the trustee would execute the formal assignment. The trustee had not imposed a deadline on Dr. Hoque for delivery of the requested letter. It was not until the letter of March 1st, 1995, that Montreal Trust indicated any interest in purchasing the cause of action. When asked by Montreal Trust in this letter to revoke the offer to Dr. Hoque, an agreement had already been made, and the trustee was in no position to resile from that agreement. It must be remembered that Dr. Hoque supported the trustee's recommendation on the discharge hearing on the understanding the cause of action against Montreal Trust would be assigned to him. And that in 1993 the trustee had made a decision, in consultation with the inspectors and the solicitor, not to pursue the cause of action against Montreal Trust but to assign it to Dr. Hoque. While it is correct that once Dr. Hoque consented to the judgment in the amount of $68,000 the subsequently agreed upon consideration for the assignment (the possible acceleration of payment of the judgment) was not substantial. However, Dr. Hoque would not likely have consented to the judgment had he not the reasonable expectation that the trustee would assign the cause of action.

One must look at all of the foregoing in assessing the reasonableness or lack of the same of the decision of the trustee to conclude an agreement with Dr. Hoque in the summer of 1994.

There seemed to be an issue before Justice MacDonald as to whether the duties of a trustee in bankruptcy were as set out in Katz (supra) or those set out in Re Keppock Developments Limited reflex, (1992), 15 C.B.R. (3d) 228 (N.S.S.C.). It is my opinion this ought to have been a non-issue. The tests to be applied by a court reviewing the decision of a trustee appointed under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or a receiver appointed by the court respecting the sale of an asset are substantially the same. Both a trustee under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and a receiver appointed by the court must act in a reasonable and competent manner in the performance of their duties to the creditors. A difference between a trustee acting under the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and a receiver appointed pursuant to a court Order, is that the trustee is governed by the Act and the receiver by the common law and the terms of the court Order. In addition, the trustee has the benefit of a group of experienced creditors' representatives acting as inspectors who can bring their experience to bear on proposed dispositions of assets by the trustee. These differences do not alter the requirement that both trustees and receivers respectively act with integrity in a competent and reasonable manner.

When it comes to making business decisions relating to the sale of the bankrupt's assets, a trustee, with the authorization of the inspectors, must exercise reasonable business judgment. The trustee must provide advice to the inspectors equivalent to the advice one would expect from a reasonably competent trustee in the circumstances. Both the trustee and the inspectors are entitled to rely on legal advice from counsel for the estate. And, of course, a trustee must act with honesty and integrity. Finally, the courts should show deference to business decisions made by those entrusted by the creditors and authorized by the Act to make such decisions.

I agree with counsel for Montreal Trust that it had no obligation to indicate to the trustee it was interested in either paying a sum of money to acquire the causes of action or settling it. However, the fact that Montreal Trust was well aware of the intent of Dr. Hoque to commence action against it, yet it never exhibited any interest in acquiring the cause of action until March 1st, 1995, is a relevant consideration in reviewing the reasonableness of the trustee's action in failing to offer the cause of action to Montreal Trust prior to concluding that it would be in the best interest of the creditors to assign the cause of action to Dr. Hoque and hopefully derive a benefit for the estate if he were to succeed in his potential action. Absent evidence that it is common place for the trustees to peddle potential lawsuits that a bankrupt may have to the defendants in those potential lawsuits, it is difficult to conclude that the failure of the trustee to consider Montreal Trust as a potential purchaser of the asset (particularly where the trustee considered it to be of nebulous value and Montreal Trust had shown no interest) was a failure to act reasonably in the circumstances.

It cannot be disputed that a defendant might be prepared to pay a sum of money to avoid even a lawsuit that the defendant is satisfied is without merit simply to save the costs of defending which would not likely be recovered from a discharged bankrupt if the trustee transferred the cause of action to the bankrupt or caused the right of action to be returned to the bankrupt as an unrealized asset. This would be particularly so where the costs of defending would be high.

The lawsuit which Dr. Hoque commenced against Montreal Trust in September of 1994, which blames Montreal Trust for the collapse of his real estate ventures is complex and will be expensive to defend. That trustees do sell lawsuits to the defendants in those suits is clear from Re Katz (supra). How prevalent this somewhat unseemly method of realizing on an asset of nebulous value is not disclosed in the evidence. Although a bare assignment of a right of action was at one time illegal, an assignment of a bare right of action by a trustee in bankruptcy was not (Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 9, (4th) at para. 401).

An advertisement by a trustee, for either a public auction or a call for the submission of tenders to purchase a potential claim against one of the bankrupt's creditors, while lawful, would be unusual in the absence of a situation such as confronted the trustee in Re Katz (supra) where the trustee had an expression of interest from more than one party. The nature of the asset does not lend itself to these traditional methods of realization by a trustee. The issue, however, is whether the trustee ought to have invited a bid from Montreal Trust. Even in hindsight it is not known whether Montreal Trust would have been prepared to pay anything for the lawsuit had an offer been made to Montreal Trust in 1993 or 1994.

Mr. Rosen did not think of this method of disposing of this so-called asset; apparently it did not occur to him that he could more or less intimidate Montreal Trust into paying a substantial sum for what the trustee considered to be a lawsuit of questionable value. Had Montreal Trust ever indicated an interest before the agreement was made with Dr. Hoque, the trustee would have been in a very different situation.

I agree with the comments of Mcfarlane J. in Re Groves-Raffin Construction Ltd. (No. 2), reflex, [1978] 4 W.W.R. 451, 28 C.B.R. (N.S.) 104 (B.C. S.C.) where he stated at (C.B.R.) 112:

> "In considering the conduct of a trustee it is well to keep in mind that the scheme of the Act is to allow the trustee to administer the estate under the supervision of the inspectors without interference unless there has been an excess of power, fraud, a lack of bona fides, or unless the actions of the trustee and the inspectors are unreasonable from the standpoint of the good of the estate."

Justice MacDonald had before him all the affidavit evidence that is before us. In addition, he heard the viva voce testimony of the trustee and Dr. Hoque. Justice MacDonald clearly understood the issue and made a judgment call that the trustee, in the circumstances, acted reasonably and in the interest of the creditors generally, despite the trustee having failed to consider a sale of the cause of action to Montreal Trust.

The trial judge did not apply an incorrect test in assessing the conduct of the trustee and his decision is justified on the evidence. I would not interfere with his finding. In fact, I agree with his conclusion. (Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K" (supra)).

I would make one further point, although it was not raised in argument. Having made an agreement with Dr. Hoque to assign the cause of action to him, the trustee's hands were tied when he received the March 1st, 1995, letter from counsel for Montreal Trust. A Court would be hard pressed to conclude that it ought to set aside the agreement made with Dr. Hoque on the ground that the trustee ought to have also offered to sell the lawsuit to Montreal Trust. Dr. Hoque was entitled to insist on the agreement being completed by the exchange of the documents contemplated. Section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, while it gives the Court broad power to confirm, reverse or modify a decision complained of and make such order as it thinks just, ought not to lightly set aside an agreement that the other party (in this case Dr. Hoque) was entitled to have performed. The only ground asserted in requesting this Court to declare the agreements null and void is that the trustee ought to have disposed of the asset in a different manner. While s. 37 of the Act gives the Supreme Court in Bankruptcy power to set aside the trustee's decision, it would only be in exceptional circumstances that the Court would set aside a valid and enforceable agreement. There is no evidence of what amount Montreal Trust was prepared to pay for the assignment of the cause of action. To set aside an agreement made by the trustee in good faith would, in the eyes of those persons acquiring assets from time to time from trustees, impinge on the integrity of the bankruptcy process.

In an article entitled "Sale of Assets by a Trustee; The Fundamental Pragmatics" by Al Lando, C.A., Senior Vice-President of Price Waterhouse Limited, Toronto published in (1991), C.B.R. (3d) 179, the author draws a distinction between what might be a sharp but acceptable practice by businessmen to enhance their "bottom line" with the standard of conduct expected of a trustee in bankruptcy in realizing on assets of the bankrupt. The author states at p. 181:

> "The trustee in bankruptcy, however, is governed by standards that go beyond those which determine the business behaviour of the entrepreneur. As an officer of the Court, the trustee must always be concerned about the integrity of the insolvency process. There are times when 'reasonable' business principles are not easy to reconcile with the determinants for standards of behaviour that govern an officer of the Court. The businessman is playing in his own game, and must do what is fair and reasonable, no less, but not necessarily more. The stakes are greater for the trustee; his actions are measured against a higher test, a test of not only being right and fair but that of appearing to be right > and fair. The dilemma arises when doing what is right, when conducting an administration from the 'highest moral ground', does not necessarily produce the best commercial result.

> All of that said, the insolvency process (the Bankruptcy Act, the Courts, the office of the superintendent in bankruptcy, members of the Bar who specialize in bankruptcy law, and trustees) manages, for the most part, to satisfy its intended purposes in a practical sense. This paper will talk about basic principles, focusing on the practical considerations that influence the manner in which a trustee wheels and deals with the assets of a bankrupt."

The author then condemns the practice of trustees "wheeling and dealing" in assets to maximize recovery. He concludes his article by stating that there are certain assets that are difficult to deal with but the trustee should be governed by the same fundamental principles that govern the treatment of all assets and principles that will always enhance and never offend the integrity of the process. He concludes stating:

> "What are these principles? Among those described or alluded to are: fairness, equity, good faith, order (as opposed to 'chaos' referred to in the last case cited), honesty, integrity, due care, and sound commercial practice. Of equal importance, the trustee's actions must be perceived to be governed by these standards. That the process functions effectively, is a manifestation of the symbiosis between the practices and procedures as they are articulated in the Act, superintendent directives, and the case law, on the one hand, and their practical application in the business world, on the other hand."

A trustee in bankruptcy has a broader range of duties than simply getting the best possible price at any cost.

In Re Pachal's Beverages Ltd. (1969), 13 C.B.R. (N.S.) 160 the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal had to deal with the provisions of s. 15 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14. That section is essentially the same as the present s. 37 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The Court stated at p. 163:

> "While s. 15 gives to the court a wide discretionary power: Imperial Bank of Canada v. Barber (1921), 50 O.L.R. 380, 1 C.B.R. 485, 59 D.L.R. 523; and Re Hancock; Ex parte Spraggett, [1952] O.R. 121, 32 C.B.R. 96, [1952] 1 D.L.R. 785; that power must be judicially exercised. To obtain relief under this section, the onus rests upon the applicant to show that it has been aggrieved by the decision of the trustee, or has suffered damage or prejudice as a result of the trustee's action: Re Gareau (English and Scotch Woollen Company); Ex parte Joseph Brothers Limited (1922), 3 C.B.R. 76."

The only affidavit filed by Montreal Trust was that of Mr. Macintosh setting out the amount owing to Montreal Trust. There is nothing stated to show that Montreal Trust has been aggrieved by the decision of the trustee to assign the lawsuit to Dr. Hoque other than the argument by counsel that an action has been started and that Montreal Trust will incur costs to defend the action. Possibly it goes without saying that they are aggrieved and to that extent have or will suffer damages.

The decision in Pachal's Beverages (supra) is relevant as it makes clear that the burden of proof is on the applicant to show that the trustee's decision was unreasonable and not on the trustee to show that it was right. In the absence of evidence to prove that, as a general practice, trustees in bankruptcy offer to sell causes of action which the bankrupt may have to the potential defendants in those lawsuits who also happen to be creditors of the bankrupt, it is difficult to conclude that the trustee's conduct in this instance was a failure to meet the acceptable standards for a trustee in realizing on assets of the bankrupt.

In summary, on the principal issue, I would dismiss the appeal on two grounds. The trial judge did not err in concluding on the facts that the trustee acted reasonably, and in the interests of the creditors generally, notwithstanding the failure to ask Montreal Trust if it would like to bid to acquire the lawsuit; and, secondly, it would be unjust in the circumstances to grant the relief sought by Montreal Trust as Dr. Hoque was entitled to have the agreement he made with the trustee finalized; in short, it would not be a judicial exercise of the power given the court by s. 37 of the Act. To grant the relief sought, even if it were concluded that the trustee acted unreasonably, would also offend the integrity of the bankruptcy process.

The Costs Issue

We were advised at the hearing of this appeal that the estate in bankruptcy has no assets. I assume counsel meant no assets other than judgment against Dr. Hoque, the value of which is very dependent on Dr. Hoque succeeding in his action against Montreal Trust.

With one exception, I would not interfere with Justice MacDonald's decision on costs. I agree with counsel for Montreal Trust that the application was not frivolous; there were issues to be resolved and s. 37 is in the Act to allow decisions of the trustee to be reviewed by the Court. However, on the facts, Justice MacDonald, even if he had found that the trustee had not acted reasonably in failing to offer the lawsuit to Montreal Trust, would not likely have granted the relief sought by Montreal Trust. As already noted, it would not be just to declare the agreement with Dr. Hoque null and void.

There is no allegation of fraud nor any reason to warrant depriving Dr. Hoque of the benefit, if any, of the agreement he made with the trustee to have the lawsuit assigned to him.

Under the circumstances, Justice MacDonald did not err in awarding solicitor and client costs to the trustee to be paid by Montreal Trust notwithstanding that an award of solicitor and client costs is only made in exceptional circumstances as is an order that such costs be paid other than out of the estate.

An award of solicitor and client costs should not be limited as was held in Stiles v. British Columbia (Workers Compensation Board) (1989), 39 C.P.C. (2d) 74 to situations where the party ordered to pay the costs was guilty of reprehensible conduct. In this instance, the conduct of Montreal Trust could not be categorized as reprehensible.

Solicitor and client costs were awarded against the s. 37 applicant in Re Groves-Raffin Construction Limited (No. 2) (supra) where on the cost issue the Court concluded:

> "There is no reason, in my opinion, why the trustee or the estate should bear any part of the costs of an application brought solely for the benefit of one creditor. The costs of the trustee are therefore awarded against Fred Welsh Ltd. on a solicitor and client basis. Different considerations apply with respect to Fidelity. In essence, this has been a dispute not between Fred Welsh Ltd. and the trustee, but with Fidelity. The latter will have its costs on a party and party basis against Fred Welsh Ltd."

The application of Montreal Trust is essentially for its sole benefit. There appears to be case law that the words of s. 37 are broad enough to permit the court to set aside a sale even if the sale has been completed (See Houlden and Morawetz Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3rd Edition, Volume 1, p. 1-87. The authority cited for that statement is Re H. Packar and Sons Ltd. Hopmeyer v. Lamarre (1936), 17 C.B.R. 208 (Que. S.C.). A review of that case shows a very different fact situation than we have under consideration. In Re H. Packar (supra) one of the inspectors of the estate was the president of a company which purchased the estate assets without the prior approval of the Court to the sale. The Court declared the sale null and void; the prior approval of the Court being necessary in such a case under s. 103(6) of the Bankruptcy Act that was in force at the time. The Court stated at p. 208:

> "...There are now concerns [businesses] who make a business of buying bankrupt assets, and to allow insiders to take advantage of their knowledge to put in a bid at a few dollars more than the highest bidder is an unfair practice, which, if allowed to prevail, would discourage bidding by outsiders and militate against obtaining the best possible price, and, therefore, should not be countenanced:"

The same reasoning dictates that on the facts we have under consideration the sale to Dr. Hoque should not be set aside; it would be unfair to do so in the circumstances of this case.

Costs are in the discretion of the Supreme Court in Bankruptcy. I would not interfere with the exercise by Justice MacDonald of his discretion to award solicitor and client costs but I am of the opinion that under the circumstances he ought to have ordered that the solicitor and client costs of the trustee be taxed so as to enable Montreal Trust to make representations as to the amount of the account.

Montreal Trust has not appealed the award of costs to Dr. Hoque.

On this appeal the trustee, by notice of contention, argues that Justice MacDonald ought to have ordered Montreal Trust to pay the trustee for its time in preparing for the application. I disagree. The time spent by the trustee in these circumstances was exactly the same as the time spent by any litigant who is unfortunately involved in legal proceedings. There is no legal basis for requiring the losing party to a lawsuit or legal proceeding to pay a sum of money to the other side to compensate the winning party for time spent in preparing for and attending the proceedings.

In summary, Montreal Trust's appeal ought to be dismissed other than requiring that the solicitor and client costs awarded to the trustee be taxed.

The trustee and Dr. Hoque shall each have costs of this appeal against Montreal Trust which I would fix at $1,000 each plus disbursements.

The Honourable Mr. Justice Taylor (In Chambers)

Court of Appeal for British Columbia

Formula Atlantic Financial Corp.
- v. -
Attorney General of Canada
- and -
Attorney General of Canada
- v. -
Coroban Plastics Ltd., a Bankrupt and Formula Atlantic Financial Corp.
Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Taylor ((In Chambers)

1 These are applications for leave to appeal and for a stay of proceedings brought both in the bankruptcy of Coroban Plastics Ltd., in which an order has been made permitting the federal Crown to commence proceedings to set aside certain transfers of assets alleged to be fraudulent conveyances, and also in the action commenced by the Crown pursuant to that order against the bankrupt company and the applicant, Formula Atlantic Financial Corp., the alleged transferee of the assets concerned.

2 The applicant seeks leave in both proceedings to appeal a decision of Mr. Justice Cohen holding that it has no status in either proceeding to challenge the order of the Master under s. 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act authorizing the Attorney General, on behalf of Revenue Canada, to bring the fraudulent conveyance action. The applicant also seeks an order in the fraudulent conveyance action staying that proceeding pending the outcome of the proposed appeal. The ground on which it sought to have the s. 38 order set aside by Mr. Justice Cohen was that the material on which the order was obtained did not establish a prima facie case on the fraudulent conveyance claim. Mr. Justice Cohen did not embark on a consideration of the sufficiency of the material, but decided only that the applicant lacked status to bring the application to set aside the s. 38 order.

3 Mr. Millar, for the applicant, accepts that his client had no right to be given notice of the application for the s. 38 order. But he says it does not follow that the applicant therefore had no status to challenge the order once made.

4 Section 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (which was s. 20 of the former Bankruptcy Act) provides:

38(1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk, on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding, and on such other terms and conditions as the court may direct.

(2) On an order under subsection (1) being made the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject matter of the proceeding, including any document in support thereof.

(3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.

(4) Where, before an order is made under subsection (1), the trustee, with the permission of the inspectors, signifies to the court his readiness to institute the proceeding for the benefit of the creditors, the order shall fix the time within which he shall do so, and in that case the benefit derived from the proceeding, if instituted within the time so fixed, belongs to the estate.

There are two decisions of this court dealing with that provision in the present context: Bank of B.C. v. McCracken et al 1986 CanLII 1093 (BC CA), (1986), 4 B.C.L.R. (2d) 35 and Re Salloum (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. 336.

5 In the Bank of B.C. case the court was concerned with an order under the then s. 20 authorizing the principals of a bankrupt company, as creditors of the company, to bring an action against the bank which was petitioner in the bankruptcy proceeding. The bank had not been served with the application for the s. 20 order. It applied to have the order set aside but failed in the trial court and succeeded in this court only to the extent that the order provided that costs of the application which led to the s. 20 order being made would be in the discretion of the court hearing the action authorized by it. Giving judgment for the Court, Mr. Justice Hutcheon said (at pp. 36-37):

Digitized by Google

Section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act, in my view, clearly shows that the issue on the application is between the creditor making the application and the trustee.

I agree that there is nothing in s. 20 that requires notice of the application for that order to be served upon the intended defendant, or in the case of a continuing action, upon the defendant named in the action. The authorities supporting that view include the case of Re Swerdlow (1985), 57 C.B.R. (N.S.) 180. Mr. Justice Trainor of the Ontario Supreme Court, at p. 184, said:

In the present circumstances, where the trustee has not been discharged, but where he has decided against prosecuting the action. I can find no requirement or necessity to serve the proposed defendants with notice. Section 20 contemplates two parties, the moving creditor and the trustee.

Rule 13 mandates service on parties affected by the motion. The proposed defendants are not parties. The creditor or creditors, upon an order being granted, stand in the shoes of the trustee. In the facts of this case, I can see no cogent reason to require the creditors to give notice to the defendants, any more than I could find reason to require the trustee to serve notice if he brought the action. The trustee must be served because, by the bankruptcy, any property of the bankrupt is vested in him as is the cause of action against the bankrupt.

As I have said, where the order is made under s. 20 and when the issue is whether the trustee or creditor will take proceedings, then I agree that the intended defendant need not be served.

Mr. Justice Hutcheon went on to say that the intended defendant would have standing if the order dealt with other matters than the commencement of proceedings against it. He said:

Suppose the order under s. 20 purported to impose on the intended defendant certain obligations in the conduct of the litigation or to direct the defendant to take certain steps in that litigation. The appropriate court to hear that complaint, in my view, would be the court that made the order, that is to say, the Bankruptcy Court.

In the present case, however, there is no suggestion that the order does anything more than authorize commencement of action.

6 In Re Salloum a bank had been granted an order under the then s. 20, after the bankrupt had been discharged. The order permitted it to bring proceedings to impeach as fraudulent conveyances certain dispositions made by the bankrupt. The bankrupt sought to appeal the order to this court, his counsel asserting that the bankrupt was entitled to notice of the application for the order by reason of the fact that he had been discharged from bankruptcy. Counsel contended that the order had been granted without the bank having established that it had a prima facie case that the transfers were fraudulent, and also that the order was inequitable in the circumstances. Mr. Justice Wallace, giving judgment of this court dismissing the appeal, said (at p. 339-40):

The order granted by the chambers judge on the application is in the standard form. It authorized the Royal Bank to commence and prosecute proceedings in its own name and at its own expense and risk for the purpose of setting aside the dispositions of the lots and the boat. In other words, it authorized the Royal Bank to do that which the trustee could and presumably would have done, had he had sufficient funds.

The order did not contain any provisions that affected the status of the discharged bankrupt in any way that he would not have been affected had the trustee had the funds to pursue the intended action and decided to initiate the same. The intended defendant Mr. Salloum will, of course, be served with the proceedings in the intended action and have full opportunity to raise such defences as he considers appropriate.

The trustee's obligation to realize and distribute the estate of the bankrupt which is vested, or which may become vested, in him continues until the trustee is discharged, regardless of the prior discharge of the bankrupt. It is this obligation that the bank seeks to pursue with respect to the specific properties described in the application. The trustee, because it does not have the required funds, agrees that the bank may do so. There is no logical or legal reason why a discharged or an undischarged bankrupt, or any other intended defendant, should have notice of such a s. 20 application.

Mr. Justice Wallace held that since the bankrupt, discharged or undischarged, is not a necessary party to s. 20 proceeding, he could have no standing to appeal the order made.

7 Counsel for the applicant in the present proceedings does not seek to have those decisions reconsidered. He says instead that they do not decide the question he seeks to raise.

8 I do not understand how such an argument could succeed. These decisions, taken together, seem to me to establish clearly that on a s. 38 application, such as that which resulted in the present order, neither the bankrupt nor any other proposed defendant in the intended action has a right either to notice or to be heard on the application, and that neither the bankrupt nor any other proposed defendant will have standing to appeal any order made on such an application, provided that it goes no further than to authorize action to be brought--this being for the reason that their rights will not be affected by a s. 38 order so long as it goes no further than that. The effect of the order is to transfer from trustee to creditor whatever right of action may exist--much, no doubt, as a chose in action may be contractually transferred from one party to another, without adversely affecting the debtor. The order in this case imposes no liability on the appellant which did not previously exist, and leaves it free to assert in the action every defence it ever had.

9 The applicant may, of course, move as defendant in the action for summary dismissal of the claim if the plaintiff is unable to make out a prima facie case.

10 After hearing the application I invited the assistance of counsel with respect to two decision, Wilson v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 35 (SCC), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 594, and Caisse Populaire Vanier Ltée v. Bales reflex, (1991), 2 O.R. (3d) 456 (Gen. Div.), which were not referred to in argument. I am obliged to them for their written responses to this request. Wilson v. The Queen sets out the principle that, absent fraud or new evidence, it is not possible to attack an order in proceedings other than those whose specific purpose is the reversal, variation or nullification of that order. In Caisse Populaire Vanier Ltée v. Bales it was held that challenging the validity of a s. 38 order in the proceeding commenced pursuant to the order would amount to such a collateral attack, and is therefore impermissible.

11 While in that case the defendant company's application to dismiss an action commenced pursuant to a s. 38 order brought in the action itself was held to be an improper attack on the validity of the s. 38 order, the matter was then heard as an application for review under s. 187(5) of the then Bankruptcy Act. The present applicant's counsel says in his written argument that if the validity of the order cannot be challenged collaterally, the matter should be dealt with as in the Bales case. The former s. 187(5) (still s. 187(5) in the present Act) was not pleaded but counsel suggests this is merely a procedural defect. The subsection permits a court to "review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction". I am, however, of the view that such a provision cannot invoke any wider test for standing than would otherwise apply. In the Bales case the issue of standing does not appear to have been raised, and the decisions of this court mentioned above are not cited.

12 On the basis of those previous decisions of this court it seems to me clear that the present applicant has no status to challenge the order under s. 38 in the bankruptcy action, and nothing said by counsel suggests to me that the validity of the order could properly be subject to collateral challenge--that is to say in the action commenced pursuant to the order.

13 I would note that the proposition that a prima facie case must be established on a s. 38 application was not supported by any authority referred to before me. Assuming for the present purpose that an applicant for such an order has that burden, I would not assume, as counsel contends, that the purpose of the requirement must necessarily be to protect the intended defendant. It seems to me that the requirement could be intended to serve other purposes, including that of showing that the action which the creditor seeks to bring is capable of succeeding, so that other creditors may make an informed decision whether or not to join in it. I would note, finally, that counsel for the applicant says that if the intended defendant has no status to seek to have such an order set aside then an order obtained by fraud could not be impeached. But, of course, the court will always act to prevent its process being used so as to perpetrate a fraud. There can, in my view, be no basis for the assertion that it follows from this that a court will grant status to impeach an order on grounds other than fraud.

14 I am of the view that the applicant has not shown that it has any reasonable prospect of persuading a panel of this court that the order appealed from is in error. If there is merit in the suggestion that the Crown has no prima facie case, that is something which can be promptly dealt with in the action itself, under the ordinary rules governing summary disposition of unmeritorious proceedings. It seems to me that the proposed appeal could only delay resolution of the litigation on its merits.

15 The applications are therefore dismissed.

WHALEN J.:—

I. Introduction

[1] This is a motion by the defendants to dismiss the plaintiffs' claim as a nullity. For the reasons that follow the motion will be dismissed and an order will issue regularizing the plaintiffs' action nunc pro tunc,

II. The Facts

[2] The plaintiffs and defendant Antonio Provenzano (hereafter "Provenzano") were partners in a business financed in part through funds borrowed from a commercial lender. In applying for that loan, the parties were required to provide personal financial statements. In the case of Provenzano, one of the assets listed was a home, which he represented as being registered in his sole name with equity value of $140,000. About the same time the business failed, Provenzano divested his interest in the home to his wife. Eventually he made an assignment in bankruptcy, leaving his two partners to bear the partnership's liabilities, including to the commercial lender and judgments which inevitably followed from other creditors. Provenzano's trustee declined action to recover the bankrupt's transferred interest in the home. This was communicated to plaintiffs' counsel by letter of December 2, 1994.

[3] Accordingly, on December 8, 1994, the plaintiffs obtained an order pursuant to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (hereafter the "Act"), permitting them to commence an action against Provenzano and his wife to set aside the transfer. Apart from the issue which is the subject of this motion, there was no suggestion the order was improper. Section 38 of the Act provides as follows:

> 38(1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk, on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding, and on such other terms and conditions as the court may direct.
> (2) On an order under subsection (1) being made the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject matter of the proceeding, including any document in support thereof
> (3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.
> (4) Where, before an order is made under subsection (1), the trustee, with the permission of the inspectors, signifies to the court his readiness to institute the proceeding for the benefit of the creditors, the order shall fix the time within which he shall do so, and in that case the benefit derived from the proceeding, if instituted within the time so fixed, belongs to the estate.

[4] The order was in the usual form and followed the wording of s. 38, including that:

> ...the trustee shall within four days of service of this order upon him, execute an assignment assigning all his right, title and interest in the subject matter of the proceedings... and that such assignment shall vest in James Penfold and Nick Di Tommaso and such other creditors, if any, as shall join in the proceedings, all the right the trustee has in the said claim by virtue of this office as trustee.

[5] The plaintiffs instituted their action on March 27, 1995. The claim and order were served on the trustee by ordinary mail on March 29, 1995 and the trustee executed an acknowledgement card on April 4, 1995.

[6] For reasons unknown, the trustee did not execute and deliver an assignment of his right, title and interest in the action as directed by the order. The defendants pleaded this rendered the claim a nullity and repeated their position at discovery on February 22, 1996. The plaintiffs therefore pressed the trustee and obtained the assignment on March 22, 1996.

III. The Issue

[7] The narrow issue in this motion is whether the plaintiffs' failure to obtain the executed assignment before issuing the claim renders the action a nullity. Although the point has not previously been directly considered, various courts have envisioned conflicting solutions.

A. The Applicant / Defendant's Position

[8] In support of their position, the defendants relied on B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. v. Royal Bank 1992 CanLII 1093 (BC CA), (1992), 16 C.B.R. (3d) 72, 74 B.C.L.R. (2d) 332 (C.A.). In that case, the plaintiff corporation (a restaurant) defaulted on loans to the defendant bank, which then forced the plaintiff into bankruptcy. The bankruptcy proceedings were commenced in 1982 and completed in the same year with the discharge of the trustee. The plaintiff corporation was dissolved in 1985 under provincial companies law for failure to file annual reports. In late 1985, the principals of the corporation commenced an action against the defendant bank in their own names and in the name of the corporation, although the action was maintainable by the corporation only. Before issuing the claim, they failed to seek an order pursuant to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the same section of the Act now under consideration). The plaintiffs dallied in the pursuit of the action, resulting in motions to dismiss for want of prosecution. Eventually, in 1992, the court issued orders nunc pro tunc re-appointing the trustee in bankruptcy so he could refuse to pursue the claim, and granting leave under s. 38 to continue the claim after notifying creditors and restoring the corporation to the register. The bank successfully appealed.

[9] Writing for the majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal, Seaton J.A. acknowledged the narrow issue was whether an action commenced without prior s. 38 authorization was a nullity or an irregularity. He concluded it was a nullity, but at pp. 81 and 82 commented further:

> Section 38 offers an avenue by which a creditor can present a claim of the bankrupt and thereby recover its own claim against the bankrupt. The steps to be taken are clear:
> (1) The creditor must request the trustee to take proceedings,
> (2) The trustee must refuse or neglect to take the proceedings,
> (3) The creditor must apply to the court for an order authorizing it to take proceedings in its own name,
> (4) Notice of the contemplated proceedings must be given to the creditors,
> These are not just procedural steps. The assignment is essential—it is the foundation for the action. Clearly each of the other steps must precede the assignment.
> In the cases that granted leave nunc pro tunc that have been brought to our attention, it could be said that there was a cause of action when the proceedings were commenced. In those cases, suing a trustee (ss. 37 and 215) or a bankrupt (s. 69), the plaintiff has a claim that it cannot present without leave. In cases under s. 38, on the other hand, the plaintiff has no claim to present. Until the trustee assigns the claim the plaintiff has no status to start the action. That is not a mere technical error. The plaintiff has no cause of action absent the assignment. It can only receive the assignment after complying with the statute.

[10] The defendants therefore urged that the assignment was the "essential" step by which the plaintiffs acquired status to proceed with their claim. It was "not procedural", but rather a precondition for the commencement of the action. The defendants further urged that but for s. 38 of the Act, the plaintiffs would have no remedy, and in order to avail themselves of it they must comply strictly with the prescribed requirements. Because the steps described by the British Columbia Court of Appeal were essential preconditions to the institution of a claim, the defendants submitted that non-compliance was not simply a failure in form (an irregularity) that could be repaired by order nunc pro tunc. It was a failure of such fundamental importance as to render the offending action null and void ab initio, and as such could not be repaired by court order.

B. The Respondent / Plaintiffs' Position

warranty corporation. The trustee had previously refused to pursue the claim himself but indicated willingness to assign the estate's interest pursuant to a s. 38 order. On the final day of the time limitation for the particular cause of action, the plaintiffs obtained authorization pursuant to s. 38, including permission to issue the claim without first giving notice to other creditors (because time would not allow). To further complicate matters, no inspectors had been appointed as at the date of the s. 38 order. So the trustee's refusal to pursue the claim himself and his assignment of the action to the plaintiffs on the same date the order was granted were not considered and approved by the inspectors on behalf of the creditors. The defendants moved to strike the claim on the basis it was a nullity. They argued the court was without jurisdiction to authorize an action prior to notice being given to creditors. They questioned the propriety of the trustee's actions and the assignment of the action absent prior approval by the inspectors. They urged a narrow and strict interpretation of s. 38, based on the decision in B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. They argued that the essential steps or conditions precedent had not been taken and therefore the action was a nullity

[12] The court rejected the reasoning in B.N.R. Holdings Ltd., distinguishing it on the fact that the claim had issued without a prior s. 38 order and indeed after the bankruptcy proceedings had been completed, whereas in the Toyota case the bankruptcy proceedings were still extant and the plaintiffs had sought a s. 38 order before commencing the action. Secondly, the court observed that the application for authority under s. 38 was between the creditor and trustee. There was no need to serve others with prior notice of the application: Imprimerie Canadienne Gazette v. Turcotte (1991), 50 Q.A.C. 152; Roles v. Smith Roles Ltd. (Trustee of) (unreported), Sask. C.A., April 21, 1992; Re Parallels Restaurant Ltd. (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 266, 26 C.B.R. (2d) 385 (B.C.S.C.). Thirdly, there was no need to notify other creditors prior to the issuance of the claim, so long as they were subsequently given reasonable opportunity to participate. In other words, the sequence of the steps mandated by s. 38 was not fixed. Fourthly, the court held the section should not be given a narrow, legalistic interpretation, but rather a broader and more liberal one in keeping with its purpose of protecting creditors' rights and business relations: A. Marquette & Fils Inc. v. Mercure, 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547 at p. 556, 10 N.R. 239; Re Andrew Motherwell Ltd. of Canada (1924), 55 O.L.R. 294, 5 C.B.R. 107 (S.C.). Fifthly, it was held that in an application under s. 38, the applicant creditor need only show the trustee has refused or neglected to bring the action the creditor sought to initiate. It was that simple failure that made the remedy available. The reason for the refusal (including failure to hold a first creditors' meeting or to appoint inspectors) was not determinative. Finally, the court observed at p. 118:

> Section 38(2) states that the Trustee shall assign to the creditor all its rights, title, and interest in the chose in action of the proceeding. Houlden and Morawetz state at p. 1-129 that the right to take proceedings under s. 38 is conferred on the creditor not by the assignment but by law, and the creditor is not an assignee of the rights of the trustee. The assignment is not a condition of the creditor's acquired right to take the action, but merely a consequence of it. Therefore if there is a defect in the assignment, it will not frustrate the creditor's ability to commence the action. It is merely a procedural step.

[13] Miller J. therefore concluded the court had not overstepped its jurisdiction, nor undermined the purpose of s. 38, nor prejudiced the rights of other creditors or the bankrupt. Any error or non-compliance was an irregularity and repairable by order nunc pro tunc.

IV. Analysis

[14] Although the observations made in the B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. case in respect of the essential nature of the trustee's assignment were forcefully articulated by a senior appeal court, they were clearly obiter, as Seaton J.A. acknowledged at p. 74 of his reasons. Therefore, they are not binding on me. Also, as counsel in the instant case both observed, the B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. and Toyota cases are factually distinguishable from each other and the present one. Nevertheless, I am convinced that the approach and analysis in the Toyota case is the correct one.

[15] To begin with, I agree the interpretation of s. 38 should be large and liberal, in favour of its intended purposes and beneficiaries. Section 12 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1-21, provides:

> 12. Every enactment is deemed remedial and shall be given such fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation as best ensures the attainment of its objects.

[16] Houlden and Morawetz have succinctly summarized the purpose of the Act (with authorities) at pp. 2-3 of The 1996 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Toronto: Carswell, 1996):

> 1. To permit the honest but unfortunate debtor to secure a discharge from his/her debts upon reasonable conditions, so he/she can be financially rehabilitated and can make a fresh start as a useful citizen or business person in the community;
> 2. To provide for the orderly and fair distribution of the bankrupt's property among his/her creditors;
> 3. TO permit an investigation to be made of the affairs of the bankrupt;
> 4. To permit the setting aside of preferences, settlements and other fraudulent transactions so all ordinary creditors may share equally in the administration of the bankrupt's estate.

[17] Section 38 is clearly aimed at protecting and advancing the interests of creditors where the trustee has failed or refused to do so. By this mechanism, the creditors' interests may be independently investigated and adjudicated upon, without risk or cost to the trustee. The honest but unfortunate debtor's discharge and rehabilitation is not undermined in the process. The result either way supports a full and fair distribution of the debtor's property amongst the creditors. In situations such as those alleged in the present case, there may be an avoidance of preferential or fraudulent transactions. If the creditors seeking the benefit of s. 38 fail, then they do so at their own risk, without consequence to the trustee or bankrupt. Therefore, a liberal interpretation of s. 38 accommodates the purposes intended and without prejudice to the bankrupt (in this case, the defendants). The contrasting narrow, legalistic approach proposed in the B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. case is interpretively inconsistent with these purposes.

[18] In analyzing s. 38, the B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. court did not seem to have had the opportunity to consider the Supreme Court of Canada's reasons in Re Garage Causapscal Ltée, 1960 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1961] S.C.R. 83, 26 D.L.R. (2d) 384. In that case a debtor made payment to a creditor ten days before making an assignment in bankruptcy and at a time when both were aware the debtor was insolvent. The trustee failed to attempt recovery of the payment pursuant to s. 64 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 14 (substantially the same as s. 95 of the present Act). Section 64 presumed a preference where an assignment in bankruptcy occurred within three months after the payment having been made. The plaintiff creditor (Traders Finance) therefore obtained authorization to commence an action to recover the amount of the payment from the alleged preferred creditor pursuant to s. 16 of the Bankruptcy Act (now s. 38). The order authorizing the action and the action itself were commenced within a year of the plaintiff creditor's learning of the payment, but several years after the appointment of the trustee and the payment itself. The defendant creditor attacked the claim on the basis of a provision in the Quebec Civil Code which required it to be instituted within a year of coming to the creditor's knowledge, or where the suit was brought "by assignees or other representatives of the creditors collectively", within a year of their appointment. The defendants argued that because the action was commenced pursuant to a s. 16 (now s. 38) authorization resulting in the trustee assigning his right, title and interest in the subject-matter of the claim to the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs were caught by the time limitation applicable to trustees and their assignees. When the appeal reached the Supreme Court of Canada, the court considered the nature and effect of the assignment contemplated by the section. Speaking for the majority, Fauteux J. stated at pp. 389-90:

> In a bankruptcy or assignment, when the Trustee refuses to take proceedings for the benefit of, but at the risk and expense of, the estate, s. 16 grants the prompt creditor who wishes to sue in his own name and at his own risk and expense exclusive preference to the extent of his claim and expenses. It is this preferential right which the respondent is asserting in his proceedings. This right is conferred on him by the law and not by the Trustee. It differs, moreover, essentially from that which the Trustee, acting for the creditors as a whole, could have asserted for the benefit of the estate. The fact that, in support of the proceeding he could take in this case, the Trustee would have invoked, as the respondent has done in his action, the fraudulent character of the payment, makes it possible to say that both had common grounds, but not an identical right and remedy.
> Never having had the right or the remedy of the respondent, the Trustee could not assign it to him.
> Under the old Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 11, this same preferential right was granted to the creditor by s. 69; but the Trustee asserted it in his name for the benefit of the creditor who provided security to indemnify him for his expenses. Section 16 of the new Act upholds this preferential right, but provides that the action to assert it must be taken by the creditor personally and not by the Trustee. It is for this reason that Parliament, by s. 16, has obliged the latter to assign and hand over to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject-matter of the proceedings, including any document in support thereof, upon the order authorizing the creditor to sue being given. This obligation is a consequence and not a condition of the preferential right and of the right to sue to assert it.

[19] In Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. v. Ideal Petroleum (1959) Ltd., 1976 CanLII 142 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 230 at p. 232, 75 D.L.R. (3d) 63 at p. 65, the Supreme Court of Canada referred briefly with approval to Re Garage Causapscal Ltée, noting that an action under s. 16 (now s. 38) was personal and conferred by the Act. This expression of the law has not been altered legislatively or by further pronouncement of the Supreme Court of Canada. The reasons in the Toyota case are consistent with the law stated by the Supreme Court of Canada.

[20] Therefore, an assignment executed pursuant to s. 38 of the Act is neither the foundation of the action nor the manner by which the claimant acquires his right and status. These are personal to the creditor and are founded upon or accorded by the section itself, not the assignment. Although the Supreme Court of Canada did not discuss the reason for requiring the assignment, the purpose is apparent. By assigning his right and interest in the subject-matter of the claim, the trustee exhausts his residuary interest in the matter, thereby avoiding the possibility of a multiplicity of actions, and releasing the trustee and estate of any further responsibility or liability in that regard. Thus the "common ground" shared with the claimant creditor, but which is a separate right and remedy of the trustee or estate, is extinguished.

[21] Accepting this analysis and law (as I must), I also accept that a s. 38 assignment by the trustee is not a condition precedent to the remedy extended by the section. Rather, it is a consequence. The language of s. 38(2) also seems to indicate the consequential nature of the assignment, namely, that the trustee execute an assignment "on an order under subsection (1) being made".

[22] Upon a reading of s. 38, it would also appear there are only two conditions precedent to the creditor/claimant's commencement of an action, namely: (1) the trustee's refusal or neglect to initiate it; and (2) the court's authorization in the form of an order pursuant to s. 38. The same view was held by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Re Imprimerie Canadienne Gazette, [1991] A.Q. No. 2055 at p. 9.

[23] Furthermore, the provision is directory of the trustee, not the creditor/claimant. The order issued by the court in the instant case is similarly directory. A failure to assign would amount to non-compliance by the trustee, not the creditor/claimant. It is difficult to imagine the creditor/claimant being denied the right to institute action by the trustee's failure to deliver. If this were so, the creditor would be back in the position he was when the trustee refused or neglected to take action, and the remedy contemplated by s. 38(1) would be frustrated. Others may be interested in the assignment being executed (for example, the defendants in this case), and they may seek the assistance of the creditor/claimant, or the further intervention of the court to assure compliance. However, it is difficult to imagine a trustee's non-compliance resulting in the creditor being penalized, especially to the extent of denying or voiding the right to commence a claim.

[25] Therefore, assignment by the trustee cannot be regarded as a pre-condition to the creditor/claimant's commencement of the action. If the claim issues without the trustee having refused or neglected to commence or continue it; and/or if it issues without the authorization of the court, then it may be fundamentally flawed. This was the situation in the B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. case. In the instant case, both conditions precedent were satisfied before the action was commenced.

[26] Finally, when is non-compliance with a statutory or procedural requirement an irregularity which can be rectified by order nunc pro tunc, and when will such non-compliance be so fundamental as to render the action a nullity that cannot be repaired? These questions occupied much judicial attention during the last half of the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth, unfortunately producing a labyrinth of conflicting decisions often difficult to understand or reconcile. Nevertheless, whether in connection with statutory provisions or rules of civil procedure, certain principles have emerged.

> There are fundamental differences between a proceeding which is irregular and a proceeding which is a nullity. An irregularity is an error in the manner of taking a proceeding prescribed by the rules, or is a proceeding not in strict accordance with the prescribed form: a nullity is a proceeding which is altogether unwarranted and different from that which ought to have been taken, and affects a matter of substance. A nullity is an error in litigation which is incurable, and the person affected by it is entitled to have the proceeding set aside ex dubito justitiae without terms or conditions... If a proceeding is irregular, it may be set aside or amended or otherwise dealt with upon such terms as the court sees fit.

> When Parliament prescribes the manner or form in which a duty is to be performed or a power exercised, it seldom lays down what will be the legal consequences of failure to observe its prescriptions. The courts must therefore formulate their own criteria for determining whether the procedural rules are to be regarded as mandatory, in which case disobedience will render void or voidable what has been done (though in some cases it has been said that there must be "substantial compliance" with the statutory provisions if the deviation is to be excused as a mere irregularity). Judges have often stressed the impracticability of specifying exact rules for the assignment of a procedural provision to the appropriate category. The whole scope and purpose of the enactment must be considered, and one must assess "the importance of the provisions that has been disregarded, and the relation of that provision to the general object intended to be secured by the Act". In assessing the importance of the provision, particular regard may be had to its significance as a protection of individual rights, the relative value that is normally attached to the rights that may be adversely affected by the decision and the importance of the requirement in the overall administrative scheme established by the statute. Furthermore, much may depend upon the particular circumstances of the case in hand. Although "nullification is the natural and usual consequence of disobedience", breach of procedural or formal rules is likely to be treated as a mere irregularity if the departure from the terms of the Act is of a trivial nature, or if no substantial prejudice has been suffered by those for whose benefit the requirements were introduced, or if serious public inconvenience would be caused by holding them to be mandatory, or if the court is for any reason disinclined to interfere with the act or decision that is impugned.

[29] At p. 465 of King v. Kokot reflex, (1980), 31 O.R. (2d) 461, 119 D.L.R. (3d) 154 (H.C.J.), Steele J. cited with approval a statement of principle, articulated by Noble J. in Raspier v. Robertson (1977), 4 C.P.C. 103 (Sask. Q.B.) at p. 105:

> The line between what constitutes a nullity or an irregularity is sometimes difficult to distinguish. It seems to me that unless the Rule of practice imports a prohibition which the litigant has disregarded then it would not amount to a nullity. One general test would be whether or not the Court would, as a result of the failure to observe the Rule, lose jurisdiction over the proceedings. Another test discussed in the case law is whether or not the failure to observe the Rule strictly, has prejudiced the other parties' legal position. In my view, the more recent trend of our court is to put a liberal interpretation on the Rules of procedure with a view to facilitating, as opposed to hampering, the cause of litigation.

> 187(9) No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceedings is of the opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

[31] This raises the question of whether an action already authorized and commenced pursuant to s. 38 of the Act is a "proceeding in bankruptcy", or whether it is governed by the Rules of Civil Procedure. If it is the latter, Rule 2.01(1) of the Ontario rules provides:

> 2.01(1) A failure to comply with these rules is an irregularity and does not render a proceeding or a step, document or order in a proceeding a nullity, and the court,
> (a) may grant all necessary amendments or other relief, on such terms as are just, to secure the just determination of the real matters in dispute; or
> (b) only where and as necessary in the interest of justice, may set aside the proceeding or a step, document or order in the proceeding in whole or in part.
> (2) The court shall not set aside an originating process on the ground that the proceeding should have been commenced by an originating process other than the one employed.

[32] This rule, instituted in 1984 during the last major reform of the Ontario rules, virtually abolished the old debate as to irregularity and nullity. As the editors of Holmested and Watson on Ontario Civil Procedure observed in vol. 2 at pp. 2-6 and 2-7:

> The purpose of rule 2.01 is, quite simply, to abolish the concept of a nullity in the Rules and to provide as much relief as possible from procedural defects. The courts are not to engage in the sterile exercise of deciding first, on the authorities, whether a failure to comply with the Rules is a nullity or an irregularity, and then, if the defect is characterized as an irregularity, whether the court will permit an amendment. All defects are characterized by rule 2.01 as irregularities. The first step for the court is to determine how to cure the defect, by amendments or other relief (including dispensing with compliance with a rule; see rule 2.03) the presumption being that all defects are curable on appropriate terms.

[33] Because the defendants are questioning the viability of the action resulting from the s. 38 order and not the order itself, I am inclined to think the non-compliance alleged here is governed by the Rules of Civil Procedure, not the Act. If that is so, there will be no question of nullity, the issue being how to repair the failure complained of. The matter seems to have repaired itself by the delivery of the assignment before this motion was brought and before the action itself was ready for trial.

[34] However, lest I am mistaken in this view, I would still hold the failure to deliver the assignment within the time specified in the order and before the commencement of the action to be an irregularity repairable by order nunc pro tunc. Based on s. 187(9) of the Act and the principles stated in the passages just quoted, my reasons are as follows:

> 1. The defect in the assignment is a consequence of the order of December 8, 1994, not a condition, and as such is simply a formal procedural matter rather than an essential or fundamental one.
> 2. Being a defect of form rather than fundamental substance, the proceeding is not altogether unwarranted and different from that which ought to have been taken.
> 3. Although the assignment was delayed and therefore failed to comply with the time specified in the order of December 8, 1994, there was otherwise substantial compliance and the deviation went only to a procedural aspect which did not result in a miscarriage of justice that could not be corrected by an order.

4. The defect did not undermine the policy purpose of the section or the Act. Indeed, a refusal to cure the defect would frustrate the remedy intended.
5. The trustee and the defendants are not prejudiced in so far as the legal issues which are the subject-matter of the action are concerned. At most, the trustee and bankrupt have been delayed in the taking of the step (i.e., the assignment) which would assure a release of further responsibility in the alleged cause and the possibility of a multiplicity of actions. At worst, the delay has caused mild inconvenience which was the fault of the trustee (not the plaintiffs) to whom the direction to assign was made.
6. The failure to comply has not caused public inconvenience.
7. The defect has not resulted in the court losing jurisdiction. And
8. A liberal interpretation regarding the remedial nature of s. 38 of the Act, as discussed earlier in these reasons, requires an approach that facilitates the course of litigation rather than hampers it.

V. Conclusion

[35] For all these reasons the defendants' motion is dismissed and an order will issue nunc pro tunc declaring the late execution and delivery of the assignment by the trustee an irregularity which has been rectified by the delivery of the assignment on the date ultimately achieved. If the parties are unable to agree they may make an appointment to speak to the issue of costs.

Order accordingly.

[1] MILLER J.:– The issue in this application is whether an order I granted to the Plaintiffs on November 23, 1992 under s. 38(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (hereinafter referred to as "the Act"), authorizing them to commence an action against the named Defendants is a valid order. If it is not, can the Statement of Claim issued pursuant to the order still stand?

[2] The background facts are not in dispute but, as the sequence of events may be critical to the decision, I propose to briefly outline the key events.

[3] International Warranty Company Limited (hereinafter referred to as "International") was an Alberta company that marketed extended warranty automobile policies across Canada. It experienced severe financial difficulties in 1987 and a Receiver was appointed by this Court to protect the creditors. The named Plaintiffs in this action, Toyota Canada Inc. and Hyundai Auto Canada Inc., were two of the many creditors of International. I have been the principal judge of the Court of Queen's Bench who has handled the many applications surrounding the winding down of International's affairs and was very aware of the background of the matter. For some time prior to November 23, 1992 the Plaintiffs, through their respective counsels, have advised the Court that they were contemplating bringing an action against the Defendants to try and recover certain monies which they allege were unlawfully taken from International to the detriment of its creditors.

[4] On the 9th day of November, 1992 an order was obtained under the Bankruptcy Act appointing W.W. McCulloch and Associates Inc. as the Trustee of International. No inspectors, provided under the Act, were ever named as a formal creditors' meeting, where they would normally be elected, was not convened by the Trustee prior to November 23, 1992. At that point in time, the tangible assets of International were negligible. The Plaintiffs wrote a letter to the Trustee asking it to commence an action on behalf of the creditors against the Defendants for the recovery of monies or, alternatively, to assign the right of action to them pursuant to s. 38 of the Act. The Trustee responded by stating that there were no funds available to it to pursue the claims but it had no objection to the Plaintiffs commencing an action and was prepared to assign the rights to carry the action to the Plaintiffs. It is common ground that before responding, the Trustee did not consult with any inspectors, as none were appointed, nor did it call any meeting of creditors before it decided not to sue and to assign its rights to sue to the Plaintiffs.

[5] The 23rd of November 1992 was the last day under the Limitation of Actions Act that a Statement of Claim could be filed against the Defendants. There simply was no time left to serve any s. 38 notice upon International's creditors and, if an action was not commenced on that day, all chances of pursuing a potential substantial claim would have been lost forever. Counsel for the Plaintiffs appeared before me on the 23rd of November and sought an order permitting them to file their Statement of Claim later that day. I granted the order but made it a term of the order that the following provision be included:

> Subject to paragraph 12, all benefits to be derived from the proceedings authorized by this order together with the costs of same shall belong exclusively to the Applicants and to such other creditors of the bankrupt who may within sixty (60) days of service upon them of the notice of the granting of this order agree to contribute pro rata according to the amount of their respective claims to the expense and risk of such proceedings, and who within the like time in writing directed to the law firm of Reynolds, Mirth, Richards and Farmer, solicitors for the Applicants, signify their agreement pursuant to the form of agreement attached as Schedule "B" to this order. The Applicants shall also within 60 days of this order provide security in the amount of 5% of their claims, less all costs and fees incurred by them in accordance with paragraph 14 hereof.

[6] On the same day, after the order had been granted, the Trustee assigned to the Plaintiffs any right, title or interest to the course of action which it had as Trustee. Pursuant to the order and the assignment, the Statement of Claim was filed that day and a notice of the granting of the order was served upon all known creditors of International. They were given 60 days after service to decide if they wished to become involved in the action. If they elected not to, nothing more was required of them. If they wished to share pro rata in any proceeds, they had to agree to share the costs of the action pro rata and to deposit with the Plaintiffs' solicitor a sum equal to 5% of their claims as security for costs. Five of the creditors served did, in fact, elect to become involved in the action with the Plaintiffs and signed a written agreement to this effect.

[7] Several of named Defendants now seek to set aside the order which I granted and to ask the Court to strike out the Statement of Claim filed. None of the creditors served have objected to the order, except for the Hong Kong Bank which is both a creditor and a named Defendant.

[8] The major issues raised by the Defendants in this application are the following:

1. Did the court have jurisdiction to grant the order which permitted the Plaintiffs to commence the action immediately, without first giving the other creditors notice?

2. Are other creditors effectively precluded from joining the action as the statement of claim has been issued and the limitation period has expired, thus defeating the intention of the legislation?

3. Is the Assignment of the claim by the Trustee in Bankruptcy to the Plaintiffs valid?

Digitized by Google

4. Must the Trustee obtain permission from the Inspectors or creditors to refuse or neglect to take proceedings before consenting to the application under section 38?

5. Is this a derivative action?

6. Do the Defendants have standing to challenge the order made under section 38?

[9] Section 38 of the Act reads as follows:

> 38.(1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk, on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding, and on such other terms and conditions as the court may direct.
> (2) On an order under subsection (1) being made, the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject-matter of the proceeding, including any document in support thereof.
> (3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.

[10] The Defendants who challenge the order take the position that the general scheme of the Act only permits a trustee to take proceedings on behalf of the bankrupt estate. The bankrupt loses his or its right to sue in its own name. Section 38 of the Act constitutes an exception to the general scheme for it permits a creditor, in its own name, to sue on behalf of the bankrupt estate under certain conditions specifically spelled out within that section. Before taking proceedings the creditor must obtain a Court order. Before obtaining the order and commencing the proceedings the Defendants maintain that three things must occur.

[11] These three steps, they argue, are mandatory and are the following:

(a) The Trustee must obtain directions from the inspectors or the creditors before coming to a decision whether to refuse or neglect to take proceedings,

(b) The Plaintiffs must give notice to the other creditors before the action was commenced giving them the option of participating in the action,

(c) The assignment given by the Trustee must be to all the creditors who have indicated, before the action was commenced, that they intended to share in the costs and the proceeds.

[12] The Defendants argue that the failure to comply with any or all of these three steps leaves the Court unable to grant the order given. In support of this assertion the Defendants rely heavily upon the 1992 decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. (unreported) [reported B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. v. Royal Bank (1992), 1992 CanLII 1093 (BC CA), [1993] 2 W.W.R. 471] and Re Andrew Motherwell of Canada Ltd. (1924), 55 O.L.R. 294 (C.A.). In addition, the Defendants cite a passage from an article on the 1970 version of the Bankruptcy Act by one Michael B. Rotsztain entitled "Creditors Taking Proceeding in Bankruptcy" referring to s. 20 (which is roughly equivalent to the present s. 38) that states at p. 39:

> 6. The Proceedings
> After the completion of all matters described above, notice, assignment, agreement to share and contributed, pro rata, retainer it shall then be possible to actually commence the proceedings in question against the particular defendant. The participating section 20 creditors shall be the named applicants, plaintiffs or petitioners, as the case may be.

[13] All of the arguments raised by the Defendants revolve around how the Court should interpret s. 38 of the Act, i.e., should the Court take a narrow legalistic approach or a broader and more liberal one? There are some earlier decisions which give an indication of the favoured approach. One of these is a Supreme Court of Canada decision in A. Marquette& fils Inc. v. Mercure, 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547, where at p. 556 de Grandpre J. said:

> Before going on to another point it is perhaps not inappropriate to recall that the Bankruptcy Act, while not business legislation in the strict sense, clearly has its origins in the business world. Interpretation of it must take these origins into account. It concerns relations among businessmen, and to interpret it using an overly narrow, legalistic approach is to misinterpret it. It seems to me that appellant is urging the Court to so interpret it.

Another statement of the general approach is found in a decision from the Supreme Court of Ontario in Re Andrew Motherwell of Canada Ltd. (1924), 55 O.L.R. 294. Fisher J. said at p. 298:

> In Caughell v. Brower (1897), 17 P.R. 438, it was held that an appeal from an order setting aside an award was a proceeding in Court. Any interpretation to be given to the meaning and scope of sec. 35 should be a liberal one, and not a construction that would debar a creditor, if he is prepared to undertake the risk, of the right to proceed for his own benefit.

[14] In addition to the general approach outlined above, I thing it is also important to try to understand the general meaning and intent of s. 38 of the Act.

[15] In my view, s. 38 is designed to allow the creditors of a bankrupt estate to carry an action in their own name, when the action by law belongs to the Trustee in Bankruptcy, in circumstances where the Trustee refuses or neglects to proceed with the action.

(b) The action involved remains in substance a single action which continues to be carried on for the benefit of the estate. The recovery from the action will not be affected by the number of creditors that agree to support the action as the action remains essentially the same since it is the Trustee's rights which are being asserted,. That is very clear when reference is made to s. 38(3), which provides that the surplus realized through such action, if any, belongs to the estate.

(c) The requirement for notice to creditors is part of a mechanism with respect to how the proceeds of the action will be divided, with creditors who agree to share in the costs of prosecuting such an action and the risks involved obtaining a preference as to distribution of the proceeds of the action. The section does not affect the liability of the Defendants in any respect.

(d) Until 1949, the action authorized by s. 38 or its predecessors was brought in the name of the assignee or Trustee of the bankrupt, with a provision for security to be posted in favour of the assignee or Trustee to protect the assignee or Trustee with respect to costs. This was seen as unduly restrictive and a cause of difficulty. As a result, the section was altered to provide that the action would be brought in the name of the creditor obtaining an order under s. 38, thereby obviating the need for security to be posted in favour of the Trustee. However, this change did not alter the fundamental nature of the proceedings which are authorized by the order.

[17] In order to carry out the basic intent of s. 38, previously expressed, is it mandatory that a specific sequence of events take place? Do the decisions in B.N.R. Holdings v. Royal Bank (supra) and Re Andrew Motherwell of Canada Ltd. (supra) support this proposition?

[18] The B.N.R. case dealt with a very unusual fact situation. Mr. and Mrs. Bishop were the principals of B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. which operated a restaurant in 1981. The Royal Bank provided financing to the business and the loan was personally guaranteed by the Bishops. The business failed and a Trustee in Bankruptcy was appointed. The bankrupt company had extensive liabilities and no assets. The Trustee completed its duties and was discharged in September of 1982. The company was struck off the register of companies in 1985. The bank sued the Bishops on their guarantees. In November of 1985 the Bishops sued the bank in the name of the company and their own names. The bank took the position that the Bishops had no right to advance a claim on behalf of the bankrupt company in their own names and applied to strike out the action. The chambers judge [reported 1992 CanLII 410 (BC SC), (1992), 14 C.B.R. (3d) 233] upheld the bank's position, struck out the Statement of Claim but granted leave to the Bishops to start a new action. He ordered that the discharged Trustee be re-appointed so that it could refuse to take proceedings and then ordered that under s. 12 the Bishops would have leave to recommence the action in their own names after they had taken steps to restore the company on the register and sending notice to creditors. In effect, the chambers judge granted a Nunc Pro Tunc Order. The B.C. Court of Appeal ruled that this unusual procedure was in error and reversed the decision.

[19] In the course of the Reasons for Judgment, Seaton J.A. speaking for the court, after outlining the steps which the creditor is directed to take in s. 38, said at p. 12 [p. 479]:

> These are not just procedural steps. The assignment [from the Trustee] is essential - it is the foundation for the action. Clearly each of the other steps must precede the assignment.

And again at p. 13 [p. 479], Seaton J.A. states:

> Until the trustee assigns the claim the plaintiff has no status to start the action. This is not a mere technical error. The plaintiff has no cause of action absent the assignment. It can only receive the assignment after complying with the statute.

In determining whether the ratio of this decision governs the facts in the case at bar I observe that the real root issue in the B.N.R. case was whether an action commenced without an order under s. 38 can be saved through the issuance of an order under s. 38 nunc pro tunc. It is noted that the B.C. decision relies on the fact that the Trustee had already been discharged and, in effect, the bankruptcy proceedings had been concluded. Seaton J.A. cites with approval the B.C. Supreme Court decision of Meredith J. in Sangara v. Lawson 1984 CanLII 827 (BC SC), (1984), 52 B.C.L.R. 300, where he says at p. 301:

> In my view, s. 20 [a predecessor section to the present s. 38] contemplates that the continuance of a proceeding such as this must be taken in the bankruptcy proceedings, not afterwards.

Digitized by Google

[21] This brings me to a consideration of whether the B.N.R. case stands for the proposition that s. 38 should be interpreted as allowing the procedure contemplated by that section to go ahead, not only if a number of events occur but also, that these events occur in a specific sequence. While I believe that the B.N.R case mandates that the events do occur I am not convinced that it stands for the proposition that only one specific sequence can give the procedure validity.

[22] The Defendants state that the only way s. 38 can be validated is if:

(a) the creditors are notified before the Statement of Claim is issued and

(b) the inspectors or creditors are consulted before the Trustee decides not to take actions in its own name.

[23] Addressing the argument regarding the s. 38 requirement that notice be given to all creditors, I would break this down to two points of time. Firstly, before the order is sought and, secondly, after the order is obtained but before the Statement of Claim is issued. There is ample authority to support the proposition that the s. 38 application is one between the Trustee and the Creditor applying for the order so that only the Trustee need be served with notice of that application.

[24] See: Imprimerie canadienne Gazette v. Turcotte (unreported) Quebec Court of Appeal, issued November 27, 1991; Roles v. Smith Roles Ltd. (Trustee of) (unreported), Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, April 21, 1992; Re Parallels Restaurant Ltd. (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 266 (B.C.S.C.).

[25] It is also noted that the precedent form of a s. 38 order contained in Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law in Canada (3rd ,ed.), makes it abundantly clear that only the Trustee receives notice of the application. The following reasons for such a conclusion are logical:

(a) There is simply no need for prior notice to be given. Creditors by the terms of such an order are given the full opportunity to share in the fruits (provided they agree to share in the costs) of the litigation involved.

(b) A creditor who does not join still retains a residual interest in the litigation as any surplus recovered must be paid to the estate.

(c) All the creditors are not always known at the stage where such an order is obtained, as in this case. There is no sound reason to require that the application await until such creditors are known.

[26] I conclude that it is not necessary under s. 38 to notify the creditors in advance of the application for the order.

[27] Is it an absolute requirement to notify the creditors prior to the issuance of the Statement of Claim? To answer this one must again refer to the intent of s. 38. As I understand it, the general intent is to give those creditors who wish to assume the cost and risks of carrying an action, that would usually be conducted by the Trustee, an opportunity to do so. In exchange for assuming the risk, those creditors who participate gain a preference in any recoveries over creditors who eschew the risk. However, any surpluses left after the sponsoring creditors have recovered still belong to the bankrupt estate so that, in theory, creditors who do nothing may still recover some or all of their claims. The key element, in my opinion, is that all of the creditors be given a reasonable opportunity to decide whether or not to participate and risk further loss in exchange for a preferred position should a recovery be made as a result of the action. The order granted in this matter accorded all known creditors exactly that choice, the only difference being that they got to make the choice after the Statement of Claim was issued instead of before. In point of fact, five additional creditors elected to sign a document agreeing to take the risk and were required to put money up front toward their share of the legal costs. I cannot see how any of the creditors has been adversely affected by the sequence that was followed in this case because of the severe time limitation restraints. It is clear that, if the method set out in the order had not been granted, all of the creditors would have lost forever any opportunity to realize upon their claims. No creditor, with the exception of the Hong Kong Bank who is also a named Defendant, have come forward to challenge the sequence of events.

[28] Is it then just and equitable that one or more of the Defendants should be able to receive an advantage because of the sequence of events permitted by the order? As I observed earlier, s. 38 is designed to protect the rights of creditors to sue if the Trustee refuses or neglects to do so. It is, in my view, not designed to protect potential debtors of the bankrupt estate. If there had been funds available in the estate, it is quite possible that the Trustee would have carried the action and the Defendants would have been in jeopardy. If it was practical to notify the creditors before the Statement of Claim was issued and still avoid the limitation period, the Defendants would have been in jeopardy. I cannot see how the sequence of events as to when the creditors were notified, which is solely for their benefit, can be the basis upon which a court concerned with equity should relieve the Defendants of being placed in jeopardy and, in effect, frustrate the intent of s. 38.

[29] In my view the B.N.R. decision is restricted to the unique facts of that case and the general comments of the court regarding the necessity for strict compliance with that court's interpretation of s. 38 is not persuasive in relation to the facts of the case at bar.

Digitized by Google

[30] Does the fact that the Trustee decided not to pursue the claim without first consulting with inspectors or creditors invalidate the order?

[31] When the Court heard the application on November 23, 1992, the affidavit material filed before the Court established the following:

(a) There was some urgency with respect to the application, and it was highly advisable for the proceedings to be commenced immediately.

(b) The Trustee had not yet been able to gather a list of the creditors of the estate, let alone call the first meeting of creditors for purposes of electing the inspectors of the estate. It was impossible for the Trustee to consult with inspectors of the estate, or creditors, in a timely fashion with respect to the proceedings being proposed.

(c) The trustee confirmed that it was declining to commence proceedings due to lack of funds in the estate.

[32] In my view, in an application for an order under s. 38, the applicant creditor need only show that the Trustee has refused or neglected to bring the action the creditor wants to bring. It is not a requirement or condition precedent that the Trustee have consulted with the inspectors, nor is it a requirement or a condition precedent that the Trustee have called a meeting of the creditors with respect to the matter.

[33] The reasons given by the Quebec Court of Appeal in the 1991 decision of Imprimerie canadienne Gazette v. Turcotte (unreported) as yet should be especially noted as to why this is the better view. I paraphrase them as follows:

(a) The predecessor to s. 38 did require the inspector's permission. Parliament deleted that requirement. The Courts should not read back into a provision that which Parliament has deleted.

(b) Section 38(4) refers to the inspector's permission being required, as does s. 30. Section 38(1) does not, and the clear inference is that same is unnecessary for an application under s. 38(1).

(c) The section refers to cases where the Trustee not only refuses to bring an action, but also "neglects" to do so. If permission of the inspectors is required, that logically requires the Court to read the section as requiring the inspectors to authorize the Trustee to "neglect" to bring the action. That is illogical and incongruous.

[34] Houlden and Morawetz state at p. 1-90 [p. 1-66], with respect to s. 30(1)(d), that a defendant to an action brought by the trustee cannot set up the fact that the trustee did not obtain the permission of the inspectors for bringing the action. The permission of the inspectors is not required to give capacity to the trustee, but merely to protect the bankrupt estate with respect to costs: Re Tremblay (1922), 3 C.B.R. 488 (Que. S.C.). In view of this reasoning, the trustee has capacity to refuse to take proceedings without the permission of the inspectors. It is the applying creditors who will be taking on the risk and responsibility for costs, the estate of the bankrupt is not at risk or involved.

[35] Therefore, the trustee does not need to obtain the consent of the inspectors to refuse or neglect to take proceedings. Since there was a request from the Plaintiffs to the Trustee to act and a subsequent refusal to do so, the Plaintiffs came within the requirements of s. 38.

[36] With regard to the Trustee consulting with creditors before deciding, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Roles v. Smith Roles Ltd. (Trustee of) (supra) stated:

> It was not necessary for the Applicant to establish the basis for the Trustee's refusal or neglect, which is to say whether the Trustee had or had not obtained the consent of the creditors to its course of action.

I conclude that it is not a mandatory requirement of s. 38 for a Trustee to consult with creditors before making his decision.

[37] The next issue raised is whether the order and the mechanics used in this case effectively precludes other creditors from joining in the action after the Statement of Claim has been issued.

[38] The defendants are essentially arguing that the creditors who wish to join the action cannot do so now as they were not given notice before the action was commenced as required by s. 38. Since the limitation has expired, they argue that the creditors are not precluded from joining.

[39] The defendants agree that cases decided since 1949 have not stated that a creditor had to be a named plaintiff to enjoy the benefit of action; however, they argue that these cases have all been in error.

[40] The defendants base their arguments on the wording of s. 38(3) and its predecessors and an article written by Michael Rotsztain. They argue that since s. 38(3) states:

> (3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.

Therefore, if you are not a named plaintiff then you will not share in the proceeds. If notice is not given to the other creditors to allow them to join and effectively add their name to the action before it is initiated, then the purpose of the act is frustrated. Rotsztain's article also states that the participating s. 20 (now s. 38) creditors will be the named applicants, plaintiffs or petitioners, as the case may be.

[41] One cannot look at the words of s. 38(3) alone without looking at the bigger picture. Once a Trustee is appointed for the estate it is to act for the benefit of the estate and its creditors without partiality to any party. Section 38 is an exception to the normal course of events because it is triggered when the Trustee refuses or neglects to take legal proceedings, for whatever reasons, and therefore assigns its rights in the action to any creditor who is willing to take the action over himself. The section allows other creditors or all the creditors to join in the proceeding if they so wish. It would make sense that only those creditors who wished to take the risk of the action on would benefit from any fruits the action may bring. Therefore s. 38(3) clarifies this point exactly. Instead of the benefits of the action accruing to the estate of the bankrupt, the benefits will first accrue to those creditors who chose to take the risk.

[42] Section 38(3) is not intended to exclude "joining" creditors from enjoying the benefits of the action. Section 38(3) does not specifically exclude "joining" creditors. I believe that "creditor instituting the proceeding" can be interpreted as including those creditors who join, after being given notice. There is no need for all creditors to be named plaintiffs. Only those creditors who obtain the s. 38 order must be named as plaintiffs. They are given the right, statutorily, under s. 38 to take the action. The order in this case also provides that other creditors may join by agreement. In fact, as the Defendants have said, historically only the creditors who obtained the order have been named plaintiffs. This did not affect the agreement with the other joining creditors who elected to join after receiving notice. The agreement still provided for a pro rata sharing. The nature of the action is not affected by who is named as plaintiff. The action was a right that was vested in the bankrupt, then the Trustee and now may be pursued by a creditor.

[43] Waffle's Electric Ltd. v. Davis (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 316 (Ont. H.C.), supports the contention that not all joining creditors must be named plaintiffs. In that case an order was obtained under s. 20 (now s. 38) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3, allowing one creditor to maintain an action. Two other creditors joined by agreement with the creditor pursuant to the order. The defendants, due to a concern about security for costs, sought to have both of the joining creditors added as party plaintiffs. Justice Carruthers held: "I do not think that the scheme provided by the Bankruptcy Act envisages that creditors who ask to join the action be made party plaintiffs." He therefore declined to order that the creditors be made party plaintiffs.

[44] In Re Carex Distributors Inc. (1981), 43 C.B.R. (N.S.) 209 (Ont. C.A.), a creditor, who was also a defendant, applied to the Court to be permitted to join in an action pursuant to s. 20 of the Bankruptcy Act initiated by another creditor. The Court of Appeal held that a defendant who is also a creditor is permitted to participate in the proceedings. The Court further ordered that the action shall be taken in the name of the initiating creditor in its own name, as provided by the order. This case clearly implies that a joining creditor need not be named as a plaintiff to share in the costs and benefits of the action. Imprimerie canadienne Gazette v. Turcotte (supra) referred to Re Carex, stating that the defendant who was permitted to join in the proceedings, however, did not become a plaintiff. The creditor who applied for the order was ordered to take the proceedings in his name.

[45] In fact in the precedent form of order, found in Houlden and Morawetz, the order states that "the applicant (of the s. 38 order) may and it is hereby authorized to commence and prosecute proceedings in its own name and at its own expense ..." [vol. 2, p. 12-9]. Furthermore it stated that [vol. 2, p. 12-9]:

> ... all benefits to be derived from the proceedings authorized by this order together with the costs of same, shall belong exclusively to the applicant, and to such other creditors of the said bankrupt who may within seven days of the service upon them of the notice of the granting of this order as hereinafter provided, agree to contribute pro rata according to the amount of their respective claims to the expense and risk of such proceedings, and who within the like time in writing directed to E.F., solicitors for the applicant herein, signify their agreement.

This form implies that the creditors who obtain the order are permitted to commence the action in their name; however, other creditors who wish to join may do so by agreement. The order in the case at bar has similar provisions.

[46] The Petitioners cite Re Bernard Motors Ltd. (1958), 18 D.L.R. (2d) 528 (N.B.C.A.), and Re B. Donovan Interiors Ltd. reflex, (1990), 3 C.B.R. (3d) 196 (N.S.T.D.), which both refer to orders that contain the provisions mentioned above. The order authorizes the commencing of the action in the name of the creditor applying for the order. The order further provides for the sharing of the costs and the benefits between all creditors who choose to join by agreement in writing.

[47] I find that in order for a creditor to join in the proceedings initiated by another creditor pursuant to s. 38, he does not have to become a party plaintiff. The point is that it does not matter who is named as plaintiff. As long as there is a creditor who can be made liable for costs, it is not necessary to name all creditors. The joining creditor contributes to the costs and enjoys the potential benefits as provided in the order and the agreement signed between the creditors. The nature of the action does not change if all or one creditor is named as plaintiff. As stated in Re Parallels Restaurant Ltd. (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 266 (B.C.S.C.), by Justice Campbell, "The s. 20 order does not affect the substance or rights of the party against whom the order is directed. The issue on an application for such an order is between the trustee and the creditor applying for the order" (p. 268). Hence the fact that notice was given to the creditors after the action was commenced will not preclude them from joining the action. They are not prejudiced.

[48] The intention of s. 38, stated by all parties, is to preclude any opportunity for preference of one creditor over others, thereby requiring notice to all other creditors of the action. This was done in the case at bar. Five creditors have agreed to participate and will join in sharing the costs and the potential benefits. They are not precluded from joining even if the notice was given after the action was commenced and after the limitation period has expired. The cause of action is affected by the limitation period. The cause of action has not been altered, nor have any parties been added to the cause of action that would cause difficulties. They are not prejudiced by lack of notice before the statement of claim was issued. The policy objective of s. 38, to preclude an opportunity for preference of one creditor over others, is not frustrated. It must be noted that if the Plaintiffs had failed to commence the action immediately then the other creditors would have been prejudiced. All creditors would have lost the opportunity to bring the action forever. As stated, the nature of the action is the same and the creditors are not "plaintiffs" in the true sense that they were the "harmed" ones. The s. 38 order has merely transferred the bankrupt's rights to the chose in action over to the creditors. The requirements of s. 38 have been met.

[49] The next issue to consider is whether the assignment from the Trustee to the Plaintiffs complies with the requirements of s. 38.

[50] Section 38(2) states that the Trustee shall assign to the creditor all its rights, title, and interest in the chose in action of the proceeding. Houlden and Morawetz state at p. 1-129 that the right to take proceedings under s. 38 is conferred on the creditor not by the assignment but by law, and the creditor is not an assignee of the rights of the trustee. The assignment is not a condition of the creditor's acquired right to take the action, but merely a consequence of it. Therefore if there is a defect in the assignment, it will not frustrate the creditor's ability to commence the action. It is merely a procedural step.

[51] The standard precedent in Houlden and Morawetz, vol. 2, at pp. 12-9 - 12-10 states:

> ... the trustee shall within four days of service of this order upon him, execute an assignment assigning all his right, title and interest in the subject matter of the proceedings and ... such assignment shall vest in A.B. and such other creditors as may join in these proceedings ...

[52] The section implies that the assignment will be made immediately to the creditors applying for the order under s. 38. Therefore the assignment will be made before it is known who the other joining creditors will be. This is evident in the section in the precedent, that gives the other creditors 7 days notice to respond to indicate their willingness to participate. The applicants of the s. 38 order are assigned the right to bring the action almost immediately upon receiving the order, as evident by the form of orders. In the case at bar, the assignment is made within 4 days of service of the order and the other creditors have 60 days to indicate their willingness to participate. There is nothing unusual in these provisions.

[53] A fifth issue is whether the action commenced by Toyota and Hyundai can be classed as a "derivative action" and, if so, must it comply with the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act, which the Defendants allege did not occur. The first question to examine is whether the action is, indeed, a derivative one for, if it isn't, there is no need to see if it complies with the Canada Business Corporations Act.

[54] The defendants argue that the claims advanced by the plaintiffs are claims that can only be advanced by International Warranty Company Ltd. and therefore the plaintiffs would have to commence a derivative action. Further, that if this is a derivative action, the conditions precedent must be complied with as set out in the Canada Business Corporations Act, which they have not been.

[55] The Defendants are right in one sense, this is an action that the bankrupt, International, could have brought. It was a right, an asset, a chose-in-action vested in International. However, since International has gone bankrupt, all of its assets and liabilities have since been vested in the Trustee. A right to bring a legal action is an asset. Through s. 38, the Trustee can transfer his right to take this action to a creditor. Hence the creditor gains the right to take this action pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act. The creditors are not taking this action on the basis of being "an interested party" affected by a harm done to International Warranty. They are taking the action as if they stood in the shoes of International (or the Trustee, once they went bankrupt). This is not a derivative action. It is allowed by the Bankruptcy Act and not pursuant to the Canada Business Corporations Act.

[56] The Plaintiffs have raised the issue of whether these Defendants have the status to challenge the s. 38 order on the basis of any alleged procedural irregularities.

[57] I think the correct view of this issue was well stated by Paris J. in the B.C.S.C. decision of A & B Construction Co. v. Reid (1985), 56 C.B.R. (N.S.) 232, at pp. 234-35 where he said:

> The applicants on this motion are defendants in the action and their rights are, of course, directly affected. It seems to me that if the commencement of the proceedings in which their interests are affected is permitted by a statutory scheme only under certain conditions, namely, an order of the court authorizing it, then they should be permitted to inquire into whether those conditions have been complied with. Furthermore, if they could demonstrate that the order authorizing the proceedings was a nullity as having been made without jurisdiction, then that would surely dispose of the proceedings and they should be permitted to raise that issue in those proceedings.

[58] In the end result, I have concluded that the order granted does directly affect the Defendants and they, therefore, have status to question the validity of the order.

[59] The application to strike down the order is hereby refused. The Statement of claim issued pursuant to the order will stand.

[60] Counsel did address specifically the question of the costs of this application. As I have largely upheld the Plaintiffs' position, I think they are entitled to their costs of defending this application. If counsel cannot agree how these should be calculated they are welcome to come back to me for directions.

Application dismissed.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE CONRAD

[1] The question of law in this appeal is whether a statement of claim issued pursuant to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (now known as the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 2) ('the Bankruptcy Act"), without prior notice to other creditors, is a nullity. I am of the view it is not, and would dismiss the appeal.

The Facts

[2] The respondents, Toyota Canada Inc. ("Toyota") and Hyundai Auto Canada Limited ("Hyundai") are two of the main creditors of International Warranty Company Limited ("International") who went into receivership by court order, December 31, 1987. On November 9, 1992, an order was obtained under the Bankruptcy Act appointing a trustee in bankruptcy. Toyota and Hyundai forwarded a letter, on November 10, 1992, to the trustee requesting him to commence the proceeding which is the subject-matter of this appeal. The trustee, by letter dated November 18, 1992, communicated that he had made a decision not to pursue the litigation because the estate did not have the required funds. He proceeded without consultation with the inspectors, as it was not possible to prepare a proper list of creditors, or have a first meeting of creditors, in time to avoid the limitation risk that existed with respect to the action.

[3] November 23rd was the last day under the Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. L-15 for filing the statement of claim. On that date, Toyota and Hyundai, on notice to the trustee of International, made application for an order under s.38 of the Bankruptcy Act, authorizing them to take proceedings in this action. It is common ground that the cause of action in this suit is that of the bankrupt, and it is only by virtue of s. 38 that Toyota and Hyundai have the right to sue. While notice of that application was given to parties other than the trustee (including the appellant Lloyds Bank Canada), generally the creditors were not served.

[4] The Chambers Judge granted the application of Toyota and Hyundai, authorizing them to commence proceedings. That order included the following paragraph:

> Subject to paragraph 12, all benefits to be derived from the proceedings authorized by this Order together with the costs of same shall belong exclusively to the applicants and to such other creditors of the bankrupt who may within sixty (60) days of service upon them of the notice of the granting of this Order agree to contribute pro rata according to the amount of their respective claims to the expense and risk of such proceedings, and who within the like time in writing directed to the law firm of Reynolds, Mirth, Richards & Farmer, solicitors for the applicants, signify their agreement pursuant to the form of agreement attached as Schedule "B" to this Order. The applicants shall also within 60 days of this Order provide security in the amount of 5% of their claims, less all costs and fees incurred by them in accordance with paragraph 14 hereof.

On November 23rd, the trustee assigned to Toyota and Hyundai its interest in this cause of action. Pursuant to the order and the assignment, the statement of claim was issued that day, and thereafter notice to creditors was served on all known creditors. Of the creditors served, five elected to become involved in the action with the plaintiffs, and signed a written agreement.

[5] Several of the named defendants sought to set aside the order of the Chambers Judge and strike the statement of claim as being a nullity. At the time of that application, the limitation period for commencing this action had expired. The judge dismissed the application, and the appellants now appeal from that order. Although many issues were raised before the Chambers Judge, the hearing of this appeal revolved around the failure to give notice to creditors prior to issuance of the statement of claim.

Analysis

[6] Section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act provides the mechanism for creditors to proceed with an action of the bankrupt where the trustee refuses or fails to act, without which Hyundai and Toyota would have no cause of action against the defendants. Since the right of a creditor to bring an action under s. 38 is purely statutory, a creditor must bring itself strictly within the provisions of the section in order to exercise the powers provided by it (see In re Andrew Motherwell (1924), 4 C.B.R. 484 (Ont.S.C.) at 486; Re Points of Call Airlines Ltd. (1990), 80 C.B.R. 157 (B.C.S.C.) at 164).

> (1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceedings that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of the bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceedings, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk, on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding, and on such other terms and conditions as the court may direct.
> (2) On an order under subsection (1) being made, the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor all his right, title and interest in the chose in action or subject-matter of the proceeding, including any document in support thereof.
> (3) Any benefit derived from a proceeding taken pursuant to subsection (1), to the extent of his claim and the costs, belongs exclusively to the creditor instituting the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, belongs to the estate.

[8] The appellants rely on the decision in B.N.R. Holdings Ltd. v. Royal Bank of Canada, 1992 CanLII 1093 (BC CA), [1993] 2 W.W.R. 471 (B.C.C.A.) for the proposition that notice is a condition precedent to the validity of the action. In B.N.R. Holdings Ltd., supra, Seaton, J.A. comments on the distinction between s. 38 applications and those brought under s. 69 to allow continuation of a creditor's action, when he states at p. 479:

> In the cases that granted leave nunc pro tunc that have been brought to our attention, it could be said that there was a cause of action when the proceedings were commenced. In those cases, suing a trustee (ss. 37 and 215) or a bankrupt (s. 69), the plaintiff has a claim that it cannot present without leave. In cases under s. 38, on the other hand, the plaintiff has no claim to present. Until the trustee assigns the claim the plaintiff has no status to start the action. That is not a mere technical error. The plaintiff has no cause of action absent the assignment. It can only receive the assignment after complying with the statute.

He also sets out what he considers to be the five conditions to obtaining a s. 38 order:

> (1) The creditor must request the trustee to take proceedings,
> (2) The trustee must refuse or neglect to take proceedings,
> (3) The creditor must apply to the court for an order authorizing it to take proceedings in its own name,
> (4) Notice of the contemplated proceedings must be given to the other creditors,

With respect to those five conditions, Seaton, J.A. commented at p. 479:

> These are not just procedural steps. The assignment is essential - it is the foundation for the action. Clearly each of the other steps must precede the assignment.

[9] This reasoning differs from that in Imprimerie Canadienne Gazette v. Turcotte (1991), 50 Q.A.C. 152 (Que.CA), where the Quebec Court of Appeal approves its earlier decisions requiring that the pursuing creditor must satisfy two conditions precedent: first, to ask the trustee to take proceedings, and second, if the trustee refuses, to obtain the Court's authorization. Fish, J.A. states at p. 156-7:

> Case law also favours the position that the permission of the inspectors is not required under s. 38(1). As mentioned earlier, this court has set out two conditions precedent for an action under s. 38: failure or refusal of the trustee to take an action when requested to do so, and permission of the court. There is no mention, as a further requirement, that the inspectors authorize the proceeding: see Bank of Montreal v. Elliott and Manifattura Lane Gaetano Marzotto, supra.

[10] I approach this issue in two stages: firstly, does the section require that the notice be given before the action is commenced; and, secondly, if it does, is it a condition precedent or merely a procedural irregularity which can be cured?

[11] The Chambers Judge did not deal squarely with the jurisdictional issue of notice, but certainly took a purposive approach to interpretation of the section. He found that the intention of s. 38 in requiring notice, was to preclude any opportunity for preference of one creditor over others, which he satisfied by the terms of his order. Following the application to vary his order, the Chambers Judge stated:

> Five creditors have agreed to participate and will join in sharing the costs and potential benefits. They are not precluded from joining even if the notice was given after the action was commenced and after the limitation period has expired. The cause of action is affected by the limitation period. The cause of action has not been altered, nor have any parties been added to the cause of action that would cause difficulties. They are not prejudiced by lack of notice before the statement of claim was issued. The policy objective of section 38, to preclude an opportunity for preference of one creditor over others, is not frustrated. It must be noted that if the Plaintiffs had failed to commence the action immediately then the other creditors would have been prejudiced. All creditors would have lost the opportunity to bring the action forever.

[12] The general rule of interpretation of the Bankruptcy Act has been commented on specifically by the Supreme Court of Canada in Mercure v. Marquette & Fils Inc., 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547, at p. 556 where it is stated:

> Before going on to another point it is perhaps not inappropriate to recall that the Bankruptcy Act, while not business legislation in the strict sense, clearly has its origins in the business world. Interpretation of it must take these origins into account. It concerns relations among businessmen, and to interpret it using an overly narrow, legalistic approach is to misinterpret it. It seems to me that appellant is urging the Court to so interpret it.

> Any interpretation to be given to the meaning and scope of sec. 35 should be a liberal one, and not a construction that would debar a creditor, if he is prepared to undertake the risk, of the right to proceed for his own benefit.

[14] What then is the purpose of section 38? In my view, its primary purpose is to ensure that the bankrupt's assets are preserved for the benefit of the creditors. It provides the mechanism for creditors to proceed with an action when the trustee refuses or fails to act; thereby ensuring that assets of the bankrupt (which may otherwise go unrecovered) are available to creditors willing to finance the litigation.

[15] The secondary purpose, relating to notice, is to make sure the section operates fairly. While it is fair that those parties willing to accept the risks and costs of litigation receive a preference in terms of recovering their losses, the right to that preference must be shared with all creditors. To ensure that no creditor receives an unfair advantage over another, the section requires that notice be given to all other creditors. The interpretation of the requirement of notice should be approached with this distinction, and purpose, in mind.

[16] It is necessary to address the meaning of the words "...the creditor may obtain an order...on notice being given the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding..." in s. 38(1). There appear to be three alternative interpretations:

(1) "contemplated proceeding" refers to the application for a s. 38 order, and therefore notice to the creditors of that application is required before the application for a s. 38 order is made;

(2) "contemplated proceeding" refers to the statement of claim, and "on notice" should be read to mean "after notice". This means that notice is required before the statement of claim has been issued;

(3) "contemplated proceeding" refers to that proceeding contemplated by the order (in this case the statement of claim), and while notice must be given, the timing of that notice is flexible. The reason for the phrase "contemplated proceeding" is because at the time the order is made the proceeding is only "contemplated". This interpretation would mean that the order may be obtained, but there will be a condition in the order to give notice and to do such other things as the court directs.

[17] At first blush, the first alternative appears to technically fit best with subsections 38(2) and (3). Section 38(2) provides that "...on the order being made...the trustee shall assign and transfer to the creditor..." all his interest in the action. Section 38(3) then provides that the creditor is entitled to the benefit of the proceeding to the extent of its claim and costs. Since the duty to assign occurs immediately on the making of the order, a strict reading would require that it is only the creditor that receives the assignment who would have an opportunity to participate. If that were true, notice would be required before the application so that those creditors who were interested in participating could be assignees.

[18] There is, however, authority to support the position that the application stage only requires notice to the trustee. Fish, J.A. in Imprimerie Canadienne Gazette, supra, dealt with this issue at p. 157, where he says:

> In Re Parallels Restaurant Ltd. (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 266 (B.C.S.C), it was held that the issue under s. 20 (now s. 38), at least initially, is between the trustee and the pursuing creditor. Notice therefore does not have to be given to the defendant or to the other creditors until after the court order is made; nor is the trustee obliged to call a meeting of the creditors before deciding not to proceed with the action. See also: Re Swerdlow (1985), 57 C.B.R. (N.S.) 180 (Ont. S.C.); Re Wagon Stop Inc. (1979), 30 C.B.R. (N.S.) 63 (Ont. S.C.)

[19] In fact, the position taken by the appellants is the second alternative interpretation, namely, that notice is required before the statement of claim has been issued. As a matter of statutory interpretation, they argue the words "on notice being given" must be read "after notice being given", and cite R. v. Arkwright, 12 Adol.& E., N.S., 960, 966 as authority for the proposition.

[20] The respondents opt for the third interpretation, and say that the timing of the notice is not mandated by the section, and the requirements of the section are met by the judge providing for notice to the creditors, along with any other terms and conditions he sees fit, so that the objects of the Act can be met. In any event, they say the obligation is directory only, and not substantive, and can be cured.

> ...no notice was given to the other creditors. To this day, it is not clear they know that the judge transferred away from them at least some of the fruit of the litigation. They were entitled to notice. It is no answer to say it was a better deal than any other offer. They should decide, or at least have a chance to be heard on the point. That is why s. 38 requires notice to the creditors. It is at least equally vital that they know of a proposed assignment to a shareholder.

While this quote is helpful on the importance of notice, I do not read it as demanding that notice occur prior to commencement of proceedings as long as creditors' rights are preserved.

[22] On a strict interpretation, I acknowledge that both alternatives (2) and (3) present difficulties because s. 38(2) and (3) appear to suggest that only the creditor who receives the assignment would obtain the benefit. In my view, that is far too narrow an approach. The judge can, as he did in this case, provide for one creditor to receive the assignment on terms and conditions that allow others to join in and participate. Requiring notice before the statement of claim can lead to unreasonable, if not absurd, results. The definition of creditor under the Bankruptcy Act is a broad one and a bankruptcy may occur near the end of a limitation period, when ascertainment of an exhaustive list of creditors would not be possible. It is also easy to imagine a lawsuit proceeding, past its prescription date, and suddenly a "new creditor" appears. Would the section intend the action to be a nullity? I think not. It goes against the primary object of the Act to suggest that a failure of notice to creditors should defeat the cause of action. Notice is unrelated to the main purpose.

[23] I accept that the proper approach to interpretation is a purposive one, and the third interpretation best meets the purpose. It meets the objectives of preserving the bankrupt's assets, while still providing fairness to creditors.

[24] The defendants to the action have no interest in what creditors participate and share in the proceeds of the action. If the bankrupt has an asset in the nature of a cause of action, the defendants cannot be heard to complain if the suit is pursued on behalf of the bankrupt's estate, if done within the limitation period. They are not prejudiced because the cause of action exists, albeit in another person. The words "on notice being given to the other creditors of the contemplated proceeding" simply means that the other creditors must be given notice of the proceedings contemplated by the order. It must be a condition contained within the order. A judge can address, having regard to all the circumstances of the application, the timing of the notice and the means of participation in both the lawsuit and the proceeds. I agree with the trial judge's comments, quoted earlier, with respect to the ability of creditors to apply to participate subsequent to the commencement of the action.

[25] In the event I am wrong on the interpretation of and the timing of notice under s. 38, I would find that notice is not a condition precedent and could be cured if necessary. I recognize this appears to be contrary to the decision in B.N.R. Holdings Limited v. Royal Bank of Canada, supra. However, in that case the Court was dealing with a fact situation where the action was commenced without an order under s. 38, and the Court ruled on whether the action could be saved by the issuance of an order under s. 38 nunc pro tunc. Any discussion on the issue of notice to the creditor is obiter dicta. The case was not dealing with the interpretation of the notice provision or the timing of notice, Thus a provision in the order for notice would suffice, if my interpretation is correct. In any event, I prefer the reasoning in

Imprimerie Canadienne Gazette that there are only two conditions precedent to the commencement of proceedings. Firstly, failure or refusal of the trustee to act, and secondly, the court order under s. 38.

[26] Moreover, this is more consistent with the holding of the Supreme Court of Canada in Traders Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Emilien Levesque, 1960 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1961] S.C.R. 83, dealing with a similar provision. The Supreme Court, at page 87, said: "Cette obligation est une conséquence et non une condition du droit préférence et du droit de poursuivre pour l'exercer." The assignment of the action to the creditor is not a condition precedent to the action being brought, but a consequence of the order under s. 38. Thus, the creditor's right to carry on the action does not flow from the assignment by the trustee, but is a function of law upon the granting of the s. 38 order. Nor does it flow directly from notice. Notice is required to deal with the results of the order.

[27] In my view, if notice is required, it is merely procedural, and any irregularity can be cured. Section 187 of the Bankruptcy Act allows that procedural irregularities may be cured. Section 187(9) reads:

> (9) No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of the opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court.

[28] No substantial injustice has been caused by the failure to give notice before the statement of claim was issued. The defendants are not prejudiced. If the action against them has merit, they are liable, and not entitled to any benefit directed solely for the protection of the creditors. The action was brought against the defendants in time and they suffer no substantial injustice. In addition, no creditor can be said to have been harmed. The judge has jurisdiction to impose whatever conditions may be necessary to do justice. In this case all creditors were given notice of the proceedings after the statement of claim was issued. No creditor has been precluded from joining the action in terms of contributing to the costs and sharing in the proceeds. The creditors could have suffered harm if the statement of claim had not been issued when it was, as the limitation period was about to expire. Any substantial injustice that may have occurred would, in any event, be curable by order under s. 187(11) of the Bankruptcy Act which allows the court "...to extend the time either before or after the expiration date..." for doing any act or thing for which the time is limited. Therefore the court could permit service of notice on the creditors after the statement of claim has been issued. But as all the creditors have already been notified in the proceeding, this step is unnecessary.

[29] In summary, the notice required by s. 38(1) need not be served prior to the commencement of the proceeding, and is most properly dealt with by the court when granting the order, to ensure that all creditors are provided with ample opportunity to participate in the action in such manner as the court directs. There is ample jurisdiction in section 38 for a judge to deal with all the issues required to do justice between creditors. Even if notice was required prior to issuance, it is not a substantive condition nullifying the statement of claim.

WEILER J.A.:

INTRODUCTION

[1] These appeals raise the issue of whether a trustee in bankruptcy may claim fees in excess of the tariff allowed for the summary administration of the estate of a bankrupt, and raise issues of priority amongst those claiming a fee for the administration of a bankrupt's estate.

BACKGROUND

[2] Farley J. determined five questions of law on a Rule 21 motion and these same questions form the basis of this appeal. While there are many factual issues between the parties, for purposes of the motion, an agreed statement of facts, as well as a compendium of materials, were provided for the assistance of the court. In order to provide context for the issues I will be discussing, it will be helpful to give a brief outline of some of the facts.

[3] In 1992 and 1993, the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy ("Superintendent") found that Marshall Sone and Marshall Sone Receiver and Trustee Ltd. ("Sone") had made unauthorized withdrawals from the trust accounts of some of the bankruptcy estates under its administration resulting in shortfalls in those accounts. The Superintendent believed that Sone had converted those funds to his own use, and required that Sone cease further draws from the consolidated trust account ("CTA") with respect to the estates under summary administration. (The CTA is a trust account in which the funds from the summary administration of estates are pooled in one account. In ordinary administration estates, the trustee is required to open a separate bank account for each estate.) The Superintendent and Sone agreed that Sone would surrender his trustee's licence in November 1994 and, in the interim, would seek another trustee to work with him to supervise and complete the administration of the bankruptcy estates. The professional fees generated from work on the estates were to be applied to offset the shortfalls in the trust accounts. It was recognized, however, that the ongoing operations of Sone required funding to ensure the practice would not shut down and the estates would be administered. Consequently, the Superintendent permitted Sone to withdraw money from the CTA to cover overhead expenses.

[4] In May 1994, Rumanek and Cooper ("Rumanek") agreed to act as joint trustee of the estates being administered by Sone ("the Sone estates") in exchange for a portion of Sone's fees, and this agreement was approved by the Superintendent. When Sone did not complete administration of the estates within the time envisaged, Rumanek began paying the office and overhead expenses of Sone's staff who were engaged in administering the estates. Rumanek was appointed sole trustee by court order of Houlden J. in December 1995. At the time, Houlden J. allowed Rumanek to make a withdrawal on account of disbursements and expenses for administering the Sone estates in the amount of $120,000 from the ordinary trust accounts and the CTA. There is an issue as to whether this interim withdrawal by Rumanek and the permitted withdrawals of Sone are to be deducted from any fees due as trustee.

[5] While acting as sole trustee, Rumanek encountered numerous difficulties that caused it to spend a great deal of time on the Sone estates. The trustee's fees for the summary administration of estates are governed by a tariff which has a ceiling. This is not the case with ordinary estates. The fees of ordinary estates are subject to approval by the inspectors appointed at the first meeting of creditors and taxation by the court. In 1996, Rumanek obtained an order from the Master allowing it to convert 545 summary administration estates to ordinary estates. The effect of converting the estates was to potentially allow Rumanek to charge a higher fee.

Digitized by Google

Once the administration of an estate is complete, the trustee submits for review by the Official Receiver a draft Statement of Receipts and Disbursements that includes the fee to be charged. The Official Receiver then issues a "letter of comment" upon the draft Statement. Unless the Official Receiver indicates that taxation is necessary, once any other issues in the letter of comment are completed, the trustee proceeds to discharge. Upon discharge, the trustee is allowed to draw from its CTA an amount equal to the balance of the fees provided in the approved Statement of Receipts and Disbursements. Rumanek was of the opinion it was not receiving timely letters of comment from the Official Receiver. Rumanek sought and obtained an order from the Master that the requirement of "comment" by the Official Receiver on the trustee's accounts with respect to 20 estates be waived.

[6] The orders converting the 545 estates from summary to ordinary administration, and the order waiving the requirement of the Official Receiver's approval of its fees on the 20 estates, were set aside on appeal in May 1999.

[7] Rumanek was losing money badly on the administration of the estates. Consequently, it asked to be discharged for cause as trustee pursuant to s. 41(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), and this discharge was granted in May 1997. The Superintendent took control of the estates and, after a period of interim guardianship, Howard Wasserman was appointed guardian of the estates in February 1998. The firm Wasserman, Arsenault ("Wasserman") was appointed guardian in August 1998. Wasserman made an agreement with the Superintendent of Bankruptcy that the Superintendent would pay it a specified amount. The Superintendent is subrogated to Wasserman's claim for its fees on the estates under its administration.

[8] In July 1998, fourteen months after obtaining a discharge as trustee, Rumanek brought a motion seeking a declaration that it is entitled to payment of extraordinary expenses and increased fees totalling in excess of $1 million in administering the Sone estates. Rumanek also asserts that it is entitled to a first charge against the funds and any other assets in the Sone estates. In addition, Rumanek sued the Superintendent in Bankruptcy alleging damages for fraud and, in the alternative, claimed declaratory relief, namely fees and expenses, for work allegedly performed at the request of the Superintendent. Rumanek then sought court approval to bring the action nunc pro tunc. In May 1999, Blair J. dismissed Rumanek's motion insofar as the allegations of fraud were concerned against the Superintendent without prejudice to the motion being revived on proper affidavit evidence by Mr. Rumanek. Subsequently, Blair J. imposed a time limit of November 15, 1999 to bring the motion for leave to sue the Superintendent for fraud. Rumanek did not pursue the matter. Blair J. allowed the claim for fees and expenses against the Superintendent to proceed and it is still outstanding.

[9] In addition to Rumanek's claim for fees against the estates, the Guardian's administration was further complicated by certain third party claims to the CTA which ultimately came to an end as a result of a claims barring process. This is a process whereby the Guardian advertises for any claims to the CTA and, if no such claims are made by a certain date, the court issues an order barring any subsequent claims against the CTA or the Guardian. No new claims emerged. As a result, the only claims to the CTA are those of the Guardian, Rumanek and Sone as well as Sone's banker, CIBC. A brief explanation respecting the claim of CIBC is necessary at this point.

[10] At the same time as Houlden J. dealt with Rumanek's motion to withdraw funds from the CTA, he had before him a motion by Sone's banker, CIBC, to withdraw $71,000 from the CTA. CIBC's position is that it was not informed of the conservatory measures instigated by the Superintendent and continued to finance Sone's operating expenses to the extent of over $71,000. In December 1995, CIBC brought an application before Houlden J. to draw $71,000 in compensation for the expenses it had incurred in allowing the continued administration of the Sone estates. This application was heard at the same time as Rumanek's. Houlden J. ordered that CIBC be entitled to draw $71,000 as reimbursement for the expenses it had incurred, but later ordered that the money be returned, holding that CIBC could renew its application for payment upon proving the expenses. CIBC reapplied and this application was heard in September 1999 by Blair J.

[11] CIBC took the position before Blair J. that the effect of the orders of Houlden J. was to determine its entitlement to the $71,000 on the merits, subject to the production of vouchers to satisfy an accounting. Counsel for the Superintendent, the Guardian, and Rumanek took the position that all CIBC could do was renew its application on the merits at which time all issues "including the issues of priority regarding other claimants" would be open for determination, and that Blair J. could not interpret the order of another judge. In his endorsement, Blair J. stated: "Highly experienced judge that he [Houlden J.] was in this area (and many others) I am satisfied that if he had meant to expose CIBC to the priority contests he would have said so. He did not." In his order Blair J. allowed CIBC to apply for payment of the $71,000 on production of vouchers, but stated that "[t]he issue of priority, however, is not open for determination." The Superintendent appealed the order of Blair J. This court was not persuaded that Blair J. was in error, and dismissed that appeal on June 6, 2000. On the appeal before us, there is an issue as to the interpretation of the order of Blair J.

[12] To resolve some of the outstanding legal issues expeditiously, Rumanek and CIBC brought a Rule 21 motion before Farley J. based on an agreed statement of facts. He dealt with five questions, each of which is the subject of appeal. I will deal with these questions in the course of addressing the issues raised by the appellants.

THE FIVE QUESTIONS OF LAW AND THE ANSWERS OF FARLEY J.

[13] The five questions of law and the answers of Farley J. with respect to each of them are as follows:

Q.1. Does the Court have jurisdiction upon the taxation of a summary administration bankruptcy to allow an amount for fees which exceeds the tariff of fees for summary administration estates stipulated under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") and Bankruptcy and Insolvency Rules (the "Rules"). If so, what are the principles which must be applied in allowing such excess?

A.1. The court does not have jurisdiction to allow fees in summary administration bankruptcy estates which exceed the tariff.

Q.2. Is there any jurisdiction for the Bankruptcy Court, the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the "Superintendent") or a Trustee to withdraw or authorize the withdrawal of amounts from the estate funds held with respect to a summary administration estate for the payment of any amount other than a trustee's proper taxed fees and disbursements related to administration of the estate in question. Specifically, must the withdrawals made by Rumanek & Cooper Ltd. ("R&C") from the consolidated trust account ("CTA") maintained with respect to the summary administration bankruptcy estates formerly administered by Sone with the approval of the Superintendent and/or the Court after the commencement of R&C's involvement in this matter be credited against amounts which may be found on taxation to be due to R&C or Sone for outstanding fees and disbursements related to the administration of such estates? If such withdrawals are allowed what are the principles which govern such withdrawals and how are they to be accounted for? Should the amount of $71,000 ordered by the Court to be paid to CIBC, if proven, be treated in any manner different from other withdrawals from the CTA?

A.2. The Court and the Superintendent do not have the jurisdiction to authorize the payment of funds from summary administration bankruptcy estates to cover items other than tariff fees and disbursements; there can be no extra compensation for overhead or other costs of a trustee. Specifically, the withdrawals by R&C from the CTA with the approval of the Superintendent or the court must be credited against the amounts which may be found on taxation to be due to R&C.

Q.3. Can any party claim payment out of the CTA for fees and disbursements payable to a Trustee other than those fees and disbursements directly related to administrating the Summary Administration Estates? Specifically, can any party claim payment out of the CTA for fees and disbursements arising out of matters such as the administration of the ordinary administration bankruptcy estates, or for the cost of dealing with ordinary or extraordinary administrative requests by the Superintendent or others? If such payments are allowed, what are the principles which govern the making of these payments and how are the payments to be allocated among the bankruptcy estates?

A.3. A trustee in bankruptcy cannot claim payment out of the CTA for fees and disbursements other than those related to such summary administration estates.

Q.4. Do the fees and disbursements of the Guardian with respect to its administration of the Summary Administration Estates which are under its administration have priority over the claims of other fee claimants against the CTA by reason of s. 136(1)(b)(i) of the BIA or on some other basis? If so, to what extent do the Guardian's fees and disbursements have priority? If not, what are the principles which should guide the Registrar in determining priority of payment among the competing fee claimants?

A.4. The claims of the Guardian have priority over the fee claims of R&C in the open bankruptcy estates pursuant to the BIA; this is not a retroactive application of the Act since fees and disbursements are only determined at the time that an estate is closed.

Q.5. If the amount in the CTA is insufficient to pay both the proper fees and disbursements payable out of the CTA fund and also the proper dividends that ought to be paid to creditors in the Summary Administration Estates which are not fully administered, how should the shortfall be allocated as between the fee claimants and the creditors?

A.5. Sone and then R&C must bear the burden of any shortfall in the CTA caused by excessive draws for fees and disbursements. With respect to the CIBC issue, it takes through Sone. The $71,000 payable to the CIBC cannot reduce the amount to which creditors in the estates are entitled to receive. It was never before Blair J. and the Court of Appeal that they were dealing with a shortfall situation.

[14] For the reasons that follow, I would uphold the decision of Farley J. and dismiss these appeals, with one clarification. In question five, Farley J. was asked to decide how any shortfall should be divided between fee claimants and creditors. I agree that the fee claimants must bear the loss. I also agree that the Guardian has priority over the fee claimants, including the C.I.B.C. Farley J. was not asked to decide how any shortfall should be further divided. To the extent that his reasons appear to do so, they should be considered obiter.

SUBMISSIONS AND ANALYSIS

The Rumanek Appeal

Issue #1: Did Farley J. err in holding that the Superior Court of Justice in Bankruptcy does not have the inherent jurisdiction to allow an amount for fees of a trustee in bankruptcy such as Rumanek which exceeds the tariff of fees for summary administration estates contemplated by s. 156 of the BIA and Rule 128 of the BIA General Rules?

[15] Section 156 of the BIA and Rule 128 are as follows:

156. Fees and disbursements of trustee – The trustee shall receive such fees and disbursements as may be prescribed.

128. (1) The fees of the trustee for services performed in a summary administration are calculated on the total receipts remaining after deducting necessary disbursements relating directly to the realization of the property of the bankrupt, and the payments to secured creditors, according to the following percentages:

(a) 100 per cent on the first $975 or less of receipts;
(b) 35 per cent on the portion of the receipts exceeding $975 but not exceeding $2,000; and
(c) 50 per cent on the portion of the receipts exceeding $2,000.

(2) A trustee in a summary administration may claim, in addition to the amount set out in subsection (1),

(a) the costs of counselling referred to in subsection 131(2);
(b) the fee for filing an assignment referred to in paragraph 132(a);
(c) the fee payable to the registrar under paragraph 1(a) of Part II of the schedule;
(d) the amount of applicable federal and provincial taxes for goods and services; and
(e) a lump sum of $100 in respect of administrative disbursements.

(3) A trustee in a summary administration may withdraw from the bank account used in administering the estate of the bankrupt, as an advance on the amount set out in subsection (1),

(a) $250, at the time of the mailing of the notice of bankruptcy;
(b) an additional $250, thirty days after the date of the bankruptcy; and
(c) an additional $250, four months after the date of the bankruptcy.

(4) Subsections (1) to (3) apply to bankruptcies in respect of which proceedings are commenced on or after September 30, 1997 and the accounts are taxed on or after April 30, 1998.

[16] Rumanek submits that Farley J. erred in holding that the Superior Court of Justice in Bankruptcy does not have the inherent jurisdiction to allow an amount for fees of a trustee in a bankruptcy in excess of this tariff schedule.

[17] Section 183(1) of the BIA gives the Superior Court "such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable them to exercise original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy and in other proceedings" authorized by the Act. Rumanek submits that, as a court of equity, the Bankruptcy Court possesses inherent jurisdiction to grant the equitable relief to create a charge in favor of Rumanek for fees and expenses incurred in the administration of the trust assets that are in excess of the tariff. In support of its submission, Rumanek relies in particular on Ontario (Registrar of Mortgage Brokers) v. Matrix Financial Corp. reflex, (1993), 106 D.L.R. (4th) 132 (Ont. C.A.). In that case, a receiver and substitute trustee appointed by the Registrar of Mortgage Brokers was granted a charge on the trust assets that had benefited from the work of the receiver, notwithstanding the questionable statutory authority for the receiver's appointment. Had the charge not been granted, the receiver could have been left without any means of reimbursement for its work. The instant case is thus distinguishable on several points, including the important fact that, unlike the receiver in Matrix, Rumanek's reimbursement is governed by the statutory scheme for a trustee in bankruptcy as set out pursuant to the BIA and the BIA General Rules.

[18] In Re Aue; Re Beckles; Re Blandsford; Re Borst (1984), 50 C.B.R. (NS) 186 (Ont. S.C.), in an appeal from the registrar's order disallowing a trustee's claim for fees in excess of the tariff for "extraordinary services" in a summary administration estate, the court held that the trustee's fees and disbursements must be limited in accordance with the Bankruptcy Act to those prescribed in the Bankruptcy Rules applicable to such estates. At p. 188 Catzman J. held that submissions in support of allowing fees and disbursements for the trustee in excess of the tariff fail to "address the fundamental question of the court's lack of jurisdiction to accomplish that objective which can, in my view, only properly be achieved through amendment of the present tariff provisions, not through their disregard by court officers who are charged with the responsibility to superintend their observance." In my opinion the decision of Catzman J. is dispositive of the issue.

[19] Rumanek submits, however, that because the court has a discretion to reduce the trustee's fees below the tariff, it must have a discretion to increase them above the tariff. In Re Vanderbank reflex, (1995), 42 C.B.R. (3d) 112, (Que. S.C.), the parties agreed that the Registrar and the court kept their discretion in equity to reduce the fees prescribed by the tariff. In that case, the court followed the decision of Henry J. in Re Frustaglio (1985), 56 C.B.R. (NS) 158 (Ont. H.C.J.), where he reduced the fees of a trustee who had deliberately delayed submitting his account in order to take advantage of the higher tariff in the new rules. Following the principle in Frustaglio, the court in Vanderbank held that it is only after a trustee has fulfilled all of the objectives under the BIA of liquidation, distribution and rehabilitation of the bankrupt that he is entitled to look to the tariff for compensation. Because the trustee had not administered the estate in accordance with the Act and his duties, his compensation was reduced.

[20] I would reject the submission that there is a discretion to increase the fees above the tariff because there is discretion to reduce them. Section 156 states that the trustee "shall receive" prescribed fees. The mandatory use of the word "shall" is indicative of the intention of the BIA that the tariff is the maximum that can be allowed. As pointed out by Farley J., although the Superior Court of Justice in Bankruptcy does possess equitable jurisdiction, "that does not confer on this Court the ability, capacity, or jurisdiction to do something not allowed by the BIA." By allowing only prescribed fees, s. 156 excludes any fees not prescribed by regulation. No fees other than the tariff in Rule 128 are prescribed. Former Bankruptcy Rule 117 specifically provided that amounts in excess of the tariff could be awarded if there were extraordinary services. Rule 117 has been repealed. This supports the interpretation that the tariff establishes the maximum fee that can be allowed.

[21] Also supportive of this interpretation is the Policy Statement of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy's Programs, effective April 1, 1994. It states that the duties of the Office of the Superintendent have been expanded with the passage of the amendments to the BIA. It specifies that, if the statutory duties of the trustee are not fulfilled within the time limits contemplated under the Act, or at all, the fees that the trustee charges should be reduced, and letters of comment to that effect would be issued. No reference is made to increasing fees.

[22] The trustee's fees are based on and limited by the receipts of each estate under summary administration; they cannot exceed those receipts no matter how much extra work has been done. There is a need for a cap on the fees a trustee can charge because the summary administration of estates is a low value, high volume business. On the other hand, the compensation awarded to a trustee under the tariff is for fulfilling the requirements of the work to be done in administering the bankrupt's estate. If the work has not been done, the Official Receiver can require in its letter of comment, upon the statement of receipts and disbursements submitted by the trustee, that the trustee tax its fee claim. There is no mechanism provided to allow a trustee to have a taxation on a summary administration of a bankrupt's estate in order to increase fees. This structure further reinforces the conclusion that the tariff amount may be reduced but not increased.

[23] The determination of this issue effectively determines the answers to issues 2, 3, and 4 raised by Rumanek on appeal. I will, however, briefly address each of these issues.

Issue # 2: Did Farley J. err in holding that the Superior Court of Justice in Bankruptcy and the Superintendent do not have the inherent jurisdiction to authorize the payment of amounts from the estate funds held with respect to a summary administration estate for the payment of any amount other than a trustee's fees and disbursements related to the administration of the estate in question?

[24] Section 25(1.3) of the BIA enables a trustee to withdraw money from the trust account on application to the court. By way of exception, the trustee may withdraw money for the payment of dividends and charges incidental to the administration of the estate without court approval and without the permission in writing of the inspectors.

[25] This section contemplates the payment of money from summary administration estate funds for amounts other than a trustee's fees and disbursements. What the section does not say is whether amounts withdrawn for the trustee's expenses must be deducted from the compensation to which the trustee is entitled. Rumanek submits that the amounts that Sone and Rumanek were permitted to withdraw from the CTA for overhead by the Superintendent and by Houlden J. should not be deducted from the fees that may be found to be due to Rumanek.

[26] I have already held that there is no jurisdiction to award fees for the administration of summary estates in excess of the tariff. To allow overhead and operating expenses in addition to a trustee's fees would enable the trustee to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. A person who receives payment for services performed does not receive payment, in addition, for the overhead and operating expenses incurred in earning those fees. In a similar vein, Rumanek is not entitled to charge as a disbursement, the services of Sone's employees for clerical work such as bookkeeping, rendering accounts and collection of estate moneys. See Re Bryant Isard (1923), 4 C.B.R. 41 (Ont. S.C.).

[27] The "draws" from the CTA authorized by the Superintendent and by Houlden J. meant that the freeze imposed by the Superintendent against the withdrawal of amounts on account of fees from the CTA was temporarily lifted to allow certain specific draws to be made. The order made by Houlden J. and the authorization of the Superintendent did not, however, change the character of the money drawn out so as to make it additional compensation.

Issue # 3: Did Farley J. err in finding that the requests for services emanating from the Superintendent which were directed at Rumanek did not constitute mandatory directives pursuant to s. 5(5) of the BIA?

[28] Section 5 of the BIA sets out the duties and powers of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy. Paragraph 5 of that section obliges every person to whom a directive is issued by the Superintendent under para. 4(b) or (c) to comply with the directive. Paragraph 4(b) requires a trustee to keep such records and to provide the Superintendent with such information as the Superintendent may require. Paragraph 4(c) enables the Superintendent to give directives in relation to the powers, duties and functions of trustees. While acknowledging that the Superintendent may have made requests of Rumanek for information, Farley J. held that these requests were not mandatory directives. In any event, to the extent that the requests related to the ordinary administration of the estates, the requests for information were covered by the tariff. To the extent that the requests were extraordinary, they did not relate to the regular administration of the estates and Rumanek could look to its lawsuit against the Superintendent. In my opinion, Farley J. did not err in holding that the requests for information were not mandatory directives.

Issue # 4: Did Farley J. err in finding that a trustee in bankruptcy such as Rumanek cannot claim payment out of a consolidated trust account in respect of the costs of extraordinary services performed pursuant to requests by the Superintendent?

[29] The Guardian's position is that Rumanek is in effect asking to be appointed receiver nunc pro tunc. It was not a receiver. It was a trustee. Farley J. recognized this and stressed in his reasons that Rumanek was a trustee. If Rumanek was performing services not ordinarily performed by a trustee at the request of the Superintendent in Bankruptcy, Rumanek should have sought a further appointment other than trustee. Alternatively Rumanek has its action against the Superintendent.

Issue # 5: Did Farley J. err in finding that the doctrine of laches applied to Rumanek's claim for fees in addition to the summary administration tariff, and to its claim against the CTA for fees and disbursements for extraordinary services performed in response to directives by the Superintendent?

[30] The doctrine of laches is an equitable doctrine. Two circumstances relevant to whether or not it should be applied are the length of the delay, including any explanation for the delay, and whether there would be any prejudice if the relief requested were now to be granted: Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd (1874), L.R. 5 P.C. 221 at 239-40; K.M. v. H.M., 1992 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6 at para. 96.

[31] At the time that Rumanek sought to be discharged as trustee for cause, Rumanek did not apply to be treated differently than an ordinary trustee. During the delay of 14 months before it came forward, the Guardian closed many files. There appears to be no explanation for the delay. If the claim of Rumanek is allowed then the creditors in the estates whose files are not closed will have to bear a greater burden than those in the estates that have been closed. In argument this was described as the "cross-collateralization issue". Rumanek cannot take money out of the CTA for estates whose funds are not in the trust account but which have all been paid out.

[32] Instead of claiming all of its extra fees against the estate files that are not closed, Rumanek proposes to claim a proportionate amount. This would still place the creditors in the estates that have not been closed in a worse position than the creditors in the estates that have been closed. Rumanek has not offered any rational reason that would justify this result. Rumanek knew the extent of the work it had done at the time it was discharged. It is too late now for Rumanek to effectively recharacterize its position as other than trustee in bankruptcy. Even if there were discretion in the court to award fees in excess of the tariff, it would be inequitable to award them now.

Issue # 6: Did Farley J. err in finding that Wasserman is entitled to priority over the funds in the CTA as a person acting under a direction made under section 14.03(1)(a) of the BIA as provided for in s. 136(1)(b)(i) of the BIA? In particular, did Farley J. err in applying the newly amended section 136(1)(b)(i) of the BIA to this case, notwithstanding the argument that the application of that section amounted to a retrospective application of legislation which defeated Rumanek's vested right to priority?

[33] Section 136(1)(b) subordinates claims for fees and expenses of a trustee to those of a person acting under a direction made by the Superintendent under section 14.03(1)(a). These sections provide, in part:

Digitized by Google

14.03 (1) The Superintendent may, for the protection of an estate in the circumstances referred to in subsection (2),
(a) direct a person to deal with property of the estate described in the direction in such manner as may be indicated in the direction, including the continuation of the administration of the estate;
...
136. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:
...
(b) the costs of administration, in the following order,
(i) the expenses and fees of any person acting under a direction made under paragraph 14.03(1)(a),
(ii) the expenses and fees of the trustee, ...

[34] The appellant submits that Farley J. erred in applying s. 136(1)(b) for two reasons which I will deal with summarily. The first reason is that Wasserman has not incurred fees and expenses because its fees and expenses are being paid by the Superintendent. The fact that the Guardian has an agreement to be paid by the Superintendent does not diminish its right to claim fees under s. 136(1)(b). The agreement of the Guardian with the Superintendent for the payment of fees, while subrogating the Superintendent to the Guardian's recovery of fees and disbursements out of the bankrupts' estates, is a financing device to allow the administration of the estates to move forward.

[35] The appellant alleges, secondly, that Farley J. applied s. 136(1)(b) retroactively. Section 136(1)(b), which gives priority to the fees of a person acting under the direction of the Superintendent over the trustee, came into force on September 30, 1997. Prior to this amendment the expenses of a trustee had first priority. Rumanek submits that on a number of files its work was substantially completed, with only certain procedural or administrative steps remaining, and that it had a vested right to payment for these files prior to the coming into force of s. 136(1)(b). Accordingly, Rumanek submits that it is entitled to payment on these files in priority to the Guardian, and that Farley J. erred in not recognizing this.

Legislation clearly is retroactive if it applies to facts all of which have ended before it comes into force. Legislation clearly is prospective if it applies to facts all of which began after its coming into force. But what of on-going facts, facts in progress? These are either continuing facts, begun but not ended when the legislation comes into force, or successive facts, some occurring before and some after commencement. The application of legislation to on-going facts is not retroactive because, to use the language of Dickson J. in [Gustavson Drilling (1964) Ltd. v. M.N.R. 1975 CanLII 4 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 271], there is no attempt to reach into the past and alter the law or the rights of persons as of an earlier date. The application is prospective only to facts in existence at the present time. Such an application may affect existing rights and interests, but is not retroactive.

Legislation that applies to on-going facts is said to have "immediate effect". Its application is both immediate and general: "immediate" in the sense that the new rule operates from the moment of commencement displacing whatever rule was formerly applicable to the relevant facts, and "general" in the sense that the new rule applies to all relevant facts, on-going as well as new.

[37] I agree with Farley J. that these files should be viewed as a continuing fact situation. Rumanek ceased its work prior to the enactment of s. 136(1)(b), but the files were not complete by that date. They were on-going in varying degrees. The Guardian was appointed to complete the administration of these files. Certificates of completion had not been filed. Strictly speaking, there is no entitlement to compensation and hence no vested right to payment until a certificate of completion has been filed. It is at the time of payment that priority is determined and, hence, the application of s. 136(1)(b) does not have retrospective effect. Rumanek does not have a vested right to any fees or disbursements arising from the completion of the Sone estates by the Guardian. Farley J. did not err in his appreciation of s. 136(1)(b).

Issue # 7: Did Farley J. err in finding that Rumanek should bear the burden of any further shortfall in the CTA after any shortfall is borne by Sone?

[38] A shortfall in the CTA could only happen because a fee claimant received estate funds to which it was not entitled. If there was only one trustee, Sone, it would be clear that the loss must be borne by Sone. The creditors would be entitled to receive the dividends they would otherwise have received if Sone had not made unauthorized withdrawals.

[39] As between the creditors and the Guardian, the Superintendent has instructed the Guardian that, should the CTA be insufficient to pay both the dividends and the proper fees of the Guardian, the Guardian should adjust its fee claim to the extent necessary to allow creditors to receive the dividends that they would otherwise have received but for the shortfall.

[41] Rumanek alleges that it was not advised by either Sone or the Superintendent of the extent of the problems with the estates, including the extent of the shortfalls in the trust accounts, the concerns regarding Sone's integrity, and the agreement with Sone that he surrender his trustee licenses. Rumanek submits that its involvement as sole trustee was continued at the request of the Superintendent.

[42] Rumanek's claim that it did not know of the seriousness of the irregularities in the bankruptcy estates is an issue between Rumanek and the Superintendent that will be determined in the action instituted by Rumanek. The issue of a shortfall is an issue between Rumanek and the creditors in the bankruptcy estates. Rumanek was not compelled to take on the administration of the estates. This was a business decision on its part. The Superintendent did not oblige Rumanek to continue as trustee. If Rumanek had applied for directions or its discharge at the point when it recognized the serious nature of the irregularity in the CTA, the terms on which Rumanek could have finished the work might have been resolved. As between the creditors and Rumanek, the creditors should not be disadvantaged. Farley J. did not err in holding that the burden of any further shortfall in the CTA, after Sone, must fall secondly upon Rumanek.

[43] Conclusion for the Rumanek Appeal

The CIBC Appeal

[45] The CIBC appeal raises two issues:

- Did Farley J. err in finding that CIBC takes only through Sone and in finding that priority to the $71,000 granted by orders of Justice Houlden December 15, 1995, and of Justice Blair September 24, 1999, as affirmed by the Court of Appeal June 6, 2000 is only as to those involved in the fees and disbursements remuneration for the Sone bankruptcy estates?
- Did Farley J. err in finding that a shortfall situation was never before Blair J. and the Court of Appeal when they rendered their decisions September 24, 1999 and June 6, 2000?

[46] CIBC argues that the payment of $71,000 was a payment to a third party in order to carry on the practice to administer the Sone estates. If successful, CIBC would then be a creditor and have priority over all the fee claimants including the Guardian. Farley J. held that any payments from the CTA were an advance on the trustees' fees. I would agree with him. CIBC is not a creditor.

[47] Blair J. determined that the CIBC claim was not to be subject to priority contests with the other fee claimants as of May 1997. This is not the same issue as who should bear the loss as between creditors and the fee claimants in the event of a shortfall. The latter issue is not an issue of priority and was not before Blair J. nor dealt with on appeal. Farley J. had the equitable jurisdiction to determine that, as between the unsecured creditors and those entitled to fees, CIBC was not a creditor but a fee claimant and, as such, should share in any shortfall. This decision is not inconsistent with that of Blair J. as to priorities and therefore the issues of res judicata, stare decisis and issue estoppel raised by CIBC are simply inapplicable in the circumstances.

[48] Other than confirming the Guardian's priority of payment under s. 136(1)(b) of the BIA, Farley J. was not asked to rank the fee claimants in terms of priority. The comment in his endorsement that CIBC takes through Sone is clearly obiter. It is trite law that an appeal is from the judgement of the court and not its reasons.

Conclusion for the CIBC Appeal

Reasons for Decision

Appearing for Abakhan & Associates Inc., Administrators of the Consumer Proposal	R. Robinson
Appearing for the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the "OSB", also referred to as the official receiver)	L. Vogt
Date and Place of Hearing:	May 3, 2007 Victoria, B.C.

[1] At the request of the official receiver, the administrator applies for a taxation of its fees. The disbursements claimed are not in issue.

[2] The taxation is one of a series heard on this day, all initiated by a negative comment letter from the OSB. The OSB alleges that this and all other proposals were poorly administered. As a result, the administrator should not be entitled to any fees.

[3] In Carr (Re), 2007 BCSC 816 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 816, I discuss the general scheme for initiating and completing a Division II consumer proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA"). I will not repeat those comments except to observe that a proposal may be structured creatively, so long as it meets the requirements under s. 66 of the BIA.

[4] The proposal must be in a prescribed form but its content is deemed accepted unless modified at either a meeting of creditors or upon review of the court. The official receiver may direct such a meeting or review. Any creditor dissatisfied with the proposal's terms may also ask the administrator to convene a meeting.

[5] The proposal in this case was filed on January 28, 2004. The terms of the proposal include the following:

> 4. That the following payments be made to Abakhan & Associates Inc., the administrator of the consumer proposal, for the benefit of the unsecured creditors:
> That beginning on the date of the filing of the Proposal the debtor shall pay to the administrator an amount of $250.00 per month for twenty-six (26) months or such amount so that a total of $6,500.00 will be paid to the administrator within 26 months. [my emphasis]
> 5. That the administrator of the consumer proposal shall distribute the moneys received to the unsecured creditors in accordance with the following schedule:
> That one month after each anniversary date of this proposal the administrator shall pay to the unsecured creditors who have filed a valid proof of claim the appropriate dividends as regulated under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act of Canada.

And

> 7. That the proposal may include the following additional terms:
> (a) the creditors may appoint up to three inspectors responsible for the consumer proposal of the consumer debtor. The inspectors may have, in addition to any powers of inspectors under the Act, the power to:
> (i) receive any notice of default in the performance of a provision of the consumer proposal and waive any such default; and
> (ii) approve any amendment to the consumer proposal without calling a meeting of creditors, if the amendment would alter the schedule for and the amount of the payments to be made by the consumer debtor, but would not change the total amount to be paid.

[6] At the time of filing, the administrator opined that a proposal was more advantageous to the creditors as they would recover $.26 on the dollar while only $.05 on the dollar would be recovered in a bankruptcy.

[7] The proposal was deemed accepted without the court's review of its terms. Neither the official receiver nor any creditors raised concerns with respect to those terms.

[9] According to the administrator's records, Ms. Papick made payments totalling $1,650 in 2004. Three of these payments were for $250; others ranged from $100 to $500 each. In 2005, Ms. Papick made only one payment of $300. Thus, the total amount paid by the debtor was $1,950.00.

[10] If there is default under the proposal, the administrator may either apply to the court for an order annulling the proposal or issue a notice of deemed annulment. That notice is sent to both the creditors and the official receiver: s. 66.31 of the BIA. In this case, the administrator issued two such notices.

[11] The first notice was issued on September 23, 2005. It states that the debtor was in "in default to the extent of at least three months of the following payments" and lists the months of January 2004 to August 2005 indicating whether a payment was made or not. The notice states that the proposal was annulled effective September 23, 2005.

[12] A second notice was issued on July 5, 2006. In that notice, the administrator states that default occurred when payments were missed in March, April and May 2006. The notice states that the proposal was annulled effective July 5, 2006.

Digitized by Google

[15] In 2003, the administrator obtained a legal opinion in another matter which addressed the interpretation and application of a similarly worded payment clause. According to the opinion letter, no default could occur under the proposal unless or until the debtor failed to pay the total sum of $ 6,500 by the end of the twenty-six months. Ms. Papick could pay either the $250 or "such other amount", including $0, each month.

[16] The administrator provided the OSB with a copy of a legal opinion sometime before the first notice of deemed annulment was issued in this matter. The OSB disputed the notice. It took the position that in issuing the first notice, the administrator was not following its own "position or legal opinion". In a letter to the administrator issued February 16, 2007, the OSB says that it is not acceptable to rely on the legal opinion in some instances but to "disregard it" in others.

[19] The issue for me to determine is what impact the administrator's actions (or inaction) should have on its fees.

[20] Pursuant to Rule 129(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules the proposal must provide for certain fees and expenses. Those fees include $750 payable to the administrator on the filing of the proposal and a second $750 payable on the approval or deemed approval of the proposal by the court.

[21] Under Rule 129(1) (c), the administrator is also entitled to 20% of moneys distributed to creditors under the proposal, payable on the distribution of those moneys. Thus, there would seem to be some incentive to the administrator to ensure the debtor's compliance with the proposal's terms.

[22] In this case, the administrator claims the "preparatory fees" of $1,500 plus 20% of $63.77 for a total remuneration of $1,512. 75. After accounting for taxes, statutory fees and disbursements, the creditors share proportionately in a dividend of just over $50.00.

[23] The OSB submits that fees should be reduced (or disallowed entirely) for several reasons: first, the proposal should never have been recommended; second, the administrator should have advised the creditors of missed payments and included a provision for such notice in the proposal; and third, the proposal should have been annulled well before September 2005.

[24] On this first point, I have some doubt as to whether, on taxation, the registrar should be revisiting the trustee's recommendation to accept the proposal. It may be a relevant consideration if there were some element of bad faith on the part of the administrator or certain information about the debtor's circumstances was missed. That is not the case here. I am reluctant to fault the administrator for a recommendation that was effectively accepted by both the official receiver and the creditors.

[25] Similarly, with respect to the inclusion of mandatory language requiring notice to creditors of missed payments, this could have been addressed by the official receiver upon the filing of the proposal. The BIA does not require such mandatory language in a proposal.

[26] On the third point, the OSB submits that the administrator should have made application to the court to annul the proposal. When the first notice of deemed annulment was issued, payments under the proposal were 14 months "in arrears". It makes this submission despite previously contesting the validity of the first notice of deemed annulment.

[27] Both the administrator and the OSB are guilty of taking inconsistent positions during the administration of the proposal. It is difficult to be critical of the administrator when the OSB agreed that there had been no missed payments by September 2005.

[28] The administrator is, however, deserved of some criticism. Regardless of its interpretation of the payment clause, the administrator failed in its duties under s. 66.251 of the BIA. The administrator in a proposal such as this one is required to give notice to the creditors and the official receiver if the debtor has suffered a change of circumstances which puts the proposal in jeopardy. The provision does not, however, require the administrator to apply to the court to have the proposal annulled.

[29] There is nothing in the material before me which explains the administrator's investigations or consultations with the debtor after the filing of the proposal. Absent some explanation, it appears that the administrator made little or no effort to monitor the debtor's performance of the proposal for the first 12 to 15 months.

[30] At the very least, the debtor's failure to make any payments over a four month period in 2004 should have alerted the administrator to a possible change in the debtor's circumstances. An investigation should have been conducted and, if appropriate, notice given to the creditors and the official receiver that the proposal might be in jeopardy.

[31] When the particular administrator (not Mr. Robinson) did review the debtor's payments, the first notice of deemed annulment was issued.

[32] The issuance of the first notice of deemed annulment might have been sufficient for the purposes of s. 66.251. However, that notice was withdrawn as a result of the OSB's position. The administrator does not appear to have considered whether a separate form of notice under s. 66.251 should have been issued.

Digitized by Google

[33] The OSB must accept some responsibility for the muddled administration of this proposal. It was alerted to the missed payments in September 2005 but essentially told the administrator to carry on with the proposal.

[34] This does not absolve the administrator of its responsibilities. It still failed to investigate a possible changes of circumstances even before the first notice of deemed annulment was issued. It failed to adequately monitor the proposal after September 2005. This maladministration invites the registrar to consider a reduction in the fees claimed: Nelson (Re) [2006] O.J. No. 2812 (S.C.).

[35] In determining whether, and to what extent, a reduction is warranted, I must consider the objectives of this taxation: see Re Hess [1977] O.J. No. 1642 (H.C.J.).

[38] A third objective is to encourage, rather than to discourage, efficient, conscientious administration of the proposal for the creditors' benefit and, so far as the public is concerned, in the interests of the proper carrying out of the principles and objectives of the BIA.

[39] Even if there is no evidence of specific prejudice to the creditors, the errors or omissions in the proposal's administration can justify a reduction in fees: see Nelson (Re), supra, and Wright (Re), 2005 BCSC 1618 (CanLII), 2005 BCSC 1618.

[40] Where there is no measurable loss to the creditors, the reduction should reflect the gravity and nature of the administrator's conduct.

[41] In this case, I have found that the OSB is partly to blame for the administrator's impugned actions. Regardless, the administration was not carried out in a conscientious manner. Although there is no measurable loss to the creditors, it would seem unfair for the administrator to receive all of its fees while the creditors share in such a nominal sum.

[42] In all of these circumstances, I find that the administrator is entitled a fee of $1,300 plus GST. As noted, the disbursements claimed are not in issue.

Policy

Services of a trustee

4. It is legitimate and acceptable for a trustee to expect financial compensation from a debtor for consulting services provided, where the individual does not file an assignment in bankruptcy or a proposal with the trustee, the consultation being for the purpose of an appraisal of the individual's situation and of the solutions available.

5. Where a debtor files an assignment in bankruptcy or a proposal with the trustee after paying a consultation fee to the trustee or to a related party, the amount paid, if received within sixty (60) days prior to the date of bankruptcy or the earlier of the filing of the notice of intention under subsection 50.4(1) of the Act or a proposal, shall be:

(a) considered as part of the continuing process leading up to the actual bankruptcy or the proposal;

(b) deposited in the estate trust account; and

4. Dans le cadre d'une consultation, il est légitime et approprié pour le syndic de s'attendre à une compensation financière de la part d'un débiteur lorsque celui-ci ne fait pas cession de ses biens ou ne dépose pas une proposition auprès du syndic, la consultation visant seulement à obtenir une évaluation de sa situation et des possibilités qui s'offrent à lui.

5. Lorsque le débiteur dépose une cession de ses biens ou une proposition auprès du syndic suite à la consultation et que des honoraires de consultation ont été payés au syndic ou à une personne liée, le montant payé, s'il a été reçu dans les soixante (60) jours précédant la date de la faillite ou du dépôt d'un avis d'intention aux termes du paragraphe 50.4(1) de la Loi ou d'une proposition devra être :

a) considéré comme faisant partie du processus menant au dépôt de la cession ou de la proposition;

b) déposé dans le compte en fidéicommis (ou compte en fiducie) de l'actif; et

c) déclaré comme actif au bilan du débiteur.

6. Le travail préliminaire de consultation déjà effectué par le syndic constitue une charge de temps normal pour ce dernier, conformément à l'article 131 des Règles.

Date: FEB 10 2010

To: OSB Staff, Trustees and Registrars

Subject: Directive No. 27R, *Advances of Trustee's Remuneration for Bankruptcies Under Ordinary Administration

Date : 10 FEV. 2010

À : Employés du BSF, syndics et registraires

Objet : Instruction n° 27R. Avances de rémunération du syndic dans les faillites d'administration ordinaire

The Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (OSB) received a number of questions from various stakeholders regarding Directive No. 27, Advances of Trustee's Remuneration for Bankruptcies Under Ordinary Administration, which was issued on August 14, 2009.

There was uncertainty in terms of the trustees' reporting obligations under paragraph 7 of the Directive. Specifically, subparagraph 7(1)(e) of Directive No. 27 referred to only one of the three ways in which a trustee can obtain proper authorization to withdraw an advance on his or her remuneration and the term "unless otherwise required" in subparagraph 7(2) of the Directive was too vague and created unnecessary reporting obligations.

Le Bureau du surintendant des faillites (BSF) a reçu un certain nombre de questions de la part de divers intervenants au sujet de l'instruction n° 27, Avances de rémunération du syndic dans les faillites d'administration ordinaire, qui a été émise le 14 août 2009.

Il y avait une incertitude concernant les obligations de production de rapports des syndics aux termes du paragraphe 7 de l'instruction. Plus particulièrement, l'alinéa 7(1)e) de l'instruction n° 27 ne mentionnait qu'un seul des trois moyens par lesquels un syndic peut obtenir la permission requise afin de retirer une avance de rémunération, et l'expression « sauf avis contraire », à l'alinéa 7(2) de l'instruction, était trop vague et entrainait des obligations inutiles en matière de production de rapports.

Directive No. 27 has been amended as follows.

(1) Subparagraph 7(1)(e) now reflects the three ways in which an advance on a trustee's remuneration may be approved (as provided for in paragraph 4 of the Directive):

> (1) by a resolution of a duly constituted meeting of creditors;
> (2) by a majority of the inspectors; or

(2) Subparagraph 7(2) of the Directive now requires trustees to remit a copy of the documents referred to in subparagraph 7(1) to the OSB at the time of filing the Final Statement of Receipts and Disbursements and to the registrar or taxing officer if and when there is a taxation hearing. Trustees must only remit a copy of the documents referred to in subparagraph 7(1) to the creditors upon request.

Coming into Force

Directive 27R comes into force on February 12, 2010.

L'instruction nº 27 a été modifiée comme suit :

(1) L'alinéa 7(1)e) mentionne dorénavant les trois moyens par lesquels peut être approuvée une avance de rémunération du syndic (tel qu'il est indiqué au paragraphe 4 de l'instruction) :

> (1) par résolution adoptée à l'assemblée des créanciers;
> (2) par résolution adoptée par la majorité des inspecteurs;

(2) L'alinéa 7(2) de l'instruction exige maintenant que les syndics remettent une copie des documents mentionnés à l'alinéa 7(1) au BSF au moment de déposer l'État définitif des recettes et des débours, ainsi qu'au registraire ou au fonctionnaire taxateur au moment de l'audition de la taxation, si une telle audition a lieu. Les syndics doivent remettre une copie des documents mentionnés à l'alinéa 7(1) aux créanciers seulement si on le leur demande.

Entrée en vigueur

L'instruction nº 27R entre en vigueur le 12 février 2010.

3. The purpose of this Directive is to set out the proper procedure the trustee must follow when making an interim withdrawal or withdrawing an advance on his or her remuneration for an ordinary administration bankruptcy.

3. La présente instruction a pour objet d'établir la procédure à suivre par un syndic qui désire effectuer un paiement intérimaire ou retirer une avance de rémunération dans une faillite d'administration ordinaire.

Procedure

Modalités

4. To withdraw an advance on his or her remuneration, the trustee must obtain proper authorization in the form of a resolution of a duly constituted meeting of creditors or of a majority of the inspectors or make application to the Court for an order approving payment of the advance.

4. Afin de retirer une avance de rémunération, le syndic doit obtenir la permission requise, soit par résolution adoptée à l'assemblée des créanciers ou par résolution adoptée par la majorité des inspecteurs, ou obtenir du tribunal une ordonnance autorisant le paiement de l'avance.

5. The trustee must ensure that sufficient funds remain in the trust account to cover the disbursements and fees necessary to complete the administration of estates.

5. Le syndic doit s'assurer qu'il y a dans le compte en fidéicommis suffisamment de fonds pour couvrir les frais et honoraires nécessaires afin de mener à bien l'administration des dossiers.

6. The request of the trustee for an advance shall stipulate the specific dollar amount, which should also be reflected in the minutes of the meeting of creditors or inspectors and/or in the Court Order.

6. La demande d'avance de rémunération du syndic doit indiquer le montant précis. Ce montant doit également être indiqué dans le procès-verbal de l'assemblée des créanciers ou des inspecteurs ou figurer sur l'ordonnance du tribunal.

7.(1) Trustees shall have in their file the following information for each authorized advance on the remuneration:

(a) number of hours worked;
(b) tasks performed;

7.(1) Les syndics doivent détenir dans leur dossier les informations suivantes pour chaque avance de rémunération autorisée :

a) le nombre d'heures travaillées;
b) les tâches accomplies;

(c) hourly rates;
(d) other factors for consideration in the calculation of fees; and
(e) resolution of a duly constituted meeting of creditors, resolution of a majority of the inspectors, or Court Order approving payment of the advance, whatever the case may be.

d) les autres éléments à prendre en compte dans le calcul de la demande d'avance de rémunération; et
e) selon le cas, la résolution adoptée à l'assemblée des créanciers, la résolution adoptée par la majorité des inspecteurs, ou l'ordonnance du tribunal autorisant le paiement de l'avance.

(2) Trustees shall remit a copy of the documents referred to in subparagraph 7(1) to the OSB at the time of filing the Final Statement of Receipts and Disbursements and to the registrar or taxing officer if and when there is a taxation hearing. Trustees must only remit a copy of the documents referred to in subparagraph 7(1) to the creditors upon request.

(2) Les syndics doivent remettre une copie des documents mentionnés à l'alinéa 7(1) au BSF au moment de déposer l'État définitif des recettes et des débours et au registraire ou à l'officier taxateur s'il y a audition de la taxation. Les syndics doivent remettre une copie des documents mentionnés à l'alinéa 7(1) aux créanciers seulement si on le leur demande.

8.(1) When a registrar or taxing officer taxes the remuneration of the trustee to an amount that is less than the advance withdrawn by the trustee, this excess shall be repaid to the estate without delay.

8.(1) Lorsqu'un registraire ou un officier taxateur taxe la rémunération du syndic pour un montant moindre que l'avance déjà prise par le syndic, le surplus doit être immédiatement remboursé à l'actif de la faillite.

(2) The trustee must notify the official receiver in writing of the repayment or other changes due to the taxation.

(2) Le syndic doit immédiatement informer par écrit le séquestre officiel du remboursement ou d'autres modifications suite à la taxation.

9. The registrar or taxing officer is not bound by this Directive and can exercise his or her discretion in relation to the taxation of the trustee's accounts.

Form 10, Application of Trustee for Discharge

Form 10, Application of Trustee for Discharge, has been amended to clarify that in both bankruptcies and proposals submitted pursuant to Division I of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), trustees are entitled to apply to the court for an order of discharge.

Formulaire 10, Demande de libération du syndic

Le formulaire 10, Demande de libération du syndic, a été modifié afin de préciser que, tout comme en matière de faillite, les syndics peuvent demander au tribunal une ordonnance de libération relativement à l'administration d'une proposition déposée en vertu de la section I de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (LFI).

Form 31, Proof of Claim

The first two check boxes in paragraph 7 on Form 31, Proof of Claim, have been replaced by one check box. Whenever the trustee reviews the financial situation of a bankrupt to determine whether there have been changes to the bankrupt's obligation to make payments under section 68 of the BIA, the creditor may request to be informed, pursuant to paragraph 68(4) of the BIA, of the new fixed amount or of the fact that there is no longer surplus income and that the bankrupt's obligation to make payments under section 68 of the BIA no longer exists.

Formulaire 31, Preuve de réclamation

Les deux premières cases à cocher au paragraphe 7 du formulaire 31, Preuve de réclamation, ont été remplacées par une case à cocher. Lorsque le syndic doit examiner la situation financière du failli pour déterminer s'il y a eu des changements à l'obligation du failli de verser les paiements prévus à l'article 68 de la LFI, le créancier peut demander d'être avisé, conformément au paragraphe 68(4) de la Loi, du nouveau montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite ou du fait que le failli n'a plus de revenu excédentaire et qu'il n'est plus tenu de verser les paiements prévus à l'article 68 de la LFI.

Form 37, Voting Letter (Division I Proposal)

Minor changes have been made to Form 37, Voting Letter (Division I Proposal), so that it is specific to proposals filed pursuant to Division I of the BIA.

Formulaire 37, Formulaire de votation (proposition déposée en vertu de la section I)

Des modifications mineures ont été apportées au formulaire 37, Formulaire de votation (proposition déposée en vertu de la section I), afin qu'il soit spécifique aux propositions déposées en vertu de la section I de la LFI.

Form 37.1, Voting Letter (Consumer Proposal)

Form 37.1, Voting Letter (Consumer Proposal), has been created to take into account specific provisions applicable to consumer proposals following the amendment to subsection 66.17(2) of the BIA by Chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada (2005) and by Chapter 36 of the Statutes of Canada (2007). The amendment to subsection 66.17(2) simplified the process by eliminating the need to hold a meeting of creditors in cases where a dissent from the consumer proposal is received by the administrator. Thus, if the administrator is not required to call a meeting of creditors, the consumer proposal is deemed to have been accepted regardless of any dissent that may have been received.

To make creditors aware of the consequences of this amendment, the OSB created a new voting letter specific to consumer proposals enabling creditors to assent to or dissent from the proposal and to request that a meeting of creditors be held.

Form 49, Notice to Creditors of Consumer Proposal

Paragraph 3 of Form 49, Notice to Creditors of Consumer Proposal, has been changed to inform creditors that they may use Form 37.1, Voting Letter (Consumer Proposal), to assent to or dissent from the consumer proposal and to request that a meeting of creditors be held.

Form 87, Notice and Statement of the Receiver

A reference to subsection 246(1) of the BIA has been added to the French title of Form 87, Notice and Statement of the Receiver. This subsection was not referenced in the title of consommateur et ce, suite à la modification apportée au paragraphe 66.17(2) de la LFI par le chapitre 47 des Lois du Canada (2005) et le chapitre 36 des Lois du Canada (2007). La modification au paragraphe 66.17(2) a simplifié le processus en éliminant l'obligation de tenir une assemblée des créanciers dans les cas où une désapprobation de la proposition de consommateur est reçue par l'administrateur. Ainsi, si l'administrateur n'est pas tenu de convoquer une assemblée des créanciers, la proposition de consommateur est réputée avoir été acceptée, sans égard à toute désapprobation qui aurait été reçue.

Afin de porter à l'attention des créanciers les conséquences de ce changement, le BSF a créé un nouveau formulaire de votation spécifique aux propositions de consommateur, permettant ainsi aux créanciers d'approuver ou de désapprouver la proposition en plus de demander qu'une assemblée des créanciers soit convoquée.

Formulaire 49, Avis aux créanciers de la proposition de consommateur

Le paragraphe 3 du formulaire 49, Avis aux créanciers de la proposition de consommateur, a été modifié afin d'indiquer aux créanciers qu'ils peuvent utiliser le formulaire 37.1, Formulaire de votation (proposition de consommateur), pour approuver ou désapprouver la proposition de consommateur ainsi que pour demander qu'une assemblée des créanciers soit convoquée.

Formulaire 87, Avis et déclaration du séquestre

Une référence au paragraphe 246(1) de la LFI a été ajoutée au titre de la version française du formulaire 87, Avis et déclaration du séquestre. Ce paragraphe n'a pas été cité en amendments to Form 10, Application of Trustee for Discharge; Form 31, Proof of Claim; Form 37, Voting Letter (Division I Proposal); Form 49, Notice to Creditors of Consumer Proposal and Form 87, Notice and Statement of the Receiver. This Directive also prescribes a new form, Form 37.1, Voting Letter (Consumer Proposal).

modifications au formulaire 10, Demande de libération du syndic, au formulaire 31, Preuve de réclamation; au formulaire 37, Formulaire de votation (proposition déposée en vertu de la section I); au formulaire 49, Avis aux créanciers de la proposition de consommateur; et au formulaire 87, Avis et déclaration du séquestre. La présente instruction prescrit aussi un nouveau formulaire, le formulaire 37.1, Formulaire de votation (proposition de consommateur).

Summary

3. Form 10, Application of Trustee for Discharge, has been amended to clarify that in both bankruptcies and proposals submitted pursuant to Division I of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), trustees are entitled to apply to the court for an order of discharge.

4. The first two check boxes in paragraph 7 on Form 31, Proof of Claim, have been replaced by one check box. Whenever the trustee reviews the financial situation of a bankrupt to determine whether there have been changes to the bankrupt's obligation to make payments under section 68 of the BIA, the creditor may request to be informed, pursuant to paragraph 68(4) of the BIA, of the new fixed amount or of the fact that there is no longer surplus income and that the bankrupt's obligation to make payments under section 68 of the BIA no longer exists.

Résumé

3. Le formulaire 10, Demande de libération du syndic, a été modifié afin de préciser que, tout comme en matière de faillite, les syndics peuvent demander au tribunal une ordonnance de libération relativement à l'administration d'une proposition déposée en vertu de la section I de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (LFI).

4. Les deux premières cases à cocher au paragraphe 7 du formulaire 31, Preuve de réclamation, ont été remplacées par une case à cocher. Lorsque le syndic doit examiner la situation financière du failli pour déterminer s'il y a eu des changements à l'obligation du failli de verser les paiements prévus à l'article 68 de la LFI, le créancier peut demander d'être avisé, conformément au paragraphe 68(4) de la Loi, du nouveau montant que le failli est tenu de verser à l'actif de la faillite ou du fait que le failli n'a plus de revenu excédentaire et qu'il n'est plus tenu de verser les paiements prévus à l'article 68 de la LFI.

5 Form 37.1, Voting Letter (Consumer Proposal), has been created to take into account specific provisions applicable to consumer proposals. This voting letter, which is specific to consumer proposals, enables creditors to assent to or dissent from the proposal, as well as to request that a meeting of creditors be held. Consequently, minor changes have been made to Form 37, Voting Letter (Division I Proposal), so that it is specific to proposals submitted pursuant to Division I of the BIA.

5. Le formulaire 37.1, Formulaire de votation (proposition de consommateur), a été créé pour tenir compte des particularités applicables aux propositions de consommateur. Ce formulaire de votation, qui est spécifique aux propositions de consommateur, permet aux créanciers d'approuver ou de désapprouver la proposition en plus de demander qu'une assemblée des créanciers soit convoquée. Par conséquent, des modifications mineures ont été apportées au formulaire 37, Formulaire de votation (proposition déposée en vertu de la section I), afin qu'il soit spécifique aux propositions déposées en vertu de la section I de la LFI.

6. Paragraph 3 of Form 49, Notice to Creditors of Consumer Proposal, has been changed to inform creditors that they may use Form 37.1, Voting Letter (Consumer Proposal), to assent to or dissent from the consumer proposal and to request that a meeting of creditors be held.

6. Le paragraphe 3 du formulaire 49, Avis aux créanciers de la proposition de consommateur, a été modifié afin d'indiquer aux créanciers qu'ils peuvent utiliser le formulaire 37.1, Formulaire de votation (proposition de consommateur), pour approuver ou désapprouver la proposition de consommateur ainsi que pour demander qu'une assemblée des créanciers soit convoquée.

7 A reference to subsection 246(1) of the BIA has been added to the French title of Form 87, Notice and Statement of the Receiver. This subsection was not referenced in the title of the French version of the form; yet, it appeared in the English version. Therefore, this amendment corrects an omission in the French title and ensures consistency between the French and English versions of Form 87.

PART II

BANKRUPTCY ORDERS AND ASSIGNMENTS

Summary: Bankruptcy Petitions, Orders and Assignments and Basic Issues - Sections 42 to 49

Section 42 details the statutory list that upon which the BIA is founded, being "acts of bankruptcy" that allow petitioning and coverage by the Act. Amongst others the most common acts that the bankrupt will perpetrate that draw the application are:

- if in Canada or elsewhere he makes an assignment of his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors generally, whether it is an assignment authorized by this Act or not;
- if in Canada or elsewhere the debtor makes a fraudulent gift, delivery or transfer of the debtor's property or of any part of it;
- if in Canada or elsewhere the debtor makes any transfer of the debtor's property or any part of it, or creates any charge on it, that would under this Act be void or, in the Province of Quebec, null as a fraudulent preference;
- if, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, he departs out of Canada, or, being out of Canada, remains out of Canada, or departs from his dwelling-house or otherwise absents himself;
- if the debtor permits any execution or other process issued against the debtor under which any of the debtor's property is seized, levied on or taken in execution to remain unsatisfied until within five days after the time fixed by the executing officer for the sale of the property or for fifteen days after the seizure, levy or taking in execution, or if any of the debtor's property has been sold by the executing officer, or if the execution or other process has been held by the executing officer for a period of fifteen days after written
- demand for payment without seizure, levy or taking in execution or satisfaction by payment, or if it is returned endorsed to the effect that the executing officer can find no property on which to levy or to seize or take, but if interpleader or opposition proceedings have been instituted with respect to the property seized, the time elapsing between the date at which the proceedings were instituted and the date at which the proceedings are finally disposed of, settled or abandoned shall not be taken into account in calculating the period of fifteen days;
- if he exhibits to any meeting of his creditors any statement of his assets and liabilities that shows that he is insolvent, or presents or causes to be presented to any such meeting a written admission of his inability to pay his debts;
- if he assigns, removes, secretes or disposes of or attempts or is about to assign, remove, secrete or dispose of any of his property with intent to defraud, defeat or delay his creditors or any of them;
- if he gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended or that he is about to suspend payment of his debts;

Digitized by Google

- if he defaults in any proposal made under this Act; and
- if he ceases to meet his liabilities generally as they become due.

Subs. (2) deems any above assignment to be null and void.

Section 43 is, what I call, the "charging" provision whereby a creditor can make application to court for a bankruptcy order to have the Act apply. The two conditions to allow such are:

- If there has been an act of bankruptcy as detailed above, and,
- The debt that exists with respect to that creditor, or group of creditors, amounts to more than $1,000.

Subs. (2) allows a secured creditor to give up stated value of his security to be given standing to make a petition though only up to the amount of his residual unsecured.
Subs. (3) requires that the application be supported with an affidavit from someone personally knowledgeable of the facts attested to while subs. (4) allows the court to join the proceedings in the case of two or more bankrupts if it sees fit.
Subs. (5) requires that the petition be filed with the court in the locality of the bankrupt.
Subs. (6) provides that the court may, in its discretion, grant the bankruptcy order upon proof of application and of the facts therein. Note that civil damages may result against the petitioner if the judge finds otherwise and the debtor suffers harm because of it. So, make sure the situation is exactly as provided in the affidavits and the BIA should be called in to apply. Subs. (7) allows the court to dismiss the application if it is not satisfied with regards to the proof or that the debtor can make its payments as they come due.
Subs. (9) provides that once the bankruptcy judge is satisfied that the BIA should apply, she shall appoint a trustee the identity of which is per the desires of the petitioner(s). This allows the petitioner the ability to choose a trustee that she has total confidence in to act for her interest: it also allows the petitioner to have "first stab" at having their interests represented best since, while there are mechanics for the substitution of a trustee once the process operates, it is the basically the petitioner who chooses the initial trustee. The court will however, consider all the creditors in appointing a trustee.
Subs. (10) allows the debtor to contest the petition whereby the court will set out a stay of the proceedings to a date whereby the issue can be determined in trial: this allows a debtor to prove that they are not bankrupt or have perpetrated an above act, and that the BIA should not apply while the court will impose any conditions on alienation of the debtor's property until the next proceeding. Subs. (11) allows the court to also stay the proceedings for other reasons it feels just.
(Subs. (12) requires non-resident petitioners to extend costs with the court, before hand, for the proceeding to continue.)
Subs. (13) allows the court to substitute creditors in the stayed proceedings have not been pursed with due diligence by the primary petitioner(s).
Subs. (14) very importantly disallows a petition from being withdrawn once it has been entered into court: this is critical since the BIA cannot be used illegitimately to cause harm and the faith placed by the court in its discretion to apply the BIA should not be used capriciously by a creditor seeking to obtain advantage, other than through the BIA.

Digitized by Google

(Subs. (15) allows a petition to be acceptable against any of the partners in a partnership without having to name them all - allowing a petition to be valid if all the partners are not known by the petitioner, while subs. (16) allows consolidation of proceedings when and if other proceedings have been commenced against the same partnership in fact.)
Subs. (17) allows a bankruptcy proceeding to continue notwithstanding the debtor dies - this allows the proceedings to continue to then operate against the debtor's estate. Sections 44 and 45 then provide specific rules with regard to petitions against estates of bankrupts.

Section 46 provides for the appointment of an interim receiver, who must be a trustee, to protect the debtor's property until the petition has been dealt with. It allows the interim receiver to take immediate control of the debtor's property and allows the court to make any order it sees fit to interfere with any of the debtor's rights though on an undertaking being imposed on the applicant. This allows the petitioning creditor to protect any legal or, under BIA, interest it has in the debtor's property and its conservation. Subs. (2) states the conservatory measures that the interim receiver can take with respect to the debtor's property including control of the debtor's business, however, said control shall not operate to interfere with the business. Note that it is the conservatory measures are effectively determined by the court.
Section 47 deals with instances where secured creditors are about to or have sent possessory notices to the debtor with respect to their security. It prompts for the court to appoint an interim receiver to take control over any or all of the debtor's property until the earliest of:

- the taking of possession by a receiver, within the meaning of subsection 243(2), of the debtor's property over which the interim receiver was appointed,
- the taking of possession by a trustee of the debtor's property over which the interim receiver was appointed, and
- the expiry of 30 days after the day on which the interim receiver was appointed or of any period specified by the court.

In such a case, per subs. (2) the interim receiver shall exercise similar conservatory steps as above noted, at the discretion of the court, while per subs. (3) the appointment shall be made only if it acts to protect the debtor's estate, generally, AND the interests of the secured creditor sending the notice to enforce.

Section 47.1 attends to instances where the debtor is about or who has made a proposal within the Part III chapter on proposals and allows the court to, at any time, appoint a trustee to take control of the debtor's property. Subs. (1.1) attends to when that appointment will expire while subs. (2) deals with actions that authority can take with respect to the estate of the debtor. NOTE that pursuant to subs. (3) the appointment of the receiver shall occur only if it is in the best interests of the debtors generally or to preserve the debtor's estate. Section 47.2 allows the court to charge the debtor's property, AHEAD of any secured creditors, for the payment of the interim receiver's fees and costs.

Section 48 allows for exemption from the s 43 to 46 statutory target of application those instances where the party is a wage earner with earnings less than $2,500/year and who does not carry on her own business, carries on the tillage of soil, is a farmer or is a fisherman.

Section 49 allows an assignment of an insolvent person to her creditors to a official receiver in respect of it. Subs. (1) through (4) prompt for the filing of the assignment by the official receiver while also finding a trustee to act on the desires of the dictated creditors while if the receiver cannot find a trustee to act, the assignment fails. Subs. (6) prompts for the trigger of the summary administration provisions in the BIA to apply if, in the case when the debtor isn't a corporation, upon opinion by the receiver, if the net realizable assets of the corporation, after secured claims, is less than $5,000. Subs. (8) allows the summary administration provisions to cease to apply if the realizable value of the debtor's estate exceeds $5,000 or the costs of realization are high relative to the value.

(b) the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy within the six months preceding the filing of the application.

If applicant creditor is a secured creditor - Sec. 43(2)
(2) If the applicant creditor referred to in subsection (1) is a secured creditor, they shall in their application either state that they are willing to give up their security for the benefit of the creditors, in the event of a bankruptcy order being made against the debtor, or give an estimate of the value of the applicant creditor's security, and in the latter case they may be admitted as an applicant creditor to the extent of the balance of the debt due to them after deducting the value so estimated, in the same manner as if they were an unsecured creditor.

Affidavit - Sec. 43(3)
(3) The application shall be verified by affidavit of the applicant or by someone duly authorized on their behalf having personal knowledge of the facts alleged in the application.

Consolidation of applications - Sec. 43(4)

Dismissal of application - Sec. 43(7)

Digitized by Google

(7) If the court is not satisfied with the proof of the facts alleged in the application or of the service of the application, or is satisfied by the debtor that the debtor is able to pay their debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, it shall dismiss the application.

Dismissal with respect to some respondents only - Sec. 43(8)
(8) If there are more respondents than one to an application, the court may dismiss the application with respect to one or more of them, without prejudice to the effect of the application as against the other or others of them.

Appointment of trustee - Sec. 43(9)
(9) On a bankruptcy order being made, the court shall appoint a licensed trustee as trustee of the property of the bankrupt, having regard, as far as the court considers just, to the wishes of the creditors.

Stay of proceedings if facts denied - Sec. 43(10)
(10) If the debtor appears at the hearing of the application and denies the truth of the facts alleged in the application, the court may, instead of dismissing the application, stay all proceedings on the application on any terms that it may see fit to impose on the applicant as to costs or on the debtor to prevent alienation of the debtor's property and for any period of time that may be required for trial of the issue relating to the disputed facts.

Stay of proceedings for other reasons - Sec. 43(11)
(11) The court may for other sufficient reason make an order staying the proceedings under an application, either altogether or for a limited time, on any terms and subject to any conditions that the court may think just.

[1] September 1, 1995. FARLEY J.: – The Bank of Nova Scotia ("BNS") moved for an order pursuant to s. 181 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), annulling the bankruptcy of Olympia & York Developments Limited ("OYDL") created by a receiving order dated December 20, 1994 ("receiving order") in combination with two other orders of the same date (conjunctively the "December orders"), or, in the alternative, an order pursuant to s. 187(5) of BIA reviewing and rescinding the December orders. BNS was supported in this regard by various other parties (Martin Orbach, Lewis Gestetner, and HRF Fund Holdings Inc.; the Institute for Advanced Talmudic Study; and Yeshiva Yesodei Hatora), which, subsequent to the hearing but prior to the release of my decision, have entered into settlement agreements with the respondents Coopers & Lybrand OYDL Inc., the administrator ("administrator") pursuant to the OYDL Companies Creditors' Arrangement Act (R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 – "CCAA") plan, and Coopers & Lybrand Limited, the trustee in bankruptcy of OYDL ("trustee"), pursuant to the receiving order. The OYDL Creditors' Monitoring Committee supported the position of the administrator and trustee.

[2] On May 20, 1992, petitions in bankruptcy were issued against OYDL by 976910 Ontario Inc., Credit Lyonnais, and the HongKong and Shanghai Banking Corporation Limited. The subject receiving order made against OYDL was advanced by the petitioners in accordance with the procedure set out in s. 10.7 of the OYDL CCAA plan, which was approved by the creditors of OYDL under the CCAA and sanctioned by the court on February 5, 1993. I granted the receiving order on December 20, 1994, together with two other orders, administrative in nature, which are individually referred to as the BIA admin order and the CCAA admin order.

[3] BNS submits that the December orders are contrary to BIA in that they:

(a) create a partial and entirely voidable bankruptcy of OYDL, for the apparent purpose of avoiding significant adverse tax consequences associated with a "proper" bankruptcy of OYDL;
(b) vest only a portion of the assets of OYDL which BIA requires to be vested in the trustee;
(c) limit the powers and duties which BIA requires of a trustee in bankruptcy such as the trustee;
(d) require the administrator to act contrary to BIA; and
(e) allow for the use of certain sections of BIA in respect of certain preferences and settlements while at the same time limiting the trustee's power to review and challenge other potential preferences, settlements, and reviewable transactions which the trustee would examine under a "proper" bankruptcy of OYDL, but all in contemplation that the December orders would be annulled in the future (and hence, in the language of BIA, "ought never to have been made") when the utility of those portions of BIA sought to be relied on has been exhausted. BNS also complains that the December orders were made on an ex parte basis without the participation of those, such as BNS, whose rights would be affected by them. The administrator and trustee countered by saying that BNS is attempting to use this motion to obtain relief which would have the effect of shielding itself from an action being continued by the trustee to set aside certain alleged preferential transactions which were for the benefit of BNS, to the prejudice of the other unsecured creditors of OYDL.

[4] The two sections of BIA which were specified by BNS were:

> 181. (1) Where, in the opinion of the court, a receiving order ought not to have been made... the court may by order annul the bankruptcy.
> 187(5) Every court may review, rescind or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction.

[5] In the proceedings under CCAA, the creditors of OYDL negotiated and voted on the OYDL CCAA Plan; 27 of 35 classes of creditors voted in favour, the remaining 8 voted against the plan. The claims of BNS with respect to the swap transactions (defined infra) were included in Class 33A, which class voted against the plan. The February 5, 1993, sanction order appointed the administrator as the administrator of OYDL; in s. 16(b) the order provided that, in exercising its power and authority pursuant to the plan, the administrator was the agent of OYDL and not the agent of the creditors of OYDL.

[6] On June 10, 1993, the administrator commenced an action ("preference action") which sought to set aside and declare void certain transactions between OYDL, Olympia & York CC Limited ("OYCC"), Baden Real Estate Corp., and BNS ("swap transactions") on the basis that:

(a) the swap transactions were entered into with the intention and effect of giving BNS an improper preference over the other creditors of OYDL and of defeating, hindering, delaying, prejudicing, or defrauding OYDL's creditors contrary to the Ontario Fraudulent Conveyances Act, the Ontario Assignments and Preferences Act, and BIA;

(b) they constituted settlements pursuant to BIA; and

(c) they were oppressive, unfairly prejudicial to, or unfairly disregarded the interests of OYDL, OYCC, and the security holders and creditors thereof, contrary to s. 248 of the Ontario Business Corporations Act.

In its statement of defence, BNS stated:

(a) Class 33A was specifically excluded from those classes of creditors which approved the plan and, accordingly, none of the terms of the plan apply to BNS in its capacity as a creditor in respect of the swap transaction; and

(b) the administrator, which was appointed by the sanction order and which derives all its authority from the sanction order in the plan, therefore has no standing to assert any of the claims set forth in the statement of claim in the preference action.

BNS then moved to dismiss the preference action on the foregoing basis.

[7] On December 20, 1994, counsel for the administrator representing OYDL and for each of the petitioning creditors attended upon me regarding the December orders. There had been some discussions two weeks earlier between counsel for the administrator and for BNS concerning the possibility of the receiving order motion and on December 19, 1994, counsel for the administrator advised counsel for BNS that the administrator intended to proceed within the next day with the bankruptcy of OYDL as contemplated in s. 10.7 of the plan. In the affidavit of Paul Currie, an employee of the administrator, it was set out that one of the principal reasons for seeking the December orders was the pending BNS motion. Another factor considered was the position of the federal and provincial Crowns under the CCAA plan.

The Ontario Court of Appeal in Fine's Flowers Ltd. v. Fine's Flowers Ltd. (Creditors of) 1993 CanLII 967 (ON CA), (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 1, has now ruled subsequent to the approval of the subject plan that the Crown is not bound by CCAA proceedings. Further, Mr. Currie indicated that "[a] bankruptcy under section 10.7 will enable the Administrator to effectively deal with the remaining assets of OYDL, creditors who are affected by the Plan and creditors who are not affected by the Plan." The receiving order was issued in the general form of Form 28 of Schedule 111 of BIA.

[8] The administrator was appointed in the CCAA proceedings and is charged with the responsibility of implementing the plan. In pursuing the BIA proceedings the administrator is required to follow the provisions of s. 10.7 of the CCAA plan. The provisions of the plan and of the December orders do not restrict the court from utilizing its discretion at the hearing of any motion to annul the receiving order.

[9] The administrator points out that, in addition to having claims under Class 33A (swap transactions), BNS is a substantial creditor of OYDL in the Class 28 unsecured creditors as to $540 million of unsecured claims. While creditors of Class 28 voted in favour of the plan and are bound by it, they are only bound by it, in my view, qua their condition of being a Class 28 creditor – and not in their condition, if such were the case, under a class which did not vote in favour of the plan.

[10] In accordance with the receiving order the provisions of BIA and s. 10.7 of the plan, it is the position of the administrator and trustee that the preference action was vested in the trustee. On January 30, 1995, the administrator issued its annual report to the creditors of OYDL; it stated, at pp. 17-8, that:

> A fundamental objective in making the [bankruptcy] filing was to ensure that OYDL and the Administrator could utilize the sections of the Plan available to continue the preference action. As you will recall the Plan provided for a section 10.7 "limited bankruptcy" of OYDL if defendants to preference actions sought to have preference actions dismissed on jurisdictional grounds. Certain creditors have sought this remedy and after considering the consequences of such action the Administrator decided to utilize section 10.7 of the Plan.
> Effect of 10.7(L) Bankruptcy
> Counsel has advised that the effect of 10.7(L) is as follows:
> * OYDL is in bankruptcy;
> * the vesting of assets to the Trustee is limited to the preference action; and > * the Plan continues to be binding on OYDL.

[11] BNS asserts that the fact that the bankruptcy was so limited was not clear from the December orders or from the affidavit of Mr. Currie since the receiving order merely appoints Coopers& Lybrand Limited as the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of OYDL (not a portion of the estate) and there is nothing contained therein to suggest that the apparent objective of this "limited" vesting of assets in the trustee was an attempt to avoid the potential negative tax consequences associated with the possible change in control of all of the assets of OYDL being vested in the trustee.

[12] Section 10.7(L) of the plan provides:

> (L) Notwithstanding the granting of a receiving order pursuant to this Section 10.7, the Plan as sanctioned shall continue to be binding upon all Creditors and shall be binding upon the trustee in bankruptcy of the Relevant Applicant and the Relevant Applicant. Such receiving order shall, accordingly, vest all Preference Claims in the trustee but shall not vest any other assets nor require any administration save as contemplated hereby or ordered by the Court. Without limiting the foregoing, the powers of the Administrator with respect to OYDL and its property shall not be diminished or modified by the terms of this Section 10.7 or any deemed vesting of title in a trustee in bankruptcy of OYDL. When all Recourses [proceedings taken to enforce Preference Claims] in respect of a Relevant Applicant have been completed, whether by withdrawal of the Recourses, settlement thereof, final judgment in respect thereof or otherwise, and any required administration of the bankrupt estate completed, the Relevant Applicant shall, in the case of OYDL, and may, in the case of the other Relevant Applicants, apply for the annulment of the receiving order pursuant to Section 181 and Subsection 187(5) of the Bankruptcy Act, and the Administrator and the Creditors of the Relevant Applicant shall not oppose such annulment unless it adversely affects the exercise of a Recourse, any judgment rendered in respect of a Recourse or any settlement made between a Moving Party and a Respondent. (Emphasis added.)

[13] Section 10.7(M) of the plan provides:

> (M) The application for annulment provided for in Section 10.7(L) may be made earlier than therein contemplated with the consent of the relevant Moving Party and the trustee in bankruptcy of the Relevant Applicant on such terms as the relevant Moving Party may, in its discretion, agree to accept.

[14] It appears to me that the issue in this motion is whether the court should either annul the receiving order or rescind the December orders either because there was no jurisdiction in the court to have granted these orders on December 20, 1994, or that BNS, as supported by the other parties, has shown additional information as to why this court's discretion should be so exercised.

[15] If BIA does not allow for such a receiving order in the sense that the legislation does not permit a receiving order of the nature granted, then clearly I cannot impose my views of what is an appropriate regime to operate under regarding bankruptcy matters and disregard what is the express will of Parliament: see R. v. McIntosh, [1995] S.C.J. No. 16, at pp. 39-40. This, of course, should be contrasted with the aspect of the inherent jurisdiction of this court to deal with the vacuum which is required to be filled so as to give purpose and meaning to the legislation or to supplement what is permitted by the legislation so that there is a firm foundation on which to build, as opposed to a partial base of sand. In this regard see the views of Chadwick J. in his unreported decision Re J.P. Capital Corp., released February 28, 1995 [reported at reflex, (1995), 31 C.B.R. (3d) 102 (Ont. Bktcy.)] (especially at p. 4 [p. 104 C.B.R.] where he comments on Re A. & F. Baillargeon Express Inc. reflex, (1993), 27 C.B.R. (3d) 36 (Que. S.C.); Montreal Trust Co. v. Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Inc. (1971), 21 D.L.R. (3d) 75 (Man. Q.B.); in Re Tlustie (1923), 3 C.B.R. 654 (Ont. S.C.); Re Loxtave Buildings of Canada Ltd. (1943), 25 C.B.R. 22 (Sask. It should, however, be recognized that in the present situation there is no such general enabling language present, as was the case in Canada (Minister of Indian Affairs & Northern Development) v. Curragh Inc. 1994 CanLII 7468 (ON SC), (1994), 27 C.B.R. (3d) 148 (Ont. Gen. Div.) [Commercial List], where "takes such other action as the court [deems] advisable" was in place. As Chadwick J. said at p. 143 of Re N.T.W. Management Group Ltd. reflex, (1994), 29 C.B.R. (3d) 139 (Ont. Bktcy.):

> Courts have recognized in dealing with the bankruptcy and insolvency legislation a technical or stringent interpretation should not be applied. The Act has to be flexible to deal with the numerous situations and variations which arise from time to time. To take a technical approach to the Act would in my view defeat the whole purpose of the legislation.

Clearly, it would be undesirable for the general working of the bankruptcy and insolvency regime (be it pursuant to BIA or CCAA or a combination thereof since there must be a meshing of these two pieces of legislation) for some party to escape the scrutiny (and if found wanting, the rectification) of a preference review merely through a technical device. However, it must be acknowledged that the prevailing legislation may not always be perfect so as to preclude such a result; it may be that a party may be able to take advantage of such an imperfection until such is cured by amendment.

[16] BNS submits that the December orders create a partial and entirely voidable bankruptcy in which only certain preference claims of OYDL and no other assets vest in the trustee, which limited vesting of assets would be contrary to s. 71(2) of BIA, which provides:

> 71(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

"Property" for the purpose of BIA has been broadly defined in s. 2 as:

2. In this Act,

...."property" includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent in, arising out of or incident to property...

BNS then submits that s. 67(1) of BIA reinforces the aspect that a bankruptcy must involve all the bankrupt's property (but implicitly this must mean all property of value since it would be inappropriate to distribute "excess" liabilities).

67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

(a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

(b) any property that as against the bankrupt is exempt from execution or seizure under the laws of the province within which the property is situated and within which the bankrupt resides,

but it shall comprise

(d) such powers in or over or in respect of the property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit. (Emphasis added.)

It must be recognized that one of the fundamental purposes of the bankruptcy legislation is the appropriate distribution of the bankrupt's property amongst its creditors. See L.W. Houlden and C.H. Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3d ed., looseleaf (Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1995). It would seem to me that "shall" should be read in the imperative sense and that "all property" cannot be modified to provide that it should be part of the property: see Cheerios, supra, at p. 81. That s. 46 of BIA provides for the appointment of an interim receiver over "any part" of the property of a debtor does not seem to me to imply that BIA also provides by implication that a trustee can be appointed over "part" of the bankrupt's estate. However, of course, it should be noted that the property does not include all assets which are legally but not beneficially held by the bankrupt. In this regard it would seem to me that where the bankrupt has entered into bona fide contractual arrangements as to certain of its assets, then these assets would by implication not form part of the property of the bankrupt in the Frankian jurisprudential sense that certain of the bundle of rights (and reciprocal obligations) of those assets which have been dealt with have been alienated; however, that would not thereby "disqualify" those remaining rights (and obligations) from forming part of the bankrupt's property. It would seem that it is clear that the preference action is an asset which is appropriately property capable of devolving upon the trustee; similarly, if the preference action is successful, then the security which the BNS claims in relation to the swap transactions will be void and thus there is the appropriate devolution to the trustee of this (inchoate) right to the property forming the security for the BNS swap transaction as of the receiving order.

[17] It seems to me that the receiving order would have the effect of having all property of the bankrupt devolve upon the trustee. However, as discussed immediately above, this would not include any aspect of assets which have been otherwise alienated in a bona fide fashion. It would appear that the concern of BNS as to whether or not all (appropriate) property has so devolved upon the trustee lies as to para. 4 of the BIA admin order of December 20, 1994, which states:

> This Court Orders that, notwithstanding the granting of the Receiving Order pursuant to section 10.7 of the Plan, the Plan as sanction shall continue to be binding on the trustee in bankruptcy OYDL and OYDL.

Section 66(2) of BIA provides that "Nothing in this Act [BIA] shall be deemed to affect the operation of [CCAA]." It would seem to me that the sanctioned plan can be taken into account in the situation of determining what property is to devolve unto the trustee. As Blair J. said in his reasons in sanctioning the plan on February 5, 1993 (over two years ago) [reported as Olympia & York Developments Ltd. v. Royal Trust Co. reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 1 (Ont. Gen. Div.), at p. 19]:

> From this perspective it could be said that the parties are merely > being held to – or allowed to follow – their contractual arrangement. There is, indeed, authority to suggest that a Plan of compromise or arrangement is simply a contract between the debtor and its creditors, sanctioned by the court, and that the parties should be entitled to put anything into such a Plan that could be lawfully incorporated into any contract: see Re Canadian Vinyl Industries Inc. (1978), 29 C.B.R. (N.S.) 12 (Que. S.C.), at p. 18; L.W. Houlden & C.H. Morawetz, Bankruptcy Law of Canada, vol. 1 (Toronto: Carswell, 1984) pp. E-6 and E-7.

[18] Thus, if one takes into account the sanctioned plan (which, by implication, Blair J. determined was a bona fide contract), then it appears that the only property which was not burdened by the contractual relations of the plan was the preference action and the related asset to it. If there were other assets not so dealt with in the plan, then they would also have to be dealt with in the sense that they would devolve unto the trustee. If there are in fact other assets not so dealt with but which would have to be in accordance with this perspective, it may be entirely possible that the administrator and trustee may wish to revisit the question, especially if there would be severe adverse tax consequences. I note that CCAA need not be employed to revitalize a corporation but can also involve a liquidation scenario: See Lehndorff, supra, at p. 284 [B.L.R.], relying on Re Associated Investors of Canada Ltd. (1987), 67 C.B.R. (N.S.) 237 (Alta. Q.B.), at p. 318, reversed on other grounds (1988), 71 C.B.R. (N.S.) 71 (C.A.), and Re Amirault Fish Co., 32 C.B.R. 186, [1951] 4 D.L.R. 203 (N.S. T.D.), at pp. 187-188 (C.B.R.). In this regard I believe it fair and reasonable to categorize the Olympia & York CCAA plan as being more of the liquidation scenario as opposed to the revitalization one; those classes which did not vote in favour of the plan were allowed, in effect, to exercise and realize upon their security with the attendant "disappearance" of those assets from the scene. No one has appealed the sanction order of February 5, 1993, which approved the plan which contains s. 10.7(L) and (M). Section 6(b) of CCAA provides that a court sanctioned plan under CCAA is binding upon a trustee in bankruptcy already in existence; a fortiori, it would seem that the rights and obligations of a subsequently appointed trustee would be subject to a pre-existing sanctioned CCAA plan.

[19] I do not see this type of situation, namely, an open bona fide arrangement which has been approved in accordance with the provisions of CCAA, as being contrary to public policy, as was the concern in Re Knechtel Furniture Ltd. (1985), 56 C.B.R. (N.S.) 258 (Ont. S.C.), where the "private" arrangement was designed to keep certain assets out of the hands of creditors (with no quid pro quo). Similarly, there does not appear to be any material risk of abuse, as would be the case where an undischarged bankrupt tried to deal with his property despite having no status (see McNamara v. Pagecorp Inc. (1989), 76 C.B.R. (N.S.) 97 (Ont. C.A.)), since in the present case the administrator appointed pursuant to the plan sanctioned by the court would be dealing with matters in accordance with that plan and would always be under the general supervisory jurisdiction of the court.

[20] It would seem to me that implicit in s. 16(3) of BIA requiring the trustee to take "possession of... all property of the bankrupt" is the concept, as discussed above, that if the property which is capable of devolving upon the trustee in that it has not otherwise been appropriately alienated. The same philosophy would also deal with the concerns of BNS as to s. 158(a). It would also appear contrary to the general philosophy of the bankruptcy legislation to require an actual taking of possession of certain assets when that action would subject the trustee in the estate to greater liability than there would be value in the asset (e.g., the possession of leased premises with attendant exposure to occupation rent or the possession of hazardous property with the exposure to environmental liability). It would also appear that the plan which was sanctioned has otherwise dealt with the other potential preference settlements and related matters.

[21] It does not seem to me that BNS has made out a case that the obtaining of the December orders was an abusive process if the preference action is truly the only asset which comprises the property of OYDL when one looks at what is capable of devolving upon the trustee. It is not, of course, improper to use BIA for specific purposes aside from the division of the bankrupt's assets amongst creditors, including being able to employ remedies which would not be available outside the bankruptcy: see Re Maple City Ford Sales (1986) Ltd. reflex, (1992), 14 C.B.R. (3d) 188 (Ont. Bktcy.); Re Four Twenty-Seven Investments Ltd.; Re 495487 Ontario Ltd. (1985), 55 C.B.R. (N.S.) 183 (Ont. S.C.), affirmed (1985), 58 C.B.R. (N.S.) 266 (Ont. C.A.); Re 676915 Ontario Ltd. (1989), 76 C.B.R. (N.S.) 164 (Ont. S.C.); Gasthof Schnitzel House Ltd. v. Sanderson (1978), 27 C.B.R. (N.S.) 75 (B.C. S.C.).

[22] I would observe that I do not feel that s. 30(1) of BIA advances the cause of the administrator and trustee since that section clearly contemplates that a trustee in bankruptcy would have had devolved onto him the rights of the bankrupt tenant vis-à-vis the lease. That section only allows the trustee to otherwise deal with that property. It would seem to me that Stead Lumber Company v. Lewis (No. 2) (1957), 37 C.B.R. 24 (Nfld. T.D.); Re Erin Features #1 Ltd. 1991 CanLII 1814 (BC SC), (1991), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 205 (B.C. S.C.); Re Bakermaster Foods Ltd. (1985), 56 C.B.R. (N.S.) 314 (Ont. S.C.), should be viewed in the same light vis-à-vis the trustee's ability to disclaim or abandon "improvident contracts."

[23] I would also note as to the status of BNS to bring this motion that the obiter views of Houlden J. in Re Develox Industries Ltd. (1970), 14 C.B.R. (N.S.) 132 (Ont. S.C.), at p. 133, were not exhaustive when he said:

> In view of the disposition which I propose to make of this application, I do not have to give a definite answer to this question. However, it would seem to me that the application to rescind or annul a receiving order should be by the debtor, the petitioning creditor or the trustee. In my view, to permit any creditor to bring such an application would be an abuse to the process of the court. For the purpose of this application I will assume that the landlord has the necessary status to ask that the receiving order be annulled or rescinded.

It would not seem that he was attempting to be definitive in all circumstances, but rather that he was giving rather valuable guidance as to the question in a general sense. Thus, it would appear that where there are unusual circumstances this general rule would not and should not be applied rigidly and unthinkingly. It would seem to me that a lack of jurisdiction proposal by a creditor would be an unusual circumstance worthy of giving that creditor status. However, I would also be of the view that motions of this nature would be truly infrequent and that if creditors were to inappropriately bring such a motion, they should be made an example for others by severe costs awards or other suitable sanction.

[24] The motion of BNS is dismissed. BNS is to pay the administrator and trustee jointly $10,000 costs. This is not a severe costs award.
Motion dismissed.

Powers of interim receiver - Sec. 46(2)
(2) The interim receiver appointed under subsection (1) may, under the direction of the court, take conservatory measures and summarily dispose of property that is perishable or likely to depreciate rapidly in value and exercise such control over the business of the debtor as the court deems advisable, but the interim receiver shall not unduly interfere with the debtor in the carrying on of his business except as may be necessary for conservatory purposes or to comply with the order of the court.

Place of filing - Sec. 46(3)
(3) An application under subsection (1) is to be filed in a court having jurisdiction in the judicial district of the locality of the debtor.

Introduction

[1] This appeal concerns a priority dispute between two creditors of an insolvent company, The State Group Limited (now 1231640 Ontario Inc. but referred to here as "State"), over funds totalling approximately $5.5 million. The majority of the disputed amount resulted from an income tax refund to State of approximately $4.5 million.

[2] The priority dispute requires a consideration of the role of a receiver appointed by the court pursuant to s. 47 of the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). It also requires the court to interpret the phrase "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" in s. 20(1)(b) and the phrase "rights of a person....in respect of the collateral" in s. 20(2)(b) of the provincial Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10 ("PPSA").

[3] On one side of the priority dispute is the appellant, the Royal Bank of Canada ("the Bank"), which acted as the administrative agent for a syndicate of lenders to State. The loan was secured by a general security agreement. All parties agree that the terms of the general security agreement between the Bank and State cover all the assets of State, including the tax refund. On the other side of the dispute is the respondent, St. Paul Guaranty Insurance Company ("St. Paul"). St. Paul also holds a general security agreement over all of the assets of State, which would include the tax refund. In the middle is PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. ("PWC"), who acted as both the s. 47 BIA receiver and as the trustee in bankruptcy.

[4] At this juncture, it may be helpful to provide a brief overview of the priority regime established by the PPSA. The PPSA creates a regime that enables creditors to record written agreements giving them a security interest in a debtor's property, known as "collateral".[1] A security interest is not enforceable against a third party unless the requirements of the PPSA are met.[2] Because multiple secured creditors can acquire security interests in the same collateral, the concept of "perfection" is used to order the priorities among them. The basic rule is that perfected security interests have priority over those that are unperfected. One method of perfection is for the creditor to take actual possession of the collateral.[3] The most common method of perfection, however, is by registration of a financing statement in the Ontario Personal Property Security Registry ("PPSR"). Generally, the first person to register has a first priority secured interest that is effective against third parties, including other secured parties.[4] Perfection may last as long as the period chosen for registration lasts, generally some time longer than the length of the security agreement, or until there is a change affecting the collateral.

[5] In this case, the Bank had a first priority secured interest. St. Paul's security interest was registered after the Bank's and thus was subordinate to that of the Bank.

[6] On November 14, 2001, the Bank obtained a court order appointing PWC as an interim receiver pursuant to s. 47 of the BIA ("Appointment Order").[5]

[7] A s. 47 BIA receiver is appointed by the court when a debtor is insolvent and a creditor gives notice that it intends to enforce its security pursuant to s. 244 of the BIA. The applicant creditor must satisfy the court that the appointment of the receiver is necessary to protect the debtor's estate or the interest of the creditor who sent the s. 244 notice. Thus, the receiving order is not made in the context of an application for a bankruptcy order or in a situation where the debtor seeks to avoid bankruptcy by making a proposal to its creditors. The appointment is for "such term as the court may determine" and allows the receiver to take possession of the debtor's property that is subject to the security interest, to exercise control over it, and to take such action as the appointment order provides. The appointment order usually provides, as this order does, that third parties are prevented from taking or continuing any legal proceedings against the debtor without leave of the court.

[8] Pursuant to the Appointment Order allowing it to do so, PWC sold State's name on November 14, 2001. The next day, the name of the debtor company was changed to 1231640 Ontario Inc. Section 48(3) of the PPSA provides that if the secured creditor learns that the debtor has changed its name, the secured creditor's interest in the collateral becomes unperfected unless the secured creditor takes possession of the collateral[6] or files a financing change statement giving the new name of the debtor within thirty days.[7] If the secured creditor fails to file a financing change statement within thirty days, it can reperfect its interest by filing a fresh financing statement. [8]

[9] The Bank conceded that it would have been aware of State's name change at least by the time PWC made a second sale of State's assets on December 6, 2001. The Bank did not file, or seek leave of the court to file, a financing change statement within thirty days of becoming aware of the name change, nor did it file a fresh financing statement after that date. St. Paul also filed nothing. The proceeds of the December 6, 2001 sale and a further sale on December 24, 2001 are not in dispute on this appeal.

[10] The Appointment Order permitted PWC to assign State into bankruptcy, which it did on January 31, 2002. By this date, the previously perfected security interests of both creditors had become unperfected.

[11] Following the assignment into bankruptcy, PWC received the income tax refund owing to State in the amount of approximately $4.5 million. The Bank claimed that it was entitled to the proceeds because when PWC was appointed a receiver on November 14, 2001, it had a properly perfected first security interest. St. Paul contended that the relevant date for determining priorities was the date that PWC was appointed trustee in bankruptcy, i.e., January 31, 2002, and that as of this date, the Bank had lost its priority because it had failed to file a financing change statement as required by s. 48(3) and had also failed to file a fresh financing statement thereafter. PWC sought the direction of the court on the priority issue.

[12] Before the motion judge, the Bank argued that it was implicitly exempted from having to file a financing change statement as required by s. 48(3) of the PPSA in light of the terms of the Appointment Order. In the alternative, the Bank argued that because its security interest was perfected at the time of PWC's appointment as receiver, it did not lose its priority because a s. 47 BIA receiver is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. Since s. 20(2)(b) provides that "[t]he rights of a person... under clause 1(b) in respect of the collateral are to be determined as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect", the relevant date for determining the priority dispute is the date of the receiver's appointment. At that date, the Bank's security interest was perfected and the Bank's failure to make a further filing when PWC sold State's name did not result in a loss of its priority.[9]

[13] The motion judge rejected both of the Bank's arguments. He concluded that the November 14, 2001 court order appointing PWC as interim receiver did not have the effect of exempting the Bank from having to comply with s. 48(3) of the PPSA by filing a financing change statement within thirty days of learning that PWC had sold State's name.

[14] With respect to the Bank's alternative argument, the motion judge held that PWC, as a receiver under s. 47 of the BIA, was not "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" under s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA, but rather was appointed for the protection of the Bank's interests. He observed that the assets of the debtor did not vest in PWC, nor did the liabilities of the debtor become PWC's liabilities, as is the case with a trustee in bankruptcy. He further held that PWC did not have the authority to settle or compromise liabilities owed to the creditors of the debtor. The motion judge reasoned that the application of the ejusdem generis principle of statutory interpretation applied to the interpretation of s. 20(1)(b). He held that "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" must be of like kind or class as a trustee in bankruptcy or an assignee for the benefit of creditors. Given the distinctions he had observed between a receiver and the representatives specified in s. 20(1)(b), he held that a s. 47 BIA receiver is not "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor."

[15] Accordingly, the motion judge concluded that pursuant to s. 20(2)(b), the effective date of the appointment of a person with representative status, and the date that the representative's rights in respect of the collateral are to be determined, is the date PWC was appointed as trustee in bankruptcy, namely January 31, 2002. At that time, both St. Paul and the Bank were unperfected secured creditors. Pursuant to the priorities under the BIA, as unperfected secured creditors, the Bank and St. Paul were entitled to share rateably in the income tax refund. Since the Bank's claim was for $29 million and St. Paul's was for some $88 million, the result of the motion judge's decision is that St. Paul would be entitled to the bulk of the refund.

The Issues

[16] This appeal requires me to consider two issues:

1. Did the Appointment Order implicitly give the Bank an exemption from complying with s. 48(3) of the PPSA?
2. Did the Bank's failure to file a financing change statement or fresh financing statement result in a loss of its priority as a secured creditor?

[17] On the first issue, like the motion judge, I conclude that the obligation to make filings under the PPSA continued and that the Appointment Order did not exempt the Bank from complying with s. 48(3) of the PPSA. My colleagues agree.

[18] My colleagues and I disagree on the answer to the second question, whether the Bank lost its priority as a secured creditor. The answer depends on the date chosen for the determination of priorities. If, as I conclude, a s. 47 BIA interim receiver is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" in s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA, then in light of the combined operation of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b), the relevant date for determining the Bank's priority status is the date of the appointment of PWC as interim receiver. On that date, the Bank's security interest was perfected and had priority over that of St. Paul.

[19] In answering the second question, it is also necessary to address an alternative argument put forward by PWC. According to PWC, the Bank's priority status had to be determined all over again as of the date PWC was appointed trustee in bankruptcy on January 31, 2002. PWC argues that the s. 47 BIA receivership ended when it was appointed trustee in bankruptcy and that the s. 47 BIA receiver had no proprietary interest in the disputed assets. I reject PWC's position and conclude that the s. 47 BIA receivership did not end with PWC's appointment as trustee and that the Bank retained its priority over the tax refund following State's assignment into bankruptcy by PWC.

Analysis

1. Did the Appointment Order implicitly give the Bank an exemption from compliance with s. 48(3) of the PPSA?

[20] The Bank submits that to require it to comply with s. 48(3) of the PPSA by filing a financing change statement after it learned PWC sold State's name is inconsistent with the spirit of the Appointment Order, which had the effect of maintaining the existing priorities among creditors. The Bank also submits that exempting it from compliance with s. 48(3) does no injustice to the policy underlying the PPSA. The registration regime established by the PPSA is intended to provide a means of giving notice to interested parties of existing security interests in the debtor's property so that they can govern their dealings with the debtor accordingly. Interested parties can search the PPSR against the debtor's name for existing registrations against that debtor and its collateral. Although the PPSA requires that the debtor's name must appear correctly on a registration in order for that registration to be effective, the policy reason for requiring a secured creditor to maintain the perfection of its security interest disappears on a s. 47 BIA receivership. Under that type of receivership, the secured creditor is in the process of enforcing its security and the debtor is deprived of possession of its property and is not in a position to grant further security interests.

[21] The Bank further argues that to require it to comply with s. 48(3) would effectively require it to act in a manner that is contrary to the wording of the Appointment Order. The Bank relies on s. 7 of the order appointing PWC, which stays any "legal proceeding, enforcement process, extra-judicial proceeding or other proceeding against or in respect of the Debtor or the Property". Similarly, s. 8 of the Order restrains the enforcement or exercise of certain rights, including registration, against the debtor or the property. The Bank argues that these provisions prevented it from registering a financing change statement.

[22] The motion judge rejected the Bank's submissions. He held that even if the Bank was correct that the policy considerations requiring registration were no longer applicable in the circumstances, the court could not override the provisions of the legislation unless there was a legislative gap, which he concluded there was not. Insofar as the Appointment Order was concerned, he held that even if the filing of a financing change statement was a "proceeding" that was stayed under s. 7 or restrained under s. 8, the Bank could have applied to lift the stay and the court would likely have allowed the application. Thus, the terms of the Order did not preclude the Bank from filing the required financing change statement to maintain its perfected status prior to the assignment in bankruptcy.

[23] The motion judge's approach was intended to protect the integrity of the registration requirements of the PPSA. I agree that nothing in the Appointment Order or in the PPSA exempts the Bank from having to comply with the filing requirements of the PPSA. As indicated by the motion judge, if the filing of a financing statement was a "proceeding" that was stayed by the Appointment Order, an application to lift the stay would likely have been successful since no other creditor would be prejudiced. The reason that an application to lift the stay would likely be successful even after the expiry of the thirty day period for filing a financing change statement is reinforced by the existence of s. 30(6) of the PPSA. That subsection permits re-registration of a security interest that has become unperfected. [10] See Re PSINet Ltd., [2002] O.J. No. 271 (S.C.J.).

[24] Alternatively, instead of bringing an application to lift the stay for the limited purpose of allowing it to either maintain or to reperfect its security interest, s. 31 of the Appointment Order provides that any interested party may apply to vary or amend the order on seven days notice. The Bank could thus have applied to the court to amend the initial Appointment Order so as to enable the Bank to obtain the receiver's consent to lifting the stay or to filing the requisite PPSA registration.

[25] I note that the Standard Template Receivership Order ("the Model Order") prepared by a subcommittee of the Commercial List Users Committee in conjunction with the Canadian Bar Association Insolvency section contains standard language ordering that all rights and remedies against the debtor, the receiver, or affecting the property are stayed except with leave of the court or "except with the written consent of the Receiver" and further that nothing shall "prevent the filing of any registration to preserve or perfect a security interest." The wording of the Model Order provides further support for my conclusion that the motion judge was correct in holding that the Appointment Order did not give the Bank an implied exemption from complying with the requirement to file a financing change statement as required by s. 48(3) upon learning that PWC had sold State's name.

2. Did the Bank's failure to file a financing change statement result in a loss of its priority as a secured creditor?

[26] The resolution of this issue requires me to determine whether a s. 47 BIA receiver is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA, as well as to interpret the meaning of the words "rights of a person" in s. 20(2).

Digitized by Google

[27] For ease of reference, the relevant portions of s. 20 are as follows:

> 20 (1) Except as provided in subsection (3),[11] until perfected, a security interest,
> ...
> (b) in collateral is not effective against a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy;
> ...
> (2) The rights of a person,
> ...

[28] The Bank submits that the motion judge erred in holding that an interim receiver appointed by the court under s. 47 of the BIA is not "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. If the receiver is a "person" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b), then the date for determining the parties' priorities is the date that PWC was appointed as a s. 47 BIA receiver. On that date, the Bank had a properly perfected security interest.

[29] St. Paul's position is that the motion judge was correct in holding that an interim receiver is not a "person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. The trustee in bankruptcy, not the s. 47 BIA receiver, is the representative of the creditors and the date for determining priorities is the date of the trustee's appointment. On that date the Bank did not have a properly perfected security interest. In the alternative, St. Paul agrees with the position of PWC.

[30] PWC agrees with the Bank that an interim receiver is a representative of the creditors for the purposes of s. 20(1)(b). However, PWC submits that even if the Bank's security interest was effective as against the interim receiver, once the estate funds vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, the interim receivership ended. The relevant date for determining the effectiveness of the Bank's security interest then became January 31, 2002, when its status as trustee in bankruptcy took effect. As of January 31, 2002, the Bank's security interest was no longer perfected. The Bank responds that the receivership and the bankruptcy are not two separate processes, but one continuous process and that the date for determining priorities did not change when the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed.

[31] I first confront the issue of whether a s. 47 BIA interim receiver is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b). In my view, the motion judge erred in concluding that an interim receiver is not such a person. In reaching this conclusion, I am guided by the following considerations:

(a) the relevant principles of statutory interpretation;
(b) the history of the legislative provision and the view of commentators on the meaning of s. 20(1)(b);
(c) the fiduciary role and the powers of the s. 47 BIA receiver;
(d) the word "rights" in s. 20(2) means more than title or ownership rights and includes the right to possession;
(e) the overall scheme of the PPSA, including s. 20 as a whole and s. 30(6); and
(f) the purpose of s. 20(1)(b) is to preserve the parties' relative entitlements at the time "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" is appointed.

[32] I now discuss each of these considerations supporting my conclusion that a s. 47 BIA receiver is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b). I will then go on to address PWC's alternative argument.

(a) The relevant principles of statutory interpretation

[33] Section 20(1)(b) renders any security interest in the debtor's collateral ineffective against "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy" until that security interest is perfected. All provinces have legislation governing priorities between and among secured and unsecured creditors.[12] However, no other province uses the general words, "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" as found in s. 20(1)(b) of the Ontario legislation. The PPSA does not define "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor". Consequently, resort must be had to ordinary principles of statutory interpretation to determine the meaning of this phrase.

[34] The prevailing approach to statutory interpretation is that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament." See R. Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 4th ed. (Markham, Ont.: Butterworths, 2002) at p. 1; R. v. Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership, 2002 SCC 42 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559 at para. 26. In order to maintain harmony within the scheme of the Act, the same word must consistently be given the same meaning throughout a statute. See Sullivan, supra, at p. 163; Thomson v. Canada (Minister of Agriculture), 1992 CanLII

121 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 385. The principle is also one of the Drafting Conventions adopted by the Uniform Law Commission of Canada in s. 21(5) and s. 34(2). See Sullivan, supra, Appendix I at pp. 619, 623. The ordinary meaning of legislation is "the natural meaning which appears when the provision is simply read through". See Sullivan, supra, at p. 21; Canadian Pacific Air Lines v. Canadian Air Line Pilots Assn., 1993 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 724 at 735.

[35] Words take their meaning from the context in which they are found. Thus, in interpreting a statutory provision, among the considerations to which the court will have regard are the immediate context of the words in the section, any adjacent and closely related provisions, the Act as a whole, the history of the legislation and other external sources. See Sullivan, supra, at pp. 261-62.

(b) Having regard to the history of the legislative provision, a s. 47 BIA receiver is not excluded from being "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor"

[36] The predecessor version of the PPSA included a receiver in the list of persons who represent the creditors of the debtor. Section 22 of the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 375, stated:

22 (1) Except as provided in subsection (3),[13] an unperfected security interest is subordinate to,

(a) the interests of a person,

(iii) who represents the creditors of the debtor as assignee for the benefit of creditors, trustee in bankruptcy or receiver...

(2) The rights of a person under subclause (1)(a)(iii) in respect of the collateral are referable to the date from which his status has effect and arise without regard to the personal knowledge of the representative if any represented creditor was, on the relevant date, without knowledge of the security interest.

The question is, therefore, whether the removal of the word "receiver" from the current version of the Act, and the substitution of the word "includes" for the word "as" indicates that the legislature intended to exclude an interim receiver from the category of persons referred to in the section.

[37] In my opinion, the removal of the word "receiver" is not indicative of any legislative intention to exclude receivers appointed under s. 47 of the BIA from the category of persons included under s. 20(1)(b). I say this for four reasons.

[38] First, the earlier version of the PPSA was limitative, not expansive. The use of the word "as" in the phrase "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor as assignee ... trustee in bankruptcy, or receiver" meant that only the three categories of persons mentioned were included: see R. McLaren, Secured Transactions and Personal Property in Canada, 2nd ed., looseleaf (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at pp. 5-160 to 5-161.

[39] What the legislature intended to do and did do in amending s. 20(1)(b) was to expand the category of persons representing the creditors of the debtor. The word "including" in the current legislation is a term of extension. See Sullivan, supra, at p. 181; see also National Bank of Greece (Canada) v. Katsiknouris, 1990 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1029 at 1041, where LaForest J. wrote that the word "including" is normally "designed to enlarge the meaning of preceding words, and not to limit them." Accordingly, the examples that follow the word "including", namely, an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy, are not meant to be exhaustive. Further, an interpretation of legislation that narrows the scope of general words so that there is nothing but the enumerated items to which they can apply must be rejected. See Sullivan, supra, at p. 179. Limiting the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) to an assignee for the benefit of the creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy would leave no other persons to whom the general words, "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" could apply.

[40] Second, there is a presumption against implicit alteration of law. The legislature is presumed not to change existing law or to depart from established practices beyond that which is expressly stated. Failing to explicitly alter the law results in the law remaining undisturbed. See Sullivan, supra, at pp. 395-96. The legislature would have had to use more precise language to exclude all receivers from the category of persons "who represent the creditors of the debtor" if it wished to have done so.

[41] Third, the commentary of Mr. Fred M. Catzman, Q.C., the former chair of the Attorney General's advisory committee on the PPSA, lends some insight into why the term "receiver" was removed from the current legislation. In reference to the previous legislation, he stated that the term "receiver" is a generic term and, in his opinion, whether the receiver represented the interests of the creditors depended on whether the receiver was appointed by court order. If appointed by private agreement, the receiver represented only the interests of the creditor appointing it. See F. M. Catzman et al., Personal Property Security Law In Ontario (Toronto: Carswell, 1976) at p. 114. Where, as here, legislative change is preceded by a report of a person or body that has investigated a condition and made a recommendation, the courts are entitled to take judicial notice of it. While the commentary cannot be used as direct evidence of legislative intent, the court may use it to draw inferences about the meaning of particular provisions. See Sullivan, supra, at pp. 484-85. Removing the word "receiver" was intended to exclude a privately-appointed receiver, whose role is to protect the interests of a single secured creditor, from the class of persons contemplated by s. 20(1)(b).

Digitized by Google

[42] Fourth, the interpretation of legal scholars with expertise in the particular statute under consideration has become an authoritative source for consideration by courts. See Sullivan, supra, at p. 502. The unanimous opinion of academics and other commentators respecting s. 20(1)(b) is that the phrase "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" is not limited to assignees or trustees in bankruptcy. In The Ontario PPSA Commentary and Analysis (Markham, Ont.: Butterworths, 2000) at p. 163, under the heading "Trustee in bankruptcy and other representative creditors", Jacob S. Ziegel and David L. Denomme write in reference to s. 20(1)(b):

It is clear from the structure of clause (b) that it is not meant to be confined to an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy but also covers other creditors' representatives.

[43] Frank Bennett states in Bennett on the PPSA (Ontario), 3rd ed. (Markham, Ont.: Butterworths, 2006) at p. 53:

.... even though there is no reference to a receiver in s. 20(1), it is clear that a court-appointed receiver comes within the subsection... The court-appointed receiver is an officer of the court with fiduciary duties to all creditors and the debtor although its appointment was initiated by the secured party. [Emphasis added.]

Richard McLaren writes in Secured Transactions and Personal Property in Canada, supra, at p. 5-162:

A receiver is not listed in the revised Act [R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10] as a type of creditor's representative, but it is likely that court-appointed receivers will still qualify as a representative of creditors. Receiver is a generic term describing a person having the attributes characteristic of a receiver in chancery: one must be an officer judicially appointed and responsible to the court with the object of preserving property pending litigation to decide the rights of the parties. Once appointed by the court, the receiver is answerable to the court and to all interested parties. Given the cited case law decisions on the characteristics of a receiver, a liquidator under the Winding-Up and Restructuring Act, the Business Corporations Act or the Bank Act would qualify as a receiver.

Given that privately-appointed receivers only represent one or some of the creditors and that they are not judicially appointed, it has been held that they do not come within the ambit of s. 20(1)(b). [Citations omitted.][14]

[44] I am not aware of any scholarly opinion to the contrary. The unanimous opinion of scholars appears to be that the phrase used in s. 20(1)(b), "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor", is not limited to an assignee or trustee in bankruptcy. Further, in the opinion of two of the authors cited above, the phrase includes a court-appointed receiver.

(c) The fiduciary role and powers of the s. 47 BIA receiver

[45] The motion judge concluded that a receiver appointed by the court under s. 47 of the BIA is effectively the representative of the Bank alone. In my opinion, his conclusion on this issue is in error. A s. 47 BIA receiver owes a duty to all of the creditors of the debtor.[15] For example, a s. 47 BIA receiver was described by Cumming J. in Ravelston Corp., [2007] O.J. No. 414 (S.C.J.), aff'd 2007 ONCA 135 (CanLII), (2007), 85 O.R. (3d) 175 (C.A.), as an officer of the court, who owes a duty not only to the court, but also to all persons interested in the debtor's assets, property and undertakings. These duties must be carried out honestly and in good faith. The receiver's role, like that of a trustee in bankruptcy, is "that of a fiduciary to all interested stakeholders." He concluded at para. 67:

A court-appointed receiver under the BIA or [Courts of Justice Act], as with a trustee in bankruptcy under the BIA, has a duty to impartially represent the interests of all creditors, the obligation to act even-handedly, and the need to avoid any real or perceived conflict between the receiver's interest in administering the estate and the receiver's duty. [Citations omitted.]

[46] In addition to the fiduciary relationship to all creditors, the s. 47 receiver typically has vast powers over the property of the debtor and performs functions similar to those of a trustee in bankruptcy, albeit without relying on a change in the locus of title. The powers of the s. 47 receiver were discussed by Farley J. in Canada (Minister of Indian Affairs & Northern Development) v. Curragh Inc, [1994] O.J. No. 953 (Gen. Div.). At para. 3, Farley J. noted how amendments to the BIA in 1992 had affected the rights of secured creditors by the requirement in s. 244 to give notice to the debtor of an intention to enforce its security and to refrain from taking action for ten days, but providing for the remedy of a s. 47 receiver.

[47] After quoting the provisions of s. 47, and noting that the interim receivership in Curragh had continued for much longer than ten days, Farley J. observed that the object of the s. 47 receivership process appeared to be to maintain the mining property in question, while marketing it with a view to selling it, and that the s. 47 receivership would likely continue until the mine was sold. He concluded that "it would seem that in many practical aspects in these circumstances that the [interim receiver] is functioning as a quasi-receiver and manager/trustee in bankruptcy." He pointed out that the 1992 amendments to the BIA dealt more extensively with insolvency as contrasted with bankruptcy and that pre-amendment cases dealing with the powers of the interim receiver had to be analyzed with care.[16] Farley J. concluded that the regime providing for the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver was flexible and that the court could allow the interim receiver to exercise control over the business in question as opposed to limiting its powers for narrow purposes such as the sale of perishable goods. In addition, he observed at para. 6 that because s. 47(2)(c) allows the interim receiver to apply to the court for directions, "it would appear that these directions should be tailored to meet the practical demands of the situation which are being encountered in any given case."

[48] In deciding whether the s. 47 receiver falls within s. 20(1)(b), it is also relevant to consider that such a receiver has exclusive control over the assets and affairs of the company and, in this regard, the receiver displaces the board of directors and the company's managers: Toronto Dominion Bank v. Fortin et al. (1978), 85 D.L.R. (3d) 111 at 113 (B.C.S.C.); Community Pork Ventures Inc. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce 2005 SKQB 294 (CanLII), (2005), 11 C.B.R. (5th) 75 (Sask. Q.B.). Further, the s. 47 receiver has the power to settle liabilities and can be a successor employer, that is, it can stand in the shoes of the owner towards the employees of the company: GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. – Canada v. T.C.T. Logistics Inc., 2006 SCC 35 (CanLII), [2006] 2 S.C.R. 123. In addition, s. 47(2)(c) of the BIA empowers the interim receiver to "take such other action as the court considers advisable."

[49] Frank Bennett, in Bennett on Bankruptcy, supra, at p. 119-20, contrasts the appointment of a s. 47 interim receiver with that of receivers appointed in the context of an application for a bankruptcy order under s. 46 or pending the proposal process under s. 47.1 of the BIA as follows:

There does not appear to be any limitation on this appointment. There is no defined end of the interim receivership and the word "interim" is clearly a misnomer of the receiver's powers and duties that are more akin to a court-appointed receiver and manager under provincial legislation.

[50] As these cases illustrate, the role played by the s. 47 BIA receiver is akin to that of a trustee in bankruptcy in the sense that the s. 47 BIA receiver owes a fiduciary duty to all of the creditors and typically has vast powers over the property of the debtor. Furthermore, as in a bankruptcy, the exercise of the s. 47 BIA receiver's powers and duties is overseen by the court to ensure that the creditors of the debtor are not prejudiced.

[51] My colleague Feldman J.A. cites the case of Re TRG Service Inc., [2006] O.J. No. 4521 (S.C.J.), in which it was held that a monitor under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, is not a representative of creditors within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. The role of a court-appointed s. 47 BIA receiver stands in sharp contrast to that of a court-appointed monitor. A monitor's powers are limited and a court-appointed monitor does not stand in the shoes of the company nor owe fiduciary duties to creditors. See Re Ivaco 2006 CanLII 34551 (ON CA), (2006), 83 O.R. (3d) 108 (C.A.) at paras. 49-50, leave to appeal to S.C.C. granted, [2006] S.C.C.A. No. 490.

(d) The word "rights" in s. 20(2) means more than title or ownership rights and includes the right to possession

[52] A person "who represents the creditors of the debtor" under s. 20(1)(b) must be a person exercising rights, because s. 20(2) refers to the time when "[t]he rights of a person... in respect of the collateral under clause 1(b)" are to be determined. The PPSA does not define the word "rights" or the phrase "rights of a person...in respect of the collateral". In my opinion, the word "rights" in the PPSA is used more broadly than referring to title alone.

[53] The motion judge was of the opinion that the rights referred to in s. 20(2) are proprietary rights akin to those exercised by a trustee in bankruptcy. He concluded that a receiver is not the type of representative of creditors included in s. 20(1)(b) because, unlike with the trustee in bankruptcy, title to the debtor's assets does not vest in a s. 47 BIA receiver. In my opinion, the motion judge erred in interpreting the word "rights" in s. 20(2) as meaning proprietary rights limited to the traditional concepts of title and ownership.

[54] The motion judge's conclusion ignores the fact that the PPSA is not about title to property or rights against the debtor, but is about notice to and priorities between creditors. In Re Giffen, 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91 at para. 28, Iacobucci J. was critical of the British Columbia Court of Appeal's approach to a priority dispute under the B.C. Personal Property Security Act because that court "did not look past the traditional concepts of title and ownership." He held that the dispute could not be resolved through the determination of who had title because the dispute was one of priority to the collateral and not ownership in it.

[55] As noted by Tamara M. Buckwold and Ronald C.C. Cuming in their article, cited with approval in Giffen, supra at para. 26, "The Personal Property Security Act and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: Two Solitudes or Complementary Systems?" (1997) 12 B.F.L.R. 476 at 470:

The rights of parties to a transaction that creates a security interest are explicitly not dependent upon either the form of the transaction or upon traditional questions of title. Rather, they are defined by the [Personal Property Security] Act itself.

[56] Other legal scholars have made similar comments. In 2006 Ontario PPSA & Commentary, (Markham, Ont.: Butterworths, 2006) at p. 3, editors Jennifer G. Legge and Daphne J. MacKenzie explain that "neither the application [of the Act] nor priority contests among creditors with an interest in personal property collateral are governed by title." In his 2008 Annotated Ontario Personal Property Security Act, supra at p. 247, Richard McLaren states in regard to the general priority rules that are to be applied if no other provision of the Act is applicable: "The general priority scheme set up in s. 30(1) disregards the pre-Act law and its reverence for legal title in collateral."[17] By focusing on where title was held in interpreting s. 20(1)(b), the motion judge ignored the overall context of the PPSA.

[57] I am of the opinion that the phrase "rights of a person" in s. 20(2) refers to the entitlement of the person under s. 20(1)(b) to exercise its powers, such as the power to take possession of the debtor's assets. In Re Giffen, supra, Iacobucci J. held at para. 34 that the right to possession is a right to property or a proprietary right under the BIA. He stated: "In my opinion, the bankrupt's right to use and possession of the car constitutes 'property' for the purposes of the BIA..."[18]

[58] This interpretation of "rights of a person" in s. 20(2) is also in harmony with the use of the phrase "rights" in other sections of the PPSA, as well as scholarly comment on the word "rights" as used in the PPSA context.

[59] Although title to a debtor's property does not vest in a receiver, s. 60(1) of the PPSA states:

60. (1) Nothing in this Act prevents,

(a) the parties to a security agreement from agreeing that the secured party may appoint a receiver or receiver and manager and, except as provided by this Act, determining the rights and duties of the receiver and manager by agreement [Emphasis added.]

As the word "rights" is specifically used in relation to receivers in s. 60(1), the argument that "person" in s. 20(2) must have proprietary rights akin to those of a trustee in bankruptcy cannot succeed.

[60] Zeigel and Denomme also discuss the word "rights" in relation to one of the prerequisites for attachment under s. 11 of the PPSA: that the debtor have "rights" in the collateral. See The Ontario PPSA Commentary and Analysis, supra, at pp. 124-27. They begin by saying that the section merely states the obvious, namely, that if the debtor has no "rights" in the collateral, the debtor has nothing to give as security to the creditor. One subheading asks the question: "Is it sufficient that the debtor only has a 'power' to transfer rights in the collateral?" The authors conclude that the power to vest a good title in the goods of a third party is a sufficient right to create a security interest. They also ask the question whether anything turns on the distinction between "power" and "rights" and conclude at p. 127 that nothing turns on the distinction: "Rights" is used elliptically in paragraph [11(2)(c)] to describe collateral to which the secured party's security interest is capable of attaching, and is not concerned with the purity of the debtor's title.

[61] In addition, under s. 1 of the PPSA, a "debtor" is defined as: "a person who ... owns or has rights in the collateral, including a transferee of or a successor to a debtor's interest in collateral." The construction of this definition makes it clear that the word rights has a broader meaning than ownership.

[62] I would adopt the same approach to interpreting the word "rights" in s. 20(2). In my opinion, the phrase "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" is not limited to persons with the same proprietary rights in the collateral as an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy, but includes a receiver appointed by the court pursuant to s. 47 of the BIA who has the right to take possession of the collateral and the right to sell it. If "rights" in s. 20(2) were read as only referring to ownership rights, then the phrase "including" in s. 20(1)(b) would have no significance because only the named representatives hold title in the debtor's collateral. My interpretation of the word "rights" in s. 20(2) as referring to the receiver's rights to possess and sell the debtor's collateral gives effect to the phrase "including" in s. 20(1)(b).

(e) The overall scheme of the PPSA including s. 20 as a whole and s. 30(6)

[63] In The Ontario PPSA Commentary and Analysis, supra, at pp. 170-71, Ziegel and Denomme consider what happens when a properly perfected security interest becomes unperfected, or in other words, when it lapses. After noting that the current s. 20 does not deal with the question of what happens to a lapsed registration, the authors say that the question would have been resolved in favour of the secured party whose perfected interest had lapsed, for a number of reasons. One reason is that under the pre-PPSA statutes, the lapsed registration did not affect the validity of pre-lapse interests. The underlying reason was that priority between competing consensual interests was determined on the basis of a reliance theory. The authors then consider what the approach to priorities would be under the current s. 20(1)(b). They note that one of the arguments in favour of not giving any effect to the lapsed interest is to protect the integrity of the registration system. In opposition to this position, they note that in ss. 20(1)(c) and (d),[19] the general rule that a security interest is not effective until perfected only applies where there is a transferee for value who does not know of the security interest at the time of the transfer.

[64] The authors conclude that the argument in favour of subordinating lapsed interests in determining priorities so as to protect the integrity of the registration system is further undermined by s. 30(6) of the PPSA.[20] Under that section, a secured creditor may reperfect a security interest in the debtor's collateral that was perfected but has become unperfected. The effect of reperfecting is to restore the secured creditor to the position it had prior to becoming unperfected, subject only to the rights of a person acquired during the period of unperfection. There is no time limit for reperfecting in s. 30(6) and Ziegel and Denomme consider the reperfection requirement to be little more than a formality that "might as well be dispensed with." These provisions show that when a previously perfected security interest lapses, the integrity of the registration system is not the ultimate value to be protected.

Digitized by Google

[65] As mentioned, s. 30(6) of the PPSA also contains an exception. The exception is "...that if a person acquired rights in all or part of the collateral during the period when the security interest was unperfected, the registration shall not be effective as against the person who acquired the rights during such period." Use of the generic word "person" encompasses legal entities other than a secured or unsecured creditor. See Ziegel and Denomme, supra, at p. 259. Since the word "rights" in the PPSA has a broader meaning than proprietary rights and is to be given a consistent meaning throughout the PPSA, the reference to "rights in all or part of the collateral during the period when the security interest was unperfected" includes the rights in the collateral acquired by the s. 47 BIA receiver to take possession of a debtor's property and to sell it. On my interpretation of s. 30(6), if St. Paul had attempted to reperfect its security interest by registering a fresh financing statement after the appointment of PWC as a s. 47 BIA receiver, the exception would apply because the s. 47 BIA receiver acquired rights in the collateral, namely the right to possession of all present and future money and the right to sell the debtor's assets on behalf of all creditors and distribute the proceeds. Thus, my interpretation of s. 20(1)(b) is consistent with the interpretation of rights in the collateral under other sections of the PPSA.

(f) The purpose of s. 20(1)(b) is to preserve the parties' relative entitlements at the time "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" is appointed

[66] The purpose of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA is to preserve the relative entitlements of the creditors at the time "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" is appointed. This conclusion flows from the Supreme Court's rulings on the relationship between provincial security interest legislation and federal bankruptcy legislation.

[67] One of the clearest and most trenchant explanations of s. 20(1)(b) and its relationship to the BIA is found in Anthony Duggan and Jacob Ziegel's commentary on the decision of Iacobucci J. in Re Giffen, supra. See "Justice Iacobucci and the Canadian Law of Deemed Trusts and Chattel Security" (2007) 57 U.T.L.J. 227 at 231-34. In that case, Telecom Leasing Canada Ltd. ("TLC") leased a car to B.C. Tel, who leased it to its employee, Carol Giffen. Leases of more than one year are subject to the B.C. PPSA irrespective of who has title and even though the lease does not secure payment or performance of an obligation. Neither TLC nor B.C. Tel filed a financing statement. Giffen went bankrupt. Even though Giffen did not have title to the car, the Supreme Court held that pursuant to the B.C. PPSA, title to the car vested in the trustee in bankruptcy.

[68] Commenting on this decision, Duggan and Ziegel state:

The PPSA registration requirements serve a publicity function. "Public disclosure of the security interest is required to prevent innocent third parties from granting credit to the debtor or otherwise acquiring an interest in the collateral." From this perspective, s. 20(b)(1) of the PPSA presents a puzzle: the trustee in bankruptcy is not in the position of an innocent third party, he does not rely on the register for the purpose of any dealings with the debtor, and so he is not prejudiced by a secured party's failure to perfect a security interest. Therefore, why should an unperfected security interest be ineffective against him? According to Re Giffen, 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91, the answer relates to the rights of execution creditors and the like. PPSA s. 20(a) provides that an unperfected security interest is subordinate to execution creditors. An execution creditor may be prejudiced by an unperfected security interest, and PPSA s. 20(a), provides a remedy by giving the execution creditor priority over the secured party. If the debtor becomes bankrupt while the execution process is still in train, the execution creditor loses this priority by virtue of the stay provisions in the BIA, ss. 69.3 and 70. In effect, "the judgment enforcement rights of unsecured creditors are merged in the bankruptcy proceedings." PPSA s. 20(b)(i) is a kind of quid pro quo. It compensates unsecured creditors for the loss of their priority rights under s. 20(a) by giving the corresponding priority to the trustee in the trustee's capacity as the creditors' representative. In summary, the purpose of the PPSA s. 20 (b)(i) is "to permit the unsecured creditors to maintain, through the person of the trustee, the same status vis-à-vis secured creditors who have not perfected their security interests which they enjoyed prior to the bankruptcy of the debtor."

In Re Giffen, Justice Iacobucci put the case for PPSA, s. 20(b)(i) in fairness terms: when the debtor becomes bankrupt the execution creditor loses the priority it previously had over unperfected security interests but this is offset by giving priority to the trustee instead. However, the justification can by expressed in economic terms. The thinking goes like this: Bankruptcy creates a common pool problem, which bankruptcy law addresses by substituting a mandatory system of collective debt collection for the individual first-come, first -served debt collection system that operates outside bankruptcy. Creditors' relative entitlements should be the same inside bankruptcy as they are outside bankruptcy because otherwise there will be incentives for individual creditors to use the bankruptcy laws opportunistically. [Citations omitted; emphasis added.]

[69] The rationale given by Duggan and Ziegel in relation to bankruptcy applies equally whenever "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" is appointed. When the s. 47 BIA receiver was appointed in this case, it was because the Bank was about to enforce its security. At that time, the Bank had a properly perfected security interest. An execution creditor would not have had any priority vis-à-vis the Bank. Because the Appointment Order stayed any actions, the execution creditor would have lost any priority it had over unperfected security interests as of the commencement of the receivership, subject to the stay being lifted by the court. Whether the BIA stay is imposed automatically under s. 69.3 or by court order under s. 47, the effects of the stay and the considerations it engages are similar. To prevent insolvency as well as bankruptcy laws from being used opportunistically, creditors' relative entitlements should be the same as they were immediately prior to the time "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" was appointed.

[70] Duggan and Ziegel then address the second question raised in Re Giffen, namely, whether s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA is in conflict with the BIA because of the principle of bankruptcy law that a trustee has no greater claim to property than the debtor herself had. Iacobucci J. held that the principle is not an inflexible one and that the provinces are competent to modify it as long as the modifications are not in conflict with the provisions of the BIA.

[71] In Re Giffen, Iacobucci J. did not directly address the issue of whether a conflict exists between then s. 20(b)(i) of the B.C. PPSA and bankruptcy policy that a trustee has no greater claim to property than the debtor had. However, he provided a clue to his thinking at para. 52 of his reasons where he approved a statement from Donaghy v. CNS Vehicle Leasing, 1992 CanLII 6150 (AB QB), [1992] 6 W.W.R. 70 (Alta. Q.B.), to the effect that the issue is not ownership of the property but priority to it. Duggan and Ziegel state:

From a bankruptcy perspective, what matters is not the rights a creditor may have had against the debtor herself to the disputed asset but, rather, the creditor's rights against other creditors at the moment of bankruptcy: "it is a question of priority, not property." In other words, the flaw in TLC's argument was that it focused on the wrong attribute of the property right its security interest gave it. The question is not whether TLC could have enforced its security interest against Giffen just before she went bankrupt but, rather, whether TLC would have had a priority over an execution creditor at the same point. Section 20(1)(a) of the PPSA determines the answer to the second question, and bankruptcy policy dictates that bankruptcy law should preserve the parties' relative entitlements. If this is the real meaning of the principle at stake, there is no conflict between PPSA s. 20(1)(b), and the bankruptcy laws. On the contrary, the provision reinforces bankruptcy policy. [Emphasis added.]

[72] I take Duggan and Ziegel's reference to bankruptcy policy and bankruptcy law to be a reference to insolvency policy and law as well. Inasmuch as the purpose of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA is to preserve the relative entitlements of the parties at the time "a person who represents the debtors of the creditor" is appointed, the Bank's priority status falls to be determined at the time PWC was appointed as receiver under s. 47 of the BIA.

[73] The purpose of s. 20 of the PPSA is to permit a person who takes over control of the assets or business of the debtor to distribute those assets in an orderly fashion in accordance with the existing priorities. It is for this reason that s. 20(2) determines the rights of the representative as of the date from which her status takes effect. Determining priorities at the commencement of the distribution process when the receiver assumes control over the debtor's assets is in keeping with the goals of the legislation.[21]

Conclusion on whether PWC is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" and the date on which the determination of priorities should be made [74] Giving effect to the unique wording of Ontario's PPSA; the history of the section; the opinion of scholars; existing jurisprudence holding that the role of a s. 47 BIA receiver is similar to that of a trustee in bankruptcy; and having regard to the section as a whole, to related provisions of the PPSA, as well as to the purpose of the section, I conclude that PWC's appointment as a s. 47 BIA receiver made it "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within s. 20(1)(b). Pursuant to s. 20(2)(b), the time for determination of priorities is thus "the date from which the person's representative status takes effect." PWC's representative status took effect on the date of its appointment under the Appointment Order, namely November 14, 2001. On that date, the Bank had a properly perfected first security interest.

PWC's alternative argument: did the relevant date for determining priorities change when the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed?

[75] I must also address PWC's submission that its status as interim receiver under s. 47 of the BIA effectively ended when it became trustee in bankruptcy on January 31, 2002 and that the relevant date for the purpose of determining the relative effectiveness of the Bank's security as against PWC is no longer the date on which PWC became the interim receiver, but is now the date on which it became the trustee in bankruptcy. PWC submits that because of the intervening bankruptcy, it is no longer in possession of any of the assets of State in its capacity as receiver and thus it has no interest in the assets that are subject to the Bank's security. Thus, it argues that the Bank's secured interest is no longer effective against it in its capacity as trustee in bankruptcy because that interest became unperfected prior to the assignment into bankruptcy by operation of s. 48(3) of the PPSA.[22]

[76] There are five considerations that lead me to reject PWC's submission that the date for assessing the effectiveness of the Bank's security interest was the date of the assignment into bankruptcy:

(a) the s. 47 BIA receivership did not end when the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed;

Digitized by Google

(b) the date when a secured party acts to realize on its security is an appropriate date on which to ascertain priorities and the date should not shift;
(c) the date when the respective security interests of the parties come into conflict is the date of the Appointment Order;
(d) the policy of the BIA is not to interfere with the rights of secured creditors in realizing upon their security; and
(e) giving effect to PWC's position would undermine the purpose of s. 20 of the PPSA and lead to commercial uncertainty.

(a) The s. 47 BIA receivership did not end when the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed

[78] PWC submits that the s. 47 BIA receivership and the bankruptcy of State are two separate judicial proceedings and that when PWC was appointed trustee in bankruptcy on January 31, 2002, the s. 47 BIA receivership ended. According to PWC, the Bank's priority status must therefore be reassessed as of January 31, 2002 when it became trustee in bankruptcy.

[79] PWC cites no authority for its proposition and, in my view, its position that the receivership ended upon the bankruptcy is not supported by the jurisprudence or by the terms of the Appointment Order. The effect of bankruptcy on the authority of a court-appointed receiver depends on the circumstances. See Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. King Truck Engineering Canada Ltd. (1987), 63 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (Ont. C.A.). The court's brief endorsement (per Blair, Robins and Krever JJ.A.) states:

The appellants submitted that on the occurrence of the bankruptcy the court-appointed receiver was deprived of jurisdiction to deal with the property of the bankrupt. We do not accept this argument and agree with Hughes J. who held that the activities of a receiver-manager appointed by order of the court and a trustee in bankruptcy not so appointed can co-exist in the absence of conflict of interest and of jurisdiction.

[80] PWC's submission also ignores the wording of the Appointment Order, which is silent as to when PWC's receivership ends. There is no evidence before us that PWC has passed its final accounts as interim receiver thereby bringing its receivership to an end. More importantly, the Appointment Order specifically contemplates that PWC's receivership will continue after assigning State into bankruptcy. The order appointing PWC as interim receiver gave it broad powers, including the power to make an assignment in bankruptcy and to act as trustee.[23] Under s. 3 of the Order, PWC had the right to "take possession and control of the Property ... and all receipts ... arising out of or from the Property" of the Debtor. It was also given the power in s. 3(f) "to receive and collect all monies and accounts now owed or hereafter owing to the Debtor in respect of the Property". [Emphasis added.] The property of the debtor would include receivables such as an income tax refund.

[81] Further, s. 3(p) of the Appointment Order gives PWC as interim receiver the power to enter into arrangements with any trustee in bankruptcy, including an occupation agreement, and the power to lend money to the trustee, not exceeding $250,000 unless increased by the court. For the interim receiver to be in a position to lend money to the trustee in bankruptcy as contemplated by the Appointment Order, the s. 47 receiver must necessarily continue to exercise possession and control over the assets. I note that almost a year after the trustee was appointed, on December 19, 2002, the s. 47 BIA receiver transferred the amount of $1,180,243.72 (proceeds from the third asset sale) from its account to the account of the trustee in bankruptcy. The s. 47 BIA receiver then distributed $950,000 to the Bank.

[82] Thus, in this case, the role of the s. 47 BIA receiver and that of the trustee in bankruptcy were intended to be complimentary.[24] The process envisaged was that the interim receiver would realize all of State's assets and take possession of them, and would continue to act in conjunction with the trustee in bankruptcy. Accordingly, the receivership and the bankruptcy were not two separate and distinct procedures.

(b) The date when a secured party acts to realize on its security is an appropriate date on which to ascertain priorities and the date should not shift

[83] PWC submits that the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver did not "crystallize" the rights of the parties who had a claim against the assets of State.

[84] Contrary to PWC's submission, when a secured party acts to realize on its security, that is generally the date on which to apply priority rules. Richard McLaren in The 2008 Annotated Ontario Personal Property Security Act, supra, at p. 246, states in reference to s. 30:

A general issue which may arise through the course of the application of the priority rules is the date upon which the priority dispute will be determined. Generally, this will be the date where a secured party acts to realize upon its security.

This passage was also in an earlier version of McLaren's text and was quoted with approval in Loeb Canada Inc. v. Caisse Populaire Alexandria Ltée (2004), 7 P.P.S.A.C. (3d) 194 (Ont. S.C.J.).

[85] PWC relies on the Model Order referred to above (see para. 25), which expressly permits the filing of registrations under provincial personal property regimes, in support of its position that the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver is not the date that triggers the application of priority rules. However, at the time the events in the case at bar occurred, the practice in Ontario was to interpret the stay of proceedings in receivership orders to include a stay of any action on the part of a secured creditor to reperfect its security through registration of a financing statement.[25] A secured creditor whose interest had become unperfected could not reregister its interest without leave of the court. Thus, at the relevant time, the practice was to consider the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver as a triggering event. The effect of PWC's submission is to suggest that the 2004 procedural change to the standard form template receivership order has retrospective substantive implications.

[86] The change in practice does not affect the fact that the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver continues to result in a court-ordered stay of all actions and that this appointment still affects the enforcement rights of unsecured creditors. In that sense, the date of the appointment of the s. 47 BIA receiver is a triggering event and the date of the receiver's appointment can still be used to determine priorities.

(c) The date when the respective security interests of the parties came into conflict was the date of the Appointment Order

[87] In Sperry Inc. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce reflex, (1985), 50 O.R. (2d) 267 (C.A.), aff'g (1982), 40 O.R. (3d) 54 (H.C.), Morden J.A. dealt with a priority conflict between a bank, whose security interest had become unperfected through a lapse in registration, and an inventory supplier, whose security interest was also unperfected. After resolving the priority issue on the basis of which creditor's interest had attached first, Morden J.A. expressed his view on a different basis for coming to the same conclusion. He stated at para. 35:

...I think that it would be reasonable to conclude that the priority issue between the parties should be resolved as of the time when their respective security interests came into conflict. This would appear to be March 14, 1980, when the bank sought to enforce its interest against collateral in which Sperry claimed a superior interest. The issue arose at that time – what right did the bank have against Sperry to enforce its security?

The step the bank took on March 14, 1980 to enforce its interest in the collateral was the appointment of a private receiver pursuant to its general security agreement.

[88] In this case, the Bank acted to realize upon its security by giving a s. 244 notice and by asking the court to appoint a s. 47 BIA receiver pursuant to its general security agreement. The effect of the Bank's act was to have all actions against the debtor stayed by court order. The question of the Bank's right to enforce its security over all of the assets of the debtor arose at that time. The asset sales in November and December merely converted those assets into proceeds which could be distributed according to the priorities over them when the receiver was appointed. I am not aware of any authority that suggests that the date for determining priorities should be the date when funds owing to a debtor are actually received.

(d) The policy of the BIA is not to interfere with the rights of secured creditors in realizing upon their security

[89] The policy of the BIA is not to interfere with the rights of secured creditors in realizing upon their security. Frank Bennett, in Bennett on Creditors' and Debtors' Rights and Remedies, 4th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1994) states at p. 703: "The trustee in bankruptcy acquires title to the assets of the bankrupt subject to the rights of secured creditors." Similarly, at p. 416 of The 2007 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Toronto: Carswell, 2006), Lloyd W. Houlden and Geoffrey B. Morawetz state:

The policy of the BIA in the case of bankruptcy is not to interfere with secured creditors except in so far as it may be necessary to protect the estate as to any surplus on the assets covered by the security.

No leave is necessary for a secured creditor to proceed to realize upon its security...

[90] The statutory stay of proceedings contained in s. 70(1) of the BIA specifically excepts "the rights of a secured creditor", as does s. 71, which vests the property of the bankrupt in the trustee. If the debtor gives notice of his intention to make a proposal, the stay imposed by s. 69(1) does not apply where the secured creditor has given notice of its intention to enforce its security under s. 244(1) more than ten days before the proposal.

[91] In light of my earlier comments about the Supreme Court's decision in Re Giffen, it is also important to observe that Re Giffen does not justify using the date of the bankruptcy, rather than the date of the receivership, as the necessary reference date for determining priorities for the significant reason that the wording of the Ontario legislation is different from that considered by the Supreme Court in Re Giffen. The B.C. provision the Supreme Court was asked to interpret read: "A security interest ... in collateral is not effective against ... a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of the bankruptcy." The B.C. legislation, unlike Ontario's PPSA, does not refer to "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor." Section 20(2)(b) of the Ontario PPSA further specifies that the rights of the creditor's representative are to be "determined as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect" while the B.C. legislation forces an inquiry as to whether the security interest was perfected at the date of the bankruptcy.

Digitized by Google

This different legislative language means that the decision in Re Giffen cannot be applied to set the date of the bankruptcy, rather than the date of the receivership, as the starting point.[26]

[92] The importance of the wording of the applicable provincial legislation in determining parties' rights in a bankruptcy is highlighted by the decision of Lefebvre (Trustee of); Tremblay (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 63 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 326. In Lefebvre, the bankruptcy judge and the majority of the Quebec Court of Appeal had applied Re Giffen to two priority disputes, the facts of which were indistinguishable from those considered in Re Giffen. Writing for the court, Lebel J. allowed the appeal and held at para. 40 that the Quebec courts had given Re Giffen:

...a significance it did not in fact have, as the court failed to take into account the statutory context established by the provincial legislation of British Columbia, which defined the respective rights of a long-term lessor of a motor vehicle and the trustee in bankruptcy of the lessee. ... [T]he provincial legislation itself defined the nature of the respective rights of lessors and trustees. ... As has already been mentioned, the Civil Code of Quebec does not provide for a similar consequence for failure to publish the rights out of a lease. In this context, Giffen did not justify the solution adopted by the Court of Appeal.

[93] Lefebvre thus makes it clear that Re Giffen cannot be applied generally without regard to the statutory context.

[94] To interpret s. 20(2)(b) in a manner that shifts the reference point for the determination of priorities from the date the Bank acted to realize on its security by appointing a s. 47 BIA receiver to the date the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed interferes with the enforcement process and is not consonant with bankruptcy policy.

(e) Giving effect to PWC's position would undermine the purpose of s. 20 of the PPSA and lead to commercial uncertainty

[95] Finally, to read the reference point for determining priorities between the representative of the creditors and the secured creditor as changing in the way that PWC suggests undermines the purpose of s. 20 which, as I have indicated, is to preserve the priorities as they stood at the time "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" was appointed. From a practical point of view, changing the date for determining priorities would lead to commercial uncertainty. As noted by Winkler J. in Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada v. Royal Bank (1995), 10 P.P.S.A.C. (2d) 246 (Ont. Ct. (Gen.Div.)), the purpose of the PPSA registration regime is to impart order and certainty to commerce. To reverse priorities in the middle of the distribution process when there has been no change in the receiver's control over the assets is completely contrary to the goals of the legislation.

Conclusion

[96] Although the Bank was not exempt from the obligation to file a financing change statement or a fresh financing statement upon learning of State's name change, its failure to do so in this case did not result in a loss of priority. In my opinion, the date for determining the effectiveness of the Bank's security interest is November 14, 2001, when the court appointed PWC as interim receiver. This date for determining priorities did not change with the appointment of PWC as trustee in bankruptcy.

Disposition

[97] For the reasons I have given, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the motion judge, and in its place provide the following direction to PWC:

That the security granted by State to the Bank as Agent is fully effective as against PWC with respect to the Estate Funds (as defined in PWC's notice of motion and attached report) and that PWC act in the administration of the Estate accordingly.

[98] With respect to costs, I note that no award of costs was made to the Bank or to St Paul at first instance as this was a novel issue and the costs of PWC were ordered to be paid out of the estate. I would make the same order here.

FELDMAN J.A.:

[1] When the appellant bank sought the appointment of an interim receiver of the debtor company, it held a perfected security interest over the assets of that company. However, during the receivership the appellant allowed its registration under the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10 (the "PPSA") to lapse. The appellant did not re-perfect its security interest before the interim receiver assigned the debtor into bankruptcy, following which, a significant tax refund came into the debtor's estate.

[2] The appellant asserts priority under ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) of the PPSA over the tax refund and some other undistributed funds, on the basis that the date when the receiver was appointed is the date for determining priority, and on that date, the appellant's security interest was perfected. In contrast, the trustee in bankruptcy says that the relevant date for determining priority is the date of the assignment into bankruptcy. Because on that date the appellant's security interest was unperfected as against the trustee, the appellant ranks as an unsecured creditor, pari passu with other unsecured creditors.

[3] The motion judge dismissed the appellant's claim. For the reasons that follow, I agree with the motion judge and would dismiss the appeal.

Background

[4] The appellant held a first registered general security interest over the personal property of State, the debtor, and sought to enforce its security by seeking the appointment of an interim receiver under s. 47(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA"). A court order appointing the respondent, PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. ("PWC"), as interim receiver was issued on November 14, 2001. Following its appointment, the interim receiver sold the substantial assets of State in three sales. In accordance with the vesting orders of the court, the interim receiver distributed the proceeds of the first two sales to the creditors according to their respective priorities at the time of the sales. As part of the first sale on November 14, 2001, the receiver sold State's name triggering s. 48(3) of the PPSA, which provides:

> Where a security interest is perfected by registration and the secured party learns that the name of the debtor has changed, the security interest in the collateral becomes unperfected thirty days after the secured party learns of the change of name and the new name of the debtor unless the secured party registers a financing change statement or takes possession of the collateral within such thirty days.

[5] On January 31, 2002, in accordance with the terms of the order appointing it as interim receiver, PWC assigned the debtor into bankruptcy and PWC was appointed the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor's estate. Following the assignment, the trustee in bankruptcy received an income tax refund of $4.325 million from the Canada Revenue Agency.

[6] Before the date of the debtor's assignment into bankruptcy (and before the third sale of assets) both the appellant bank and St. Paul Guarantee Insurance Company ("St. Paul"), a subsequent secured creditor, had knowledge of the sale of the debtor's name and failed to register a financing change statement. Therefore, both of their secured debts had become unperfected in accordance with s. 48(3).[27]

[7] Following the debtor's assignment into bankruptcy, the appellant bank asserted a first priority right to the income tax refund and some other funds held by the trustee by filing a proof of claim, which included a secured claim in the amount of $20 million, with PWC as trustee in bankruptcy. In response, the trustee in bankruptcy brought a motion for the advice and direction of the court as to whether the appellant bank's security interest, which was unperfected at the date of the bankruptcy, remained effective against it as trustee.

[8] The motion judge reached the following conclusions:

1. An interim receiver appointed under s. 47(1) of the BIA is not a person who represents the creditors of the debtor within the meaning of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) of the PPSA.
2. The order appointing the interim receiver, which contemplated that interested parties could move for a lift of the stay it imposed, did therefore not have the effect of precluding the appellant from maintaining the perfected status of its security interest following the appointment of the interim receiver.
3. A court has no jurisdiction to override provisions of the PPSA, including s. 48(3), and the appellant's security interest became unperfected in accordance with that section.
4. As an alternative to its argument that the interim receiver is a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, the appellant argued before the motion judge that it held a perfected security interest in the income tax refund and other amounts on the basis that the interim receiver took possession of those funds "on behalf of" the appellant upon its appointment at the behest of the appellant. The motion judge rejected that argument and held that s. 26(2) of the PPSA has no application to the facts of this case, as the interim receiver did not take possession of the income tax refund on behalf of the appellant bank.[28]

Digitized by Google

5. PWC only became a person who represents the creditors of the debtor within the meaning of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) of the PPSA upon its appointment as trustee in bankruptcy. Because at that time the security interest of the appellant was unperfected, it was and remains ineffective against the trustee from that date.

Issues

[9] My colleague has identified two issues for determination on this appeal:

1. Did the order appointing the interim receiver give the appellant an exemption from complying with s. 48(3) of the PPSA?
2. Did the appellant's failure to file a financing change statement result in a loss of its priority as a secured creditor?

The resolution of the second issue requires a determination of whether an interim receiver appointed under s. 47(1) of the BIA, although not referred to by name in ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b), is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of these provisions. It also requires a determination of the purpose and effect of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b).

[10] During the applicable period, ss. 20(1) and 20(2) of the PPSA read as follows:

> 20(1) Except as provided in subsection (3), until perfected, a security interest,
> (a) in collateral is subordinate to the interest of,
> (i) a person who has a perfected security interest in the same collateral or who has a lien given under any other Act or by a rule of law or who has a priority under any other Act, or
> (ii) a person who causes the collateral to be seized through execution, attachment, garnishment, charging order, equitable execution or other legal process, or
> (iii) all persons entitled by the Creditors' Relief Act or otherwise to participate in the distribution of the property over which a person described in subclause (ii) has assumed control, or the proceeds of such property;
> (b) in collateral is not effective against a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy;
> (c) in chattel paper, documents of title, securities, instruments or goods is not effective against a transferee thereof who takes under a transfer that does not secure payment or performance of an obligation and who gives value and receives delivery thereof without knowledge of the security interest;
> (d) in intangibles other than accounts is not effective against a transferee thereof who takes under a transfer that does not secure payment or performance of an obligation and who gives value without knowledge of the security interest.
> 20(2) The rights of a person,
> (a) who has a statutory lien referred to in subclause (1) (a) (i) arise,
> (i) in the case of the bankruptcy of the debtor, at the effective date of the bankruptcy, or
> (ii) in any other case, when the lienholder has taken possession or otherwise done everything necessary to make the lien enforceable in accordance with the provisions of the Act creating the lien;
> (b) under clause (1) (b) in respect of the collateral are to be determined as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect.

[11] In his submissions, counsel for the appellant characterized the effect of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) to be that when a representative of creditors is appointed, "the music stops" under the PPSA, meaning that the priority rights of all parties are frozen for the purpose of distribution of the estate of the debtor.

[12] The appellant's position is that an interim receiver, appointed by the court under s. 47(1) of the BIA, is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. The appellant submits that upon the appointment of the interim receiver, the priority interests of all creditors of the debtor are frozen and the interim receiver is to distribute the assets or proceeds of the assets of the debtor, no matter when they are realized or distributed, in accordance with the respective priority positions of the creditors as of the date of the receiver's appointment.

[13] To the extent that the security interest of a secured creditor may become unperfected under s. 48(3) of the PPSA following the appointment of a representative of creditors, submits the appellant, this post-appointment event has no bearing on the secured creditor's priority for the purpose of the distribution of assets of the debtor's estate. Or, put another way, the effect of the order appointing the interim receiver was to exempt the appellant from the requirement of complying with s. 48(3). Consequently, the fact that the appellant failed to file a financing change statement before the date of the debtor's assignment into bankruptcy and the appointment of the trustee in bankruptcy did not affect the appellant's entitlement to continue to be paid from the assets of the estate in accordance with its priority position as it stood on the date of the appointment of the interim receiver, at which time its security interest was perfected.

[14] I summarize my reasons for rejecting the appellant's position as follows. First, although an interim receiver may represent the creditors of the debtor for some purposes, it is not "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning and purpose of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b), and the term "receiver" should not be read in to these subsections. Unlike a trustee in bankruptcy, a receiver does not obtain the debtor's proprietary interest in the collateral and obtains no priority rights under ss. 20(1)(b) or 20(2)(b) in the collateral, or in respect of the collateral, and thus is not in a priority contest with any creditor on behalf of unsecured creditors. The purpose of these subsections is to allow the representative of creditors to defeat unperfected security interests on behalf of unsecured creditors whose rights to collect outstanding debts from the debtor are statutorily stayed, such as on bankruptcy or assignment for the benefit of creditors. Unlike on a bankruptcy or assignment for the benefit of creditors, creditors' priority rights are not statutorily stayed on a receivership. Although such rights may be stayed by the order appointing the receiver, a creditor may apply to lift the stay in order to commence or continue proceedings to collect its debt.

[15] Second, the effect of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) is to determine the priority rights of creditors at a particular time, but not to freeze priorities for all time, or, in the words of appellant's counsel, to "stop the music". Neither these subsections nor the order appointing the interim receiver had the effect of exempting the appellant from the requirement of complying with s. 48(3). Consequently the appellant's security interest became unperfected by its failure to file a financing change statement within the time period specified by s. 48(3). Because it also failed to re-register under s. 30(6) before the debtor's assignment into bankruptcy, the appellant's security interest is not effective against the trustee in bankruptcy.

Analysis

Issue 1: Did the order appointing the interim receiver give the appellant an exemption from complying with s. 48(3) of the PPSA?

[16] The motion judge found that the order appointing the receiver did not exempt the appellant from complying with s. 48(3), nor did the stay provisions of the order prevent the appellant from seeking to lift the stay in order to file a financing change statement. My colleague concludes that the motion judge was correct on this issue and I agree. In my view, the consequence of this conclusion is that the appellant's failure to comply with s. 48(3) caused its security interest to become unperfected and to be ineffective against the trustee in bankruptcy under ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b).

Issue 2: Did the appellant's failure to file a financing change statement result in a loss of its priority as a secured creditor?

(i) Subsection 20(1) of the PPSA

[17] Subsection 20(1) prescribes the effect of perfection of a security interest in collateral in relation to other claims against the same collateral and defines the rules for determining priority between the holder of an unperfected security interest and others with a claim to, or an interest in, the collateral. Under s. 20(1)(a), an unperfected security interest "is subordinate to" perfected security interests in the same collateral as well to the interests of lienholders and of unsecured creditors who have seized the collateral through legal processes.

[18] In contrast, under ss. 20(1)(b), (c) and (d), an unperfected security interest "is not effective" against a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy, and against certain transferees of the debtor's property. The different language is used because s. 20(1)(a) orders the priority among secured creditors and other creditors with a realized interest in the collateral, while under ss. 20(1)(b), (c) and (d), an unperfected security interest is treated as an unsecured interest as against the named persons.

[19] In order to interpret the meaning and scope of the term "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" in s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA, one must examine the language of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b), since both clauses work together, as well as the purpose of the provisions, which I will discuss later in these reasons.

[20] Clause 20(1)(b) states that a security interest in collateral, until perfected, "is not effective against a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy." Before this provision was amended in 1989, it provided that an unperfected security interest in collateral was ineffective against three named representatives: a trustee in bankruptcy, an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a receiver. See Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 375, s. 22(1)(a)(iii). While in amending the provision the legislature specifically removed the reference to a "receiver", it also added the term "including", which now precedes "assignee for the benefit of creditors" and "trustee in bankruptcy". The appellant argues that because the legislature used the word "including", the removal of the reference to a "receiver" does not indicate an intention by the legislature to exclude receivers from the ambit of the provision.[29]

Digitized by Google

[21] I disagree. The legislature's removal of a receiver from s. 20(1)(b) means the appellant cannot succeed without showing that an interim receiver is a "person who represents the creditors of the debtor" in the sense that fits the language and purpose of both ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b). There is no question that, in carrying out its functions and duties, an interim receiver can act in a representative capacity on behalf of some or all of the creditors.[30] The issue in this case is whether an interim receiver is the type of representative of creditors that is referred to in these two clauses.

(ii) A receiver does not obtain the debtor's proprietary interest in the collateral

[22] The first relevant difference between a receiver and a trustee in bankruptcy or an assignee for the benefit of creditors is that a receiver does not obtain the debtor's proprietary interest in the collateral. In their text Personal Property Security Law (Toronto: Irwin Law Inc., 2005), Professors Cuming, Walsh and Wood, at pp. 441-42, begin their discussion of the interface between s. 20 of the PPSA and the BIA by explaining that the vesting of the debtor's personal property in the trustee in bankruptcy under s. 71(2) of the BIA gives the trustee the independent status to defeat unperfected security interests in that property under s. 20:

> The PPSA provides that a security interest is not effective against a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of bankruptcy. The effect of this is to give to the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy an independent status to defeat unperfected security interests in personal property that vests in the trustee as provided by BIA [sub]section 71(2). [Citations omitted.]

[23] The two creditors' representatives named in s. 20(1)(b) share an important characteristic: by virtue of statute (s. 71 of the BIA and ss. 7 and 8 of the Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. A.33), upon their respective appointments, the proprietary rights of the debtor in the collateral vest in these representatives.

[24] Section 71 of the BIA provides:

> 71. On a bankruptcy order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with their property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, immediately pass to and vest in the trustee named in the bankruptcy order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any assignment or transfer.

[25] Sections 7 and 8 of the Assignments and Preferences Act provide:

> 7. Every assignment made under this Act for the general benefit of creditors, if the property is described in the words "all my personal property that may be seized and sold under execution and all my real estate, credits and effects", or in words to the like effect, vests in the assignee all the real and personal estate, rights, property, credits and effects, whether vested or contingent, belonging to the assignor at the time of the assignment, except such as are by law exempt from seizure or sale under execution, subject, however, as regards land, to the Registry Act and the Land Titles Act.
> 8. Every assignment for the general benefit of creditors, whether it is or is not expressed to be made under or in pursuance of this Act and whether the assignment does or does not include all the real and personal estate of the assignor, vests the estate, whether real or personal or partly real and partly personal, thereby assigned in the assignee therein named for the general benefit of creditors, and the assignment and the property thereby assigned is subject to all the provisions of this Act, and the same applies to the assignee named in the assignment.

[26] As a result, these representatives hold the debtor's proprietary interest in the collateral. This is to be contrasted with the role and legal status of a receiver, whether privately or court-appointed. I will discuss court-appointed receivers because in this case, PWC is a court-appointed receiver and a court-appointed receiver has statutory authority.

[27] One important difference between a court-appointed receiver and a trustee in bankruptcy (or assignee for the benefit of creditors) is that a receiver obtains its powers from an order of the court . These powers allow the receiver to administer the business and assets of the debtor, and to effect a sale of the debtor's assets pursuant to a vesting order of the court. However, the debtor's property rights in the assets, whether the debtor has full or partial title or merely a right of possession, do not devolve onto the receiver as they do onto a trustee in bankruptcy by statute under s. 71 of the BIA. As the motion judge stated at para. 29:

> The appointment of an Interim Receiver does not vest the assets of the debtor in the Interim Receiver, as in the case of a Trustee in Bankruptcy, nor do the liabilities of the debtor become liabilities of the Interim Receiver whereas, in the case of a bankruptcy, the liabilities become liabilities of the bankrupt estate to be administered and, subject to the > rights of secured creditors, paid or compromised by the Trustee out of the assets of the bankrupt estate.

[28] The receiver is solely an administrator accountable to the court and to all stakeholders in the receivership, appointed to ensure that the debtor's assets are realized in an orderly manner and for the maximum realizable value, and then to distribute the proceeds to creditors and other claimants in accordance with their respective priorities. It is in that way that a receiver may represent creditors. As the motion judge pointed out, a debtor could retain possession and remain in business during a receivership, and, subject to the terms of the order appointing the interim receiver, could borrow additional funds and create additional security that would continue after the termination of the receivership. In some circumstances the debtor could retain the business following the discharge of the receiver. The debtor is not stripped of all of its interest in the collateral upon the appointment of an interim receiver.

[29] The fact that ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) deal with proprietary rights is reflected in the language and effect of s. 20(2)(b) which states:

> 20(2) The rights of a person,
> ...
> (b) under clause (1)(b) in respect of the collateral are to be determined as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect.

The effect of s. 20(2) is to define the time from which the rights of statutory lienholders under s. 20(1)(a)(i) and of representatives of creditors under s. 20(1)(b) are to be determined. The effective timing of the other rights under ss. 20(1)(a), (c) and (d) is built into the description of those rights. (See para. 10 above for the relevant provisions.)

[30] However, the wording of s. 20(2)(b) also tells us that s. 20(1)(b) has conferred "rights ... in respect of the collateral" on the representative of creditors and that those rights are to be determined "as of" the effective date of the representative's appointment. Although the term "rights", standing alone, is used in s. 60 of the PPSA to mean the right to take administrative steps, "rights ... in respect of the collateral" are rights that indicate a proprietary or priority interest in the collateral that entitles the holder of such rights to be paid out of the proceeds of that collateral in accordance with its priority.

(iii) A receiver does not assert the claim of the unsecured creditors against competing security interests

[31] A trustee in bankruptcy, unlike a receiver, represents the creditors in another way beyond administering the estate: the trustee holds the debtor's proprietary interest in the assets on behalf of the unsecured creditors. As Iacobucci J. stated in Re Giffen, 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91 at para. 41 (referring to the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal decision in Paccar Financial Services Ltd. v. Sinco Trucking Ltd. (Trustee of), 1989 CanLII 287 (SK CA), [1989] 3 W.W.R. 481 at 490):

> [T]he trustee, after bankruptcy, acts as the representative of the unsecured creditors of the bankrupt and asserts "the claim of the unsecured creditors to the goods and possessions of the bankrupt pursuant to the priorities established for competing perfected and unperfected security interests."

[32] Consequently, a trustee occupies a priority position for the purpose of distribution of the proceeds of the debtor's estate. In that sense, a trustee in bankruptcy is in competition with other creditors for its priority position among creditors, and its rights in the collateral are in competition with the rights of other creditors in the collateral. In contrast, a receiver is not in competition with creditors and has no priority position itself because any rights it has in the collateral are administrative but not proprietary. It is merely an administrator who pays out the proceeds to the creditors, both secured and unsecured, if there are sufficient funds, in the order of their priority.

[33] In Re Giffen, Iacobucci J. discussed the purpose and effect of s. 20 of the British Columbia Personal Property Security Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 359 – which is the counterpart of s. 20 of the PPSA but with slightly different wording. He explained that the reason why the PPSA provides that a trustee in bankruptcy defeats an unperfected security interest is because, before bankruptcy, an unsecured creditor can take steps to obtain and enforce a judgment against the debtor through execution proceedings that will rank ahead of an unperfected security interest under s. 20(1)(a)(i). However, once bankruptcy occurs, "all claims are frozen and the unsecured creditors must look to the trustee in bankruptcy to assert their claims." Re Giffen, supra at para. 39. As Anthony Duggan and Jacob Ziegel explain when discussing Re Giffen in their article, "Justice Iacobucci and the Canadian Law of Deemed Trusts and Chattel Security" (2007), 57 U.T.L.J. 227 at 231: "If the debtor becomes bankrupt while the execution process is still in train, the execution creditor loses this priority by virtue of the stay provisions in the BIA, ss. 69.3 and 70."

[34] In Re Giffen, supra at para. 39, Iacobucci J. adopted the following statement by Professor Cuming in his article entitled "Canadian Bankruptcy Law: A Secured Creditor's Heaven" (1994), 24 Can. Bus. L.J. 17 at 27-28:

> In effect, the judgment enforcement rights of unsecured creditors are merged in the bankruptcy proceedings and the trustee is now the representative of creditors who can no > longer bring their claims to a "perfected" status under provincial law. As the repository of enforcement rights, the trustee has status under s. 20(b)(i) of the B.C. PPSA to attack the unperfected security interest.

And at para. 41, Iacobucci J. agreed with the conclusion of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal at p.490 of Paccar that: "It is simply a contest as between an unsecured creditor and the holder of an unperfected security interest."

[35] In their discussion of Re Giffen, Professors Duggan and Ziegel, supra at 231-34, explain how bankruptcy law works with the PPSA to preserve creditors' relative priority entitlements post-bankruptcy. The authors comment that Iacobucci J.'s decision in Re Giffen confirms "the complementary relationship between the federal bankruptcy statute and the provincial PPSAs": s*upra* at 249.

[36] It follows from Re Giffen that a receiver is not intended to be included as a "person who represents the creditors of the debtor" for the purpose and therefore within the meaning of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) of the PPSA. The reasons for this conclusion are: (a) unlike in a bankruptcy, a receiver, including a court-appointed interim receiver, does not stand in for unsecured creditors in a priority contest with any other creditor; (b) a receiver is not the "repository of enforcement rights" of unsecured creditors with any status to "attack the unperfected security interest" (Re Giffen, supra, at para. 39); and (c) in a receivership, unlike in a bankruptcy, there is no statutory stay causing execution creditors to lose their priority and ability to realize on their debt.

(iv) Personal Property Security Acts of other provinces

[37] The conclusion that a receiver is not a person who represents the creditors of the debtor under s. 20 is also consistent with the correlative sections of the Personal Property Security Acts of the other common law provinces.[31] The comparable provisions in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland do not include a receiver.[32] Only the relevant sections of the Manitoba and Ontario Acts formerly referred to a receiver, but both have since been amended to remove this reference.

[38] The Manitoba statute contained a provision with language identical to the previous version of the Ontario section, R.S.O. 1980, c. 375, which read:

> 22(1) [A]n unperfected security interest is subordinate to > (a) the interest of a person
> (iii) who represents the creditors of the debtor as assignee for the benefit of creditors, trustee in bankruptcy or receiver...
> 22(2) The rights of a person under sub-clause 1(a)(iii) in respect of the collateral are referable to the date from which his status has effect and arise without regard to the personal knowledge of the representative if any represented creditor was, on the relevant date, without knowledge of the unperfected security interest.

Manitoba's replacement provision does not use the term "includes", but instead lists only two representatives of creditors, neither of which is a receiver.[33]

[39] The Manitoba courts considered the effect of the former wording of s. 22 in the context of a court-appointed receivership in the case of RoyNat Inc. v. Ja-Sha Trucking & Leasing Ltd. (Receiver of), reflex, [1991] 6 W.W.R. 764 (Q.B.), aff'd reflex, (1992), 94 D.L.R. (4th) 611 (C.A.). The court had appointed a receiver of the debtor trucking company at the request of a secured creditor, Roynat. Another secured creditor, Paccar, had a prior purchase-money security interest in some of the trucks, but had inadvertently failed to renew its PPSA registration and was unperfected on the date of the appointment of the receiver. Paccar sought an extension of time to re-perfect its security under s. 65 of the Manitoba PPSA, which provided that when an extension is granted "the rights of other persons accrued up to the time of the registration of the order made under this section are not affected by the order." The receiver opposed Paccar's motion. It took the position that on its appointment as a receiver, by operation of ss. 22(1)(a)(iii) and 22(2), it had accrued the rights referred to in s. 65.

[40] In the Court of Queen's Bench, Scollin J. rejected the position of the receiver. He explained that even though a receiver was referred to in s. 22, the rights and interests of a receiver are not the same as those of a trustee in bankruptcy. He concluded at 768 that:

> [T]he provisions of s. 22 can be sensibly reconciled with the provisions of s. 65 by recognizing that the only rights of the creditor which should be subordinated to the interest and rights of the receiver are those which necessarily conflict with the due exercise of the rights of the receiver as representative of the creditors in executing the mandate of the court. The status of a receiver does not bring with it a cornucopia of rights.... Beyond his mandate, the receiver has no status. Unless his rights or interests are affected, no issue of subordination even arises. In this case he has demonstrated no > diminution of his rights or interest and no prejudice to any creditor. To recognize the substantive security interest of Paccar causes no injustice or prejudice to the receiver or to other creditors and permits full recognition of and harmony between ss. 22 and 65 of the Act. Absent prejudice, the receiver's rights or interest do not extend to defeating an application which, but for his appointment, would be effective to relieve against an inadvertent lapse.

[41] The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. Twaddle J.A. acknowledged that Scollin J. may have been correct in his view, distinguishing a trustee in bankruptcy from a receiver, that while a trustee in bankruptcy does acquire a priority property right on appointment, a receiver does not. However, he said he was not required to decide the issue because he could dismiss the appeal based on his interpretation that s. 22 did not defeat the remedial effect of s. 65. He stated at p. 615:

> An order made under s. 65 re-perfects the security interest as though it had never lapsed, subject only to the rights of those who have dealt with the debtor in the meantime and who would be prejudiced by permitting the order under s. 65 to have retroactive effect.

[42] In my view, Scollin J.'s analysis of the rights of a receiver was correct and consistent with the conclusion reached on the appeal. Furthermore, his understanding was given full effect when s. 22 was repealed and replaced in Manitoba in 1993 with the new provision that excludes a receiver from its ambit. As mentioned above, the equivalent statutory provisions of the other common law provinces do not make reference to a receiver.

(v) The effect of a court-ordered stay

[43] Other case law has also considered the issue of re-perfecting a security interest following the appointment of a receiver or of a monitor under s. 11.7 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36. This case law arises because when a receiver (or monitor) is appointed, unlike in a bankruptcy, the debtor does not lose all rights and interest in the collateral and the rights of creditors are not statutorily frozen. Although an order appointing a receiver will normally stay all proceedings against the interests of the debtor, the court can always lift the stay to allow a creditor to take certain steps to enforce its rights or perfect its security against the debtor, subject to considering competing rights acquired by other creditors in the interim.

[44] Subsection 30(6) of the Ontario PPSA provides:

> Where a security interest that is perfected by registration becomes unperfected and is again perfected by registration, the security interest shall be deemed to have been continuously perfected from the time of first perfection except that if a person acquired rights in all or part of the collateral during the period when the security interest was unperfected, the registration shall not be effective as against the person who acquired the rights during such period.

Using s. 30(6), a secured creditor with a security interest that is originally perfected by registration but becomes unperfected, can re-perfect by registration and regain its priority standing as against all other creditors except as against someone who "acquired rights in all or part of the collateral" while the creditor's security interest was unperfected.

[45] As was decided in Roynat, supra, on appointment, a receiver does not acquire any rights in the collateral that are in competition with the rights of any creditor. In other words, a receiver does not obtain the right to receive any portion of the proceeds of the estate of the debtor. Consequently, a secured creditor whose security interest had been perfected at some point but was unperfected on the date of the appointment of a receiver may re-perfect under s. 30(6) and retain its priority, regardless of the appointment of a receiver in the interim, by obtaining a lift-stay order from the court, if necessary.

[46] For example, in Re TRG Service Inc. 2006 CanLII 37967 (ON SC), (2006), 26 C.B.R. (5th) 203 at paras. 53-59 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), C. Campbell J. held that a monitor under the CCAA is not a representative of creditors within s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. He stated that "[t]he fact that the Initial Order envisaged the Monitor assessing claims as between creditors does not grant it any legal entitlement to or over the assets of the debtor": Re TRG Service Inc., supra at para. 57. C. Campbell J. allowed the appeal from the decision of the monitor who had refused to allow a secured creditor to perfect its security after the CCAA order. He concluded that there was nothing in the CCAA that would permit the exercise of any jurisdiction to disallow registration and that s. 20(1)(b) did not apply for the reasons quoted.

[47] Similarly, in Brookside Capital Partners Inc. v. RSM Richter Inc. 2006 ABQB 572 (CanLII), (2007), 25 C.B.R. (5th) 273 (Alta. Q.B.), Richter was first a monitor of the debtor, Kodiak, under the CCAA and subsequently, receiver-manager of Kodiak appointed by the court to carry out a sale of its assets. Brookside was a secured creditor of Kodiak whose registration under the Alberta PPSA was defective. Consequently, both before and on the date of the appointment of the receiver, Brookside's security interest was unperfected.

[48] Brookside registered a financing change statement on the day the receiver was appointed and sought leave of the court to lift the court-ordered stay and validate that registration nunc pro tunc. Richter, as Kodiak's receiver, took the position that Brookside's security interest was ineffective against it. As in this case, the receiver argued that its role was similar to a trustee in bankruptcy and it should therefore have the same tools as those provided to trustees in bankruptcy by the PPSA

[49] The first issue before the Brookside court was "whether a receiver should be seen as entitled to the same priority as is granted to a trustee in bankruptcy by s. 20(a)(i) of the PPSA": supra at para. 13. The second question was whether the stays under both appointment orders should be lifted to allow Brookside to validate its registration nunc pro tunc. The application judge made the important observation that the second issue would not arise if a receiver is the same as a trustee under s. 20(a)(i) because, in that event, Brookside's unperfected security interest would be ineffective against the receiver and "Brookside's attempted correction of its registration after the date of the Receivership Order could not improve its position": supra at para. 14. [Emphasis added.]

[50] The application judge concluded on the first question that because s. 20(a)(i) of the Alberta PPSA refers only to a trustee in bankruptcy, it cannot be interpreted to also refer to a receiver.[34] He then went on to decide the second question. He concluded that there would be no prejudice to the debtor or any of the other creditors by allowing Brookside to perfect its security as of the date of the receivership, because had the CCAA and receivership orders not been made, Brookside could have perfected at any time. Since s. 20(a)(i) did not apply, there was no reason why the secured creditor could not register under the PPSA. Nor was there any purpose in precluding the ex post facto registration.

[51] As these cases demonstrate, in a receivership, because a creditor's right to take steps against the debtor is stayed not by any legislative directive, but rather by virtue of the terms of the order appointing the receiver, such a stay can be lifted by the court to allow a secured or unsecured creditor to pursue its rights against the interests of the debtor in appropriate circumstances, including obtaining judgment or asserting a lien, and to effect relevant registrations. This includes registrations under s. 30(6) of the PPSA to regain priority for the purpose of distribution of the debtor's assets by the receiver.

[52] In fact, the new Standard Template Receivership Order of the Commercial List – which is to be used when a receiver is appointed by the Superior Court of Justice – clearly excepts registrations under the PPSA from the effect of the stay. Paragraph 9, which contains the stay order, specifically provides that nothing in that paragraph prevents "the filing of any registrations to preserve or perfect a security interest". This paragraph clearly describes the understanding of the bench and bar that the "music" does not stop on the appointment of a receiver because the ongoing need to register and to perfect security is recognized and acknowledged. There would be no cause or purpose in doing so if priorities were frozen on the date of the order.

[53] There is nothing in the PPSA that says that it stops being applicable at any time. In particular, s. 20 does not prevent ss. 48(3) or 30(6) from continuing to apply and to have effect. It does not freeze priority positions but just states the consequences of non-perfection at a point in time. There is no legislated freezing of priorities, or anything that "stops the music" in a receivership, other than the court order creating it which provides for the ability to seek and obtain a lift-stay order. Consequently, the result the appellant seeks to achieve – the freezing of priority positions – does not occur in a receivership. Nor are the unsecured creditors left in a position where they are necessarily precluded from taking further steps to enforce their rights against the interest of the debtor. Therefore, when a receiver is appointed, the unsecured creditors do not need s. 20(1)(b) to level the playing field for them as against unperfected security interests. A receiver is not a "repository of enforcement rights" like a trustee in bankruptcy; nor do unsecured creditors need to rely on a receiver to attack unperfected security interests

[54] In a bankruptcy, not only does the debtor have no further interest in the collateral, but also the priority rights of creditors are "frozen", as stated by Iacobucci J. in Re Giffen, supra at para. 39 by virtue of s. 71 and s. 69.3(1) of the BIA,[35] the latter of which provides:

> Subject to subsections (2) and (3) and sections 69.4 and 69.5, on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor has any remedy against the debtor or the debtor's property, or may commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy, until the trustee has been discharged.

[55] Consequently, in a bankruptcy, the effect of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) together with the BIA is that a security interest in collateral that is unperfected on the date of bankruptcy is ineffective against the trustee throughout the bankruptcy, and that unperfected status cannot be cured in relation to the trustee. Similarly, a security interest that is perfected on the date of bankruptcy is effective against the trustee and remains effective because the bankrupt estate is frozen and the debtor no longer has any interest in the collateral for the purposes of registration.

(vi) Trustee's alternative argument

[56] The trustee in bankruptcy argued on this appeal that even if the receiver is "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" under s. 20(1)(b), because the appellant bank's security interest was unperfected on the date when the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed, its security interest was ineffective against the trustee under the express words of s. 20(1)(b). The appellant's position was that once priorities were frozen on the appointment of the interim receiver, they remained frozen on the appointment of the trustee. My colleague has concluded that the interim receivership never terminated, that the tax refund came to the interim receiver, and that the sections operate from and relate back to the original date when PWC was first appointed as interim receiver, at which time the appellant's security interest was perfected.

[57] In respect of the trustee's position, I agree that the appellant's security interest is ineffective against the trustee. As I have explained, ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) should not be read to apply to a receiver for two reasons. Unlike a trustee in bankruptcy and an assignee for the benefit of creditors, a receiver does not obtain the debtor's rights in respect of the collateral and is therefore not in a priority contest with any creditor on behalf of unsecured creditors. Also, in a receivership, the debtor maintains its rights in the collateral. Second, unlike in a bankruptcy, creditors' rights are not frozen on a receivership by statute. Those rights may be stayed by the court order appointing the receiver, but as in the order in this case, the stay can be and often is lifted in order to allow a creditor to register to maintain its perfected status — for example, under s. 48(3) — or to re-perfect under s. 30(6). As already noted, the new standard form of order for a court-appointed receiver no longer includes any stay of a creditor's right to perfect or re-perfect its security interest. The only purpose for a creditor to perfect or re-perfect after a receiver is appointed is to maintain its priority during the receivership.

[58] The motion judge found, in accordance with the record and the position of the trustee, that the tax refund came into the hands of PWC as trustee in bankruptcy. The interim receiver assigned the debtor into bankruptcy in accordance with the order appointing it, at which time the provisions of the BIA applied, including s. 71. It was not disputed, either before the motion judge (see para. 59 of his reasons) or on this appeal, that the property of the debtor passed to the trustee on the date of the bankruptcy. Section 20(1)(b) of the PPSA says that an unperfected security interest is ineffective against a trustee in bankruptcy. The court is required to give effect to that specific statutory provision.

Conclusion

[59] I agree with the motion judge that a receiver is not a representative of creditors within the meaning of ss. 20(1)(b) and 20(2)(b) of the PPSA and the term "receiver" should not be read in to the legislation. Because the appellant's security interest became unperfected as a result of the operation of s. 48(3), and because it did not re-perfect its security interest before the assignment of the debtor into bankruptcy, it was unperfected on the date of the appointment of the trustee and its security interest is therefore ineffective against the trustee.

[60] The unfortunate result for the appellant, and apparent windfall for St. Paul, is that the appellant loses its priority over St. Paul, and even though St. Paul also lost its secured standing, they rank pari passu as unsecured creditors in the bankruptcy. This result flows from the fact that both were unperfected on the date of the appointment of the trustee and both their security interests are therefore ineffective against the trustee.

[61] I would dismiss the appeal with costs to the trustee and to St. Paul out of the estate. I would fix those costs in the amount of $15,000 each, inclusive of disbursements and G.S.T.

[1] Section 1(1) of the PPSA defines "collateral" as "personal property that is subject to a security interest".

[2] Under s. 11(1) of the PPSA, a security interest is not enforceable against a third party unless the requirements of the PPSA for "attachment" are met. Attachment occurs when: (1) the creditor takes possession of the collateral or enters into a written security agreement with the debtor; (2) the agreement is signed by the debtor; and (3) the agreement contains a description of the collateral enabling it to be identified. In addition, "value" or consideration for the agreement must be given by the creditor and the debtor must have "rights" in the collateral.

[3] A security interest in investment property may now be perfected by control of the collateral under subsection 1 (2). Securities Transfer Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 8, s. 123(9).

[4] There are a number of exceptions to the general priority rules contained in s. 30 with which we are not concerned. One exception is a Purchase Money Security Interest (PMSI) in inventory.

[5] Unless otherwise indicated, where the term "receiver" is used in these reasons, it is used to refer to an interim receiver appointed by the court under s. 47 of the BIA.

[6] The motion judge held that the refund was a receivable that was not capable of being possessed. This aspect of the motion judge's decision is not under appeal. I make no comment as to the correctness of the motion judge's conclusion.

[7] Section 48(3) reads:

> (3) Where a security interest is perfected by registration and the secured party learns that the name of the debtor has changed, the security interest in the collateral becomes unperfected thirty days after the secured party learns of the change of name and the new name of the debtor unless the secured party registers a financing change statement or takes possession of the collateral within such thirty days.

[8] A financing change statement cannot be used to reperfect a lapsed security interest. A fresh financing statement is required. See s. 52(2) of the PPSA.

[9] The relevant provisions of s. 20 provide:

> 20 (1) Except as provided in subsection (3), until perfected, a security interest,
> (b) in collateral is not effective against a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy;
> ...
> (2) The rights of a person,
> ...
> (b) under clause 1(b) in respect of the collateral are to be determined as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect.

[10] Section 30(6) reads:

> Where a security interest that is perfected by registration becomes unperfected and is again perfected by registration, the security interest shall be deemed to have been continuously perfected from the time of first perfection except that if a person acquired rights in all or part of the collateral during the period when the security interest was unperfected, the registration shall not be effective as against the person who acquired the rights during such period.

[12] The most common formulation is: "A security interest... in collateral is not effective against (i) a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of bankruptcy, or (ii) a liquidator appointed under the Winding-up Act (Canada) if the security interest is unperfected at the date that the winding-up order is made..." as found, for example in Manitoba's Personal Property Security Act, C.C.S.M. c. P. 35, s. 20(b).

[13] Subsection (3) deals with purchase-money security interests, and its exception is not relevant here.

[14] McLaren goes on to comment that the 1992 amendments to the BIA brought with them regulation of receivers where a debtor is insolvent. He observes that federal bankruptcy legislation has increased the control and accountability of these privately-appointed receivers. He raises the possibility that in light of these statutory changes, privately-appointed receivers will also be held to be representatives of the creditors within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b) of the Act. Ziegel and Denomme, supra, query at p. 163 whether Ontario law would recognize a category of creditors' representatives who do not owe their status to statutory authority. In this case, we are not concerned with a privately-appointed receiver but a court-appointed interim receiver who derived his status from the BIA.

[15] If in fact PWC is acting as a representative of the Bank alone, it seems it would have been under a duty to apply to the court to lift the stay to permit it to register a financing change statement on behalf of the Bank.

[17] Section 30(1) reads:

> 30. (1) If no other provision of this Act is applicable, the following priority rules apply to security interests in the same collateral:
> 1. Where priority is to be determined between security interests perfected by registration, priority shall be determined by the order of registration regardless of the order of perfection.
> 2. Where priority is to be determined between a security interest perfected by registration and a security interest perfected otherwise than by registration,
> > i. the security interest perfected by registration has priority over the other security interest if the registration occurred before the perfection of the other security interest, and

ii. the security interest perfected otherwise than by registration has priority over the other security interest, if the security interest perfected otherwise than by registration was perfected before the registration of a financing statement related to the other security interest.

3. Where priority is to be determined between security interests perfected otherwise than by registration, priority shall be determined by the order of perfection.

4. Where priority is to be determined between unperfected security interests, priority shall be determined by the order of attachment.

[18] Iacobucci J. also considered the meaning of the phrase "rights in goods" in s. 12(2) of B.C.'s PPSA dealing with leased goods. He concluded that a lessee had a proprietary interest in such goods (at para 36):

> I note that s. 12(2) of the PPSA also recognizes that a lessee obtains a proprietary interest in leased goods. Section 12(2) states explicitly that 'a debtor has rights in goods leased to the debtor...when he obtains possession of them in accordance with the lease. [Emphasis in original.]

[19] For ease of reference, ss. 20(1)(c) and (d) read:

> 20 (1) ...until perfected, a security interest,
> (c) in chattel paper, documents of title, instruments or goods is not effective against a transferee thereof who takes under a transaction that does not secure payment or performance of an obligation and who gives value and receives delivery thereof without knowledge of the security interest;
> (d) in intangibles other than accounts is not effective against a transferee thereof who takes under a transaction that does not secure payment or performance of an obligation and who gives value without knowledge of the security interest.

[20] Section 30(6) reads:

> (6) Where a security interest that is perfected by registration becomes unperfected and is again perfected by registration, the security interest shall be deemed to have been continuously perfected from the time of first perfection except that if a person acquired rights in all or part of the collateral during the period when the security interest was unperfected, the registration shall not be effective as against the person who acquired the rights during such period.

[21] The importance of control is emphasized in Ontario's new Securities Transfer Act, 2006 (STA), S.O. 2006, c.8 which came into force on January 1, 2007 together with related PPSA amendments. In addition to registration and perfection, a new, third, method of perfecting a security interest is by control of the security which can include an intangible interest. John Cameron, in his article on the STA, 22 B.F.L.R. 309-352 at 321, states," As the Comment notes, obtaining 'control' means a secured party has taken whatever steps are necessary to place itself in a position where it can have the securities sold, without further action by the owner." The secured party need not have exclusive control over the security. Other secured parties can have a concurrent right and a debtor can retain rights in the security.

[22] I acknowledge that in some cases, a secured creditor's failure to comply with s. 48(3) during a s. 47 BIA receivership could result in a loss of that party's priority depending on the nature of the court order appointing the interim receiver. The role of the s. 47 BIA receiver is very much defined by the terms of the court order appointing the receiver and the common law describing its role. As Farley J. noted in Curragh, supra, at para. 6, the regime providing for the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver is a flexible one and the court is empowered to give directions to the interim receiver that can meet the practical demands of any given case. If then, for example, the court did not order a stay of all actions on the appointment of a s. 47 BIA receiver, then this would affect the extent to which the particular s. 47 BIA receiver qualifies as "a person who represents the creditors of the debtor" within the meaning of s. 20(1)(b). Also, if for some reason the s. 47 receivership ended before there was any priority conflict, then the failure to reregister could well have consequences following the debtor's emergence from receivership. In other words, the significance of a failure to reregister will depend on a number of relevant factors in each case.

[23] Other powers included the following: to take control of the property to preserve, protect, and liquidate it; to manage and carry on the business; to purchase or lease machinery; to receive and collect all money "now owed or hereafter owing" to the debtor; to execute transfers, conveyances, leases, bills of sale, or other documents respecting the property in the name and on behalf of the debtor; to report to, meet with and discuss with secured and unsecured creditors of the debtor deemed appropriate including offers and expressions of interest received; to apply for any vesting orders in order to convey the property; to register a copy of the Order appointing it and "any other Orders obtained by the Interim Receiver in respect of the Property against title to any or all property comprised in the Property" and; to sell, convey, or mortgage the property out of the ordinary course of business and without compliance with Part V of the PPSA (Ontario), or providing any other notice which a creditor or other party may be required to issue in order to dispose of the collateral of a debtor, with the approval of the Court.

[24] I am under the impression that, as here, the same person often acts as a s. 47 BIA receiver and trustee in bankruptcy. Based on my interpretation of their roles, namely, that a s. 47 receiver owes a fiduciary duty to the creditors of the debtor and its function is similar to that of a trustee in bankruptcy, a trustee in bankruptcy is not a third party vis-à-vis the s. 47 receiver who also represents those same creditors. Thus, I see no conflict in the same person fulfilling both roles. To hold otherwise and to open the door to a potential for conflict between the role of the s. 47 receiver and a trustee in bankruptcy would result in the same person ordinarily not being able to fulfill both roles with attendant increased expense, duplication of effort, and delay.

[25] A proceeding is any step that must be taken before a creditor or the creditor's representative can enforce its rights and may include the delivery of a copy of a certificate: Re Woodward's Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 236 at para. 26 (B.C.S.C.).

[26] McLaren, supra, at p. 172, in discussing s. 20(1)(b) and Giffen, writes that "the wording of the B.C. Act on debtor security interests is very different from Ontario's s. 20(1)(b).

[28] Subsection 26(2) of the PPSA provides that a "security interest in collateral in the possession of a person, other than the debtor, the debtor's agent or a bailee mentioned in subsection (1), is perfected by, (a) issuance of a document of title in the name of the secured party; (b) possession on behalf of the secured party; or (c) registration." No appeal was taken from this finding.

[29] Whether a particular representative of creditors, other than a receiver, may be included in s. 20(1)(b) need not be decided in this case.

[30] Although a court-appointed receiver owes duties to the court and to the creditors in respect of the proper conduct of the receivership (see for example Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Usarco Ltd. 2001 CanLII 24004 (ON CA), (2001), 196 D.L.R. (4th) 448 at paras. 28-30 (Ont. C.A.)), it is interesting to compare ss. 47(3) and 47.1(3) of the BIA. Under the first subsection, an interim receiver can only be appointed if it is necessary to protect the debtor's estate or the interests of the creditor who sought the appointment, while under the second subsection, the receiver can only be appointed if it is necessary to protect the debtor's estate or the interests of one or more creditors or the creditors generally. The difference may impact on the particular receiver's duties as a representative of creditors.

[31] In Quebec there is a different regime. See Lefebvre (Trustee of); Tremblay (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 63 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 326 at paras. 19-40, where the Supreme Court of Canada discusses the regime in Quebec.

[32] See Personal Property Security Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 359, s. 20(b); Personal Property Security Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. P-7, s. 20(a); Personal Property Security Act, S.S. 1993, c. P-6.2, s. 20(2)(b); Personal Property Security Act, C.C.S.M. c. P35, s. 20(b); Personal Property Security Act, S.N.S. 1995-96, c. 13, s. 21(2); Personal Property Security Act, S.N.B. 1993, c. P-7.1, s. 20(2); Personal Property Security Act, R.S.P.E.I. 1988, c. P-3.1, s. 20(2); Personal Property Security Act, S.N.L. 1998, c. P-7.1, s. 21(1).

[33] The equivalent provision of Manitoba's statute now reads:

> 20. A security interest
> ...
> (b) in collateral is not effective against
> (i) a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of bankruptcy, or
> (ii) a liquidator appointed under the Winding-up Act (Canada) if the security interest is unperfected at the date that the winding-up order is made.

Personal Property Security Act, C.C.S.M. c. P.35.

[34] The judge is referring only to ss. 20(a)(i), not 20(a)(ii), which also lists a liquidator under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. W-11.

[35] Section 71 of the BIA is set out above at para. 24. Section 69.4 of the BIA allows the court to declare that sections that freeze rights do not apply to a particular creditor if that creditor is likely to be materially prejudiced by the continued operation of the sections or it is otherwise equitable to make such a declaration. It is unlikely that this section could be used to assist an unperfected secured creditor because such a person is always going to be prejudiced by the operation of s. 20(1)(b) of the PPSA. As this court has held in Re Ma 2001 CanLII 24076 (ON CA), (2001), 143 O.A.C. 52 at paras. 2 and 3, 'The role [of the courts under s. 69.4] is one of ensuring that sound reasons, consistent with the scheme of the [BIA] exist for relieving against the otherwise automatic stay.... [L]ifting the automatic stay is far from a routine matter.' [Citations omitted.] In most instances, a lift stay is ordered under s. 69.4 where (a) the proceeding in respect of which the lift is requested is one in relation to which the debtor's liability would not be released by an order of discharge from bankruptcy, or (b) where the bankrupt "is a necessary party for the completed adjudication" of the relevant proceeding: see Re Koval 2003 CanLII 20584 (ON SC), (2003), 48 C.B.R. (4th) 103 at para. 6 (Ont. Sup. Ct.).

[1] April 3, 1994. FARLEY J.: – Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. was appointed as the interim receiver ("IR") of the defendant's Faro mine pursuant to s. 47 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended in 1992 ("BIA") by my order of October 15, 1993. What the IR proposed was that for the purpose of facilitating a sale of the Faro mine, the IR would advertise for any claims against that asset and that if a claim were not made by a certain date (originally proposed to be April 22, 1994) then the IR wanted an order from this Court barring any claims against those assets or the IR (but not against the defendant). The draft order went on to provide for this Court requesting the aid and assistance of any court in Canada, the United States of America or elsewhere to the extent necessary to give effect to the terms of this order. The IR's position was that this Court had the inherent jurisdiction to issue such an order notwithstanding the location of the Faro mine in the Yukon. The position of the lien claimants (claiming pursuant to the Miners Lien Act, R.S.Y.T. 1968, c. 116 ("MLA") was that this Court should not attempt to deal with any in rem matter affecting Yukon assets.

[2] On January 12, 1994, I granted leave pursuant to para. 14 of my October 15, 1993 order to any MLA claimants to pursue their claims in the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory (including priority aspects vis-à-vis the Bank of Nova Scotia security), provided they not enforce any judgment by sale of the property except by further leave from this Court. Thus it would appear to me that this Court operating as the bankruptcy court under the insolvency legislation of the BIA retains overall jurisdiction in this matter. That is appropriate in my view given that the defendant's head office is in Toronto but with operations literally at the very opposites of Canada (Nova Scotia, British Columbia and the Yukon Territory).

[3] I do pause to note that the BIA involves and affects secured creditors to a degree that was not present under the pre-1992 legislation. Under the previous legislation, the practical result was that secured creditors were not affected – as witness the lead-in provisions such as "subject to the rights of secured creditors…". However, under the revised legislation a debtor company is able to initiate action leading to a proposal and thereby bind, at least for the time being, secured creditors. Perhaps more to the point is the requirement of s. 244 requiring any secured creditor who wishes to enforce his security on the debtor company's general undertaking to give notice and refrain from taking that enforcement action for 10 days. However s. 47 allows for the appointment of an interim receiver in such s. 244 circumstances. Section 47 provides:

> 47(1) Where the court is satisfied that a notice is about to be sent or has been sent under subsection 244(1), the court may, subject to subsection (3), appoint a trustee as interim receiver of all or any part of the debtor's property that is subject to the security to which the notice relates, for such term as the court may determine.
> (2) The court may direct an interim receiver appointed under subsection (1) to do any or all of the following:
> (a) take possession of all or part of the debtor's property mentioned in the appointment;
> (b) exercise such control over that property, and over the debtor's business, as the court considers advisable; and
> (c) take such other action as the court considers advisable.
> (3) An appointment of an interim receiver may be made under subsection (1) only if it is shown to the court to be necessary for the protection of
> (a) the debtor's estate; or

[4] The provisions of s. 47 should be contrasted with the provisions of s. 46:

> 46(1) The court may, if it is shown to be necessary for the protection of the estate of a debtor, at any time after the filing of a petition for a receiving order and before a receiving order is made, appoint a licensed trustee as interim receiver of the property of the debtor or of any part thereof and direct him to take immediate possession thereof on such undertaking being given by the petitioner as the court may impose with respect to interference with the debtor's legal rights and with respect to damages in the event of the petition being dismissed.
> (2) The interim receiver appointed under subsection (1) may, under the direction of the court, take conservatory measures and summarily dispose of property that is perishable or likely to depreciate rapidly in value and exercise such control over the business of the debtor as the court deems advisable, but the interim receiver shall not unduly interfere with the debtor in the carrying on of his business except as may be necessary for the conservatory purposes or to comply with the order of the court.

[5] Certainly under these circumstances, the interim receivership has survived for a much longer period of time than the 10 days. It would seem that in many practical aspects in these circumstances that the IR is functioning as a quasi-receiver and manager/trustee in bankruptcy. It would not be generally said that interim receivers have "sale powers" – beyond of course the aspect of disposing of perishable goods or those items with a predilection to depreciation in value. These aspects are referred to in s. 46(2); it would not seem reasonable to assume that a s. 47(1) interim receiver had less authority in this regard. Although we may observe that one is not dealing with fruit which is subject to rot, one is dealing with mining properties which involve certain potential environment frailties and the possibility of safety risks if not attended to. It is perhaps unfortunate that certain of those directly involved in the protection of the public (i.e. the governmental organizations) have not taken a more aggressive and positive role in funding the activities of the IR since it is only the IR which stands in between the band-aid environmental solution and the abandonment of the property with ensuing environmental risks. Indeed the environmental legislation regime appears to have frozen the situation with the likelihood that the IR will "continue" until the Faro mine is in fact sold. It appears that the object of the process at the present time is to maintain the property on a shoestring (which has thus far worked) while marketing it with a view towards its sale. With a sale the new owner would then take charge of the property, with the general requirement to maintain it in good condition for environmental purposes and exploiting it in due course when it is determined that conditions are favourable.

[6] The 1992 amendments to the BIA significantly affected this legislation, especially in respect of affecting the rights of secured creditors and more extensively dealing with the aspect of insolvency (as contrasted with bankruptcy). Pre-amendment cases must be analyzed with care, especially those of some antiquity. For example, Westlake v. Martin (1930), 11 C.B.R. 469 (Ont. C.A.) dealt with an interim receiver. However as Fisher J.A. pointed out at p. 477:

> But the defendant having been appointed receiver and subsequently custodian and trustee his duties as such are clearly defined by the Act. Under sec. 5(2) of The Bankruptcy Act [9 C.B.R. 37],
> "an interim receiver may, under the direction of the court, summarily dispose of any perishable goods and carry on the business of the debtor for all conservatory purposes."
> Under sec. 34(2) [9 C.B.R. 99] a custodian has the same powers as a receiver, and by subsec. (3) he "shall remain in possession until a trustee is appointed by the creditors"; and after his appointment as trustee he is governed by the powers given to him by sec. 43 [9 C.B.R. 112].
> The appointment of a receiver does not effect a transfer of the debtor's property; he has no estate vested in him, the object of his appointment being simply for protection of the estate: see In re Berry; Duffield v. Williams, [1896] 1

Digitized by Google

> Ch. 939, at p. 944, 65 L.J. Ch. 245, and unless it is for protection or preservation of the property, a receiver has no right to sell property of the debtor: see In re Wells and Croft (1895), 72 L.T. 359, 2 Manson 41.

He had previously observed at p. 474 that the court order appointing the interim receiver was not expansive:

> The order appointing the defendant as receiver contains, apart from the usual undertaking as to damages, authority to "take possession of the property" to "summarily dispose of any perishable goods" "to control the receipts and disbursements of the business of the debtor" and "to not unduly interfere with the carrying on of the business of the debtor in the ordinary way."

Certainly in that case the interim receiver went beyond the authority granted under the then legislation and the appointment order since at p. 476 Fisher J.A. recited that the interim receiver "[c]arried on the business generally" and did not limit himself to perishable goods. This should be contrasted with the rather flexible regime under a s. 47(1) BIA appointment of an interim receiver; the court may allow the interim receiver to exercise control over the business in question – but as well pursuant to s. 47(2)(c) it would be possible for the interim receiver to apply to the court for directions. Certainly it would appear that these directions should be tailored to meet the practical demands of the situation which are being encountered in any given case.

[7] The IR relies upon s. 47(2) and s. 188 of the BIA with respect to the requested order. It submits that the sale aspect is a natural development or extension of the process in these circumstances – and that a sale would be enhanced if potential bidders were alerted to the number, nature and extent of claims against the property and with a confidence that these would be the sole claims, all others having been barred. I am of the view that this would be an obvious practical benefit in the circumstances. Section 47(2) has been set out above; s. 188 provides:

> 188(1) An order made by the court under this Act shall be enforced in the courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy elsewhere in Canada in the same manner in all respects as if the order had been made by the court hereby required to enforce it.
> (2) All courts and the officers of all courts shall severally act in aid of and be auxiliary to each other in all matters of bankruptcy, and an order of one court seeking aid, with a request to another court, shall be deemed sufficient to enable the latter court to exercise, in regard to the matters directed by the order, such jurisdiction as either the court that made the request or the court to which the request is made could exercise in regard to similar matters within its jurisdiction.

[8] I think it also helpful to recall that the bankruptcy court is the court of superior jurisdiction in the various provinces and territories: see s. 183(1). Thereby the BIA confers on a pre-existing court a jurisdiction in bankruptcy and insolvency and judges of these courts have jurisdiction therein and the power to deal with such matters: see Re Dominion Shipbuilding & Repair Co. (1926), 7 C.B.R. 349 (Ont. S.C.); Holley v. Gifford Smith Ltd. (1986), 59 C.B.R. (N.S.) 17, 54 O.R. (2d) 225, 26 D.L.R. (4th) 230, 14 O.A.C. 65 (C.A.).

[9] Houlden and Morawetz, The Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act 1993 (Toronto, Carswell) at pp. 354-355 state:

> It is sometimes a difficult matter to decide whether or not the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction. In deciding the issue, there are two aspects which have to be considered. First, the person against whom the proceeding is brought. If the action is taken against the person who is not a creditor but is a stranger to the bankruptcy, the bankruptcy court may not have jurisdiction. Second, the nature of the remedy that is sought. If the action seeks a remedy that is given by [the] Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, such as an action to declare a transaction, a settlement or preference, the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction. But if the remedy is not given by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or by comparable provincial legislation, the bankruptcy court ordinarily does not have jurisdiction: see Case Comment Re M.B. Greer & Co. (1953), 33 C.B.R. 69 (Ont. S.C.) at pp. 74-75; Mancini v. Falconi (1987), 65 C.B.R. (N.S.) 246 (Ont. S.C.) and Annotation at p. 247, and Bankruptcy Rule 89.

[10] In the 1994 edition of the foregoing book, Houlden and Morawetz further examine this having broken down the topic into various categories. The following excerpts at pp. 365-367 are illustrative; while the cases referred to deal with trustees and bankruptcy situations, there will be some relevance to interim receivers in s. 244 situations:

> Generally speaking, the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction over matters relating to the administration of the bankrupt estate. The bankrupt and the creditors, being parties to that administration, are subject to that jurisdiction. Furthermore, there are transactions, such [as] fraudulent preferences, settlements, and invalid personal property securities, which by provincial or federal legislation are also subject to the jurisdiction of the court, even though they involve third parties. But the mere fact that a trustee in bankruptcy has a claim against a stranger to the bankruptcy does not ipso facto give the Bankruptcy Court jurisdiction to hear the matters: Ellis v. Silber (1872), 8 Ch. App. 83, 42 L.J. Ch. 666, 28 L.T. 156, 21 W.R. 346 (L.C.). In some cases the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction, and in other cases it does not.

(2) Proceedings to Determine Whether or not a Person is a Creditor or the Rights and Obligations of a Creditor

If proceedings are taken to determine whether a person is a creditor of the bankrupt estate or the rights and obligations of a creditor, the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction ...

[p. 365]

(5) Proceedings Against Strangers to the Bankruptcy

Although it is said that the trustee has no right to bring a stranger into the Bankruptcy Court and to compel him to submit his rights for determination by that court (see, for example, Re Reynolds (1928), 10 C.B.R. 127, 62 O.L.R. 271, [1928] 2 D.L.R. 520 (S.C.), affirmed (1928), 10 C.B.R. 127 at 131, 62 O.L.R. 360, [1928] 3 D.L.R. 562 (C.A.)), this statement is too wide.

In determining jurisdiction where strangers to the bankruptcy are involved, it is submitted that the court has to assume that the trustee will be successful in his application. The question then is, will the unsuccessful claimant be a creditor of the bankrupt estate as a result of losing the application? If the answer is yes, then the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction. If the answer is no, then the Bankruptcy Court does not have jurisdiction ...

(9) Concurrent Jurisdiction of Bankruptcy Courts and Ordinary Civil Courts

The jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court is not exclusive. Even though a remedy can be claimed in the Bankruptcy Court, the same remedy can also be claimed in the ordinary civil courts: Stillwater Lumber & Shingle Co. v. Canada Lumber & Timber Co. reflex, (1923), 3 C.B.R. 807, [1923] 1 W.W.R. 1333, 32 B.C.R. 81, [1923] 2 D.L.R. 900 (C.A.). Re Westam Development Ltd. (1967), 10 C.B.R. C.A. refused 1991 CanLII 1765 (BC CA), (1991), 3 C.B.R. (3d) 318, 48 C.P.C. (2d) 300.

[11] What do we have here regarding the lien claimants under the MLA? That legislation (incorporating the definitions of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. Y-4) involves liens which attach to mining interests. Sections 2 and 3 provide:

2(1) Any person who performs any work or service in respect of or places or furnishes any material to be used in the mining or working of any placer or quartz mine or mining claim shall, by virtue thereof, have a lien for the price of such work, service or material upon the minerals or ore produced from and the estate or interest of the owner in the mine or mining claim in or in respect of which such work or service is performed or material furnished, limited however in amount to the sum justly due to the person entitled to the lien.

(2) The lien shall attach upon the estate or interest of the owner and of all persons having any interest in the mine or mining claim and all appurtenances thereto, the minerals or ores produced therefrom, the land occupied thereby or enjoyed therewith and the chattels, equipment and machinery in, upon or used in connection with such mine, mining claim or land.

(3) Upon registration, the lien shall attach and take effect as against persons purchasing and mortgagees and other encumbrancers registering their mortgages or encumbrances subsequent to the commencement of performance of work or service or furnishing of material in respect of which the lien is claimed.

3. Any lien registered under this Act shall, as to one-half of the output from the mine or mining claim in respect of which the lien is claimed, take priority over all mortgages and encumbrances registered subsequent to November 16, 1957.

This legislation and its concept of the lien affecting the output of the mine or mining claim is apparently unique to the Yukon Territory. It was felt appropriate to have the courts of the Territory deal with the interpretation and entitlement of those provisions. Certainly their approach is the preferable one when looked at from the aspect of one court according due deference to another with a "closer" connection to the situation and this course alleviates the necessity of having to deal with the MLA through opinions on foreign law. It would appear to me on a cursory review that the nature of the lien is an in rem claim against real property interests in the Territory: see W.J.C. Kaufmann Co. v. Berberi (1982), 36 O.R. (2d) 774 (Div. Ct.) at p. 780:

Enforcement of the lien is therefore by an action in rem against the land or money standing in place of the land (see Pankka v. Butchart et al., [1956] O.R. 837, 4 D.L.R. (2d) 345 (C.A.)).

It would therefore seem to me that I should not do anything which would interfere with the determination of the rights which persons claiming under the MLA would have against the Faro mine (i.e. its output).

[12] However, does that mean that what we will have is a fork in the road with the problem being not that one has to chose between the two branches but rather that participants in this matter must in effect straddle to keep a foot on both paths. I think not for this would be to give everyone the worst of all possible solutions.

[13] Clearly a solution which allows for the determination of the exact nature and amount of the claim against the Faro mine will be of assistance in marketing that asset. A prospective purchaser will know what he is facing when making an offer for the mine. It would therefore be of significant assistance if this determination could be made rather soon as to clarify the situation before offers are requested.

[14] I do not see that an order providing for advertising for claims – including those under the MLA – would infringe upon the jurisdiction of any other court nor the rights of any potential claimant. It was proposed that a letter go out to any person shown in the books of the defendant as a potential claimant as well as advertising in several newspapers having circulation in material areas. The point in contention would appear to be whether this Court has jurisdiction to order that a claim that has not in effect been registered with this Court by a certain date (by filing a proof of claim with the IR who would then report to this Court) could be barred.

[15] Certainly the non-bankruptcy courts of this country have exercised their inherent jurisdiction to bar claims against specified assets and receivers: see Ultracare Management Inc. v. Gammon, Order of Austin J. dated October 19, 1993; Liquidators of Wallace Smith Trust Co. v. Dundalk Investment Corp., Order of Blair J. dated September 22, 1993. As Macdonald J. said in Re Westar Mining Ltd., 1992 CanLII 1863 (BC SC), [1992] 6 W.W.R. 331 (B.C. S.C.) at p. 337:

> I have concluded that "justice dictates" they should, and that the circumstances call for the exercise of this court's inherent jurisdiction > to achieve that end: see Winnipeg Supply& Fuel Co. v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp., reflex, [1972] 1 W.W.R. 651, 23 D.L.R. (3d) 160 (Man. C.A.), at p. 657 [W.W.R.].
> The circumstances in which this court will exercise its inherent jurisdiction are not the subject of an exhaustive list. The power is defined by Halsbury's (4th ed., vol. 37, para. 14) as:
> "... the reserve or fund of powers, a residual source of powers, which the court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just or equitable to do so ..."
> Proceedings under the C.C.A.A. are a prime example of the kind of situations where the court must draw upon such powers to "flesh out" the bare bones of an inadequate and incomplete statutory provision in order to give effect to its objects.

In commenting on this decision and discussing the stay provisions of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA") and the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, Tysoe J. observed in Re Woodward's Ltd., [1993] B.C.J. No. 42 at p. 11 [17 C.B.R. (3d) 236, at pp. 247-248]:

> Hence, it is my view that the inherent jurisdiction of the Court can be invoked for the purpose of imposing stays of proceedings against third parties. However, it is a power that should be used cautiously. In Westar Macdonald J. relied upon the Court's inherent jurisdiction to create a charge against Westar's assets because he was of the view that Westar would have no chance of completing a successful reorganization if he did not create the charge. I do not think that it is a prerequisite to the Court exercising its inherent jurisdiction that the insolvent company will not be able to complete a reorganization unless the inherent jurisdiction is exercised. But I do think that the exercise of the inherent jurisdiction must be shown to be important to the reorganization process.
> In deciding whether to exercise its inherent jurisdiction the Court should weigh the interests of the insolvent company against the interests of the parties who will be affected by the exercise of the inherent jurisdiction. If, in relative terms, the prejudice to the affected party is greater than the benefit that will be achieved by the insolvent company, the Court should decline to exercise its inherent jurisdiction. The threshold of prejudice will be much lower than the threshold required to persuade the Court that it should not exercise its discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA to grant or continue a stay that is prejudicial to a creditor of the insolvent company (or other party affected by the stay).

[16] While the BIA is generally a very fleshed out piece of legislation when one compares it to the CCAA, it should be observed that s. 47(2)(c): "The court may direct an interim receiver... to... (c) take such other action as the court considers advisable" is not in itself a detailed code. It would appear to me that Parliament did not take away any inherent jurisdiction from the Court but in fact provided, with these general words, that the Court could enlist the services of an interim receiver to do not only what "justice dictates" but also what "practicality demands." It should be recognized that where one is dealing with an insolvency situation one is not dealing with matters which are neatly organized and operating under predictable discipline. Rather the condition of insolvency usually carries its own internal seeds of chaos, unpredictability and instability. I think it should be emphasized again what I was discussing earlier in my reasons: that an asset of the nature of the Faro mine is not one which can be easily mothballed and insulated from nature affecting its present condition. Rather, it must be constantly attended to so as to avoid adverse environmental deterioration which will not only be very costly to clean up but will create a health and safety hazard. The danger cannot be ignored. (I do not mean to imply that this asset is unusual or out of the ordinary for other mines in similar circumstances.) Abandonment of the property would likely carry heavy political consequences given the ultimate responsibility of the various levels of government for environmental and other concerns. A shoestring (budget) will support a great weight – but only momentarily. Given the conditions prevailing and these circumstances, it would appear to me that the best practical solution would be that a new owner take over care and custody of this asset through purchase.

[17] Ought I to do anything to assist in this regard? As was stated in Tezcan v. Tezcan 1987 CanLII 157 (BC CA), (1987), 46 D.L.R. (4th) 176 (B.C. C.A.) at p. 179:

> The general rule is that the courts of a country have no jurisdiction to adjudicate on the right and title to lands not situate within its borders. Only the courts of the jurisdiction in which lands are situate, may adjudicate on the rights and title to such lands: Duke v. Andler, 1932 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1932] S.C.R. 734. The rule is not confined to the formalities of transfer of title, but extends to all disputes touching the land, including debt, trust, or tort: see Deschamps v. Miller, [1908] 1 Ch. 856; Purdom v. A.E. Pavey & Co. 1896 CanLII 17 (SCC), (1896), 26 S.C.R. 412; British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Mocambique, [1893] A.C. 602 (H.L.).

See also J.G. Castel, Canadian Conflict of Law, 2nd ed. (1986; Butterworths, Toronto) at pp. 405-406.

[18] However I do not see that these principles answer all the question. It must be recognized that Yukon law and the Yukon courts will determine the amount of the MLA claims and their priority; however this must interface with the general aspect of the defendant's insolvency. It strikes me that we might well analogize to the overall problem of multi-jurisdiction bankruptcies which I discussed in my paper "Potpourri of Current Topics" given at the 1993 Insolvency Institute of Canada Conference. I said at pp. 29-30:

> There are three possible approaches to insolvency where assets and creditors are located in more than one country (see: Warren and Westbrook, The Law of Debtors and Creditors (1986), p. 721):
> > (1) The universalist approach whereby the courts of one country have exclusive jurisdiction over the insolvency of a particular debtor, and all the creditors have to bring their claims before that original bankruptcy court. Such a solution could only be achieved by means of a multinational treaty.
> > (2) The strict territorial approach, whereby each country distributes the assets located within its jurisdiction according to its own law, and does not recognize any foreign representative of creditors.
> > (3) A mixed or compromise approach, whereby the courts of each country exercise insolvency jurisdiction over the assets present in that country, but recognize the interests of foreign representatives of creditors and seek to co-operate with foreign courts.
> For an interesting discussion of choice of law issues vis-à-vis the traditional approach (territoriality, unity and universality) and proposals for new approaches see: Jay L. Westbrook, "Conflict of Laws Issues In International Insolvencies", The Twenty-Third Annual Workshop on Commercial and Consumer Law: Conference on International and Comparative Commercial Insolvency Law, (June 24-26, 1993), University of Toronto, Faculty of Law, p. 718.

I am of the view that the mixed or compromise approach is the reasonable one to adopt in these circumstances. It seems to me that this can be achieved by having the Yukon court adjudicate the MLA claims but providing that this Court as the one involved in the insolvency proceedings grant an order that any MLA claims for which proofs of claim not filed with the IR for adjudication in the Yukon Court (assuming no excess problem) by a specific date will be barred. In this regard, I would request the aid of the Yukon Court in its bankruptcy capacity (see s. 188 BIA) to assist in the implementation of this to the extent necessary. 19 I have indicated that there should be a specific period of time to allow for the advertising and submission of claims. Given that several weeks have elapsed since this motion was heard, it would seem to me that the originally proposed time frame is likely too tight. I would request the counsel for the IR and MLA claimants see me at a convenient 9:30 this coming week to resolve the timing question.

Order accordingly.

Authority and Purpose

2. This Directive is issued pursuant to paragraph 5(4)(c) of the Act.

3. The purpose of this Directive is to set out the framework of a program that will permit a debtor who has insufficient funds to cover the cost of an administration of a bankruptcy to have access to the bankruptcy system. This Directive sets out the procedure and criteria for eligibility.

Procedure

4. Debtors initially contacting the OSB for advice relative to their financial affairs will be provided with a list of trustees participating in the BAP.

5. If unable to obtain the services of a trustee after consulting at least two (2) trustees, or the sole trustee in the area where there is only one trustee, the debtor may again contact the OSB if the debtor considers that bankruptcy remains a potential solution. At such time, a registration form detailing the debtor's name, address and telephone number and the name(s) of trustee(s) previously contacted will be prepared.

6. On a rotational basis, the designated Bankruptcy Analyst will deliver the registration form to a participating trustee, who becomes the designated trustee to administer the assignment.

7. The debtor will contact the trustee designated by the designated Bankruptcy

Autorité et objet

2. La présente instruction est émise en vertu de l'alinéa 5(4)c) de la Loi.

3. La présente instruction a pour objet de présenter le cadre du programme qui permet aux débiteurs n'ayant pas les fonds suffisants pour couvrir les frais d'administration d'une faillite d'avoir accès au système de faillite. Elle énonce les modalités et les critères d'admissibilité à ce programme.

Modalités

4. Un débiteur demandant initialement conseil au BSF parce qu'il ne peut faire face à ses obligations se verra remettre une liste de syndics qui se sont engagés à rencontrer les exigences du PAF.

5. Si le débiteur est dans l'impossibilité d'obtenir les services requis après avoir consulté deux (2) syndics, ou le syndic lorsqu'il y en a un seul dans le secteur, le débiteur pourra recommuniquer avec le BSF s'il estime que la faillite demeure une solution envisageable. Un formulaire renfermant le nom, l'adresse, le numéro de téléphone du débiteur et le nom des syndics contactés sera alors préparé.

6. Sur une base rotative, l'analyste des faillites désigné transmettra le formulaire d'enregistrement à un syndic participant qui deviendra de fait le syndic désigné pour administrer la cession.

7. Le débiteur communiquera avec le syndic désigné par l'analyste des faillites désigné afin

Analyst in order to fully discuss the alternatives to bankruptcy and the consequences of declaring bankruptcy or making a proposal.

8. Provided that the debtor is eligible for the BAP pursuant to sections 14 and 15 below, and decides to declare bankruptcy, the designated trustee will prepare the necessary documentation for the filing of the assignment.

9. If the assignment is not filed within thirty (30) days of the debtor's assessment, the trustee is obliged to report this fact to the designated Bankruptcy Analyst. In remote geographical areas, a slightly longer period of time may be acceptable, subject to the approval of the designated Bankruptcy Analyst.

10. Trustees must be available for service throughout the entire year and agree to ensure that files accepted under the BAP will receive the same level of service as similar files accepted outside of the program.

11. The application for a bankrupt's discharge is not to be delayed due to the lack of full payment of a trustee's fee. Trustees, however, are entitled to payment in full of their out-of-pocket expenses.

12. In cases where third-party deposits or guarantees are taken by the trustee, such arrangements must be made in accordance with Directive No. 16, Third-Party Deposits and Guarantees de discuter pleinement des solutions de rechange à la faillite et des conséquences de la faillite ou du dépôt d'une proposition.

8. Si le débiteur est admissible au PAF aux termes des paragraphes 14 et 15 ci-après et s'il décide de faire faillite, le syndic désigné devra préparer la documentation nécessaire en vue de déposer la cession

9. Si la cession n'est pas déposée dans les trente (30) jours suivant l'évaluation du débiteur, le syndic devra en faire rapport à l'analyste des faillites désigné. Dans les régions éloignées, une période de temps plus longue pourrait être acceptable, sous réserve de l'approbation de l'analyste des faillites désigné.

10. Les syndics doivent pouvoir offrir le service tout au long de l'année et doivent s'assurer que tous les dossiers acceptés en vertu du PAF seront traités de la même manière que les autres dossiers similaires acceptés par les syndics hors du programme.

11. La demande de libération du failli ne doit pas être retardée parce que les honoraires du syndic n'ont pas été entièrement versés. Toutefois, les syndics ont droit au paiement intégral de leurs débours personnels.

12. Dans les cas où des dépôts ou garanties de tierces personnes sont acceptés par le syndic, il faut que l'instruction n° 16, Dépôts et garanties de tierces personnes, soit respectée.

13. If the debtor does not meet with the trustee at the trustee's office or does not proceed with an assignment after the assessment, the designated trustee will return the registration form indicating the reasons for the non-assignment to the OSB.

Eligible Debtors

14. Following attempts to secure the services of a trustee, insolvent individuals wishing to make an assignment in bankruptcy and who contact the OSB may be accepted into the BAP, except individuals:

(a) who are incarcerated;

(b) who were previously or are currently involved in commercial activities where the administration of the bankruptcy could give rise to an appreciable amount of administrative or investigative work for the trustee; or

(c) who are required to make surplus income payments in accordance with the Directive No. 11R2, Surplus Income.

15. Where a debtor's income increases after being accepted into the BAP, the debtor will be required to make payments on the surplus income where required pursuant to the Directive No. 11R2, Surplus Income.

13. Si le débiteur ne se présente pas au bureau du syndic ou s'il décide de ne pas faire cession de ses biens suite à l'évaluation, le syndic désigné retournera le formulaire d'enregistrement en donnant les raisons du désistement au BSF.

Débiteurs admissibles

14. Après avoir essayé d'obtenir les services d'un syndic, toute personne insolvable qui désire faire une cession et qui communique avec le BSF pourra être admissible au PAF, sauf les personnes :

a) qui sont incarcérées;

b) qui participaient ou participent à des activités commerciales dans le cadre desquelles l'administration de la faillite pourrait entraîner un travail de gestion ou d'enquête important pour le syndic; ou

c) qui sont tenues de faire des paiements au titre du revenu excédentaire conformément à l'instruction n° 11R2, Revenu excédentaire.

15. Lorsqu'un débiteur voit ses revenus augmenter après son admission au PAF, le débiteur doit effectuer des paiements au titre du revenu excédentaire lorsqu'il est tenu de le faire en vertu de l'instruction n° 11R2, Revenu excédentaire.

Eligible Trustees

16. A participating trustee, once designated, must agree to accept and process assigned eligible debtors except in those situations where the trustee will be in a conflict of interest. For the purpose of this Directive, conflicts of interest shall be governed by the applicable provisions of the Act and the Rules.

17. All trustees requesting to participate in the BAP will be eligible to do so subject to the following provisions:

(a) they fully agree to adhere to all the requirements of the BAP;

(b) new trustees requesting to participate in the BAP will be added to the list of participating trustees every January 1 and July 1;

(c) any trustee withdrawing from the BAP, either voluntarily or involuntarily, will not be permitted to return to the program for a period of two (2) years from the withdrawal date. Subsequent readmittance into the program would be at the discretion of the designated Assistant Superintendent; and

Syndics admissibles

17. Tous les syndics demandant de participer au PAF seront admissibles, sous réserve des dispositions suivantes :

a) ils conviennent de se conformer à toutes les exigences du PAF;

b) les nouveaux syndics demandant de participer au PAF verront leur nom ajouté à la liste des participants le 1er janvier et le 1er juillet de chaque année;

c) tout syndic se retirant du PAF, de façon volontaire ou non, ne pourra être réadmis au programme avant l'expiration d'un délai de deux (2) ans. Sa réadmission à l'intérieur du programme sera laissée à la discrétion du surintendant adjoint désigné; et

(d) should any trustee withdraw from the program due to exceptional circumstances (e.g. sickness), the designated Assistant Superintendent would decide as to when the trustee would be admitted back into the BAP.

18. To prevent undue advantage to any participating trustee, periodic rearrangement of the trustee list will be made by the OSB.

19. Trustees participating in the program, subject to section 21 of this Directive, shall be resident trustees having a principal office unless bankruptcy service is otherwise unavailable in a particular area.

20. Only one name for each trustee office will be permitted in the listing. A non-resident trustee may be listed as a participating trustee in areas not served by a resident trustee.

21. Trustees not complying with the spirit or conditions of the BAP may see their name deleted from the list of participating trustees by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

Coming into Force

22. This Directive comes into force on September 18, 2009.

d) advenant que le syndic se retire du programme en raison de circonstances exceptionnelles (p. ex., maladie), il reviendra au surintendant adjoint désigné de déterminer quand celui-ci pourra être admis de nouveau au PAF.

18. Afin d'éviter un avantage indu en raison de l'ordre des syndics sur la liste, ladite liste sera réaménagée périodiquement par le BSF.

19. Les syndics participant au programme devront, sous réserve de l'article 21 de la présente instruction, être des syndics locaux possédant un bureau principal, à moins que les services d'un syndic ne puissent être retenus dans une région particulière.

20. Un seul nom de syndic par bureau sera inscrit sur la liste. Le nom d'un syndic possédant un bureau secondaire peut être inscrit sur la liste des syndics participants lorsque la région où est situé ce bureau n'est desservie par aucun autre syndic.

Collections Manual Updates

This chapter is currently under revision.

Overview

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) is designed for the rehabilitation of debtors. When a person or corporation is insolvent, protection from the creditors is sought under this Act. The BIA is administered by Industry Canada.

Legislation

This section identifies legislation related to Bankruptcy:

- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act
- Excise Tax Act, sections: 165, 265, 295(5)(a), 296 and 317
- Income Tax Act, sections: 128, 224(1.2), 241(4)(a), 227(4)
- Provincial Executions and Exemptions Acts

Key Legislative Items:

- Providing Tax Information to Trustees
- Definition of Legal Representative
- Deemed Agent of a Bankrupt
- Clearance Certificate Not Required
- Summary Administration
- Ordinary Administration

Providing Tax Information to Trustees

Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) may disclose tax information to trustees in limited situations. The authority for such disclosure is found in the Income Tax Act (ITA), paragraph 241(4)(a) and (k) and the Excise Tax Act (ETA), paragraph 295(5) and subparagraph 295(5)(c)(ii). For further detail refer to Confidentiality.

Definition of Legal Representative

As a result of Bill C-28 which received Royal Assent on June 18, 1998 subsections 159(1), (2) and (3) changed references to "persons required to file a return" and to "responsible representatives". A "legal representative" was concurrently added to subsection 248(1) of the ITA. Subsection 248(1) of the ITA is amended to add a definition of "legal representative" of a taxpayer. This definition contemplates persons who are acting in a fiduciary or a representative capacity. Specifically, trustees in bankruptcy, assignees, liquidators, curators, receivers of any kind, trustees, heirs, administrators, executors or committees as well as any other like person are considered to be legal representatives, provided that they administer, wind up, control or otherwise deal in a representative or fiduciary capacity with the taxpayer's property or property held for the taxpayer's benefit. For further details, refer to the Directives, Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program – RCD 98-04 and Lien and Charge Registration - RCD 98-08.

Deemed Agent of a Bankrupt

The Excise Tax Act, paragraph 265(1)(a) and the Income Tax Act, paragraph 128(1)(a) deems the trustee to be an agent of the bankrupt.

Any actions performed by the trustee in the administration of the estate of the bankrupt or in carrying on the business affairs of the bankrupt is deemed to be performed by the trustee on behalf of the bankrupt.

Clearance Certificate Not Required

In a bankruptcy situation, the trustee does not require a Clearance Certificate prior to the distribution of property.

Summary Administration

If the bankrupt is not a corporation and the realisable assets of the bankrupt do not exceed $10,000 after deducting the claims of the secured creditors, the estate may be subject to a summary administration in order to reduce administration time and costs.

For additional details regarding right of secured creditors, refer to Directive ARD 03-09, The Relationship between Bankruptcy and Insolvency Events

Ordinary Administration

Where the official receiver determines that:

- the realizable assets of the bankrupt, after the claims of the secured creditors are deducted, exceed $5,000 or the amount prescribed, as the case may be, or
- the costs of realization of the assets of the bankrupt are a significant proportion of the realizable value of the assets, and
- the official receiver considers that such a direction is appropriate.

Methods of Declaring Bankruptcy

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act provides three different ways to go into bankruptcy.

- voluntary
- involuntary
- deemed

For additional details, refer to Directive ARD 03-09, The Relationship between Bankruptcy and Insolvency Events

Related Topics:

- Voluntary Assignment
- Involuntary Assignment
- Deemed Bankruptcy
- Effect of Bankruptcy

Voluntary Assignment

A voluntary assignment in bankruptcy can be made pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, section 49. It provides that insolvent persons make an assignment of all their assets for the general benefit of all creditors. The bankruptcy is subject to the provincial Executions and Exceptions Acts.

Digitized by Google

For additional details, refer to Directive, ARD 03-10, Determining the Date of Bankruptcy.

Involuntary Assignment

An involuntary assignment in bankruptcy is made pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, sections 43 to 45. Involuntary bankruptcy occurs when a creditor files a petition in a provincial court for a receiving order against the debtor's assets. An individual may be petitioned into bankruptcy when the following conditions exist:

- amount of debt owing the petitioning creditors exceeds $1,000.00
- debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy

For additional details, refer to Directive, ARD 03-10, Determining the Date of Bankruptcy.

Deemed Bankruptcy

A debtor is deemed bankrupt when a proposal pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, section 50 to 53, has failed. For further information refer to Proposals in Bankruptcy and Insolvency.

For additional details, refer to Directive, ARD 03-10, Determining the Date of Bankruptcy.

Effect of Bankruptcy

When a debtor becomes bankrupt, most debts and liabilities to which the bankrupt is subject are deemed to be claims provable in bankruptcy. When an assignment in bankruptcy is made or the debtor is petitioned into bankruptcy, no creditor, including CRA, with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall commence or continue any action, execution or take other proceedings to enforce payment of the debt, except when an enhanced Requirement to Pay has been issued under the Income Tax Act, section 224(1.2) or the Excise Tax Act, section 317(3).

Registration of Security

According to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, subsection 86(1), all provable Crown claims, rank as unsecured, unless the Crown has perfected the security. To obtain perfection, CRA must register the security in a public registry system of a province or a territory. The registration of security does not provide CRA with a priority over other secured claims.

This does not apply to deemed trust property.

To perfect the security by registration, refer to the procedures Registering a Security.

Exemptions From Registration

Exemptions from registration include the regular types of security instruments accepted by CRA, such as:

- bank letter of guarantee
- security deposit agreement

Trustees Liability

Amended subsection 159(1) provides that the legal representative of a taxpayer is jointly liable with the taxpayer to pay any amount payable by the taxpayer and to perform any duty or obligation imposed under the ITA. This clarifies that, for all purposes of the ITA (including assessments, objections and appeals as well as collection, administration and enforcement), the legal representative is considered to be the taxpayer's agent, for example, where the legal representative carries on the business of the taxpayer, the representative will be required to deduct, withhold and remit amounts that the taxpayer would have been required to deduct, withhold and remit. Further actions and proceedings under the ITA taken by the representative or taken by the Minister against the representative, will be binding on the taxpayer. For example, the issuance of a notice of assessment against a legal representative of the taxpayer (say a parent corporation that wound up its subsidiary and acquired its assets) will have the same effect as if it had been issued against the dissolved taxpayer, assuming it had been in existence at the time.

The liability of the legal representative to pay an amount extends to any amount payable by the taxpayer under the ITA at or before the time the legal representative is called upon for a payment. The liability of the legal representative acting in good faith is limited to the property in the possession or control of the legal representative which belonged to the taxpayer (i.e. was not subject to any security interests) when that person is called upon to make a payment on behalf of the taxpayer.

Where it is determined that the legal representative is liable for payment, raise a memo assessment under S. 159 as outlined in the Memorandum Assessments Chapter.

For further details, refer to the Directives, Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program - RCD 98-04 and Lien and Charge Registration - RCD 98-06.

Rights of a Bankrupt

The bankrupt has the right to earn a living. For this purpose, the bankrupt is allowed to engage in or continue a taxable commercial activity, outside of the estate, following a bankruptcy.

In the case of a Goods and Services Tax account, the trustee is responsible for the bankrupt's previous account number only.

Obligations of First-Time Consumer Bankruptcies

Special rules apply to individuals who have never before been bankrupt under the laws of Canada, including:

- automatic discharge of the bankrupt individual following expiration of a nine month period, unless a creditor, the trustee or the Superintendent of Bankruptcy opposes the discharge
- debt counselling provided to all first-time bankrupts, arranged by the trustee and paid by the estate of the bankrupt

Offences Under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) is designed for the rehabilitation of debtors. Any person or corporation who attempts to abuse the BIA is subject to severe penalties.

List of Offences

Actions that constitute an offence under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act include:

- failing to perform the obligations of the bankrupt, without reasonable cause
- fraudulently disposing of property before or after the bankruptcy
- refusing or neglecting to answer questions truthfully
- concealing, destroying, mutilating, falsifying, omitting, or disposing of a book or document relating to the affairs of the debtor

For further information on offences refer to the BIA, sections 198, 199, 200 and 201(3).

Types of Penalties

If convicted of an offence under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the debtor may be subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000.00 and/or imprisonment of up to one year.

Discharge of a Bankrupt

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act sets parameters for:

- discharging the bankrupt
- timely closing of files with respect to the estate trust account
- filing a certificate of compliance
- remitting undeclared dividends

Related Topics:

- First-Time Consumer Bankruptcies
- Repeat Consumer Bankruptcies
- Bankrupt Corporations
- Reasons A Bankrupt Remains Undischarged

First-Time Consumer Bankruptcies

All first-time bankrupt entities may obtain an automatic discharge if the following preconditions are met:

- nine months have elapsed after the date of bankruptcy
- the creditors, trustee or the Superintendent of Bankruptcy do not oppose the discharge
- the bankrupt received mandatory debt counselling

If the discharge is not opposed, the Court issues to the bankrupt a Certificate of Discharge and a copy is sent to the Superintendent.

If the discharge is opposed, the trustee applies to the Court to obtain an appointment for the hearing of the opposition.

The automatic discharge does not apply if the bankrupt does any one of the following:

- applies for a discharge before the nine month period

Digitized by Google

- refuses or neglects to receive counselling

Repeat Consumer Bankruptcies

For repeat consumer bankruptcies, the making of a receiving order against or of an assignment by a person operates as an application for discharge. After a minimum of three months and a maximum of 12 months from the date of bankruptcy, the trustee applies to the Court for an appointment for the hearing of the application for discharge. The notification of the hearing of the application for discharge is sent to all proven creditors. Any creditor may oppose the discharge.

In addition, under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) subsection 169(3), a bankrupt may apply for a discharge at any time, at his own expense.

Bankrupt Corporations

A bankrupt corporation may apply for a discharge only after the corporation has fully satisfied the claims of all creditors and pays 5% interest on all proven claims. The discharge of a corporation rarely occurs.

Reasons A Bankrupt Remains Undischarged

A bankrupt individual may remain undischarged for the following reasons:

- the delay for the bankrupt's automatic discharge under the BIA has not elapsed
- bankrupt is not entitled to an automatic discharge, the bankrupt did not apply to the court for a discharge
- the court refused to grant the bankrupt an absolute discharge, and the bankrupt made no further application for a discharge
- the court suspended the bankrupt discharge for a specified time, which has not elapsed yet
- the court granted an order of discharge subject to terms or conditions, which the bankrupt did not yet fully meet
- a creditor successfully opposes the bankrupt's application for an absolute discharge; and
- the bankrupt's trustee recommends that the application be adjourned sine die
- the bankrupt has not met the required obligations under the BIA

Discharge of Trustees

Where a trustee has completed the duties with respect to the administration of the property of a bankrupt, the trustee shall apply to the court for a discharge.

Subsection 41(1) of the BIA allows a trustee, who has completed the duties required in administering the bankrupt's estate, to apply to the court for a discharge; and, under

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

Digitized by Google

subsection 41(2), the court may discharge the trustee on such administration, or for sufficient cause before the estate has been fully administered.

An example of sufficient cause could be where the bankrupt has failed to:

- respect the conditions for the discharge; and
- provide the trustee with monthly income-and-expense statements and affidavits as to earnings

When such is the case, the debtor remains as an undischarged bankrupt. This status does not preclude a creditor from taking collection action.

- Requirements for Trustee's Discharge
- Effect of a Trustee's Discharge

Requirements for Trustee's Discharge

The trustee is required to:

1. Apply for the taxation of the trustee's account and for a discharge by sending to the Superintendent:
   - final statement of receipts and disbursements
   - dividend sheet
   - where inspectors were appointed by the creditors, a copy of the minutes of the meeting of inspectors at which the final statement of receipts and disbursements and dividend sheet were approved or refused
   - Notice of Application for Discharge of the trustee
2. Once the trustee's account is taxed, the trustee will, within 30 days after receiving the Superintendent's comments, send to each creditor:
   - a notice of taxation of the account
   - copy of the trustee's discharge
   - copy of final statement of receipt and disbursements
   - dividend sheet
   - the final dividend owed to the creditor

Under summary administration, the trustee's discharge is automatic if the Superintendent or a creditor does not object.

Effect of a Trustee's Discharge

Digitized by Google

By subsection 69.3(1) of the BIA, a creditor has to wait for the trustee's discharge before taking action against a bankrupt, with respect to recovering a claim provable in bankruptcy. CRA takes the position that it is not necessary to obtain the court's permission to take action against a bankrupt, once the trustee is discharged.

Even though the trustee is discharged, the bankrupt may not be and if not discharged the bankrupt is no longer protected from creditors. Case law holds that when a trustee is discharged but the bankrupt is not, the bankrupt should not be shielded from creditors when he or she has not complied with the duties imposed under the BIA. In this case, the duties would be the conditions imposed for obtaining the discharge from bankruptcy, and the courts have held that a bankrupt should be entitled to the stay-of-proceedings provisions under the BIA, only as long as that person demonstrates a willingness to perform those duties.

A stay-of-proceedings provision is critical to the orderly administration of the bankrupt's estate, as it ensures that a creditor's position will not be improved at the expense of other creditors. During the stay, the trustee plays an essential role in administering that estate. One of that official's task is to liquidate the bankrupt's property and distribute the funds from the liquidation. Another task is to try and persuade the bankrupt to comply with the duties imposed by the court. However, once the trustee is discharged, the stay no longer applies.

The courts have held that the bankrupt loses any rights to the stay, when the trustee has been discharged, and a creditor should be free to take any action against an undischarged bankrupt, without first obtaining the permission of the court.

Non-Refundable Credit in Year of Bankruptcy

Where an individual becomes bankrupt, subsection 128(2) of the ITA divides the calendar year in which the bankruptcy occurs into two taxation years: one that runs from January 1 to the day before the bankruptcy (pre-bankruptcy) and the other that begins on the day of the bankruptcy and runs to December 31 (post bankruptcy).

Section 118.95 of the ITA ensures that, where an individual becomes bankrupt in a calendar year, non-refundable tax credits in respect of each of the two periods in the calendar year will be calculated on a pro-rata basis.

This amendment is effective for 1995 and subsequent taxation years where the date of bankruptcy is after April 26, 1995. For detailed information about bankruptcy and the effects on the collection program, refer to the Bankruptcy & Insolvency Handbook dated March 1997. Refer to Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program - RCD 98-04 for further details.

Unpaid Suppliers' Rights

Unpaid suppliers have a statutory right to repossess goods, in the case of a bankruptcy of a purchaser. This right ranks above every other claim or right, except where a subsequent purchaser buys the goods for value in good faith, without having knowledge that the supplier had demanded repossession of the goods.

For further detail, refer to the directive, The Rights of Unpaid Suppliers in a Bankruptcy or an Insolvency, RCD 00-22.

- Conditions for Repossession

Conditions for Repossession

The supplier has 10 days to repossess the goods from the date at which all of the following conditions are met:

- supplier must present the tax debtor or the trustee with a written demand for repossession within 30 days after the delivery of the goods
- goods have to be in the possession of the purchaser or the trustee and not have been resold to a subsequent arm's-length purchaser
- goods have to be identifiable as those delivered by the supplier
- goods have to be in the same state as they were on delivery

Farmers, fishermen and aquaculturists are granted a first charge over the purchaser's entire inventory where the indebtedness to the supplier arose with respect to products delivered 15 days before the purchaser's bankruptcy or receivership.

For further detail, refer to the directive, The Rights of Suppliers in a Bankruptcy or an Insolvency, RCD 00-22.

GST Registrants Eligibility to Claim Input Tax Credits

Purchasers, who are GST registrants, are eligible under the Excise Tax Act (ETA) to claim an input tax credit (ITC) for the GST paid or payable on property and services acquired for use in their commercial activities. The purchaser is eligible to claim an ITC for the GST payable on the supply even if he/she has not actually paid the GST. The supplier, on the other hand, in his net tax calculation for a given reporting period, must include GST amounts that become collectible by him/her in that reporting period even if he/she does not actually collect the GST amounts from the purchaser in that reporting period. The supplier must remit to the Crown an amount of net tax equal to the formula A-B (A being the amount of GST collected or collectible on supplies in a given reporting period; and B being the amount of ITC to which the supplier is entitled).

Bankrupt Purchasers Eligibility to Claim Input Tax Credits

A bankrupt purchaser in his net tax calculations, can claim a deduction equal to 7/107ths when the amount, is recognized as a bad debt. This may result in a loss to the Crown as the GST on the supply is indirectly refunded twice and/or in some cases refunds or rebates are paid to the insolvent purchaser's estate in bankruptcy.

Example of Bankrupt Purchasers Eligibility to Claim Input Tax Credits

Digitized by Google

P buys taxable supplies from S on credit in the amount of $20,000 plus GST of $1,400 for a total of $21,400. S as required remits the GST to CRA P does not pay S and makes an assignment in bankruptcy.

S files a Proof of Claim for $21,400, but as an unsecured creditor, S is unable to recover his claim. He then writes-off the amount of $21,400 as a bad debt and, as Section 231 of the ETA entitles him to do, S. deducts 7/107th (for example: $1,400) of the amount written-off as a bad debt, when calculating his net tax payable.

The resulting effect: the $1,400, which S previously remitted to CRA, is credited to S, and no GST was paid with respect to the transaction between S and P.

Since P can claim an ITC as soon as the GST is payable (that is, as soon as the transaction is completed), he is entitled to claim the ITC of $1,400, even though he did not and will never pay the GST of $1,400 to S.

The resulting effect: if CRA were to refund the ITC to P, since we did not receive any of that amount, CRA would lose the amount twice (one to S and once to P).

For further detail, refer to the directive, Assessment of Insolvent purchasers under 296(1)(b) of the ETA, (96-12)

Situation When Duplicate Claim for ITC is Created

Duplicate claims are created when the supplier files a Proof of Claim for a purchaser's debt which includes a GST component for which the supplier has already accounted for and remitted to the Receiver General, and CRA files a Proof of Claim for the tax payable assessment against the same purchaser. The onus has been on CRA to prove that there is no duplication.

Objective of Orderly Payment of Debts

The Orderly Payment of Debts (OPD) provisions are found in Part X of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA). The objective of the OPD legislation is:

- to provide non-corporate debtors with a method to repay certain debts within a reasonable time frame in accordance with their ability to pay
- to protect, during this time frame, the non-corporate debtors from legal action by their creditors

Note: GSTC and CFB (CCTB) debts are to be included in OPD consolidations.

Impact of OPD on GST

To determine whether GST debts are excluded from the application of the OPD provisions refer to subsection 218(2). The provisions also impose monetary limits and restrictions as to the types of debts to which the OPD scheme applies.

GST Debts Exempt from the Application of OPD

GST debts incurred by a non-corporate debtor in the course of his/her business cannot be subject to an OPD order even if at the time the application is made for the OPD order, the individual is no longer carrying on the business which gave rise to the debts.

If a non-corporate trader or merchant incurs a GST debt during the ordinary course of business, that debt is exempt from the OPD provisions.

If a non-corporate debtor or trader is no longer carrying business which gave rise to the GST debt, that dept is exempt for the OPD provisions.

GST Debts that may Qualify for Application of OPD

If an individual is the recipient of a supply taxable, and it is for his or her personal use, that person incurs a GST liability. If the individual fails to pay that GST and the supplier does not account for it in its net tax calculation as and when required by the ETA, CRA can raise an assessment against the individual pursuant to paragraph 296(1)(b) of the ETA for the GST payable.

If such an assessment is raised against the individual, and the individual applies for an OPD order, the GST debt that is the subject of the assessment would not constitute a debt incurred by the individual in the ordinary course of his/her business and would therefore be a part of the OPD order.

When an assessment is raised against the recipient (other than a corporation) of a taxable supply pursuant to paragraph 296(1)(b) of the ETA, the collection officer should find out from Audit if, in fact, the taxable supply was incurred for personal rather than business use. As a result, the collection officer will be able to determine whether or not the GST debt falls within paragraph 218(2)(d) of the BIA. It should be noted that these assessments are not common.

If a non-corporate trader or merchant did not incur a GST debt during the ordinary course of business, that debt could qualify for the OPD provisions.

Example of OPD Order

P, is a proprietor in Manitoba and sells recreational vehicles. P buys a cabin cruiser (a taxable supply) from S in the amount of $20,000 plus GST of $1,400 for a total of $21,400. S does not account or remit the GST to CRA.

An audit is conducted on P's business. During the course of the audit it is determined that in addition to unremitted net tax, the purchase of the cabin cruiser was for personal use. Audit raises an assessment for GST owing in the amount of $6,500.00 (broken down as: $1,400.00 tax payable assessment for the purchase of the cabin cruiser [296(1)(b) ETA] and net tax arrears related to P's commercial activities for $5,100.00).

P experiences financial problems and applies for an OPD Consolidation Order. P's debts to CRA are as follows:

• personal income tax	$ 5,000.00
• GST outstanding	$ 6,500.00
• Source deductions	$ 3,500.00
Total due	$15,000.00

Digitized by Google

In the above example, the following amounts would be subject to the OPD Consolidation Order:

$5,000.00 [personal income tax debt (T1)]
$1,400.00 [GST tax payable assessment – the cabin cruise]
$6,400.00
and the following amounts excluded by virtue of paragraph 218(2)(d) of the BIA would not be subject to the OPD

$3,500 [source deductions debt]
$5,100.00 [GST net tax debt]
$8,600.00

Section 170 report

This is the report that a trustee must file when the bankrupt applies to be discharged from his or her bankruptcy. The information includes the causes of the person's bankruptcy, and the bankrupt's conduct during bankruptcy. You can use the information to determine whether to oppose the bankrupt's application for a discharge.

Surplus income

Starting in April 1998, a bankrupt must contribute surplus income to his or her estate. The trustee shall set out in a notice to creditors the established amount. After comparing the surplus amount with the information obtained from the T1 return, you may determine that the amount is not adequate. If it is not adequate you must notify the trustee and provide him or her with the reasons for your objection within 30 days of from the date of bankruptcy. The trustee will then advise the official receiver that the surplus payment amount is to be mediated.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD 00-04, Surplus Income: Financial Contribution from a bankrupt.

Change in income

At your request you will be informed of any change in the amount that the bankrupt is required to pay. The bankrupt must inform the trustee of any material change in his or her financial situation. On obtaining information regarding a change in a bankrupt's financial situation and surplus payments required, you may make representations to the trustee if you determine that the surplus amount is insufficient.

Exceptions that Supersede Deemed Trust Provision

The only exceptions that supersede the deemed trust provisions are a prescribed security interest (mortgages) and for the right of an unpaid supplier of goods to repossess those goods as provided under sections 81.1 and 81.2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. This legislation is retroactive to June 15, 1994.

If a situation arises that may benefit from invoking this new subsection or if you have further questions, please call Art Weston who can be reached at (613) 954-1513.

Similar amendments are made to the Canada Pension Plan and the Employment Insurance Act and a reference to new subsection 227(4.1) of the ITA is added to the deemed trust exception in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act at the same time as similar clarification are made to the priority status of equivalent provincial deemed trusts. For further details, refer to the Directives, Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program - RCD 98-04, Lien and Charge Registration - RCD 98-06 and The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act – ARD 01-02.

Management of Bankrupt Account

A bankrupt account is managed by the Tax Services Office of record. Accounts for bankrupt individuals are transferred to the sub-ledger from the T1System. This office is responsible for the following actions:

1. Filing the Proofs of Claim.
2. Investigating other possible actions pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.
3. Assuming all other actions such as:
   - attending the meeting of creditors
   - acting as inspector, etc.

Application of Proof of Claim

To receive funds from a bankruptcy proceeding or to vote at a meeting of creditors, a proof of claim must be filed.

Related Topics:

- When to Amend Proof of Claim

When to File Separate Proof of Claim

File a separate Proof of Claim for the following:

- deemed trust claim
- unsecured claim

A deemed trust claim includes amounts for:

- employee Canada Pension Plan (CPP) contributions
- employee Unemployment Insurance (UI) and Employment Insurance (EI) premiums
- federal tax
- provincial tax
- Goods and Services Tax (GST) if an enhanced Requirement to Pay was issued prior to the bankruptcy date

Digitized by Google

An unsecured claim includes amounts for:

- employer portion of the CPP contributions
- employer portion of the UI and EI premiums
- GST
- individual and corporate tax
- all penalties and interest

When Proof of Claim Not Filed

A Proof of Claim is not required to be filed if the following conditions are met:

- debt is below minor balance threshold
- all returns are filed up to the date of bankruptcy, and
- no outstanding audit exists

Note: A late filing penalty raised against a late return filed by a trustee is not a provable claim.

For further details, see Directive RCD 00-15, Proving a Claim Under the bankruptcy and Insolvency Act for a Late Filing Penalty.

When to Amend Proof of Claim

Amend CRA's Proof of Claim in the following situations:

- a payment other than dividends is received for prebankruptcy debt
- a change in the prebankruptcy debt occurs attributable to an additional assessment or reassessment

First Meeting of Creditors

The first meeting of creditors is held within 21 days of the trustee's appointment. For special circumstances, the Official Receiver may extend the meeting date by 10 days and up to 30 days. The extension is permitted as long as no creditors are prejudiced and the general administration of the estate is not compromised.

If CRA has not filed a proof of claim, a collection officer, as a representative of the Crown may attend the first meeting of creditors as an observer. An observer cannot vote on any resolution or participate in questioning the bankrupt entity. These limitations cause this type of attendance to be a fact finding mission alone.

For procedures to follow when attending the first meeting of creditors, refer to Deciding to Attend First Meeting of Creditors and Participating at First Meeting of Creditors.

Criteria to Consider for Inspector's Role

Consider the following criteria to determine the feasibility of taking on the role as an inspector on an account:

- size of the liability
- if there are substantial assets in the estate
- need to monitor the estate
- priority ranking of CRA's claim and the likelihood of receiving a satisfactory dividend
- how the effort of being an inspector will benefit CRA's claim

Inspector's Duties

The inspector's duties are carried out until the trustee is discharged. The duties of the inspector do not cease when an employee quits CRA or leaves Collections, unless they formally resign from the Board of Inspectors.

The inspector's duties include:

1. Disbursements.
2. Provide general supervision of the trustee's administration of the estate.
3. Authorize the trustee to perform certain acts such as selling assets.
4. Account for all assets.

Inspector's Expenses

When a collector is appointed as an inspector, any fees are turned over to CRA and any expense will be reimbursed.

Right of Offset in Bankruptcy

CRA offsets a debit balance by a refund or rebate in these circumstances:

- the debit and the credit both pertain to periods prior to the date of bankruptcy

Refunds or Rebates Owing to Debtors

Any refund, rebate or other amounts owing to the tax debtor in any prebankruptcy period are sent to the trustee provided that the following conditions are met:

- trustee has notified the Tax Services Office located in the debtor's locality
- all returns for prebankruptcy periods are filed
- no returns are being amended
- no crown debt exists

For additional details refer to the Directive, RCD 00-24, Treatment of Refunds in a Bankruptcy.

Refunds or Rebates Owing to Estates in Bankruptcy

Any refund, rebate or other amount owing to the estate of the bankrupt entity is sent to the trustee:

For Income Tax:

- in the case of a pre-bankruptcy refund, after the application of any crown set-off
- in the case of a post-bankruptcy refund, if the refund is part of the bankruptcy assets or pursuant to a written understanding between the trustee and the bankrupt

For Goods and Services Tax:

- once all required returns are filed
- if post-bankruptcy returns are not being amended

For additional details refer to the Directive, RCD 00-24, Treatment of Refunds in a Bankruptcy.

Treatment of Canada Child Tax Benefit in a Bankruptcy

Digitized by Google

A refund arising from CCTB is exempt property and does not form part of the bankrupt's estate. Consequently, a tax debtor would receive such a refund, regardless of whether that person is bankrupt or not.

The only time a bankrupt tax debtor would not receive a payment is when that tax debtor has a CCTB debt arising from the excess payment of CCTB. In these situations, the CCTB payment will be offset against the CCTB debt if the payment and the debt arise from the same bankruptcy period. All years prior to the year in which the tax debtor is bankrupt are pre-bankruptcy years for the purposes of CCTB.

Note: CCTB payments are never issued to trustees in bankruptcy.

For further detail refer to the Communication ARD-2005-004, Treatment of the Canada Child Tax Benefit in Bankruptcy.

Opposition to Discharge Cases

The Department of Justice will provide legal advice or opinions on collection matters and initiate or defend an action in Court on behalf of CRA.

Representation on behalf of CRA by individuals who are not members of the Bar, and who are not working for, or as an agent of, the Department of Justice, is not acceptable.

Collection Action on an Undischarged Individual Bankrupt

CRA may take any collection action against a bankrupt once the trustee is discharged without first having to obtain the court's permission.
The amount collected is not to be remitted to the bankrupt's estate.

CRA takes the position that based on the plain meaning of subsection 69.3(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, it may take any type of collection action, and if it incurs the financial risks associated with the action, it should be entitled to keep any funds recovered, and not have to share them with the other creditors of the estate.

For further detail, refer to the directives, Collection Action on an Undischarged Bankrupt, RCD 97-01, 99-03 and 00-01.

When to Collection Action Taken on a Corporate Bankrupt

CRA may take collection action on a corporate bankrupt, once the trustee is discharged, and further assets or income that could be liquidated to the benefit of creditors are located. Advise the trustee who, notwithstanding his discharge, remains the trustee of the estate for the performance of such duties as may be incidental to the full administration of the estate.

If the trustee refuses to liquidate the assets located, CRA may apply to the court to take proceedings pursuant to section 38 of the BIA.

On the application of any interested person, the court may also appoint a trustee to complete the administration of the estate.

To collect on a bankrupt, refer to the procedures Collecting from an Undischarged Bankrupt.

Statutory Set-Off

When garnishing an account receivable for a business entity, the Crown has a right of set-off pursuant to subsection 97(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The right of set-off is not affected by the stay of proceedings with respect to amounts owing up to the date of the bankruptcy. It would be improper to withdraw the statutory set-off in such circumstances. Therefore, a statutory set-off with respect to an account receivable from the federal government should not be withdrawn as the federal Crown has the right of set-off pursuant to subsection 97(3) of the BIA. The right of set-off is not affected by the stay of proceedings with respect to an amount owing up to the date of bankruptcy.).

Enhanced Requirements to Pay

Before the date of bankruptcy, enhanced Requirements to Pay may be issued to collect both a debt from Source Deductions and Goods and Services Tax. After the date of bankruptcy, enhanced Requirements to Pay may only be issued to collect a debt from Source Deductions.

The allocation for payments received from enhanced Requirements to Pay differs whether the payment was received prior to, or after the date of bankruptcy.

Related Topics:

Applying Amounts to Source Deductions Accounts

When payments are received prior to the date of bankruptcy, they are allocated in the same priority established in the system.

When payments are received after an account is bankrupt, they are applied in the following order:

1. penalties
2. interest

Digitized by Google

3. employer's portion of Canada Pension Plan (CPP) contribution

4. employer's portion of Unemployment Insurance (UI) and Employment Insurance (EI) contributions

5. provincial tax

6. employee's portion of the CPP contribution

7. employee's portion of the UI and EI contributions

8. federal tax

Applying Amounts to GST Accounts

Payments received from a Goods and Services Tax Enhanced Requirement to Pay are applied to the oldest debt covered by the Enhanced Requirement to Pay, starting with the penalties, the interest and the tax and repeating for the next oldest assessment.

Proposals Made After Bankruptcy

The approval of a proposal made after a bankruptcy annuls the bankruptcy and re-vests in the debtor all the right, title and interest of the trustee, unless otherwise stated in the proposal.

Proposals made after a bankruptcy may be extremely complicated due to the various combinations of claims that may exist and must be approved by the inspectors, if any.

For further information on proposals, refer to Proposals in Bankruptcy and Insolvency.

Impact on Directors' Liability

In order to raise an assessment and pursue the Directors for their joint and several liability, CRA must file a Proof of Claim within six months of the date of the assignment into bankruptcy.

Directors' Liability assessments pursuant to section 323 of the ETA cannot be raised on paragraph 296(1)(b) assessments, but may be raised if warranted against any net tax amounts due on the same Notice of Assessment.

Trustee's Reasonable Fees and Costs

A trustee may recover reasonable fees and costs in situations where CRA could benefit directly from the trustee's expertise in maximizing recovery of amounts due under Enhanced Requirement to Pay or deemed trusts. The circumstances under which CRA might allow a practitioner reasonable fees and costs, are those where the trustee would recover amounts that the Crown might not have otherwise been able to recover.

Note: For further detail, refer to the directive: Reasonable Fees and Costs (RCD 95-08).

Indicators of Reasonable Fees and Costs

Indicators of the reasonableness of fees and costs are:

- the amount of time spent on the file
- the amount realized, and the difficulties encountered in bringing about that result
- the importance and urgency of the matters with which the practitioner has had to deal
- the success with respect to those problems encountered in the administration
- the expenses incurred which were reasonably necessary to fulfil the duties

Indicators of Unreasonable Fees and Costs

Indicators of unreasonable fees and costs are:

- services not authorized by law
- decisions that are not prudent and that produce no positive results
- conduct contrary to instructions
- office expenses

Requirements of Trustees Invoice for Fees and Costs

The trustee will send an invoice to CRA as proof of services rendered. To justify payment, the trustee is required to itemize actions taken that would be commensurate with the amount deducted. This includes:

Digitized by Google

- a detailed description of the work done
- time spent actually doing the various items of work

  Note: Not simply hourly rate times the number of hours.
- a description of the degree of success vis-à-vis the problems encountered
- an accounting of the amount realized on behalf of the Crown
- a reasonable description of disbursements made

Offset of Refunds Pursuant to 296(4) of the ETA

CRA will not prove a claim for amounts assessed and will not participate in the distribution of dividends under the BIA for that amount.

CRA will assess, for the purposes of satisfying a debt for "tax payable" owed to the Crown by insolvent purchasers, and will continue to offset those amounts pursuant to subsection 296(4). Moreover, CRA will use the authority of subsection 97(3) (Law of set-off to apply) of the BIA to exercise its right of set-off against pre-bankruptcy credit refunds/rebates, even if the application for the credit refund/rebate, relating to a period prior to bankruptcy, is filed after the bankruptcy occurs. In this regard, CRA will use a statutory set-off notice to offset against credits, refunds/rebates payable to the insolvent purchaser by another Crown department for pre-bankruptcy debts.

Application of Credits on a Pre-Bankruptcy

When both the bankrupt and the trustee have been discharged, credits for this period can be applied to a debit for the same period or to an in-bankruptcy debit, whether that debit has been written off or is still owing. In this situation, the credit cannot be applied to a post-bankruptcy or subsequent debit.

When only the bankrupt has been discharged, credits for this period can be applied to a debit for the same period, whether that debit has been written off or is still owing. In this situation, the credit cannot be applied to a post-bankruptcy or subsequent debit.

In-Bankruptcy Overpayments

A refund arising from an in-bankruptcy return cannot be applied to a pre-bankruptcy debt; it can only be applied to a liability stemming from an in-bankruptcy return.

Completion of Proof of Claim - ELCS # 19673

The proof of claim form has been revised to accommodate recent amendments to the BIA. As a result of the amendments, CRA may request certain information from a trustee-in-bankruptcy about the affairs of the bankrupt, you should request the information (available for individuals only), as it could assist in opposing the discharge or getting the bankrupt to contribute more of his or her surplus income. For further detail, refer to the directive, Revised Proof of Claim for Bankruptcy (98-03).

The following provides further detail on completing the Proof of Claim - ELCS # 19673:

- Unsecured Claim

Digitized by Google

a) Select the first box, if you are proving an unsecured claim; that is, a claim for the debt of an individual ("T1"), a corporation ("T2"), GST, or a director who has been assessed pursuant to section 227.1 of the ITA or section 323 of the ETA, if CRA has not taken any security for any of those types of debts.

b) Select the second box, if you are proving a preferred claim by virtue of section 136 of the BIA; that is, you are claiming certain fees and costs, allowed under certain conditions, to be recovered from the estate in priority to certain claims. These fees are generally out-of-pocket expenses incurred in taking legal action against the taxpayer before the taxpayer becomes bankrupt.

- Secured Claim

  Select, if you are proving a secured claim; that is, if the Department holds a mortgage, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against the taxpayer's property as security for the tax debt.

  If a portion of the debt exceeds the amount of security held, you must prove an unsecured claim for that portion.

- Claim against director

  An amendment to the BIA permits a claim for directors' liability to be compromised, when the corporate debt has been compromised as a result of the filing of a proposal. Select this box, if you are proving such a claim.

  You may have to file such a claim for a GST debt. This should not apply for payroll deductions given that, under subsection 60(1.1) of the BIA, CRA is guaranteed full payment of that debt.

Amending Current Collections Actions

Once a bankruptcy is confirmed, the quicker the collection actions are amended, the greater the opportunity for recovery to CRA.

To amend current collection actions once a bankruptcy is confirmed:

1. Arrange to have the trustees send to the attention of Revenue Collections of the Tax Services office in the locality of the bankrupt the following:
   - all information and correspondence required under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), the Excise Tax Act (ETA) and the Income Tax Act (ITA)
   - copy of the Notice of Bankruptcy
2. Cancel all arrangements and legal actions regarding arrears.
3. Return post-dated cheques to the bankrupt.
4. Withdraw all Requirements to Pay under the ETA, subsections 317(1),(2) or (6) and the ITA, subsections 224(1) and (1.1).

   Do not withdraw enhanced Requirements to Pay. Pursue collection of the amounts garnished or in some cases, it may be preferable to allow the trustee to collect the accounts receivable and pay the funds to CRA.
5. Return all writs and orders issued to the applicable Federal Court or to Headquarters as policy dictates.
6. Cancel any instructions issued to a sheriff concerning seizure or sale of property.

   In the case where CRA instructed the sheriff to seize assets before the bankruptcy, the BIA, subsection 73(2) provides that the sheriff must deliver the said property back to the trustee even if the execution or attachment was performed prior to the assignment. Consequently, CRA may not file a preferred claim for legal costs, sheriff's fees and land registry fees if it is the first creditor to initiate such an action.
7. If the account is a Goods and Services Tax account:

   a) Change the collections status code to "bankruptcy".

   b) Ensure that all pertinent flags are set, in order to:
      - prevent issuance of collections notices
      - prevent refunds from being issued

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

Digitized by Google

- monitor the account
- prevent the system from spawning the credits to pre-bankruptcy debits

c) Change the mailing address and contact name to reflect the trustee.

For those accounts that have direct deposit, changing the mailing address to reflect the trustee's address has no effect on the direct deposit facility. Therefore, you must also check to see if the account is coded for direct deposit by accessing the Retrieve Direct Deposit Information screen (=DDP RDDI). If the account is coded for direct deposit, a written request to cancel direct deposit must be faxed to:

Summerside Tax Centre
Remittance/Returns Processing
Fax: (902) 432-5730
Tel: (902) 432-5034

The request should indicate your name, telephone number and the reason why direct deposit is being cancelled, for example, bankrupt, receivership or proposal etc.

8. Compare the actual balance of the account to the balance declared on the Notice of Bankruptcy for noticeable differences.

9. Compare the assets declared on the Notice of Bankruptcy (Statement of Affairs) with the assets discovered during the course of CRA's investigations to determine:

- undeclared assets
- preferential treatment of creditors
- improper disposal of assets

For further details, refer to Directive RCD 00-02, Statement of Affairs of a Bankrupt

Registering a Security

To register a security, ensure that the following conditions are met:

- registration is completed before the date the bankruptcy starts
- registration is for amounts owing at the time of registration plus accruing interest

Refer to Security for further detail.

Collecting on a Bankrupt Account

To collect on a bankrupt account when advised or informed of a bankruptcy:

1. File the Proof of Claim.

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

Digitized by Google

2. If the account relates to a source deductions debt, send the Enhanced Requirements to Pay to all receivables.

3. Request a payroll audit and a regular audit where appropriate.

4. Notify the trustee of the obligation to file all returns.

5. Intercept internal funds.

6. Bring to the attention of the trustee and/or an inspector any actions that would constitute an offence under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Guidelines for Preparing Proof of Claim

To receive any funds from a bankruptcy proceeding or to vote at a meeting of creditors, a Proof of Claim must be filed.

To prepare a Proof of Claim, apply the following guidelines:

1. Ensure the accuracy of the following information:
   - proper legal name of the bankrupt entity
   - date of the assignment, proposal or receiving order
   - amount of the debt as of the date of bankruptcy
   - payments received toward arrears in the last 90 days
2. Sign the Proof of Claim and have the signature witnessed.

Deciding to Attend First Meeting of Creditors

To decide to attend a first meeting of creditors:

1. Determine if it is necessary to attend the creditors' meeting. Consider the following:
   - amount, content and proportion of liability relative to other creditors
   - priority of the payment of CRA's debt relative to other creditors
   - investigations reveal reasons to be appointed inspector in the bankruptcy
   - any suspicion of fraud
   - whether the value of the assets of the estate is high
2. Prior to the meeting, file a Proof of Claim. This must be filed whether or not you decide to attend the first meeting of creditors.
3. If you decide to attend the first meeting of creditors, obtain a proxy signed by the appropriate Departmental authority.

Participating at First Meeting of Creditors

When asking questions at the first meeting of creditors, adhere to the confidentiality restrictions of the Excise Tax Act, section 295(5)(a) and the Income Tax Act, section 241(4)(a). For further information, refer to Confidentiality.

To participate at the first meeting of creditors:

1. Discuss reviewable transactions.
2. Obtain detailed accounting information about the debtor's affairs.
3. Compare accounting information with the historic data on the account.
4. Discuss Directors' Liability.

Considering Opposing Discharge Application

To consider if CRA should oppose a discharge application, evaluate the case in the context of information relating to the following questions:

- is it possible to recover more funds?
- does the bankrupt entity have high income-earning potential which justifies a conditional discharge?
- does it appear that the reason for bankruptcy is to avoid the payment of taxes?
- is CRA able to provide factual grounds, as stated in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, section 173, on which the discharge may be opposed?

The result of opposing a discharge may result in the following:

- the Court may order up to five years of continuing payments to be made by a discharged bankrupt

  Note: Longer terms of payment may be imposed in exceptional circumstances.

- the Court has the power to grant, refuse or suspend the discharge or order a conditional discharge

Opposing Discharge Application

To oppose a discharge application:

Provide the following information to the Department of Justice as soon as possible, or at a minimum, two months prior to the automatic discharge date:

- date of bankruptcy and number of previous bankruptcies
- marital status, number of dependants and amount of child support or alimony payments

Digitized by Google

- source of income, assets, liabilities and CRA account status of the bankrupt (provide supporting documents)
- spouse's source of income, assets, liabilities and CRA account status
- tax history and report on collections actions taken (identify if this information was provided by the Ministère du Revenu du Québec)
- reviewable transactions including transfer or disposal of assets during the previous year and contributions to Registered Retirement Savings Plans during the previous five years
- Statement of Account and Statement of receipts and disbursement
- copies of the Proofs of Claim and the supporting documentation

Monitoring Account

To monitor an account in bankruptcy:

1. On a regular basis, input all pertinent information on the bankrupt's account, for example: ACSES diary, GST collections log.
2. Regularly check RAPID Option E for Industry Canada updates on the status of the Estate.

   Note: The CRA receives a weekly tape from Industry Canada [the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (OSB)] containing details of new insolvency filings and updates on previous filings. This information, as it relates to individuals, is displayed on RAPID Option E. These displays include numerical Estate Type Codes and Estates Discharge Type Codes. For explanations of these codes refer to Directive RCD 02-02, Access to Insolvency Information on RAPID.
3. With the trustee determine which property and/or secured claims have been filed.
4. Follow up with the trustee to ensure the filing and processing of any missing returns.
5. Set proper intercept flags, for example: CORLOC, status code.
6. Follow up on the completion of any outstanding audits.
7. Whenever a payment is made or a change in the debt occurs, amend Proofs of Claim.
8. Consider other methods of recovery, including:
   - assessments pursuant to the Directors' liability provisions of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act
   - assessments where there is evidence of non-arm's length transfers
   - non-compliance of any Requirement to Pay issued to a third party

9. Determine if a balance remains on the account:

   a) If a balance remains and the trustee has been discharged, initiate write-off procedures.

      For further information on write-off procedures, refer to Uncollectible Debts.

   b) In the case of a GST account, upon acknowledgement of the trustee's discharge, if no balance remains, send a request to have the account closed.

Collecting from an Undischarged Bankrupt

To collect from an undischarged bankrupt:

1. Verify that any dividend shown on the dividend sheet is credited to the account.

2. Ascertain from Option E on RAPID that the trustee is discharged.

3. Establish that the undischarged bankrupt has the ability to pay. Where the bankrupt was conditionally discharged as a result of CRA's opposing the discharge, the file will usually contain helpful information on ability to pay. The assumption that there is no ability to pay is not sufficient; confirmation to this effect is necessary.

4. Contact the bankrupt for payment, if there is ability to pay advise of legal action if payment is not made. Refer to ELCS letter #19687.

5. If the bankrupt does not reply, proceed with step #7.

6. If the bankrupt has started any action in order to be put back under the BIA's protection, check with the trustee to confirm the information that the bankrupt provided.

7. Proceed to collect the account, as you would any other.

   Note: To accommodate the updating of interest, the debit will have to be moved from the bankruptcy Subledger Account Type 121 as it is non-interest bearing. As a result of system limitations, the T1 Accounting System cannot properly handle the future accounting ramifications. So, the debit will have to remain on the Subledger System as Account Type 100. Requests for these actions are to be sent to T1 Client Services at your TC.

   For further detail, refer to the directive, Collection Action on an Undischarged Bankrupt, (97-01), (99-03) and (00-01).

Coding a GST Account Where a 296(1)(b) Assessment Exists

Upon notification that an account is in bankruptcy or receivership proceed in the following manner:

1. Input the appropriate collection status code.

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

Digitized by Google

2. Manually allocate the pre-bankruptcy credits to the appropriate reporting periods.

3. When credit returns or rebate claims exceeding PROTECTED have been filed by the registrant, trustee and/or receiver, access the GST system and place a refund hold on the account using the Maintain Account Refund/Credit Hold (MARH) screen.

4. Place an Account Maintenance Hold on the account, using the MARH screen, to allow for the cancellation of any post-bankruptcy credits which have been automatically transferred to pre-bankruptcy periods (note: post-bankruptcy credits cannot be used to offset existing pre-bankruptcy debit). The distribution instructions for the credits can be found in the Account Maintenance Manual.

   Confirm that the account has been allocated for audit. If an audit is not planned, and the PROTECTED threshold has been exceeded prepare an audit request to identify the net tax amounts as well as the tax payable amounts on the Notice of Assessment.

5. Pursuant to section 318 of the ETA, issue statutory set-off notices on any pre-bankruptcy income or corporate tax refunds as well as pre-bankruptcy amounts payable from other federal departments (for example: Public Works and Government Services Canada).

6. Prepare a Proof of Claim for any net tax payable amounts only, do not include the tax payable amounts assessed under paragraph 296(1)(b) of the ETA.

7. Monitor the account for receipt of dividends from the bankrupt estate and the trustee's final Receipts and Disbursements statement.

8. Submit the account for write-off. Refer to procedures outlined in Uncollectible Debts.

For further detail, refer to the directive, Assessment of Insolvent Purchasers under 296(1)(b) of the ETA, (96-12).

Applying OPD Payments to GST Accounts

To apply OPD payments to GST accounts:

1. If the GST debt is excluded from the application:

   - continue with collection action
   - do not change the collection status of the account

2. If the GST debt is not excluded from the application:

   - change the collection status of the account to 14
   - record the particulars of the Consolidation Order in the account diary

PART III PROPOSALS DIVISION I
GENERAL SCHEME FOR PROPOSALS

Summary: General Proposals, Their Character and Their Effect - Sections 50 Through 66

Section 50 generally provides that a proposal to the creditors can be made by:

- An insolvent person
- A trustee in bankruptcy in charge of the bankrupt's property
- The bankrupt
- A secured creditor's receiver

While subs. (1.1) disallows a proposal to be made in respect of a consumer proposal attended to in other provisions in the BIA.

Pursuant to subs. (1.2) the proposal must be made for the benefit of all the creditors generally while if it includes secured creditors it shall be made on a class by class basis to all those affected per class. Subs. (1.4) determines that for purposes of class segregation the following will be considered as criteria:

- the nature of the debts giving rise to the claims;
- the nature and rank of the security in respect of the claims;
- the remedies available to the creditors in the absence of the proposal, and the extent to which the creditors would recover their claims by exercising those remedies;
- the treatment of the claims under the proposal, and the extent to which the claims would be paid under the proposal; and
- such further criteria, consistent with those set out in paragraphs (a) to (d), as are prescribed while subs. (1.5) allows the court to determine into which class a secured claim may fall. Subs. (1.6) and (1.7) provide methods for the secured creditor to place a value on his claim.

Pursuant to subs. (1.8) all questions concerning the proposal, except its acceptance or refusal, shall be determined by ordinary resolution of the creditors.

Subs. (2) sets out the mechanics by which a proposal is filed: via submission of such documents ass stated with a trustee in the locality of the debtor while subs. (2.1) requires that filing to also be made to the official receiver of the same locality.

Subs. (3) provides that the inspectors of the proposer bankrupt shall approve the proposal before any action is commenced.

Subs. (4) provides that effectively no proposal can be withdrawn without the approval of the court or creditors.

Subs. (4.1) allows a party who has made a proposal to further make an assignment of his property.

Subs. (5) prompts the trustee of the proposal too make an investigation of the debtor's affairs to determine the accuracy of the statements as well as the cause of the proposal for purposes of presentation at the meeting of creditors.

Digitized by Google

Subs. (6) provides for various filings by the trustee including a monthly cash-flow of the debtor, while subs. (7) allows any creditor to obtain said filing and the court may interfene in preventing the disclosure of the cash-flow when:

- such release would unduly prejudice the insolvent person; and
- non-release would not unduly prejudice the creditor or creditors in question.

Subs. (10) allows the trustee access to the debtor's property to verify all material aspects of the filings she is compelled to make in respect of the debtor's affairs. This access is similar to that under bankruptcy orders. The trustee thereby files the information she realizes with the official receiver, the court as well as the creditors. Subs. 11 provides similar duties on the interim receiver if such has been appointed.

Subsection (12) allows the court to declare any proposal void, if, on application of the trustee, interim receiver or creditor it finds that:

- the debtor has not acted, or is not acting, in good faith and with due diligence;
- the proposal will not likely be accepted by the creditors; or
- the creditors as a whole would be materially prejudiced if the application.

If such happens, following subs. (12.1) there is a deemed assignment and the s. 57 applies.

Subsections (13) and (14) allow a proposal to encompass the liabilities of the directors of corporate debtors however such does not include:

- relate to contractual rights of one or more creditors arising from contracts with one or more directors; or
- are based on allegations of misrepresentation made by directors to creditors or of wrongful or oppressive conduct by directors while subs. (15) allows the court to intervene and disallow a compromise involving directors if it would not be just or equitable. Subs. (16) and (17) allows the court to determine director claimant classes while the latter transfers said claims to be made against those acting in that capacity for the corporation.

Section 50.1 attends to instances where secured creditors are allowed to vote on the proposal, based on their proven secured claim value while subs. (2) sets the value of the claim to be that of its face or the assessed value and subs. (3) provides that the difference between the face and the lower assessed value votes as an unsecured creditor. Subs. (4) allows the secured creditor to apply to court to have an assessed value contested and set by the court. Subs. (5) provides that when no secured creditor provides proof of claim at or before the meeting of the creditors then they all are deemed to have refused the proposal.
Section 50.2 provides that when a secured creditor has not has her claim affected with a proposal - it continues at face - then they shall not be allowed to vote on any proposal as interested affected parties.
Section 50.3 provides that when a bankruptcy results from, effectively, refusal of the proposal then the secured creditor claims are then subject to different demanding requirements of proof under the bankruptcy provisions cited.

Section 50.4 creates with the insolvent person the opportunity to gain some deferral until determination of the proposal via filing with the official receiver an "notice of intention" whereby they must file with that party the consenting trustee identity who has agreed to act, the notice to file a proposal and a list of creditors with claims over $250. Subs. (2) thereby prompts for the timely filing of cash-flows of the debtor, attested for reasonableness with the official receiver while subs. (3) allows any creditor affected to obtain such information while subs. (4) protects the trustee if a party has detrimentally relied on the filing made if they have exercised good faith and reasonable care. In the absence of the creditor asking for a filing the trustee is obligated to send to each a copy of the notice and the information above listed. Subs. (7) allows the trustee in respect of the proposal to have open access to as much of the insolvent person's records and business as is necessary to make necessary filings. Subs. (8) prompts for the failure of the action on the notice of intention, at the end of 30 days without action of the insolvent party or trustee, whereby an assignment has then been deemed to have been made thereby prompting for the application of the rest of the BIA as if an act of bankruptcy has occurred, however, subs. (9) allows the debtor to ask the court for an extension of time for varying series of time to carry through but only where:

- the insolvent person has acted, and is acting, in good faith and with due diligence;
- the insolvent person would likely be able to make a viable proposal if the extension being applied for were granted; and
- no creditor would be materially prejudiced if the extension being applied for were granted.

Subs. (11) allows a creditor amongst other acting parties, to ask the court to terminate the extension period obtained by the debtor if:

- the insolvent person has not acted, or is not acting, in good faith and with due diligence,
- the insolvent person will not likely be able to make a viable proposal before the expiration of the period in question,
- the insolvent person will not likely be able to make a proposal, before the expiration of the period in question, that will be accepted by the creditors, or
- the creditors as a whole would be materially prejudiced were the application under this subsection rejected.

Section 50.5 prompts the trustee under the notice of intention to be actively involved in the proposal's construction as well as any negotiations leading up to it.

Section 50.6 allows the court to set up security of rank on the debtors property in effort to inject additional cash funding to the debtor to improve the chance of acceptance. Subs. (3) and (4) allows the court to charge the assets while the latter allows the court to shift the charges already made but only with the consent of those affected through a previous action. Subs. (5) provides the criteria to determine whether this type of order should be made which consists of:

- the period during which the debtor is expected to be subject to proceedings under this Act;
- how the debtor's business and financial affairs are to be managed during the proceedings;
- whether the debtor's management has the confidence of its major creditors;
- whether the loan would enhance the prospects of a viable proposal being made in respect of the debtor;
- the nature and value of the debtor's property;
- whether any creditor would be materially prejudiced as a result of the security or charge; and
- the trustee's report referred to in paragraph 50(6)(b) or 50.4(2)(b), as the case may be.

Section 51 provides that the trustee shall prompt for the calling of a meeting of the known creditors by sending each the particulars, as well as copy to the official receiver. Subs. (2) provides that if a prior meeting was informally held by the debtor and his creditors and the condition of the estate of the debtor has not substantially changed then the information prescribed in the primary subsection shall not have to be filed. Subs. (3) prompts for the official rreceiver to chair the meeting called, while his opinion is binding on any disputes that may arise, though can be appealed to court.

Section 52 allows for an adjournment of the 1st meeting to allow for further investigation of the debtors affairs.

Digitized by Google

Section 53 provides for pro-active prior assent or dissent on any voting to be made at the meeting as if it were at the meeting itself.

Section 54 provides that at the meeting it shall be voted by the creditors to either accept or dismiss the proposal. Subs. (2) provides a distinct structure of voting classes being:

- the following creditors with proven claims are entitled to vote:
  - all unsecured creditors, and
  - those secured creditors in respect of whose secured claims the proposal was made;
- the creditors shall vote by class, according to the class of their respective claims, and for that purpose
  - all unsecured claims constitute one class, unless the proposal provides for more than one class of unsecured claim, and
  - the classes of secured claims shall be determined as provided by subsection 50(1.4);
- the votes of the secured creditors do not count for the purpose of this section, but are relevant only for the purpose of subsection 62(2); and
- the proposal is deemed to be accepted by the creditors if, and only if, all classes of unsecured creditors — other than, unless the court orders otherwise, a class of creditors having equity claims — vote for the acceptance of the proposal by a majority in number and two thirds in value of the unsecured creditors of each class present, personally or by proxy, at the meeting and voting on the resolution.

Subs. (2.1) deems Crown claims related to income tax, CPP or EI, or their provincial equivalent, not to be secured claims for the above purposes.
Subs. (2.2) prompts that when no secured creditor has voted at the meeting them they have refused the proposal. Subs. (3) provides that related creditors can only vote against a proposal while if the trustee is a creditor she cannot vote at all.

Section 54.1 provides that equity claims are all of one class, unless directed contrary by the court, and that they cannot vote on any proposal.
Section 55 allows the creditors to adjust the terms of the proposal at the meeting, though, with the consent of the debtor.
Section 56 provides that the creditors can appoint up to 5 inspectors to have the affairs of debtor monitored.

Section 57 provides that when a proposal is refused there is an automate deemed assignment and, effectively, an act of bankruptcy occurs, and that consequently, the trustee must take further steps in relation thereto specified. Section 57.1 allows a court to substitute the specified acting trustee of the proposal that has failed, iff it is in the best interests of the creditors.
Section 58 provides the “going in” provisions, to court, when a proposal has been accepted. It sets out the parties and time frames to provide information to the interested parties who include every creditor known so that they are aware of possible court acceptance and their interest in the on-going proceedings. This allows any creditor who may have voted against the proposal to make representations to court upon hearing to affect its acceptance.

Section 59 provides that the court can hear almost all evidence related to the proposal before it is sanctioned which includes, primarily, the report from the trustee, the debtor and any creditor voting in any manner. Pursuant to subs. (2) the court must refuse to sanction the proposal if it is detrimental to the creditors as a whole or if the debtor has perpetrated any offence under the relevant sections in the BIA.

Digitized by Google

Subs. (3) allows for withholding of the sanction by the court when any of the below acts have occurred unless the court is satisfied that at least 50% of the unsecured claims of debtors will be paid:

- the assets of the bankrupt are not of a value equal to fifty cents on the dollar on the amount of the bankrupt's unsecured liabilities, unless the bankrupt satisfies the court that the fact that the assets are not of a value equal to fifty cents on the dollar on the amount of the bankrupt's unsecured liabilities has arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible;
- the bankrupt has omitted to keep such books of account as are usual and proper in the business carried on by the bankrupt and as sufficiently disclose the business transactions and financial position of the bankrupt within the period beginning on the day that is three years before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included;
- the bankrupt has continued to trade after becoming aware of being insolvent;
- the bankrupt has failed to account satisfactorily for any loss of assets or for any deficiency of assets to meet the bankrupt's liabilities;
- the bankrupt has brought on, or contributed to, the bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculations, by unjustifiable extravagance in living, by gambling or by culpable neglect of the bankrupt's business affairs;
- the bankrupt has put any of the bankrupt's creditors to unnecessary expense by a frivolous or vexatious defence to any action properly brought against the bankrupt;
- the bankrupt has, within the period beginning on the day that is three months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included, incurred unjustifiable expense by bringing a frivolous or vexatious action;
- the bankrupt has, within the period beginning on the day that is three months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included, when unable to pay debts as they became due, given an undue preference to any of the bankrupt's creditors;
- the bankrupt has, within the period beginning on the day that is three months before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included, incurred liabilities in order to make the bankrupt's assets equal to fifty cents on the dollar on the amount of the bankrupt's unsecured liabilities;
- the bankrupt has on any previous occasion been bankrupt or made a proposal to creditors;
- the bankrupt has been guilty of any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust;
- the bankrupt has committed any offence under this Act or any other statute in connection with the bankrupt's property, the bankruptcy or the proceedings thereunder;
- the bankrupt has failed to comply with a requirement to pay imposed under section 68;
- the bankrupt, if the bankrupt could have made a viable proposal, chose bankruptcy rather than a proposal to creditors as the means to resolve the indebtedness; and
- the bankrupt has failed to perform the duties imposed on the bankrupt under this Act or to comply with any order of the court.

Subs. (4) allows the court to order any amendment to the debtor's constating documents as needed to give effect to the proposal.

Section 60 provides for the ordering of trustee fee payment out of possible distributions to be ahead of those otherwise. If such is not the case the proposal will not be allowed.

Subs. (1.1) provides that Crown claims in the form of income tax, CPP and EI (and provincial equivalent) must be provided for full satisfaction before a proposal will be sanctioned by the court. Subs. (1.3) provides that employee costs must be satisfied or validly made provision for before a proposal can be extended.

Digitized by Google

Subs. (1.4)-(1.5) equally provide that employees have no voting ability as well as specific rules related to prescribed pension plan funding.
Subs. (1.7) provide for lower ranking in a proposal of all equity claims until all other claims are paid in full.
Subs. (2) provides that all monies paid by the debtor pursuant to the proposal will be to the trustee who will then distribute them pursuant thereto to the affected creditors while subs. (3) affects the same arrangement to instances of promissory notes or shares of the debtor.
Subs. (4) provides that any distributions will be taxed on same terms of s. 147 in respect of fees to the Superintendent.
Subs. (5) allows the court to refuse a proposal if the above subsection particulars are not adhered to.

Section 61 operates to annul any bankruptcy in fact if the proposal that is made is accepted by the creditors. All powers and titles then remain with the bankrupt to carry on her business. Subs. (2) thereof allows the court to annul a proposal whereby:

- the insolvent person is deemed to have thereupon made an assignment;
- the trustee shall, without delay, file with the official receiver, in the prescribed form, a report of the deemed assignment;
- (b.1) the official receiver shall issue a certificate of assignment, in the prescribed form, which has the same effect for the purposes of this Act as an assignment filed under section 49; and
- the trustee shall, within five days after the day the certificate mentioned in paragraph (b) is issued, send notice of the meeting of creditors under section 102, at which meeting the creditors may by ordinary resolution, notwithstanding section 14, affirm the appointment of the trustee or appoint another licensed trustee in lieu of that trustee.

Subs. (4) provides that any fees incurred to prepare a proposal shall not be met out the estate of the debtor, unless they are trustee fees.

Section 62 provides that any proposal by an insolvent person shall be filed by the trustee with the official receiver in prescribed form. Subs. (1.1) provides for the timing of valuation of the claims of the creditors for these purposes to be the either the date of:

- the notice of intention; or
- the proposal, if no notice of intention was filed

while with respect to proposal arising out of bankruptcies the date of valuing the claims shall be the date of bankruptcy. Subs. (2) provides that once the proposal has been accepted by both the creditors and the court it shall be binding on all unsecured claims as well as any class of secured claims which voted in favour of it to the extent of a majority or 2/3rds in value. Subs. (2.1) provides that acceptance of a proposal does not release the debtor from s. 178 claims unless the proposal makes provision for such. They are:

(a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail;
(a.1) any award of damages by a court in civil proceedings in respect of
(i) bodily harm intentionally inflicted, or sexual assault, or
(ii) wrongful death resulting therefrom;
(b) any debt or liability for alimony or alimentary pension;
(c) any debt or liability arising under a judicial decision establishing affiliation or respecting support or maintenance, or under an agreement for maintenance and support of a spouse, former spouse, former common-law partner or child living apart from the bankrupt;

(d) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity or, in the Province of Quebec, as a trustee or administrator of the property of others;
(e) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability that arises from an equity claim;
(f) liability for the dividend that a creditor would have been entitled to receive on any provable claim not disclosed to the trustee, unless the creditor had notice or knowledge of the bankruptcy and failed to take reasonable action to prove his claim;
(g) any debt or obligation in respect of a loan made under the Canada Student Loans Act, the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act or any enactment of a province that provides for loans or guarantees of loans to students where the date of bankruptcy of the bankrupt occurred

(i) before the date on which the bankrupt ceased to be a full- or part-time student, as the case may be, under the applicable Act or enactment, or

(ii) within seven years after the date on which the bankrupt ceased to be a full- or part-time student; or

(h) any debt for interest owed in relation to an amount referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (g).

Section 62.1 attends to instances of default of the proposal. The nature of the default that prompts for the trustee to inform the official receiver as well as the creditors is limited to:

- default is made in the performance of any provision in a proposal,
- the default is not waived
    - by the inspectors, or
    - if there are no inspectors, by the creditors,

  and
- the default is not remedied by the insolvent person within the prescribed time.

Section 63 provides that where the court can over-turn a previously sanctioned proposal where there is injustice or undue delay or that the approval of the court was obtained through fraud, however, pursuant to subs. (2) for all intents and purposes anything previously done under the proposal is not undone. Subs. (3) allows the trustee or any debtor to make application to the court to have a proposal sanctioned undone when there has been a conviction of the debtor of an offence under the BIA. Subs. (5) and (6) thereafter then provide that once a proposal has been annulled there is, effectively, an assignment and thus an act of bankruptcy and that the trustee is then compelled to file additional disclosures to the official receiver.

Section 64 allows for the removal of directors who, through their conduct, are undermining an effort to make a proposal while subs. (2) allows the court to fill any resulting vacancy.
Section 64.1 allows the court to charge assets of the corporate debtor proposer in respect of any director liability that that party may become subject to in carrying out the terms of the proposal while pursuant to subs. (2) such rank can exceed any secured creditor but only if the director cannot obtain indemnity insurance for her function in this regard. Subject to subs. (4) said charge cannot be made with it results from a director's actions that were of gross negligence or wilful misconduct or, in Quebec, the director's or officer's gross or intentional fault.

Section 64.2 allows for charging of debtor's assets in respect of costs to carry out the proposal which include:

Digitized by Google

(a) the trustee, including the fees and expenses of any financial, legal or other experts engaged by the trustee in the performance of the trustee's duties;
(b) any financial, legal or other experts engaged by the person for the purpose of proceedings under this Division; and
(c) any financial, legal or other experts engaged by any other interested person if the court is satisfied that the security or charge is necessary for the effective participation of that person in proceedings under this Division

While subs. (2) allows prior ranking against secured creditors.

Section 65 opens up financing alternatives to debtors with respect to their proposals by allowing for the subscription of shares or other securities however if a creditor chooses not to participate her claim shall be valued and extinguished with cash.

Section 65.1 allows for preventing of acceleration of private agreement clauses in the case of notices or proposals by statutorily preventing them from being operative: this considerably allows some leeway in arranging proposals. Subs. (2) and (3) provide coverage of leases that shall not be terminated and the continuation of utilities. Subs. (6) allows a petitioning supplier who is subject to these subsections to approach the court to allow them not to have effect if such would cause financial hardship to the applicant.

Section 65.11 allows a debtor, on the day of the proposal or intention, to disclaim or resiliate any agreement that it may have with any party. This allows additional reflexability to ensuring that a proposal will be successful. Subs. (2) prevents, in the case of an individual debtor, such, unless she is carrying on business and only in respect of the a business arrangement. It should be noted that the other party may apply to court to have the agreement maintained, pursuant to subs. (3) while if the trustee also disagrees the debtor can apply to court to have it carried through. Subs. (5) prompts the court to consider, in whether to order:

- whether the trustee approved the proposed disclaimer or resiliation;
- whether the disclaimer or resiliation would enhance the prospects of a viable proposal being made in respect of the debtor; and
- whether the disclaimer or resiliation would likely cause significant financial hardship to a party to the agreement.

Pursuant to subs. (8) the other party, who suffers a loss, then has a provable claim. Note that pursuant to subs. (10) this opportunity does not apply to:

- an eligible financial contract;
- a lease referred to in subsection 65.2(1);
- a collective agreement;
- a financing agreement if the debtor is the borrower; or
- a lease of real property or of an immovable if the debtor is the lessor.

Section 65.12 covers collective agreements whereby the debtor can restructure its terms on provision of notice. If the bargaining agent does not comply with the demand the debtor can apply to court to do so while the court will sanction such only if:

- the insolvent person would not be able to make a viable proposal, taking into account the terms of the collective agreement;
- the insolvent person has made good faith efforts to renegotiate the provisions of the collective agreement; and

- the failure to issue the order is likely to result in irreparable damage to the insolvent person.

The rest of the section deals with other mechanics by which collective agreements are dealt with.

Section 65.13 provides that the debtor which has a proposal or intention in process cannot dispose of assets other than in the normal course of its business while the court may order such. Given subs. ((3) the court give notice to the affected secured creditors if it applies to court to authorize an asset disposition. The criteria for granting the order to dispose are not limited to but include:

- whether the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition was reasonable in the circumstances;
- whether the trustee approved the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition;
- whether the trustee filed with the court a report stating that in their opinion the sale or disposition would be more beneficial to the creditors than a sale or disposition under a bankruptcy;
- the extent to which the creditors were consulted;
- the effects of the proposed sale or disposition on the creditors and other interested parties; and
- whether the consideration to be received for the assets is reasonable and fair, taking into account their market value.

Subs. (5) and (6) deal with related (non-arm's length) transfers and provides additional steps to ensure that the instance is not taken advantage of at the demise of the creditors. Subs. (7) allows for the court to order a transfer of free title with shifting of secured creditor claim to other assets of the debtor.

Section 65.2 through 65.22 allows a debtor, under a proposal/intention or bankruptcy, to disclaim a commercial lease they may have, within the parameters specified in its subsections.

Section 66 allows all the provisions in the BIA to apply to proposals under the Division, applied as per circumstances. Subs. (2) prompts for the inapplicability of the CCAA compromise scenario if the BIA was used instead, making them mutually exclusive. Iff a CCAA compromise has failed to be accepted then further action under the BIA cannot be pursued.

Who may make a proposal - Sec. 50

50. (1) Subject to subsection (1.1), a proposal may be made by

(a) an insolvent person;

(b) a receiver, within the meaning of subsection 243(2), but only in relation to an insolvent person;

(c) a liquidator of an insolvent person's property;

(d) a bankrupt; and

Where proposal may not be made - Sec. 50(1.1)

(1.1) A proposal may not be made under this Division with respect to a debtor in respect of whom a consumer proposal has been filed under Division II until the administrator under the consumer proposal has been discharged.

To whom proposal made - Sec. 50(1.2)

(1.2) A proposal must be made to the creditors generally, either as a mass or separated into classes as provided in the proposal, and may also be made to secured creditors in respect of any class or classes of secured claim, subject to subsection (1.3).

Idem - Sec. 50(1.3)
(1.3) Where a proposal is made to one or more secured creditors in respect of secured claims of a particular class, the proposal must be made to all secured creditors in respect of secured claims of that class.

Classes of secured claims - Sec. 50(1.4)
(1.4) Secured claims may be included in the same class if the interests or rights of the creditors holding those claims are sufficiently similar to give them a commonality of interest, taking into account

(a) the nature of the debts giving rise to the claims;
(b) the nature and rank of the security in respect of the claims;
(c) the remedies available to the creditors in the absence of the proposal, and the extent to which the creditors would recover their claims by exercising those remedies;
(d) the treatment of the claims under the proposal, and the extent to which the claims would be paid under the proposal; and
(e) such further criteria, consistent with those set out in paragraphs (a) to (d), as are prescribed.

Court may determine classes - Sec. 50(1.5)
(1.5) The court may, on application made at any time after a notice of intention or a proposal is filed, determine, in accordance with subsection (1.4), the classes of secured claims appropriate to a proposal, and the class into which any particular secured claim falls.

[1] PAPERNY J. (orally): — Resurgence Asset Management LLC "Resurgence" appeared on behalf of holders of approximately 60 percent of the unsecured notes issued by Canadian Airlines Corporation in the total amount of $100 million U.S. These unsecured note holders are proposed to be classified as unsecured creditors in the plan that is the subject of these proceedings.

[2] Resurgence applied for the following relief:

1. An order lifting the stay of proceedings against Canadian Airlines Corporation and Canadian Airlines International Ltd. (respectively "CAC" and "CAIL" and collectively called "Canadian") to permit Resurgence to commence and proceed with an oppression action against Canadian, Air Canada and others.
2. Further, and in the alternative, Resurgence sought the same relief described in item one above in the context of the C.C.A.A. proceedings.
3. An order that any and all unsecured claims held or controlled, directly or indirectly by Air Canada shall be placed in a separate class and either not allowed to be voted at all, or, alternatively, allowed to be voted in separate class from all other affected unsecured claims.
4. An order that there be a separation in class between creditors of CAC and CAIL
5. An order striking Section 6.2(2)(ii) of the plan on the basis that it is contrary to the C.C.A.A.

[3] Resurgence abandoned the application described in item 1 above, and the application in item 2 was addressed in my ruling given May 8, 2000, in these proceedings.

Standing

[4] Prior to dealing with the remaining issues of classification, voting and Section 6.2(2)(ii) of the plan, the issue of standing needs to be addressed. This was a matter of some debate, largely in the context of the first two applications. Canadian argued that Resurgence was only a fund manager and did not hold the unsecured notes, beneficially or otherwise, and, accordingly, did not have standing to make any of the applications. The evidence establishes that Resurgence is not the legal owner and the evidence of beneficial ownership is equivocal.

[5] Canadian has not raised this issue on any of the previous occasions on which Resurgence has been before the court in these proceedings. There has been a consent order involving Resurgence and Canadian.

[6] In my view, it is not appropriate now for Canadian to suggest that Resurgence does not represent the interests of the holders of 60 percent of the unsecured notes and essentially seek a declaration that Resurgence is a stranger to these proceedings.

[7] I am not prepared to dismiss the applications of Resurgence on classification, voting and amending the plan out of hand on the basis of standing.

[8] Resurgence was also supported in these applications by the senior secured note holders. For the purposes of these applications, I accept that Resurgence is representing the interests of 60 percent of the unsecured note holders.

Classification of Air Canada's Unsecured Claim

[9] By my April 14, 2000 order in these proceedings, I approved transactions involving CAIL, a large number of aircraft lessors and Air Canada, which achieved approximately $200 million worth of concessions for CAIL. In exchange for granting the concession, each creditor received a guarantee from Air Canada and the assurance that the creditor would immediately cease to be affected by the C.C.A.A. proceedings.

[10] These concessions or deficiency claims were quantified and reflected in promissory notes which were assigned to Air Canada in exchange for its guarantee of the aircraft leases. The monitor approved the method of quantifying these claims and recognized the value of the concessions to Canadian. In that order I reserved the issue of classification and voting to be determined at some later date. The plan provides for two classes of creditors, secured and unsecured.

[11] The unsecured class is composed of a number of types of unsecured claims, including aircraft financings, executory contracts, unsecured notes, litigation claims, real estate leases and the deficiencies, if any, of the senior secured note holders.

[12] In one portion of the application, Resurgence seeks to have Air Canada vote the promissory notes in separate class and relied on several factors to distinguish the claims of other Affected, Unsecured Creditors from Air Canada's unsecured claim, including the following:

1. The Air Canada appointed board caused Canadian to enter into these C.C.A.A. proceedings under which Air Canada stands to gain substantial benefits in its own operations and in the merged operations and ownership contemplated after the compromise of debts under the plan.
2. Air Canada is providing the fund of money to be distributed to the Affected Unsecured Creditors and will, therefore, end up paying itself a portion of that money if it is included in the Affected Unsecured Creditors' class and permitted to vote.

Digitized by Google

3. Air Canada gave no real consideration in acquiring the deficiency claims and manufactured them only to secure a 'yes' vote.

[13] Air Canada and Canadian argue that the legal right associated with Air Canada's unsecured promissory notes and with the other Affected, Unsecured Claims, are the same and that the matters raised by Resurgence, as relating to classification, are really matters of fairness, more appropriately dealt with at the fairness hearing. Air Canada and Canadian emphasized that classification must be determined according to the rights of the creditors, not their personalities.

[14] The starting point in determining classification is the statute under which the parties are operating and from which the court obtains its jurisdiction. The primary purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to facilitate the re-organization of insolvent companies, and this goal must be given proper consideration at every stage of the C.C.A.A. process, including classification of claims; see, for example, Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. v. Oakwood Petroleums Ltd. (1988), 72 C.B.R. (N.S.) 20 (Alta. Q.B.)

[15] Beyond identifying secured and unsecured classes, the C.C.A.A. does not offer any guidance to the classification of claims. The process, instead, has developed in the case law.

[16] A frequently cited description of the method of classification of creditors for the purposes of voting on a plan, under the C.C.A.A., is Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v Dodd (1891), [1892] 2 Q.B. 573 (Eng. C.A.).

> The word 'class' is vague and to find out what is meant by it, we must look at the scope of the section which is a section enabling the court to order a meeting of a class of creditors to be called. It seems plain that we must give such a meaning to the term 'class' as will prevent the section being so worked as to result in confiscation and injustice, and that it must be confined to those persons whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with the view to their common interest.

This test has been described as the "commonality of interest" test. All counsel agree that this is the test to apply in classification of claims under the C.C.A.A. However, there is a dispute on the types of interests that are to be considered in determining commonality.

[18] Generally, the cases hold that classification is a fact-driven determination unique to the circumstances of every case, upon which the court should be loathe to impose rules for universal application, particularly in light of the flexible and remedial jurisdiction involved; see, for example, Re Fairview Industries Ltd. reflex, (1991), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 71 (N.S. T.D.)

[19] The majority of the cases presented to me, held that commonality of the interest is to be determined by the rights the creditor has vis-a-vis the debtor. Courts have also found it helpful to consider the context of the proposed plan and treatment of creditors under a liquidation scenario. In the absence of bad faith, motivation for supporting or rejecting a plan is not a classification issue in the authorities.

[20] In considering what interests are included in the commonality of interest test, Forsyth J., in Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. (Supra) had to determine whether all the secured creditors of the company ought to be included in one class. The creditors all had first-charge security and the same method of valuation was applied to each secured claim in order to determine security value under the plan. The distinguishing features were submitted to be based on the difference in the security held, including ease of marketability and realization potential. In holding that a separate class was not necessary, Forsyth J., said at page 29:

> Different security positioning and changing security values are a fact of life in the world of secured financing. To accept this argument would again result in a different class of creditor for each secured lender.

In doing so, Forsyth J. rejected the "identity of the interest" approach in which creditors in a class must have identical interests.

[21] It was also submitted in Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. that since the purchaser under the plan had made financing arrangements with the Royal Bank, the bank had an interest not shared by the other secured creditors. Forsyth J., held that in the absence of any allegation that the Royal Bank was not acting bona fide in considering the benefit of the plan, the secured creditors could not be heard to criticize the presence of the Royal Bank in their class.

[22] Forsyth J., also emphasized in Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. that the commonality test cannot be considered without also considering the underlying purpose of the C.C.A.A., which is to facilitate reorganizations of insolvent companies. To that end, the court should not approve a classification scheme which would make a reorganization difficult, if not impossible, to achieve. At the same time, while the C.C.A.A. grants the court the authority to alter the legal rights of parties other than the debtor company without their consent, the court will not permit a confiscation of rights or an injustice to occur.

[23] The Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. approach was specifically adopted in British Columbia in Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Insurance Co. of Canada (1989), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 195 (B.C. C.A.), where it was held that various mortgagees with different mortgages against different properties were included in the same class.

[24] In Savage v. Amoco Acquisition Co. (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 154 (Alta. C.A.) the Alberta Court of Appeal rejected the argument that shareholders who have private arrangements with the applicant or who are brokers or officers or otherwise in a special position vis-a-vis the debtor company, should be put in a special category.

[25] At page 158 the court stated in regard to the test applied to classification:

> We do not think that this rule justifies the division of shareholders into separate classes on the basis of their presumed prior commitment to a point of view. The state of facts, common to all, is that they are all offered this proposal, face as an alternative the break-up of this apparently insolvent company and hold shares that appear to be worthless on break-up. In any event, any attempt to divide them on the basis suggested, would be futile. One would have as many groups as there are shareholders.

The commonality of interest test was addressed by the British, Columbia Supreme Court in Re Woodward's Ltd. 1993 CanLII 870 (BC SC), (1993), 84 B.C.L.R. (2d) 206 (B.C. S.C.). Tysoe J. rejected the identity of interest approach and held that it was permissible to include creditors with different legal rights in the same class, so long as their legal rights were not so dissimilar that it was still possible for them to vote with a common interest.

[26] Tysoe J. went on to find that legal interests should be considered in the context of the proposed plan and that it was also necessary to examine the legal rights of creditors in the context of the possible failure of the plan.

[27] In other words, "interest" for the purpose of classification does not include the personality or identity of the creditor, and the interests it may have in the broader commercial sphere that might influence its decision or predispose it to vote in a particular way; rather, "interest" involves the entitlement of the debt holder viewed within the context of the provisions of the proposed plan. In that regard, see Woodward's Ltd. at page 212.

[28] In Fairview Industries Ltd., the court held that in classification there need not be a commonality of interest of debts involved, so long as the legal interests were the same. Justice Glube (as she then was) stated that it did not automatically follow that those with different commercial interests, for example, those with security on "quick" assets, are necessarily in conflict with those with security on "fixed" assets. She stated that just saying there is a conflict is insufficient to warrant separation.

[29] In Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corp. v. Bank of Nova Scotia reflex, (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 621 (Ont. Gen. Div.) at 626 like Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., the "identity of interests" approach was rejected. The court preserved a class of creditors which included debenture holders, terminated employees, realty lessors and equipment lessors.

[30] Borins J. held that not every difference in the nature of the debt warrants a separate class and that in placing a broad and purposive interpretation on the C.C.A.A., the court should "take care to resist approaches which would potentially jeopardize a potentially viable plan." He observed that "excessive fragmentation is counterproductive to the legislative intent to facilitate corporate reorganization" and that it would be "improper to create a special class simply for the benefit of an opposing creditor which would give that creditor the potential to exercise an unwarranted degree of power." (p. 627).

[31] In summary, the cases establish the following principles applicable to assessing commonality of interest:

1. Commonality of interest should be viewed on the basis of the non-fragmentation test, not on an identity of interest test;
2. The interests to be considered are the legal interests the creditor holds qua creditor in relationship to the debtor company, prior to and under the plan as well as on liquidation;
3. The commonality of these interests are to be viewed purposively, bearing in mind the object of the C.C.A.A., namely to facilitate reorganizations if at all possible;
4. In placing a broad and purposive interpretation on the C.C.A.A., the court should be careful to resist classification approaches which would potentially jeopardize potentially viable plans.
5. Absent bad faith, the motivations of the creditors to approve or disapprove are irrelevant.
6. The requirement of creditors being able to consult together means being able to assess their legal entitlement as creditors before or after the plan in a similar manner.

[32] With this background, I will make several observations relating to the reasons asserted by Resurgence that distinguish Air Canada from the rest of the Affected Unsecured Creditors.

[33] The first two reasons given relate to interests of Air Canada extraneous to its legal rights as a unsecured creditor. The third reason relates largely to the further assertion that Air Canada should not be allowed to vote at all. The matter of voting is addressed more specifically later in these reasons.

[34] The factors described by Resurgence distinguish between Air Canada and other unsecured creditors relate largely to the fact that Air Canada is the assignee of the unsecured debt. In my view, that approach is to be discouraged at the classification stage. To require the court to consider who holds the claim, as distinct from what they hold, at that point would be untenable. I note that Mr. Edwards recognizes in 1947 in his article, "Reorganizations under the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act", (1947), 25 Cdn. Bar Rev. 587, and observe this concern is heightened in the current commercial reality of debt trading.

[35] Resurgence also asserted that a court should avoid placing creditors with a potential conflict of interest in the same class and relies on Re NsC Diesel Power Inc. (1990), 79 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (N.S. T.D.), a case in which the court considered a potential conflict of interest between subcontractors and direct contractors. To the extent this case can be seen as decided on the basis of the distinct legal rights of the creditors, I agree with the result. To the extent that the case determined that a class could be separated based on a conflict of interest not based on legal right, I disagree. In my view, this would be the sort of issue the court should consider at the fairness hearing.

[36] Resurgence also relied on the decisions of the British Columbia Supreme Court in Re Northland Properties Ltd. (1988), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 166 (B.C. S.C.), a case decided prior to Norcen Energy Resources Ltd.. In that case the court held that a subsidiary wholly owned by Northland Bank was incorporated to purchase certain bonds from Northland in exchange for preferred shares and was not entitled to vote. The court found that would be tantamount to Northland Bank voting in its own reorganization and relied on Re Wellington Building Corp., [1934] O.R. 653, 16 C.B.R. 48 (Ont. S.C.) In this regard. I would note that the passage relied upon at page 5 in that case, in Wellington Building Corp (Supra) dealt with whether the scheme, as proposed, was unfair.

[37] All creditors proposed to be included in the class of Affected, Unsecured Creditors, are all unsecured and are treated the same under the plan. All would be treat similarly under the BIA. The plan provides that they will receive 12 cents on the dollar. The Monitor opined that in liquidation unsecured creditors would realize a maximum of 3 cents on the dollar. Their legal interests are essentially the same. Issue is taken with the presence of Air Canada, supporter and funder of the plan, also having taken an assignment of a substantial, unsecured claim. However, absent bad faith, who creditors are is not relevant. Air Canada's mere presence in the class does not in and of itself constitute bad faith.

[38] Further, all of these methods of distinguishing Air Canada's unsecured claim at their core are fundamentally issues of fairness which will be addressed by the Court at the fairness hearing on June 5, 2000. I am prepared to give serious consideration to these matters at that time and direct that there be a separate tabulation of the votes cast by Air Canada arising from any assignments of promissory notes they have taken, so that there is an evidentiary record to assist me in assessing the fairness of the vote when and if I am called upon to sanction the plan. This approach was taken by Justice Forsyth in Norcen Energy Resources Ltd., and in my view is consistent with the underlying purpose of the C.C.A.A. I wish to emphasize that the concerns raised by Resurgence will form part of the assessment of the overall fairness of the plan.

[39] Permitting the classification to remain intact for voting purposes will not result in a confiscation of rights of or injustice to the unsecured note holders. Their treatment does not at this point depart from any other Affected Unsecured Creditors and recognizes the similarity of legal rights. Although based on different legal instruments, the legal rights of the unsecured note holders and Air Canada are essentially the same. Neither has security, nor specific entitlement to assets. Further, the ability of all of the Affected Unsecured Creditors to realize their claims against the debtor companies, depend in significant part, on the company's ability to continue as a going concern.

[40] The separate tabulation of votes will allow the "voice" of unsecured creditors to be heard, while at the same time, permit rather than rule out the possibility that a plan might proceed.

[41] It is important to preserve this possibility in the interests of facilitating the aim of the C.C.A.A. and protecting interests of all constituents. To fracture the class prior to the vote, may have the effect of denying the court jurisdiction to consider sanctioning a plan which may pass the fairness test but which has been rejected by one creditor. This would be contrary to the purpose of the C.C.A.A.

Separating the Claims Against CAC and CAIL

[42] Resurgence briefly argued that since Air Canada's debt is owed by CAIL only, it could only look to CAIL's assets in a bankruptcy and would not be able to look to any CAC assets. In contrast, Resurgence suggested that the unsecured note holders are creditors of both CAIL under a guarantee, and CAC under the notes. Resurgence submitted that the resulting difference in legal rights destroys the commonality of interests.

[43] There is insufficient evidence to suggest that the unsecured note holders are also creditors of CAIL. Counsel referred only to a statement made by Mr. Carty on cross-examination that there was an "unsecured guarantee". However, no documents have been brought to my attention that would support this statement and, in of itself, the statement is not determinative. In any case, I do not have sufficient evidence before me to conclude that there would be a meaningful difference in recoveries for unsecured creditors of CAC and CAIL in the event of bankruptcy. I, therefore, cannot conclude on this basis that rights are being confiscated, unlike Tysoe J.'s ability to do so in Re Woodward's Ltd. Simply looking to different assets or pools of assets will not alone fracture a class; some unique additional legal right of value in liquidation going unrecognized in a plan and not balanced by others losing rights as well is needed on the analysis of Tysoe J.

[44] I recognize the struggle between the unsecured note holders, represented by Resurgence on one side, and Air Canada and Canadian on the other. Resurgence fears the inclusion of Air Canada and the Affected Unsecured Creditors' class will swamp the vote. Air Canada and Canadian fear that exclusion of Air Canada will result in the voting down of a plan which, in their view, otherwise stands a realistic chance of approval. As unsecured creditors, they do share similar legal rights. As supporters or opponents of the plan, they may well have distinctly different financial or strategic interests. I believe that in the circumstances of this case, these other interests and their impact on the plan, are best addressed as matters of fairness at the June 5, 2000 hearing, and in this way, the concerns will be heard by the court without necessarily putting an end to the entire process.

Voting

[45] Although my decision on classification makes it clear that I will permit Air Canada to vote on the plan, I wish to comment further on this issue. Air Canada submitted that it should be entitled to vote the face value of the promissory notes which represent deficiency claims assigned to it from aircraft lessors in the same fashion as any other creditor who has acquired the claims by assignment. All parties accept that deficiency claims such as these would normally be included and voted upon in an unsecured claims class. The request by Resurgence to deny them a vote would have the effect of varying rights associated with those notes.

[46] The concessions achieved in the re-negotiation of the aircraft leases, represent value to CAIL. The methodology of calculation of the claims and their valuation was reviewed by the Monitor and this is not being challenged. Rather, it is because it is Air Canada that now holds them, that it is objectionable to Resurgence. Resurgence asserts that Air Canada manufactured the assignment so it could preserve a 'yes' vote. This, in my view, is a matter going to fairness. Is it fair for Air Canada to vote to share in the pool of cash funded by it for the benefit of unsecured creditors? That matter is best resolved at the fairness hearing.

[47] Resurgence relied on Northland Properties Ltd. in which a wholly owned subsidiary of the debtor company was not allowed to vote because to do so would amount to the debtor company voting in its own reorganization. The corporate relationship between Air Canada and CAIL can be distinguished from the parent and wholly owned subsidiary in Northland Properties Ltd.. Air Canada is not CAIL's parent and owns 10 percent of a numbered company which owns 82 percent of CAIL. Further, as noted above, the court in Northland Properties Ltd. apparently relied on the passage from Wellington Building Corp which indicated in that case the court was being asked to approve a plan as fair. Again, the basis on which Resurgence seeks to deprive Air Canada of its vote is really an issue of fairness.

Section 6(2)(2) of the Plan

[48] Resurgence wishes me to strike out Section 6(2)(2) of the plan, which essentially purports to provide a release by affected creditors of all claims based in whole or in part on any act, omission transaction, event or occurrence that took place prior to the effective date in any way relating to the debtor companies and subsidiaries, the C.C.A.A. proceeding or the plan against:

1. The debtor companies and its subsidiaries;
2. The directors, officers and employees;
3. The former directors, officers and employees of the debtor companies and its subsidiaries; or
4. The respective current and former professionals of the entities, including the Monitor, its counsel and its current officers and directors, et cetera. Resurgence submits that this provision constitutes a wholesale release of directors and others which is beyond that permitted by Section 5.1 of the C.C.A.A. CAIL and CAC submit that the proposed release was not intended to preclude rights expressly preserved by the statute and are prepared to amend the plan to state this.

[49] Section 5.1(3) of the C.C.A.A. provides that the court may declare that a claim against directors shall not be compromised if it is satisfied that the compromise would not be fair and reasonable in the circumstances.

[50] In this application of Resurgence, the court must deal with two issues: One, what releases are permitted under the statute; and, two, what releases ought to be permitted, if any, under the plan.

[51] In my view, I will be in a better position to assess the fairness of the proposed compromise of claims which is drafted in extremely broad terms, when I consider the other issues of fairness raised by Resurgence. Accordingly, I leave that matter to the fairness hearing as well.

[52] In summary, the application contained in paragraph (d) of the Resurgence Notice of Motion is dismissed. The application in paragraph (e) is adjourned to June 5, 2000.

B. Summary of Proposal

If appropriate, a brief summary of the proposal is to be made.

C. Financial Position and Causes of Difficulties

Comply with subsection 50(5) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act as to the appraisal and investigation of the affairs and property of the debtor to estimate with reasonable accuracy the debtor's financial situation and the causes of his or her difficulties.

Where the operations of the debtor's business are significant to the proposal, the status of these operations should be reported on, including whether they are to be continued or discontinued.

Advise the creditors as to the availability of the most recent financial statements and make comments if applicable. Such comments should include a brief synopsis of the general order of the financial statement(s) and what degree of reliance, if any, was placed upon the financial statement(s) by the trustee.

D. Interim Receiver

If an interim receiver has been appointed, the creditors should be advised as to any pertinent information arising from this appointment.

E. Identification and Evaluation of Assets

For the purpose of projecting the realization in a bankruptcy situation, attempt to evaluate the assets of the debtor by class and disclose the basis of evaluation. If such an evaluation has not been done, mention that such is the case and give the reasons for not evaluating the assets. Also, attempt to identify and report to creditors on any encumbrances against the said assets.

F. Conduct of the Debtor

Attempt, to the best of your ability, to identify any preferential payment, settlement or reviewable transaction that the debtor may have been a party to and report to the creditors. The trustee should also disclose the extent of the work performed in identifying these transactions. If no work has been done in this area, provide an explanation to the creditors.

Report to the creditors on any offences under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act that might have been noted.

G. Creditors' Claims

Report on the proofs of claim received and on material differences with the liabilities indicated on the Statement of Affairs, if any.

Bring to the attention of the creditors all claims in the estate involving parties related to the debtor as well as the nature of the review of the trustee to ascertain the validity of the transactions.

Indicate whether or not a legal opinion has been obtained on the validity of the securities if there are secured creditors.

H. Previous Business Dealings with the Debtor

State if the trustee or a firm with whom he or she is related:

ii) may be in a possible conflict of interest situation as a result of having provided these services.

Disclose all previous dealings with the debtor, including any remuneration received.

Information regarding previous meetings with major creditors may be provided to the other creditors.

J. Remuneration of Trustee

K. Other

Any other pertinent facts, such as legal proceedings or contract arrangements in which the debtor is involved, should be mentioned to the creditors as these could influence their decision.

L. Statement of Estimated Realization

A statement of estimated realization should be included in the report. The statement should show both scenarios (i.e. in the eventualities of accepting the proposal and of bankruptcy). The format is at the trustee's discretion; however, there should be as much disclosure as possible to indicate the amount that would be available for distribution to unsecured creditors.

M. Recommendations

It is the trustee's duty to inform the creditors in an objective and professional manner. The trustee must state whether or not, in his or her opinion, the proposal is to the advantage of the creditors. To this end, the trustee may take into account not only the terms of the proposal but also some other factors, such as the volume of business that the debtor could bring to the creditors in the future. If no recommendation is made in the report, the trustee must indicate the reasons for this situation

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Taxation — Income tax — Trust for moneys deducted — Employer defaulting on line of credit and financial institution exercising right of compensation on employer's term deposit pursuant to agreement — Deemed trust in favour of Crown over property of employer that has deducted income tax and employment insurance premiums at source — Crown seeking to collect amount due by employer for unremitted source deductions from proceeds of term deposit — Whether compensation agreement between financial institution and employer created "security interest" within meaning of s. 224(1.3) of Income Tax Act — Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), ss. 224(1.3) "security interest", 227(4.1).

On September 18, 2000, the Caisse granted Camvrac a line of credit up to $277,000. A week later, Camvrac deposited $200,000 with the Caisse in accordance with a "Term Savings Agreement". Under the agreement, the deposit was neither negotiable nor transferable. On the same day, the Caisse and Camvrac entered into a "Security Given Through Savings" agreement in which Camvrac agreed to maintain and permit the Caisse to retain the deposit of $200,000 for the duration of its indebtedness to the Caisse. It also agreed that, in the event it defaulted, there would be compensation between the credit agreement and the term deposit. Camvrac defaulted on the loan on November 25, 2000, and later made an assignment in bankruptcy. The Caisse noted on its copy of the "Term Savings Agreement": "To be closed on 21/2/2001 to realize on security". Since Camvrac had failed to remit to the Crown income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted at source, the Crown gave the Caisse notice to pay the amount owing to the Crown from the proceeds of the deposit. Section 227(4.1) of the Income Tax Act ("ITA") and s. 86(2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act ("EIA") create a deemed trust in favour of the Crown over property of the employer that has deducted income tax and employment insurance premiums at source. This trust applies to property of an employer and property held by any secured creditor of the employer that, but for its security interest, would be property of the employer. The property is impressed with the deemed trust at the time the unremitted amounts were deducted at source by the employer. The Caisse unsuccessfully challenged the recovery process. The prothonotary, the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal held that the Crown was entitled to recover the amounts due and the interest paid at the rate provided for in ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of the Federal Courts Act.

Held (LeBel and Deschamps JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, Fish, Charron and Rothstein JJ.: The agreement between the Caisse and Camvrac gave rise to a "security interest" for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA. Camvrac's property subject to the security interest is thus deemed to be held in trust for the Crown under s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA because Camvrac did not remit to the Crown income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted at source. [1] [2]

The definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) does not require that the agreement between the creditor and debtor take any particular form, nor is any particular form expressly excluded. So long as the creditor's interest in the debtor's property secures payment or performance of an obligation, there is a security interest within the meaning of this section. Parliament has chosen an expansive definition of security interest in s. 224(1.3) in order to enable maximum recovery by the Crown under its deemed trust for unremitted income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted at source by employers. It is open to Parliament to define a term in an area of its own legislative competence in order to ensure that there is a rule of general application across all of the provinces. [12] [14] [15]

Whether a contract providing for a right to compensation (in Quebec) or a right to set-off (in the common law provinces) also gives rise to a security interest within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) requires that the terms of the contract be carefully considered to determine whether the parties intended to confer on one party an interest in the property of the other party that secures payment or performance of an obligation. If the substance of the agreement demonstrates that the parties intended an interest in property to secure an indebtedness, then a security interest exists within the meaning of s. 224(1.3). In this case, it was the five-year term and the maintenance and retention of the $200,000 deposit, as well as Camvrac's agreement not to transfer or negotiate the deposit and that the deposit could only be used as security with the Caisse, that created the Caisse's interest in Camvrac's property for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA. In the absence of these encumbrances on Camvrac's deposit, Camvrac could have withdrawn the deposit at any time. Should it have done so and still been indebted to the Caisse, the Caisse's right to compensation would be ineffective because it would not be indebted to Camvrac at the time the Caisse had to resort to the remedy of compensation. [23] [25] [30]

The Caisse is liable to pay to the Crown the amounts for employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted at source by Camvrac up to, and including, any deductions not remitted as of February 21, 2001 — the date on which the Caisse realized on its security. The trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA is deemed to be in effect at any time. It does not matter that the term deposit became the property of Camvrac only after some of the employment insurance premiums and income tax deductions went unremitted since the deemed trust encompasses property which comes into the hands of the tax debtor after the trust arises. The proceeds of Camvrac's term deposit are therefore available to the Crown to discharge all of the outstanding employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted at source by Camvrac, whether the unremitted deductions occurred before or after Camvrac entered into the "Term Savings Agreement" and until February 21, 2001. Interest is calculated in accordance with ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of the Federal Courts Act from February 21, 2001, when the Caisse effected compensation, to the date of payment. [59] [61] [63]

Per LeBel and Deschamps JJ. (dissenting): Compensation is not a "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA. For the purposes of s. 224(1.3), it is not enough that compensation offers protection similar to that of a security interest: it must also confer a real right. To limit the concept of security interest in s. 224(1.3) to rights that are real in nature is consistent both with the shared meaning of the terms ("security interest" and "garantie") used in the two versions of the provision and with Parliament's purpose of giving the deemed trust priority over the security interests referred to in s. 224(1.3). This deemed trust was created to ensure that employers remit income tax deducted from their employees' salaries to the Receiver General for Canada. [65] [98] [101]

Although compensation can be likened to a security interest, it cannot be equated with one in the sense that the term "security interest" must be given in the context of s. 224(1.3) ITA. Where compensation may be effected between two debts, the effect is clearly analogous to that of a "security interest" in the broad sense of the term; nevertheless, compensation or set-off is not regarded, in the positive law of either Quebec or the common law provinces, as having the characteristics of a real right. The automatic extinction of mutual debts is an effect of compensation, but it does not constitute the enforcement of a real right in the property in question. Furthermore, a conclusion that compensation is a "security interest" as that term is defined in the federal statute would conflict with the meaning given to the term in provincial personal property security statutes, which exclude set-off. Such an interpretation would also be inconsistent with the common law concept of "set-off", on which numerous business transactions are based. Finally, whether considered in isolation or as a whole, the term for repayment of the deposit amount, the obligation to maintain, the right to withhold and the limits on the right to transfer, hypothecate or negotiate the deposit created only personal obligations. [102] [107] [122] [132]

Insofar as the amounts had not been deducted at the time the agreement was entered into, the Caisse's right to conventional compensation may be set up against Her Majesty because Her Majesty cannot have more rights than Camvrac itself had. In Quebec civil law, as at common law, the rule for asserting contractual rights against third-party assignees is based on the general principles governing obligations. The right to conventional compensation is assessed as of the time the right is granted, not as of the time it is exercised. The protection of third parties, codified in art. 1681 C.C.Q., applies to rights acquired before the compensation agreement was signed. Thus, where the trust applies to a claim, it attaches to a legal relationship that corresponds to an active contractual situation, which explains why the beneficiary of the trust may assert only those rights held by the tax debtor. When Parliament wished to give the deemed trust more teeth, it took care to give Her Majesty priority over secured creditors. It did not alter the general rules governing the rights a debtor can assert against its original creditor. [65] [147] [148] [150] [152]

Camvrac's right to recover its claim was subject to the right to compensation that had been granted to the Caisse in September 2000 in the agreement to give savings as security. In the context of that agreement, the right to compensation was a right held by the Caisse that could not be negated solely by the fact of the deemed trust becoming effective. Her Majesty, as a third party, could not demand that the Caisse discharge its debt to Camvrac if the conditions for repayment had not been met. The Caisse's right had to be respected by third parties who acquired rights after the agreement was signed. Consequently, Her Majesty must abide by the compensation agreement, given that her right is subsequent to it. [153]

Her Majesty may, however, claim from the Caisse the amount owed by Camvrac before the compensation agreement was signed in September 2000. The claims of the Caisse and Camvrac have distinct sources: one is based on the variable credit contract, the other, on the term savings agreement. The Caisse's claim against Camvrac dates from September 18, 2000 and Camvrac's claim, from September 25, 2000. On the latter date, Camvrac undertook, first in the term savings agreement, "to make, on the date of acquisition, a deposit in the amount of $200,000", and then in the agreement to give savings as security, to "maintain" a deposit in the amount of $200,000. For Camvrac to be able to undertake in the agreement to give savings as security to "maintain" the deposited amount, its claim resulting from the term savings agreement had to take on an independent existence, if only at the time the deposit was made. Given that the deposit was made before the right to compensation was granted, the deemed trust could have become effective in respect of Camvrac's claim up to the total of the amounts owed to Her Majesty as of September 25, 2000. This is not a case in which the respective debts have the same source and the claim is subject to a right to compensation. Just as Her Majesty's rights are subordinated to the right to compensation for deductions subsequent to the signing of the agreement, the Caisse's right must give way to Her Majesty's pre-existing right. [154] [156]

On the interest issue, there is no need to vary the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal. [157]

[1] ROTHSTEIN J. — The primary issue in this appeal is whether the agreements between the Caisse populaire ("Caisse") and its customer, Camvrac Enterprises Inc. ("Camvrac"), give rise to a "security interest" within the meaning of that term in s. 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"). The definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA has also been incorporated by reference in s. 86(2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23 ("EIA"). If the agreements between the Caisse and Camvrac do fall within the definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA, then the property of Camvrac that is subject to the security interest of the Caisse is deemed to be held in trust for the Crown under s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA because Camvrac did not remit to the Crown income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted at source by Camvrac.

[2] In my view, the agreements between the Caisse and Camvrac gave rise to a "security interest" for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA. Camvrac's property subject to the security interest was property that was subject to the Crown's deemed trust. I would dismiss the appeal.

I. Facts

[3] On September 18, 2000, the Caisse granted Camvrac a line of credit up to $277,000. On September 25, 2000, Camvrac deposited $200,000 with the Caisse in accordance with a "Term Savings Agreement" providing that the deposit would mature on October 16, 2005. The "Term Savings Agreement" sets out the terms of Camvrac's entitlement to the deposit and the Caisse's obligation to pay Camvrac $200,000. The relevant portions of the "Term Savings Agreement" stated:

[TRANSLATION]

Date of maturity: October 16, 2005

PROVISIONS GOVERNING THE PRINCIPAL

2. The member [Camvrac] agrees to make, on the date of acquisition, a deposit in the amount of $200,000 (hereinafter referred to as the "initial amount of deposit").
3. On the date of issue associated with the applicable term ("date of issue"), the initial amount of deposit and the interest then accrued on that amount shall be reinvested in the form of a deposit maturing on the maturity date associated with the applicable term ("date of maturity").
4. This deposit may neither be negotiated nor transferred. No amount in principal or interest shall be redeemable or payable before the date of maturity.
5. This deposit may be hypothecated or given as security only in favor of the issuing Caisse.

[4] The Caisse and Camvrac also entered into a "Security Given Through Savings" agreement. The most relevant terms read:

[TRANSLATION]

1. RIGHT TO WITHHOLDING AND COMPENSATION

To secure the repayment of any sum in principal, interest, costs and accessories owed or to be owed the Caisse by:

: the Depositor [Camvrac]

under:

: (a) a line of credit agreement in the amount of $277,000.00 granted to him (her) on 2000-09-18;

: and under any debts or obligations, present or future, direct or indirect held by:

: the Depositor

(hereinafter referred to as "the Credit Contract[s]")

the Depositor undertakes to maintain and consents to the withholding by the Caisse, in the account(s) or on the certificate(s) of deposit mentioned below, of the amount of $200,000.00 distributed as follows:

Account or certificate of deposit identification (for deposit certificates, state date issued amount and certificate number)	Sum withheld by the Caisse
ALTERNATIVE TERM SAVINGS 5 YEARS IN THE AMOUNT OF $200,000.00	$200,000.00

The Caisse may withhold the sums shown above, . . . as long as all the amounts due under the Credit Contract(s) have not been fully repaid and, in the case of a line of credit, as long as it has not been cancelled. In cases of default as provided for below, there shall be compensation between the Credit Contract(s) and the certificate(s) of deposit or the amounts deposited defined above, as provided for in Section 7.

2. SAFEKEEPING OF CERTIFICATES

For the whole term of this agreement, the above-mentioned certificate(s) of deposit shall be kept by the Caisse.

3. HYPOTHEC

To further secure the repayment of any sum owed or to be owed under the Credit Contract(s), the Depositor hypothecates and pledges the above-mentioned certificate(s) of deposit and sums deposited, for an amount equal to the total amount of the sums withheld. The parties also agree that the clause shown on the certificate(s) of deposit stipulating that such certificate(s) are neither negotiable nor transferable shall be deemed cancelled, effective from the date of these presents.

7. DEFAULT

The Depositor shall be in default in any of the following cases:

(a) if any of the commitments under the Credit Contract(s) or these presents is not fulfilled;

(b) if the Depositor or the Borrower becomes insolvent or goes bankrupt, or if he(she) makes a proposal and it is rejected or annulled;

In the event of any default:

(a) any sums owing under the Credit Contracts shall immediately become payable;

(b) the Caisse may use the sums deposited or the certificate(s) of deposit contemplated herein, regardless of its(their) having matured or not, to compensate its claim under the Credit Contract(s);

The consequences of a default are for the exclusive benefit of the Caisse and the latter may waive them expressedly. The Caisse may, among others, without any prejudice to its rights, wait for the maturity date of the certificate(s) of deposit before exercising its rights as provided for in paragraphs (b) and (c) above.

8. RESERVE OF RECOURSES

. . . Furthermore, failure by the Caisse to avail itself of any of its rights in case of default shall not be interpreted as a waiver of such rights.

[5] Camvrac failed to pay the interest on its line of credit on November 25, 2000 and so was technically in default on that date. However, the Caisse took no steps as a result of the default and, according to the Caisse's account summaries, Camvrac's line of credit continued to accrue interest until January 31, 2001. On February 7, 2001, Camvrac made an assignment in bankruptcy. On February 21, 2001, the Caisse made the following note on its copy of the "Term Savings Agreement" : [TRANSLATION] "To be closed on 21/2/2001 to realize on security." Finally, on June 12, 2001, the Crown gave the Caisse notice to pay the amount owing to the Crown for unremitted employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted at source by Camvrac from the proceeds of the term deposit the Crown said was subject to its deemed trust.

[6] Prothonotary Tabib of the Federal Court, Justice Pinard of the Federal Court, and Justice Létourneau writing for the Federal Court of Appeal found in favour of the Crown: 2005 FC 731, 2006 D.T.C. 6385, aff'd 2005 FC 1563, 2007 D.T.C. 5664, aff'd 2006 FCA 366, 361 N.R. 77. The Caisse now appeals to this Court.

II. The Primary Issue

[7] Under the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement, the Caisse was entitled to effect compensation to reduce or eliminate Camvrac's indebtedness to it if Camvrac defaulted on its line of credit. The Caisse did so. The issue is whether the Crown is the beneficial owner of Camvrac's term deposit to the extent of the unremitted employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted by Camvrac at source as a result of the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA.

III. Analysis

A. The Definition of "Security Interest" in Section 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act

[8] Parliament has defined "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA. This definition provides that:

> "security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a debenture, mortgage, hypothec, lien, pledge, charge, deemed or actual trust, assignment or encumbrance of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for;

[9] Section 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA create a deemed trust in favour of the Crown over property of the employer that has deducted income tax and employment insurance premiums at source. The deemed trust applies to property of the employer and property held by any secured creditor of the employer that, but for its security interest, would be property of the employer. The property is impressed with the deemed trust at the time the unremitted amounts were deducted at source by the employer. Section 227(4.1) ITA provides:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (except sections 81.1 and 81.2 of that Act), any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any other law, where at any time an amount deemed by subsection (4) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not paid to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) of that person that but for a security interest (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust is deemed
> (a) to be held, from the time the amount was deducted or withheld by the person, separate and apart from the property of the person, in trust for Her Majesty whether or not the property is subject to such a security interest, and
> (b) to form no part of the estate or property of the person from the time the amount was so deducted or withheld, whether or not the property has in fact been kept separate and apart from the estate or property of the person and whether or not the property is subject to such a security interest > and is property beneficially owned by Her Majesty notwithstanding any security interest in such property and in the proceeds thereof, and the proceeds of such property shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all such security interests.

Section 86(2.1) EIA is to the same effect with respect to employment insurance premiums deducted by employers at source.

[10] While the definition of "security interest" is similar to legal terminology used in the personal property security and other legislation of the provinces, the definition in s. 224(1.3) ITA is the only relevant definition of "security interest" for the purposes of s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA. Both s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA, which incorporate by reference the definition of "security interest" from s. 224(1.3) ITA, apply

> [n]otwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (except sections 81.1 and 81.2 of that Act), any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any other law . . . [s. 227(4.1) ITA]

Digitized by Google

> [n]otwithstanding the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (except sections 81.1 and 81.2 of that Act), any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any other law . . . . [s. 86(2.1) EIA]

This is a clear indication that the scope of the deemed trust created by these provisions over property of the tax debtor is to be defined in terms of the statutory definition of "security interest" provided by Parliament in s. 224(1.3) ITA and not as the term security interest may be used in provincial legislation.

[11] As Binnie J. recently noted in Saulnier v. Royal Bank of Canada, 2008 SCC 58, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 166, at para. 16, "[f]or particular purposes Parliament can and does create its own lexicon." Parliament's authority to define terms without reference to provincial law in areas of federal legislative competency was considered with respect to bankruptcy in Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453. Gonthier J. held for the majority, at para. 32, that > the definition of terms such as "secured creditor", if defined under the Bankruptcy Act, must be interpreted in bankruptcy cases as defined by the federal Parliament, not the provincial legislatures. Provinces cannot affect how such terms are defined for purposes of the Bankruptcy Act.

[12] It is therefore open to Parliament to define a term in an area of its own legislative competence (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 91(2A) "Unemployment Insurance" and s. 91(3) "The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation"), as it has done here, in order to ensure that there is a rule of general application across all of the provinces. Were provincial law used to define the meaning of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA and, in turn, the scope of the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA, uniformity could not be achieved. Rather, what constituted a "security interest" for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA could be different from province to province. The Minister's ability to recover unremitted source deductions would then vary depending on an employer's location.

[13] Further, if provincial law were used to define the meaning of a "security interest" under s. 224(1.3) ITA, a change in the provincial law of property security would affect the scope of the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA from time to time. This level of uncertainty cannot have been what Parliament intended with the words "any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation" in s. 224(1.3) ITA. This definition is incorporated by reference in s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA which create the deemed trust in favour of the Crown "[n]otwithstanding . . . any enactment of a province".

[14] In this case, Parliament has chosen an expansive definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA in order to enable maximum recovery by the Crown under its deemed trust for unremitted income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted at source by employers. Parliament did so, in part, in response to this Court's decision in Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 411, which interpreted the former deemed trust provisions in the ITA narrowly.

[15] In order to constitute a security interest for the purposes of s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA, the creditor must hold "any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation". The definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA does not require that the agreement between the creditor and debtor take any particular form, nor is any particular form expressly excluded. So long as the creditor's interest in the debtor's property secures payment or performance of an obligation, there is a "security interest" within the meaning of this section. While Parliament has provided a list of "included" examples, these examples do not diminish the broad scope of the words "any interest in property": see Dagg v. Canada (Minister of Finance), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 403, at para. 68, and R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (5th ed. 2008), at pp. 61-68.

[16] I agree with my colleague that the common linguistic meaning of the defined term "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA is the English term "security interest". A "security interest" is defined as any interest in property or "droit sur un bien" (right over property) that secures the performance of an obligation.

[17] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA applies to the facts before this Court.

B. The Relationship Between Contractual Compensation or Set-Off and a Security Interest

[18] Compensation and set-off are terms of art which I do not purport to define exhaustively in these reasons. Compensation in Quebec is similar to set-off in the common law provinces. There are a number of circumstances giving rise to compensation or set-off. There are also different kinds of compensation and set-off. "Legal compensation" is defined in arts. 1672 ff. of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 ("C.C.Q."). Articles 1672 and 1673 state in part that:

> 1672. Where two persons are reciprocally debtor and creditor of each other, the debts for which they are liable are extinguished by compensation, up to the amount of the lesser debt.

> 1673. Compensation is effected by operation of law upon the coexistence of debts that are certain, liquid and exigible and the object of both of which is a sum of money or a certain quantity of fungible property identical in kind.

[19] In the common law provinces, "legal set-off" is similarly statutorily defined. In the Ontario Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, for example, "legal set-off" is defined in s. 111:

> 111. — (1) In an action for payment of a debt, the defendant may, by way of defence, claim the right to set off against the plaintiff's claim a debt owed by the plaintiff to the defendant.
> (3) Where, on a defence of set off, a larger sum is found to be due from the plaintiff to the defendant than is found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to judgment for the balance.

[20] "Equitable set-off" was compared and contrasted with legal set-off by Wilson J. in Holt v. Telford, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 193. Wilson J. said of equitable set-off, at pp. 205-6:

> The distinction between set-off at law and set-off in equity was canvassed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in C.I.B.C. v. Tuckerr Indust. Inc., supra, at p. 605:
> Such a set-off has its origin in equity and does not rest on the statute of 1728. It can apply where mutuality is lost or never existed. It can apply where the cross obligations are not debts.

Equitable set-off, like legal set-off, is also raised by way of cross-claim (see Holt, at pp. 212-13).

[21] There may be some differences between legal compensation (in Quebec) and legal and equitable set-off (in the common law provinces). However, the differences between legal compensation and legal and equitable set-off do not arise in this case because this Court is considering a right to compensation conferred on the Caisse by a contract between the Caisse and Camvrac (i.e. the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement). The Caisse and my colleague use the term "compensation conventionnelle". I translate "compensation conventionnelle" as "contractual compensation".

[22] Contractual compensation achieves a similar goal to legal compensation or legal or equitable set-off, the discharge of mutual debts. However, contractual compensation achieves this goal through mutual consent. It provides the contracting parties with a self-help remedy that avoids the technical requirements of legal compensation or legal or equitable set-off : see J.-L. Baudouin and P.-G. Jobin, Les obligations (5th ed. 1998), at para. 981, and K. R. Palmer, The Law of Set-Off in Canada (1993), at pp. 263-64. Both a contract providing for a right of compensation in Quebec and a contract providing for a right of set-off in the common law provinces are to be interpreted by a court in a manner that gives effect to the intentions of the parties as reflected in the words of the contract.

[23] I do not think it is correct to make a blanket determination that a contractual right to compensation or a contractual right to set-off can never be associated with a "security interest" or that they are always associated with a "security interest". Whether a contract providing for a right to compensation or a right to set-off also gives rise to a "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA requires that the terms of the contract be carefully considered to determine whether the parties intended to confer on one party or the other "any interest in property [of the other party] that secures payment or performance of an obligation".

[24] In The Law of Set-Off (3rd ed. 2003), Professor S. R. Derham argues, I think persuasively, that some contracts including a right of set-off (or, in this case, contracts including a right of compensation) should be said also to involve security. As an example of a set-off agreement that also contains a security interest, Professor Derham describes a situation very similar to the one before this Court in the following words, at para. 16.82:

> . . . a bank as a condition to the grant of a facility requires that a deposit be made with it which the depositor is not permitted to access until all indebtedness under the facility has been paid, and the parties agree that the bank may appropriate the deposit in discharge of the debt in the event of default in payment. The essence of the arrangement is that the depositor's property, in the form of the account in credit, is to function as a security. Indeed, in the case of a charge-back in which express words of charge are used, a contractual set-off is the very remedy that would be contemplated . . . . [Emphasis added.]

[25] The essence of contractual compensation or set-off is that the terms of the contract reflect the mutual intention of the parties: see Derham, at para. 16.86. If their mutual intention is to create a security interest to ensure that the right of compensation or set-off will be an effective remedy, there is no reason to think that a security interest does not exist simply because the parties have chosen one mechanism for realizing on the security, rather than another. What must be considered is the substance of the agreement. If the substance of the agreement demonstrates that the parties intended an interest in property to secure an indebtedness, then a security interest exists within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA.

C. Application of the Deemed Trust Provisions

[26] In this case, the Caisse says that its contractual right to effect compensation with Camvrac is not a "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA. It says that this contractual right did not confer on it an interest in Camvrac's property with the intention of securing the line of credit that it extended to Camvrac. Rather, the Caisse says that the contractual right allowed it simply to extinguish its own indebtedness to Camvrac.

[27] The Crown submits that the definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA is broad enough to include the Caisse's contractual right to effect compensation contained in the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement between the Caisse and Camvrac. It says that the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA protected its interest in the proceeds of Camvrac's term deposit because the property of Camvrac subject to the Caisse's security interest is beneficially owned by the Crown under its deemed trust to the extent of the unremitted source deductions.

[28] The issue then is whether the Caisse and Camvrac intended the agreements, which included the Caisse's right to effect compensation, to create a "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA. In my view, they did.

[29] The relevant facts are these. Camvrac made a deposit of $200,000 with the Caisse. Camvrac and the Caisse entered into a "Term Savings Agreement" under which Camvrac and the Caisse agreed that:

(a) Camvrac's deposit would be for a term of five years;
(b) Camvrac could not negotiate or transfer the deposit;
(c) the term deposit could be hypothecated or given as security, but only in favour of the Caisse.

Camvrac and the Caisse also agreed to enter into the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement. Under this agreement, Camvrac and the Caisse agreed that:

(a) "To secure repayment of any sum . . . owed or to be owed the Caisse" by Camvrac under its line of credit that:
    (i) Camvrac would maintain a deposit of $200,000;
    (ii) Camvrac consented to the Caisse withholding repayment of the sum of $200,000;
    as long as the line of credit was still outstanding.
(b) In the event of default, there would be compensation between the line of credit and the deposit of $200,000.

These agreements expressly conferred on the Caisse an interest in the property of Camvrac (i.e. Camvrac's deposit) to secure repayment of Camvrac's indebtedness to the Caisse.

[30] It was the five-year term and the maintenance and retention of the $200,000 deposit, as well as Camvrac's agreement not to transfer or negotiate the deposit and that the deposit could only be used as security with the Caisse, that created the Caisse's interest in Camvrac's property for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA. In the absence of these encumbrances on Camvrac's deposit, Camvrac could have withdrawn the deposit at any time. Should it have done so and still been indebted to the Caisse, the Caisse's right to compensation would be ineffective because it would not be indebted to Camvrac at the time the Caisse had to resort to the remedy of compensation. However, in this case the terms of the agreements provided that Camvrac agreed to the encumbrances on its deposit of $200,000 so that the Caisse would continuously be indebted to Camvrac and that on default there would be effective compensation. It is the fact that the agreements secured the Caisse's right to effective compensation by conferring on the Caisse an interest in Camvrac's property that created a "security interest" for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA.

[31] I note here, from the words of the agreements, that the Caisse itself conceived of its agreements with Camvrac as creating "security" for the line of credit. The "Term Savings Agreement" provided that the term deposit "may be hypothecated or given as security only in favor of the issuing Caisse" (emphasis added). In the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement, it was Camvrac's term deposit which was used "[t]o secure the repayment" of the line of credit (emphasis added). The hypothecation provision contained in the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement was "[t]o further secure the repayment" (emphasis added). Thus, even in the absence of hypothecation, the agreements granted the Caisse rights over Camvrac's deposit to ensure an effective compensation remedy. The rights and obligations ensuring an effective compensation remedy were the Caisse's primary security because the hypothecation was viewed as "further" security.

[32] While the mechanism by which the Caisse would realize on its security was compensation, that mechanism in no way detracts from the fact that the deposit was encumbered by the conditions agreed to by Camvrac and imposed by the Caisse in order to ensure that the remedy of compensation would be effective. Nor does the fact that the Caisse could realize on its security by means of a book entry diminish the fact that the deposit secured Camvrac's obligation to the Caisse. In the absence of the restrictions imposed by the Caisse, Camvrac's right to repayment of its deposit of $200,000 could have been encumbered or transferred to a third party as security: see arts. 1637 and 2710 C.C.Q. and B. Crawford, The Law of Banking and Payment in Canada (loose-leaf), vol. 2, at § 9:30.20. Just because a creditor holding a security interest (the Caisse) is also the debtor (the Caisse owes the $200,000 deposited by Camvrac to Camvrac) does not make it any less of a security interest for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA.

[33] The situation in this case is in contrast to one in which a bank has what may be a standard term in a deposit agreement that any credit in the customer's account may be appropriated by the bank in discharge of the customer's potential indebtedness to the bank. In that case, there is no obligation on the customer to maintain a specific sum or, indeed, any amount deposited in the account at all as security for a loan that may or may not exist. There is no continuous right in the customer's property to protect the bank against default. The customer may withdraw any or all of the amounts in the account at any time. No specific property secures repayment. In these circumstances, based on this type of deposit agreement, the customer's property — its right to claim a deposit — cannot be said to secure its indebtedness to the bank. Unlike the case before this Court, this is a simple contractual right to set-off or compensation without attendant security.

D. Responses to Deschamps J.

[34] In my view, the difference in the results reached by Deschamps J. and myself in this case stems from the approaches we have taken. If I understand my colleague's approach correctly, she focusses on the remedy of compensation to conclude it is not a security interest. Under my approach, it is necessary to consider all of the relevant terms of the agreements between Camvrac and the Caisse and not solely the provisions entitling the Caisse to the remedy of compensation. In my view, the issue is not whether compensation alone is viewed as a security interest. It is whether the agreements between the parties — including the Caisse's contractual right to effect compensation — created a "security interest" to ensure that the remedy of compensation would be effective.

[35] Deschamps J. says that a creditor with a right to effect compensation or set-off attains a goal analogous to a security interest. However, in her view, creditors who exercise their right to compensation or set-off are not enforcing a security by realizing on the debtor's property, but are instead just extinguishing mutual obligations.

[36] I agree with her that compensation or set-off is the extinguishment of mutual obligations. However, mutual obligations must exist for compensation to be an effective remedy. If a debtor can, at its own option, eliminate the creditor's liability to it (by withdrawing its deposit), the creditor may have a right of compensation or set-off, but it may not be effective. It is the encumbrances placed on the debtor's claim against the creditor that ensure that the creditor will remain liable to the debtor and, in this way, ensure an effective compensation remedy.

[37] Deschamps J. also notes that compensation is not specifically enumerated in s. 224(1.3) ITA and that this is important for two reasons. First, she relies on academic authorities who assert that a contractual right to set-off cannot create a security interest because the right does not confer on the creditor an interest in the debtor's property. Second, she says that compensation would have to be specifically enumerated in s. 224(1.3) ITA because compensation and set-off are not included in the provincial statutes respecting personal property security. Legal compensation is not included in the division relating to hypothecs in the Civil Code of Québec. She also says that set-off is excluded from the personal property security legislation of the common law provinces which all include definitions of security interest that are similar to that in s. 224(1.3) ITA. In light of the exclusion of contractual compensation and contractual set-off from provincial legislation dealing with security interests over property and the fact that contractual compensation does not confer on the creditor an interest in the debtor's property, its absence from the list of examples of security interests provided in s. 224(1.3) ITA is evidence that Parliament did not intend to include contractual compensation or contractual set-off within its definition of "security interest".

[38] With respect to my colleague's reliance on academic authorities who say that a contractual right to set-off does not confer on a creditor an interest in property, I understand these authorities differently than my colleague. Professor Derham explains that a contract containing a right to set-off like the one at issue in this case can also confer on a creditor an interest in a debtor's property: see Derham, at para. 16.82. However, the authors upon whom Deschamps J. relies do not address the precise issue before this Court. For example, R. C. C. Cuming, C. Walsh and R. J. Wood say, in Personal Property Security Law (2005):

> Set-off, whether contractual or procedural, does not involve a security interest because neither party to the set-off acquires a property interest. [p. 87]

And Professor R. M. Goode says, in Goode on Legal Problems of Credit and Security (4th ed. 2008):

> The party asserting it [the right of set-off] never acquires rights in the other's monetary claim at all; he merely asserts a countervailing claim which operates in pro tanto extinction of his monetary liability. [para. 1-19]

However, in this case, the Caisse has acquired rights in Camvrac's property by the encumbrances placed on Camvrac's deposit. Those rights ensured that Camvrac's claim against the Caisse for its deposit would continuously exist in order to ensure that the compensation remedy would be effective. The P. Wood quote relied upon by Deschamps J. states:

Digitized by Google

> [With respect to set-off] . . . a depositor does not grant a property right over the depositor's ownership of the deposit claim back to the bank to secure a loan owed by the depositor to the bank.
> (Set-Off and Netting, Derivatives, Clearing Systems (2nd ed. 2007), at para. 1-008)

Yet, in this case, Camvrac did grant the Caisse a continuous interest in its deposit.

[39] It appears these authors were considering a bare right to contractual set-off such as the standard form deposit agreement I have discussed above. I believe these authors are saying that the remedy of set-off results in no property of the debtor coming in the hands of the creditor as the result of a set-off. All that occurs is the extinguishment of mutual debts. These authors are not addressing the period of time before set-off takes place where, as in this case, the creditor has taken steps to place restrictions on the debtor's property to ensure that the creditor continuously remains liable to the debtor so that the set-off remedy will be effective.

[40] I agree with my colleague that legal compensation does not appear grouped with hypothecs in the Civil Code of Québec. However, the issue is not whether compensation is a security interest. The fact that the terms "contractual compensation" or "contractual set-off" do not specifically appear as examples of the defined term "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA does not mean that an agreement which provides for compensation, but which also conforms to the statutory definition of a "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA is to be exempted from the purview of this definition. The list is non-exhaustive. Even when the remedial mechanism is compensation, so long as an agreement confers on a creditor an interest in property that secures the payment or performance of an obligation through compensation, the agreement will constitute a "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA.

[41] Although it is unnecessary for me to decide this point in order to resolve the issues in this appeal, I would respectfully disagree with my colleague that any agreement that provides for contractual set-off is categorically excluded from the personal property security legislation of the common law provinces. In the common law provinces, the approach to personal property security arrangements is functional, rather than formal. For example, s. 3(1) of Alberta's Personal Property Security Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. P-7, states that it applies to

> (a) every transaction that in substance creates a security interest, without regard to its form and without regard to the person who has title to the collateral, and
> (b) without limiting the generality of clause (a), a chattel mortgage, conditional sale, floating charge, pledge, trust indenture, trust receipt, assignment, consignment, lease, trust and transfer of chattel paper where they secure payment or performance of an obligation.

See also the personal property security acts of the other provinces and territories: s. 3(1) in New Brunswick (S.N.B. 1993, c. P-7.1), Prince Edward Island (R.S.P.E.I. 1988, c. P-3.1), Manitoba (C.C.S.M., c. P35) and Saskatchewan (S.S. 1993, c. P-6.2); s. 2(1) in British Columbia (R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 359), Northwest Territories and Nunavut (both S.N.W.T. 1994, c. 8); s. 4(1) in Nova Scotia (S.N.S. 1995-96, c. 13) and Newfoundland and Labrador (S.N.L. 1998, c. P-7.1); s. 2(a) in Ontario (R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10); and s. 2 in Yukon (R.S.Y. 2002, c. 169).

[42] Given the functional approach to personal property security arrangements in these statutes, it is difficult for me to see how any transaction that confers an interest on a creditor in a debtor's property to secure an obligation could be categorically excluded unless that type of transaction has been defined and expressly excluded by the legislation itself. To my knowledge, an agreement that provides for security together with a right of set-off to realize on that security is not expressly excluded in any of the common law provincial personal property security statutes. What is required by the common law provincial personal property security statutes is a decision about whether a particular contract or agreement in a given case functions as a security interest.

[43] Deschamps J. says the Caisse did not rely on its hypothec. She says the mere obligation of Camvrac to maintain its deposit and the Caisse's right to withhold repayment of the deposit do not create the real right necessary for a "security interest". She distinguishes between "droit de rétention", which she says only applies to corporeal property and which has some of the attributes of a real right and a "droit de retenue", which applies to retention of amounts of money and which has no attributes of a real right and corresponds to compensation.

[44] At both civil and common law, a claim, like a deposit, may be charged with a real right or become the subject of a creditor's interest in property. For example, accounts receivable are often assigned to lending institutions as security for loans. Indeed, a deposit in a bank or caisse is an account receivable in favour of the customer. In the case of term deposits, in the absence of restrictions imposed by the lending institution, a term deposit may be assigned just like other receivables. An assignee has an interest in or a real right over the account receivable, that is an encumbrance on the claim of the creditor to the proceeds of the receivables whether from debtor customers or from a debtor bank or caisse.

[45] In s. 224(1.3) ITA, the word "interest" in English is rendered as "droit" or right in French. As Marc Cuerrier notes in "The Harmonization of Federal Tax Legislation" (section 2.3), booklet 7 published in The Harmonization of Federal Legislation with the Civil Law of the Province of Quebec and Canadian Bijuralism (2001), this terminological difference in the English and French reflects differences in the two major legal systems of Canada. While in the common law it is possible to speak independently of both rights and interests in property, only rights are recognized in the civil law. As Martin Lamoureux notes in his article "The Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Term Interest: An Interesting Case for Harmonization" published in The Harmonization of Federal Legislation with Quebec Civil Law and Canadian Bijuralism — Collection of Studies in Tax Law 2001 (2002), 7.1, the term "droit" in civil law corresponds most to the term "interest" in common law.

[46] In this case, the issue is not whether the Caisse's interest in or right over Camvrac's property is one that conforms with the property security legislation of the provinces. This is because the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA, which incorporate by reference the definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA, applies "[n]otwithstanding . . . any enactment of a province" (see also DaimlerChrysler Financial Services (debis) Canada Inc. v. Mega Pets Ltd., 2002 BCCA 242, 212 D.L.R. (4th) 41, at para. 31). However, it is of note that the agreements between the Caisse and Camvrac did conform to the requirements for a movable hypothec with delivery established by this Court in Caisse populaire Desjardins de Val-Brillant v. Blouin, 2003 SCC 31, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 666, so as to constitute a real right under the Civil Code of Québec.

[47] In the Civil Code of Québec, a hypothec is defined as a real right (art. 2660 C.C.Q.). As my colleague notes, a claim, like an account receivable, can be hypothecated with or without delivery (art. 2710 C.C.Q.). In Val-Brillant, Gonthier J., for the majority, considered what was necessary for a movable hypothec with delivery over a non-negotiable claim, like the one at issue in this case. He held at para. 28 that:

> A movable hypothec with delivery on a non-negotiable claim is therefore validly granted and published [per arts. 2702 and 2703 C.C.Q.] where (i) the debtor has transferred effective control of the claim to the creditor by giving the creditor the right to collect directly in the event of default, without further authorization by the debtor; (ii) where the claim is evidenced by a non-negotiable title which it is possible to hand over, such title has been handed over to the creditor; and (iii) the necessary steps have been taken so that the hypothec may be set up against the debtor of the claim in accordance with art. 1641 C.C.Q.

[48] In this case, the agreements between the Caisse and Camvrac met these criteria. First, the Caisse had effective control over Camvrac's claim. The five-year term and the conditions in the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement ensured that the Caisse had effective control over Camvrac's deposit and that, in the event of default, the Caisse could effect compensation between the line of credit and Camvrac's deposit without further authorization from Camvrac. Second, it is not clear on the record whether a certificate of deposit was or was not issued in this case. Both clause 2 of the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement and the fact that the Caisse noted on its copy of the "Term Savings Agreement" that it had been [TRANSLATION] "To be closed on 21/2/2001 to realize on security" suggest that, if a certificate of deposit was issued, it was held by the Caisse. However, nothing turns on whether Camvrac's term deposit was evidenced by a certificate of deposit. Gonthier J.'s second criteria for a movable hypothec with delivery over a non-negotiable claim only applies where a non-negotiable title exists. Where it does not, the second criteria is not applicable. Third, a movable hypothec with delivery is set up against the account debtor and all other claimants by taking the necessary steps under art. 1641 C.C.Q. Under art. 1641 C.C.Q., the assignment may be set up against the account debtor and other claimants as soon as the account debtor has acquiesced in it. In this case, in respect of Camvrac's deposit, the Caisse is the account debtor as well as the assignee. Obviously, the Caisse as account debtor acquiesced in the assignment of its debt to itself as assignee. In my view, because the agreements between the Caisse and Camvrac met the criteria of a movable hypothec with delivery on a non-negotiable claim and because a hypothec is defined as a real right in the Civil Code of Québec, the Caisse must have held a real right over Camvrac's property.

[49] As my colleague notes at para. 129, art. 2702 C.C.Q. has been amended and these amendments have come into force since this case was heard. It is not necessary to embark upon an interpretation of these amendments. However, what they point out is that, should provincial law form the basis for defining a "security interest" under s. 224(1.3) ITA, the scope of the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA could change from time to time with changes to provincial property security law. In my view, this result is not contemplated by the words of ss. 224(1.3) and 227(4.1) ITA, and s. 86(2.1) EIA.

[50] Deschamps J. says that Camvrac's obligation to maintain the deposit and the Caisse's right to withhold repayment "were of residual application" only (para. 120). During the term of the deposit, the Caisse was not required to return the deposit until the term had expired.

[51] Even if the obligation to maintain and the right to retain are residual and apply only after the five-year term of the deposit has expired, they are nonetheless encumbrances that could affect Camvrac's use of its property. Indeed, as Deschamps J. says, they are mechanisms provided "to ensure that legal or conventional compensation could be effected" (para. 120). That is precisely the point. The agreements entered into by Camvrac and the Caisse created rights and obligations, including the Caisse's right of retention and Camvrac's obligation to maintain the deposit, to ensure that the Caisse would remain liable to Camvrac if the Caisse had to resort to compensation as a remedy.

[52] Finally, Deschamps J. says that the Caisse's right of retention of Camvrac's $200,000 deposit does not confer on the Caisse a real right to Camvrac's term deposit. She says at para. 121:

> The most important thing to bear in mind is that none of the clauses . . . created a real right or [a] security interest . . . . A term is a deadline for repayment. The right to deduct is simply the right of a creditor not to perform an obligation to pay as long as a debt is owed to him or her. It is, in a way, an extension granted for repayment. As for the obligation to maintain, it is clearly an undertaking by one person to another to perform an obligation. The limit on the right to transfer, hypothecate or negotiate constitutes an obligation "not to do".

[53] She further says, at para. 124, that my approach may conflict with how negative pledges are treated under the functional approach to personal property security in the common law provinces. She quotes Professors Cuming, Walsh and Wood who say, at p. 86:

> A "negative pledge" clause or negative covenant in a loan agreement under which the borrower covenants not to encumber or dispose of some or all of her personal property until the loan is repaid does not create a security interest since, standing alone, the covenant does not create an interest in the property of the borrower. A negative pledge clause in a security agreement cannot prevent the covenantor from giving another effective security interest in the collateral. [Emphasis added.]

[54] I believe her paras. 121 and 124 highlight the difference between us. I would agree with my colleague that no security interest has been created if a contractual right to compensation only means that, should the debtor default, the creditor may retain amounts owed to the debtor, if any. I would also agree that a negative pledge "standing alone" does not "prevent the covenantor from giving another effective security interest in collateral".

[55] However, much more was occurring here. From the outset, the Caisse required that Camvrac make a term deposit subject to encumbrances in order to ensure that the Caisse would remain liable to Camvrac, in the event that the Caisse had to resort to the remedy of compensation as a result of default. The right of retention, the obligation to maintain and Camvrac's pledge not to hypothecate or use its term deposit as security in favour of anyone besides the Caisse were three of a series of encumbrances that created the Caisse's interest in or right over Camvrac's property to ensure that compensation would be an effective remedy.

E. To Which of the Unremitted Source Deductions Did the Deemed Trust Apply?

[56] Having concluded that the agreements between the Caisse and Camvrac created a "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA, it is now necessary to determine whether the deemed trust covered all unremitted source deductions that the Crown sought from the Caisse.

[57] On the facts of this case, some of the unremitted employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted was owed by Camvrac to the Crown before Camvrac entered into the "Term Savings Agreement" with the Caisse. There is some question, then, in this case, whether the deemed trust provisions in s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA can confer beneficial ownership on the Crown over Camvrac's after-acquired property (i.e. the term deposit).

[58] A second issue is at what point the Caisse realized on its security in the term deposit by effecting compensation. The Caisse says that the relevant date was the date of default, November 25, 2000. The Crown says that the relevant date was February 21, 2001. Under s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA, Camvrac's property is impressed with the Crown's deemed trust from the time income tax and employment insurance premiums were deducted at source by Camvrac. The date at which the Caisse effected compensation is important because unremitted employment insurance premiums and income tax were deducted by Camvrac until the end of January 2001. If the Caisse is correct, as of November 25, 2000 the Crown would have no entitlement to the proceeds of the term deposit for source deductions that were deducted after November 25, 2000 since the term deposit would no longer have been the property of Camvrac once compensation had been effected and could not be subject to the deemed trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA. If the Crown is correct, then the proceeds would be subject to the deemed trust for the full amount of the unremitted source deductions to February 21, 2001 (as the date when compensation was effected by the Caisse).

[59] With respect to whether the deemed trust provisions apply to after-acquired property, this Court interpreted s. 227(4.1) ITA broadly in First Vancouver Finance v. M.N.R., 2002 SCC 49, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 720, as applying to both property in the hands of the tax debtor and after-acquired property. In First Vancouver, Iacobucci J. held for the Court, at para. 38, that > based on the plain language of ss. 227(4) and 227(4.1) as supported by the purpose of the provisions and intentions of Parliament, the deemed trust created by these sections encompasses property which comes into the hands of the tax debtor after the trust arises.

Digitized by Google

The trust created by s. 227(4.1) ITA and s. 86(2.1) EIA is deemed to be in effect "at any time". It does not matter that the term deposit became the property of Camvrac only after some of the employment insurance premiums and income tax deductions went unremitted since the deemed trust "encompasses property which comes into the hands of the tax debtor after the trust arises". The proceeds of Camvrac's term deposit are therefore available to the Crown to discharge all of the outstanding employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted at source by Camvrac, whether the unremitted deductions occurred before or after Camvrac entered into the "Term Savings Agreement" and until the date that the Caisse realized on its security.

[60] As to the date on which the Caisse exercised its right to compensation, I agree with the Crown for two reasons. First, February 21, 2001 is the date on which the Caisse itself noted on its copy of the "Term Savings Agreement": [TRANSLATION] "To be closed on 21/2/2001 to realize on security." This is evidence that the Caisse believed that compensation was effected on that date and not earlier. Second, the Caisse, according to its account records, continued to charge interest on the line of credit until January 31, 2001 despite the fact that Camvrac had defaulted on November 25, 2000 by failing to make its interest payment to the Caisse due on that date. The "Security Given Through Savings" agreement stated that:

> . . .
> The consequences of a default are for the exclusive benefit of the Caisse and the latter may waive them expressedly. The Caisse may, among others, without any prejudice to its rights, wait for the maturity date of the certificate(s) of deposit before exercising its rights as provided for in paragraphs (b) and (c) above.
> . . . Furthermore, failure by the Caisse to avail itself of any of its rights in case of default shall not be interpreted as a waiver of such rights.

[61] These terms acknowledged that the Caisse had a discretion as to the timing of when compensation would be effected. The Caisse was entitled, as it did here, not to effect compensation immediately upon default, but instead could choose to allow the line of credit to remain open. This is what the Caisse did. It did not effect compensation until February 21, 2001. The Caisse is liable to pay to the Crown the amounts for employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted at source by Camvrac up to, and including, any deductions not remitted as of February 21, 2001.

F. Interest Calculation

[62] This issue may be disposed of quickly. The Caisse says that if it is liable to the Crown, the law of Quebec with respect to pre-judgment interest rather than ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, applies. I cannot agree with the Caisse. Markevich v. Canada, 2003 SCC 9, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94, is dispositive of the issue. Indebtedness under the ITA and EIA gives rise to a cause of action outside of a particular province and so the rules respecting pre-judgment interest in ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of the Federal Courts Act apply: see Markevich, at paras. 39-40. The cause of action was that of the Crown against the Caisse for unremitted source deductions pursuant to its deemed trust which arose because the Caisse appropriated funds belonging to Camvrac which were impressed with the Crown's deemed trust.

IV. Conclusion

[63] For these reasons, I find that the terms of the "Term Savings Agreement" and the "Security Given Through Savings" agreement between the Caisse and Camvrac created a "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) ITA. The Caisse was liable to the Crown for the unremitted employment insurance premiums and income tax deducted at source by Camvrac up to and including February 21, 2001. Interest is calculated in accordance with ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of the Federal Courts Act from February 21, 2001, when the Caisse effected compensation, to the date of payment.

English version of the reasons of LeBel and Deschamps JJ. delivered by [65] DESCHAMPS J. (dissenting) — The Court is once again being asked to consider the scope of the rights resulting from the deemed trust created by Parliament to ensure that employers remit income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted from their employees' salaries to the Receiver General for Canada. For the reasons that follow, I find that compensation is not a "security interest" within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"), and the Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23 ("EIA"), and that the appellant's contractual right may be set up against the respondent because the respondent cannot have more rights than the employer itself had. I would accordingly allow the appeal and remand the case to the trial judge to establish the amount of the deductions that had not been remitted at the time the compensation agreement was signed.

1. Issues

[66] The main issue in this appeal concerns the effect of the deemed trust provided for in the ITA and the EIA on assets subject to compensation under an agreement between the Caisse populaire Desjardins de Bon Conseil, to whose rights the appellant ("Caisse") has succeeded, and the employer, Camvrac Enterprises Inc. ("Camvrac"). The Caisse raises an additional issue related to the calculation of interest. It submits that as a result of ss. 36(1) and 37(1) of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, interest should have been calculated in accordance with the rule that applies in Quebec. The respondent contends that ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of that Act apply instead, because the cause of action arose outside Quebec. I will discuss the issue relating to the deemed trust first before turning to the interest issue.

2. Facts

[67] Between May 2000 and January 2001, Camvrac, an employer doing business in Quebec, failed to remit $26,863.53 in income tax and employment insurance premiums deducted from its employees' salaries to the Receiver General for Canada. Nothing in the evidence specifies the amount owed by Camvrac as of September 25, 2000, but according to the Federal Court prothonotary who heard the matter at trial, the unremitted deductions totalled $5,558.72 in October 2000.

[68] On September 18, 2000, the Caisse and Camvrac signed a variable credit contract under which the Caisse extended $277,000 in credit to Camvrac. A few days later, on September 25, 2000, two additional agreements were signed: a term savings agreement under which Camvrac deposited $200,000 in the Caisse for a term expiring on October 16, 2005, and an agreement to give savings as security for the repayment of any amount owed to the Caisse, in which Camvrac granted the Caisse a "right to withholding and compensation" and a hypothec. Only the right to compensation is in issue in this appeal: neither the hypothec nor the right to withhold was raised, enforced or exercised, or set up against the respondent. Although excerpts from the relevant clauses are also set out in the Appendix, I will reproduce one here that I will be discussing more specifically:

> [TRANSLATION]
> To secure the repayment of any sum in principal, interest, costs and accessories owed or to be owed the Caisse by the Depositor under a line of credit agreement in the amount of $277,000.00 granted to him (her) on 2000-09-18 and under any debts or obligations, present or future, direct or indirect held by the Depositor, the Depositor undertakes to maintain and consents to the withholding by the Caisse, in the account(s) . . . mentioned below, of the amount of $200,000.00 distributed as follows: . . . . Alternative term saving 5 years in the amount of $200,000.00 . . . .
> The Caisse may withhold the sums shown above, along with the interest from the certificates of deposit if applicable, as long as all the amounts due under the Credit Contract(s) have not been fully repaid and, in the case of a line of credit, as long as it has not been cancelled. In cases of default as provided for below, there shall be compensation between the Credit Contract(s) and the certificate(s) of deposit or the amounts deposited defined above, as provided for in Section 7.

[69] I note that the parties and the courts below have sometimes referred to the term deposit as a "certificate of deposit". In my opinion, as is indicated in the term savings agreement, it is simply a term deposit. But what it is called is of no consequence in light of the mechanisms that are at issue in this appeal.

[70] On November 25, 2000, Camvrac defaulted on the interest on the borrowed amount. On December 1, 2000, that interest was paid by means of a manual transfer of funds effected by the Caisse. A statement dated December 31, 2000, shows a debt of $277,000 owed by Camvrac to the Caisse; it also indicates that monthly interest on the total amount of the loan was charged to Camvrac. A savings and investment account statement dated January 31, 2001 shows a balance of $200,578 in respect of the deposit. On February 5, 2001, Camvrac made an assignment in bankruptcy. On its copy of the deposit agreement, the Caisse made the following note: [TRANSLATION] "To be closed on 21/2/2001 to realize on security."

[71] On June 12, 2001, the respondent required the Caisse to pay her $26,863.53 owed by Camvrac for payroll deductions. She submits that this amount was protected by the deemed trust resulting from provisions of the ITA and the EIA. The Caisse counters that the note made on the deposit agreement on February 21, 2001 was merely administrative in nature and that its debt to Camvrac was extinguished by compensation.

3. Judicial History

[72] Before a prothonotary of the Federal Court, the respondent argued that the deposited amount was property of Camvrac that was subject to the deemed trust, and that in enforcing its security interest on February 21, 2001, the Caisse had realized on that certificate and should have paid her the amount of the deductions Camvrac had failed to remit. The Caisse submitted that under the agreement with Camvrac, the mutual debts — its own and that of Camvrac — became exigible when Camvrac defaulted and that those debts had been extinguished by compensation. In the prothonotary's opinion, there was no doubt that the deposited amount was held as security, that in "cashing it in", the Caisse was enforcing a security interest, and that the deposited amount was subject to the deemed trust. She therefore held that "the value of the benefit conferred on the [Caisse] through the realization on its security interest in the certificate of deposit constitutes the proceeds from the certificate of deposit, and must be paid to the Receiver General" (2005 FC 731, 2006 D.T.C. 6385, at para. 22). According to the prothonotary, legal compensation could not be relied on, because the term of the deposit had not expired. She added that if the Caisse wanted to avail itself of its contracts with Camvrac, it had to manifest its intention to enforce them, which it did not do until February 21, 2001, by which time the respondent's right had priority. The prothonotary therefore ordered the Caisse to pay the amount claimed by the respondent. She awarded interest at the rate provided for in ss. 36(2) and 37(2) of the Federal Courts Act.

[73] The Federal Court upheld the prothonotary's judgment (2005 FC 1563, 2007 D.T.C. 5664). In response to the Caisse's argument that the prothonotary had failed to consider the forfeiture of the term clause in the term savings agreement, the court stated that although conventional compensation could have been effected under the terms of the contract before the expiry of the term of the deposit, the Caisse had not exercised its right to do so until February 21, 2001, by which time the deposit amount was subject to the deemed trust. The Federal Court rejected the Caisse's argument that compensation is not a security interest, relying instead on the French version of the definition of "security interest" (garantie) in s. 224(1.3) ITA to conclude that even if compensation were held to constitute a payment, it would be considered a "security interest" within the meaning of the ITA.

[74] The Federal Court of Appeal also concluded that the ITA's definition of "security interest" is sufficiently broad to include the Caisse's right to compensation in respect of Camvrac's deposit, and that the provisions concerning the deemed trust authorized the respondent to recover from the Caisse the amounts owed by Camvrac (2006 FCA 366, 361 N.R. 77). On the interest issue, the Court of Appeal relied on Markevich v. Canada, 2003 SCC 9, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94, and Canada (Attorney General) v. Caisse populaire d'Amos, 2004 FCA 92, 324 N.R. 31, and upheld the trial judgment.

4. Parties' Arguments Concerning the Deemed Trust

[75] The Caisse advances three arguments: (1) the courts below erred in finding that the mechanism it relies on is a security interest within the meaning of ss. 224(1.3) and 227(4.1); (2) compensation is not a mechanism for performing obligations; and (3) the time when the debt was extinguished does not depend on whether the compensation is characterized as legal or conventional, but in the alternative, if it must be characterized, it should instead be regarded as a contractual arrangement for compensation in the future. This last argument does not appear to have been raised as forcefully in the courts below, but the facts and legal concepts relied on remain the same.

[76] The respondent contends that the deemed trust creates an absolute priority and that, regardless of whether the compensation is conventional or legal or of whether compensation constitutes a security interest, the proceeds from the "cashing in" of the term deposit must be paid to her up to the amount of the source deductions owed by the employer.

[77] Because the courts below held that compensation constitutes a "security interest" as defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA, I will deal with this issue first. I will then consider whether the contractual right to compensation may be set up against the respondent.

5. "Security Interest" as Defined in Section 224(1.3) ITA

[78] Over ten years ago, Gonthier J. observed in Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 411, at para. 22, that a clash between conflicting legislative objectives had given rise to a competition of priorities between deemed trusts and consensual security interests. In 1998, Parliament enacted legislation to expand the scope of the deemed trust (S.C. 1998, c. 19, s. 226(1)) and give it priority over every "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3). In this context, it is important to clearly delineate the concept of "security interest" as defined in that provision.

[79] Although the provisions in issue in this appeal — ss. 224(1.3), 227(4) and 227(4.1) ITA and the corresponding provisions of the EIA — are reproduced in the Appendix, I will nevertheless reproduce the more relevant passages here for ease of reference. Section 224(1.3) ITA defines "security interest" for the purposes of the deemed trust. The English version of the definition reads as follows:

> "security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a debenture, mortgage, hypothec, lien, pledge, charge, deemed or actual trust, assignment or encumbrance of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for;

[80] The terminology used in the French version is different. On the one hand, the term "security interest" is rendered as "garantie". On the other hand, whereas the word "interest" is used in the English expression "interest in property", the word "droit" is used instead in the expression "droit sur un bien" in French:

> « garantie » Droit sur un bien qui garantit l'exécution d'une obligation, notamment un paiement. Sont en particulier des garanties les droits nés ou découlant de débentures, hypothèques, privilèges, > nantissements, sûretés, fiducies réputées ou réelles, cessions et charges, quelle qu'en soit la nature, de quelque façon ou à quelque date qu'elles soient créées, réputées exister ou prévues par ailleurs.

[81] The concept of "garantie" can vary in scope depending on the context. It is therefore important that the two versions be read together and that the meaning of the terms "security interest" and "garantie" be harmonized in the context of s. 224(1.3) ITA. It should be noted that there is no distinct federal common law: Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054, McNamara Construction (Western) Ltd. v. The Queen, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 654, and P. Denault, La recherche d'unité dans l'interprétation du droit privé fédéral (2008), at p. 38. Where the suppletive law must be applied to interpret a concept incorporated into a federal rule, the law of the province is the relevant source: Federal Law—Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1, S.C. 2001, c. 4, s. 8, amending the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21. As a result, absent an express provision to the contrary, federal legislation must be interpreted in a manner consistent with the concepts and institutions of the legal system of the province in which it is to be applied: A. Morel, "La rédaction de lois bilingues harmonisées avec le droit civil", in The Harmonization of Federal Legislation with Quebec Civil Law and Canadian Bijuralism — Collection of studies (1997), 309, at p. 313.

[82] Furthermore, not only must reference be made — when necessary to interpret federal legislation — to the law of the province in which it is to be applied, but both the English and French versions must be taken into consideration: M. Bastarache et al., The Law of Bilingual Interpretation (2008), at pp. 42 et seq. I will begin by analysing the English and French versions to determine whether a shared meaning can be established. In the case at bar, this analysis leads to a notion common to the civil law and the common law that makes it possible to harmonize the application of the taxing provision in the two legal systems.

[83] Given that the terms "security interest" in the English version and "garantie" in the French version may not have the same scope, it will be necessary to establish the shared meaning of the English and French versions by applying the principles of bilingual interpretation recently reiterated in R. v. S.A.C., 2008 SCC 47, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 675, at paras. 14-16 (see also Bastarache et al. and P.-A. Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (3rd ed. 2000), at p. 327).

[84] There are two steps to this analysis: identifying the shared meaning and establishing Parliament's intent. At the first step, there are three possibilities (S.A.C., at para. 15):

> First, the English and French versions may be irreconcilable. . . . Second, one version may be ambiguous while the other is plain and unequivocal. The shared meaning will then be that of the version that is plain and unambiguous: Daoust, at para. 28; Côté, at p. 327. Third, one version may have a broader meaning than the other. According to LeBel J. in Schreiber, at para. 56, "where one of the two versions is broader than the other, the common meaning would favour the more restricted or limited meaning".

[85] The first possibility can be ruled out: the two versions are not irreconcilable. In English, the expression "security interest" has a well-established meaning, whereas the French word "garantie" is more general. While every security interest is necessarily a garantie, the opposite is not necessarily true. For example, a personal surety provides a garantie but does not establish a security interest in his or her property. The English term is therefore more specific than the French. However, in light of the broad scope of the "security interest" concept, I do not consider it appropriate to say that the English version is "narrow" and the French version broad. If a choice had to be made between the second and third categories, therefore, the question would have to be placed in the second, that of the unequivocal version/ambiguous version. Here, this choice does not change the outcome, since in either case the shared meaning is that of the term used in the English version: "security interest".

[86] At the second step in the interpretation of bilingual statutes, it must be determined whether the shared meaning of the two versions is consistent with Parliament's intent (S.A.C., at para. 16). It is clear that the successive amendments to the ITA and the EIA in respect of the deemed trust were intended to give enhanced protection to the tax creditor. Beyond this immediate objective, however, I cannot conclude that Parliament intended that the priority set for the taxing authorities should be vague. Such an interpretation would make it impossible for a tax debtor's creditors to determine their rights in advance. Given that the common law and civil law concepts are compatible, Parliament can only have intended to treat all Canadian taxpayers the same way and to enable both communities to predict how the legal mechanisms they use to organize their affairs will be interpreted. Only the shared meaning makes it possible to attain this objective. Accordingly, I conclude that Parliament's intent is consistent with the well-established concept of "security interest" as opposed to the more ambiguous concept of "garantie" (see ss. 8.1 and 8.2 of the Interpretation Act, introduced by the Federal Law — Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1; Denault, at p. 117).

[87] If, in the instant case, the shared meaning corresponds to the unequivocal concept of "security interest", it is because there is a concept common to a "security interest" in the sense of "interest in property" and a "garantie" in the sense of "droit sur un bien". It is this concept that must be identified. In "The Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Term Interest: An Interesting Case for Harmonization", in The Harmonization of Federal Legislation with Quebec Civil Law and Canadian Bijuralism (2002), published in the Collection of Studies in Tax Law 2001, Martin Lamoureux points out that a term like "interest" may be impossible to define without considering the context. In his view, "depending on the context, the expression 'interest in property' appears to be the converse of the notion of absolute ownership" (p. 7:9). According to this interpretation, therefore, the security interest — the right in question in s. 224(1.3) ITA — is distinct from a right of absolute ownership.

[88] After analysing how the "interest" concept is used in the ITA and in the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 ("ETA"), Lamoureux proposes the concept of "real right" as a basis for harmonizing those of "interest" and "droit". He explains this as follows:

> As we stated in part three, we propose to harmonize the notion of "interest" (intérêt) with its Quebec equivalent which is "real right" (droit réel). This conclusion is based on a comparative analysis which shows a great similarity between the two concepts. In fact, a comparison of the two concepts shows a similarity between several of their general attributes, for example, the right to follow, the right to assert adversus omnes, a direct right to the thing and the dismemberment of property over time. [p. 7:22]

[89] This proposal is relevant in the case of s. 224(1.3), because the words "interest" and "droit" are used in the English and French versions of that provision. However, Lamoureux mentions some differences between the "interest" and "real right" concepts: for instance, beneficial ownership, equity and future interest can give rise to an interest in property but do not necessarily have equivalents in civil law. He accordingly suggests that Parliament should define "real right" in the ITA and the ETA, and include common law concepts needed for certain specific purposes in the definition. I agree with using the "real right" concept to harmonize the concept of "interest in property" with that of "droit sur un bien" (right in property). In classical civil law, a droit sur un bien is a real right, not a personal right. The accessory real right (known in French as a "droit réel accessoire" and, often, as a "droit réel de garantie") forms an essential component of a security: P.-C. Lafond, Précis de droit des biens (2nd ed. 2007), at paras. 422-23 and 440-47; Private Law Dictionary and Bilingual Lexicons: Obligations (2003), "accessory real right", at pp. 4-5; D.-C. Lamontagne, Biens et propriété (6th ed. 2009), at paras. 103-4.

[90] At common law, the term "real right" and its close cousins "right in rem" and "jus in re", although less common, are nevertheless established. Professor Royston Miles Goode writes in Goode on Legal Problems of Credit and Security (4th ed. 2008), at para. 1-17, that "a security interest is a right in rem". Professors Ronald C. C. Cuming, Catherine Walsh and Roderick J. Wood also refer to the concept of "real right" or "right in rem" in Personal Property Security Law (2005):

> A creditor who is given a security interest in the debtor's property obtains a proprietary right to the collateral. The defining characteristic of a proprietary right (which is also referred to as a real right or a right in rem) is that it is a right in a thing that is generally enforceable against the world. [p. 511]

See also R. A. Macdonald, "Reconceiving the Symbols of Property: Universalities, Interests and Other Heresies" (1994), 39 McGill L.J. 761; J. Austin, Lectures on Jurisprudence, or, The Philosophy of Positive Law (5th ed. 1885), at pp. 381-91; T. E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence (12th ed. 1916), at pp. 146-47; W. N. [91] Moreover, just as an interest in property may be considered to be similar in many respects to a civil law real right, at common law, the notion of a "real right" is considered to be essential to a finding that a security interest exists in the area of personal property security. It is now well established that a functional approach has been adopted in the common law provinces and that form is not determinative of whether a security has been created. The fact remains, however, that the basis for a security interest continues to be a real right. Professors Cuming, Walsh and Wood explain this clearly:

> The elimination of form as a determinant of the existence of a security agreement necessitates a close look at some types of transactions that, on the surface, appear to fall outside the scope of a PPSA but that may provide for interests that fall on one side of the line or the other, depending upon the presence or absence of a feature. In each case, it is necessary to determine whether the essential characteristics of a security agreement are present. This involves answering the question: does the transaction involve the contractual recognition or creation of an interest in the personal property of one person that secures an obligation owing to another person? . . . The "interest" involved must be a real right in personal property in the sense that it is exercisable against not only the obligor but also against third parties with subsequent interests in the property. [pp. 85-86]

Professor Goode makes a similar comment in this respect (at para. 1-17):

Digitized by Google

> Even where the creditor is to be given rights in respect of an asset, it is necessary to distinguish real rights from personal rights. . . . [A] security interest is a right in rem and in principle the secured creditor is entitled to remove the asset from the general body of creditors.

[92] The common law concept of security interest therefore corresponds, in civil law terms, not to a personal right, but to a real right. In short, although no single expression is used at common law, what can be seen is that the right holder has a right in the property itself, as opposed to a right to compel a person to perform an obligation, which is the essence of a personal right. Thus, the "real right" concept is common to the two legal traditions. This concept is also inherent, and literally so, in the English expression "interest in property" and the French expression "droit sur un bien" used in s. 224(1.3).

[93] The "real right" concept is also inherent in the mechanisms listed in s. 224(1.3). From the perspective of the civil law, the list in that provision includes forms of security formerly provided for in the Civil Code of Lower Canada and certain special statutes, such as the Act respecting the special powers of legal persons, R.S.Q., c. P-16, that have been consolidated in the Civil Code of Québec in the concept of the hypothec; the forms of security in question conferred real rights on creditors. Some of the mechanisms set out in the list in s. 224(1.3) ITA warrant comment.

[94] For instance, the term "assignment" refers to an assignment by way of security, not an absolute assignment (Alberta (Treasury Branches) v. M.N.R., [1996] 1 S.C.R. 963, at para. 22; First Vancouver Finance v. M.N.R., 2002 SCC 49, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 720, at para. 39). In the Civil Code of Québec, an assignment by way of security takes the form of a movable hypothec (J.-L. Baudouin and P.-G. Jobin, Les obligations (6th ed. 2005), by P.-G. Jobin with the collaboration of N. Vézina, at No. 942).

[95] As for the trust, it is true that, in civil law, property is transferred in trust to a patrimony by appropriation (art. 1261 C.C.Q.). However, the transferred right is in the "property" (art. 1260 C.C.Q.). Moreover, a creditor who is a beneficiary of a security trust is not an ordinary creditor; the beneficiary's right may be characterized as a hybrid or sui generis right and has some of the characteristics of a real right (R. A. Macdonald, "The Security Trust: Origins, Principles and Perspectives", in Contemporary Utilisation of Non-Corporate Vehicles of Commerce (1997), Meredith Lectures, 155, at pp. 203-4; J. B. Claxton, Studies on the Quebec Law of Trust (2005), at pp. 553-55; J. E. C. Brierley, "Title Six: Certain Patrimonies by Appropriation — Articles 1256-1298", in Reform of the Civil Code (1993), vol. 1-B, at p. 17). And it should be noted that a legislature may expressly include, in a technical definition of a term, mechanisms that do not fall within the usual definition of the term.

[96] The same reasoning applies to the mechanisms listed in the provision if they are viewed from a common law perspective. Some of them (mortgage, trust, assignment) transfer legal or equitable title to the secured creditor. Others, such as the pledge or the charge, are comparable to the civil law's hypothec, with or without delivery. As for the lien, it may take a number of forms: it is akin sometimes to a pledge, where it includes a right to sell the property (Goode, at para. 1-49), and sometimes to a legal mortgage, where it is non-possessory. Finally, "encumbrance" is a very broad term that is defined in Black's Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1990) as "[a]ny right to, or interest in, land which may subsist in another to diminution of its value" (p. 527). Although this term can refer to an easement, it should be noted that where its use to refer to a form of security is concerned, the examples given are usually the mortgage, the lien and the trust (D. A. Dukelow, The Dictionary of Canadian Law (3rd ed. 2004), at p. 408). Thus, the mechanisms mentioned above give the creditor a right that can be characterized as a "real right" within the shared meaning of this expression in the two legal traditions.

[97] The debenture is the only item in the list in s. 224(1.3) ITA that does not create a real right. However, it is a special case. The debenture has historically been central to secured lending transactions (L. Payette, Les sûretés réelles dans le Code civil du Québec (2nd ed. 2001), at pp. 387-89 and 815-20; B. A. Garner, A Dictionary of Modern Legal Usage (2nd ed. 1995), at p. 250; The Dictionary of Canadian Law, at pp. 318-19; H. Reid, Dictionnaire de droit québécois et canadien (3rd ed. 2004), at p. 162). Ordinarily, a debenture is issued and secured in a single instrument. One such instrument was considered by this Court in Royal Bank of Canada v. First Pioneer Investments Ltd., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 125. The following comment by P. L. Davies helps clarify the scope of the mechanism to which the term "debenture" as used in s. 224(1.3) ITA applies: "The expression 'debenture' is applied indiscriminately to the instrument creating or evidencing the indebtedness and to the debt itself and the bundle of rights vested in the holder to secure its payment" (Gower and Davies' Principles of Modern Company Law (7th ed. 2003), at p. 809). The debenture is also mentioned in s. 2(a) of Ontario's Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10, as an example of a transaction that creates a security interest. Cuming, Walsh and Wood explain this as follows: ". . . it can be assumed that, in this context, the term refers to a corporate obligatio[n] secured by some form of security agreement in personal property" (p. 62, n. 21). In short, even though a debenture can be seen, in a technical sense, as merely a debt obligation (P. Martel, Business Corporations in Canada (2005), at pp. 32-14 and 32-15), the term "debenture" must be interpreted in its commercial and historical context, and its inclusion in the list in s. 224(1.3) ITA leads to the conclusion that Parliament intended to include the types of security that are most frequently used to grant real rights in property.

[98] In my opinion, since compensation has not been included in the list, the Caisse's right can constitute a security interest only if it entails a real right. To limit the concept of security interest in s. 224(1.3) ITA to rights that are real in nature is consistent both with the shared meaning of the terms ("security interest" and "garantie") used in the two versions of the provision and with Parliament's purpose of giving the deemed trust priority over the security interests referred to in s. 224(1.3) ITA: First Vancouver Finance.

[99] It must now be determined whether compensation is a "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA.

6. Right to Compensation and Security Interest

[100] Before determining whether compensation is a "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA, I must mention that many Quebec commentators have characterized compensation as a form or type of "garantie". It is important to note their use of the French term "garantie", which, as I mentioned above, has a less precise meaning than "security interest". Thus, Baudouin, Jobin and Vézina state, at No. 1035, that compensation [TRANSLATION] "serves as a garantie by making it possible to avert the risks of debtor insolvency". In their view, compensation gives [TRANSLATION] "ordinary creditors a measure of priority in not requiring them to compete with other creditors" (see also: D. Lluelles and B. Moore, Droit des obligations (2006), at No. 2672; V. Karim, Les obligations (2nd ed. 2002), vol. 2, arts. 1497 à 1707 C.c.Q., at pp. 749-50; J. Pineau, D. Burman and S. Gaudet, Théorie des obligations (4th ed. 2001), at p. 612). Moreover, compensation is a mechanism for extinguishing obligations that operates differently depending on the context in which it is effected: A. Bélanger, Essai d'une théorie juridique de la compensation en droit civil québécois (2004), at p. 299.

[101] These observations, although relevant to a description of compensation and its effects, do not support a conclusion that compensation is a "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA. Although compensation may have the same effect as a security interest, care must be taken not to refer to the flexible sense that can be derived only from the French term "garantie". For the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA, it is not enough that compensation offers protection similar to that of a security interest: it must also confer an "interest in property", that is, a real right.

[102] Although it is true that compensation can be likened to a security interest, it cannot be equated with one in the sense that the term "security interest" must be given in the context of s. 224(1.3) ITA. Where compensation may be effected between two debts, the effect is clearly analogous to that of a "security interest" in the broad sense of the term; nevertheless, compensation or set-off is not regarded, in the positive law of either Quebec or the common law provinces, as having the characteristics of a real right. The automatic extinction of mutual debts is an effect of compensation, but it does not constitute the enforcement of a real right in the property in question. Since compensation is not specifically mentioned in the definition of "security interest" in s. 224(1.3) ITA, I find that it is not a security interest for the purposes of that provision.

[103] Guy Duboc, a French author, suggests in La compensation et les droits des tiers (1989), at pp. 244-47, Nos. 360-64, that compensation agreements should be recognized as pledge agreements that are subject to the same conditions and have the same effects as a pledge. But he is alone in his opinion, and he himself acknowledges that his position is a bold one. In my view, this position cannot be incorporated into Quebec law, especially in light of the consolidation of all forms of security that took place in the course of the reform of the Civil Code of Québec. Rather, it must be concluded that the provisions on compensation, located as they are in the chapter on the extinction of obligations, do not support the argument that compensation is a pledge that would be considered a hypothec under the Civil Code of Québec. To reach the same conclusion as Duboc would be contrary to the objective pursued by the codifiers in 1991 of consolidating the various forms of security.

[104] There is another reason why I would place compensation, or set-off, outside the ambit of s. 224(1.3) ITA. The term "security interest" used in the English version is one that is used extensively in the common law provinces in, specifically, the context of personal property security law. For example, it is defined as follows in the English version of Ontario's Personal Property Security Act:

> "security interest" means an interest in personal property that secures payment or performance of an obligation, and includes . . . .

As can be seen, this definition is very similar to the one in the English version of s. 224(1.3) ITA:

> "security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of . . . .

[105] Furthermore, in most of the common law provinces, the French versions of this provision do not raise the same problems as the French version of the federal provision (see, for example, in addition to the Ontario statute, those of New Brunswick (Personal Property Security Act, S.N.B. 1993, c. P-7.1) and Manitoba (Personal Property Security Act, C.C.S.M., c. P35)). In the Ontario statute, the French version reads as follows:

Digitized by Google

> « sûreté » Intérêt sur des biens meubles qui garantit le paiement ou l'exécution d'une obligation, notamment les intérêts suivants . . . .

Thus, the term "security interest" is rendered as "sûreté" in the Ontario statute, as opposed to "garantie" — a word that requires interpretation because of its vagueness — in the federal statute.

[106] All the personal property security statutes of the common law provinces include broad, functional definitions of "security interest" (see, for example, s. 1 ("security interest") of Ontario's Personal Property Security Act and s. 1 ("security interest") of New Brunswick's Personal Property Security Act). Despite this liberal approach, all these statutes — except that of Ontario — give priority to contractual rights that arise before an assignment to another creditor is known. The Ontario statute was to the same effect until 2006; since then, it has provided that the right arises as of the time the debt becomes payable. The new Ontario provision does not appear to have been considered by the courts. However, regardless of when such rights arise, they are always dealt with separately from security interests (e.g., Ontario's Personal Property Security Act, s. 40; New Brunswick's Personal Property Security Act, s. 41; all other such statutes have virtually identical provisions), which shows that the legislatures did not consider set-off to be included in the concept of "security interest". In the only case in which the most common wording of the provisions creating this type of right has been interpreted, 518718 Alberta Ltd. v. Canadian Forest Products Ltd., 1998 ABQB 619, 63 Alta. L.R. (3d) 371, the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench held that a creditor with a contractual right of set-off has priority over an assignee provided that the creditor's right arises before the assignment (paras. 54, 55 and 63) (in that case, the result was altered on the basis of estoppel, but estoppel is not in issue in the case at bar).

[107] A conclusion that compensation is a "security interest" as that term is defined in the federal statute would therefore conflict with the meaning given to the term in the provincial personal property security statutes, which exclude set-off. Such an interpretation would also be inconsistent with the common law concept of "set-off", on which numerous business transactions are based. Cuming, Walsh and Wood express the following opinion (at p. 87):

> Set-off, whether contractual or procedural, does not involve a security interest because neither party to the set-off acquires a property interest.

Professor Goode adds the following, at para. 1-19:

> A right of set-off, even if given by contract, is a purely personal right to set one claim against another. The party asserting it never acquires rights in the other's monetary claim at all; he merely asserts a countervailing claim which operates in pro tanto extinction of his monetary liability. It follows that a contractual set-off does not create a security interest.

P. Wood expresses the same opinion in Set-Off and Netting, Derivatives, Clearing Systems (2nd ed. 2007), at para. 1-008:

> Although set-off has a similar commercial effect to a security interest, set-off is not a security interest in that the creditor does not grant the debtor a property interest over the creditor's property in the debt owed to the creditor to secure the cross-claim owed by the creditor to the debtor, eg a depositor does not grant a property right over the depositor's ownership of the deposit claim back to the bank to secure a loan owed by the depositor to the bank. Nor is set-off a right of retention like a lien because the bank does not retain the coins or notes of the depositor: the property in the benefit of the deposit account is held by the depositor and the bank has no property to retain.
> Hence a right of set-off would not normally conflict with negative pledges typical of unsecured bank loan agreements whereby the borrower agrees not to create security over its assets. Negative pledges which widen the concept to include transactions similar to security interests should also not prohibit set-offs since a security interest and related title finance transactions (sale and leaseback, factoring, sale and repurchase) usually involve property transfers, but set-off is not a property transfer. A negative pledge which prohibited set-off would effectively prevent the debtor from becoming reciprocally indebted to a counterparty — impracticable in the normal case.
> Professor Grant Gilmore, one of the US architects of Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code, when requested to exclude set-off from the definition of security interests, remarked, "One might as well exclude fan-dancing". Nevertheless he reluctantly gave in: Article 9 does not apply to "a right of recoupment or set-off": see s. 9-109(d)(10). In New Zealand the equivalent Personal Property Security Act does not apply to a right of set-off, netting or combination of accounts: see s. 23(c).

[108] Although I will be discussing the reasons of Rothstein J. below, I wish at this point to draw attention to one aspect of his reasoning. He relies on an excerpt from S. R. Derham's book The Law of Set-Off (3rd ed. 2003) to conclude that if the parties intended to create a security interest, that interest must be covered by the definition in s.

Digitized by Google

224(1.3) ITA. With respect, the following statement by Derham must be borne in mind: ". . . the predominant view is that a set-off agreement is not a charge" (para. 16.80). Thus, it must be understood that the passages cited by my colleague are part of a discussion of arguments in support of an unconventional approach. As with my rejection of Duboc's novel interpretation of French law, I find that it would not really be appropriate to incorporate into federal law a concept that is not recognized at common law and is totally unknown in civil law. In my view, it is very dangerous to assert that a real right in property can result from the parties' intention without basing that assertion on a mechanism known to the law.

[109] This review of the academic commentaries thus leads me to conclude that, under the common law as it now stands, set-off is excluded from the field of personal property security. The fact that a legal mechanism enables a creditor to obtain an effect similar to that of a "security interest" in the generic sense of the term does not make that mechanism a security interest.

[110] Despite the arguments presented in all courts, my colleague Rothstein J. considers that the question to be answered is not whether compensation is a security interest. Rather, in his view, the issue is whether the agreement created a "security interest" as defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA. He concludes that such an interest did in fact result from the juxtaposition of certain rights of the Caisse and obligations of Camvrac.

[111] As Rothstein J. sees it, compensation is merely a remedy (para. 30). The undertakings that gave rise to an "interest in property" as defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA were those relating to the term for repayment of the deposit amount, the obligation to maintain the deposit, the right to withhold and the limits on transferring, negotiating and hypothecating the deposit (para. 30). Rothstein J. does not concern himself with whether those rights, either individually or collectively, created a real right. Yet even though he does not expressly accept that a security interest entails a real right, he considers that, in the case at bar, the Caisse held a movable hypothec with delivery in accordance with the reasoning of the majority in Caisse populaire Desjardins de Val-Brillant v. Blouin, 2003 SCC 31, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 666. For several reasons, I cannot accept my colleague's interpretation of the "security interest" concept or his recourse to the hypothec to conclude that the deemed trust had priority. I will discuss my objections under two heads.

Novel Approach to the "Security Interest" Concept

[112] I must say that Rothstein J.'s approach to the "security interest" concept is a novel one. He states that he agrees that the shared meaning lies in the English version, which implies that the English term corresponds to a legally recognized common concept. As I mentioned above, there is no federal common law. To identify the purpose Parliament was pursuing when it chose the "security interest" concept, it is necessary to refer to the common law, which is provincial law. The analysis cannot therefore disregard provincial law. However, the effect of my colleague's interpretation is to expand the "security interest" concept beyond its accepted scope in Canadian commercial law. Since his approach does not correspond at all to the shared meaning, its effect is to disregard both the principles applicable to the interpretation of bilingual legislation and those applicable to the harmonization of federal law and provincial law.

[113] Rothstein J. concludes on the basis of inchoate accessory rights that an interest in property — or, in other words, a "security interest" as defined in s. 224(1.3) LIR — was created (at para. 30):

> It was the five-year term and the maintenance and retention of the $200,000 deposit, as well as Camvrac's agreement not to transfer or negotiate the deposit and that the deposit could only be used as security with the Caisse, that created the Caisse's interest in Camvrac's property for the purposes of s. 224(1.3) ITA.

What my colleague overlooks in his analysis is the fact that under s. 224(1.3) ITA, the interest in the property must make it possible to realize on the security. To simply find that an interest in property exists without regard for the context is not sufficient.

[114] At common law, a security interest typically entails three fundamental rights: (1) the right to realize on property given as security; (2) a right to priority with respect to the proceeds of realization; and (3) the right to follow the property in the hands of a third party to whom it has been transferred (Cuming, Walsh and Wood, at p. 1). None of the rights mentioned by Rothstein J. enable the person concerned to appropriate the property. Thus, neither the term for repayment, nor the obligation to maintain, nor the right to withhold, nor the limit on the right to transfer, hypothecate or negotiate would enable the Caisse to realize on the deposit or appropriate the deposit amount to ensure performance of the secured obligation. I cannot imagine that Parliament intended the provision to apply to any mechanism other than the one known at common law that makes it possible to appropriate the property to which the security interest relates. What must be done under s. 224(1.3) ITA is to identify a security interest, not a simple interest.

[115] Although my colleague does not include compensation in the above list in support of his conclusion that an interest in property was created, he does ultimately refer to it, describing it as a remedy. What I conclude from this is that he does not see compensation as an interest in property and that according to his interpretation only the rights he mentions create such an interest. I believe that a few comments about each of these rights will be helpful here.

[116] Regardless of what standpoint is taken in reviewing the Caisse's obligation with respect to the term, the clause establishing the term cannot be viewed as stipulating anything other than a deadline for repayment of the deposit. It is well established that in the context of a banking contract, to deposit an amount in a financial institution is to make a loan. The financial institution becomes the owner of the loaned amount and must return it with the interest agreed on (art. 2330 C.C.Q.). The transaction is, in a word, a simple loan (art. 2329 C.C.Q.). The clause that establishes the term merely fixes the time when the loaned amount is to be returned. Camvrac's relationship with the Caisse with respect to the deposit was merely one of creditor and debtor that entailed only a right to be repaid upon expiry of the term. The establishment of a term did not alter the nature of the legal relationship between the Caisse and Camvrac. The right was not a real right, but a simple personal right.

[117] The same analysis applies to the covenants to which Camvrac agreed, those relating to Camvrac's claim against the Caisse. The undertakings to maintain the deposit and not to transfer, negotiate or hypothecate the claim conferred on the Caisse no right in the claim Camvrac had against it. In the event of default, these rights would be of no assistance unless they were violated, in which case they might give rise to an action for failure to perform the contract. All these rights were personal rights, not real rights. The right to withhold warrants more specific comment.

[118] In considering the meaning to be given to the expressions "droit de retenue" and "droit de rétention" and the nature of the right that has been created, the context is essential. In civil law, there is one concept known as the "droit de rétention" (under, for example, arts. 875, 974, 1250 and 2543 C.C.Q.), which is a right to retain corporeal property, and another known as the "droit de retenue", or right to deduct (see arts. 2111, para. 2 and 2123 C.C.Q.). The right to deduct is different from the right to retain: it applies to an amount of money, not to corporeal property. There is therefore no right to follow. Also, the creditor's claim does not have priority. The right to deduct has none of the characteristics on the basis of which a right to retain can be likened to a real right.

[119] In the instant case, in the agreement to give savings as security, the following appears as the title of clause 1: "Droit de rétention et de compensation" ("Right to withholding and compensation" in the English version of the Caisse's standard form contract). Regarding obligations, the agreement provides that the depositor "consents to the withholding by the Caisse, in the account(s) . . . mentioned below, of the amount of . . .", and that "[t]he Caisse may withhold the sums . . . in the case of a line of credit, as long as it has not been cancelled". Despite the use of the expression "droit de rétention" in the title of the clause, the purpose of the right is to deduct an amount of money and not to retain corporeal property, which means that it is a "droit de retenue", not a "droit de rétention" within the meaning of the Civil Code of Québec.

[120] This right to deduct could be of no help to the Caisse during the term of the deposit, as the Caisse was not required to return the deposited amount until the term expired, and this stipulation afforded it no additional protection. Since clause 11 of the term savings agreement provided that the term would be renewed automatically in the absence of notice to the contrary, the Caisse would be able to exercise the right to deduct only if Camvrac gave notice that it would not be renewing the term. Such notice could be given not later than seven days after the term expired. If a notice of non-renewal were received, it would then be open to the Caisse to request repayment under clause 5 of the variable credit contract. In such circumstances, compensation could be effected by operation of law upon the expiry of the term, and the right to deduct and the obligation to maintain the deposit would be irrelevant. If, however, the Caisse did not immediately cancel the line of credit when the term of the deposit expired owing to the non-renewal, Camvrac would be precluded from requesting repayment because of its undertaking to maintain the amount in a deposit and the Caisse's right to deduct the amount. The Caisse would then retain the power to cancel the line of credit at any time, at its discretion, in order to effect legal compensation or, in the case of default, conventional compensation. These scenarios show that the Caisse's right to deduct and Camvrac's obligation to maintain were mechanisms provided for in the agreement to ensure that legal or conventional compensation could be effected. They conferred no separate right to realize on the claim and, moreover, were of residual application.

[121] The most important thing to bear in mind is that none of the clauses on which Rothstein J. relies created a real right or an interest in property ("security interest" as defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA). A term is a deadline for repayment. The right to deduct is simply the right of a creditor not to perform an obligation to pay as long as a debt is owed to him or her. It is, in a way, an extension granted for repayment. As for the obligation to maintain, it is clearly an undertaking by one person to another to perform an obligation. The limit on the right to transfer, hypothecate or negotiate constitutes an obligation "not to do".

[122] Thus, I cannot see how these rights, whether considered in isolation or as a whole, might constitute a "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA. None of them provides a basis for using the property to ensure performance of the obligation, and none of them constitutes an interest in property that secures performance of an obligation.

[123] As Professors Cuming, Walsh and Wood point out, the elimination of form as a determinant of the creation of a security does not mean that every contractual undertaking can be regarded as security on personal property. The limits on which Rothstein J. relies can be compared with those applicable to flawed assets. According to the technique of flawed assets, property such as a bank deposit is subject to limits on withdrawal until the depositor has repaid his or her debt to the bank. It is well established that this technique does not create a security interest. Professor Goode explains this as follows (at para. 1-21):

> [The technique of flawed assets] does not of itself constitute a security, for the bank acquires no rights over the deposit, merely a right to withhold repayment.

[124] Cuming, Walsh and Wood also cite examples of undertakings pursuant to which creditors are given interests in property that cannot be characterized as security interests. One of them, the covenant not to dispose of or encumber property, is of interest, as it is analogous to one of the undertakings on which Rothstein J. relies:

> A "negative pledge" clause or negative covenant in a loan agreement under which the borrower covenants not to encumber or dispose of some or all of her personal property until the loan is repaid does not create a security interest since, standing alone, the covenant does not create an interest in the property of the borrower. A negative pledge clause in a security agreement cannot prevent the covenantor from giving another effective security interest in the collateral. [p. 86]

Adding one or more personal rights does not result in the creation of a real right, which, as we saw above, Cuming, Walsh and Wood consider essential to the creation of a security interest. If Rothstein J.'s conclusion that a contractual undertaking creates an interest in the property is based on the functional approach, a further issue that will arise is how the negative pledge — whether or not in combination with another personal right such as the right to compensation — is now to be characterized.

[125] Therefore, in my view, not only is Rothstein J.'s analysis of the expression "interest in property" or "droit sur un bien" unacceptable in that it disregards the fact that the principal purpose of a security interest must be to permit the property given as security to be realized, but it cannot be reconciled with the characterization of techniques similar to those adopted in the case at bar that do not create security interests.

Granting of a Movable Hypothec on a Claim With Delivery

[126] I also wish to comment on the argument that a hypothec was granted on the basis of the reasoning followed in Val-Brillant. First of all, I would point out that no evidence was adduced concerning a hypothec and that no submissions were made in this respect either before the prothonotary or in the Federal Court or the Federal Court of Appeal. I find this argument somewhat surprising in view of the fact that the parties neither produced evidence nor made submissions with respect to it. It will also be necessary to place Val-Brillant in context and to comment briefly on the use of the hypothec to confirm that the Caisse's right is subject to the deemed trust.

[127] In Val-Brillant, the issue was whether a non-negotiable certificate of deposit could be the object of a pledge (art. 2702 C.C.Q.). There were two opposing theories, of "materialization" or "dematerialization" of the pledge: Payette, at pp. 380-91; P. Ciotola and A. Leduc, "Arrêt Val-Brillant: évolution ou régression de l'hypothèque mobilière avec dépossession, en droit civil québécois?", in S. Normand, ed., Mélanges offerts au professeur François Frenette: études portant sur le droit patrimonial (2006), at p. 361. The majority accepted the theory of dematerialization and held that there could be a pledge on a non-negotiable instrument. Gonthier J., writing for the majority, concluded that effective control of a non-negotiable instrument for the purposes of arts. 2702 and 2703 C.C.Q. could be gained by means of the assignment of claims mechanism referred to in art. 2710 C.C.Q.

[128] The commentators have criticized the view that a movable hypothec with delivery can be granted in the manner described in Val-Brillant: Ciotola and Leduc; D. Pratte, "L'hypothèque avec dépossession de créances non représentées par un titre négociable ou le retour à une fiction accommodante", in Mélanges offerts au professeur François Frenette: études portant sur le droit patrimonial, at p. 421.

[129] Article 2702 C.C.Q. was amended on January 1, 2009. The Civil Code of Québec now explicitly provides that physical delivery of the property or instrument is essential for a pledge to be granted. This amendment to the Civil Code of Québec is a clarification made by the legislature in response to Val-Brillant (see: Quebec, National Assembly, Journal des débats, June 11, 2008, 1st Sess., 38th Leg., vol. 40, No. 46, at p. 1, Bill 47, Securities and Other Financial Assets Transfer Act; M. Deschamps, "Le nouveau régime québécois des sûretés sur des valeurs mobilières", lecture delivered on March 19, 2009 to the Chaire du notariat of the Université de Montréal, at p. 4, note 12 (online: //www.chairedunotariat.qc.ca/fr/conferences/mois/032009/Deschamps.pdf.). It is now clear that the instrument that is delivered must confer effective control over the claim without recourse being had to the assignment of claim mechanism as suggested by Gonthier J. By specifying that physical delivery is required, the legislature has indicated that the theory of materialization of the pledge has been accepted: the instrument must therefore be negotiable. The only exception to this requirement that the instrument be negotiable relates to certain securities (art. 2714.7 C.C.Q.). At the same time, in response to a concern expressed by the majority in Val-Brillant, the Regulation respecting the register of personal and movable real rights was amended to enable individuals who do not operate enterprises to hypothecate incorporeal property and claims — including claims represented by non-negotiable instruments — without delivery: O.C. 30-2009, (2009) 141 G.O. 2A, at p. 17A; art. 2683 C.C.Q. This amounts to a relaxation of the conditions under which an individual can grant a hypothec without delivery. As for a deposit, such as the one in the case at bar, it cannot be the object of a pledge.

[130] Having said this, I have difficulty understanding how the hypothec fits into the reasoning that leads Rothstein J. to conclude that the rights granted to the Caisse created a security interest. Two interpretations are possible. Does my colleague conclude that the respondent's right has priority over the Caisse's right solely because of the control exercised over the claim by means of the term, the obligation to maintain, the right to withhold and the limits on the rights to transfer, hypothecate and negotiate? Or is his conclusion based on the idea that in addition to those rights, Camvrac had granted a right to compensation that resulted in a hypothec? If the first interpretation is correct, the argument based on the hypothec is irrelevant. If the second is correct, the right to compensation becomes determinative even though my colleague does not include it among the sources of an interest in property. If Rothstein J.'s conclusion that the deemed trust has priority is based on the hypothec, his reasoning clashes with the clarification made by the Quebec legislature.

[131] Furthermore, I cannot accept the Court's recourse to an argument that has been raised neither by the Caisse nor by the respondent. As I mentioned above, the agreement to give savings as security provided for the granting of a hypothec, a right to withhold and a right to compensation, but only the right to compensation was raised and argued. The Caisse was not limited in the choice of rights it could exercise. If, for example, in addition to the hypothec and the right to compensation, the claim had been secured by another personal right, such as by suretyship, the respondent could not have claimed from the Caisse the amount received from the surety. It would have been clear that the Caisse was free to choose which right it would exercise. Thus, it could have chosen to exercise its right to compensation, or it could also — independently of the hypothec also provided for in the contract — have availed itself of the suretyship if such a right were provided for in the contract. The Civil Code of Québec provides, on the one hand, for compensation and, on the other hand, for hypothecs on claims. These two mechanisms must not, in my opinion, be confused. The reasons for the parties' choice may be based in fact. In my view, the question is not merely one of law. In all fairness to the parties, therefore, I do not consider it appropriate at this point to intervene in the "judicial contract" to alter the bases of the appeal before the Court.

[132] I therefore find, with respect, that as regards the term, the obligation to maintain, the right to withhold and the limits on the right to transfer, hypothecate or negotiate, all that have been created are personal obligations. Furthermore, since the parties did not raise the hypothec in this Court, I do not think that we can base our conclusion on an argument in respect of which no evidence was adduced and that does not correspond to the law. The appellant chose to exercise its right to compensation, and that is the right that must be considered.

[133] As a result, I conclude that the appellant is correct in arguing that compensation is not a "security interest" as that term is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA. To accept the Caisse's first argument is not to dispose of the appeal, however. Despite my finding that the Federal Court of Appeal erred in holding that the respondent had priority on the basis that the Caisse, in effecting compensation, had created a security interest for itself, the case is not yet closed. It must still be determined whether the right to compensation may be set up against the respondent, who, as a result of the deemed trust, not only has a priority over secured creditors — as the term "secured creditor" is defined in s. 224(1.3) ITA — but also has a right in the tax debtor's property. To do this, it must be asked whether the respondent may exercise its right in respect of both the amounts that had not been remitted at the time the right to compensation was granted to the Caisse and those that were not remitted after that time. As I mentioned above, by September 25, 2000, the date the compensation agreement was signed, Camvrac had already failed to remit some amounts that had been deducted from its employees' salaries. Those amounts totalled approximately $5,000.

7. Possibility of Setting up the Compensation Agreement Against the Respondent

[134] I do not think it necessary to explain at length why, prior to the expiry of the term of the deposit, the Caisse's right was not a right to legal compensation. The Caisse's right cannot be dissociated from the contract in which it was granted, if only because one of the conditions for legal compensation was not met: Camvrac's debt was not exigible, because repayment of the deposit amount was not due until October 2005. It will therefore be necessary to refer to the agreements between Camvrac and the Caisse.

[135] The Civil Code of Québec does not mention conventional compensation. However, there is nothing that prohibits it. In fact, conventional compensation is merely the arrangement by contract of the mechanism provided for in the Code. Furthermore, commentators have long recognized the validity of compensation agreements (see: Baudouin, Jobin and Vézina, at No. 1057; Lluelles and Moore, at No. 2701).

Digitized by Google

[136] The issue in the case at bar is whether the Caisse may set up its compensation agreement against the respondent. The respondent's right is provided for in s. 227(4.1) ITA. If I exclude the portions relating to the priority over secured claims, which I have already discussed, the respondent's right in Camvrac's property is set out as follows:

> 227. . . .
> (4) Every person who deducts or withholds an amount under this Act is deemed . . . to hold the amount separate and apart from the property of the person . . . in trust for Her Majesty and for payment to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act.
> (4.1) . . . where at any time an amount deemed by subsection (4) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not paid to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act, property of the person . . . equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust is deemed
> (a) to be held, from the time the amount was deducted or withheld by the person, separate and apart from the property of the person, in trust for Her Majesty . . . and
> (b) to form no part of the estate or property of the person from the time the amount was so deducted or withheld . . . .

[137] The statutory mechanism transfers the tax debtor's property to a trust. In First Vancouver Finance, the Court likened this mechanism to a floating charge over all the tax debtor's assets up to the amount due, in that the trust does not attach to any specific property and allows the tax debtor's business to be carried on as usual.

[138] All forms of security — including what was formerly referred to as a floating charge — are now consolidated in the Civil Code in a single mechanism, the hypothec. The transfer of property into a trust may also be likened to garnishment, since that is the procedure provided for in s. 224(1) ITA to enable the respondent to appropriate amounts owed to the tax debtor that are subject to the deemed trust: Alberta (Treasury Branches). Whether the transfer into a trust is likened to a hypothec, to garnishment or to a simple assignment, the rules remain the same. The Civil Code of Québec and the Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25, provide that the rules governing the assignment of claims apply. The relevant provisions read as follows:

> Civil Code of Québec
> 1680. A debtor who has acquiesced unconditionally in the assignment or hypothecating of claims by his creditor to a third person may not afterwards set up against the third person any compensation that he could have set up against the original creditor before he acquiesced.
> An assignment or hypothec in which a debtor has not acquiesced, but which from a certain time may be set up against him, prevents compensation only for debts of the original creditor which come after that time.
> Code of Civil Procedure
> 637. If the affirmative declaration of the garnishee is not contested and does not show the existence of another seizure by garnishment in his hands, the clerk, upon an inscription by either party, orders the garnishee to pay to the seizing creditor the amounts which he owes to the judgment debtor to the extent of the amount of the judgment in capital, interest and costs. To that extent the order of the clerk effects an assignment, in favour of the seizing creditor, of the judgment debtor's claim, from the date of the seizure. Such order must be served on the garnishee and becomes executory 10 days later.

[139] The ability of the debtor of the assigned claim to set up against the assignee any recourse that the debtor may have against the assignor is based on the general rule that the assignee may not have more rights in the assigned claim than the assignor had. This rule is set down in art. 1637 C.C.Q.:

> 1637. A creditor may assign to a third person all or part of a claim or a right of action which he has against his debtor.
> He may not, however, make an assignment that is injurious to the rights of the debtor or that renders his obligation more onerous.

[140] This provision is complemented by art. 1643 C.C.Q., which provides that a debtor may rely on a cause of extinction that occurred before an assignment could be set up against him or her. The first paragraph of that article reads as follows:

> 1643. A debtor may set up against the assignee any payment made to the assignor before the assignment could be set up against him, as well as any other cause of extinction of the obligation that occurred before that time.

[141] The commentators and the courts have accordingly recognized that any defences and any right to refuse to perform (exception for nonperformance) that arose prior to an assignment may be set up against the assignee by a debtor who has not acquiesced in the assignment. The same is true of the extinction of obligations by compensation: Karim, at p. 773; Baudouin, Jobin and Vézina, at No. 962; Lluelles and Moore, at No. 3176; Bélanger, at p. 189.

[142] Furthermore, where the right to compensation arises from an agreement entered into before the assignment became enforceable against the debtor, the debtor's rights under the agreement may be set up against the assignee: A. L. Green Ltd. v. Michaud, [1975] C.A. 432, cited with approval in Banque Royale du Canada v. Béliveau, [1976] C.A. 539, and Bandera Investment Co. v. Société immobilière du Québec, J.E. 98-1667 (Sup. Ct.), SOQUIJ AZ-98021774. The above cases concerned claims for rent in respect of which the lessees had a right to deduct or a right to compensation. In each case, because the contractual right to compensation predated the assignment, the exercise of the right was authorized in respect of the period after the assignment. In these circumstances, it was held that the agreements could be set up against the third parties because they had acquired their rights after the compensation agreements were signed. Although the judges did not say so explicitly, it seems clear that this conclusion was based on the premise that art. 1681 C.C.Q. did not apply in the circumstances because the assignees had acquired no rights as of the time the compensation agreements were signed. Vincent Karim makes the following comment:

> [TRANSLATION] However, it will be hard for the creditors of an insolvent party to challenge a compensation agreement entered into at the same time as the contract giving rise to that party's claim, as the creditors will have difficulty proving that the agreement has caused them any prejudice. [p. 750]

[143] The same approach has been adopted for assignments of conditional claims: Seigneur v. Immeubles Beneficial Ltée, [1994] R.J.Q. 1535 (C.A.); Banque Nationale du Canada v. Notre-Dame-du-Lac (Ville) (1990), 31 Q.A.C. 45; and Banque de Montréal v. Walsh & Brais Inc., [1990] R.L. 119 (C.A.).

[144] Conventional compensation — or contractual set-off — defies categorization, since it may take as many forms as the contract that provides for it will allow: Derham, at para. 16.85. However, there is no denying that the right to compensation has characteristics in common with such concepts as the conditional obligation, the exception for nonperformance, and even the right to deduct or the right to retain. In D.I.M.S. Construction inc. (Trustee of) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 52, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 564, at paras. 28-29, for example, the Court likened a statutory right to deduct to compensation. Moreover, the right to deduct was one of the very first justifications given in France for holding that the debt actually owed to an assignee was the net amount: Duboc, at p. 169, No. 239, commenting on Ch. civ., May 13, 1833, S. 1833.1.668. While it comes as no surprise that Quebec's rules lead to the same result as the rules of French law, it is interesting to note that common law commentators and courts also acknowledge that the right to set-off may be asserted against third parties.

[145] Where the French rules are concerned, however, it should be noted that allowing compensation to be effected is based on a concept that does not on its own form part of the positive law of Quebec. In France, where there is a sufficient nexus between two debts, compensation may be effected despite the assignment of a claim or a collective recovery procedure: D. R. Martin, "Contrats et obligations", Juris-classeur civil, arts. 1289 to 1293, fasc. 108 to 111, No. 75. Since a compensation agreement creates a sufficient nexus, the possibility of setting it up is not in dispute (unless the agreement was entered into during a period where solvency was in doubt): Cass. civ., July 13, 1942, J.C.P. 1943.II.2157 (Annot. Houin); Cass. com., June 3, 1997, D. 1998.Jur.61 (Annot. François). (See, however, Cass. com., Dec. 9, 1997, Bull. civ. IV, No. 327, and the critique of that decision by A. Honorat, "Redressement et liquidation judiciaires", D. 1998.Somm.325.) Some authors draw a distinction in the case of garnishment by a third party on the basis that the property would no longer be available after the seizure: Didier Martin, "Des techniques d'affectation en garantie des soldes de comptes bancaires", D. 1987.Chron.229, and Thierry Bonneau, in Droit bancaire (7th ed. 2007), at No. 395. Duboc disagrees, however, as do Jean-Louis Rives-Lange and Monique Contamine-Raynaud (Droit bancaire (6th ed. 1995)). According to Rives-Lange and Contamine-Raynaud, [TRANSLATION] "[t]here is no reason to decide cases involving collective seizures differently from those involving individual seizures" (p. 183, footnote 6). In Quebec, the French debate over the unavailability of seized property would have to be resolved in favour of the possibility of setting up a compensation agreement entered into before the seizure. As I mentioned above, since art. 637 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that seizure results in assignment of the claim, the principles discussed above concerning the assignment of claims apply to garnishment.

[146] The number of cases in which common law courts have considered contractual set-off is small, but the few reported decisions on this subject have been favourable to the right to rely on set-off agreements. For instance, I have already mentioned 518718 Alberta, in which the court held that a contractual right of set-off had priority over the assignee's rights. Likewise, the Ontario Court of Appeal held in Ching v. Jeffery (1885), 12 O.A.R. 432, that the defences available to the debtor on an assigned promissory note, including the right to reduce his or her debt by an amount owed by the assignor, could be raised against the assignee. In Canadian Admiral Corp. v. L. F. Dommerich & Co., [1964] S.C.R. 238, it was held that the debtor had as against the assignee under a factoring agreement the same defence it would have had as against the assignor. Finally, in Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Block Bros. Contractors Ltd. (1980), 118 D.L.R. (3d) 311 (Alta. Q.B.), a contractual right to set-off (referred to by the parties as a right to "future set-off") was available against an assignee of security on the basis of cases in which courts had applied the general rule that an assignee cannot have any greater right than the assignor (p. 318).

[147] In sum, at common law, as in Quebec civil law, the rule for asserting contractual rights against third-party assignees is based on the general principles governing obligations. It can be inferred from the decisions cited above that the right to conventional compensation is assessed as of the time the right is granted, not as of the time it is exercised. The protection of third parties, codified in Quebec law in art. 1681 C.C.Q., applies to rights acquired before the compensation agreement was signed. In Traité de droit civil — Les obligations: les effets du contrat (1992), No. 602, at p. 589, Professor Jacques Ghestin gives a clear explanation of the effect of the transfer of a claim. His comment clarifies the legal justification for the possibility of setting up a contractual right to compensation against third parties:

> [TRANSLATION] A claim is not only a patrimonial asset, but also a legal relationship. When a claim is alienated, therefore, what is transferred is not just an asset, but also an active contractual situation.
> The possibility of setting up a contract whose object is the transfer of a claim thus necessarily has some particularities that are accounted for in positive law on the basis that the contract produces effects in respect of certain third parties.

[148] Thus, where the deemed trust applies to a claim, it attaches to a legal relationship that corresponds to an active contractual situation, which explains why the beneficiary of the trust may assert only those rights held by the tax debtor at the time the trust became effective.

[149] It will also be helpful to refer back to s. 227(4.1) ITA and to review the cases in which the scope of the deemed trust has been considered. Before Parliament clarified the respondent's priority over secured creditors, the courts had held that prior rights could be disregarded only to the extent expressly provided for in the relevant provision. For example, in Board of Industrial Relations v. Avco Financial Services Realty Ltd., [1979] 2 S.C.R. 699, Martland J. wrote:

> In [s. 5A] the absence of a specific statutory provision to that effect, in my view it should not be construed in a manner which could deprive third parties of their pre-existing property rights. [p. 706]

(See also Dauphin Plains Credit Union Ltd. v. Xyloid Industries Ltd., [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1182, at p. 1199.)

[150] This suggests that it is necessary to be cautious in assessing the scope of the deemed trust on the tax debtor's property. When Parliament wished to give the deemed trust more teeth, it took care to give the respondent priority over secured creditors. It did not alter the general rules governing the rights a debtor can assert against its original creditor. In assessing the consequences of that decision, particularly with regard to compensation, one can but find support in an interpretation based on the normally applicable legal rules.

[151] Compensation is used in many business transactions and in the asset accounting of many businesses. M. E. Grottenthaler and P. J. Henderson state in The Law of Financial Derivatives in Canada (loose-leaf) that "Canada can be described as a 'netting friendly' jurisdiction" both in the context of insolvency and where contractual matters outside that context are concerned (p. 5-3). They explain that netting, which is a form of set-off, is crucial to derivatives transactions that affect the capitalization rules applicable to banks. They say the following about the importance of this mechanism:

> It is of the utmost importance to parties that the termination and close-out netting provisions are enforceable against the other party. Unlike the case with many commercial transactions, parties are not willing to accept the risk that these provisions may not be fully enforceable in an insolvency situation. There are several reasons for this. First, many entities that participate in the derivatives market are subject to regulatory requirements that they maintain a certain asset level in relation to their liabilities (i.e. adequate capital). For this purpose, it is desirable to account for their transactions with their various counterparties on a net basis. The Basel Committee on Banking Supervision developed a new framework for regulatory capital and risk management (known as Basel II). The implementing Capital Adequacy Requirements guidelines released by OSFI [the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions] to apply to Canadian incorporated banks allow for the netting of contracts pursuant to contractual netting provisions if the bank can satisfy OSFI that certain conditions are met, including that the institution has a written and reasoned legal opinion that, in the event of any legal challenge, the relevant courts would find the exposure under the netting agreement to be the net amount under the laws of all relevant jurisdictions (which includes the counterparty's home jurisdiction and the governing law of the transactions and the netting agreement). The legal opinions must address the validity and enforceability of the netting agreements in the context of insolvency proceedings.
> Secondly, because the marketplace for derivatives transactions is a highly competitive and global marketplace, entities governed by the laws of a jurisdiction that does not recognize the effectiveness of termination and close-out netting in an insolvency situation are put at a serious competitive disadvantage. [pp. 5-2 and 5-3]

[152] This is just one example of the use of compensation in a context that does not involve the "security interest" concept and of the great importance of this mechanism both in Canadian law and in international economic relations. Parliament thus seems to have had reasons for acting as it did in modifying the deemed trust only to give the respondent priority over creditors with security interests. I have concluded that the deemed trust does not give the respondent more rights than the tax debtor had and that, insofar as the amounts had not been deducted at the time the agreement was entered into, the Caisse's right may be set up against the respondent. What this finding means in practice must now be determined.

[153] In the case at bar, Camvrac's right to recover its claim was subject to the right to compensation that had been granted to the Caisse in the agreement to give savings as security. In the context of that agreement, the right to compensation was a right held by the Caisse that could not be negated solely by the fact of the deemed trust becoming effective. The respondent, as a third party, could not demand that the Caisse discharge its debt to Camvrac if the conditions for repayment had not been met. The Caisse's right had to be respected by third parties who acquired rights after the agreement was signed. Consequently, the respondent must abide by the compensation agreement, given that her right is subsequent to it.

[154] As I mentioned above, Camvrac had remitted nothing to the respondent since May 2000. Because the compensation agreement was entered into in September 2000, a question that arises is whether the respondent may claim from the Caisse amounts owed prior to that date. This is the issue that remains to be addressed.

[155] In certain circumstances, the debt itself can consist only of the net balance owed by the debtor. Thus, where, as in Bandera, the amount of an assignment of rent is established only after adjustments, the amount of the rent corresponds to the net balance payable to the landlord. In such a situation, regardless of when the assignee's right first arises, his or her claim cannot exceed the actual amount owed by the debtor of the assigned claim, that is, the post-compensation amount. In other cases, such as where the respective claims do not have the same source, the date the creditor's right arises may be relevant. The instant case is one such case.

[156] The claims of the Caisse and Camvrac have distinct sources: one is based on the variable credit contract, the other, on the term savings agreement. The Caisse's claim against Camvrac dates from September 18, 2000 and Camvrac's claim, from September 25, 2000. On the latter date, Camvrac undertook, first in the term savings agreement, [TRANSLATION] "to make, on the date of acquisition, a deposit in the amount of $200,000", and then in the agreement to give savings as security, to "maintain" a deposit in the amount of $200,000. These undertakings show that the respective claims of the Caisse and Camvrac are distinct. For Camvrac to be able to undertake in the agreement to give savings as security to "maintain" the deposited amount, its claim resulting from the term savings agreement had to take on an independent existence, if only at the time the deposit was made. Given that the deposit was made before the right to compensation was granted, the deemed trust could have become effective in respect of Camvrac's claim up to the total of the amounts owed to the respondent as of September 25, 2000. This is not a case in which the respective debts have the same source and the claim is subject to a right to compensation. Just as the respondent's rights are subordinated to the right to compensation for deductions subsequent to the signing of the agreement, the Caisse's right must give way to the respondent's pre-existing right. As I stated at the beginning of these reasons, the evidence in the record is insufficient to establish the amount of the unremitted deductions with any precision; therefore, failing an agreement between the parties, the case must be remanded to the court of original jurisdiction to establish that amount.

8. Interest Issue

[157] Regarding interest, the Court of Appeal correctly endorsed the application of Markevich, and there is no need to intervene.

9. Conclusion

[158] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal, authorize compensation for the balance of the amounts deducted as of September 25, 2000 and, failing an agreement between the parties, remand the case to the court of original jurisdiction to establish the amount to be paid by the Caisse to the respondent, with costs throughout.

(a) Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.)

224. . . .

(1.3) In subsection (1.2),

"security interest" means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a debenture, mortgage, hypothec, lien, pledge, charge, deemed or actual trust, assignment or encumbrance of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for;

227. . . .

(4) Every person who deducts or withholds an amount under this Act is deemed, notwithstanding any security interest (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) in the amount so deducted or withheld, to hold the amount separate and apart from the property of the person and from property held by any secured creditor (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) of that person that but for the security interest would be property of the person, in trust for Her Majesty and for payment to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act.

(4.1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (except sections 81.1 and 81.2 of that Act), any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any other law, where at any time an amount deemed by subsection (4) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not paid to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) of that person that but for a security interest (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust is deemed

(a) to be held, from the time the amount was deducted or withheld by the person, separate and apart from the property of the person, in trust for Her Majesty whether or not the property is subject to such a security interest, and

(b) to form no part of the estate or property of the person from the time the amount was so deducted or withheld, whether or not the property has in fact been kept separate and apart from the estate or property of the person and whether or not the property is subject to such a security interest . . . .

(b) Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23

86. (1) All premiums, interest, penalties and other amounts payable by an employer under this Act are debts due to Her Majesty and are recoverable in the Federal Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided for by this Act.

(2) Where an employer has deducted an amount from the remuneration of an insured person as or on account of any employee's premium required to be paid by the insured person but has not remitted the amount to the Receiver General, the employer is deemed, notwithstanding any security interest (as defined in subsection 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act) in the amount so deducted, to hold the amount separate and apart from the property of the employer and from property held by any secured creditor (as defined in subsection 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act) of that employer that but for the security interest would be property of the employer, in trust for Her Majesty and for payment to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act.

(2.1) Notwithstanding the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (except sections 81.1 and 81.2 of that Act), any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any other law, where at any time an amount deemed by subsection (2) to be held by an employer in trust for Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act, property of the employer and property held by any secured creditor (as defined in subsection 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act) of that employer that but for a security interest (as defined in subsection 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act) would be property of the employer, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust is deemed

(c) Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64

1637. A creditor may assign to a third person all or part of a claim or a right of action which he has against his debtor.

He may not, however, make an assignment that is injurious to the rights of the debtor or that renders his obligation more onerous.

1643. A debtor may set up against the assignee any payment made to the assignor before the assignment could be set up against him, as well as any other cause of extinction of the obligation that occurred before that time.

1671. Obligations are extinguished not only by the causes of extinction contemplated in other provisions of this Code, such as payment, the expiry of an extinctive term, novation or prescription, but also by compensation, confusion, release, impossibility of performance or discharge of the debtor.

1672. Where two persons are reciprocally debtor and creditor of each other, the debts for which they are liable are extinguished by compensation, up to the amount of the lesser debt.

Compensation may not be claimed from the State, but the State may claim it.

1673. Compensation is effected by operation of law upon the coexistence of debts that are certain, liquid and exigible and the object of both of which is a sum of money or a certain quantity of fungible property identical in kind.

A person may apply for judicial liquidation of a debt in order to set it up for compensation.

1680. A debtor who has acquiesced unconditionally in the assignment or hypothecating of claims by his creditor to a third person may not afterwards set up against the third person any compensation that he could have set up against the original creditor before he acquiesced.

An assignment or hypothec in which a debtor has not acquiesced, but which from a certain time may be set up against him, prevents compensation only for debts of the original creditor which come after that time.

1681. Compensation may neither be effected nor be renounced to the prejudice of the acquired rights of a third person.

(d) Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25

637. If the affirmative declaration of the garnishee is not contested and does not show the existence of another seizure by garnishment in his hands, the clerk, upon an inscription by either party, orders the garnishee to pay to the seizing creditor the amounts which he owes to the judgment debtor to the extent of the amount of the judgment in capital, interest and costs. To that extent the order of the clerk effects an assignment, in favour of the seizing creditor, of the judgment debtor's claim, from the date of the seizure. Such order must be served on the garnishee and becomes executory 10 days later.

LASKIN J.A.:

A. INTRODUCTION

[1] This appeal arises out of a priorities dispute between two groups of creditors of an insolvent company, Ivaco Inc., and its related group of companies. The dispute is over the sale proceeds of the assets of Ivaco. On one side of the dispute are the employees and retirees in Ivaco's underfunded non-union pension plans. They claim under the deemed trust and lien provisions of Ontario's Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8, ss. 57(3), (4) ("PBA"), and seek to recover unpaid contributions to the plans outside of bankruptcy. On the other side of the dispute are Ivaco's financial and trade creditors. They wish to put Ivaco into bankruptcy in order to take advantage of the scheme of distribution under the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). The dispute arises because provincial deemed trusts do not, by virtue of that legislative designation, enjoy priority under the federal bankruptcy statute.

[2] Ivaco and its related group of companies (collectively "the Companies") became insolvent in 2003. In September 2003, the Companies sought and obtained court-ordered protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). All claims of creditors were stayed. A later order stayed the Companies' obligation to pay the outstanding past service contributions and special payments to the non-union pension plans. (Past service contributions are monies due to fund benefits or benefit enhancements for pension members' past service; special payments are extraordinary payments made because a pension plan is underfunded).

[3] The main purpose of CCAA proceedings is to facilitate the restructuring of an insolvent company so that it may stay in business. The Companies, however, were unable to restructure. In late 2004, virtually all of their assets were sold. All that remains is a pool of money: the proceeds of sale. All that remains to be done is to distribute this pool of money among the creditors.

[4] The Superintendent of Financial Services, representing the employees and retirees, brought a motion for an order that part of the sale proceeds be used to satisfy the unpaid past service and special contributions, which the Companies are deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plans under the PBA. Alternatively, the Superintendent sought an order segregating this amount in a separate account. The Quebec Pension Committee ("QPC"), the administrator of the largest non-union plan, supported the Superintendent's motion. Two of the Companies' lenders, the Bank of Nova Scotia and the National Bank, brought motions for an order lifting the stay under the CCAA and petitioning the Companies into bankruptcy.

[5] Farley J., who had supervised these CCAA proceedings for over two and a half years, heard all three motions. By order dated July 18, 2005 he dismissed the Superintendent's motion and partly granted the banks' motions. He lifted the stay and permitted the bankruptcy petitions to proceed, but he did not put the Companies into bankruptcy.

[6] The Superintendent appeals. She argues that the motions judge erred either in law or in the exercise of his discretion. The Superintendent submits that the motions judge erred in law by failing to order immediate payment of the amount of the deemed trusts or in failing to segregate this amount. The Superintendent contends that the PBA legally required that the deemed trusts for unpaid past service contributions and special payments be executed or protected before bankruptcy.

[7] Alternatively, the Superintendent submits that the motions judge erred by exercising his discretion to lift the stay under the CCAA and permit the bankruptcy petitions to proceed without first protecting the claims of the pension beneficiaries. The Superintendent contends that the motions judge exercised his discretion on a wrong principle because he ignored the unfairness and prejudice to the Companies' most vulnerable creditors.

[8] The Superintendent also appeals an ancillary order made by the motions judge. To facilitate the bankruptcy petitions, the motions judge ordered that the head offices of two of the Companies be transferred from cities in Quebec to Toronto. The Superintendent and the QPC submit that the motions judge had no jurisdiction under the CCAA to do so, or alternatively, improperly exercised his discretion in doing so.

[9] This court granted leave to appeal under s. 13 of the CCAA. The court also stayed the two orders in favour of the banks pending the disposition of the appeal.

B. RELEVANT FACTS AND CHRONOLOGY

a) The Companies

[10] Six related corporations were granted protection under the CCAA: Ivaco Inc., Ivaco Rolling Mills Ltd. ("IRM"), Ifastgroupe Inc., Docap (1985) Corporation, Florida Sub One Holdings Inc. and 3632610 Canada Inc. Four of these corporations – Ivaco, IRM, Ifastgroupe and Docap – established the non-union pension plans in issue on this appeal.

[11] Ivaco, IRM and Ifastgroupe ceased operations after their assets were sold. Only Docap now has any operating assets. Its assets consist mainly of inventory and accounts receivable that have not yet been sold. Docap is a small entity. Neither restructuring it nor selling it as a going concern seems a viable option. The National Bank, Docap's principal secured creditor, wishes to put the company into bankruptcy and liquidate its assets.

b) The non-union pension plans

[12] The Companies had both a unionized and non-unionized workforce. They established various registered pension plans for their employees. These included four non-union plans: the Ivaco Salaried Plan, which is registered in Quebec and has both Quebec and Ontario members, the Designated Employees Plan, the Ingersoll Plan and the Docap Plan, all registered in Ontario.

[13] The QPC administers the Ivaco Salaried Plan, which is the largest of the four plans. Ivaco formerly administered the other three plans. However, the Superintendent appointed PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. as administrator of the Designated Employees Plan and the Ingersoll Plan. A former Ivaco employee administers the Docap Plan for Ivaco.

c) The initial stay under the CCAA

[14] After their operations became financially troubled, the Companies sought and were granted protection from their creditors under the CCAA. On September 16, the motions judge granted a comprehensive stay of all creditor claims up to that time. He appointed Ernst & Young Inc. as Monitor. As a result of the stay, debts of the Companies existing on the date of the initial stay order have not been paid.

Digitized by Google

[15] During the CCAA proceedings the Companies continued to pay the wages and benefits of all active employees. The Companies also continued to pay their current contributions to their various pension plans.

d) The pension stay order

[16] When the Companies began CCAA proceedings, the non-union pension plans were underfunded. Before the initial stay order the Companies had been making both special payments and past services contributions to rectify this underfunding. Under the PBA, past service contributions accrue daily and are to be paid monthly.

[17] Early in the CCAA proceedings, the Monitor concluded that the Companies would jeopardize their ability to restructure if they were required to continue making past service contributions and special payments. Because of the magnitude of these payments, the creditors would not agree to permit the DIP (debtor in possession) loan to be used for funding the pension plans. In their view, and in the view of the Monitor, doing so would imperil the possibility of restructuring. Relying on the Monitor's opinion, the Companies sought, and on November 28, 2003, were granted a pension stay order.

[18] The motions judge relieved the Companies from making past service contributions or special payments to the underfunded non-union pension plans during the CCAA stay. No interested party, including both the Superintendent and the QPC, opposed the order. All parties thought that relieving the Companies from making these payments would assist their restructuring efforts. The Companies still remained obligated to make current contributions to the non-union plans.

[19] Paragraph 4 of the pension stay order stipulated that none of the Companies would incur any obligation because of the failure to make these past service contributions and special payments during the stay period:

> THIS COURT ORDERS that none of the Applicants or Partnerships, or their respective officers or directors shall incur any obligation, whether by way of debt, damages for breach of any duty, whether statutory, fiduciary, common law or otherwise, or for breach of trust, nor shall any trust be recognized, whether express, implied, constructive, resulting, deemed or otherwise, as a result of the failure of any person to make any contribution or payments other than current cost contribution obligations ("Current Contributions") during the Stay Period that they might otherwise have become required to make to any pension plans maintained by an Applicant or Partnership.

[20] Paragraph 5 of the pension stay order expressly recognized that statutory deemed trust, liens or other charges may arise because the Companies were relieved from paying past service contributions but that they would not have priority over the charges in the initial stay order:

> THIS COURT ORDERS that if any claim, lien, charge or trust arises as a result of the failure of any Person to make any contribution or payment (other than Current Contributions) during the Stay Period that such Person might otherwise have become required to make to any pension plans maintained by an Applicant or Partnership but for the stay provided for herein, no such claim, lien, charge or trust shall be recognized in this proceeding or in any subsequent receivership, interim receivership or bankruptcy of any of the Applicants or Partnerships as having priority over the claims of the Charges as set out in the Amended and Restated order.

[21] Paragraph 6 of the order recognized that the pension stay did not compromise the Companies' obligations under their non-union pension plans:

> Nothing in this Order shall be taken to extinguish or compromise the obligations of the Applicants and Partnerships, if any, regarding payments under the Pension Plans.

e) The sale to Heico

[22] As the Companies were unable to restructure, they began to pursue a second option: selling their assets in a going concern sale. On August 18, 2004, the motions judge approved the sale of the assets of Ivaco, Ifastgroupe and IRM to the Heico Companies. As part of the transaction, the purchaser hired the Companies' unionized workforce and assumed the Companies' obligations to their unionized pension plans. The purchaser also hired almost all of the Companies' non-unionized workforce, but it was unwilling to assume the Companies' obligations to the four non-union pension plans. These obligations remained with the Companies.

[23] Nonetheless, the Monitor supported the sale. In the Monitor's view, the sale gave the creditors and workers greater recovery and benefits than they would obtain in either a bankruptcy or a liquidation. Again, no party, including both the Superintendent and the QPC, opposed the sale.

[24] The motions judge made two orders — on August 18, 2004 and November 30, 2004 — vesting the assets in the purchaser. These orders expressly preserved all claims that might have been made against the assets by providing that these claims could be made against the sale proceeds. In accordance with these orders, the Monitor is holding the sale proceeds in various trust accounts.

[25] In December 2004, Ivaco, IRM and Ifastgroupe wound-up their non-union pension plans. Under the PBA, they are obligated to fund the wind-up liabilities of these plans.

f) The pension claims

[26] The Companies' non-union pension plans have been severely underfunded and the deficit has increased during the stay period. At the beginning of the CCAA proceedings in September 2003, unpaid past service contributions to the non-union plans totalled about $1.4 million and the solvency deficiency amounted to approximately $11.1 million. By December 2004 these figures had grown to approximately $11.6 million and $29.1 million respectively. They continued to grow while the pension stay order remained in place.

[27] The potential loss of benefits for each pensioner is significant. Counsel for the Superintendent advised the court that the average pensioner in the non-union plans is sixty-seven years old and earns a pension of $14,000 per year. These pensioners will receive their full pension only if the full wind-up deficit is paid. For example, if the plans do not recover the past service contributions suspended by the pension stay order, the average monthly pension will be reduced by 26 per cent from approximately $1,200 to $888. If only unpaid contributions are recovered, and not the full solvency deficiency, the average pension will be reduced by 17 per cent to $996 monthly.

g) The claims of the financial creditors

[28] The outstanding claims of the financial creditors of the Companies are also significant. We were told that the sale proceeds of the Companies' assets are insufficient to satisfy all claims, and are certainly insufficient to satisfy the unsecured claims.

[29] The Bank of Nova Scotia was the lender to IRM. By October 2003, IRM owed the Bank about $40 million. IRM had ceased to meet its liabilities generally as they became due, and had given notice to its creditors that it had suspended payment of its debts. On October 3, 2003 the Bank issued a petition for a receiving order against IRM. The issuance of the petition was permitted by the initial stay order, but that proceeding was otherwise stayed. The order under appeal lifted the stay and permitted the Bank of Nova Scotia to proceed with its petition.

[30] The National Bank lent money to Ivaco, Ifastgroupe and Docap. As of March 2005 it had a secured claim against Ivaco for $17 million,[1] and against Docap for $55,622 U.S. and $4.2 million Canadian. It also had an unsecured claim against Ifastgroupe for $45.5 million Canadian. Ifastgoupe is also indebted to La Caisse for $14.9 million.

[31] A large number of other creditors also have claims against the Companies: Ivaco has 792 creditors with claims totalling $554.9 million; Docap has 82 creditors with claims totalling $111.1 million; and Ifastgroupe has 645 creditors with claims totalling $253.3 million.

C. ANALYSIS

a) What is in issue on this appeal

[32] The scope of this appeal is quite narrow. There are three issues:

1) Did the motions judge err in law in failing to order immediate payment of the amount of the deemed trusts under the PBA or in failing to segregate this amount in a separate account?
2) Did the motions judge err in the exercise of his discretion by lifting the stay and permitting the bankruptcy petitions to proceed, without protecting the claims of the pension beneficiaries?
3) Did the motions judge err in law or in the exercise of his discretion by ordering the transfer of Ivaco's and Ifastgroupe's head offices from Quebec to Toronto?

b) What is not in issue on this appeal

[33] There are also three issues raised by the parties that do not need to be decided on this appeal: (1) whether, outside of bankruptcy, the deemed trusts under the PBA have priority over the Bank of Nova Scotia's security under s. 427 of the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c.46; (2) whether the Superintendent can show "sufficient cause" under s. 43(7) of the BIA to deny the application for a bankruptcy order; and, (3) whether the deemed trusts under the PBA also meet the requirements for a common law trust and thus on bankruptcy should be excluded from the property of the Companies under s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA.

[34] On my view of the appeal, the first of these issues does not have to be resolved. It may become relevant at the bankruptcy hearing, and, if so, should be dealt with by the bankruptcy judge. See Abraham v. Canadian Admiral Corp. (Receiver of) 1998 CanLII 2081 (ON CA), (1998), 39 O.R. (3d) 176 (C.A.). The second and third issues, I assume, will be dealt with at the hearing of the bankruptcy petitions. Admittedly, the motions judge made some observations on these two issues. However, he also said, at para. 20 of his reasons, that he was not deciding either one:

> However, in the circumstances, I do not find it appropriate to allow (indeed direct) that there be an assignment in bankruptcy on a "voluntary basis" as there is the s. 43(7) issue to be determined. Similarly with respect to the balance of declarations requested by the National Bank, while I have made some general observations as to reversing priorities, it > would not be appropriate to determine with finality the priorities of various claims on the record before me at this time.

[35] In their written and oral submissions, the Superintendent and the QPC argued that some of the motions judge's general observations on these issues were wrong. I do not propose to consider these arguments because, as the motions judge recognized, they should be addressed at the hearing of the bankruptcy petitions. Instead, I will make a few brief observations of my own.

[36] In my view, the motions judge appropriately considered what would likely happen at the bankruptcy hearing. He did so because the likely implications of lifting the stay were relevant considerations to the exercise of his discretion.

[37] The motions judge observed, at para. 14, that the discretion to refuse to make a bankruptcy order under s. 43(7) typically is exercised in two categories of cases: where the petitioner has an ulterior motive in seeking the order, or where the order would not serve any meaningful purpose. This observation reflects the current state of the case law under s. 43(7). See for example Re Dallas/North Group Inc. reflex, (1999), 46 O.R. (3d) 602 (Gen. Div.); Buth-na-bodhiaga, Inc. v. Lambert 2002 CanLII 45022 (ON CA), (2002), 60 O.R. (3d) 787 (C.A.). Although the motions judge added that the Superintendent's claim does not appear to come within either category, he left the final determination of that question for the bankruptcy judge.

[38] The motions judge also observed, at para. 11 of his reasons, that a provincially created deemed trust does not by that fact alone enjoy priority under the BIA. This is not a contentious proposition. In a series of cases, the Supreme Court of Canada has repeatedly said that a province cannot, by legislating a deemed trust, alter the scheme of priorities under the federal statute. See for example British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24; Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453. Indeed, it is this jurisprudence that undoubtedly prompted the Superintendent's original motion and appeal to this court.

[39] The motions judge also correctly observed, at para. 11 of his reasons, that a provincial deemed trust will retained its priority in bankruptcy only if it also meets the three attributes – the three certainties – of a common law trust: certainty of intent; certainty of subject matter; and certainty of object. Only a trust that has these three attributes is a "true trust" that will be exempt from the bankrupt's estate under s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA. See for example Henfrey Sampson, supra. Whether the Superintendent can establish a true trust for unpaid past service contributions, even though the proceeds of the Heico sale have been commingled, will be decided at the bankruptcy hearing.

c) Did the motions judge err in law in failing to order immediate payment of the amount of the deemed trusts or in failing to segregate this amount?

[41] The Superintendent's principal submission is that the motions judge erred in law in failing to order payment of the amount of the deemed trusts before bankruptcy or in failing to order the Monitor to segregate this amount during the CCAA proceedings. The submission that the motions judge was legally required to order payment or segregation of the amount of the deemed trusts was not advanced before him. The Superintendent advanced this submission for the first time in this court. I do not agree with it.

[42] I will deal first with whether the motions judge should have required the Monitor, Ernst & Young, to segregate the amount of the deemed trusts. The Superintendent contends that the Companies, and in their place the Monitor, had a statutory and fiduciary obligation to segregate. As the Monitor was an officer of the court, the motions judge should have compelled it to fulfill these duties. This contention faces three obstacles: the language of the PBA; the terms of the pension stay order; and the status and role of the Monitor.

[43] The deemed trusts for unpaid past service and special contributions are found in ss. 57(3) and (4) of the PBA. Subsection (3) is the basic provision that creates a deemed trust for unpaid employer contributions. Subsection (4) stipulates that on the wind up of a pension plan, employer contributions accrued but not yet due because of the timing of the wind up are also deemed to be held in trust:

> s. 57(3) An employer who is required to pay contributions to a pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to the employer contributions due and not paid into the pension fund.
> s. 57(4) Where a pension plan is wound up in whole or in part, an employer who is required to pay contributions to the pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations.

[44] At para. 11 of his decision, the motions judge said that both unpaid contributions and wind-up liabilities are deemed to be held in trust under s. 57(3). In his earlier decision in Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Usarco (1991), 42 E.T.R

235, Farley J. said, at para. 25, that the equivalent legislation then in force under the Pension Benefits Act, 1987, S.O. 1987, c.35 referred only to unpaid contributions, not to wind-up liabilities. I think that the statement in Usarco is correct, but I do not need to resolve the issue on this appeal.

[45] Under s. 57(5) of the PBA the plan administrator has a lien and charge on the assets of the employer for the amount of any deemed trust. The lien and charge permit the administrator to enforce the deemed trust.

> s. 57(5) The administrator of the pension plan has a lien and charge on the assets of the employer in an amount equal to the amounts deemed to be held in trust under subsections (1), (3) and (4).

[46] The Superintendent argues that these provisions required the Companies, and in their place the Monitor, to keep the unpaid contributions in a separate account. However, the language of s. 57 does not require the employer to hold the contributions separately. A "deemed trust" is, in a sense, a legal fiction. Outside of bankruptcy it does create a priority for pension contributions, a priority that would not exist but for the designation. Yet, as I have already said, this legislative designation by itself does not create a true trust. If the province wants to require an employer to keep its unpaid contributions to a pension plan in a separate account it must legislate that separation. It has not done so.

[47] The Superintendent argues that the pension stay order supports her position because para. 5 the order, supra, recognized that a deemed trust for unpaid contributions may arise during the stay period and that para. 6 of the stay order, supra, did not compromise the Companies' obligation to make these contributions. This argument fails to take account of para. 4 of the pension stay order. Paragraph 4 stipulates that during the stay the Companies will not incur any obligation – statutory, fiduciary or otherwise – for failing to make contributions to the plan. In my view, the Superintendent's argument amounts to an impermissible collateral attack on para. 4 of the pension stay order.

[48] The Superintendent also tries to buttress her position by arguing that the Monitor stands in the shoes of the Companies, and like the Companies, has a fiduciary duty to the pension beneficiaries. I disagree.

[49] The Monitor was appointed under s. 11.7(1) of the CCAA to "monitor the business and financial affairs" of the Companies, and was given the functions set out in s. 11.7(3) of that statute: to examine the Companies' property, report to the court on the Companies' business and financial affairs and keep the creditors informed. Although the motions judge gave the Monitor additional powers, they were limited. The Monitor was given authority to deal with day-to-day administrative matters, to finalize the sale to Heico and to receive and control the proceeds of sale. I do not think it can be fairly said that the Monitor "stands in the shoes of the Companies".

[50] Equally important, the Monitor does not owe a fiduciary duty to the pension beneficiaries. The Superintendent's attempt to impose an obligation on the Monitor to segregate the contributions to the non-union plans depends at least on establishing that the Monitor acts as a fiduciary of the employees in those plans. Both the role of the Monitor and the initial stay order preclude the Superintendent's assertion.

[51] Pension plan administrators do owe a fiduciary duty to plan members. See E.E. Gillese, The Fiduciary Liability of the Employer as Pension Plan Administrator (Toronto: The Canadian Institute, November 18, 1996, pp. 1-25). But the Monitor was not given that role. It is not an administrator of any of the four non-union plans. Indeed, the Superintendent never asked the court to give the Monitor responsibility for administering these plans.

[52] Moreover, para. 59 of the initial stay order expressly states that the Monitor is not to be considered either a successor or related employer.

> THIS COURT ORDERS that nothing in this Order shall result in the Monitor being or being deemed or considered to be a successor or related employer, sponsor or payor with respect to any Applicant or any employees or former employees of any Applicant under any legislation, including ... the Pension Benefits Act (Ontario) ... or under any other provincial or federal legislation, regulation or rule of law or equity applicable to employees or pensions, or otherwise." [Emphasis added].

As the Monitor was neither a plan administrator nor a successor employer, it can owe no fiduciary duty to the members of the four plans.

[53] Therefore, the combination of the wording of s. 57 of the PBA, para. 4 of the pension stay order and the limited role of the Monitor, refute the Superintendent's segregation argument. The Superintendent, however, submits that two cases, the decision of this court in GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. - Canada v. TCT Logistics Inc. 2005 CanLII 3584 (ON CA), (2005), 74 O.R. (3d) 382 (C.A.) and an earlier decision of the motions judge in Usarco, supra, support the argument for segregation. In my view, both cases are distinguishable.

[54] In TCT Logistics, this court held that an interim receiver, who was both an officer of the court and stood in the shoes of the debtor, had a statutory duty under the legislation then in force, s. 15 of the Load Brokers Regulation, O.Reg. 556/92 (passed under the Truck Transportation Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. T.-22) to hold carriers' fees that it had collected in a separate trust account. TCT Logistics and this case differ in three critical ways.

Digitized by Google

[55] First, the interim receiver in TCT Logistics, was not just an officer of the court, it stood in the place of the debtor company. Here, although the Monitor is an officer of the court, it does not stand in the place of the Companies. For the reasons outlined in para. 49 its role is far more limited.

[56] Second, in TCT Logistics the court order authorized the interim receiver to hold the carriers' fees in a separate bank account until entitlement to that money was decided. Here, the pension stay order prohibited the Companies from making any past service or special contributions during the stay period.

[57] Third, and perhaps most important, the applicable legislation in TCT Logistics, s. 15(2) of the Load Brokers Regulation required the debtor company to maintain a separate trust account and to keep the fees it collected for the carriers in that account. Here, s. 57 of the PBA does not similarly require an employer to keep its unpaid contributions in a separate trust account. Moreover, in TCT Logistics, despite s. 15(2) of the Regulation, this court held that the carrier fees previously collected by the debtor company lost their character as trust money because they had been commingled with other funds. TCT Logistics thus does not support the Superintendent's position.

[58] In Usarco, supra, at para. 16, Farley J. commented that the deemed trust provisions of the PBA "implied a fiduciary obligation on the part of Usarco", and that "a trustee in bankruptcy stepping into the shoes of Usarco must deal with that fiduciary obligation". These comments do not apply to this case. The Monitor here, unlike the trustee in bankruptcy in Usarco, did not step into the shoes of the debtor. Thus, Usarco does not assist the Superintendent.

[59] For these reasons, I reject the Superintendent's argument that the motions judge was required in law to order the segregation of the amount of the deemed trusts during the CCAA proceeding. I now turn to the Superintendent's other submission: that the motions judge was required in law to order that the amount of the deemed trust be paid at the end of the CCAA proceedings, but before bankruptcy.

[60] The CCAA itself did not require the motions judge to execute the deemed trusts. The Superintendent cannot point to any section of the statute where a legal obligation to order payment of the past service contributions can be found. Moreover, in my view, absent an agreement, I doubt that the CCAA even authorized the motions judge to order this payment. Once restructuring was not possible and the CCAA proceedings were spent, as the motions judge found and all parties acknowledged, I question whether the court had any authority to order a distribution of the sale proceeds. See for example Re United Maritimes Fisheries Cooperative (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 170 at 173 (N.B.Q.B.).

[61] The Superintendent's submission that the motions judge was required to order payment of the outstanding contributions rests on the proposition that a gap exists between the CCAA and the BIA in which the provincial deemed trusts can be executed. This proposition runs contrary to the federal bankruptcy and insolvency regime and to the principle that the province cannot reorder priorities in bankruptcy.

[62] The federal insolvency regime includes the CCAA and the BIA. The two statutes are related. A debtor company under the CCAA is defined in s. 2 by the company's bankruptcy or insolvency. Section 11(3) authorizes a thirty-day stay of any current or prospective proceedings under the BIA, and s. 11(4) authorizes an extension of the initial thirty-day period. During the stay period, creditor claims and bankruptcy proceedings are suspended. Once the stay is lifted by court order or terminates by its own terms, simultaneously the creditor claims and bankruptcy proceedings are revived and may go forward.

[63] For the Superintendent's position to be correct, there would have to be a gap between the end of the CCAA period and bankruptcy proceedings, in which the pension beneficiaries' rights under the deemed trusts crystallize before the rights of all other creditors, including their right to bring a bankruptcy petition. That position is illogical. All rights must crystallize simultaneously at the end of the CCAA period. There is simply no gap in the federal insolvency regime in which the provincial deemed trusts alone can operate. That is obviously so on the facts in this case because the Bank of Nova Scotia had already commenced a petition for bankruptcy, which was stayed by the initial order under the CCAA. Once the motions judge lifted the stay, the petition was revived. In my view, however, the situation would be the same even if no bankruptcy petition was pending.

[64] Where a creditor seeks to petition a debtor company into bankruptcy at the end of CCAA proceedings, any claim under a provincial deemed trust must be dealt with in bankruptcy proceedings. The CCAA and the BIA create a complementary and interrelated scheme for dealing with the property of insolvent companies, a scheme that occupies the field and ousts the application of provincial legislation. Were it otherwise, creditors might be tempted to forgo efforts to restructure a debtor company and instead put the company immediately into bankruptcy. That would not be a desirable result.

[65] Also, giving effect to the Superintendent's position, in substance, would allow a province to do indirectly what it is precluded from doing directly. Just as a province cannot directly create its own priorities or alter the scheme of distribution of property under the BIA, neither can it do so indirectly. See Husky Oil, supra, at paras. 32 and 39. At bottom the Superintendent seeks to alter the scheme for distributing an insolvent company's assets under the BIA. It cannot do so.

Digitized by Google

[66] The Superintendent relies on one authority in support of its position: the decision of the motions judge in Usarco, supra. In that case, although a bankruptcy petition had been brought, Farley J. nonetheless ordered the receiver to pay to the pension plan administrator the amount of the deemed trusts under the PBA. However, the facts in Usarco differed materially from the facts in this case.

[67] In Usarco, CCAA proceedings did not precede the bankruptcy petition. Moreover, in Usarco the petitioning creditor was not proceeding with its bankruptcy petition because its principal had died, and no other creditor took steps to advance the petition. Thus, unlike in this case, in Usarco it was unclear whether bankruptcy proceedings would ever take place.

[68] Recently in Re General Chemical Canada Ltd., [2005] O.J. No. 5436, Campbell J. relied on this distinction, followed the motions judge's decision in the present case and refused to order payment of the amount of the deemed trusts under the PBA. He wrote at para. 35:

> To conclude otherwise (absent improper motive on the part of Company or a major creditor) would be to negate both CCAA proceedings and bankruptcy proceedings by preventing creditors from pursuing a process of equitable distribution of the debtor's property as they believe it to be when making their decisions.

I agree. The factual differences between General Chemical and this case on the one hand, and Usarco on the other, render Usarco of no assistance to the Superintendent on this appeal.

[69] Because the federal legislative regime under the CCAA and the BIA determines the claims of creditors of an insolvent company, if the rights of pension claimants are to be given greater priority, Parliament, not the courts, must do so. And Parliament has at least signalled its intention to do so. Last year it passed the Wage Earner Protection Program Act, S.C. 2005 c.47. That Act would amend the BIA and give special priority to unpaid pension contributions of a bankrupt employer. This statute, however, has not been proclaimed in force. That it was passed perhaps shows that under the existing legislative regime, claims like that of the Superintendent must fail. I would reject this ground of appeal.

d) Did the motions judge err in the exercise of his discretion by lifting the stay and permitting the bankruptcy petitions to proceed?

[70] In my view, the motions judge's order lifting the stay was a discretionary order. He summarized his reasons for rejecting the Superintendent's position and exercising his discretion to allow the bankruptcy petitions to proceed at para. 18 of his decision:

> In the end result I do not see that the Superintendent has made a compelling case to the effect that the petitions in bankruptcy should not be allowed to proceed in the ordinary course. I have reached that conclusion by weighing the factors pro and con as discussed above, including the relative benefits to all stakeholders (including workers and pensioners) to maintaining the CCAA proceedings (with the benefit of the suspension of past contributions as per the unopposed and un-reconsidered order of November 28, 2003), the fact that no reorganization is now possible as all Ivaco Companies (except Docap) have ceased operations and are without operational assets and that the Ivaco Companies are now essentially in a distribution of proceeds mode.

[71] Appellate review of a discretionary order under the CCAA is limited. See Re Air Canada 2003 CanLII 36792 (ON CA), (2003), 66 O.R. (3d) 257 at para. 25 (C.A.); Re Royal Crest Lifecare Group Inc. 2004 CanLII 19809 (ON CA), (2004), 46 C.B.R. (4th) 126 at para. 23 (Ont. C.A.); Algoma Steel Inc. v. Union Gas Ltd. 2003 CanLII 30833 (ON CA), (2003), 63 O.R. (3d) 78 at para. 16 (C.A.). Appellate intervention is justified only for an error in principle or the unreasonable exercise of discretion. The Superintendent submits that the motions judge exercised his discretion improperly – on a wrong principle – because he ignored the "unfair and prejudicial" effects of his order on the Companies' most vulnerable class of creditors: the pension beneficiaries. I disagree.

[72] The Superintendent argues that the motions judge's order was unfair to the pension beneficiaries in three related ways. First, she points out that the pension beneficiaries agreed to a stay of the past service contributions to keep the Companies afloat, which in turn permitted the going concern sale to Heico. That sale greatly enhanced the return to the creditors. The Superintendent contends that now permitting the bankruptcy petitions to proceed, which would potentially deprive the pension beneficiaries of their rights, produces an unfair outcome.

[73] Undoubtedly, and regrettably, the pension beneficiaries stand to suffer from the insolvency of the Companies. However, the Superintendent's argument implicitly assumes that the pension beneficiaries alone made sacrifices to maximize the recovery for all creditors. The motions judge rejected this assumption, which he said at para. 2 of his reasons, "somewhat overstates the situation". The motions judge accurately concluded:

> [O]ther stakeholders (such as the financial and trade creditors) as a result of the stay also contributed to the financial stability of the Ivaco Companies, fragile as their financial situation was, by not being paid interest as such became due nor for pre-filing indebtedness which was due.

In short, all creditors gave up something to permit the Companies to stay in business so that they could either reorganize or sell their assets in a going concern sale.

[74] Second, the Superintendent contends that the motions judge's order undermined his earlier pension stay order, which had expressly preserved the pension beneficiaries' deemed trust rights. I do not accept this contention. Although the pension stay order did not take away these deemed trust rights, it did not provide that the deemed trusts would be paid out of any sale proceeds. Instead, para. 4 of the pension stay order provided that the Companies would not incur any obligation because of their failure to pay past service contributions during the stay period. Moreover, even though the Superintendent and the QPC knew that a petition for bankruptcy (by the Bank of Nova Scotia) was pending when they agreed to the pension stay order, they did not ask that the order be conditional on payment of the amount of the deemed trusts when the stay was lifted.

[75] The third aspect of unfairness on which the Superintendent relies is that the motions judge's order fails to take account of the law's "special solicitude" for pensioners. Certainly provincial pension legislation has shown this solicitude. It has recognized the importance of ensuring that retirees have income security. Thus, it has legislated statutory trusts and liens to protect their pension claims. But federal insolvency law has not shown the same solicitude. It does not accord the claims of "sympathetic" creditors more weight than the claims of "unsympathetic" ones. Subject to specified exceptions, the BIA aims to distribute a bankrupt debtor's estate equitably among all of the estate's creditors. There are undoubtedly compelling policy reasons to protect pension rights in an insolvency. But, as I have said, it is for Parliament, not the courts, to do so.

[76] Therefore, I do not accept the Superintendent's unfairness argument. Also, in my view, numerous considerations supported the motions judge's decision to lift the stay and permit the bankruptcy petitions to proceed. These considerations include the following:

- The CCAA proceedings are spent. There are no entities to reorganize and no further compromises can be negotiated between the Companies and their creditors. There remains only a pool of money to distribute. The BIA is the regime Parliament has chosen to effect this distribution.
- The petitioning creditors have met the technical requirements for bankruptcy. And their desire to use the BIA to alter priorities is a legitimate reason to seek a bankruptcy order. See for example Bank of Montreal v. Scott Road Enterprises Ltd. 1989 CanLII 2726 (BC CA), (1989), 57 D.L.R. (4th) 623 at 627, 630-631 (B.C.C.A); Re Harrop of Milton Inc. (1979), 22 O.R. (2d) 239 at 244-245 (S.C.).
- The Superintendent and the QPC agreed to the CCAA process. They recognized that it benefitted the pension claimants. Thus, they did not oppose either the pension stay order or the sale to Heico. They did not ask to have the deemed trusts satisfied or an amount to satisfy them set aside, though they knew that bankruptcy was pending. They likely recognized that if they had insisted on a segregation order, the other creditors may not have agreed to the sale. It is now too late for the Superintendent and the QPC to ask for relief that they never sought during the entire CCAA process.
- The motions judge would have gone beyond his role as a referee in the CCAA proceedings if he had given effect to the Superintendent's claim. The Superintendent wants to jump ahead of all the other creditors by obtaining an extraordinary payment at the end of a long CCAA process. If the motions judge had ordered this payment, he would have upset the ground rules that all stakeholders agreed to and that he supervised for over two years.

[77] The motions judge took into account the likely result of the Superintendent's claims if the Companies are put into bankruptcy. He recognized that bankruptcy would potentially reverse the priority accorded to the pension claims outside bankruptcy. Nonetheless, having weighed all the competing considerations, he exercised his discretion to lift the stay and permit the bankruptcy petitions to proceed. In my view, he exercised his discretion properly. I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

e) Did the motions judge err by ordering the transfer of Ivaco and Ifastgroupe's head offices from Quebec to Toronto?

[78] Ivaco's head office was in Montreal; Ifastgroupe's head office was in Marieville, Quebec. The motions judge ordered that these head offices be transferred to Toronto. He did so in the light of s. 43(5) of the BIA, which states that an application for a bankruptcy petition shall be filed in the court having jurisdiction in the judicial district of the locality of the debtor. The Superintendent, supported by the QPC, submits that the motions judge had no jurisdiction to make this order, or that he improperly exercised his discretion in doing so. I disagree with both submissions.

[79] The Superintendent and the QPC contend that the CCAA does not expressly authorize a judge to transfer the location of the head office of a debtor company. And, although a judge in CCAA proceedings has inherent jurisdiction to control the court's processes, the judge does not have a similar jurisdiction to do what the motions judge did here: control the debtor Companies' or the creditors' processes. See Re Stelco Inc. 2005 CanLII 8671 (ON CA), (2005), 75 O.R. (3d) 5 at para. 38 (C.A).

[80] I accept the Superintendent's and the QPC's contention that the CCAA did not give the motions judge jurisdiction to order the transfer. I also accept that the transfer was not made to facilitate a restructuring under the CCAA. Instead it was made to facilitate future bankruptcy proceedings. Nonetheless, in my view, the motions judge did not need to resort to the CCAA because he had express authority to order the transfer in s. 191 of the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44. Sections 191(1) and (2) provide:

> s. 191(1) In this section, "reorganization" means a court order made under;
> (a) section 241;
> (b) the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act approving a proposal; or > (c) any other Act of Parliament that affects the rights among the corporation, its shareholders and creditors.
> s. 191(2) If a corporation is subject to an order referred to in subsection (1), its articles may be amended by such order to effect any change that might be lawfully be made by an amendment under section 173.

[81] The applicable section here is section 191(1)(c). The stay order is an order under an Act of Parliament, the CCAA, that affects the rights among the Companies, its shareholders and its creditors. See Re Beatrice Foods Inc. reflex, (1996), 43 C.B.R. (4th) 10 (Ont. Gen. Div.). Therefore, as both Ivaco and Ifastgroupe were subject to an order under s. 191(1)(c) of the CBCA, under s. 191(2) each of its articles may be amended to effect any change that might be made by an amendment under s. 173. Section 173(1)(b) of the statute permits a corporation to change the location of its head office:

> s. 173(1) Subject to sections 176 and 177, the articles of a corporation may by special resolution be amended to
> ...
> (b) change the province in which its registered office is situated;

[82] On my reading of the statute, s. 191 is a stand-alone section that gave the motions judge authority to order the transfer. Provided a corporation is subject to an order under s. 191(1), its articles may be amended. The amending order under s. 191(2) need not serve the purpose of the triggering statute in s. 191(1), in this case the CCAA. If Parliament had wanted to limit amendments to those that would facilitate a reorganization, it could have said so. Thus, the combination of ss. 191(1)(c), 191(2) and 173(1)(b) gave the motions judge the jurisdiction to order the transfer of Ivaco and Ifastgroupe's head offices from Quebec to Toronto. Resort to the CCAA was unnecessary.

[83] The Superintendent and the QPC rely on this court's decision in Re Stelco in support of their argument. However, that case differs from the present case in a material way. In Re Stelco the issue was whether a motions judge in CCAA proceedings could order the removal of two members of the company's board of directors under s. 109(1) of the CBCA. The power to remove directors is vested in the shareholders. Blair J.A. held that the motions judge could not rely on the court's discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA to override or supplant the specific power in s. 109(1) of the CBCA. The discretion under s. 11 must be used to control the court's processes, not the company's processes.

[84] By contrast, in the present case, s. 191 of the CBCA gives the court express authority to order the transfer of the head office of a company that is subject to an order under the CCAA. Thus, to make a transfer order, the court need not rely on its discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA.

[85] However, the jurisdiction in s. 191(2) is discretionary, as evidenced by the use of the word "may". Therefore, the remaining question on this ground of appeal is whether the motions judge properly exercised his discretion in ordering the transfer. I think that he did.

[86] Ivaco and Ifastgroupe had not actively carried on business since the sale of their assets to Heico was completed in December 2004. The Monitor holds the proceeds of the sales in bank accounts in Toronto. Because of the lengthy and complex CCAA proceedings, the Ontario Superior Court – Commercial List is familiar with the affairs of Ivaco and Ifastgroupe. Having all the issues common to all the Companies administered at the same time before the court familiar with these issues will facilitate the most efficient, consistent and just administration and distribution of their estates.

[87] The QPC, in particular, objects to these head office transfers. It argues that the motions judge's order will enable the creditors to defeat a future motion to transfer to the Quebec Superior Court the question whether the Companies participating in the Ivaco Salaried Plan are "solidarily liable", that is jointly and severely liable, under Quebec law for satisfying the obligation to fund the plan.

Digitized by Google

[88] The underpinning of the QPC's argument is as follows: the "solidarily liable" provision is unique to Quebec law and therefore should be decided by a Quebec court. Whether the Quebec or the Ontario Superior Court presides over this future motion will turn on the application of the forum conveniens principle. One relevant factor in assessing the forum conveniens is the residence or place of business of the parties. According to the QPC, transferring Ivaco's and Ifastgroupe's head offices to Toronto will tip the scales in favour of the Ontario Superior Court hearing the "solidarily liable" motion.

[89] It seems to me that this is a weak argument. The QPC has not yet brought this motion. When it does, the Ontario Superior Court can assess the relevant considerations affecting the appropriate forum. Now, however, the motions judge's transfer order just makes good sense. He, therefore, exercised his discretion properly. I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

D. CONCLUSION

[90] The motions judge did not err in law in refusing to order the immediate payment of the amount of the deemed trusts under the Pension Benefits Act or in refusing to segregate that amount. Nor did he err in exercising his discretion to lift the stay under the CCAA and permit the bankruptcy petitions to proceed. Finally, the motions judge did not err in ordering that the head offices of Ivaco and Ifastgroupe be transferred from Quebec to Toronto. Accordingly, I would dismiss the Superintendent's appeal.

[91] If the parties cannot agree on the costs of the appeal, they may make written submissions to the court. These submissions should be delivered within 30 days of the release of these reasons.

INTRODUCTION

[1] On August 31, 2000, applications were brought by Dundee Securities Corporation, Peters & Co. Limited, Nesbitt Burns Inc., Newcrest Capital Inc., RBC Dominion Securities, Bunting Warburg Dillon Read Inc., First Energy Capital Corporation (being the underwriters in the flow-through common share offering of Merit Energy Ltd., described below), certain directors and officers of Merit Energy Ltd. and Larry Delf, a representative purchaser of flow-through common shares in Merit, to determine whether these applicants were entitled to a priority in the nature of an equitable lien over the proceeds of the sale of Merit's assets.

[2] I dismissed the equitable lien applications. The Underwriters, except First Energy Capital Corporation, appealed that decision.

[3] Needless to say, the applicants wanted to be recognized as ordinary creditors of Merit in the event they did not have an equitable lien.

[4] Pending the hearing of the equitable lien appeal, the administration of the estate of Merit continued. As a result of my dismissal of the equitable lien claim, the Trustee anticipated that a fund of approximately $10 million would be available for distribution to unsecured creditors.

[5] Accordingly, the Trustee sought a determination as to the right of the Flow-Through Shareholders, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers to be recognized as ordinary creditors of Merit and to be included in the distribution.

[6] I heard argument on that issue on April 30, 2001 but reserved my decision until the results of the appeal were known. On May 18, 2001, the appeal was heard and dismissed[1], so it is now appropriate to make the requested determination.

[7] The Trustee takes the position that the claims in issue are in substance claims by shareholders for the return of equity and, on the basis of the decision in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp.[2], must rank behind the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors.

[8] Alternatively, the Trustee argues that their claims are too contingent to constitute provable claims under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. [3]

[9] The Flow-Through Shareholders, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers[4] submitted that their claims were in substance creditor claims and that they were not too contingent, thus qualifying them to rank as unsecured creditors in Merit's insolvency. If that position is sustained, the quantification of those claims will be a separate issue.

BACKGROUND

Digitized by Google

[10] Merit was in the business of the exploration, development and production of natural gas and crude oil in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

[11] On July 15, 1999, the Underwriters entered into an underwriting agreement with Merit whereby they agreed to participate in a public offering of 2,222,222 Flow-Through Shares of Merit. Paragraph 16 of the Underwriting Agreement states in part:

> The Corporation shall indemnify and save each of the Indemnified Persons harmless against and from all liabilities, claims, demands, losses, (other than losses of profit in connection with the distribution of common shares), costs, damages and expenses to which any of the Indemnified Persons may be subject or which any of the Indemnified Persons may suffer or incur, whether under the provisions of any statute or otherwise, in any way caused by, or arising directly or indirectly from or in consequence of:
> (a) any information or statement contained in the Public Record (other than any information or statement relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and furnished to the Corporation by the Underwriters for inclusion in the Public Record) which is or is alleged to be untrue or any omission or alleged omission to provide any information or state any fact the omission of which makes or is alleged to make any such information or statement untrue or misleading in light of all the circumstances in which it was made;
> (b) any misrepresentation or alleged misrepresentation (except a misrepresentation or alleged misrepresentation which is based upon information relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and furnished to the Corporation by the Underwriters for inclusion in the Public Record) in the Public Record.

[12] The Underwriting Agreement provides in Paragraph 2 (entitled "Corporation's Covenants as to Qualification") that:

> [Merit] agrees:
> (a) prior to the filing of the Preliminary Prospectus and thereafter and prior to the filing of the Prospectus, to allow the Underwriters to participate fully in the preparation of the Preliminary Prospectus (excluding the documents incorporated therein by reference) and such other documents as may be required under the Applicable Securities Laws in the Filing Jurisdictions to qualify the distribution of the Common Shares in the Filing Jurisdictions and allow the Underwriters to conduct all due diligence which the Underwriters may reasonably require (including with respect to the documents incorporated therein by reference) in order to (i) confirm the Public Record is accurate and current in all material respects; (ii) fulfill the Underwriters' obligations as agents and underwriters; and (iii) enable the Underwriters to responsibly execute the certificate in the Preliminary Prospectus or the Prospectus required to be executed by the Underwriters;
> (b) the Corporation shall, not later than on July 19, 1999, have prepared and filed the Preliminary Prospectus...with the Securities Commissions...
> (c) the Corporation shall prepare and file the Prospectus...as soon as possible and in any event not later than 4:30 p.m. (Calgary time) on August 3, 1999...
> (e) that, during the period commencing with the date hereof and ending on the conclusion of the distribution of the Common Shares, the Preliminary Prospectus and the Prospectus will fully comply with the requirements of Applicable Securities Laws of the Filing Jurisdictions and, together with all information incorporated therein by reference, will provide full, true and plain disclosure of all material facts relating to the Corporation and the Common Shares and will not contain any misrepresentation; provided that the Corporation does not covenant with respect to information or statements contained in such documents relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and furnished to the Corporation by one or more of the Underwriters for inclusion in such documents or omissions from such documents relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and the foregoing covenant shall not be considered to be contravened as a consequence of any material change occurring after the date hereof or the occurrence of any event or state of facts after the date hereof if, in each such case, the Corporation complies with subparagraphs 3(a), (b), (c) and (d).

[13] In accordance with its covenant, Merit filed a Preliminary Prospectus and a Prospectus to qualify the shares for issue and ultimately the offering closed on August 17, 1999, at which time 2, 222, 222 Flow-Through Shares of Merit were issued.

[14] The Prospectus indicated that:

Digitized by Google

The gross proceeds of this Offering will be used to incur CEE in connection with the Corporation's ongoing oil and natural gas exploration activities. The Underwriters' fee and the expenses of this Offering will be paid from Merit's general funds...

The Flow-through Common Shares will be issued as 'Flow-through Shares' under the Act. The Corporation will incur on or before December 31, 2000, and renounce to each purchaser of Flow-through Common Shares, effective on or before December 31, 1999, CEE in an amount equal to the aggregate purchase price equal to the aggregate purchase price paid by such purchaser.
Subscriptions for Flow-through Common Shares will be made pursuant to one or more subscription agreements ('Subscription Agreements') to made between the Corporation and one or more of the Underwriters or one or more sub-agents of the Underwriters , as agent for, on behalf of and in the name of the purchasers of Flow-through Common Shares...

[15] The Prospectus also indicated that:

... Pursuant to the Subscription Agreements, the Corporation will covenant and agree (i) to incur on or before December 31, 2000 and renounce to the purchaser, effective on or before December 31, 1999, CEE in an amount equal to the aggregate purchase price paid by such purchaser for the Flow-Through Common Shares and (ii) that if the Corporation does not renounce to such purchaser, effective on or before December 31, 1999, CEE equal to such amount, or if there is a reduction in such amount renounced pursuant to the provision of the Act and as the sole recourse of the purchaser for such failure or reduction, the Corporation shall indemnify the purchaser as to, and pay in settlement thereof to the purchaser, an amount equal to the amount of any tax payable or that may become payable under the Act...by the purchaser as a consequence of such failure or reduction...
In respect of CEE renounced effective on December 31, 1999, and not incurred prior to the end of the period commencing on the date that the Subscription Agreement is entered into and ending on February 29, 2000, the Corporation will be required to pay an amount equivalent to interest to the Government of Canada. Any amount of CEE renounced on December 31, 1999 and not incurred by December 31, 2000 will result in a reassessment of deductible CEE to subscribers. However, interest in respect of additional tax payable under the Act by a purchaser of Flow-Through Common Shares will generally not be levied in respect of such reassessment until after April 30, 2001.

[16] The Underwriters each entered into Subscription and Renunciation Agreements with Merit for the purchase of the Flow-Through Shares, containing the covenants described in paragraph 15 above.

[17] Merit did not incur CEE as anticipated and in fact only approximately $4 million (of the anticipated $15 million of CEE) was renounced to the Flow-Through Shareholders prior to Merit being placed in receivership, leaving an $11 million shortfall. As a result, those Flow-Through Shareholders, who anticipated tax deductions based on $15 million of CEE, were potentially faced with a tax problem.

[18] The Directors and Officers entered into indemnity agreements with Merit, which state in part that:

To the full extent allowed by law, [Merit]...agrees to indemnify and save harmless the Indemnified Party, his heirs, successors and legal representatives from and against any and all damages, liabilities, costs, charges or expenses suffered or incurred by the Indemnified Party, his heirs, successors or legal representatives as a result of or by reason of the Indemnified Party being or having been a director and/or officer of [Merit] or by reason of any action taken by the Indemnified Party in his capacity as a director and/or officer of [Merit], including without limitation, any liability for unpaid employee wages, provided that such damages, liabilities, costs, charges or expenses were not suffered or incurred as a direct result of the Indemnified Party's own fraud, dishonesty or wilful default.

[19] Merit, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers have been named as defendants in several actions commenced throughout Canada by or on behalf of the Flow-Through Shareholders. These actions allege that Merit, the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers are liable to the Plaintiffs because of misrepresentations made in the Prospectus. The Plaintiffs seek, inter alia, damages against all defendants, recission of their purchase of the Flow-Through Shares and damages for lost tax benefits associated with the Flow-Through Shares. The Underwriters have third-partied Merit and the Directors and Officers. As noted, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers previously sought recognition as equitable lien holders (which was denied) and now they seek recognition as ordinary creditors.

[20] PriceWaterhouseCoopers was at all material times the auditor of Merit. As PriceWaterhouseCoopers had not yet filed a proof of claim at the time the Trustee filed its motion, the Trustee's materials did not address its claim as part of its application. However, the Trustee did not object to PriceWaterhouseCoopers participating in this application.

Digitized by Google

[21] PriceWaterhouseCoopers is in a similar position as the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers as it too has an indemnity from Merit and has also been sued by the Flow-Through Shareholders for misrepresentation. Its indemnity states that:

> Merit Energy Ltd. hereby indemnifies PriceWaterhouseCoopers LLP ("PriceWaterhouseCoopers")...and holds them harmless from all claims, liabilities, losses, and costs arising in circumstances where there has been a knowing misrepresentation by a member of Merit Energy Ltd.'s management, regardless of whether such a person was acting in Merit Energy Ltd.'s interest. This indemnification will survive termination of this engagement letter. This release and indemnification will not operate where PriceWaterhouseCoopers ought to have uncovered such knowing misrepresentation but failed to, due the gross negligence or willful misconduct of PriceWaterhouseCoopers, its partners and/or employees.

ISSUES

1. Are the claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors?
2. Are the claims of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors?

DECISION - ISSUE 1

The claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders are subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors as they are in substance shareholder claims for the return of an equity investment.

ANALYSIS

[22] Central to this application are the reasons of my sister Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp.

[23] In that case, Big Bear Exploration Ltd. completed a hostile takeover for all of the shares of Blue Range Resource Corporation. After the takeover was completed, Big Bear alleged that the publicly disclosed information upon which it had relied in purchasing the Blue Range shares was misleading and that the shares were worthless. As sole shareholder, Big Bear authorized Blue Range to commence CCAA proceedings and then submitted a claim as an unsecured creditor in Blue Range's CCCA proceedings, based on the damages it alleged it had suffered as a result of Blue Range's misrepresentations.

[24] Romaine J. rejected Big Bear's attempt to prove as an unsecured creditor and held that Big Bear's claim was "in substance" a shareholder claim for a return of an equity investment and therefore ranked after the claims of unsecured creditors according to the general principles of corporate law, insolvency law and equity.

[25] Romaine J. stated at pp. 176-177:

> In this case, the true nature of Big Bear's claim is more difficult to characterize. There may well be scenarios where the fact that a party with a claim in tort or debt is a shareholder is coincidental or incidental, such as where a shareholder is also a regular trade creditor of a corporation, or slips and falls outside the corporate office and thus has a claim in negligence against the corporation. In the current situation, however, the very core of the claim is the acquisition of Blue Range shares by Big Bear and whether the consideration paid for such shares was based on misrepresentation. Big Bear had no cause of action until it acquired shares of Blue Range, which it did through share purchases for cash prior to becoming a majority shareholder, as it suffered no damage until it acquired such shares. This tort claim derives from Big Bear's status as shareholder, and not from a tort unrelated to that status. The claim for misrepresentation therefore is hybrid in nature and combines elements of both a claim in tort and a claim as shareholder. It must be determined what character it has in substance.
> It is true that Big Bear does not claim recission. Therefore, this is not a claim for return of capital in the direct sense. What is being claimed, however, is an award of damages measured as the difference between the "true" value of Blue Range shares and their "misrepresented" value - in other words, money back from what Big Bear "paid" by way of consideration...A tort award to Big Bear could only represent a return of what Big Bear invested in equity of Blue Range. It is that kind of return that is limited by the basic common law principle that shareholders rank after creditors in respect of any return on their equity investment. ...
> I find that the alleged share exchange loss derives from and is inextricably intertwined with Big Bear's shareholder interest in Blue Range. The nature of the claim is in substance a claim by a shareholder for a return of what it invested qua shareholder, rather than an ordinary tort claim.

[26] Romaine J. went on at pp. 177-184 to describe five policy reasons which justified the conclusion that shareholders' claims such as Big Bear's should be ranked behind the claims of Blue Range's unsecured creditors. In summary, they are:

(i) the claims of shareholders rank behind the claims of creditors in insolvency;

Digitized by Google

(ii) creditors do business on the assumption that they will rank ahead of shareholders in the event of their debtor's insolvency;
(iii) shareholders are not entitled to rescind their shares on the basis of misrepresentation after the company has become insolvent;
(iv) United States jurisprudence supports the priority of creditors in "stockholder fraud" cases; and
(v) to allow the shareholders to rank pari passu with the unsecured creditors could open the floodgates to aggrieved shareholders launching misrepresentation actions.

[27] Re Canada Deposit Insurance* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank [5] is also central to this application. That case involved an issue of priorities with respect to the insolvency of the Canadian Commercial Bank. In an effort to preserve the bank, a participation agreement was entered into among the governments of Canada and Alberta, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and six commercial banks. The sum of $255 million was advanced and it was to be repaid by CCB out of certain portfolio assets and pre-tax income. The agreement promised an indemnity in the event of insolvency, and gave the participants a right to subscribe for shares in CCB at a named price.
[28] The Supreme Court of Canada held that although the participation agreement contained both debt and equity features, it was, in substance, a debt transaction. Iacobucci J. stated at p. 406:

> As I see it, the fact that the transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, pose an insurmountable obstacle to characterizing the advance of $255 million. Instead of trying to pigeon-hole the entire agreement between the Participants and C.C.B. in one of two categories, I see nothing wrong in recognizing the arrangement for what it is, namely, one of a hybrid nature, combining elements of both debt and equity but which, in substance, reflects a creditor-debtor relationship. Financial and capital markets have been most creative in the variety of investments and securities that have been fashioned to meet the needs and interests of those who participate in those markets. It is not because an agreement has certain equity features that a court must either ignore those features as if they did not exist or characterize the transaction on the whole as an investment. There is an alternative. It is permissible, and often required, or desirable, for debt and equity to coexist in the given financial transaction without altering the substance of the agreement. Furthermore, it does not follow that each and every aspect of such an agreement must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue. Again, it is not because there are equity features that it is necessarily an investment in capital. This is particularly true when, as here, the equity features are nothing more than supplementary to and not definitive of the essence of the transaction. When a court is searching for the substance of a particular transaction, it should not too easily be distracted by aspects which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement. [emphasis added]

[29] As noted, the Flow-Through Shareholders have commenced several actions. Against Merit, they seek recission or damages due to an alleged misrepresentation in the Prospectus (based on their statutory rights to these remedies as disclosed in the Prospectus). They also claim damages relating to lost tax benefits associated with the Flow-Through Shares. While this is a contractual remedy based on the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements, it also has elements of misrepresentation flowing from certain descriptive statements made in the Prospectus.
[30] The Flow-Through Shareholders submitted that they are entitled to be treated as creditors based on the actions they have commenced, but the Trustee objects to this treatment and has sought the direction of the Court in this regard.

i. The Trustee's Position

[31] The Trustee (through counsel) focussed on the allegations made in the statements of claim in its analysis. It suggested that the essential allegation of the Flow-Through Shareholders in their actions is misrepresentation and that as a result of such misrepresentation they have suffered damages. The Trustee then described the remedy sought as, in essence, a claim for a return of equity. The Trustee suggested that the claim for the anticipated tax benefits was no more than a claim for a benefit that was ancillary to their shareholding interest. The Trustee also described the Flow-Through Shareholders' application to prove as unsecured creditors as an attempt to take a "second kick at the can", following the failure of their equity investment.
[32] Using the reasoning of Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, the Trustee argued that the claim of the Flow-Through Shareholders must be subordinated to Merit's unsecured creditors. The Trustee submitted that all five policy reasons listed in that case (and described above) are present in this case, emphasizing that the dividend will be reduced 20 to 27% (from 15 to 11-12 cents) if the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims are included in the unsecured creditors' pool and that the facts in this case favour subordination even more than the facts in Re: Blue Range Resource

Corp., as some of the Flow-Through Shareholders are seeking to rescind their purchase of the Flow-Through Shares in their actions.

ii. The Flow-Through Shareholders' Position

[33] Arguments were filed separately by Mr. McNally, as Counsel for Larry Delf (Mr. Delf being the designate of the Representative Flow-Through Shareholders group), and by Mr. Shea as Counsel for certain other Flow-Through Shareholders.

The Representative Flow-Through Shareholders Group's Position

[34] Mr. McNally did not take issue with the suggestion that as a general rule, shareholders rank after secured creditors. He also did not object to the reasoning of Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp., provided the case is limited to its context and not used to stand for the general proposition that in no circumstances may a shareholder ever have a claim provable in bankruptcy.

[35] Mr. McNally did object to the Trustee's characterization of the claim as a single claim for misrepresentation seeking damages equal to their purchase price for the shares. He suggested that the claims involved firstly, a right to damages or recission qua shareholder under securities legislation and secondly, a right to damages for breach of an indemnity provision qua debt holder. He also submitted that this latter claim may also be seen as having nothing to do with misrepresentation in the Prospectus or a return of capital, but arises independently as a result of Merit's failure to incur and then renounce CEE to the shareholders to enable them to obtain certain tax deductions.

[36] Mr. McNally suggested that this latter claim for tax losses was also a claim provable in bankruptcy. He referenced Laskin J.A.'s recognition in Re Central Capital Corporation [6] that shareholders may participate as creditors in the context of declared dividends because the liquidity provisions of corporate legislation would not have been triggered if the dividends had been declared prior to insolvency and would therefore be enforceable debts. Laskin J.A. stated at p.536:

> It seems to me that these appellants must either be shareholders or creditors. Except for declared dividends, they cannot be both... Moreover, as Justice Finlayson points out in his reasons, courts have always accepted the proposition that when a dividend is declared it is a debt on which each shareholder can sue the corporation.

[37] Mr. McNally also relied on Re G.M.D. Vending Co. [7] where the British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed declared but unpaid dividends to rank with other unsecured claims in a bankruptcy.

[38] He also emphasized that the CEE aspect of the relationship between the Flow-Through Shareholders, on the one hand, and Merit, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers, on the other, possesses many of the indicia of debt mentioned by Weiler J.A. in Re Central Capital Corporation in that: (1) Merit is obliged to expend the funds raised by the Prospectus on CEE and the funds are advanced by Flow-Through Shareholders for this specific purpose alone, (2) there is an indemnity provision in the Prospectus itself to the Flow-Through Shareholders if this does not occur, evidencing an intention that the investors are to be fully repaid for the loss of the tax benefit,[8] and (3) interest becomes due for the amount of the failed tax write-off and is covered by the indemnity provision as tax payable.

[39] He suggested that the indemnity provisions in the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements are enforceable at law without consideration of corporate liquidity and are an acknowledgment of the unique commercial position of the Flow-Through Shareholders in the event that the CEE is not renounced. He concluded by submitting that the potential liquidity problem and contingent liability must constitute the rationale for the presence of the indemnity in the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements in the first place.

The Other Flow-Through Shareholders Group's Position

[40] Mr. Shea suggested that not only were the claims for tax losses relating to the CEE provable claims, the tort/statutory aspects of their claims were also provable claims, albeit they would be dealt with as "contingent" claims within the meaning of ss. 121 and 135 of the BIA[9]. He further submitted that the fact they are claims by shareholders is irrelevant.

[41] He relied on Gardner* v. Newton [10] as authority for the proposition that a contingent claim is a claim that may or may not ripen into a debt depending on the occurrence of some future event. Mr. Shea also suggested that so long as the claim is not too remote or speculative, a claim, even though it has not yet been reduced to judgment, may still be a contingent claim. Mr. Shea pointed out that the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. [11] departed from the earlier cases relied upon by the Trustee, including Claude Resources (Trustee of) v. *Dutton [12]. The Court of Appeal stated they imposed too high of a threshold for the establishment of a contingent claim and held that it was not necessary to demonstrate probability of liability but merely to show they were not too remote or speculative.

Digitized by Google

[42] He asserted that the claims are not shareholder claims, but claims for statutory remedies and for breach of contract and must rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors for that reason. Mr. Shea also said the Court must look to the substance of the relationship between the claimant and the bankrupt and most importantly, the context in which the claim is made.

[43] Mr. Shea then argued that it would not be equitable to subordinate these claims while other claims based on tort, breach of contract or statutory remedy are allowed to rank as unsecured claims and concluded that the traditional principles for subordinating claims by shareholders do not apply to this case.

[44] He suggested that allowing claims for statutory remedies and/or breach of contract based on misrepresentation to rank as unsecured claims will not affect how creditors do business with companies. Further, he argued that allowing this result will not "open the floodgates" as the statutory remedies involved are narrow in scope and have strict and relatively short time frames.

iii. The Underwriters' Position

[45] Firstly, the Underwriters supported the Flow-Through Shareholders' submissions regarding the nature of their claims. They emphasized that Re: Blue Range Resource Corp should not stand for the proposition that shareholders must always be subordinated to unsecured creditors simply because they are shareholders. Rather, the nature and substance of their claims determines the treatment they receive in the estate.

[46] The Underwriters also suggested that Re: Blue Range Resource Corp turned on its unique facts of a purchaser of Blue Range shares having knowledge of misrepresentations yet exercising shareholder rights, such as authorizing the company to take CCAA proceedings and then making an unsecured claim in those proceedings for the loss associated with its share purchase. The shareholder in that case did not claim recission and did not deny or attempt to avoid its shareholder status. Moreover, there was no contractual right to be treated by the company as anything but a shareholder.

[47] The Underwriters distinguished the claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders from those of Big Bear in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp as follows: (1) the Flow-Through Shareholders are not pursuing tort claims based on their status as shareholders, but rather are asserting a statutory right of recission, thereby refuting their status as shareholders, (2) the Flow-Through Shareholders also allege a direct contractual claim for indemnity against Merit pursuant to Subscription and Renunciation Agreements in which Merit agreed to incur qualifying expenditures (CEE), to renounce the resulting tax benefits to them and to indemnify them if it failed to incur the CEE, and (3) if their claims are ultimately successful, the Flow-Through Shareholders will be former shareholders and current creditors of Merit.

Resolution- ISSUE 1

[48] I agree with Romaine J. that the correct approach is to first examine the substance of the claim made against the insolvent. There are the two claims mentioned by counsel for the Flow-Through Shareholders. The first is an alternate remedy for damages or recission based on the alleged misrepresentations contained in the Prospectus. I was advised that some have advanced only one of these alternative claims. The second is cast as a claim in damages under the indemnity in the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements for the failure to renounce CEE.

[49] The Flow-Through Shareholders' claims for recission or damages based on misrepresentation derive from their status as Merit shareholders. Regardless of how they are framed[13], the form the actions take cannot overcome the substance of what is being claimed. It is plain from the Prospectus and the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements that the Flow-Through Shareholders invested in equity. It is equally plain from their actions that what they seek to recoup, in substance, is their investments. As in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, the "very core" of these claims arises from the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of Merit shares. The Flow-Through Shareholders had no cause of action until they acquired the Flow-Through Shares and their claims include a direct claim for return of capital in their request for recission and in the case of a damage claim, just as in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, the measure of damages enables them to recover the purchase price of the shares.

[50] It is true these shareholders are using statutory provisions to make their claims in damages or recission rather than the tort basis used in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, but in substance they remain shareholder claims for the return of an equity investment. The right to a return of this equity investment must be limited by the basic common law principle that shareholders rank after creditors in respect of any return of their equity investment.

[51] Now what about the second aspect of the claims?

[52] The second claim of the Flow-Through Shareholders has some of the features of a debt and the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements provide for a specific remedy in the event Merit fails to comply with its undertaking to make and renounce the CEE expenditures .

Digitized by Google

[53] While the discussion in Re Central Capital Corporation regarding the claim for declared dividends is appealing, it does not precisely apply in these circumstances. The tax advantages associated with flow-through shares is reflected in a premium paid for the purchase of the shares[14]. In essence, what happens in a flow- through share offering (as sanctioned by the Income Tax Act[15]) is the shareholder buys deductions from the company. As the company has given up deductions, it wants to be paid for those deductions that it is renouncing. From the perspective of the purchaser of the shares, the premium for the shares would not have been paid without some assurance that the deductions will be available. I note the purchaser is also required to reduce their adjusted cost base of the shares (for tax purposes) by the amount of the deductions utilized by the purchaser.

[54] While the Flow-Through Shareholders paid a premium for the shares (albeit to get the deductions), in my view the debt features associated with the CEE indemnity from Merit do not "transform" that part of the relationship from a shareholder relationship into a debt relationship. That part of the relationship remains "incidental" to being a shareholder.

[55] In summary, the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims, regardless of the basis chosen to support them, are in substance claims for the return of their equity investment and accordingly cannot rank with Merit's unsecured creditors.

DECISION - ISSUE 2

The claims of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers are not subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors as they are in substance creditors' claims that are not too contingent to constitute provable claims.

i. The Trustee's Position

[56] The Trustee argued that while on their face, the Underwriters' and the Directors and Officers' claims are not shareholder claims, "in substance", they are shareholders' claims and are no more than an indirect passing-on to Merit of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims. As a result, the Trustee submitted, equity dictates that since the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims must rank behind those of the unsecured creditors, the claims of the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers must fail as well. The Trustee suggested this subordination follows from the policy considerations set out by Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp. Alternatively, the Trustee asserted that the claims of the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers are so contingent they must be valued at nil.

ii. The Underwriters' Position

[57] The Underwriters argued that regardless of how the Court characterized the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims, the Trustee cannot succeed against the Underwriters because: (1) the indemnity claims are based on contractual, legal and equitable duties owed to the Underwriters by Merit, to which the Flow-Through Shareholders are strangers and to which Re: Blue Range Resource Corp has no application; (2) equitable subordination has never been applied by Canadian courts and the Trustee cannot satisfy the test even if the court chooses to apply it, and (3) the Underwriters' claims are precisely the type of contingent claims contemplated by the BIA.

iii. The Directors' and Officers' Position

[58] The Directors and Officers conceded that, while some of the potential liability they face is as a result of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims against them, or via indemnity claims brought by the Underwriters and Auditors against them, their claim is simply a claim in contract that is not an effort to obtain a return of equity. They argued that the enforceability of the indemnity is not contingent on the source of the potential liability.

[59] In any case, the Directors and Officers face claims other than from Merit's shareholders, which include: (1) a Saskatchewan action alleging the Directors and Officers assented to or acquiesed in Merit not paying its accounts and ought to be held liable for them, and (2) an Alberta action relating to ownership and lease payments on oilfield equipment. The Directors and Officers asserted that the existence of these claims demonstrate that they are not simply attempting to pass on shareholder claims, but rather they are making a contractual claim for all the potential liability they face, as the indemnity intends.

[60] The Directors and Officers also suggested that, as with the Underwriters, some of the contingency in their claim under the indemnity has been realized to the extent of legal fees incurred in defending the various actions. In any case, they agreed with the Flow-Through Shareholders and Underwriters that a contingent claim need not be "probable" in order to be "provable" but need only something more than to "remote and speculative in nature".

[61] Further, directors and officers require indemnities and commercial necessity dictates that these indemnities have real value.

Resolution - ISSUE 2

Nature of the Underwriters and the Directors' and Officers' claims against Merit

[62] The fundamental premise of the Trustee's argument is that the Underwriters' indemnity simply "flows through" or "passes on" the Flow-Through Shareholders' claim to Merit. This ignores the nature of the causes of action being advanced by the Underwriters and the existence of a contractual indemnity freely given by Merit for good and valuable consideration. The Trustee did not suggest that the indemnity was invalid or unenforceable, rather, it argued that this valid and enforceable right should be treated as a "shareholders' claim" and subordinated. With respect, I cannot agree with the Trustee's position.

[63] The Trustee's argument attempts to shift the Court's focus from the Underwriters' claim against Merit to the claim being asserted against the Underwriters, even though it is the former that the Trustee wants the Court to subordinate. The Flow-Through Shareholders' cause of action against the Underwriter's is predicated on the Underwriters' alleged failure to discharge a statutory duty and their liability is not contingent in any way on a successful claim by the Underwriters against Merit under the indemnity.

[64] The Underwriters' indemnity claims against Merit are not made as a shareholder or for any return of investment made by the Underwriters. Rather, they are based on contractual, legal and equitable duties owed directly by Merit to the Underwriters. Similarly, the other causes of action advanced by the Underwriters against Merit in the Third Party Notice do not arise from any equity position in the company, but are based on agency, fiduciary and contractual relationships between the Underwriters and Merit, to which the Flow-Through Shareholders are strangers and are unavailable for them to assert.

[65] For example, the Underwriters are entitled to an indemnity for defence costs even if the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims fail completely. The ultimate success or failure of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims makes no difference to the existence and enforceability of this right against Merit.

[66] As the Underwriters' claims are not claims for a return of equity, Re: Blue Range Resource Corp does not apply. That decision only addressed equity claims of shareholders and I am not prepared to extend its application to the claims of the Underwriters in the application before me, simply because the claims triggering an indemnity by the Underwriters against Merit were shareholders' claims.

[67] As Firstenergy Capital Corp. emphasized, even if I were to apply the policy considerations for subordinating claims identified by Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp to the Underwriters' claims, these policy considerations support a conclusion that the Underwriters' claims are of the type I believe that Romaine J. would protect, not subordinate:

> 1. Shareholders rank behind creditors in insolvency - the issue here is whether the Underwriters are properly characterized as equity stakeholders or creditors. This is done by considering the substance of their claim. Regardless of how the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims are characterized, the substance of the Underwriters' claims against Merit are contractual. They arise out of a contract for indemnity between Merit and the Underwriters. This is clearly distinct from a claim for return of shareholders' equity. The Trustee asked the court to consider the fact of a possible future payment from the Underwriters to the Flow-Through Shareholders in characterizing the claim of the Underwriters against Merit. Given the nature of the obligations under an indemnity, this is inappropriate. Describing the Underwriters' claims as "no more than and indirect passing-on of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims" is based on a flawed analysis of the obligations under an indemnity and ignores the statutory duty of the Underwriters to the Flow-Through Shareholders. There are two distinct obligations.
> The first obligation relates to the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims against the Underwriters and any obligations that may be imposed on the Underwriters as a result. This obligation is completely unrelated to, and unaffected by the Underwriters' indemnity. The second obligation is between Merit, as indemnifier, and the Underwriters. This second obligation is the obligation that must be characterized in this application. The Flow-Through Shareholders are strangers to this claim.
> 2. Creditors do business with companies on the assumption they will rank ahead of shareholders on insolvency - the focus of this analysis is the degree of risk-taking respectively assumed by shareholders and creditors. Unlike shareholders who assume the risks of insolvency, the Underwriters bargained, as any other creditor, for their place at the creditor table in an insolvency. An indemnity is a well-known commercial concept business people routinely use to eliminate or reduce risk and should be recognized as a necessary and desirable obligation.
> To subordinate the Underwriters' claim would amount to a reversal of the expectations of the parties to the indemnities. The evidence before me suggests that the Underwriters would not have participated in Merit's offering without the indemnity. I need not decide whether that is true.
> Subordinating the Underwriters would fundamentally change the underlying business relationship between underwriters and issuers, and would be unexpected in the industry. Such a result might make it impossible for an underwriter to recover under an indemnity from a bankrupt issuer in respect of an equity offering.

3. Shareholders are not entitled to rescind shares after insolvency - this consideration has no bearing on the Underwriters as they are not shareholders seeking to rescind shares. Their claims against the bankrupt are for damages under a contract for indemnity. Further, I was not asked to determine this particular question in this application.

4. The principles of equitable subordination - In Re Canada Deposit Insurance* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank, the Supreme Court of Canada expressly left open the question of whether equitable subordination formed part of Canadian insolvency law, but expressed its opinion as to the applicable test as developed in the United States:

> ...(1) the claimant must have engaged in some type of inequitable conduct; (2) the misconduct must have resulted in injury to the creditors of the bankrupt or conferred an unfair advantage on the claimant; and (3) equitable subordination of the claim must not be inconsistent with the provisions of the bankruptcy statute...(p. 420)

An application of these criteria would lead to the conclusion that equitable subordination would not apply in this case, even if it was part of Canadian law.

Although the Trustee suggested that the Underwriters may have "participated" in the misrepresentation, there is no evidence before me of inequitable conduct on their part. It is perhaps significant that the Flow-Through Shareholders have not alleged any such misconduct as against the Underwriters, but rather they have only advanced the statutory causes of action available to them under securities legislation.

As there is no evidence of inequitable conduct on the part of the Underwriters, there can be no corresponding injury to Merit's other creditors, or enhancement of the Underwriters' position.

Finally, the application of equitable subordination of the Underwriters' claims in this case would be inconsistent with the established priority scheme contained in the BIA. The United States Supreme Court addressed this third requirement of consistency in United States* v. *Noland [16]:

> [t]his last requirement has been read as a 'reminder to the bankruptcy court that although it is a court of equity, it is not free to adjust the legally valid claim of an innocent party who asserts the claim in good faith merely because the court perceives the result as inequitable'

This statement encapsulates what the Trustee is asking to the Court to do: subordinate the claims of the Underwriters, who have asserted their claims under their indemnities as they are entitled to do, merely because the result may be perceived as inequitable. The words of the US Supreme Court are consistent with the view that equitable subordination is an extraordinary remedy that ought to be employed only where there is some misconduct on the part of the claimant. The statutory scheme of distribution in the BIA must be paramount, and if it is to be interfered with, it should only be in clear cases where demonstrable inequitable conduct is present.

5. Floodgates - Romaine J. considered that allowing Big Bear's claim for misrepresentation to rank with unsecured creditors would encourage aggrieved shareholders to claim misrepresentation or fraud. This consideration has no application to the Underwriters, who are not shareholders. Allowing the Underwriters' claims, which are based on a contractual right of indemnity, will not open the door to increased claims of misrepresentation or fraud by shareholders. The nature of the claims against the Underwriters and the Underwriters' claim against Merit are entirely different.

[68] In summary, the Underwriters' claims against Merit are creditors' claims which rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors.

[69] With this result I appreciate the potential for the Flow-Through Shareholders to be seen as obtaining some recovery from the estate before all the unsecured creditors are paid in full. It might even be suggested it may ultimately allow the Flow-Through Shareholders to achieve indirectly what they could not achieve directly, based on the substance of their claims. This may be the final economic result.

[70] However, success by the Flow-Through Shareholders against the Underwriters is not contingent upon success by the Underwriters against Merit nor does it automatically follow that success by the Flow-Through Shareholders against the Underwriters must inevitably lead to success by the Underwriters against Merit. A successful claim by the Underwriters against Merit will be determined on the basis of the provisions of the indemnity and the result of the claim against the Underwriters will be one of the factors in that analysis.

[71] As the possible economic result described in paragraph 69 does not flow from a continuous chain of interdependent events, the possibility that the Flow-Through Shareholders may indirectly recover some of their equity investment from others prior to Merit's unsecured creditors being paid in full would not be a sufficient reason to decide this application differently.

[72] As with the Underwriters, I find that the Directors and Officers have creditors' claims entitled to rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors.

Contingent claims

[73] While the Trustee's primary argument was the claims of the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers are merely indirect shareholder claims, alternatively, it argued that these claims are too contingent and cannot constitute a provable claim on that basis.[17]

[74] The Trustee relied on the case of Claude Resources (Trustee of)* v. *Dutton in support of its position. In that case, an indemnity agreement was executed between the bankrupt and its sole shareholder, officer and director and entitled the individual to be indemnified for any liabilities arising out of actions taken in his capacity as an officer and director of the bankrupt. This individual was sued in relation to a debenture offering and sought to prove using his indemnity. Noble J. described the claim as having a "double contingency", in that as a first step the action on the debenture offering must be successful, and if so, then the claim on the application of the indemnity agreement must also succeed. Noble J. held that more is needed beyond evidence that the creditor has been sued and that liability may flow; some element of probability is needed.

[75] The Trustee submitted that there is no evidence as to the potential success of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims against the Underwriters and/or the Directors and Officers, nor was it possible prior to judgment in those actions, to determine whether any liability of the Underwriters and/or the Directors and Officers to the Flow-Through Shareholders would qualify for indemnification.

[76] The fact that a claim is contingent does not mean it is not "provable"[18]. Provable claims include contingent claims as long as they are not too speculative: Negus* v. *Oakley's General Contracting [19]. Section 121 defines provable claims to include "all debts and liabilities, present or future,...to which the bankrupt may become subject...".

[77] Section 121 does not specify the degree of certainty required to make a claim provable, other than to include as provable all debts or liabilities to which the bankrupt may become subject. As stated, the Ontario Court of Appeal addressed this in Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. and held that the test of probable liability set out in Claude Resources (Trustee of)* v. *Dutton and Re Wiebe (also relied on by the Trustee) imposed too high of a threshold to establish a valid contingent claim. Rather, the Ontario Court of Appeal expressed that contingent claims must simply be not too "remote or speculative in nature". I agree with the Ontario Court of Appeal's view of the test.

[78] On a plain reading of the Underwriting Agreement, the indemnity appears to be engaged by the Flow-Through Shareholders' actions. The actions are under case management and are proceeding through discoveries at this time. Further, there are several authorities that suggest an indemnity becomes enforceable as soon as a claim of the type indemnified is alleged.[20] Finally, at least one part of the Underwriters' claim is not contingent - they have incurred costs and disbursements in defence of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims and according to the terms of the indemnity are currently entitled to reimbursement for those costs, regardless of the outcome of the litigation.

iv. PriceWaterhouseCoopers

[79] PriceWaterhouseCoopers made similar submissions to the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers and emphasized the strong policy reason behind supporting auditors' indemnities as unsecured and not subordinated claims. In addition, PriceWaterhouseCoopers has an independent claim for negligent misrepresentation against the Directors and Officers, arising out of the provision of information to PriceWaterhouseCoopers by Merit management which PriceWaterhouseCoopers alleges was known, or ought to have been known, to be incorrect. PriceWaterhouseCoopers suggested this further distinguishes PriceWaterhouseCoopers' situation from the situation before the Court in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp.

[80] I find that PriceWaterhouseCoopers' indemnity claim is a creditor's claim entitled to rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors. My reasoning with respect to the Underwriters' claims, as based on their indemnities, applies equally to PriceWaterhouse Coopers' claim based on its indemnity.

[81] I am aware that the indemnities of the Flow-Through Shareholders are not being accorded creditor status, while those of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers are. However, as noted, the indemnity feature of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims is related to certain deductions and those deductions were part of the purchase price for the shares. This in my view is more analogous to Re Canada Deposit Insurance* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank than to Re Central Capital Corporation and that to me is sufficient to justify the distinction.

CONCLUSION

[82] The claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders are in substance claims for the return of equity investment and rank behind the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors, which shall include the claims of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouse Coopers.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE KERANS

[1] The Bankruptcy Court, when approving a Proposal under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, may freeze interest owing on debts from the date of the proposal. Without such an order, the freeze is not automatic. Also, no rule of law forbids simpliciter the enforcement, for costs incurred by the creditor after bankruptcy, of a pre-bankruptcy cost indemnity given by the bankrupt. But a Bankruptcy Court may refuse to enforce that indemnity by a creditor who incurred costs other than in a commercially reasonable fashion or whose position otherwise amounts to an abuse of the bankruptcy process.

I

[3] In 1981, the Court held that the bankrupt had breached the Proposal, and deemed that to be an assignment in bankruptcy. The respondent and cross-appellant trustee, Thorne Riddell, Inc., became its trustee and proceeded with administration. A decade later, that task nears completion.

[4] Because a distribution looms, attention has turned to the valuation of claims. The three appellant mortgagees, AMIC Mortgage Investment Corporation, Paramount Life Insurance Company and Fidelity Trust Company realized their securities and filed demands for deficiencies. The trustee accepted these except the interest and costs portions.

[5] The trustee disputed any claim for interest or costs after the date of the original Proposal, and sought directions as a means to resolve the matter. The mortgagees intervened. They acknowledged before us that they cannot exact interest after the date of bankruptcy, but resisted an earlier termination date. They pointed to their security instruments, which contain a full right of recovery from the borrower of all collection costs. They say the trustee must honour this without regard to when the creditor incurred the expenses.

[6] We do not know the details of these expenses. But the mortgagees demand reimbursement of huge sums, and I suspect that they cover participation in many disputes involving this infamous bankruptcy over the past decade. That raises the problem whether one creditor shall, despite results, participate in litigation after bankruptcy at the expense of the other creditors.

[7] The learned Queen's Bench judge, sitting in Bankruptcy chambers, excluded interest after the date of proposal and costs after the date of bankruptcy. See reflex, (1990), 110 A.R. 295; 2 C.B.R. (3d) 196. The mortgagees appeal from both orders. The trustee also appeals because the order permitted costs after the date of the Proposal.

[8] It is common ground that no term in the statute clearly and unequivocally resolves either dispute, and no authority has yet reached precisely these topics. In my view, I stated the correct rules for this case at the start, and for the reasons that follow.

II

[9] Because the mortgagees conceded that they could not expect interest after the date of bankruptcy, the remaining dispute relates to interest from the date of the proposal to the date of the bankruptcy. Consequently, the argument turned upon whether the Act applied the after-bankruptcy rule to proposals.

[10] The starting point, then, must be the rule about interest after bankruptcy. Under the scheme of the Act, the only entitlement of a claimant to share in the realized assets of the bankrupt arises under s.121(1), (or because of an obligation incurred by the trustee during administration, which did not arise in this case). S. 121(1) provides:

> All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject at the date of the bankruptcy or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the bankruptcy shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[11] The trustee correctly said that the mortgagees fall within the scope of this rule. The mortgagees correctly responded that they can charge for an obligation that arises after bankruptcy provided that it must arise from a pre-bankruptcy obligation. And, of course, the mortgagees founded their claims both to interest and costs on a pre-bankruptcy agreement.

[12] The trustee pointed to s. 122(2) as offering yet another limit on post-bankruptcy interest. It provides:

> Where interest on any debt or sum certain is provable under this Act but the rate of interest has not been agreed on, the creditor may prove interest at a rate not exceeding five per cent per annum to the date of bankruptcy from the time the debt or sum was payable, if evidenced by a written instrument, or, if not so evidenced, from the time notice has been given the debtor of the interest claimed.

Digitized by Google

[13] I agree that this rule assumes that interest is not payable after bankruptcy. It does not, however, make the rule.

[14] The trustee also argued that s. 121(2), discussed below, further limits the scope of future claims. I agree, but this limit does not apply to interest. I therefore will deal with that provision in greater detail when I come to the costs topic.

[15] In the end, the trustee could not point to any provision in the Act that forbids interest after bankruptcy. It must rely on common law.

[16] Several Canadian cases say that the trustee need not pay interest after bankruptcy even if in the face of a deficiency on realization of a security. See Re Levesque Auto Inc. (1978) 26 C.B.R. (N.S.) 234 (Que. S.C.), Re J.A. Gosselin Ltée. (1979) 30 C.B.R. (N.S.) 306 (Que. S.C.). They follow an old English case, Re Savin (1872) 7 Ch. App. 760. James, L.J. there followed the rule through several cases to a decision by Lord Loughborough in 1794. After first saying that he would apply the rule "whether a right and reasonable rule or not", James, L.J. offered this explanation for it at p.764:

> I believe, however, that if the question now arose for the first time I should agree with the rule, seeing that the theory in bankruptcy is to stop all things at the date of the bankruptcy, and to divide the wreck of the man's property as it stood at that time.

[17] I accept that bankruptcy aims to freeze the affairs of debtors and, quickly and summarily, liquidate and distribute their assets. It is not entirely clear to me, however, why those who prudently bargained for interest in that event should lose that benefit. But the Court of Appeal in Savin overruled the Vice-Chancellor. He had contended that the rule did not apply in the case of an express agreement to pay interest on a secured debt. And that rule has persisted for more than a century.

[18] I suppose one also might view interest as somehow not having the same right to equality of treatment as the demands of other creditors. The chambers judge took that approach. But the ranking of contractual rights in terms of moral priorities offers difficulties. I fear we distinguish them more by their accidents than their essence. For example, interest to a moneylender represents profit. Suppliers of goods, on the other hand, build profit into price. Why should one be preferred? Here, we might more accurately speak of a hedge against loss from delayed payment rather than a profit. I suspect few firms profit when a debtor becomes bankrupt. But the distinction remains dubious. Interest on overdue debt (as well as the rate) depicts the moneylender's hedge; a reserve for doubtful accounts built into the price portrays the supplier's hedge.

[19] Nevertheless, I accept that Savin expresses the law in Canada today: claims provable in bankruptcy cannot include interest after bankruptcy. I would be loath, however, to extend it in a cause where the apparent rationale does not need it.

[20] The trustee, having gained acceptance of the rule, then relied upon s. 121(4) to date that rule back to the date of a Proposal. It provides:

> Where a proposal is made before bankruptcy, the claims provable shall be determined as of the date of the filing of the proposal.

[21] The trustee argued that this rule is "plain and unambiguous". That it is, but it does not plainly deal with the interest rule. The trustee must argue that s.121(4) also extends to proposals the restrictions on future interest that exist in common law for bankruptcies. That is not so clear. Mr. Robinson for the trustee acknowledged that its view required one, to borrow his metaphor, to "massage" the words in the Act.

[22] Not surprisingly, each party applied, if I may continue the metaphor, a selection of magic oils from the cupboard we call the canons of interpretation. As usual, that resourceful collection offered solace to both, and led to yet another example of the game of "thrust and parry". See: K. N. Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition: Deciding Appeals, Boston, 1960, Little Brown, Appendix C. The canons claim to corral a chimera: an expression of legislative intent where none is present.

[23] The mortgagees first parried that s. 121(4) speaks to claims provable on a proposal, not those provable on a bankruptcy. They correctly argued that, on the making of a Proposal, creditors must prove claims in a way like bankruptcy. See s. 62(1). Moreover, the statutory rules governing proposals adopt, changing what ought to be changed, the rules governing bankruptcy. See s.66(1). S. 121(4), they said, must be read in that context. It merely confirms that, while the Act borrows some bankruptcy procedure for proposals, the cut-off date for proposals is the date of a proposal not the date of bankruptcy. Finally, they argued, many proposals contemplate that the debtor will continue in business, and incur new debt. The view taken by the trustee would deprive those new creditors of the hope of payment on a later bankruptcy, and thus destroy the proposal scheme.

[24] The counter-thrust of the trustee suggested that, if the provision means no more than what the mortgagees assert, then it is redundant. S. 62(1) already provides that the date of proposal "... shall constitute the time for determination of the claims of the creditors and for all other purposes of this Act". Indeed, the learned chambers judge viewed the closing words of that term as decisive. The mortgagees parried that s. 121(4) merely confirms what will occur if a Court rejects a proposal and a bankruptcy automatically follows. They added that, as a matter of law, the date of the proposal is not decisive for "all other purposes". They pointed to the rule that one counts from the date of bankruptcy for suits about fraudulent preferences where a bankruptcy follows a collapsed proposal. See Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation Limited v. Ideal Petroleum (1959) Ltd. (1976), 26 C.B.R. (N.S.) 84 at 92-93 (S.C.C.). Nothing in Re Gavex, a Resource Corporation (1989), 75 C.B.R. (N.S.) 178 (B.C.S.C.) supports the trustee's view. They in turn cited Re Crown Royal Clothing Co. (1969), 15 C.B.R. (N.S.) 203, at 205 (Que. S.C.), but I find nothing of great help in that decision.

[25] The trustee emphasized that Parliament placed the disputed rule in a section dealing with bankruptcy, not proposals. We should therefore understand that it deals with bankruptcy. The mortgagees relied upon the turgid legislative history of this very old and oft-amended Act. They contended that one should not much rely upon placement as an interpretive aid. And they conceded that perhaps s. 121 (4) merely confirms that a creditor need not re-file claims when a proposal fails and a bankruptcy follows.

[26] In my view, the interest rule, which might make sense in one context, might make no sense at all in another. Proposals can include on-going commercial activity by the debtor, not a sell-off. They might permit insolvent persons to hold creditors at bay and continue in business. That amounts to the opposite of a brief freeze to divide the "wreck of a man's property". I therefore would not extend an interest freeze, automatically and necessarily, to all proposals.

[27] Moreover, the rule proposed by the trustee offends the public interest. Proposals serve the public good because they keep businesses alive and preserve jobs and investment. Why should I encourage creditors to oppose them with a rule like this?

[28] Nor am I persuaded that Parliament has. I suppose someone might argue that s.121(4) deprives a creditor of interest during the life of a proposal only if it fails and a bankruptcy follows. If the proposal succeeds, and the debtor avoids bankruptcy, then the debtor pays interest. But this is an impossible rule that might encourage a debtor to fail, and that might lead to a creditor having to return monies earlier received. In any event, I would not read all that into this little section.

[29] The learned chambers judge said that, in this case, the proposal amounted to an assignment in bankruptcy. He said that "the fact of bankruptcy" was evident to all at that time. (I think he meant the fact of insolvency. Bankruptcy is a legal status, which the debtor did not have under the proposal.) I acknowledge that the Proposal here collapsed soon after approval. To a creditor, the difference must seem pointlessly technical. But I am dealing with a legal rule that would govern both successful and failed proposals.

[30] The powers of a Court hearing a request for approval of a Proposal might well include the power to freeze interest in the right case. I will not rule out consideration of arguments based upon the fairness of return of principal to all before the award of profit to some. Perhaps also the approving order might deal with the effect of an immediate collapse of some desperate attempt to preserve an enterprise. But no judge here exercised the power to deny interest during the life of a proposal. On the contrary, the Proposal approved by the Court had contemplated interest continuing.

[31] I would allow the appeal on the first point and direct the trustee not to reject interest to the date of bankruptcy.

III

[32] In my view, the costs rule proposed by the trustee offers even greater difficulties.

[33] Again, the trustee relied upon s. 121(1) as prohibiting future claims. Again, it had to acknowledge that a demand for costs incurred after bankruptcy that invokes an agreement made before bankruptcy falls within the scope of entitlement under that section. The precise point came before Baron Pollock and Viscount Cave in 1886. See In Re Smith, (1886) 3 Morrell 179, at 183-185 (Eng. Div. Ct.).

[34] In its factum, the trustee offered only an argument based upon the limit on future charges implied by operation of the valuation procedure in s. 121(2). In oral argument, Mr. Robinson expanded this by relying upon an analogy to the common law rule about post-bankruptcy interest.

[35] I will first deal with the argument based upon s. 121(2). It provides:

> The court shall, on the application of the trustee, determine whether any contingent claim or any unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, it shall value the claim, and the claim shall after that valuation be deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[36] The trustee argued that this rule limits future exactions to those that can be valued before they arise. Future costs, unlike future interest, cannot readily be calculated in advance.

[37] I agree that this rule can limit future claims that otherwise fall within the scope of entitlement. In fact, some may not be provable when the trustee calls for proof. The trustee cites two examples: Re Carling Acceptance

Limited (1976) 22 C.B.R. (N.S.) 258 (Ont. S.C.) and Re Stone (1980) 34 C.B.R. (N.S.) 87 (Ont. S.C.). Both offer difficulties. In Carling, the Court first found that the challenged demand was, by its terms, conditional. It then found that the condition, in fact, would never be met during the bankruptcy. The condition required that the bankrupt have a large surplus! One might dismiss the decision as merely one where the claimant failed to prove its case. In Stone, the bankrupt had guaranteed a debt payable by instalment. The primary debtor had defaulted, but, on the date of bankruptcy, only a portion of the debt had become due and payable. The claim of the primary creditor against the estate of the guarantor bankrupt was limited to what was due. That decision might be doubted because some contingent future liability existed to be valued. See, contra, In Re Froment, reflex, [1925] 2 W.W.R. 415, at 423 (Alta. S.C.T.D.). Ironically, in that case the Court did not discount the award for the contingency that the primary debtor might pay.

[38] One must take care not to over-state the rule. It does not eliminate contingent or future claims. It merely subjects them to a valuation process. See In re Elliot Lake Ready-Mix Limited; Smith v. Elliot Lake Ready-Mix Limited (1961), 2 C.B.R. (N.S.) 187, at 190 (Reg. Ont. H.C.) and Re Wallace; Manitoba Public Insurance Corporation v. Wallace (1988), 69 C.B.R. (N.S.) 56, at 59 (Man. Q.B.).

[39] The trustee asserted that all must be valued as at the date of bankruptcy. As this case can be decided without challenge to this assertion, I accept it for that purpose. But I note that judicial valuation occurs only when the trustee asks for it. The valuing Court can have regard to events after bankruptcy, and before the hearing, to help it decide. I see nothing in the cases, or in common sense, to the opposite effect. The learned chambers judge here accepted the impossibility of valuation at the date of bankruptcy. I see no evidence to support that finding.

[40] Indeed, I doubt the fairness of reliance on s. 121(2) in this case because the trustee here has yet to make an application and the Court has yet to hear the evidence. If we treat this motion for directions as such an application, then the mortgagees can fairly say that, today, they can prove the sums they claim. The situation might have been very different had the trustee brought an application years ago. Of course, the mortgagees did not file a specific claim until 1989, after all securities were realized and a final deficiency calculation available.

[41] Delayed proof of a claim seems to be common and sensible practice. See Alberta v. Bank of Canada 82 Alta. L.R. (2d) 392 (C.A.). Indeed, s. 127(1) of the Act provides that a creditor must acknowledge only the "net" amount realized on a security, which implies a delayed valuation. Reasonable costs of sale, including legal fees, may be chargeable in any event by all secured creditors. See Royal Bank v. Sefel Geophysical Ltd. (1989), 76 C.B.R. (N.S.) 29 (Alta. Q.B.) and Re I. Shaffran Ltd.; M. Miller & Associates Ltd. v. Banque Royale Du Canada et al. (1982), 42 C.B.R. (N.S.) 66 (Que. S.C.).

[42] This case may be different because the mortgagees may charge for costs for some events other than realization efforts, and the indemnity agreements may be sufficiently wide to permit them. One before us offers indemnity for:

> ... all sums which the mortgagee may and does from time to time ... incur ... in exercising ... or in pursuance of any ... purpose ...

[43] It remains at least possible that the mortgagee might seek reimbursement for more than straightforward realization expenses. I think of cost awards made against it in earlier proceedings in this bankruptcy. Or expenses incurred in pursuit of some hare-brained notion rightly opposed by the trustee and all other creditors. All the more reason for a hearing under s. 121(2) to settle the facts.

[45] During oral argument, Mr. Robinson suggested a public policy reason to refuse to enforce a costs indemnity: enforcement might produce the anomalous result that other creditors fund litigation begun by the holder of the indemnity.

[46] This is an argument for equality of creditors not unlike the argument for the interest rule. Again, one can object that the courts should not refuse to enforce the reasonable exercise of fair bargains won by prudent creditors. We see the ancient argument about the enforcement of "unfair" contracts with a new twist: it is said that the bargain is unfair to other creditors, not the debtor.

[47] I agree that bankruptcy law aims to discourage litigation, and that to enforce an indemnity might have the opposite effect. One can imagine cases where invocation of the indemnity should not be permitted. It is not necessary to deal here with the rule outside bankruptcy. But bankruptcy involves special control of the affairs of the debtor and the creditors and includes the power to approve or deny claims for costs. See C.M.H.C. v. Conatv et al (1967) 61 D.L.R. (2d) 97 at 105 (Alta. C.A.). See also s. 197(4) of the Act. The late MacPherson, J. succinctly stated the correct view in Sefel [supra] at p.33:

> 161179 Canada Inc. also complained that the costs of realization for payment to the Royal Bank fell on the junior secured creditor and the unsecured. However, it has always been so. Courts in Canada have always upheld the right of a creditor to enforce the contract between it and the debtor so long as that contract was enforced in a commercially reasonable fashion.

[48] In conclusion, no rule of law forbids simpliciter the enforcement of a pre-bankruptcy cost indemnity given by the bankrupt to a creditor for expenses incurred after bankruptcy. But a Bankruptcy Court may refuse to enforce that indemnity. It might refuse when enforcement would countenance abuse of the bankruptcy process. Or where a creditor incurred costs other than in a "commercially reasonable fashion".

[49] In the result, I would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal. I would direct the trustee that it cannot simply reject costs claims arising during the proposal period or indeed the bankruptcy. It can, however, challenge specific items as beyond the scope of the indemnity or for other reasons.

INTRODUCTION

FACTS

[1] Maple Homes Canada Ltd. for eleven years has carried on a business of supplying distinctively Canadian building materials for the construction of homes outside Canada, particularly in Japan. It did not produce the materials itself but obtained them from suppliers in Canada and then arranged to have them loaded into containers and shipped to the overseas customer. It would charge a markup on the materials. At peak, in 1995, it employed 12 people and had annual sales of $8.6 million.

[2] Maple Homes lodged an Intention to make a Proposal on May 10, 2000. The Trustee under that Proposal, David Gray of Campbell Saunders Ltd., reported on June 30, 2000 that the debtor had assets of an estimated value of $13,000 and liabilities of $664,758.14. He stated the opinion that the causes of insolvency of the debtor were the decline in the Asian market and the bankruptcy of several large customers of Maple Homes. He further stated the opinion that the conduct of the debtor is not subject to censure and that none of the facts mentioned in sections 143 and 147 (it is common ground that he meant to refer to those provisions whose new section numbers are 173 and 177) may be proved against the debtor.

[3] The Trustee held a meeting of creditors at which a Special Resolution accepting the Proposal was passed, with 72.2% in favour in terms of the amounts voting.

[4] The Trustee reported that in his opinion the debtor's Proposal is an advantageous one for the creditors because the unsecured creditors will receive a dividend in the range of 7 – 8.5%, whereas in bankruptcy the unsecured creditors will not receive a dividend.

[5] The Proposal includes provisions that the debtor will liquidate its assets and pay the net proceeds of sale (after satisfaction of valid security interests) to the Trustee; cause Brad Grindler to sell his interest in a property on Pender Island and pay the net proceeds to the Trustee for the general benefit of unsecured creditors; cause Brad Grindler to pay to the Trustee from his future income the sum of $30,000 at the rate of not less than $500 per month; and cause Brad Grindler to waive any right he may have to a dividend under the Proposal. Paragraph 5 of the Proposal states:

> By accepting this Proposal, the unsecured creditors shall agree to accept the amounts paid and payable under paragraph 2, coupled with the waiver referred to in paragraph 4 above as payment in full for an assignment of their provable claims against the debtor under the Act, together with all rights of recovery they may have against Brad and Cathie Grindler in that regard. The assignment aforesaid shall be made to the debtor or to whomever it may direct.

[6] Mr. Max Gomez voted against the Proposal. Mr. Gomez is a resident of Montera in Cantabria, Spain. He had agreed in July 1999 to purchase materials from Maple Homes for construction of a home. The total purchase price was $177,589. He paid that in two instalments, on July 8, 1999 and September 13, 1999. He received one shipment from Maple Homes in September 1999, worth $76,179.23. Therefore, he is owed roughly $100,000 by the debtor.

[7] Before Mr. Gomez sent the first instalment, he received a fax from Mr. Grindler that informed him that the quote was being split up into three shipments, and stated:

> To get things moving, if all is fine with the First Shipment quotation, please sign page 2 of the quote where provided and fax it back to us. Once we confirm your deposit, we will place the orders. Then we will advise on the shipping.

Mr. Gomez signed the "quote" and returned it with his first instalment of $60,000 U.S. He requested that all invoices be made out to his family society, Operadora Cancun 1900, S.L. (I note here that counsel for Maple Homes argued that because of this the contract was really between Operadora Cancun and Maple Homes. Mr. Gomez in an affidavit deposed that Operadora Cancun is his personal and family tax society, which every family is entitled to have under the laws of Spain for tax benefits and the assignation and protection of personal assets. The "quote" was signed by Mr. Gomez, the payments came from him, and except for the one invoice, all other correspondence and dealings were with Mr. Gomez. Therefore, I am proceeding on the basis that the contract was between Maple Homes and Mr. Gomez and that he is the creditor and entitled to oppose approval of the proposal as he has done.)

[8] The events that led to Maple Homes's insolvency began in the fall of 1999. As the Trustee stated, the decline in the Asian market and the bankruptcy of some large customers seem to have been the turning points. From 1999 sales of $300,383.92 in August and $210,117.53 in September, there was a dramatic decline to $62,519.13 in October, $73,272.40 in November, $60,097.66 in December, $24,713,28 in January 2000, $16,430.96 in February, with an improvement again in March, 2000 to $117,628.11. As a result, although Maple Homes had actually received payment in full from Mr. Gomez, it proved unable to pay the suppliers (which had begun to demand cash on delivery) and to provide the materials it had contracted to send to Spain. This was despite the efforts described by Mr. Grindler to keep the company afloat — laying off employees, ceasing to draw any salary, and borrowing money from family members to put into the company. Mr. Grindler summarizes in his affidavit:

Digitized by Google

> I worked exclusively for the Company from its start until the date of the Proposal, and have put an enormous amount of energy and effort into the Company. Until recently, Maple Homes was always a tremendous source of pride for me. As a result, however, it was very difficult for me this Spring to come to accept that Maples Homes could not make ends meet and could not meet its debts. I kept thinking that Maple Homes could turn things around and be a success again. As will be outlined below, I tried just about everything that I could think of, including reducing the number of Maple Homes' staff, borrowing from a family member, foregoing my own salary, seeking financing, and of course bidding on further work. In a particularly difficult period of time, I also sent some emails to Mr. Gomez which were untruthful, and which I deeply regret. During that period of time I was making every effort I could to assist Maple Homes to put together the money to pay the suppliers so that it could ship the products that Mr. Gomez had ordered, and I genuinely believed that Maple Homes would succeed in this regard. Unfortunately, however, that never proved to be possible, despite considerable effort.

[9] In the early spring of 2000, Mr. Grindler began to respond to Mr. Gomez's inquiries with untruthful statements in emails and faxes. In some of these he created elaborate lies to explain the delay in the shipment of materials. It was not until April 12, 2000 that Mr. Grindler informed Mr. Gomez that the shipment was not on its way and could not be sent because of the lack of funds in Maple Homes.

[10] Mr. Gomez deposes that he trusted Mr. Grindler and believed his representations that the funds Mr. Gomez provided to Maple Homes would be used for the specific purpose for which they were provided.

[11] Maple Homes has applied for court approval of the Proposal, which application is opposed by Max Gomez. Mr. Gomez has applied for an order and declaration that sections 69 to 69.3 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, no longer operate in respect of himself. He has commenced an action against Bradley Michael Grindler and Cathie Mae Grindler for damages for breach of trust and for an accounting. He has not sued Maple Homes but wishes to be able to do so. In his affidavit he states that he is concerned that his ability to trace and recover his funds and prove the details of the fraud he alleges will be impaired by the passage of time if his right to pursue action against Maple Homes is stayed.

ISSUES

A. Should the Proposal of Maple Homes Canada Ltd. be approved?

B. If the Proposal is approved, should Max Gomez be granted an exemption from the stay of proceedings pursuant to s. 69.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act?

ANALYSIS

A. Should the Proposal of Maple Homes Canada Ltd. be approved?

[12] The relevant provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act are:

> s.59 (1) The court shall, before approving the Proposal, hear a report of the trustee in the prescribed form respecting the terms thereof and the conduct of the debtor, and, in addition, shall hear the trustee, the debtor, the person making the Proposal, any opposing, objecting or dissenting creditor and such further evidence as the court may require.
> (2) Where the court is of the opinion that the terms of the Proposal are not reasonable or are not calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, the court shall refuse to approve the Proposal, and the court may refuse to approve the Proposal whenever it is established that the debtor has committed any one of the offences mentioned in sections 198 to 200.
> (3) Where any of the facts mentioned in sections 173 and 177 are proved against the debtor, the court shall refuse to approve the Proposal unless it provides reasonable security for the payment of not less than fifty cents on the dollar on all the unsecured claims provable against the debtor's estate or such percentage thereof as the court may direct.
> s.173 (1) The facts referred to in section 172 are:
> ...
> (c) the bankrupt has continued to trade after becoming aware of being insolvent; ...

1. Are the terms of the Proposal reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of creditors pursuant to s. 59 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act?

[13] The Trustee is recommending approval of the Proposal, pointing out that it will bring the unsecured creditors some return (a dividend of 7 – 8.5%) rather than no return. The Trustee estimated that if Mr. Grindler were petitioned into bankruptcy he would be required to make payments of $500 per month for between nine and twenty-one months (thus, a total of $4,500 - $10,500), rather than the total of $30,000 under the Proposal.

Digitized by Google

[14] The principal of the company, Brad Grindler, is putting into the Proposal what appears to be his only remaining substantial asset, the family recreational property on Pender Island which is worth perhaps $40,000, in addition to $30,000 of his future income. Mr. Sullivan argued that the creditors will thus receive more under the Proposal than they would if they put both Maple Homes and Mr. Grindler into bankruptcy. He urged that if the Proposal is rejected Maple Homes will automatically be bankrupt which would destroy the goodwill it has built up in the market over 11 years.

[15] He referred to Re Pateman reflex, (1991), 5 C.B.R. (3d) 115 (Man. Q.B.) at p. 120 where Oliphant A.C.J.Q.B. wrote:

> The decision of the Newfoundland Supreme Court [In Bankruptcy] in Irving Oil Ltd. v. Noseworthy (1982), 42 C.B.R. (N.S.) 302, is authority for the proposition that where the majority of the creditors is in favour of the Proposal and it has not been demonstrated that public policy or good business morality or practice militate against it, the Proposal should be approved.

The Court in Re Pateman also noted that the onus is on the party seeking approval for the Proposal to establish that its terms are reasonable and for the benefit of the general body of creditors, that while the majority of creditors' views should be seriously considered, they are not binding, and that it is the duty of the court to be satisfied that creditors will be better off under the Proposal than in bankruptcy.

[16] Mr. Scouten argued that in this respect the Proposal did not meet the standard necessary for approval. He pointed out that Mr. Gomez is one of the largest creditors and perhaps one of the few with claims against Mr. Grindler personally. Thus, he argued, the aspect of the Proposal that Maple Homes cited as a reason for approval (the contribution by Mr. Grindler personally) was actually a reason to reject the Proposal because it may put his major personal asset out of reach of his creditors.

[17] Mr. Sullivan argued that approval of the Proposal is consistent with the two overriding objectives of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: to ensure the equitable distribution of an insolvent's assets amongst its creditors pari passu, and to assist the financial rehabilitation of debtors. Mr. Scouten urged on the other hand that the objectives of the legislation also encompass requiring debtors to act responsibly with respect to their creditors. He pointed to the dishonest statements made by Mr. Grindler to Mr. Gomez and to the possibility that Maple Homes continued to trade after knowing it was insolvent. He also urged that the proposed dividend was very modest, amounting to $700 per $10,000 of claim, and thus only marginally better than bankruptcy.

[18] The main ground for Mr. Gomez's position that the Proposal should not be approved was that a "fact mentioned" in s. 173(c) of the Act had been proved, namely that Maple Homes continued to trade while it knew it was insolvent. Mr. Scouten argued that at the latest by March 10, 2000, Mr. Grindler as principal of Maple Homes knew that it was insolvent. The definition of "insolvent person" under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act refers to a person:

> (a) who is for any reason unable to meet his obligations as they generally become due,
> (b) who has ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business as they generally become due, or
> (c) the aggregate of whose property is not, at a fair valuation, sufficient, or, if disposed of at a fairly conducted sale under legal process, would not be sufficient to enable payment of all his obligations, due and accruing due...

Mr. Scouten pointed to the evidence that the sales of Maple Homes had been in serious decline since September of 1999, having plummeted to 10% of previous levels, that a large prospective order from a German customer had fallen through at the end of February, that the company's suppliers had put it on a "C.O.D." basis, that Mr. Grindler had ceased to draw a salary, had borrowed money from family to put into the company and had laid off employees, and that Mr. Gomez had been demanding shipment of the goods worth roughly $100,000 for which he had already paid. I note that for Maple Homes to have reached the state of $13,000 assets and $664,758.14 liabilities by the date of the Trustee's report in June 2000, it would have to have been in something approaching that state by early March. I also note that, as counsel for Maple Homes urged, the evidence suggests that Mr. Grindler adopted the tactic of lying to Mr. Gomez about his shipment out of desperation.

[19] The law on this subject is summarized in Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3rd ed., at p. 6–92:

> Section 173(1)(c) makes it imperative that a debtor who is aware that he is insolvent should cease trading and either call a meeting of creditors or file an assignment in bankruptcy: Re Lunenfeld (1929), 10 C.B.R. 457 (Ont. S.C.). If a debtor continues in business, he has committed a fact under s. 173(1)(c). By continuing to trade, the debtor is continuing in business at the risk of his creditors if business does not improve, and a debtor has no right to do this: Re Stainton, Ex parte Board of Trade (1887), 4 Morr. 242....
> For the court to find that a fact has been committed under s. 173(1)(c), it is essential to prove that the debtor was aware of his insolvency.

Digitized by Google

The Stainton case illustrates that this principle applies even when the debtor has a bona fide belief that trade must soon revive. Cave J. wrote at p. 251:

> Now, a man, of course has a perfect right as long as he is solvent, to determine that he will go on with a business, although it may be a losing business. He may trust that before he becomes insolvent matters will change, and he will again be in a condition of prosperity. But the moment he becomes insolvent, then he is no longer going on at his own risk in case of failure; he is going on at the risk of his creditors, in case things do not mend as he hopes they will. In my judgment a man has no right to do that. The moment things have got to such a pitch that he cannot pay 20*s.* in the pound, but he nevertheless thinks that if he goes on he may be able to retrieve his position, in my opinion he ought to call his creditors together, and leave them who will have to bear the loss in case his calculations are wrong, to determine whether that course of going on shall be proceeded with or not.

[20] Mr. Scouten submitted that this case provides an opportunity for the Court to make it clear that insolvent persons who are carrying on business at the risk of their creditors will not be allowed to do so without consequences for themselves.

[21] Mr. Sullivan, however, suggested that the older authorities must be read with some caution since the more recent trend is to view bankruptcy legislation through a less penal, and more rehabilitative, lens. He argued that an overly strict interpretation of the provisions regarding doing business while insolvent is inconsistent with the objectives of the legislation, and pointed out that since a debtor cannot make a Proposal until it is insolvent, an overly strict view would leave only a very brief opportunity to make a Proposal. He cited Mercure v. Marquette& Fils, 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547 at p. 556 where the Court stated:

> Before going on to another point it is perhaps not inappropriate to recall that the Bankruptcy Act, while not business legislation in the strict sense, clearly has its origins in the business world. Interpretation of it must take these origins into account. it concerns relations among businessmen, and to interpret it using an overly narrow, legalistic approach is to misinterpret it. it seems to me that appellant is urging the Court to so interpret it.

[22] He referred to Re Moxam (1978), 31 C.B.C. 151 (B.C.S.C.) in which Low, L.J.S.C. (as he then was) allowed an application for discharge, stating at p. 153:

> I do not find any evidence that Mr. Moxam continued to trade after knowing that he was insolvent. He merely made reasonable efforts to salvage a situation that involved increasing despair.

[23] Mr. Scouten urged that the Moxam case is quite different on its facts. The debtor there was found to have been straightforward in his dealings with the creditors, which is not the case here. As well, he argued, in the case of Maple Homes, there was not a gradual decline, inevitable only with hindsight, but a tangible and definite occurrence — the loss of the large order from Germany at the beginning of March — after which Mr. Grindler must have known that Maple Homes was insolvent.

[24] Indeed, he argued, Mr. Grindler had admitted this in his affidavit, where he swore:

> Until recently, Maple Homes was always a tremendous source of pride for me. As a result, however, it was very difficult for me this Spring to come to accept that Maple Homes could not make ends meet and could not meet its debts.

However, I do not find this constitutes the admission alleged because the word "Spring" may refer to a season that extends to the beginning of May, which is when Maple Homes gave notice of its intention to make a Proposal to its creditors.

[25] Mr. Scouten's submissions, urging that persons in financial difficulty have an obligation to keep optimism in check and to be candid with their creditors, have force. Nevertheless, I have concluded that the evidence does not establish that this debtor continued to trade after it knew it was insolvent. The length of time for which the company had been in business, the concentrated efforts Mr. Grindler was making to solve the business's problems including continued bids on work, and the fact that a large order such as the one that fell through at the beginning of March could have permitted the company to continue, are consistent with good faith and reasonable efforts to carry on, rather than with knowledge that the business would fail. I am satisfied that, within a reasonable time of knowing that Maple Homes was insolvent, its principal, Mr. Grindler, gave notice of intention to make a Proposal and that a "fact" mentioned in s., 173(c) has not been proved.

[26] Because I am also otherwise satisfied for the reasons put forward by the Trustee and by counsel for Maple Homes that the Proposal of Maple Homes is reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of creditors, that Proposal is approved.

B. Should Mr. Gomez be granted an exemption from the stay of proceedings pursuant to s. 69.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act?

[27] The relevant provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act are:

> 69 (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) and sections 69.4 and 69.5, on the filing of a notice of intention under section 50.4 by an insolvent person,

> 69.31(1) Where a notice of intention under subsection 50.4(1) has been filed or a Proposal has been made by an insolvent corporation, no person may commence or continue any action against a director of the corporation on any claim against directors that arose before the commencement of proceedings under this Act and that relates to obligations of the corporation where directors are under any law liable in their capacity as directors for the payment of such obligations, until the Proposal, if one has been filed, is approved by the court or the corporation becomes bankrupt.

[28] Some grounds on which courts will lift stays of proceedings were set out in Re Advocate Mines Limited (1984), 52 C.B.R.(N.S.) 277 (Ont. S.C.) at p. 278:

> The court may, however, remove the stay of proceedings prescribed by that section in appropriate cases and has done so in the following circumstances:
> 1. Actions against the bankrupt for a debt to which a discharge would not be a defence.
> 2. Actions in respect of a contingent or unliquidated debt, the proof of which and valuation has that degree of complexity which makes the summary procedure prescribed by s. 95(2) of the Bankruptcy Act inappropriate.
> 3. Actions in which the bankrupt is a necessary party for the complete adjudication of the matters at issue involving other parties.
> 4. Actions brought to establish judgment against the bankrupt to enable the plaintiff to recover under a contract of insurance or indemnity or under compensatory legislation.
> 5. Actions in Ontario which, at the date of bankruptcy, have progressed to a point where logic dictates that the action be permitted to continue to judgment.

[29] It was common ground that the burden is on the applicant for a declaration under s. 69.4 to satisfy the court that one or more of those grounds is present and that the applicant is likely to be materially prejudiced or that it is equitable on other grounds to make such a declaration.

[30] The authorities establish that it is not for the court to inquire into the merits of the action the applicant wishes to bring. In Re Francisco 1995 CanLII 7371 (ON SC), (1995), 32 C.B.R. (3d) 29 (Ont. Gen. Div.) the court stated the position thus (at p. 34):

> Without intending to usurp the role of the trial judge to decide otherwise on the facts established before him, I am satisfied BPCO has pleaded sufficient allegations to bring its claim, at least arguably, within s. 178(1)(d).

Mr. Sullivan cited Wychreschuk v. Sellors (1988), 71 C.B.R. (N.S.) 37 (Man. Q.B.), appeal dismissed (1989), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 267 (C.A.) where Monnin J. observed that the granting of leave is a discretionary matter, and wrote at p. 39:

> In order for leave to be granted, an applicant must demonstrate to the court that there exist compelling reasons to permit an action either to commence or to proceed.

However, as Master Tokarek observed in Re Bond, [1993] B.C.J. No. 1175 (Q.L.) (S.C.), there is little available guidance as to what may be considered a "compelling reason".

[31] In Eron Financial Services Ltd. (Receiver of) v. Biller 1999 CanLII 6194 (BC SC), (1999), 10 C.B.R. (4th) 252 (B.C.S.C.) the Receiver and Judicial Trustee of the plaintiffs wished to proceed with an action against the defendant before his Trustee in Bankruptcy had been discharged. They wished to bring an action claiming fraud and seeking a declaration of trust. The court decided to permit the action to proceed, stating at p. 256:

> The facts of the case are similar to those in J.B. Allen, supra, where the Court relied upon the earlier decision in Cravit, Re (1984), 54 C.B.R. (N.S.) 214 (Ont. S.C.) where Master Ferron stated at p. 215:
> > ... in order to come to a conclusion that the plaintiffs should not be permitted to proceed I would have to conclude that the plaintiffs could either not succeed in the action in question or that if they succeeded they could not recover against the [bankrupt's] insurer.
> > The function of the bankruptcy court is not to inquire into the merit of the action sought to be commenced or continued but rather to be assured that such an action, falling within the s. 49(1) [now s. 69.3] stay, should continue for the reasons which I detailed in Re Advocate Mines Ltd.
> The bankrupt, Mr. Biller, is a necessary party to the action as he was an officer and director of many, if not all of the plaintiff companies. Further, the claim is based upon a cause of action for which, if successful, will not be defeated by the bankruptcy. Lastly, the Judicial Trustee ought to be able to pursue the action against the other defendants, the bankrupt's wife and their holding company.

[32] The parties referred me to a number of other authorities, including Likins v. Francis 1995 CanLII 7378 (ON SC), (1995), 33 C.B.R. (3d) 259 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Re Duvall 1992 CanLII 1917 (BC SC), (1992), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 264 (B.C.S.C.); Royal Bank v. Exner 1993 CanLII 7305 (AB QB), (1993), 23 C.B.R. (3d) 274 (Alta. Q.B.); Dutchak Estate v. Seidle, [1998] S.J. No. 756 (Q.L.) (Sask. Q.B.); J.B. Allen & Co. v. D.E. Witmer Plumbing& Heating Ltd. reflex, (1992), 12 C.B.R. (3d) 272 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Don Bodkin Leasing Ltd. v. Rayzak, [1994] O.J. No. 280 (Q.L.) (Ont. Gen. Div.); and Re Quality Carpets Ltd. 1995 CanLII 803 (BC SC), (1995), 36 C.B.R. (3d) 143 (B.C.S.C.).

[33] The principles that emerge from the jurisprudence may be summarized:

> (1) The general scheme of bankruptcy proceedings is that civil actions are stayed against the insolvent person; exemptions are to be made only where there are "compelling reasons". This flows from one of the major purposes of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, which is to permit the rehabilitation of the bankrupt unfettered by past debts.
> (2) An applicant for exemption from the stay must show that there will be material prejudice to the applicant if the stay is continued or that it is equitable on other grounds to allow the exemption.
> (3) The existence of one or more of the factors listed in Re Advocate Mines will be an important consideration, but is not determinative.
> (5) Rather, it must assess whether it is a claim of the nature that would survive discharge, whether it is a claim that could not succeed, and whether if it did succeed it could not result in recovery against the defendants.

[34] The standard appears to be somewhat more stringent than that for permitting a cause of action to continue under a rule such as Supreme Court Rules, B.C. Reg. 221/90, Rule 19(24), where a proceeding may be struck as disclosing no reasonable claim or defence only if the pleading itself makes it plain and obvious there is none. Given the purpose of bankruptcy legislation and the fact that continuing an action is the exceptional situation, I think that generally there must be more than pleadings or proposed pleadings disclosing a claim. There must also be some evidence supporting the conclusion that there is a fair issue to be tried. However, to expect more than that would be inconsistent with the statutory scheme. The legislation contemplates that claims of fraud or breach of fiduciary duty may survive bankruptcy or insolvency, and it will seldom be possible to prove such cases on a balance of probabilities at an early stage and without discovery.

[36] The first question is whether this would be an action falling within any of the grounds listed in Re Advocate Mines, supra. The applicant's position is that it is an action against the bankrupt for a debt to which a discharge would not be a defence, and that the company Maple Homes is a necessary party in the action against Bradley and Cathie Grindler.

[37] In claiming that the action is one for which discharge would not be a defence, the applicant here relies on s. 178(1)(d). He has issued a writ and statement of claim against Bradley Grindler and Cathie Grindler pleading that Maple Homes and Bradley Grindler, in using the funds Mr. Gomez provided for unauthorized purposes, and concealing that they had done so, committed a breach of trust. He also pleaded that Cathie Grindler was at all material times an active director and participant in Maple Homes and knowingly assisted in the misappropriation by Maple Homes and Bradley Grindler of the payments, the concealment of that misappropriation, and the continuing deceit upon the plaintiff. He further pleaded that the funds were used to pay third parties or to make payments to or for the benefit of the defendants, or to purchase assets now in the possession of the defendants or others, and seeks a tracing remedy in respect of the payments and assets. Maple Homes is not a party to the action.

[38] After the close of the hearing, and upon further review of the matter, I requested further submissions from counsel as to the impact of paragraph 5 of the Proposal. It appeared that there might be some question about whether the legislation encompassed a stay of all claims against the Grindlers personally, even though such a stay seemed to be assumed in the provisions of paragraph 5 of the Proposal and in the submissions of counsel for Maple Homes. The response from counsel for Maple Homes clarified that its position is that if the Proposal is approved, Mr. Gomez will lose all of his claims (against both the company and Mr. and Mrs. Grindler) except for claims (if any) for non-dischargeable debts under s. 178(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[39] On the other hand, Mr. Scouten argued on behalf of Mr. Gomez that although the Proposal, if approved, would bind Mr. Gomez such that he would require a declaration under s. 69.4 in order to pursue an action against Maple Homes, paragraph 5 of the Proposal, in purporting to cover "all rights of recovery" against the Grindlers personally, goes beyond what is permitted by s. 50(13) and (14) of the Act. Those sections provide:

> 50 (13) A Proposal made in respect of a corporation may include in its terms provision for the compromise of claims against directors of the corporation that arose before the commencement of proceedings under this Act and that relate to the obligations of the corporation where the directors are by law liable in their capacity as directors for the payment of such obligations.
> (14) A provision for the compromise of claims against directors may not include claims that:
> (a) relate to contractual rights of one or more creditors arising from contracts with one or more directors; or
> (b) are based on allegations of misrepresentation made by directors to creditors or of wrongful or oppressive conduct by directors.

[40] Mr. Gomez's position is that the Proposal goes further than the Act permits in these ways:

> (1) the claims against Mr. Grindler arising from things done or said by him personally, and otherwise than by law by virtue of his capacity as a director, such as the claims in deceit, are not covered under s. 50(13);
> (2) Cathie Grindler has maintained that she was not a director of Maple Homes at the time of the payments made by Mr. Gomez and, if so, claims against her are not covered under s. 50(13); and
> (3) in part, Mr. Gomez's claims against Mr. Grindler are based on allegations of misrepresentation and wrongful conduct on the part of Mr. Grindler, which are not covered under s. 50(13).

[41] Mr. Scouten argues that the Proposal is therefore bad on its face or, in the alternative, that if approved it can have no effect on the rights of Mr. Gomez to pursue claims against Bradley or Cathie Grindler since those claims either do not "relate to the obligations of the corporation where the directors are by law liable in their capacity as directors", or else (in Mr. Grindler's case) are based on allegations of "misrepresentation made by directors to creditors or of wrongful or oppressive conduct by directors". He argues that the claims do not fall within s. 50(13) in that they do not relate, for example, to a director's liability at law for unpaid statutory remittances, wages or similar debts of the company for which a director is liable qua director. He argues that s. 50(13) does not allow a corporate Proposal to include a term compromising all claims against directors of the company; the section, properly read, only covers terms compromising claims for conventional "director's liabilities" arising out of the director's legal capacity as a director.

[42] In response, Mr. Sullivan argues that the extent to which court approval of this Proposal would affect claims in the action against Bradley and Cathie Grindler will be a matter for the judge to decide in that action. He agrees that if the law does not allow a Proposal to affect a particular type of claim, then regardless of the provisions found within the Proposal, the Proposal cannot affect such claims.

[43] I conclude that Mr. Scouten is correct; the Proposal of Maple Homes cannot compromise all claims against Bradley and Cathie Grindler, for the reasons he has put forward.

[44] With respect to the application for a declaration permitting an action against Maple Homes, the argument on behalf of Mr. Gomez was that the debt arose out of a breach of trust. Mr. Gomez's position is that when he advanced the funds it was understood that they would be used to pay for the materials required to build his house. In his affidavit, Mr. Gomez deposes:

> Regarding paragraphs 16 through 20 of the Grindler Affidavit, when I met with Mr. Grindler in Vancouver, he specifically informed me that Maple Homes was not a manufacturer and he and Maple Homes would purchase for me and ship materials from different suppliers. I knew there would be a price mark-up for these services. Bradley Grindler took me to see a number of manufacturers/suppliers' show room locations and display facilities, including two display houses, while I was in Vancouver. At that time Mr. Grindler again confirmed the terms of our agreement: He told me "you select what you want and we will buy it for you". At these locations I then selected specific items which Bradley Grindler and Maple homes would purchase and ship to me. These included such items as the Jacuzzi, shower stalls, faucets, kitchen sink, the stairs ... and the mouldings for the walls and ceilings....
> Further Bradley Grindler took me and my wife for lunch and at that luncheon meeting, I specifically asked Mr. Grindler how I could be certain that if I paid him my money he would in fact purchase the house materials and ship them to me. He assured me he was a trustworthy person who had been in business for several years, operated a reputable company and I could trust him to buy and deliver all materials to me. I relied on those representations and I trusted that he would, for the price mark-up of Maple Homes, use my monies for the specific purpose of purchasing the materials, paying all suppliers and deliver the Materials to me.
> These statements, and Mr. Grindler's conduct in dealing with me throughout, left me with the clear understanding that Maple would be using the money that I sent to it to purchase and pay for the goods from his third party suppliers, and I understood this to be an important and central feature of the arrangement between us for the purchase and supply of products to me.

[45] That evidence was not contradicted. Although it is conceded that the funds were kept in the Maple Homes general account, the records show that the funds were tracked separately in that account, as were funds deposited by other customers. Mr. Scouten argued that implicit in a "deposit" is a trust-like notion; a "deposit" does not necessarily create a trust, but shows that the money is to be used for a particular purpose. He relied on a series of cases beginning with Barclay's Bank Ltd. v. Quistclose Investments Ltd., [1970] A.C. 567 (H.L.) in arguing that these arrangements gave rise to a relationship of a fiduciary character or trust in favour of the suppliers of the materials, and, secondly, if that trust failed, in favour of Mr. Gomez.

[46] Mr. Sullivan argued, however, that it was the practice of Maple Homes with all of its customers to require payment in advance for their orders, and that although Mr. Gomez had specifically chosen certain materials, those materials could have come from Maple Homes's inventory just as much as from the suppliers under the terms of the contract, which was simply to provide the materials. Acknowledging the seriousness of Mr. Grindler's admitted dishonest statements to Mr. Gomez after the funds were gone, Mr. Sullivan pointed to Mr. Grindler's contrition and to his affidavit stating that he had continued to hope that more orders would come in and he would be able to fulfil the contract. Mr. Sullivan argued that sometimes even honest people say things they regret, that it was a time of panic, and that the lies in that context do not make Mr. Grindler a "fraud artist".

[47] The law with respect to "Quistclose trusts" is, as Mr. Scouten said, still under development. The Quistclose case itself involved a loan from Quistclose Investments to Rolls Razor Ltd., which was in financial difficulties. The loan was made on the agreed condition that it would be used to pay a dividend. The cheque was paid into a separate account opened for that purpose with the bank. The bank knew that the money was borrowed, and agreed with Rolls Razor Ltd. that the account would only be used for the purpose of paying the dividend. Before the dividend had been paid, Rolls Razor Ltd. went into voluntary liquidation. Quistclose brought an action claiming that the money had been held by Rolls Razor Ltd. on trust to pay the dividend; that trust having failed, there was then a resulting trust for Quistclose of which the bank had notice. Lord Wilberforce, with whom all other members of the Court agreed, held that the mutual intention of Quistclose and Rolls Razor, and the essence of their bargain, was that "the sum advanced should not become part of the assets of Rolls Razor Ltd., but should be used exclusively for payment of a particular class of its creditors, namely, those entitled to the dividend." He then stated at p. 580:

> That arrangements of this character for the payment of a person's creditors by a third person, give rise to a relationship of a fiduciary character or trust, in favour, as a primary trust, of the creditors, and secondarily, if the primary trust fails, of the third person, has been recognised in a series of cases over some 150 years.

These cases do not detract, the court said, from the principle that in the absence of some special arrangement creating a trust, payments of this kind are made upon the basis that they are to be included in the company's assets. Further, the court rejected the argument that if a transaction was one of loan, giving rise to a legal action of debt, this necessarily excluded the implication of any trust relationship. Lord Wiberforce wrote at p. 581-82:

> There is surely no difficulty in recognising the co-existence in one transaction of legal and equitable rights and remedies: when the money is advanced, the lender acquires an equitable right to see that it is applied for the primary designated purpose ...: when the purpose has been carried out (i.e., the debt paid) the lender has his remedy against the borrower in debt: if the primary purpose cannot be carried out, the question arises if a secondary purpose (i.e., repayment to the lender) has been agreed, expressly or by implication: if it has, the remedies of equity may be invoked to give effect to it, if it has not (and the money is intended to fall within the general fund of the debtor's assets) then there is the appropriate remedy for recovery of a loan. I can appreciate no reason why the flexible interplay of law and equity cannot let in these practical arrangements, and other variations if desired: it would be to the discredit of both systems if they could not. In the present case the intention to create a secondary trust for the benefit of the lender, to arise if the primary trust, to pay the dividend, could not be carried out, is clear and I can find no reason why the law should not give effect to it.

[48] Mr. Scouten cited Ling v. Chinavision Canada Corp. reflex, (1992), 10 O.R. (3d) 79 (Ont. Gen. Div.) which applied the principle stated in Quistclose.

[49] Mr. Sullivan, however, argued that the principle is limited to situations where there is an express agreement that the funds will be kept separate and will be used only for the specified purpose. The fundamental premise articulated in Henry v. Hammond, [1913] 2 K.B. 515 at p. 521, he argued, is solidly accepted:

> It is clear that if the terms upon which the person receives the money are that he is bound to keep it separate, either in a bank or elsewhere, and to hand that money so kept as a separate fund to the person entitled to it, then he is a trustee of that money and must hand it over to the person who is his cestui que trust. If on the other hand he is not bound to keep the money separate, but is entitled to mix it with his own money and deal with it as he pleases, and when called upon to hand over an equivalent sum of money, then, in my opinion, he is not a trustee of the money, but merely a debtor.

He referred to Bank of Montreal v. B.C. (Milk Marketing Board) 1994 CanLII 2770 (BC SC), (1994), 94 B.C.L.R. (2d) 281 (S.C.). There the Court held that the principle that where A gives money to B for the specific purpose of paying C, the money is impressed with a trust and may not be appropriated by him, is undoubted. Newbury J. observed, however, that in both the Quistclose case itself and in Lowndes Lambert Group Ltd. v. Specialty Underwriting Services Ltd. 1986 CanLII 870 (BC SC), (1986), 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 308 (S.C.) which applied it, that it appeared that (1) the recipient of the funds was required, either by express terms or the course of dealings between the parties, to keep the money separate from its own funds; and (2) the funds were paid on express conditions of trust which the payees later tried to repudiate. The Court, having commented that the case at bar involved a claim that a trust should be implied from the course of dealings, concluded at p. 288:

> Faced with the clear authority of Henry v. Hammond, then, I must conclude that the absence of an obligation on McKinnon in the ordinary course to segregate funds received from the Board from its own funds is fatal to the inference that a trust existed in this case. Regardless of who was a conduit for the payment of funds to whom, and regardless of whether a direct liability existed between the receiving vendors and the defendant producers, such an obligation, express or implied, is "the essential thing" not proven here. It follows that the funds withheld from McKinnon by the Board constitute only a debt owing to the vendor, and that they must be distributed first to secured creditors and thereafter to other claimants in accordance with the Bankruptcy Act.

[50] Henry v. Hammond has been cited and its principle followed a number of times in Canadian law. Mr. Sullivan cited, in addition to the above instance, M.A. Hanna Company v. The Provincial Bank of Canada, 1933 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1935] S.C.R. 144; Salo v. Royal Bank of Canada, [1988] B.C.J. No. 999 (Q.L.)(C.A.) and Toronto Dominion Bank v. Hayworth Equipment Sales Ltd. (1985), 56 C.B.R (N.S.) 82 (Alta. Q.B.).

[51] Given that on its face the proposed action against Maple Homes and Bradley and Cathie Grindler is one that would survive discharge, I must ask whether it is one that could not succeed. There is evidence that the parties had discussions which left Mr. Gomez with the understanding that his funds would be used to purchase and ship the materials he had ordered for his house. Those funds were placed in the Maple Homes general account but were tracked separately. There is some authority that would support the proposed claim, if the evidence were fully developed in a way favourable to the claimant. I conclude that this action meets the required standard.

[52] As well, I take into account that the action against Mr. and Mrs. Grindler can proceed despite the Proposal for the reasons set out above, and that action will involve the same events and raise many of the same issues as those in the proposed action.

[53] Is there material prejudice if Mr. Gomez is required to wait? Is it equitable to grant the exemption? The allegations are serious ones, relating to breach of fiduciary duty. Mr. Gomez, in all good faith, trusted Maple Homes to use the money he provided for the purchase of materials for his home in Spain. Maple Homes, through Mr. Grindler, proceeded in a course of deception for several months, until it was far too late for Mr. Gomez to try to retrieve his funds. He may or may not succeed at trial in establishing that there was a trust-like relationship, but he is entitled to try. He will be prejudiced due to passage of time in producing his evidence if he is required to wait. In all of the circumstances it would be inequitable to deny his application.

[54] Therefore, the exemption sought by Mr. Gomez will be granted.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The Proposal is approved. It meets the statutory requirements. It has not been established that the debtor continued to trade after it knew it was insolvent.
2. The application by Mr. Gomez for a declaration under s. 69.4 that sections 69 to 69.3 no longer apply to him, is granted. This is because the claim that he wishes to bring against Maple Homes for breach of trust meets the standard required under s. 69.4 in that it is the type of claim that would survive discharge, it could succeed, there would be prejudice to continue the stay and it is equitable to grant the exemption.

"Lynn Smith, J."
The Honourable Madam Justice Lynn Smith

(c) the failure to issue the order is likely to result in irreparable damage to the insolvent person.

No delay on vote on proposal - Sec. 65.12(3)
(3) The vote of the creditors in respect of a proposal may not be delayed solely because the period provided in the laws of the jurisdiction governing collective bargaining between the insolvent person and the bargaining agent has not expired.

Claims arising from revision of collective agreement - Sec. 65.12(4)
(4) If the parties to the collective agreement agree to revise the collective agreement after proceedings have been commenced under this Act in respect of the insolvent person, the bargaining agent that is a party to the agreement has a claim, as an unsecured creditor, for an amount equal to the value of concessions granted by the bargaining agent with respect to the remaining term of the collective agreement.

Order to disclose information - Sec. 65.12(5)
(5) On the application of the bargaining agent and on notice to the person to whom the application relates, the court may, subject to any terms and conditions it specifies, make an order requiring the person to make available to the bargaining agent any information specified by the court in the person's possession or control that relates to the insolvent person's business or financial affairs and that is relevant to the collective bargaining between the insolvent person and the bargaining agent. The court may make the order only after the insolvent person has been authorized to serve a notice to bargain under subsection (1).

Unrevised collective agreements remain in force - Sec. 65.12(6)
(6) For greater certainty, any collective agreement that the insolvent person and the bargaining agent have not agreed to revise remains in force.

Parties - Sec. 65.12(7)
(7) For the purpose of this section, the parties to a collective agreement are the insolvent person and the bargaining agent who are bound by the collective agreement.
2005, c. 47, s. 44.

Restriction on disposition of assets - Sec. 65.13
65.13 (1) An insolvent person in respect of whom a notice of intention is filed under section 50.4 or a proposal is filed under subsection 62(1) may not sell or otherwise dispose of assets outside the ordinary course of business unless authorized to do so by a court. Despite any requirement for shareholder approval, including one under federal or provincial law, the court may authorize the sale or disposition even if shareholder approval was not obtained.

Individuals - Sec. 65.13(2)
(2) In the case of an individual who is carrying on a business, the court may authorize the sale or disposition only if the assets were acquired for or used in relation to the business.

Notice to secured creditors - Sec. 65.13(3)
(3) An insolvent person who applies to the court for an authorization shall give notice of the application to the secured creditors who are likely to be affected by the proposed sale or disposition.

Factors to be considered - Sec. 65.13(4)
(4) In deciding whether to grant the authorization, the court is to consider, among other things,

- (a) whether the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition was reasonable in the circumstances;
- (b) whether the trustee approved the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition;
- (c) whether the trustee filed with the court a report stating that in their opinion the sale or disposition would be more beneficial to the creditors than a sale or disposition under a bankruptcy;
- (d) the extent to which the creditors were consulted;
- (e) the effects of the proposed sale or disposition on the creditors and other interested parties; and
- (f) whether the consideration to be received for the assets is reasonable and fair, taking into account their market value.

Additional factors — related persons - Sec. 65.13(5)
(5) If the proposed sale or disposition is to a person who is related to the insolvent person, the court may, after considering the factors referred to in subsection (4), grant the authorization only if it is satisfied that

(a) good faith efforts were made to sell or otherwise dispose of the assets to persons who are not related to the insolvent person; and
(b) the consideration to be received is superior to the consideration that would be received under any other offer made in accordance with the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition.

Related persons - Sec. 65.13(6)
(6) For the purpose of subsection (5), a person who is related to the insolvent person includes
(a) a director or officer of the insolvent person;
(b) a person who has or has had, directly or indirectly, control in fact of the insolvent person; and
(c) a person who is related to a person described in paragraph (a) or (b).

Assets may be disposed of free and clear - Sec. 65.13(7)
(7) The court may authorize a sale or disposition free and clear of any security, charge or other restriction and, if it does, it shall also order that other assets of the insolvent person or the proceeds of the sale or disposition be subject to a security, charge or other restriction in favour of the creditor whose security, charge or other restriction is to be affected by the order.

Restriction — employers - Sec. 65.13(8)
(8) The court may grant the authorization only if the court is satisfied that the insolvent person can and will make the payments that would have been required under paragraphs 60(1.3)(a) and (1.5)(a) if the court had approved the proposal.

2007, c. 36, s. 27.

Insolvent person may disclaim or resiliate commercial lease - Sec. 65.2
65.2 (1) At any time between the filing of a notice of intention and the filing of a proposal, or on the filing of a proposal, in respect of an insolvent person who is a commercial lessee under a lease of real property or an immovable, the insolvent person may disclaim or resiliate the lease on giving thirty days notice to the lessor in the prescribed manner, subject to subsection (2).

Bankruptcy — Proposals — Disclaimer of commercial leases — Tenant validly assigning leases and assignee subsequently becoming insolvent — Assignee giving landlords notice of intention to repudiate leases pursuant to s. 65.2 of Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act — Whether repudiation of leases under s. 65.2 relieved first tenant of its obligations as original lessee — Whether post-disclaimer, assignors and guarantors must be treated in same manner with respect to liability — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 65.2.

Landlord and tenant — Commercial leases — Assignment clause — Insolvent commercial tenant — Tenant validly assigning leases and assignee subsequently becoming insolvent — Assignee giving landlords notice of intention to repudiate leases pursuant to s. 65.2 of Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act — Whether rights between landlords and original tenant affected by proceedings under s. 65.2 — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 65.2.

The appellant was the respondents' original tenant. Ultimately, F held the validly assigned leases. F later became insolvent and attempted reorganization under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. F, through its trustee, repudiated the leases. Pursuant to s. 65.2(3) of the Act, the respondents received compensation payments equivalent to six months rent upon approval of the proposal. The respondents informed the appellant that F had repudiated the leases and asserted their right to be paid the outstanding rent under the assignment clause in the leases. The appellant declined to pay. The respondents filed suit and the appellant applied for summary judgment in both cases. Holding that the notices of repudiation given under s. 65.2 terminated the leases for all purposes, the motions judge granted summary judgment and dismissed the respondents' claims. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment, finding that the rights between the respondents and the appellant were unaffected by proceedings under s. 65.2.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The repudiation of the leases under s. 65.2 of the Act did not affect the appellant's obligations as the original lessee. Section 65.2 should be read narrowly. The plain purposes of the section are to free an insolvent from obligations under a commercial lease that have become too onerous, to compensate the landlord for the early determination of the lease, and to allow the insolvent to resume viable operations as best it can. Repudiation benefits only the insolvent. Nothing in the Act protects third parties, including assignors, from the consequences of an insolvent's repudiation of a commercial lease. From the time a lease is completed, the original tenant is bound by all the conditions of the lease, including the term. The covenant is fully enforceable even if it has been assigned. Explicit statutory language is required to divest persons of rights they otherwise enjoy at law. So long as the doctrine of paramountcy is not triggered, federally regulated bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings cannot be used to subvert provincially regulated property and civil rights.

The mere possibility that the original tenant may have a right of indemnity against his insolvent assignee and is able to make a claim to participate in the proposal proceedings as an unsecured creditor is not inconsistent with the Act. On the contrary, it is consistent with the circumstances applicable to other alternative debtors, and does not affect or alter the nature of the original tenant's contractual relationship and obligations. More importantly, it does not require that the original tenant be discharged from liability.

In distinguishing between a guarantor and an assignor post-disclaimer, Cummer-Yonge Investments Ltd. v. Fagot, [1965] 2 O.R. 152, has created uncertainty in leasing and bankruptcy and should be overruled. Post-disclaimer, assignors and guarantors ought to be treated the same with respect to liability.

MAJOR J. —

I. Introduction

1 This appeal arises from a motion for summary judgment. The facts are undisputed. The respondents, Crystalline Investments Limited ("Crystalline") and Burnac Leaseholds Limited ("Burnac"), while owners of different properties, are referred to collectively as the "landlords".

2 Dominion Stores Limited was the original tenant of the landlords. It is not clear from the record nor is it relevant whether Dominion Stores Limited became Domgroup Limited ("Domgroup") by reorganization or by a change of name. For purposes of this appeal, the appellant Domgroup can be viewed as the original tenant.

3 Domgroup assigned the leases to Coastal Foods Limited ("Coastal Foods"), a wholly owned subsidiary. The consent of the landlords was not required under the leases for the assignments. Domgroup subsequently sold Coastal Foods which amalgamated to form Food Group Inc. ("Food Group"). Food Group later became insolvent and attempted a reorganization under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "Act"), as amended to 1994.

4 The question is whether the terms of the reorganization by the insolvent assignee through its trustee where it purported to repudiate the leases under s. 65.2 of the Act affect the obligations between the landlords and the original tenant.

5 The procedure for granting summary judgment in Ontario was set out in rule 20.04(2) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194. That rule provided as follows at the time:

> 20.04 . . .
> (2) Where the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to a claim or defence, the court shall grant summary judgment accordingly.

6 In Guarantee Co. of North America v. Gordon Capital Corp., 1999 CanLII 664 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 423, at para. 27, Iacobucci and Bastarache JJ. discussed the legal principles that govern a motion for summary judgment:

> The appropriate test to be applied on a motion for summary judgment is satisfied when the applicant has shown that there is no genuine issue of material fact requiring trial, and therefore summary judgment is a proper question for consideration by the court. See Hercules Managements Ltd. v. Ernst & Young, 1997 CanLII 345 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 165, at para. 15; Dawson v. Rexcraft Storage and Warehouse Inc. 1998 CanLII 4831 (ON CA), (1998), 164 D.L.R. (4th) 257 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 267-68; Irving Ungerman Ltd. v. Galanis reflex, (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 545 (C.A.), at pp. 550-51. Once the moving party has made this showing, the respondent must then "establish his claim as being one with a real chance of success" (Hercules, supra, at para. 15).

The parties do not dispute the test for summary judgment.

7 The motions judge held that notices of repudiation given under s. 65.2 terminated the leases for all purposes. Relying on Cummer-Yonge Investments Ltd. v. Fagot, [1965] 2 O.R. 152 (H.C.), he found that, since the leases no longer existed, the liabilities that would have been owed by the original tenant to the landlords also disappeared. He granted summary judgment dismissing the claims of the landlords who sought damages from the original tenant. The Ontario Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge and held that the rights between the landlords and the original tenant were unaffected by proceedings under s. 65.2. The appeal was allowed and the summary judgments set aside.

8 For the reasons that follow, I agree with the Ontario Court of Appeal that the insolvency of the assignee and the order made pursuant to the Act do not affect the landlords who can continue to look to the original tenant for enforcement of the leases. The order affects the insolvent assignee and its creditors, including the original tenant and assignor of the leases, but does not reach to the landlords. I would dismiss the appeal.

9 In this appeal, the appellant sought to rely on certain common law remedies and, in particular, advanced the defence of surrender which was neither pleaded nor raised before the motions judge or the Court of Appeal. Surrender must be pleaded. See McNeil v. Train (1848), 5 U.C.Q.B. 91; Wotherspoon v. Canadian Pacific Ltd. (1979), 22 O.R. (2d) 385 (H.C.), at p. 562. In these circumstances the court refused to consider the question.

10 This appeal is limited to confirming that Food Group's repudiation of the leases assigned to it by Domgroup did not, by virtue of s. 65.2 alone, terminate Domgroup's rights and obligations under the leases. Section 65.2 relates to the repudiation of leases by insolvent commercial tenants. It is not concerned with the effects of that repudiation on third parties, such as assignors and guarantors. Whether the leases were terminated by surrender, as Domgroup argues for the first time in the Court, or by the application of some other principle of common law, is a question best left for trial.

II. Background

11 On April 30, 1979, Domgroup leased premises from Crystalline. On April 24, 1980, Domgroup leased a different location from Burnac. Both premises were located in New Brunswick. The leases had 25-year terms and contained the following assignment clause:

> Notwithstanding any assignment or sublease the Lessee shall remain fully liable under this lease and shall not be released from performing any of its covenants, obligations or agreements in this lease and shall continue to be bound by this lease.

12 On May 25, 1985, Domgroup assigned both leases to Coastal Foods which later became Food Group.

13 Food Group encountered financial difficulty and attempted a reorganization. In February of 1994, Food Group filed a notice of intention to make a proposal pursuant to Part III of the Act.

14 Food Group then prepared and filed its proposal, stating that it believed the proposal would be "of benefit to its creditors and employees, and will enable the Food Group to continue in business, albeit on a much reduced scale". Part of the proposal was that Food Group's leases with Burnac and Crystalline be terminated pursuant to s. 65.2.

15 On February 18, 1994, the insolvent Food Group, through its trustee, gave the original landlords, Burnac and Crystalline, notice of its intention to repudiate the leases. Neither Burnac nor Crystalline applied to the court to challenge the repudiation of the lease although entitled to do so under the Act. At no time did Food Group advise Domgroup of the proceedings.

16 On March 18, 1994, the proposal was approved by the Court of Queen's Bench for New Brunswick in Bankruptcy. On March 24, 1994, Burnac and Crystalline received compensation payments of $173,704.39 and $131,154.54, respectively, being the equivalent of six months rent under the leases pursuant to s. 65.2(3) of the Act. The repudiation was declared to be effective as of March 31, 1994.

17 Food Group vacated Crystalline's premises in March of 1994. It had previously vacated Burnac's premises one year earlier, but had continued to pay rent.

18 Burnac, one of the original landlords, entered into short-term leases with a bingo operation and started modifications to the premises to accommodate another tenant. Similarly, the other landlord, Crystalline, licensed its premises to kiosk-based vendors.

19 On January 20, 1995, Burnac and Crystalline informed the original tenant, Domgroup, by mail that the insolvent, Food Group, had repudiated the leases. At the same time, they asserted their rights to be paid outstanding rent pursuant to the assignment clause in the leases. The letters did not acknowledge the termination of the leases as of March 31, 1994.

20 Domgroup declined to pay. Burnac and Crystalline both sued in Ontario Superior Court. Domgroup, on application, was granted summary judgment in both cases. Both were later reversed by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

III. Relevant Statutory Provisions

21 Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3

> 65.2 (1) At any time between the filing of a notice of intention and the filing of a proposal, or on the filing of a proposal, in respect of an insolvent person who is a commercial tenant under a lease of real property, the insolvent person may repudiate the lease on giving thirty days notice to the landlord in the prescribed manner, subject to subsection (2).
> (2) Within fifteen days after being given notice of the repudiation of a lease under subsection (1), the landlord may apply to the court for a declaration that subsection (1) does not apply in respect of that lease, and the court, on notice to such parties as it may direct, shall make such a declaration unless the insolvent person satisfies the court that the insolvent person would not be able to make a viable proposal, or that the proposal the insolvent person has made would not be viable, without the repudiation of that lease and all other leases that the tenant has repudiated under subsection (1).
> (3) Where a lease is repudiated pursuant to subsection (1), a proposal filed by the insolvent person must provide for payment to the landlord, immediately after court approval of the proposal, of compensation equal to the lesser of
> (a) an amount equal to six months rent under the lease, and
> (4) For the purpose of voting on any question relating to a proposal referred to in subsection (3), the landlord does not have any claim in respect of accelerated rent, damages arising out of the repudiation, or the compensation referred to in subsection (3).
> (5) Nothing in subsections (1) to (4) affects the operation of section 146 in the event of bankruptcy.
> (6) Where an insolvent person who has made a proposal referred to in subsection (3) becomes bankrupt
> (a) after court approval of the proposal and before the proposal is fully performed, and
> (b) after compensation referred to in subsection (3) has been paid, > the landlord has no claim against the estate of the bankrupt for accelerated rent.

IV. Judicial History

A. Ontario Superior Court of Justice (2001), 39 R.P.R. (3d) 49

22 The motions for summary judgment by Domgroup were heard by Trafford J. on March 1, 2001, and by consent, the legal issue was stated as follows:

> Is a landlord, following the Court-approved termination of a commercial lease under s. 65.2 of the 1992 Act and following acceptance of the compensation provided for by the statutory code, entitled to arrears of rent, or for damages, in respect of the unexpired term of the terminated lease as against the pre-proposal assignor of the lease?

23 The motions judge held that the court-approved termination of the leases ended all obligations of the parties and rendered the assignment clause inoperative. The compensation paid to the landlords under s. 65.2 constituted the total compensation for all damages to which they were entitled under the leases. Since the entire lease, including the assignment clause, was terminated by the court order, there was no basis in law for the claims made against the original tenant, Domgroup. He granted summary judgment in both cases.

B. Ontario Court of Appeal 2002 CanLII 9612 (ON CA), (2002), 58 O.R. (3d) 549

24 The Ontario Court of Appeal rejected the conclusion of the motions judge that the provisions of s. 65.2 terminated the leases for all purposes. In the view of Carthy J.A., the rights between the landlords and the original tenant were unaffected by the insolvency proceedings. He found no change in this result was warranted by the 1997 amendment to the English version of s. 65.2 from the term "repudiate" to "disclaim".

25 The Court of Appeal held that the consequences of repudiation should be restricted to those provided for in s. 65.2 having regard to the purposes of insolvency proceedings as a whole. While the insolvency proceedings permitted Food Group as the insolvent to shed its obligations, the rights and liabilities of Domgroup to the landlords under the leases remained intact.

V. Analysis

A. The Construction of Section 65.2

26 The dispute is whether the Act has relieved the appellant Domgroup of its obligations by the assignment of the leases ultimately to the insolvent. More precisely, should s. 65.2 be interpreted to bring all the obligations between the appellant and respondents to an end when the leases were repudiated by the insolvent, Food Group?

27 While the drafting of s. 65.2 focusses on bilateral relationships, such as a simple lease between a landlord and a tenant, the effect of the repudiation does not change in circumstances such as the present ones, involving a tripartite arrangement resulting from the assignment of a lease. In both situations, the repudiation must be construed as benefiting only the insolvent.

28 I, thus, agree with the Court of Appeal that s. 65.2 should be read narrowly. The plain purposes of the section are to free an insolvent from the obligations under a commercial lease that have become too onerous, to compensate the landlord for the early determination of the lease, and to allow the insolvent to resume viable operations as best it can. Nothing in s. 65.2, or any part of the Act, protects third parties (i.e., guarantors, assignors or others) from the consequences of an insolvent's repudiation of a commercial lease. That is to say that they remain liable when the party on whose behalf they acted becomes insolvent.

29 When a lease is finalized, the landlord and tenant then have privity of contract and privity of estate. See Francini v. Canuck Properties Ltd. (1982), 35 O.R. (2d) 321 (C.A.), at pp. 322-23. When the lease is assigned, the landlord's privity of estate with the original tenant comes to an end, but the privity of contract continues and the original tenant remains liable upon its covenant. The estate or interest in the tenancy is transferred to the assignee, who, by being entitled to possession, is obliged to make payment of rent, but, subject to the terms of the lease and the agreement of the parties, the original tenant remains liable should his assignee not pay the rent. See C. S. Goldfarb, "The Rights and Obligations of the Original Tenant and Subsequent Tenants after an Assignment of Lease", in H. M. Haber, ed., Assignment, Subletting and Change of Control in a Commercial Lease (2002), 157.

30 Both the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Transco Mills Ltd. v. Percan Enterprises Ltd. 1993 CanLII 2876 (BC CA), (1993), 100 D.L.R. (4th) 359, at p. 366, and Carthy J.A., here, at para. 16, quoted from Vice-Chancellor Megarry in Warnford Investments Ltd. v. Duckworth, [1978] 2 All E.R. 517 (Ch. D.), at p. 526, where the position of an original tenant in bankruptcy proceedings is discussed. It is worth repeating:

> The original lessee is a person who as principal, undertook towards the lessor, the obligations of the lease for the whole term; and there is nothing in the process of assignment which replaced this liability by the mere collateral liability of a surety who must pay the rent only if the assignee does not. The bankruptcy of the assignee has for the time being destroyed the original lessee's right against the assignee to require him to discharge the obligations of the lease, and it has impaired the lessee's right of indemnity against him when he has to discharge the obligations himself; but it has not affected his primary liability towards the lessor, which continues unaffected. At no time does an original lessee become a mere guarantor to the lessor of the liability of any assignee of the lease. [Emphasis added.]

31 From the time a lease is completed, the original tenant is bound by all the conditions, including the term. Despite the hardship that may later develop, the covenant is fully enforceable even if it has been assigned. In England, however, public concern over the continuing liability of original tenants in post-assignment bankruptcy situations resulted in the enactment of the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 (U.K.), 1995, c. 30. As a result, when a tenant in England lawfully assigns a lease, that tenant will have no further obligations with respect to the covenant. To effect the same result in Canada, similar legislation is needed.

B. Does the Common Law Indemnification Right Frustrate the Act?

32 If the liabilities remain enforceable by the landlord against the original tenant, then presumably the original tenant can exercise its common law indemnification rights against its assignee as an unsecured creditor. See Peterborough Hydraulic Power Co. v. McAllister (1908), 17 O.L.R. 145 (C.A.), at p. 151. The original tenant could therefore prove a claim in insolvency against that assignee under this right of indemnity. As a result, the insolvent assignee could face an additional claim on the lease in excess of the preferred payment required to be paid to the landlord under s. 65.2.

33 The appellant submits this result would frustrate the objectives of the Act and is the reason that a repudiation under s. 65.2 should terminate a lease for all purposes. I disagree for two reasons.

34 First, an assignor is no different from other alternative debtors, none of which is excused under the Act. For example, s. 179 states:

> 179. An order of discharge does not release a person who at the date of the bankruptcy was a partner or co-trustee with the bankrupt or was jointly bound or had made a joint contract with him, or a person who was surety or in the nature of a surety for him.

While s. 62(3) provides:

> 62. . . .

Digitized by Google

> (3) The acceptance of a proposal by a creditor does not release any person who would not be released under this Act by the discharge of the debtor.

Parliament therefore saw fit to conserve the liabilities of alternative debtors, yet chose not to extinguish their common law rights of indemnity.

35 Second, where an original tenant seeks indemnification on a contingent claim, provided the claim is provable and not disallowed, it would fall into the insolvency to be dealt with in accordance with the scheme of the Act. The assignor simply joins the other unsecured creditors in the proceedings. If such a claim is approved, it cannot satisfy and at the same time frustrate the Act.

36 Simply stated, the mere possibility that the original tenant may have a right of indemnity against his insolvent assignee and is able to make a claim to participate in the proposal proceedings as an unsecured creditor is not inconsistent with the statutory scheme. On the contrary, it is consistent with the circumstances applicable to other alternative covenantors, and does not affect or alter the nature of the original tenant's contractual relationship and obligations. More importantly, it does not require that the original tenant be discharged from liability.

37 I also question whether there is any justification for distinguishing between a guarantor and an assignor post-disclaimer. In Cummer-Yonge, supra, the landlord brought an action against guarantors of a bankrupt tenant for the unpaid rent accruing after the tenant's bankruptcy but prior to the reletting of the leased premises. The trustee in bankruptcy had disclaimed the lease in accordance with the trustees' rights under the then applicable federal bankruptcy and provincial landlord and tenancy legislation. The guarantee provision contained in the disclaimed lease provided as follows:

> The Guarantors if one is a party hereto join for the first five (5) years of the term hereby granted for valuable consideration and for the purpose of guaranteeing the due performance by the Lessee of all its covenants in this lease including the covenant to pay rent on the part of the Lessee to be performed.

38 Gale C.J.H.C. applied the reasoning of the English Court of Appeal in Stacey v. Hill, [1901] 1 Q.B. 660. He read the guarantee clause strictly as a pure surety provision and found that when the lease was disclaimed by a trustee in bankruptcy, the bankrupt's covenants to perform were dissolved. Since the guarantors' obligation is to assure performance of those covenants, their obligations disappeared with the covenants. The Ontario Court of Appeal affirmed the decision without reasons ([1965] 2 O.R. 157*n*).

39 Cummer-Yonge has created uncertainty in leasing and bankruptcy. Not only have drafters of leases attempted to circumvent the holding in Cummer-Yonge by playing upon the primary and secondary obligation distinction, but courts have also performed what has been called "tortuous distinctions" in order to reimpose liability on guarantors. See J. W. Lem and S. T. Proniuk, "Goodbye 'Cummer-Yonge': A Review of Modern Developments in the Law Relating to the Liability of Guarantors of Bankrupt Tenants" (1993), 1 D.R.P.L. 419, at p. 436.

40 Despite the division over Cummer-Yonge, the distinction between guarantors as having secondary obligations that disappear when a lease is disclaimed by a trustee in bankruptcy, and assignors as having primary obligations that survive a disclaimer, thrives in Canadian case law.

41 Not surprisingly, Stacey v. Hill, supra, led to a similar situation in England. In Hindcastle Ltd. v. Barbara Attenborough Associates Ltd., [1996] 1 All E.R. 737 (H.L.), Lord Nicholls, faced with facts involving a guarantor of an assignor of a lease, gave a convincing illustration of the absurdity of maintaining this distinction, at p. 754:

> This would make no sort of legal or commercial sense. This would mean that directors who guarantee their company's obligations would not be liable if their own company became insolvent whilst tenant, but they would be liable if an assignee from their company encountered financial difficulties whilst tenant. Mr. Whitten, as guarantor of CIT's obligations, remains liable to the landlord. According to Stacey v. Hill, had he been a guarantor of Prest's liabilities [the assignee who became bankrupt], the disclaimer would have released him. What sort of a law would this be? [Emphasis in original.]

42 The House of Lords went on to overrule Stacey v. Hill. In my opinion, Cummer-Yonge should meet the same fate. Post-disclaimer, assignors and guarantors ought to be treated the same with respect to liability. The disclaimer alone should not relieve either from their contractual obligations.

43 The appellant submits that the English bankruptcy statute that was applied in Hindcastle clearly stated that disclaimer will not "affect the rights or liabilities of any other person", and that s. 65.2 of the Act has no similar wording. I agree with the respondents' rebuttal to this argument that the English wording affirms the ordinary construction of the statute. In other words, explicit statutory language is required to divest persons of rights they otherwise enjoy at law. As Carthy J.A. observed in the Court of Appeal, at paras. 11-12, the lease may have real value to the original tenant and, on the wording of s. 65.2, cannot be eliminated in the absence of the original tenant's agreement. In any event, so long as the doctrine of paramountcy is not triggered, federally regulated bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings cannot be used to subvert provincially regulated property and civil rights. See Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453; Giffen (Re), 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91.

44 As previously noted, the appellant sought to argue surrender in this Court despite not having pleaded surrender in either action as a defence, and not raising the issue before the motions judge or the Court of Appeal. Like the other defences, surrender represents an issue for trial. The decision whether to allow amendments to the pleadings, and on what terms if any, should be left to the trial judge.

VI. Disposition

45 I would dismiss the appeal and award the respondents their costs in this Court and below.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Proposals in Bankruptcy and Insolvency

Collections Manual Updates

Overview

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act stresses the rehabilitation of debtors. As an alternative to bankruptcy, legislation provides insolvent individuals and corporations with an opportunity to restructure their finances and to offer a settlement to their unsecured creditors to repay, in whole or in part, the amount owed. If a proposal can be filed, the debtors normally retain most if not all of their assets. A proposal is made to creditors through a trustee/administrator. If a majority of the creditors vote in favour of the proposal it is binding on all unsecured creditors regardless of their voting position.

Legislation

This section identifies legislation related to proposals in bankruptcy:

- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA)
- Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (CCAA)
- Excise Tax Act (ETA)
- Income Tax Act (ITA) subsection 25(1), 99(2), 128 and 224(1.2)

Background Information

Types of Proposals

The BIA provides for two different types of proposals, depending on the circumstances of the debtor.

Related Topics:

- Division I Proposals
- Division II Proposals

Division I Proposals

The Division I proposal, also known as a commercial proposal within the CRA, applies to and may be filed by insolvent:

- corporations
- cooperatives
- individuals with liabilities exceeding $75,000.00, excluding any amounts secured by a principal residence

Division II Proposals

The Division II proposal, also known as a consumer proposal within the BIA and the CRA, may be filed by insolvent individuals:

- whose liabilities do not exceed $75,000.00, excluding any amount secured by their principal residence

For further details, refer to: Directive ARD-03-09, The Relationship between Bankruptcy and Insolvency Events.

Note: There are situations where proposals are incorrectly filed, for example where a Division II proposal is filed where the individual debtor's total liabilities exceed $75,000.00. These proposals, will only be challenged if there is a benefit to the CRA.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-00-30, The Incorrect Filing of Proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Notice of Intention to File a Proposal

Debtors filing a Division I proposal have two options:

- file a Notice of Intention (NOI) to file a proposal
- file a proposal

The filing of an NOI is not mandatory; however, an NOI provides the debtor:

- an Immediate Stay of Proceedings

Digitized by Google

- time to review their financial situation with the trustee/administrator
- time to discuss proposal terms with creditors to obtain their support and help ensure the acceptance of the proposal

The effective period for filing a proposal, after an NOI has been filed, is 30 days. The Court may extend the time for filing a proposal in increments of 45 days. The extension will extend the Stay of Proceedings, and allow time to finalize the proposal. However, the total extensions may not exceed beyond six months of the date of the first filing. As a creditor, the CRA may oppose an extension.

If it appears that there is danger of loss, or the extension is frivolous, refer the case to the Department of Justice to oppose the time extension.

Note: There are no provisions in the BIA for an individual filing a Division II proposal to file an NOI.

Debtor Obligations

Aside from making payments as required by the terms of the proposal debtors have other obligations that they must meet to complete a successful compromise. These obligations vary depending on the type of proposal.

Related Topics:

- After filing an NOI
- After filing a Division II Proposal

After filing an NOI

The debtor must perform the following tasks:

- prepare and file a projected cash flow statement to the Official Receiver within 10 days
- file a Division I proposal, within 30 days of the date of the NOI or, within the extension of time granted by the Court

Failure to perform either of the above, within the allotted time, will result in the debtor's deemed assignment into bankruptcy.

For further details, refer to Directive ARD-03-10 Determining the Date of Bankruptcy.

After filing a Division II Proposal

The consumer debtor is required to attend two financial counselling sessions with the trustee/administrator or other qualified counsellor.

Stay of Proceedings

The Stay of Proceedings is pursuant to BIA s 69, 69.1 and 69.2(1) and applies to Division I and Division II Proposals.

Related Topics:

Digitized by Google

Stay of Proceedings for Division I and NOI

The Stay of Proceedings ensures that no action is initiated or continued against the debtor or the debtor's property by the creditors, once a NOI or Proposal is filed, including payroll amounts that may be collected under subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA.

The Stay of Proceedings does not apply to secured creditors who:

- have taken possession of secured assets prior to the NOI or proposal or;
- have given notice of their intention to enforce security more than ten (10) days prior to the NOI or Proposal

The Stay does not prevent the CRA from pursuing deemed trust against a secured creditor who is or becomes eligible to realize a security on any property.

Note: If it appears that the debtor is attempting to liquidate assets, the file should be referred to the Department of Justice.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-99-04, Liquidation Proposals.

Stay of Proceedings for Division II

A Stay of Proceedings applies to Division II proposals as outlined in section 69.2(1) of the BIA. The exception to this section is Source Deductions that can be collected via an Enhanced Requirement to Pay pursuant to subsection 224.1(1.2) of the ITA.

This exception is created by the combination of two clauses:

- the "notwithstanding" clause included in subsection 224.1(1.2) of the ITA
- the failure of the BIA to specify the Enhanced Requirement to Pay in section 69.2(1)

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-01-05, The Status of Source Deductions in a Consumer Proposal.

Termination of Stay of Proceedings

The Stay of Proceedings, with respect to payroll amounts collectible under subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA, is terminated and collections proceedings may commence when one of the following situations occurs:

- the debtor fails to remit current payroll deductions as they come due after the filing of the NOI or proposal
  - at this point the CRA may use an Enhanced Requirement to Pay to collect both the pre and post-NOI or proposal arrears
- a secured creditor commences realization of security that is subject to garnishment under the Income Tax Act, subsection 224 (1.2)

Digitized by Google

A creditor or other person affected by a Stay imposed under the BIA may apply to the court to lift the Stay. To obtain an order, the court must be satisfied that the creditor is likely to be materially prejudiced, or it is equitable on other grounds that the Stay be lifted.

Once a Division I Proposal is Filed

A Division I Proposal:

- must provide for payment in full, within six months of court approval, all payroll amounts that may be subject to an Enhanced Requirement to Pay Demand pursuant to the ITA, subsection 224(1.2)
- must provide for the payment of all employee compensation claims, pursuant to paragraph 136(1)(d) of the BIA, in priority to other claims
- converts GST/HST Deemed Trust claims to unsecured debts, unless the CRA has certified the debt and registered that amount in a public property registration system, at which point a secured claim may be filed

For further details, refer to Communication TSDMB-2004-035, Collecting GST/HST in an Insolvency.

Once a Division II Proposal is Filed

The Division II process begins with the filing of the proposal. The trustee/administrator assists the consumer debtor with preparing the proposal. The Stay of Proceedings begins immediately.

A Division II proposal:

- must be no longer than five (5) years
- allows creditors 45 days to vote or to request a meeting of creditors
- requires a meeting of creditors if any objection is received within 45 days or if requested by creditors having at least 25% in value of all the proven claims
- is deemed to have been accepted by the creditors if no dissent is received within the 45 day period and there is no first meeting of creditors
- is approved or denied by a majority of votes at the first meeting of creditors unless deemed accepted

There are no provisions in the BIA that require payment in full of the source deductions claim within six months, however

- the CRA's policy is to request that all source deduction amounts be paid within six months of proposal approval
- if this request is refused the Agency may vote against the acceptance of the proposal and/or proceed with legal action through an Enhanced Requirement to Pay

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-01-05, The Status of Source Deductions in a Consumer Proposal.

Digitized by Google

Effect of an Approved Proposal

Once approved a Division I or a Division II proposal is binding on all unsecured creditors, including the CRA, whether or not a Proof of Claim has been filed and regardless of how they voted.

Effects of a Failed Proposal

The effect of a proposal that fails after approval, or a proposal that fails to obtain the approval of creditors, depends on the proposal type:

- If a Division I proposal does not receive creditor or court approval, or, fails for any reason, after approval, the failure results in an automatic assignment in bankruptcy effective:
    - the date the proposal is annulled by the court or
    - the date of rejection by the creditors or
    - the date of rejection by the court
- If a Division II proposal fails, the rights of the creditor's are restored

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-00-19, Collection Action When the Trustee or the Administrator Obtains a discharge from a Proposal and Directive ARD-03-10, Determining the Date of Bankruptcy.

Default and Annulment of a Proposal

Where default occurs in the performance of any provision in a proposal, the trustee or the creditors may apply to the court to have the proposal annulled.

The annulment of a proposal differs depending on the type of proposal.

Related Topics:

- Annulment of Division I Proposal
- Annulment of Division II Proposal

Annulment of Division I Proposal

Annulment of a Division I proposal occurs by order of the court when any one of the following conditions exists:

- a default occurs in the performance of any provision of the proposal
- the court determines that:
    - the proposal cannot continue without injustice
    - the proposal cannot continue without undue delay
    - the approval of the court was obtained fraudulently

Digitized by Google

- at the request of the trustee/administrator or the creditors where, after the approval of a proposal, the debtor has been convicted of an offence under the BIA s.63(3)

When a Division I proposal is annulled, an assignment in bankruptcy is deemed to have taken effect at the date of the order of annulment.

At this time the CRA's Proof of Claim must be amended for the bankruptcy. A revised Proof of Claim will be filed to reflect the amount due at the date of annulment, and any dividends received under the proposal

For further details on the procedures to follow in a bankruptcy, refer to the Bankruptcy Chapter.

Annulment of Division II Proposal

In the case of a Division II proposal the BIA provides for a deemed annulment to occur when:

- the consumer debtor defaults on monthly payments for a total of three months
- the consumer debtor is overdue by three months on any payment

The annulment of a consumer proposal can also occur by order of the Court,

- when any one of the following situations exists:
  - the debtor was not eligible to make a proposal
  - the debtor cannot continue without injustice or undue delay; or
  - approval of the court was obtained fraudulently.
- when the debtor is convicted of any offence under the BIA s.83.3(1)(3)

The annulment of a Division II proposal does NOT result in a deemed assignment into bankruptcy.

When a Division II proposal is annulled, the unsecured creditors may immediately commence collection action for the full amount of their debts, including accrued interest to date, less any dividends received

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-00-19; Collection Action When the Trustee or the Administrator Obtains a discharge from a Proposal.

Duties of a Trustee/Administrator

A Trustee/Administrator does not have to accept an appointment as trustee/administrator, however, once the appointment is accepted they must perform their duties until they are discharged or another trustee/administrator is appointed in their place. It is their responsibility, before accepting an appointment, to protect themselves against the possibility of having to bear their own expenses of administering the estate due to insufficient funds.

On the filing of a NOI or a proposal, a trustee/administrator who has accepted the appointment cannot resign without obtaining a court order.

The trustee/administrator must:

- conduct a financial investigation, pursuant to subsection 66.13(2)(a) of the BIA, of the debtor
- file a report, within ten (10) days, with the official receiver which contains
    - the results of the above investigation
    - an opinion as to the reasonableness, fairness and viability of the proposal
    - a statement of income, expenses, assets and liabilities
    - a list of creditors with claims greater than $250.00
- prepare and file the proposal with the official receiver
- send to all creditors, within ten (10) days:
    - a copy of the proposal
    - a copy of the report sent to the Official Receiver
    - a blank Proof of Claim form
    - a notice explaining that a creditor's meeting will only be held if requested, within forty-five (45) days, by creditors totalling more than 25% of the proven claims

Trustee's Duties after the Approval of Proposal

Unless stated in the proposal, debtors retain ownership of their property and the trustee/administrator is not required to file returns and remit taxes, unless specified by the court.

The trustee/administrator's duties after approval of the proposal include the following:

- ensure that the terms of the proposal are met
- administer the distribution of dividends
- issue Certificate of Full Performance of Proposal once the terms of the proposal have been fulfilled

Section 80(13) of the ITA in Proposals

When a tax debtor successfully files a proposal under the BIA to pay commercial obligations at less than 100 cents on the dollar, subsection 80(13) of the ITA states that the debtor must report the forgiven amount in the year in which the settlement or forgiveness occurred.

When analyzing a proposal under the BIA:

Digitized by Google

- If there is a clause in the proposal asking the CRA not to apply subsection 80(13) of the ITA, you must ask that it be withdrawn
- If the tax debtor refuses to withdraw the clause, the CRA will vote against the proposal and advise the Court of its inappropriateness

Since forgiveness does not occur until after the proposal terms have been met and the Certificate of Full Performance is granted, the Section 80(13) assessment can only occur in the post proposal period.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-97-04, The application of section 80 of the Income Tax Act ("ITA") to proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") and Directive RCD-98-07, The Debt-Forgiveness Rules: Section 80 of the Income Tax Act ("ITA").

Request to Change a Fiscal Period End (FPE)

Once a tax debtor adopts a fiscal period end, it can only be changed to take effect in future taxation years. In addition, the CRA must consent to the change.

This requirement is intended to prevent a tax debtor from rearranging the fiscal period end to minimize the payment of taxes. The CRA will approve a request for a change in fiscal period end only on the basis of sound business reasons other than obtaining tax benefits.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-97-05, Change in Fiscal Period End ("FPE") in a Proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") and Directive RCD-00-13, Section 34.2 of the Income Tax Act.

The Effect of Changing the FPE in a Proposal

Changing the FPE in a proposal reduces the amount that the tax debtors would pay at 100 cents on the dollar. Changing a tax debtors' FPE, when they file a proposal under the BIA, could result in a loss of revenue to the Crown.

Tax Office Responsibilities for Account

With the implementation of the Regional Insolvency teams all initial documentation for all proposals is forwarded to the appropriate Regional Intake Centre for Insolvency (RICI). From there the determination will be made if the file is to be handled by the RICI, or by the High Risk Insolvency (HRI) Officers located in the various TSO's.

For further details refer to Communication TSDMB-2007-095(ARD). Designing Insolvency Work for the Future ("DIW") - Information Update and Next Steps.

The RICI or HRI handle the following tasks:

- investigating further collection avenues under the BIA, ITA and ETA
- filing Proof of Claims
- voting on the proposal
- assuming all other actions, such as attending the meeting of creditors and acting as inspector

Upon receipt of the creditor's package:

- cancel all previous arrangements and legal actions regarding arrears
- return all post-dated cheques
- if Writs of Seizure and Sale have been sent to Bailiff:
    - but have not been actioned, then instruct Bailiff to return the writs
    - and property has been seized, instruct the Bailiff to hold in abeyance until instruction from the Insolvency unit
    - and the property sold, instruct the Bailiff to await instruction concerning the disbursement of funds
- withdraw all Requirements to Pay pursuant to the ETA, subsections 317(1), (2) or (6) and the ITA, subsections 224(1) and (1.1)
- do not withdraw Enhanced Requirements to Pay. Issue ELCS letter #19755 to the Account Receivables which advises, the Enhanced Requirement to Pay is to be held in abeyance until further notice and to remit all funds to the debtor
- review the documents provided and compare with available CRA information

Digitized by Google

- conduct the appropriate searches such as:
    - credit bureau
    - motor vehicle
    - property
    - land titles

Note: Creditors have 45 days after the filing of a Division II proposal and 21 days after the filing of a Division I proposal to review the file, prepare the Proof of Claim and submit a vote.

Legal Rights of Trustees/Administrators

Trustees/administrators have the right:

- to receive any information that is necessary to determine the debtor's liabilities and obligations
- to discuss the tax debtor's affairs with the collection officer in order to conclude the proposal

For further details refer to Directive RCD-00-14, Disclosure of Confidential Information to Trustees-in-Bankruptcy and Receivers.

Treatment of Refunds in Proposal Situations

Subsections 164(2) of the ITA and 296(7) of the ETA allow the CRA to withhold refunds owed to a taxpayer when they are, or are about to become, liable for any other amounts to the Crown.

This action becomes restricted, not ceased, by the Stay of Proceedings created with the filing of a Proposal or NOI.

Subsection 97(3) of the BIA recognises a creditor's right of set-off under certain conditions:

- a legal set-off where there is mutuality of debts
- an equitable set-off
- set-off by agreement of contract

Accordingly, the CRA will apply the right of set-off in the following situations:

- If a tax debtor has filed a Notice of Intention, or has filed a Proposal, the CRA will exercise the right of set-off until the court approves the Proposal, provided both the debit and credit exist in the pre proposal period
    - you cannot take a post proposal credit and apply it to a pre proposal debt
- If the tax debtor is involved in business, and the debt relates to that business, the debts being set off do not have to exist at the time of the filing the proposal or NOI, as long as both debts exist prior to court approval

Digitized by Google

- if the debtor agrees, prior to court approval, the CRA will set-off amounts payable in the post filing period; an amount arising before but payable by the Crown to the tax debtor after the Stay of Proceedings is in place; against an amount owing at the filing of the Notice of Intention or the Proposal

For further details refer to Directive TSDMB-2006-063 (ARD), Applying Set-off in a Proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Related Topic:

- Refunds not Set-Off

Refunds not Set-Off

If, the CRA applies the right of set-off, proves a claim and accepts the proposal, which the court subsequently approves, it will return to the taxpayer amounts that it had set off between the filing of the Notice of Intention to file a proposal, or the filing of the Proposal, and the court's approval.

If the CRA has filed a provisional claim for the amount compromised in a Proposal under the BIA, and the tax debtor has received a refund for that year, set-off does not apply. Further, the CRA will cancel the provisional claim in respect of that amount.

For further details refer to Communication TSDMB-2007-007 (ARD), Provisional Proofs of Claim.

Voting on a Proposal

A proposal is a contract between a debtor and their creditors. Although the debtor may make a proposal, the creditors are not obliged to accept it.

Proposal approval requires acceptance by all classes of unsecured creditors as follows:

- the majority in numbers and
- two thirds the dollar value in claims

Once approved by the Court, a proposal is binding on all creditors, including CRA, even though we may have not voted or voted against the proposal.

For further details, refer to Communication TSDMB (ARD)-2006-073, The Agency's Approach to Proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA).

Factors to consider when reviewing a Proposal

Digitized by Google

Every proposal situation is different and, notwithstanding the debtor's previous conduct, must be examined on its own merit. Investigating and evaluating a proposal allows maximum recovery and ensures that the interests of the Crown are protected.

The following factors should be considered before voting on a proposal:

- is the proposal the result of misfortune or did the debtor ignore his/her obligation to pay taxes
- is the purpose of the proposal to avoid paying taxes
- does the proposal protect other tax interests of the Crown
    - are current tax instalments, filing and payment compliance, throughout the duration of the proposal, addressed
- what is the level of risk involved in accepting the proposal
    - is there a risk that the debtor's liability could increase or could the debtor liquidate assets during the proposal and would this jeopardize the position of the CRA
- does the proposal represent a greater recovery than would be expected in a bankruptcy proceeding
- if returns are outstanding at the filing of the proposal,
    - the Agency will not compromise the current-year debt
    - the Agency may raise an assessment(s) for the period(s) for which returns are outstanding, and prove a claim for the assessed amount plus amounts already assessed
- is the proposal viable
    - can the debtor's financial situation support the proposal
    - is there an infusion of external funds to support it

Note: When a proposal includes amounts deferred by an election under section 34.2 of the ITA refer to Directive RCD-00-13, Section 34.2 of the Income Tax Act.

Acceptance of Proposal

A vote of approval for a proposal is based on certain conditions and considerations. The proposal should, where appropriate, provide for:

- the maximum recovery to CRA, as opposed to bankruptcy, net of administrative expenses
- the payment in full of all payroll account arrears within 6months 6 monthas required under the BIA
- the remittance of instalments, payroll deductions, and/or GST/HST as required for the duration of the proposal

Digitized by Google

- the filing of information returns as required for the duration of the proposal
- the application, of refunds under the ITA, pertaining to the year of the proposal or prior years
- the application of refunds or rebates under the ETA, pertaining to all periods for which the liability is due
- payment terms that maximize ability to pay and should include a reasonable application of funds derived from equity in assets

For further details, refer to Communication TSDMB-2006-053, Proposal Terms relevant to the Canada Revenue Agency and Directive RCD-00-28, Terms for Proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Authority to Accept a Proposal

The minimum authority level to approve a proposal vote is the Manager. It may have to be approved by the Assistant Director, depending on office structure.

For further details refer to: Amendments/Corrections to the Delegations Legislative and Policy Matrices.

Rejection of Proposal

The risk that debtors face when they file a Division I proposal is that if the proposal is rejected by the creditors or the Court, or if they fail to meet any of the deadlines in the process, they are deemed to have made an assignment in bankruptcy.

The risk that debtors face when they file a Division II proposal is that if the proposal is rejected by the creditors or the Court, the rights of the creditors are restored. However, action cannot be taken to recover amounts until the trustee has been discharged.

Note: The consequences, of rejecting a proposal should be considered when voting against a proposal. Even if the creditors accept a proposal, final approval rests with the court.

Proposals Made After Bankruptcy

A proposal made after bankruptcy annuls the bankruptcy. This re-vests with the debtor all the rights, title and interest in property previously given to the trustee, unless otherwise stated in the proposal.

Proposals made after a bankruptcy may be extremely complicated due to the potential combinations of claims made. Facts must be discussed with senior personnel of the tax services office to determine the appropriate action to take.

Inspector's Role

The Inspector's responsibilities in proposals made after bankruptcy include:

Digitized by Google

- approving the proposal
- supervising the work of the trustee/administrator
- directing the issuance of dividends
- waiving a default, if the debtor can remedy the problem within 30 days
- refusing to waive a default if the debtor is unable to remedy the problem within 30 days

Effective Date of Claim

When a proposal is made after bankruptcy, the effective date of CRA's claim is the date on which the bankrupt became bankrupt.

Director's Liability when the Corporation has filed a Proposal

Section 69.31(1) of the BIA creates a Stay of Proceedings for actions against the director(s), when a notice of intention or a proposal has been filed. This Stay of Proceedings is in effect until the court approves the proposal or the corporation becomes bankrupt. During this period the CRA cannot commence or continue any action against the directors.

Section 50(13), of the BIA, permits a proposal to include a clause allowing the compromise of claims against directors. If the proposal is approved with that clause the CRA is bound by it. The court may declare that the claim against the directors not be compromised if the CRA proves that the compromise is unjust or that the directors have misrepresented themselves. These cases should be referred to the Department of Justice.

Director's Liability when the Director has filed a Proposal

In order to raise a Director's Liability Assessment, and prove a claim in the director's proposal, the CRA must complete the pre-requisites, as outlined in section 227.1(2) of the ITA and/or section 323(2) of the ETA.

In order to be eligible to receive a dividend in the proposal a claim should be filed as soon as possible. In the event that the assessment has not yet been completed send ELCS letter 80758 to the trustee to advise them of the pending assessment.

For more detailed information, refer to the Directors' Liability chapter.

Provisional Claims

A provisional claim is an estimate of tax liability. It covers the period beginning at the tax debtor's current fiscal year start (usually January 1) and ending on the date of the filing of an NOI or proposal, whichever is earlier.

Without a provisional claim, the entire year of the proposal is treated as post proposal, therefore, excluded from the proposal, and is fully collectible. In many cases this could result in the debtor being unable to meet the terms of the proposal and ultimately having the proposal fail.

Pre-conditions to Filing a Provisional Claim

Prior to the CRA filing a provisional claim and possibly compromising a current year debt, certain conditions must be met. It is the responsibility of the trustee to advise the debtor of the following:

- all outstanding income tax returns must be filed and assessed
- a provisional return must be filed with the proposal
- the provisional return must be based on income earned during the pre-proposal period and be reasonably accurate
- if no provisional return is filed with the proposal, it must be indicated on the proposal as "unknown" . If no provisional return is filed 10 days prior to when the creditors vote, CRA will not file a provisional proof of claim or the CRA will not file a provisional claim
- the provisional amount must be disclosed on the Statement of Affairs
- the proposal must contain the following clauses:
    - I confirm that the estimated current year pre-proposal income tax debt, based on the provisional return and disclosed on my statement of affairs, is a reasonable estimate of my actual current year pre-proposal income tax debt.
    - I will prepare and file, on or before the filing due date, a tax return for the tax year in which the proposal is filed as well as a detailed calculation of the actual current year pre-proposal income tax debt, which discloses the details of any differences from the estimated current year pre-proposal income tax debt.
    - I agree that if the amount of the actual current year pre-proposal income tax debt exceeds the estimated current year pre-proposal income tax debt, the excess will become a post proposal debt.
    - The income tax debt for the period from the date of filing of the proposal to December 31st of the year during which the proposal is filed is a post-proposal debt that is not affected by this proposal.

If the pre-conditions are not met, the entire amount will be treated as post-proposal and be fully collectible.

Calculating the Provisional Claim

For individual (T1) accounts, the provisional claim will be calculated based on the provisional return filed with the proposal.

For corporate ("T2") accounts, the trustee could base the estimate of the provisional claim on the calculation of the instalment amounts under section 157 of the ITA, prorated to the date of the proposal.

Digitized by Google

Adjusting the Provisional Claim

Once the debtor files their final tax return for the year of the proposal, it may be necessary to adjust, or cancel the provisional claim as follows:

- if an amount is owing on assessment of the actual income tax return, the CRA will allocate the amount assessed between the pre and the post proposal periods
- if the amount allocated to the pre-proposal period, is greater than the amount on the provisional claim, the difference becomes post proposal debt
- if the amount allocated to the pre-proposal period is less than the amount on the provisional claim, a revised Proof of Claim must be filed
- if the assessment reflects a refund, the provisional Proof of Claim must be cancelled
- in the event that the reduction or cancellation of the claim is necessary, the CRA should notify the trustee immediately and any overpayment of dividends should be returned to the trustee

For further details refer to Directive RCD-95-07, Provisional Claims, Communication TSDMB-2004-007 (ARD), Provisional Proofs of Claim and Communication TSDMB (ARD)-2006-048, Allocation of Current Year Tax in the Year of a Proposal.

Verification of subsection 80(13) of the ITA

Audit administers section 80 of the ITA. It is essential that Audit have access to information about proposals under the BIA, to enable Audit to verify that subsection 80(13) is properly applied, send a copy of the proposal to the audit section.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-97-04 The application of section 80 of the Income Tax Act ("ITA") to proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"), Directive RCD-98-07 The Debt-Forgiveness Rules: Section 80 of the Income Tax Act ("ITA") and Directive RCD-00-17 The Application of the Debt-Forgiveness Rules in a Proposal.

Request for a Change in Fiscal Period End When Negotiating a Proposal

When negotiating a proposal under the BIA, collections will not honour a tax debtor's request for a change in the FPE.

A tax debtor does not have to request a change in fiscal period when:

- a law requires such a change, for example, as stated by section 128 of the ITA, the fiscal period changes automatically when a corporation, an estate, or a trust is bankrupt
- filing valid elections under the ITA will extend the fiscal period beyond the date that would be applicable if there were no such election, for example: a sole proprietor disposes of a business and an election is made under subsection 25(1) of the ITA to retain the year-end for a business disposed of by an individual proprietor

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-97-05 Change in Fiscal Period End ("FPE") in a Proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA") and Directive RCD-00-13 Section 34.2 of the Income Tax Act.

How to Action an Account

To action an account after being advised of a proposal:

- Review the proposal document to evaluate the acceptability of its terms
- Determine the following amounts:
  - outstanding
  - assessed
  - unassessed
- File the necessary proofs of claim
- Review the proposal to determine if a representative from the CRA should attend the first creditors meeting, if a meeting of creditors is called
- Obtain a Proxy to vote

For further details, refer to Attending Meeting of Creditors.

Proving a Claim

A Proof of Claim must be filed with the Trustee/Administrator to ensure that CRA can:

- participate/vote at the meeting of creditors
- have the ability to request changes to the proposal

- receive a dividend

ELCS Verses

For Income Tax debts (T1 & T2) use the following ELCS verses:

- 19672 - Cover Letter for Proof of Claim to Trustee
- 19673 - Proof of Claim
- 19674 - Schedule "A"

For a GST/HST account with no Deemed Trust use:

- 19675 - Cover letter for Proof of Claim to Trustee
- 19673 - Proof of Claim
- 19681 - Schedule "A"

Payroll Deemed Trust

You do not need to file a "property" claim for payroll deemed trust amounts in a Division I proposal as section 60(1.1) of the BIA requires the payroll account be paid in full within six (6) months of court approval.

Use ELCS letter # 82202 to advise the trustee of payroll amounts owing.

Division II of the BIA does not require the payroll account be paid in full within six (6) months. However, CRA policy is to require that clause be in the proposal. Should the debtor refuse, the CRA will proceed to issue an ERTP which may put the proposal at risk of failure.

In certain circumstances an extension beyond the six (6) months may be appropriate. The tax debtor's circumstances and reasons for the extension of time should be considered and approval sought from the team leader or manager.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-01-05 The Status of Source Deductions in a Consumer Proposal.

GST/HST Deemed Trust

A property claim for GST/HST is only filed when the CRA has issued an Enhanced Requirement to Pay prior to the Stay of Proceedings coming into force.

Digitized by Google

Note: The deemed trust amount cannot exceed the actual value of the Accounts Receivables regardless of the amount on the ERTP.

Use ELCS letter # 19796 to advise the trustee of any GST/HST deemed trust amounts owing.

Amending a Proof of Claim

Amend the CRA's Proof of Claim when:

- payment, other than dividends, is received for a pre proposal debt
- the pre proposal debt changes as a result of an additional assessment or reassessment
- where refunds, otherwise due to the tax debtor, are applied to reduce the liability

Evaluating a Proposal

Evaluating a proposal involves the analysis of three main factors, reliability, viability and acceptability.

Reliability is determined by comparing the information in the proposal with information obtained from other sources:

- are the assets and liabilities consistent with the information on file
- are you aware of any undisclosed assets
- does the cash flow statement reflect the information available from tax returns and other sources of information
- does the debtor have the ability to pay more
- has the debtor, in the past, been compliant with the CRA

Viability is the debtor's ability to fulfill the terms of the proposal. Review to determine:

- the debtor can generate the funds to support the proposal
- if the debtor cannot generate the funds to support the proposal, will there be an infusion of external funds to support the proposal
- can the debtor make current remittances, instalments and tax payments in addition to proposal payments

Acceptability of the proposal is how do the terms of the proposal impact the amount the CRA will realize from the debtor. Factors to consider are:

- is this the best option to maximize recovery
- does the proposal protect the interests of the crown
- are there terms that require current tax instalments
- are there terms that require filing and payment compliance throughout the duration of the proposal with respect to all revenue types

Digitized by Google

- is there limited or no risk in accepting the proposal
- is there a risk that the debtor's liability could increase or could the debtor liquidate assets during the proposal, and jeopardize the position of the CRA
- the economic consequences such as potential loss of jobs, or a business being shut down in a depressed area as a result of an over aggressive repayment demand (management and Field Support should be informed immediately when these types of situations occur)
- the possibility of recovering more money if the tax debtor were adjudged bankrupt and RCA opposing the discharge

To evaluate the potential success of a proposal, ensure that the following conditions exist:

- debtor has the support of the secured creditors
- debtor's secured liabilities remain current
- debtor has additional credit for working capital
- debtor has a viable company or a reliable source of income
- debtor has management ability to implement the proposal
- debtor has management integrity

The amount of time and effort spent on a proposal should be commensurate with:

- the appearance that it is a tax driven proposal with a substantial debt to the CRA, poor compliance history and limited number of other creditors
- the tax debtor has been bankrupt or filed a proposal before
- the dollar amount and percentage of total claims that the CRA represents are large
- the potential amount to be recovered from the debtor
- the terms of the proposal are unsatisfactory

Determining Payment Terms of a Proposal

The BIA sets out terms appropriate to a proposal. As well, the CRA requires certain terms included to protect the Crown's interests.

For further details, refer to Communication TSDMB-2006-053 Proposal Terms relevant to the Canada Revenue Agency and Directive RCD-00-28 Terms for Proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Attending a Meeting of Creditors

The purpose of a meeting of creditors is to obtain pertinent information on the debtor and to vote on the proposal. If the CRA determines that it is in its best interest to attend the meeting, ensure all documentation such as the Proof of Claim, Proxy and other documents are prepared and ready to present prior to the meeting of creditors or at the meeting of creditors. If the intention is to postpone the meeting of creditors, ensure there is a valid cause to support the decision.

Determining Whether to Attend a Meeting of Creditors

To determine whether or not to attend a meeting of creditors or not, the following factors should be considered:

- amount and scope of the CRA's liability
- terms of the proposal
- the CRA wishes to act as an inspector or monitor in the proposal
- suspicion of fraud

Preparing for the First Meeting of Creditors

Prior to the first meeting of creditors:

- review the proposal documents and compare the information to that which the CRA already possesses or can obtain quickly
- conduct the appropriate searches
- request any documents or information you may need from the trustee/administrator or the taxpayer prior to the meeting of creditors.
- ensure all related accounts are filed up to date
- prepare and file Proofs of Claim
- prepare a list of questions to be asked at the meeting
- obtain a Proxy signed by the appropriate authority

For the correct level of authority to sign a Proxy refer to Communication TSDMB-2007-022 Amendments/Corrections to the Delegations Legislative and Policy Matrices.

Contributing at a Meeting of Creditors

When attending a meeting of creditors, keep in mind the confidentiality restrictions of the Excise Tax Act, section 295(5)(a) and the Income Tax Act, section 241(4)(a).

Digitized by Google

For further details refer to Directive RCD-00-14 Disclosure of Confidential Information to Trustees-in-Bankruptcy and Receivers and Disclosure to a Trustee in Bankruptcy or Receiver.

This meeting should be used to:

- discuss reviewable transactions
    - creditors are permitted to ask questions of both the trustee/administrator and debtor to obtain a better understanding of the debtor's financial position
    - creditors may also request changes to the proposal
- obtain detailed accounting information about the debtor's affairs and compare it to historic data on the account

Based on the questions put forth by creditors and the answers of the debtor or amendments to the proposal, you may wish to have the meeting adjourned prior to a vote being conducted. The BIA supports the adjourning of a meeting so that creditors may further review the proposal and investigate the affairs of the debtor.

Accepting or Rejecting a Proposal

Prior to accepting or rejecting a proposal:

- forward the relevant facts to Tax Services Office management for review and appropriate approval
- If the proposal involves a compromise or settlement that reflects a significant public interest refer the case to Headquarters, Revenue Collections, Operations Directorate, Accounts Receivable Division

Managing an Account after the Acceptance of a Proposal

When a proposal is filed for an individual or corporate tax account, the debt must be transferred to a sub-ledger account. When the proposal is completed or if it fails, the system is updated. Monitoring of the debtor's account must continue until the successful completion of the proposal, and the deletion of all remaining account balances should be completed pursuant to current write-off policies.

Transferring the Debt to a Subsidiary Ledger Account

Transfer the debt to a subsidiary ledger account only in the case of individual (T1) and corporate (T2) tax accounts. GST/HST and Payroll accounts are managed on their regular systems.

To transfer a debt to a Subsidiary Ledger account:

Digitized by Google

- for a T1 account an ERA request must be sent to the assigned Tax Centre, requesting the creation of a 31 124 subsidiary ledger account and the transfer of the debt owing with an effective interest date of the date of the proposal

- for a T2 account send an e-mail to the Corporate Services department of the applicable Tax Centre and request that they create a 32 254 subsidiary ledger account and the transfer of the debt owing with an effective interest date of the date of the proposal

Interest will not be charged on the amounts transferred to a subsidiary ledger account unless it is stipulated in the proposal agreement at the request of the creditor.

The transfer of the T1 account initiates the setting of a transfer code on the T1 system. As a result:

- the current year tax return, that is, the return for the year in which the proposal was filed will be processed on the Subsidiary Ledger account

- it is the responsibility of the collections officer to determine which portion of the ensuing assessment, if any, is not to be included in the proposal

For further details refer to Communication TSDMB-2006-048 Allocation of Current Year Tax in the Year of a Proposal.

- once the year of the proposal tax return has been processed, request the tax centre down the transfer code on the T1 system to ensure that future tax returns can be processed on the T1 account and place a keep code 6 on the T1 account

- if there is a re-assessment of the pre proposal period prepare an amended Proof of Claim immediately and advise the trustee/administrator of the change in amount due in the proposal

Other Subsidiary Ledger Type Codes

Other revenue types automatically accommodate any variations that may arise from a proposal on their systems.

For a detailed listing, refer to TSDMB STARS Definitions; Subledger Revenue Types.

Writing Down a Debt Once it is Transferred to a Subsidiary Ledger Account

Once the proposal debt is transferred to a Subsidiary Ledger Account, the debt must be written-down to the net realizable amount.

For further details refer to: Write-Down of Proposal Accounts and Communication TSDMB-2006-021 Net Realizable Value and Uncollectible Debts.

Updating the System When a Proposal is Completed

To update the system when a proposal is finalized and a certificate of full performance has been issued:

- Submit the balances remaining in the subsidiary ledger account for write-off.

- Remove the refund intercept, if applicable.

Digitized by Google

Once the terms of the proposal have been met, the recovery of a debt or liability established by an assessment or a reassessment for a pre-proposal year is not permissible.

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-00-05 Assessing or Reassessing a tax Debtor Already Discharged from a Proposal under the BIA.

Updating the System if a Proposal Fails

If the debtor is deemed bankrupt (Division I proposal) by order of the Court:

- request the transfer of the corporate debt from the subsidiary ledger (32 354) back to the corporate (T2) account, as there are no subsidiary ledger accounts for bankrupt corporate accounts
- In the case of an individual that filed a Division I proposal, once option "E" is updated and changed to "bankrupt", the debt will be transferred from the subsidiary ledger 124 (proposal) to a subsidiary ledger 121 (bankruptcy) account

If the debtor is not deemed bankrupt (consumer proposal):

- request the transfer of the debt from the subsidiary ledger (31 124) back to the T1 account, the debt is now fully collectible
- for a GST/HST account, remove the proposal code, the debt is now fully collectible
- there are no special actions required in the case of a Source Deductions account, the debt is fully collectible

THE APPLICATION

[1] This is an application by Abakhan & Associates Inc. ("Abakhan") for the taxation of fees claimed in the administration of Ms. Carr's Division II consumer proposal. It is one of nine similar applications by Abakhan heard on this day. All applications result from a negative comment letter issued by the official receiver. Those comments were expanded upon by Ms. Vogt in both oral and written submissions.

[2] The OSB challenges the administrator's entitlement to the fees on the basis that the administrator, relying on a clause in the proposal, by-passed the requirements under s. 66 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA") with resulting prejudice to creditors.

[3] Specifically, the OSB suggests that the administrator failed in its duty to monitor the performance of the proposal. The OSB is also critical of the proposal's terms.

THE FEES CLAIMED

[4] The administrator claims fees of $2,406.68 representing $1,500 for preparatory work and 20% of the $4,533.42 collected under the proposal. The fees are claimed pursuant to Rule 129 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency General Rules (the "Rules") which provides as follows:

> 129. (1) For the purposes of paragraph 66.12(6)(b) of the Act, the fees and expenses of the administrator of a consumer proposal that must be provided for in a consumer proposal are as follows:
> (a) $750, payable on filing a copy of the consumer proposal with the official receiver;
> (b) $750, payable on the approval or deemed approval of the consumer proposal by the court;
> (c) 20 per cent of the moneys distributed to creditors under the consumer proposal, payable on the distribution of the moneys;
> (d) the costs of counselling referred to in subsection 131(1);
> (e) the fee for filing a consumer proposal referred to in paragraph 132(c);
> (f) the fee payable to the registrar under paragraph 3(b) of Part II of the schedule; and
> (g) the amount of applicable federal and provincial taxes for goods and services.
> (2) Subsection (1) applies to consumer proposals in respect of which proceedings are commenced on or after April 30, 1998.

THE PROPOSAL

[6] Ms. Carr filed her consumer proposal on December 24, 2002. The appropriate notices were sent to the creditors and the official receiver, none of whom raised any concern as to the terms of the proposal. The proposal is in the name of Ms. Carr only, although the terms refer to a joint filing. Nothing turns on that language.

[7] The payment clause in the proposal provides:

> That beginning on the date of the filing of the joint Proposal the debtors shall pay to the administrator the following:
> - $200 per month for Thirty-six (36) months; and
> - the existing RRSP's (valued at approximately $10,000 before tax) will be de-registered as allowed by the plans and the "before tax" proceeds will be paid to the administrator over the same Thirty-six (36) months > such that a total of $17,200 will be paid to the administrator over the Thirty-six (36) months.

[8] Between the filing of the proposal and November 2005, Ms. Carr missed four of the monthly payments due in December 2002, July 2003, May 2004 and October 2005. In December 2005, the administrator discovered that the RRSP had been de-registered and the proceeds dissipated. A total sum of $6,400 was paid under the proposal.

[9] On April 20, 2006, the administrator issued a Notice to Creditors and Report to the Official Receiver on Deemed Annulment of Consumer proposal. In that notice, the trustee states that the debtor "is in default to the extent of at least three months" of the payments required under the proposal. The notice was issued pursuant to s. 66.31(1) of the BIA.

[10] At this hearing, the administrator expressed the view that because the debtor had 36 months to complete the payment of the RRSP (and pay the total amount of $17,200), she was not in default until December 2005.

THE SUPERINTENDENT'S POSITION

[11] The OSB submits that the administrator's interpretation and application of the payment clause is simply wrong. The Notice of Deemed Annulment should have been issued 24 months earlier as by May 2004, Ms. Carr had missed three monthly payments.

[12] The failure to annul the proposal prejudiced the creditors in that the RRSP proceeds were no longer available for collection by the end of the 36 months. The stay of proceedings in force for the duration of the proposal prevented creditors from seeking to review the disposal of the RRSP.

Digitized by Google

[13] The OSB is also critical of the administrator for failing to:

- include in his report to creditors that they will not be notified if payments are not made or that a stay of proceeding will remain in force for the duration of the proposal; and
- recognize that Ms. Carr was not in a position to remedy even one missed monthly payment.

[14] Regardless of the proposal's specific terms, once the proposal was deemed accepted, the OSB and the creditors should be able to rely on the administrator to both monitor the debtor's compliance and notify the creditors of any default.

[15] The OSB further suggests that the administrator should not have recommended the proposal in the first place.

[16] In her subsequent bankruptcy assignment, Ms. Carr failed to mention the $10,000 RRSP proceeds. The assignment was made through Abakhan. As trustee, Abakhan neglected to raise the issue in its s. 170 report. It was only after the OSB expressed its concerns that Abakhan filed a Notice of Opposition to Ms. Carr's discharge from bankruptcy, citing as grounds the disposal of the RRSP.

[17] The OSB submits that both the proposal's terms and the administrator's alleged inaction erode public confidence in the integrity of the BIA.

[18] In the result, the administrator should receive no fee or, if a fee is allowed, it should be commensurate to the dividend issued to creditors. The dividends paid to individual creditors in this case range from a low of $29.38 to a high of $940.51.

THE ADMINISTRATOR'S POSITION

[19] The administrator's position is three-fold: first, the terms of the proposal are within the scheme of the BIA; second, the proposal was not in default until the end of the 36 month term; and third, the creditors have not been prejudiced as, even absent the RRSP, they received a greater dividend than what might have been recovered in a bankruptcy.

[20] With respect to the performance of the payment clause, the administrator relies on a legal opinion obtained subsequent to the filing of this proposal. The legal opinion does not specifically address the administrator's duty to monitor the performance of the proposal. Nor does the opinion address the specific terms of this proposal.

[21] Rather, the opinion suggests that where there is flexibility in the amount to be paid, there can be no "missed" payments until the full term of the proposal comes to an end. Applying that proposition to this case, Ms. Carr had no obligation to de-register the RRSP and pay proceeds to the trustee until November 2005. Nor was she in default by failing to make the monthly payments as required as these were only a means to fulfill the ultimate payment of $17,200.

DISCUSSION

[22] The scheme for initiating and administering Division II consumer proposals is set out in ss. 66.11 to 66.40 of the BIA. An overview of the scheme is as follows:

- A debtor provides the administrator with prescribed information on the debtor's financial circumstances
- The administrator:
  - investigates the debtor's financial affairs to assess with reasonable accuracy the debtor's financial situation and cause or causes of the insolvency;
  - provides counselling; and
  - prepares a proposal in the prescribed form;
- The term of the proposal may not exceed 5 years;
- The proposal is then filed with the official receiver;
- Within 10 days of filing, the administrator:
  - reports to the official receiver, including whether the proposal is reasonable and fair to both the creditors and the debtor and whether the debtor can perform the proposal;
  - sends the proposal (and the report) to every known creditor with an explanation that a meeting of creditors will only be called if such a meeting is required by the official receiver and a review by the court of the proposal will be only sought if requested by the official receiver or an interested party;
  - if there is no request to have the proposal reviewed, the proposal is deemed accepted;
  - where payments under the proposal are to be made monthly and the debtor is in default to the extent of three months payments, the proposal will be deemed annulled and the administrator shall forthwith inform the creditors and file a report with the official receiver;
  - the proposal must provide for the payment of the administrator's fees and expenses which are governed by Rule 129.

[23] Administrator's fees are taxed if there is a negative comment letter from the OSB or the creditors raise objections. At the taxation of the administrator's fees, the registrar shall consider the letter of comment from the OSB: Rule 103 of the Rules. It is not disputed that the OSB may also present oral argument.

[24] In this and the related applications, the OSB relies on various authorities which primarily address the ability of the administrator to waive default under a proposal. The OSB's summary of the decisions is reproduced below:

> Schrader, Re 13 C.B.R. (4th) 256, 1999 CarswellNS 330 (N.S.S.C.) — Registrar Hill decided Act did not permit discretion to forgive default, cannot revive proposal after Deemed Annulment.
> White, Re, 13 C.B.R. (4th) 128 (N.S.S.C.), 2001 CarswellNS 489 — Registrar Hill decided that tariff fees may only be based on amounts received while the proposal is in force. Any payments received after deemed annulment are not subject to fees.
> Dziewiacien, Re, 2002 CarswellOnt 3599, 37 C.B.R. (4th) 250 (Ont. S.C.J.) — Deputy Registrar Nettie decided that neither the creditors nor the court has authority to waive default, extend time to cure default or set aside deemed annulment and concludes that the debtor may seek leave of the court (S.66.32) to file an amended proposal only if they are able to demonstrate a good reason for the default and satisfy the court there is a reasonable prospect a new proposal would be accepted by creditors.
> Wiggins, Re 50 C.B.R. (4th) 306, 67 O.R. (3d) 133, 2003 CarswellOnt 3514 (Ont. S.C.J.) — Justice Swinton considered fact that debtor failed to make payments for 3 months - then resumed payments and made up arrears. Administrator made application to court for declaration that court had jurisdiction to waive default – application dismissed – jurisdiction cannot be exercised if conflicts with provision of Act.... S. 66.31 deals specifically with defaults = Deemed Annulment, therefore the court does not have jurisdiction to waive debtor's default.
> Williams, Re 2005 BCSC 108 (CanLII), 2005 BCSC 108, [2005] B.C.W.L.D. 2080 — Master Baker decided the Supt had very limited authority to question legality of terms, and found the term which enabled the Administrator to extend time for making payment as long as extension did not extend beyond five years – to be reasonable and useful and refers to the McManus decision – in which the OSB must file all proposals (S.62), and must have issues reviewed by the court approval (S.59), but does not consider the prejudice to creditors:
> - who are not sent notice when payments are not made and are precluded from making application to annul the proposal
> - stay of proceedings remain in force for the duration of the proposal (up to 5 years) even when it is evident the debtor does not earn sufficient income to complete the terms
> - post proposal creditors are free to realize upon income and assets, while the pre proposal creditors remain subject to the stay
> - assets may otherwise dissipate particularly when it is evident the proposal will not be completed
> Sztojka, Re 2005 CarswellOnt 7449 — Registrar Nettie decided that proposals which provide inspectors or Administrators with power to waive defaults – are both offensive to and prohibited by the Act.... S.66.31 provides that in event of default... proposal is deemed annulled unless:
> - court otherwise orders
> - or where an amended proposal is filed prior to deemed annulment

[25] Williams (Re), supra, concerns the administrator's application for a declaration that a particular term in a consumer proposal is valid and permissible. The OSB opposed the inclusion of the term but took no position in the application. The court found that the particular clause was neither prohibited by nor offensive to the BIA and was aimed at the general purpose of insolvency legislation. The clause in question granted the administrator the power to extend the time for making of any payments required so long as the extension was not beyond five years from the date of approval of the proposal before the court.

[26] At paragraph 8, the court states:

> 8. Other authorities should be noted at this point. The authors of Bankruptcy & Insolvency Law of Canada [See Note 7 below] state:
> > There can be a variety of plans put forward in a proposal. The only limits are the ingenuity of the draftsman and the necessity for finding terms which will be acceptable to creditors.
> As well, in Re McManus [See Note 8 below], Low J., of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, concluded (albeit in respect of a proposal that was not a Consumer Proposal):
> > Section 62(1) requires the trustee to file a copy of the proposal with the official receiver. It does not give the official receiver any discretion to refuse to accept it. It is nothing more than a procedural notice requirement. I can find nothing in the Act that gives the official receiver any control over the content of the proposal. Whether the proposal is legally valid and reasonable are > judicial determinations which fall to the court under s. 59, not to the official receiver under s. 62(1).

> These comments, taken together, in my view permit the Trustee and the debtor a great deal of flexibility in crafting a Consumer Proposal, the only limitation being that the proposed terms not offend or violate the terms of the Act. Moreover, the Superintendent's standing to question the legality of such terms is very limited.

[27] In contrast, Stojka (Re), supra, decides that any proposal which provides inspectors or administrators with power to waive default is both offensive to and prohibited by the BIA.

[28] While these last two decisions appear to be in conflict, neither addresses the issue before me. This is not an application to approve a so-called waiver term. In any event, the administrator submits that it did not waive any defaults. The real issue is whether the provisions of Ms. Carr's proposal permit her to miss one or more of the $200 monthly payments and delay de-registering the RRSP until the end of the proposal. If that is the case, then the administrator has done nothing wrong.

[29] The proposal's payment clause is poorly worded. It invites differing interpretations of Ms. Carr's obligation to de-register the RRSP. For example, it might be interpreted as requiring the de-registering of the RRSP "beginning on the date of filing the proposal" with net proceeds to be paid in increments "over...36 months." Alternatively, it could be interpreted as the administrator suggests, and apparently intended. That is, Ms. Carr was to de-register the RRSP and pay over the proceeds at any time over the 36 months, including waiting until the end of the proposal's term.

[30] However, separate and apart from that obligation, Ms. Carr was to pay $200 each month. The payment clause does not allow her to remit any lesser amount each month. Thus, the first three missed $200 payments should have triggered the default of the proposal.

[31] Alternatively, the administrator might have applied to amend the proposal. Or, if there had been an application, the court may have ordered the default forgiven: s. 66.3. The administrator took neither of these steps.

[32] In those circumstances, I agree with the OSB that the notice of deemed annulment should have been issued after the missed payment in May 2004. There has been maladministration of the proposal.

[33] In addition to this failure, the administrator failed to comply with the provisions of s. 66.251 of the BIA which provides that:

> Where a proposal is approved or deemed approved by the court and the terms of the proposal do not provide for the distribution of available moneys at least once every three months, the administrator shall forthwith, upon ascertaining any change in the consumer debtor's circumstances that leads the administrator to conclude, after consultation with the debtor where practicable, that such change could jeopardize the consumer debtor's ability to meet the terms of the proposal, in writing, notify the official receiver and every known creditor of the change.

[34] This section applies as payments were to be issued to creditors one month after the anniversary date of proposal. In my view, s. 66.251 imposes a duty on the administrator to monitor the debtor's ability to perform the proposal. The missed payments in 2002 and 2003 (which were never made up for by the debtor) should have led the administrator to consult with the debtor about a change of circumstances. There is no evidence that any such consultation took place.

[35] The next matter to consider is what impact these omissions should have on the administrator's claim for remuneration.

[36] The objects of a taxation are to:

1. allow the [administrator] fair compensation for his services;
2. prevent unjustifiable payments for fees to the detriment of the creditors; and
3. encourage, rather than to discourage, efficient, conscientious administration of the [proposal] for the benefit of the creditors.

Re Hess (1977), 23 C.B.R. (N.S.) 215 (Ont. S.C.) at page 218.

[37] Some of the OSB's comments relate to the administration of Ms. Carr's bankruptcy estate. Those comments should carry no weight in this taxation. The actions of Abakhan as trustee in bankruptcy are not under review. The OSB may choose to raise its concerns in a taxation of the trustee fees claimed in the bankruptcy proceeding.

[38] I have found that the administrator failed to recognize and act on defaults under the proposal. However, despite the defaults, the debtor paid a further $3,400 under the proposal.

[39] There is no information before me as to when the RRSP proceeds were dissipated. It may have been done within months of filing the proposal. It would be speculating to say that the proceeds were available to the creditors after May 2004.

Digitized by Google

[40] Based on the information presented, I am unable to say that the creditors would, or could, have benefited had the notice of deemed annulment been issued when it ought to have been.
[41] Relying on the administrator's report, it appears that even with the defaults, the creditors would not have been better off if the debtor made a bankruptcy assignment in December 2002 or later. In the proposal, the creditors benefited to the extent that the administrator continued to collect the $200 monthly payments until November 2005.
[42] As for fairness of the proposal, at the time of filing, the debtor was employed on a full-time basis. The proposal appeared viable, if only just. The debtor's circumstances changed when she went on medical leave and suffered a reduction in income. Based on the circumstances at the time of filing, it was clear that a proposal was more advantageous to the creditors.
[43] I have given little weight to the OSB's concern that certain terms should have been included in the proposal. The official receiver is given notice of the proposal. If it has concerns with the terms, or lack thereof, it should ask the administrator to seek a review before the court. Otherwise, the terms of the proposal are deemed accepted.
[44] In summary, while the proposal was not administered perfectly, it is speculative to say that the creditors suffered as a result.
[45] In Re Wright [2005] B.C.J. No. 2507, Registrar Blok found that it was proper for the registrar to consider reducing a trustee's fees where the maladministration does not result in identifiable prejudice to the estate but where the integrity of the bankrupt system is undermined (at para. 52). Those comments are equally applicable to administrator's maladministration of a proposal.
[46] What, then, is the suitable fee for the administrator in this case?
[47] When there is no measurable loss to the creditors, there is no alternative formula for calculating a reduction in fees. The registrar must apply his or her own judgment to the circumstances and arrive at a "proper amount" that reflects the gravity and nature of the impugned conduct of the administrator: Nelson (Re) [2006] O.J. No. 2812 (S.C.) at para. 35.
[48] The views of the OSB with respect to fair fees should be given considerable weight: Nelson (Re), supra, at para. 36. I do not find the administrator's inaction to be of such gravity that its fees should be disallowed entirely. The OSB recommends, in the alternative, that fees should be commensurate with the dividend paid to creditors. As noted, those dividends ranged considerably, depending on the amount of the claim. In my view, it would be unfair to reduce the administrator's fee to only $940.00 which is the highest dividend paid
[49] The other method of arriving at the proper amount is to disallow fees collected after May, 2004 when the notice of deemed annulment should have been issued: White (Re). After May, 2004, the administrator collected fees of $906.68 (plus GST) which sum represents 20% of all moneys distributed to the creditors under the proposal. Such a reduction would, however, seem contrary to the intent of Rule 129(1) (c) which allows the administrator fees for its services in collecting and distributing monies received under the proposal.
[50] The alternative calculation is to reduce fees for those services performed after May, 2004. According to the administrator's records, the dividends paid to the creditors after May, 2004 amount to $2,862.42. Accepting that the administrator should not receive the benefit of the proposal after deemed annulment, fees should be reduced by $572.48 (20% of $2,862.42).
[51] While this would seem to be the tidy solution to calculating a reduction to the administrator's fees, I am not satisfied that the figure arrived at is a "proper" amount. The proposal was not monitored as it should have been. The notice of deemed annulment should have been sent out much earlier. However, the administrator's services in continuing to collect monthly sums benefited the creditors. And, I am not persuaded that the creditors have been prejudiced.
[52] Considering all of these factors, I find that the administrator's fees should be reduced by $ 300 (plus GST).

Appearing for Abakhan & Associates Inc., Administrators of the Consumer Proposal	R. Robinson

[1] This is a taxation of administrator's fees under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA").

[2] It is one of nine taxations heard on this day, all involving consumer proposals administered by Abakhan & Associates Inc. ("Abakhan"). The taxations result from a negative comment letter from the OSB. The OSB is critical of the form and content of the proposals as well as Abakhan's administration.

[3] With one exception, all of the matters concern the same form of proposal. In all cases, the administrator is accused of inaction resulting in prejudice to the creditors: see, for example Carr (Re) 2007 BCSC 816 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 816 and Papick (Re) 2007 BCSC 818 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 818.

[4] In this particular case, the OSB submits that the administrator failed to notify the creditors of defaults under the proposal. The result is that the creditors were subject to the stay of proceedings while the proposal was allegedly in arrears. I say allegedly because the administrator denies that it was under any obligation to report a missed payment.

[5] The OSB is also critical of the administrator recommending acceptance of the proposal. The viability of the proposal was marginal at best.

[6] On April 11, 2005, Mr. Castillo filed a joint proposal with his wife, Ana Isis Macias Romero. A separate court file was opened with respect to Ms. Romero, but there is only one fee claimed in the joint proposal under review.

[7] The proposal contained the following terms:

> 4. That the following payments be made to Abakhan & Associates Inc., the administrator of the consumer proposal, for the benefit of the unsecured creditors:
> That beginning on the date of the filing of the Proposal the debtors shall pay to the administrator an amount of $200.00 per month for thirty-six (36) months or such amount so that a total of $7,200.00 will be paid to the administrator within thirty-six (36) months. [my emphasis]
> 5. That the administrator of the consumer proposal shall distribute the moneys received to the unsecured creditors in accordance with the following schedule:
> That one month after each anniversary date of this proposal the administrator shall pay to the unsecured creditors who have filed a valid proof of claim the appropriate dividends as regulated under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act of Canada.

And

> 7. That the proposal may include the following additional terms:
>
> (a) The creditors may appoint up to three inspectors responsible for the consumer proposal of the consumer debtor. The inspectors may have, in addition to any powers of inspectors under the Act, the power to:
> (I) receive any notice of default in the performance of a provision of the consumer proposal and waive any such default; and
> (ii) approve any amendment to the consumer proposal without calling a meeting of creditors, if the amendment would alter the schedule for and the amount of the payments to be made by the consumer debtor, but would not change the total amount to be paid.

[9] In its report to the official receiver and creditors, the administrator opines that the proposal is more advantageous to creditors than a bankruptcy. Under the proposal, the creditors would receive $.27 on the dollar; nothing would be recovered in a bankruptcy. The proposal is considered viable because Mr. Castillo is "employable as a painter" and Ms. Romero is "looking for work".

[10] The debtors made three payments under the proposal: $300 on each of July 5, 2005 and July 26, 2005; and $400 on September 20, 2005.

[12] There is no information of efforts made by the administrator to investigate why payments were not made after September 2005. In this case, the administrator's employee deposes that she attempted to contact the debtors (she does not say when) by email and phone but the home number was out of service and there was no record on file of any work number.

[13] The administrator's application to annul was the first notice to the creditors of any problem with the proposal.

Digitized by Google

[14] The administrator submits that it did not fail in any duties as the proposal was not in default unless or until the sum of $7,200 was unpaid at the end of the 26 months. Under the proposal, the debtor could make monthly payments of $200 "or such amount", including nothing. The debtors' only obligation was to ensure that $7,200 was paid.
[15] In Walter (Re), supra, and Papick (Re), supra, I accepted that this was a reasonable interpretation and application of the payment clause. It was a term apparently accepted by the creditors and certainly not objected to by the official receiver.
[16] For the purposes of this taxation, I am not willing to fault the administrator for recommending acceptance of the proposal: Walter (Re), supra. Nor am I willing to consider whether certain terms should have been included in the proposal. Both are matters that could have been addressed before the proposal was deemed accepted.
[17] However, Abakhan should still be faulted for its administration of the proposal. It failed in its obligation to monitor the debtors' circumstances. If properly monitored, the administrator might have concluded that the proposal was in jeopardy and given the appropriate notice to the creditors and the official receiver under s. 66.251 of the BIA. Given the infrequency of payments in the first six months of the proposal, it should have been obvious to the administrator that an investigation of the debtors' circumstances was warranted.
[18] It appears that in this particular case, the debtors were "signed up" and then forgotten. Such a practice reflects poorly not only on the administrator (not Mr. Robinson, I should add) but also on the integrity of the bankruptcy system. Fees can be reduced on that basis alone: Wright (Re) 2005 BCSC 1618 (CanLII), 2005 BCSC 1618.
[19] The creditors received nothing under this proposal. They would have received nothing if the debtors were assigned into bankruptcy. Thus, there is no measurable loss to the creditors despite the administrator's inaction. In the absence of any such measure, the registrar must decide what might be a "proper" reduction in fees: Nelson (Re) [2006] O.J. No. 2812.
[20] In accordance with the principles discussed in Carr (Re) 2007 BCSC 816 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 816, the administrator's fees are reduced by $150 and allowed at $518 (plus GST).

Appearing for Abakhan & Associates Inc., Administrator of the R. Robinson Consumer Proposal

Appearing for the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the "OSB", also referred to as the official receiver)	L. Vogt
Date and Place of Hearing:	May 3, 2007 Victoria, B.C.

[1] This is another in a series of taxations heard May 3, 2007, all involving similar proposals administered by Abakhan & Associates Inc. ("Abakhan").

[2] In this, as in all of the other cases, the OSB suggests that Abakhan should receive no remuneration for its services. It submits that the administrator attempted to by-pass the provisions of s. 66 under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA"). In doing so, the administrator neglected to report defaults under the proposal resulting in prejudice to creditors.

[3] In all other cases, I have accepted that the administration of the particular proposal was deficient and reduced fees accordingly. Each proposal contained similar language and terms to those described below, but the administrative deficiencies differed in gravity. In most instances, there was no demonstrated prejudice to the creditors. However, I found that a failure to adhere to statutory duties alone justified a reduction in fees.

[4] Here the debtor filed a proposal on November 4, 2004. The proposal contained the following clauses:

> 4. That the following payments be made to Abakhan & Associates Inc., the administrator of the consumer proposal, for the benefit of the unsecured creditors:
> That beginning on the date of the filing of the Proposal the debtor shall pay to the administrator an amount of $150.00 per month for thirty-six (36) months or such amount so that a total of $5,400.00 will be paid to the administrator within thirty-six (36) months. [my emphasis]
> 5. That the administrator of the consumer proposal shall distribute the moneys received to the unsecured creditors in accordance with the following schedule:
> That one month after each anniversary date of this proposal the administrator shall pay to the unsecured creditors who have filed a valid proof of claim the appropriate dividends as regulated under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act of Canada.

And:

> 7. That the proposal may include the following additional terms:
>
> (a) the creditors may appoint up to three inspectors responsible for the consumer proposal of the consumer debtor. The inspectors may have, in addition to any powers of inspectors under the Act, the power to:
> (i) receive any notice of default in the performance of a provision of the consumer proposal and waive any such default; and
> (ii) approve any amendment to the consumer proposal without calling a meeting of creditors, if the amendment would alter the schedule for and the amount of the payments to be made by the consumer debtor, but would not change the total amount to be paid.

[5] The administrator recommended acceptance of the proposal on the basis that creditors would see a better return than if the debtor made an assignment into bankruptcy. The official receiver did not require the court's review of the proposal: s. 66.22 of the BIA. Nor did the creditors raise any issue with respect to any of the proposal's terms. As a result, the proposal was deemed approved without the court's review.

[6] Payments made by Ms. Dela Cruz during the first year of the proposal were sporadic. She did not make any payments for a five month period in 2005. The last payment was made in December 2005. The amount of the payments varied from a low of $150 to a high of $600. The total amount paid was $1,500.

[7] At some point, the administrator's office attempted to contact the debtor by phone and mail. The material before me does not say when those attempts were made. Phone messages were not returned, while mail was returned with the notation "moved address unknown".

[8] On October 4, 2006, the administrator obtained an order annulling the proposal.

[9] The administrator claims total remuneration of $1,092.44. There is no dividend payable to creditors as this sum, together with statutory fees and taxes, equals the amount paid by the debtor under the proposal.

[10] These circumstances are similar to those found in the other administrations under review: see Papick (Re), 2007 BCSC 818 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 818; Castillo (Re), 2007 BCSC 828 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 828; Segi (Re), 2007 BCSC 831 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 831, for example.

[11] The administrator argues that it should not be penalized because the proposal was not in actual default unless or until Ms. Dela Cruz failed to pay the full $5,400 due at the end of the 36 months. She was entitled to pay either the $150 or any other sum, including nothing.

Digitized by Google

[12] In decisions considering a similar clause, I found that the administrator's interpretation and application of the payment provision was reasonable. I also question the weight to be given to the official receiver's objection to this term when it made no request for the proposal's review by the court.

[13] However, as with the other matters before me, I find that the administrator failed in its statutory duties under s. 66.251 of the BIA. That failure justifies a reduction in the administrator's fees. Like most of the other matters, there is no measurable loss to the creditors.

[14] The administrator's fees are reduced to reflect the nature and gravity of the maladministration: Nelson (Re), [2006] O.J. No. 2812 (S.C.). It is entitled to the sum of $800 (plus GST).

To: OSB Staff, Trustees and Registrars

Subject: Revision to Form 49, *Notice to Creditors of Consumer Proposal

Form 49, Notice to Creditors of Consumer Proposal, has been revised to reflect the legislative amendment to subsection 66.17(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), which was amended by Chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada, 2005, and Chapter 36 of the Statutes of Canada, 2007, and to bring to creditors' attention the impact of the change.

According to section 66.17 of the BIA, any creditor who has proved a claim may indicate assent to or dissent from the consumer proposal at or prior to a meeting of creditors, or prior to the expiration of the 45-day period after the filing of the consumer proposal.

The amendment to subsection 66.17(2) is to clarify that any dissent received by the administrator of a consumer proposal is not a request for a meeting of creditors for the purpose of paragraph 66.15(2)(b), and will not be counted in a vote on the consumer proposal unless the administrator is required to call a meeting of creditors pursuant to section 66.15 of the Act.

Objet : Révision du formulaire 49, *Avis aux créanciers de la proposition de consommateur

Le formulaire 49, Avis aux créanciers de la proposition de consommateur, a été révisé pour tenir compte de la modification apportée au paragraphe 66.17(2) de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (LFI), par le chapitre 47 des Lois du Canada (2005) et le chapitre 36 des Lois du Canada (2007), et pour porter à l'attention des créanciers les conséquences de ce changement.

En vertu de l'article 66.17 de la LFI, tout créancier qui a prouvé une réclamation peut, lors de l'assemblée des créanciers ou avant la tenue de celle-ci, ou encore avant l'expiration des 45 jours suivant le dépôt de la proposition de consommateur, indiquer s'il approuve ou désapprouve la proposition.

La modification apportée au paragraphe 66.17(2) de la LFI vise à préciser que toute désapprobation reçue par l'administrateur de la proposition de consommateur n'est pas une demande en vue de la convocation d'une assemblée des créanciers pour l'application de l'alinéa 66.15(2)b) et ne sera pas calculée dans le cadre d'un vote portant sur la proposition de consommateur, à moins que l'administrateur ne soit tenu de convoquer une assemblée des créanciers en vertu de l'article 65.15 de la Loi.

Form 49 has been amended to reflect the legislative amendment to subsection 66.17(2) and to make it clear that if there is no requirement to call a meeting of creditors, the consumer proposal is deemed to be accepted regardless of any dissent received.

Ainsi, le formulaire 49 a été modifié pour tenir compte de la modification apportée au paragraphe 66.17(2) de la Loi et pour préciser que si l'administrateur n'est pas tenu de convoquer une assemblée des créanciers, la proposition de consommateur est réputée avoir été acceptée, sans égard à toute désapprobation qui aurait été reçue.

JUDGMENT GUNN J.
July 13, 1994

Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada ("Revenue Canada Taxation") applies for an order pursuant to ss 66.3(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as am. S.C. 1992, c. 27 (the "BIA") annulling the consumer proposal of James Bruce Engdahl (the "debtor") filed with the official receiver on the 11th day of January, 1993 on the basis that the debtor was not eligible to make a consumer proposal when the consumer proposal was filed as the aggregate of his unsecured debts exceeded $75,000 on that date.

FACTS

The facts may be summarized as follows:

Digitized by Google

1. On January 8, 1993 the debtor made a consumer proposal that was filed with the official receiver by Jeffrey W. Pinder, the administrator (the "administrator") on January 11, 1993.
2. The debtor says he disclosed to the administrator all his debts and liabilities including a liability to Revenue Canada Taxation. This consisted of his outstanding liability to Revenue Canada Taxation for the 1990 and 1991 taxation years of approximately $13,200 plus his estimate of his tax liability for 1992 of $12,600.
3. The debtor says these figures were a fair and honest estimate arrived at in consultation with his accountant and that at the time of making his proposal he was not aware of any personal tax liability, either actual or potential, other than the estimated $25,800 set out in his statement of affairs.
4. The debtor offered in the consumer proposal to pay the sum of $7,200 in full and final satisfaction of all claims of unsecured creditors by paying $200 on the first day of each month for 36 months.
5. On January 20, 1993, Revenue Canada Taxation received a copy of the debtor's consumer proposal and statement of affairs from the administrator in which the debtor listed Revenue Canada Taxation as an unsecured creditor with a debt of $25,800.
4. On February 12, 1993, the records of Revenue Canada Taxation indicated the debtor was indebted under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) in respect of the 1988 and 1991 taxation years in the sum of $13,242.58 and a proof of claim in that amount was filed by Revenue Canada Taxation with the administrator on that date.
5. There was no meeting of creditors on this consumer proposal, as no creditor requested a meeting, and the consumer proposal was not reviewed by the Court as the consumer proposal was deemed to be approved by the Court as at March 23, 1993, pursuant to ss. 66.22(2) of the BIA.
6. On April 30, 1993 the debtor filed his personal income tax return for the 1992 taxation year and reported therein as income the receipt of director's fees of $63,500 from Triple J. Enterprises Corp. ("Triple J").
7. After assessment of the 1992 income tax return the records of Revenue Canada Taxation indicated the income tax indebtedness of the debtor was $39,756.03 after including the additional unpaid income tax, penalty and interest of $25,885.59 due in respect of the 1992 taxation year and an amended proof of claim in the amount of $39,756.03 was filed by Revenue Canada Taxation with the administrator on August 18, 1993.
8. October 18, 1993 the administrator advised Revenue Canada Taxation that the sum of $7,200 had been paid to the administrator and the debtor had fully performed all his obligations under the consumer proposal.
9. October 19, 1993 the debtor was reassessed for the 1990 and 1991 taxation years to include the unreported amounts discovered during the course of the audit conducted by Revenue Canada Taxation and the records of Revenue Canada Taxation indicated the income tax indebtedness of the debtor was increased to $92,819.89 and a proof of claim in the amount of $92,819.89 was filed by Revenue Canada Taxation with the administrator on that date.
10. On October 26, 1993 Triple J was re-assessed for the 1990 and 1991 taxation years to include the non-deductible unreported amounts discovered during the course of the audit conducted by Revenue Canada Taxation and notice of re-assessment was mailed to Triple J on that date.

Digitized by Google

11. On or about November 3, 1993 the administrator sent to the Department of Justice (Canada), a draft receipts and disbursements, dividend sheet, and administrator's certificate.
12. On or about January 19, 1994, the administrator reported to Department of Justice (Canada) on the status of two secured creditors and advised that if no formal objection were filed the certificate of compliance would be issued.
13. February 8, 1994 the certificate of full performance was issued by the administrator pursuant to s. 65.3 of the BIA.
14. On February 21, 1994 Revenue Canada Taxation received from the administrator a cheque in the sum of $3,804.53 as a final dividend on its claim of $92,819.89.
15. The administrator says Revenue Canada Taxation never formally or informally objected to the consumer proposal. His first notice of their objection was the notice of application to annul the proposal.
1. The debtor says he does not agree with the reassessment made by Revenue Canada Taxation but has not filed a notice of objection as he believes his tax liability for 1991 and 1992 would be discharged upon compliance with his consumer proposal.
17. The debtor says if his consumer proposal is annulled he will be forced to make an assignment in bankruptcy.

ISSUES

1. Was the debtor eligible to make a consumer proposal?
2. Can the proposal be annulled after full compliance with the proposal and the issuance of a certificate by the administrator?
3. If so, is this a proper case for annulment?

DISCUSSION

1.Was the Debtor eligible to make a consumer proposal?

Revenue Canada Taxation submits the debtor was not eligible to make a consumer proposal as the aggregate of his unsecured debts exceeded $75,000 on the date the consumer proposal was filed.

Revenue Canada Taxation says the debtor's income tax liability for 1992 was assessed after the date of the filing of the consumer proposal in the amount of $25,885.59 in respect of income earned in 1992, prior to the filing of the consumer proposal, and thus the debtor's unsecured liabilities on January 11, 1993 did exceed $75,000. In addition, the income tax liability of the debtor for 1990 and 1991 was also re-assessed after the date of filing this consumer proposal to include the income tax, interest and penalties arising from income earned in 1990 and 1991, and the debtor's unsecured liability under the Income Tax Act alone exceeded $75,000 on January 11, 1993 as the aggregate debt to Her Majesty the Queen existing in 1988, 1990, 1991 and 1992 was $92,819.87.

Revenue Canada Taxation relies on s. 222 of the Income Tax Act and ss. 152 and 158 of the Income Tax Act.

Associate Chief Justice Noel dealt with the issue of when tax liability exists in the case of R. v. Simard-Beaudry Inc. et al. (1971), 71 D.T.C. 5511 at 5515:

As to his second argument, namely that the debt arising from re-assessment of the taxpayer dates only from the time that the taxpayer is assessed, and that it did not accordingly, exist at the time the agreement was made, it seems to me that the answer to this is that the general scheme of the Income Tax Act indicates that the taxpayer's debt is created by his taxable income, not by an assessment or re-assessment. In fact, the taxpayer's liability results from the Act and not from the assessment. In principle, the debt comes into existence the moment the income is earned, and even if the assessment is made one or more years after the taxable income is earned, the debt is supposed to originate at that point. Here the re-assessments issued on August 14, 1969, for income earned in previous years seem to me to be at most a confirmation or acknowledgment of the amounts owing for these earlier years. Indeed, in my opinion, the assessment does not create the debt, but is at most a confirmation of its existence. . . .

Revenue Canada Taxation therefore submits the income tax debt of the debtor to Her Majesty the Queen existed in 1988, 1990,

Digitized by Google

1991 and 1992 when the income that formed the subject matter of the tax was earned; and the aggregate amount of the unsecured debt to Her Majesty the Queen, being $92,819.87 exceeded $75,000 on the date the consumer proposal was filed and the debtor was therefore ineligible to file a consumer proposal on that date as the aggregate of his unsecured debts exceeded $75,000.

The debtor says he does not agree with the reassessment, and that he did not know he was ineligible at the time he made the proposal.

The time at which the claims of creditors must be determined is the date of the filing of the proposal (ss. 66.28(1) BIA) at which time the debtor was, based on his tax reassessment, ineligible to file a consumer proposal.

2.Can the proposal be annulled after full compliance with the proposal and the issuance of a certificate by the administrator?

The debtor submits that once there has been compliance with the terms of a proposal and the administrator has issued a certificate pursuant to ss. 66.38 there is nothing to annul.

Revenue Canada Taxation argues the Court has authority to annul a consumer proposal after a certificate of full performance has been issued and relies upon ss. 66.3(1) of the BIA. This section arguably provides authority to annul a consumer proposal and does not limit the authority of the Court to annulments prior to the issuance of a certificate of full performance, but instead provides annulment whenever a debtor was not eligible to make a consumer proposal.

In ss. 66.32(2) of the BIA it is provided that upon annulment of a consumer proposal creditors claims are "revived". If a debtor is released from his creditors' claims only upon the issuance of a certificate of full performance then annulment of a consumer proposal prior to issuance of a certificate of full performance would not require "revival" of creditors' claims. If a debtor is released from his creditors' claims only upon issuance of a certificate of full performance then an annulment subsequent thereto is contemplated by ss. 66.32(2) as creditors' claims are "revived".

The debtor says the filing of a proposal suspends the creditors' rights. If the proposal is annulled prior to the issuance of the proposal being fully performed and the issuance of the certificate, the rights of the creditors revive for the amount of their claims less any dividends received. The debtor submits s. 66.32(2) of the BIA does not provide any support for the proposition that a consumer proposal can be annulled after it has been fully performed and the certificate has been issued.

I do not agree. In my view ss. 66.3(1)(a) is very clear in providing authority to the Court, without limitation, to annul a consumer proposal if the debtor was not eligible to make a consumer proposal when the consumer proposal was filed. It cannot depend on how long the debtor's true financial affairs are unknown whether due to any advertent or inadvertent actions on the part of the debtor or others.

3.If so, is this a proper case for annulment?

The Court is given discretionary power to annul consumer proposals by s. 66.3(1) of the BIA. The principles on which judicial discretion is exercised in cases involving the annulment of commercial proposals were considered in Gavex, A Resource Corp., Re

Digitized by Google

(1989), 77 C.B.R. (N.S.) 102 (B.C.S.C.) and T.E. Quinn Truck Lines Ltd., Re (1987), 64 C.B.R. (N.S.) 255 (Ont. S.C.).

In Gavex, A Resource Corp., supra, it was noted that the authority to annul a proposal is discretionary and that judicial discretion must be exercised in light of ss. 63(4) of the BIA which provides that upon annulment of a commercial proposal the debtor is automatically bankrupt. Lander J. at p. 107 of his decision then adopted and applied the principle quoted in T.E. Quinn Truck Lines Ltd., supra, at p. 259 from Halsbury's Laws of England (4th) Vol. 3, p. 250, para. 437 respecting the exercise of judicial discretion:
However, the court will not, in the absence of fraud, exercise the power of adjudging the debtor bankrupt, if it can see plainly that the creditors can gain nothing by it; but it will do so if there is a probability of gain for them.

Unlike the annulment of a commercial proposal, annulment of a consumer proposal does not automatically result in bankruptcy for, by virtue of s. 66.4, all provisions of the BIA, except Division I of Part III, (including ss. 63(4)) apply to consumer proposals. Section 66.4 provides as follows:
66.4 All the provisions of this Act, except Division I of this Part, in so far as they are applicable, apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to consumer proposals.
Therefore, Revenue Canada Taxation argues different principles ought to apply in respect of the exercise of judicial discretion to annul consumer proposals as bankruptcy is not the automatic result.

Revenue Canada Taxation argues the debtor is largely in the same position after annulment as before except he would not be eligible to file another consumer proposal or be entitled to the benefit of the stay of proceedings in ss. 69 to 69.2 of the BIA unless by virtue of ss. 66.32(1) the Court ordered otherwise.

Revenue Canada Taxation says the creditors relied upon the accuracy of the documents filed by the debtor at the time of the proposal. It further argues that by the time the debtor filed his 1992 income tax return on April 30, 1993, the time for requesting a meeting of creditors or having the consumer proposal reviewed by the Court had already expired since the consumer proposal was deemed to be approved by the Court on March 23, 1993.

The debtor says that ss. 66.13(3) provides that the administrator shall not file a consumer proposal if it has reason to believe that the debtor is not eligible to make a consumer proposal. At the time of filing, there was no reason to believe that the debtor was not eligible. His known liabilities were less than $75,000. His liability to Revenue Canada Taxation was disclosed in an amount greater than the proof of claim originally filed by Revenue Canada Taxation because he included an estimate of his taxes for the 1992 taxation year.

The debtor says even where there has been non-compliance with the terms of a proposal, the courts have been reluctant to annul the proposal unless there is reason to believe that the unsecured creditors will gain as a result of the annulment. Here the only evidence on that issue comes from the debtor who says if the proposal is annulled he will be forced to make an assignment in bankruptcy.

The debtor submits the following considerations are relevant in determining whether to exercise my discretion to annul the proposal:

Digitized by Google

(1) The debtor did not file a proposal knowing he was ineligible to file the proposal;
(2) The debtor has satisfied the terms of the proposal which all of the creditors were deemed to have accepted;
(3) On June 1, 1993, facts were within the knowledge of Revenue Canada Taxation indicating that the debtor was ineligible to make a consumer proposal, yet it raised no objection and took no steps to annul the proposal for a full nine months;
(4) Revenue Canada Taxation, after the facts were within its knowledge, allowed the debtor to continue to make payments under the proposal, and received the benefit of these payments in the form of a final dividend;
(5) Revenue Canada Taxation waited until after the certificate of compliance had been issued before taking any steps to annul the proposal.

The function of a court sitting in bankruptcy and insolvency matters is to take into account the interests of a debtor and his creditors and balance their interests while maintaining the integrity and confidence of the public.

The largest single unsecured creditor of the debtor is Her Majesty the Queen for arrears of income tax. In Katari, Re (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 178 (Ont. S.C.) Granger J. characterized income tax debts by stating at pp. 183 and 184:

In my opinion, arrears of income tax are in a different category than other debts. Such arrears represent moneys which the bankrupt was obliged by law to forward to Revenue Canada Taxation, and as a result of the bankrupt's failure to carry out his duty he has made an assignment in bankruptcy and now seeks a discharge from such bankruptcy. The majority of Canadian citizens pay their tax when due and as a result have substantially less money available for the purchase of goods and services. The bankrupt in this case was able to retain the moneys which rightfully belonged to Revenue Canada and to enjoy the goods and services which such moneys provided.

I agree with the views expressed by Granger J. However, in the circumstances of this case I do not feel it is an appropriate case in which to annul the consumer proposal given the actions of Revenue Canada Taxation. I accept that the debtor did not know he was ineligible at the time of making the proposal. He has completed all his requirements pursuant to the proposal and has received the certificate of compliance from the administrator. I am not satisfied any benefit will accrue to the unsecured creditors if the proposal were to be annulled, based on the debtor's belief he will be forced to make an assignment in bankruptcy if the proposal were to be annulled.

Accordingly, on the evidence before me and in the exercise of my discretion, I decline to annul the consumer proposal of the debtor and the application by Revenue Canada Taxation is dismissed with costs to the debtor.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE

IN BANKRUPCY AND INSOLVENCY

RE: IN THE MATTER OF the Consumer Proposal of Sally Teresa Wiggins
BEFORE: Swinton J.
COUNSEL: Sanjeev P.R. Mitra for the Administrator
Valerie Anderson for the Superintendent of Bankruptcy

HEARD: September 16, 2003
ENDORSEMENT

[1] The Administrator of the Consumer Proposal of Sally Teresa Wiggins and other individuals listed in Schedules A, B and C of the Motion Record sought a declaration that this Court has the inherent jurisdiction to waive default in a consumer proposal more than three months following the default and for other relief.

[2] Section 66.31(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended, provides:

> Independently of section 66.3,
> (a) where payments under a consumer proposal are to be made monthly or more frequently and the consumer debtor is in default to the extent of three months payments, or
> (b) where payments under a consumer proposal are to be made less frequently than monthly and the consumer debtor is in default for more than three months on any payment,
> the consumer proposal shall thereupon be deemed to be annulled unless the court has previously ordered otherwise or unless an amendment to the consumer proposal has previously been filed, and the administrator shall forthwith so inform the creditors and file a report thereof in the prescribed form with the official receiver.

[3] In this case, Ms. Wiggins failed to make payments for three months. She then resumed payments and made up the arrears. However, pursuant to s. 66.3(1), her consumer proposal was deemed annulled. Nevertheless, the Administrator allowed her to pay the arrears and has continued to make distributions to creditors as if the consumer proposal remained in effect.

[4] Mr. Justice Ground approved the omnibus procedure for this motion, which groups individuals like Ms. Wiggins in Schedule A and seeks an order waiving the default and setting aside the deemed annulment. Schedule B includes individuals who were in arrears over three months and who are making progress to make up the arrears. The Administrator seeks an order of waiver of the default, the setting aside of the deemed annulment and filing of an amended proposal, or the granting of leave to file a second consumer proposal. Finally, Schedule C consists of individuals who were in arrears over three months and who made unsuccessful attempts to catch up. An order is sought with respect to the distribution of funds held by the Administrator which were received after the deemed annulment.

[5] Decisions of the Registrar in both Nova Scotia and Ontario have held that there is no specific authority under the BIA to allow a court to waive the default by the debtor following the deemed annulment of a consumer proposal (Re Schrader reflex, (1999), 13 C.B.R. (4th) 256 (N.S. Reg.); Re Dziewiacien reflex, (2002), 37 C.B.R. (4th) 250 (Ont. Reg.)). Deputy Registrar Nettie in Re Dziewiacien held that s. 187(11) of the Act does not permit the court to extend a time period in the Act where there has been an intervening statutory event consequent upon default. That decision was not appealed.

Digitized by Google

[6] Section 183(1) of the Act vests the Superior Court of Justice in Ontario and the named courts in other jurisdictions with "such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable them to exercise original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy". The Administrator argued that this section confers inherent jurisdiction on this Court, which should be exercised in this case to waive the default and set aside the deemed annulment under the Act for debtors in Schedule A and B. Counsel for the Superintendent agreed with this position, based on the facts before me in this motion.

[7] The Bankruptcy Court may authorize and sanction acts required to be done by a trustee for the due administration and protection of the bankrupt estate, even though there is no specific provision in the Act (Re Tlustie (1923), 3 C.B.R. 654 (Ont. Reg.)). However, inherent jurisdiction can not be exercised if the exercise conflicts with the provisions of the Act (Wasserman Arsenault Ltd. v. Sone 2000 CanLII 22507 (ON SC), (2000), 22 C.B.R. (4th) 153 (Ont. S.C.J.), aff'd 2002 CanLII 41494 (ON CA), (2000), 33 C.B.R. (4th) 145 (Ont. C.A.)). Here, s. 66.31 deals specifically with what follows if the consumer debtor is in default in payments for three months: the consumer proposal is deemed annulled unless the court has ordered otherwise or unless an amendment to the proposal has been filed before the three month period expires.

[8] In my view, there is no inherent jurisdiction to waive a default like that of Ms. Wiggins and to set aside the deemed annulment of her consumer proposal, given the express terms of the Act. While Ontario courts may have granted the relief sought in this motion prior to the decision in Re Dziewiacien, in my view, they had no inherent jurisdiction to do so.

[9] Given that individuals like Ms. Wiggins and those in Schedule A have continued to make payments as if the consumer proposal were still in effect, and the Administrator has continued to make distributions, leave is given to this group to file a second consumer proposal, and I order that they are entitled to the relief in ss. 69-69.2. Given the payment history since the default, it appears that there is a reasonable prospect of the new proposal being accepted by the creditors.

[10] Given the history of the Schedule B debtors, I also grant leave to this group to file a second consumer proposal, and I order that they are entitled to the relief in ss. 69-69.2 for the same reason.

[11] With respect to Schedule C, the Administrator has asked for directions with respect to the distribution of funds which it received after the deemed annulment. According to Re White 2002 CanLII 25275 (NS SC), (2001), 31 C.B.R. (4th) 128 (N.S. Reg.), those funds should be distributed to the creditors.

Memorandum of Decision of
K. R. Laycock, Registrar in Bankruptcy

[1] On April 7th, 1999 the debtor filed a Consumer Proposal with the Official Receiver's Office. The statement of affairs disclosed assets of $2,650.00 and lists as creditors, the Brick for $3,000.00 and Revenue Canada Taxation for $24,000.00.

[2] Paragraph 5 of the proposal required the debtor to pay $500.00 upon filing the proposal and paying to the administrator $300.00 per month commencing May 15th, 1999 and continuing for 36 months for a total of $11,300.00.

[3] Paragraph 7 stated:

> The debtor further agrees that during the course of the proposal he will:
> (a) remit current year installment payments of individual tax and file income tax returns as required by the Income Tax Act.

[4] The Consumer Proposal was forwarded to the creditors and deemed accepted pursuant to the Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act, section 66.18(1).

[5] The periodic payments required by the proposal have been made, however the debtor has failed to file income tax and GST returns for 2002. When he made his last proposal payment to the Administrator, he was in default in paying $479.00 for his 2001 income tax, he failed to file his 2001 GST return and failed to pay his March and June 2002 quarterly installment, each in the amount of $1100.00.

[6] The trustee has filed an affidavit stating that both he and Canada Customs and Revenue Agency have on various occasions demanded that his 2002 tax return and GST returns be filed and that any amounts payable be remitted. Notice of this application and the trustee's affidavit have been served on Mr. Newsham.

[7] The Bankruptcy & Insolvency Act allows or requires a proposal to be annulled or deemed annulled for non-compliance with the proposal or the Act. The trustee's application for an order annulling the proposal is made pursuant to section 66.3(1) which states:

> Where default is made in the performance of any provision in a consumer proposal, or where it appears to the court
> (a) that the debtor was not eligible to make a consumer proposal when the consumer proposal was filed,
> (b) that the consumer proposal cannot continue without injustice or undue delay, or > (c) that the approval of the court was obtained by fraud,
> the court may, on application, with such notice as the court may direct to the consumer debtor and, if applicable, to the administrator and to the creditors, annul the consumer proposal.

[8] The Act encourages debtors to make proposals before considering bankruptcy as an option (section 173(1)(n)). Consumer proposals often result in the distribution of more funds to creditors then would normally occur in a bankruptcy. Consumer proposals permit the affairs to be dealt with quickly, efficiently and with a minimum of administration and expense.

[9] On an application to annul a consumer proposal the court is not required to annul the proposal for default in the performance of provisions in the consumer proposal. The court is vested with a discretion. The nature and extent of the default and the importance of the default to the integrity of the proposal must be considered.

[10]What some debtors fail to appreciate is that the process of bankruptcy, or arrangements with creditors through proposals is a learning process. In bankruptcy the debtor is required to attend two counselling sessions. A recognition of the cause of bankruptcy and the prevention of a repeat bankruptcy is a necessary ingredient of counselling. Budget preparation and the proper use of credit cards must be an important component of most counselling sessions. Because of the rise in second, third and fourth time bankruptcies, counselling to avoid repeat assignments is viewed by the courts as an important and necessary ingredient in the process.

[11]There are no mandatory counselling provisions for a consumer proposal. It is however necessary for the debtor to recognize the cause of the problem and avoid a repeat use of the bankruptcy and insolvency provisions. Mr. Newsham's primary creditor was the federal tax authorities. His proposal included a material provision for compliance with Canada's tax laws during the currency of the proposal. CCRA filed the only proof of claim filed in the proposal. They are keenly interested in Mr. Newsham learning from the process by requiring that he file all necessary returns and make his tax payments. The concept of payment has an element of mandatory budgeting or setting aside of funds to pay anticipated tax at year end.

[12]While payment of the funds under the proposal is an important ingredient, the failure of Mr. Newsham to file his income tax and GST returns for 2002 can not be considered a minor non-compliance.
[13]Mr. Newsham has failed to file an affidavit or appear on the application to explain his non-compliance.
[14]Recognizing the importance of compliance with the terms of the proposal, it is also recognized that there are advantages to the debtor and CCRA in completion of this proposal. CCRA will receive required income tax and GST returns and the debtor will be released from tax debts arising prior to the filing of the proposal. If the proposal is annulled the administrator will distribute the funds received by him and CCRA will be allowed to pursue the balance of the unpaid income tax plus interest thereon. In my view, the court under section 66.3 has more than two options. The court is not bound to either to annul a proposal or forgive the non-compliance. The court should encourage or require compliance before annulling the proposal.
[15]It is therefore ordered that Mr. Newsham file his 2002 income tax and GST returns within 45 days of being served with this decision. It is a further provision that Mr. Newsham shall pay any income tax or GST amounts within 90 days of the issuance by CCRA of any assessment or re-assessment notice. In default of either of these conditions the proposal shall forthwith be annulled.

Heard on the 05th day of November, 2003.

IN BANKRUPTCY
IN THE MATTER OF THE PROPOSAL OF BONNIE WILLIAMS

DECISION OF

ISSUE

[1] Mr. Hagen, the administrator / trustee ("the Trustee") for Ms. Williams, seeks a declaration that a particular term of a consumer proposal is valid and permissible. That term is:

> 10(b) In the absence of appointed Inspectors the Administrator of this Consumer Proposal shall have the power to extend the time for the making of any payment required to be made pursuant to this Proposal provided that no such extension shall extend beyond the five years following the approval of this Proposal by the Court;

[2] Apparently this term's inclusion in the proposal concerns the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy Canada, whose representatives advised Mr. Hagen, the Trustee, that they did not consider it an appropriate inclusion in a consumer proposal. Interestingly, however, the Superintendent's formal position, as stated in a letter to the Trustee's counsel, Mr. Christiansen, is that "...the Superintendent intends to take no position in respect of the application which is currently before the Court." Mr. Christiansen was therefore in the interesting position of placing all perspectives and all arguments, both for and against the term, before the court.

ANALYSIS

[3] The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[1] (the Act) imposes two important chronologies upon consumer proposals; the proposal must be completed within five years[2] and a default in any payments required by the proposal for three consecutive months results in a deemed annulment of the proposal[3]. A deemed annulment in a consumer proposal does not, as with conventional proposals, result automatically in bankruptcy. Rather, the party simply reverts to his/her pre-proposal circumstance, and creditors may pursue their remedies unhindered by the Act.

[4] Swinton J. of the Ontario Superior Court considered the effect of s. 66.31 in Re Wiggins[4]. Ms. Wiggins' situation is precisely the situation and statutory result that Mr. Hagen's term attempts to avoid; after Ms. Wiggins failed for three months to make her payments, her proposal was deemed annulled. Despite her deemed annulment, however, Ms. Wiggins' administrator "...allowed her to pay the arrears and has continued to make distributions to creditors as if the consumer proposal remained in effect."[5]

[5] After noting that the BIA contains no specific authority permitting the court to waive default after a deemed annulment, Swinton J. concluded[6] that neither does the court have any inherent jurisdiction to waive default once the proposal is deemed annulled. Simply put, any application to waive default or to amend the proposal must be done before the three month period expires.

[6] It is interesting to note that, despite this black letter law statement, the Superintendent issued a "Position Statement" in May of 2004 which recognized the potential difficulties for consumer proposals that Wiggins noted. The Superintendent therefore instructed Trustees that:

> If, despite the deemed annulment of a proposal, the debtor has fully satisfied his or her financial obligations under the proposal prior to the administrator / trustee taking the actions prescribed by section 66.31, the administrator / trustee must forthwith issue a Certificate of Full Performance.

In other words, Trustees were directed by the Superintendent to ignore the clear effect and direction given by Wiggins. The Superintendent's directive, apparently, was meant as a temporary solution to address possible inequities created by s. 66.31, and was to apply for 30 days, after which the Superintendent "...will insist on the rigorous application of section 66.31." It is hard to see how such a directive and consequent Certificate could withstand a challenge by, say, a creditor. Still, it points to the Superintendent's justifiable concern (in my view) that the deemed annulment aspect of s. 66.31 can have mischievous effects. The Superintendent gave further directions as to how Trustees were to treat deemed annulments if the debtor had resumed payments after a deemed annulment, but had not yet completed all required payments.

[7] It is also interesting to note that the Superintendent, following on ss. 5(4)(e) and 66.13(2) of the Act has prescribed Form 47 for use in Consumer Proposals, para. 6(a)(i) of which provides:

> The creditors may appoint up to three inspectors responsible for the consumer proposal of the consumer debtor. The inspectors may have, in addition to any powers of inspectors under the Act, the power to
> (i) receive any notice of default in the performance of a provision of the consumer proposal and waive any such default
> (Emphasis added)

As this form and its term imply, an attempt is made to fill a gap in the Act: there is no authority in the Act for inspectors in a Consumer Proposal to waive default. Mr. Christiansen points to the irony of the Superintendent promulgating a form which gives inspectors rights that the Act does not, while disagreeing with an analogous term respecting Trustees.

[8] Other authorities should be noted at this point. The authors of Bankruptcy & Insolvency Law of Canada[7] state:

Digitized by Google

> There can be a variety of plans put forward in a proposal. The only limits are the ingenuity of the draftsman and the necessity for finding terms which will be acceptable to creditors.

As well, in Re McManus[8], Low J., of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, concluded (albeit in respect of a proposal that was not a Consumer Proposal):

> Section 62(1) requires the trustee to file a copy of the proposal with the official receiver. It does not give the official receiver any discretion to refuse to accept it. It is nothing more than a procedural notice requirement. I can find nothing in the Act that gives the official receiver any control over the content of the proposal. Whether the proposal is legally valid and reasonable are judicial determinations which fall to the court under s. 59, not to the official receiver under s. 62(1).

These comments, taken together, in my view permit the Trustee and the debtor a great deal of flexibility in crafting a Consumer Proposal, the only limitation being that the proposed terms not offend or violate the terms of the Act. Moreover, the Superintendent's standing to question the legality of such terms is very limited.

[9] The Superintendent's representatives advised Mr. Hagen that, in addition to there being no authority in the Act for the inclusion of the impugned term, the Superintendent considered that the term created a conflict of interest for the Trustee. One assumes that the possible conflict arises from the Trustee's entitlement to a fee for his / her services, payment of which is given priority by s. 66.26(1). As Mr. Christiansen pointed out in argument, Trustees constantly balance rights, including, to a degree, theirs, in administering estates. Moreover, it is hard to see how the Trustee's rights might bear unduly on a decision to waive default; in waiving default and extending the time for completion of the proposal the Trustee would, presumably, wait for payment of his / her fee in the same manner that creditors await payment.

CONCLUSION

[10] I cannot, therefore, see how the impugned term offends, or is prohibited by, the Act. Its inclusion seems, with respect, aimed at the general purpose of insolvency legislation, namely to assist well intentioned but unfortunate debtors in ameliorating or rehabilitating their financial circumstances. While the specific authority for the provision is not found in the Act, the term is as reasonable and useful as the analogous provision suggested by the Superintendent in the promulgation of Form 47. Finally, the term comes well within the ambit of the observations of Houlden and Morowitz, above, at para. 8. The term is therefore a valid, permissible, and binding term for inclusion in Consumer Proposals.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE
IN BANKRUPCY AND INSOLVENCY
RE: IN THE MATTER OF the Consumer Proposal of Sally Teresa Wiggins
BEFORE: Swinton J.
COUNSEL: Sanjeev P.R. Mitra for the Administrator
Valerie Anderson for the Superintendent of Bankruptcy

HEARD: September 16, 2003
ENDORSEMENT

[1] The Administrator of the Consumer Proposal of Sally Teresa Wiggins and other individuals listed in Schedules A, B and C of the Motion Record sought a declaration that this Court has the inherent jurisdiction to waive default in a consumer proposal more than three months following the default and for other relief.

[2] Section 66.31(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended, provides:

Independently of section 66.3,

(a) where payments under a consumer proposal are to be made monthly or more frequently and the consumer debtor is in default to the extent of three months payments, or

(b) where payments under a consumer proposal are to be made less frequently than monthly and the consumer debtor is in default for more than three months on any payment,

the consumer proposal shall thereupon be deemed to be annulled unless the court has previously ordered otherwise or unless an amendment to the consumer proposal has previously been filed, and the administrator shall forthwith so inform the creditors and file a report thereof in the prescribed form with the official receiver.

[3] In this case, Ms. Wiggins failed to make payments for three months. She then resumed payments and made up the arrears. However, pursuant to s. 66.3(1), her consumer proposal was deemed annulled. Nevertheless, the Administrator allowed her to pay the arrears and has continued to make distributions to creditors as if the consumer proposal remained in effect.

[4] Mr. Justice Ground approved the omnibus procedure for this motion, which groups individuals like Ms. Wiggins in Schedule A and seeks an order waiving the default and setting aside the deemed annulment. Schedule B includes individuals who were in arrears over three months and who are making progress to make up the arrears. The Administrator seeks an order of waiver of the default, the setting aside of the deemed annulment and filing of an amended proposal, or the granting of leave to file a second consumer proposal. Finally, Schedule C consists of individuals who were in arrears over three months and who made unsuccessful attempts to catch up. An order is sought with respect to the distribution of funds held by the Administrator which were received after the deemed annulment.

[5] Decisions of the Registrar in both Nova Scotia and Ontario have held that there is no specific authority under the BIA to allow a court to waive the default by the debtor following the deemed annulment of a consumer proposal (Re Schrader reflex, (1999), 13 C.B.R. (4th) 256 (N.S. Reg.); Re Dziewiacien reflex, (2002), 37 C.B.R. (4th) 250 (Ont. Reg.)). Deputy Registrar Nettie in Re Dziewiacien held that s. 187(11) of the Act does not permit the court to extend a time period in the Act where there has been an intervening statutory event consequent upon default. That decision was not appealed.

[6] Section 183(1) of the Act vests the Superior Court of Justice in Ontario and the named courts in other jurisdictions with "such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable them to exercise original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy". The Administrator argued that this section confers inherent jurisdiction on this Court, which should be exercised in this case to waive the default and set aside the deemed annulment under the Act for debtors in Schedule A and B. Counsel for the Superintendent agreed with this position, based on the facts before me in this motion.

[7] The Bankruptcy Court may authorize and sanction acts required to be done by a trustee for the due administration and protection of the bankrupt estate, even though there is no specific provision in the Act (Re Tlustie (1923), 3 C.B.R. 654 (Ont. Reg.)). However, inherent jurisdiction can not be exercised if the exercise conflicts with the provisions of the Act (Wasserman Arsenault Ltd. v. Sone 2000 CanLII 22507 (ON SC), (2000), 22 C.B.R. (4th) 153 (Ont. S.C.J.), aff'd 2002 CanLII 41494 (ON CA), (2000), 33 C.B.R. (4th) 145 (Ont. C.A.)). Here, s. 66.31 deals specifically with what follows if the consumer debtor is in default in payments for three months: the consumer proposal is deemed annulled unless the court has ordered otherwise or unless an amendment to the proposal has been filed before the three month period expires.

Digitized by Google

[8] In my view, there is no inherent jurisdiction to waive a default like that of Ms. Wiggins and to set aside the deemed annulment of her consumer proposal, given the express terms of the Act. While Ontario courts may have granted the relief sought in this motion prior to the decision in Re Dziewiacien, in my view, they had no inherent jurisdiction to do so.

[9] Given that individuals like Ms. Wiggins and those in Schedule A have continued to make payments as if the consumer proposal were still in effect, and the Administrator has continued to make distributions, leave is given to this group to file a second consumer proposal, and I order that they are entitled to the relief in ss. 69-69.2. Given the payment history since the default, it appears that there is a reasonable prospect of the new proposal being accepted by the creditors.

[10] Given the history of the Schedule B debtors, I also grant leave to this group to file a second consumer proposal, and I order that they are entitled to the relief in ss. 69-69.2 for the same reason.

[11] With respect to Schedule C, the Administrator has asked for directions with respect to the distribution of funds which it received after the deemed annulment. According to Re White 2002 CanLII 25275 (NS SC), (2001), 31 C.B.R. (4th) 128 (N.S. Reg.), those funds should be distributed to the creditors.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE
IN BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY
In the Matter of the Proposal of Rosanna Joan Britton and Milton Author Britton of the City of Toronto, in the Province of Ontario
Court File No.: 31-370436/31-370437
June 21, 2005
Counsel: Philip J. Gertler – for the Administrator
Diane Tung – for the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy
Karen Smith
Heard: June 20, 2005
Reasons

[1] This was a motion by Beallor & Partners Inc., the Administrator of the joint consumer proposal of Rosanna Joan Britton and Milton Author Britton, (the "Brittons"), for an Order validating the Certificate of Full Performance issued by the Administrator in this matter on August 4, 2004, (the "Certificate"). The motion was served on the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the "OSB"), and all of the proposal creditors. Only the OSB appeared in response to the motion.

[2] The OSB indicated that it did not oppose the relief being sought by the Administrator. The OSB is taking issue only with the fees to be allowed the Administrator, and requires a date for the taxation of the Statement of Receipts and Disbursements, on which it has not provided a positive comment letter.

[3] In light of this, the Administrator would, prima facie, expect to receive the validation Order which it seeks. However, having read the materials filed, and having had the opportunity to hear from both counsel for the Administrator and the capable representatives of the OSB, I am not persuaded that it is an appropriate matter to exercise this Court's discretion and validate the Certificate, for the reasons that follow.

[4] It is now well settled in Ontario, starting from Re Dziewiacien reflex, (2002), 37 C.B.R. (4th) 250 (Superior Court of Justice), and as stated in Re Wiggins 2003 CanLII 15976 (ON SC), (2003), 67 O.R. (3d) 133 (Superior Court of Justice) by Swinton, J. at paragraph 9, that there is "no inherent jurisdiction to waive a default like that of [the Proponent] and to set aside the deemed annulment of [a] consumer proposal". Madam Justice Swinton went on to recognize that "while Ontario Courts may have granted the relief sought in this motion prior to the decision in Dziewiacien, Re, in my view, they had no inherent jurisdiction to do so". Prior to these two decisions, the practice had developed of applying to the Court for an Order waiving deemed annulments in consumer proposals. The development of a practice validating the issuance of Certificates of Full Performance is tantamount to the previous, now discarded, practice of waiving default. The only discernible difference is that Administrators will wait until after all monies have been paid and a Certificate of Full Performance granted, to come to Court to bless their actions. This does nothing to require Administrators to properly monitor payments on consumer proposals, and alert proponents when they are nearing the point of deemed annulment. It also renders the obligations of the Administrator under s. 66.31(2) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, (the "Act"), meaningless. In not providing for any mechanism to revive consumer proposals, which have been deemed annulled, Parliament must have intended their administration to be undertaken with great care, and, in fact, provided for detailed duties and consequences upon their deemed annulment.

[5] Contrast the Order being sought herein with the reasoning and decision of Swinton, J., in Wiggins where Her Honour provided for the making of second proposals by those proponents who were making their payments, but had previously been deemed annulled. This result recognizes the limitations of the Court's jurisdiction, and works within the Act to effect a pragmatic solution. The making of second proposals, essentially completion proposals, where the proponent proposes to pay all remaining payments under the annulled proposal to the creditors of that proposal seems a reasonable and legislatively authorized result. The validation of Certificates of Full Performance, after the fact, is not so clearly authorized by the Act, and does nothing to promote the careful administration of these proposals by the Administrator.

[6] I am cognizant of the Order made by Swinton, J., in Wiggins on December 12, 2003, wherein Her Honour, in effect, validated a number of Certificates of Full Performance. However, while I was provided a copy of the Order, I was not provided with any reasons for that Order, and can but conclude that there may have been specific facts in those Estates to warrant such an Order. I can find nothing in the case at bar to warrant such an Order. I find that it is contrary to the intent of the Act and Parliament to simply allow Administrators to carry on without regard to deemed annulment under the belief that if they carry on long enough, they can issue a Certificate of Full Performance and come to this Court to have that regularized. If the Administrator is not able to comply with s. 66.31(1)(a) of the Act to address a default and impending deemed annulment, then the proper procedure, from the cases cited, is to come to the Court, and seek an Order permitting the filing of a completion proposal. In that way, Certificates of Full Performance will continue to be able to be relied upon as, in fact, being certification that a proposal was fully performed – on time and in full, unless varied prior to annulment by the Court or the creditors. Of course, the tests for the relief set out by s. 66.32 of the Act, being a reasonable explanation for the default, and evidence of the likelihood of acceptance of a second proposal by the creditors, must be met.

[7] As a result, the relief sought in paragraph 1 of the Motion Record is denied. Having been issued after the deemed annulment of the Proposal, the Certificate is of no force and effect. Under the relief sought in paragraph 2 of the Motion Record, I do find it appropriate to Order that the Brittons are at liberty to file a second proposal to the creditors of the proposal that was deemed annulled. I find that they have satisfied me that, by their ultimate completion of payments, the default is reasonably excusable. I am also satisfied by the silence of the creditors in response to this motion, that a second proposal to those same creditors to complete the first proposal will likely meet with acceptance. The Administrator may retain any monies collected after deemed annulment, but not yet distributed, in trust pending the acceptance of another consumer proposal or return of the said monies to the Brittons upon rejection of another consumer proposal. The Brittons, upon making a further consumer proposal are entitled to the relief provided by ss. 69 to 69.2 of the Act.

[8] As for the desire of the OSB to tax the accounts of the Administrator, I concur with counsel for the Administrator that this hearing was not the proper forum for that. The OSB may require the Administrator to proceed to taxation of its Statement of Receipts and Disbursements in the usual manner, and cause a hearing date for that to be set.

[9] If necessary, I may be spoken to on costs.

Bankruptcy and insolvency -- Personal property security -- Company employee leasing vehicle -- Lessor failing to register financing statements under B.C. Personal Property Security Act and thus perfect its security interest -- Employee making assignment in bankruptcy -- Property of bankrupt vesting in trustee under Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act -- Unperfected security interest in collateral not effective against trustee under Personal Property Security Act -- Whether trustee entitled to proceeds of sale of vehicle -- Personal Property Security Act, S.B.C. 1989, c. 36, s. 20(b)(i) -- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, ss. 67(1), 71(2).

The respondent lessor leased a car to a company which in turn leased it to G, one of its employees. The lease between G and her employer was for more than one year and gave G the option of purchasing the vehicle from the lessor. Although the lessor was not a party to the lease agreement, it played an important role in the arrangement. The lessor received a deposit from G, it fixed the lease rates, and it was entitled to receive payments directly from G if her employer stopped paying her. The lessor and G were also named as the owners of the vehicle in the registration and insurance documents; the lessor was described as the "lessor" and G was described as the "lessee". G made an assignment in bankruptcy. Neither the lessor nor the employer had registered financing statements under the British Columbia Personal Property Security Act ("PPSA") in respect of their leases, with the result that the lessor's security interest in the car was not perfected. The lessor seized the vehicle and sold it with the appellant trustee's consent. The trustee subsequently brought a motion for an order that it was entitled to the proceeds of sale, relying on s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA, which provides that a security interest in collateral is not effective against a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of the bankruptcy. The lessor opposed the claim on the grounds that the bankrupt never owned the car and that the trustee could not have a better claim to the car than the bankrupt had. The trial judge held that the lessor's unperfected security interest was of no effect as against the trustee. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision and held that the proceeds properly belonged to the lessor.

Digitized by Google

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The definition of "security interest" in the PPSA explicitly includes leases for a term of more than one year. The lessor's interest in the car is the reservation of title in the car; this interest, created by the lease agreement, falls within the ambit of the PPSA. Since the lessor did not have possession of the car and did not register its security interest, it held an unperfected security interest in the car prior to the bankruptcy. The bankrupt's right to use and possession of the car constitutes "property" for the purposes of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"), which passed to the trustee by virtue of s. 71(2). Section 12(2) of the PPSA also recognizes that a lessee obtains a proprietary interest in leased goods. Here, the trustee's possessory interest in the car comes into competition with the unperfected security interest of the lessor. On a plain reading of s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA, the lessor's interest in the car is ineffective against the trustee. While the effect of s. 20(b)(i), on the present facts, is that the trustee ends up with full rights to the car when the bankrupt had only a right of use and possession, s. 20(b)(i) modifies the principle that a trustee is limited to the rights in the property enjoyed by the bankrupt. The issue is not ownership of the vehicle, but rather priority to it. Although federal bankruptcy legislation provides that a trustee shall step into the shoes of the bankrupt and as a general rule acquires no higher right in the property of the bankrupt than that which the bankrupt enjoyed, it is a policy choice of the legislature that an unsecured creditor's position, as represented by the trustee, is more meritorious than the unperfected security interest of a secured creditor.

The trustee can sell the car and confer good title. The lessor could have made a claim against the car under s. 81 of the BIA. This claim would have been defeated by the trustee in reliance on s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA. Both the defeat of a claim and the failure to make a claim under s. 81 result in the effective abandonment or relinquishment of any claim to the car.

Section 20(b)(i) of the PPSA does not offend the priorities set out in the BIA, but rather is only one element of the provincial legislation which serves to define the rights of the parties involved in a bankruptcy. More particularly, s. 20(b)(i) serves, on the present facts, to define the rights of the lessor and indicates that for the purpose of the bankruptcy, the lessor does not have the status of a secured creditor. Even though bankruptcy is clearly a federal matter, and even though it has been established that the federal Parliament alone can determine distribution priorities, the BIA is dependent on provincial property and civil rights legislation in order to inform the terms of the BIA and the rights of the parties involved in the bankruptcy.

Since s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA provides that the lessor's unperfected security interest is ineffective against the interest acquired by the trustee, the trustee need not make an election under s. 30(1)(k) of the BIA in order to realize its interest in the car.

G did not hold the car on resulting trust for the lessor, since the contract of lease does not contemplate the creation of a trust.

1 IACOBUCCI J. -- The principal question raised by this appeal is whether s. 20(b)(i) of the Personal Property Security Act, S.B.C. 1989, c. 36 ("PPSA"), can render a lessor's unperfected security interest in personal property ineffective against the rights acquired in the property by the trustee in bankruptcy, which finds its authority under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). I conclude that s. 20(b)(i) operates, on the present facts, to defeat the unperfected security interest of the respondent Telecom Leasing Canada (TLC) Limited (the "lessor"), in favour of the interest acquired by the appellant R. West & Associates Inc. (the "trustee").

2 Constitutional questions were raised in this appeal; however, in my view of the case, it is not necessary to address these issues. A reading of the provisions of the BIA and the PPSA in question reveals that no conflict arises in the operation of the legislation.

1. Facts

3 On October 27, 1992, the lessor leased a 1993 Saturn car to the B.C. Telephone Company, which in turn leased the car to one of its employees, Carol Anne Giffen (the "bankrupt"). The bankrupt and her employer were parties to the agreement of lease entitled "Employee Agreement Personal Vehicle Lease Program/Flex Lease Program". The term of the lease was for more than one year. The lease gave the bankrupt the option of purchasing the vehicle from the lessor.

4 Although the lessor was not a party to the agreement, it played an important role in the arrangement contemplated by the agreement. More specifically, the lessor received a deposit from the bankrupt, it fixed the lease rates, and it was entitled to receive payments directly from the lessee/bankrupt if her employer stopped paying her. Further, the lessor and the bankrupt were named as the owners of the vehicle in the registration and insurance documents relating to the vehicle; the lessor was described as the "lessor" and the bankrupt was described as the "lessee".

5 The bankrupt made an assignment in bankruptcy on October 12, 1993. Neither the lessor nor the B.C. Telephone Company had registered financing statements under the PPSA in respect of their leases. The failure to register meant that the lessor's security interest in the car was not perfected, as defined in the PPSA, at the time of the assignment in bankruptcy.

6 The appellant was appointed as the trustee in bankruptcy. The lessor seized the vehicle and sold it with the trustee's consent; proceeds of $10,154.54 were held in trust by the lessor's counsel. The trustee subsequently brought a motion for an order that it was entitled to the proceeds of sale relying on s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA. The lessor opposed the claim on the grounds that the bankrupt never owned the car and that the trustee could not have a better claim to the car than the bankrupt had.

7 Hood J. of the Supreme Court of British Columbia held that, by virtue of s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA, the unperfected security interest of the lessor was of no effect as against the trustee. Hood J. ordered that the proceeds from the sale of the vehicle be paid over to the trustee. The lessor appealed to the Court of Appeal for British Columbia; the Attorney General of British Columbia was granted leave to intervene as a party respondent in the appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and held that the proceeds properly belonged to the lessor.

3. Judicial History

A. British Columbia Supreme Court reflex, (1994), 90 B.C.L.R. (2d) 326

9 Hood J. held that the trustee was entitled to the proceeds from the car. He began his analysis by examining the relationship between the parties and found that the respondent was the lessor and the bankrupt was the lessee of the car, even though the respondent was not party to the lease agreement. He also found that the lease agreement, which was for a period of more than one year, was a "security interest" for the purposes of the PPSA.

10 Hood J. analysed the holding of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in International Harvester Credit Corp. of Canada Ltd. v. Bell's Dairy Ltd. (Trustee of) (1986), 61 C.B.R. (N.S.) 193. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal found that a trustee in bankruptcy may acquire a higher interest in property than that enjoyed by the bankrupt through the operation of the PPSA. The court also concluded, in accordance with the Saskatchewan PPSA, that a lessor's security interest is subordinate to the interest of a trustee in bankruptcy where the lessor failed to perfect its interest. Hood J. added that the trustee's claim in the present case was even stronger than that of the trustee in International Harvester since s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA provides that an unperfected security interest will be "not effective against" a trustee in bankruptcy whereas the Saskatchewan equivalent provides that an unperfected security interest will be "subordinate to" the interest of a trustee in bankruptcy.

11 Hood J. held that the PPSA applied on the facts and in so doing he rejected the lessor's argument that this was a matter of exclusive federal jurisdiction governed by the BIA. He noted that the constitutionality of the PPSA was not in issue before him, and that in Paccar Financial Services Ltd. v. Sinco Trucking Ltd. (Trustee of), 1989 CanLII 287 (SK CA), [1989] 3 W.W.R. 481 (Sask. C.A.), the Saskatchewan equivalent to s. 20(b)(i) was held to be constitutionally valid.

12 The learned trial judge rejected the lessor's argument that the trustee had disclaimed the property by failing to elect to retain the lease under s. 30(1)(k) of the BIA. He found that this argument ignored the statutory rights granted to the trustee under s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA. Hood J. also dismissed the lessor's argument that a resulting trust existed between the bankrupt and the lessor, and therefore the vehicle did not form part of the bankrupt's estate, as provided by s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA. In Hood J.'s view, the equitable principle of resulting trust could not usurp the clear provisions of the PPSA and the rights it conferred upon the trustee. The lessor had also argued that the trustee was estopped from claiming that the vehicle was part of the bankrupt's estate, given that the bankrupt signed a statement of affairs which referred to the vehicle as "fully encumbered". Hood J. stated that the bankrupt's conduct or view of her interest was not determinative of the question of law at issue.

13 Hood J. concluded that the trustee was entitled to the net sale proceeds from the vehicle, together with an accounting.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal 1996 CanLII 1429 (BC CA), (1996), 16 B.C.L.R. (3d) 29

14 Finch J.A., Macfarlane and Wood JJ.A. concurring, overturned Hood J. and held that the lessor was entitled to the proceeds of the car.

15 Finch J.A. disagreed with the reasoning and the result in International Harvester, which had been followed by the trial judge. In his view, both International Harvester and Hood J.'s decision in the case on appeal failed to account for the role of the BIA in the circumstances of a bankruptcy. Section 67 of the BIA provides that the trustee in bankruptcy shall receive only the "property of the bankrupt" thus there was no legitimate basis for granting to a trustee in bankruptcy a greater claim to the property than that which the bankrupt enjoyed. Finch J.A. held (at p. 40) that to allow the trustee a greater claim to the property than the bankrupt had would "overlook fundamental concepts of bankruptcy law" as expressed in Fleeming v. Howden (1868), L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 372 (H.L.), and Flintoft v. Royal Bank of Canada, 1964 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1964] S.C.R. 631.

16 Finch J.A. rejected the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal's characterization of the trustee as "a representative of the creditors of the bankrupt", and he found that the Saskatchewan Court erred in relying on Re Perepeluk; Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Touche Ross Ltd., reflex, [1986] 2 W.W.R. 631 (Sask. C.A.), as authority for that proposition. He did not find that Perepeluk "[laid] down any broad statement of principle to the effect that the trustee's obligation is to the creditors as opposed to the bankrupt" (p. 42). Further, Finch J.A. noted that the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal failed to consider that a trustee is an officer of the court, appointed to stand in the bankrupt's shoes and to represent the bankrupt's interests, even where those interests are adverse to the interests of the creditors. With these principles in mind, Finch J.A. underlined that the trustee could only succeed to the rights of the bankrupt.

17 Finch J.A. distinguished Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., 1977 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 753, which the appellant Attorney General cited in support of the argument that assets other than those of the bankrupt may be distributed upon bankruptcy. Finch J.A. held that recovering for a bankrupt's estate property which the bankrupt had unlawfully concealed is not comparable to the present circumstances where provincial legislation operates to add to the bankrupt's estate property which never belonged to the bankrupt.

18 Finch J.A. also considered Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, where this Court held that valid provincial workers' compensation legislation was inoperative where it conflicted with federal priorities as established by the BIA. The lessor argued that Husky Oil stood for the proposition that provincial legislation can neither remove nor add something to a bankrupt's estate owing to the primacy of the priority scheme of the BIA. Finch J.A. reviewed Gonthier J.'s comments in Husky Oil regarding the analysis which must be undertaken to determine whether two laws are in operational conflict. He then found that s. 20(b)(i) and the BIA do conflict since s. 20(b)(i) purports to define the property of the bankrupt in a way which is inconsistent with the definition provided in the BIA. He further found that s. 20(b)(i) is inconsistent with the BIA since it permits property which does not belong to the bankrupt to be distributed among the bankrupt's creditors.

19 Finch J.A. stated that the real question at issue is who holds title to the car. That is, did the bankrupt or the trustee in bankruptcy obtain title to the vehicle by reason of the lessor's failure to register its security interest? The bankrupt acquired only a right to use the car and a contingent future right of purchase. The learned judge concluded that s. 20(b)(i) cannot possibly have the effect of transferring title from the lessor, the true owner, to the trustee in bankruptcy because this would give the trustee greater proprietary rights in the car than the bankrupt enjoyed.

20 Finch J.A. rejected the argument that Re Nishi Industries, reflex, [1978] 6 W.W.R. 736 (B.C.C.A.), in which the British Columbia Conditional Sales Act, 1961, S.B.C. 1961, c. 9, was held to be constitutionally valid and was found to give a trustee in bankruptcy priority over a secured creditor, supported the trustee's position. He distinguished that case on the basis that, under a conditional sale or chattel mortgage, the mortgagee or the purchaser acquires a property interest, whereas in the present case the lessee does not acquire a property interest in the collateral. Rather, the bankrupt held only the right to possess the car while payments were being made.

21 Finch J.A. also dismissed the lessor's argument based on s. 30(1)(k) of the BIA, under which a trustee may elect to retain a lease. Finch J.A. found that s. 30(1)(k) applied only to leases of property belonging to the bankrupt and had no application where the bankrupt has leased the property of another.

22 Finding it unnecessary to address the other issues raised by the lessor or to deal with the constitutional questions raised by the Attorney General, Finch J.A. allowed the appeal and directed that the proceeds be paid to the lessor.

4. Issues

23 There is one principal issue in the present appeal: can s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA extinguish the lessor's right to the car in favour of the trustee's interest, or is the operation of s. 20(b)(i) limited by certain provisions of the BIA?

24 In my view, this issue can be resolved through a normal reading of the relevant provisions of both the PPSA and the BIA, buttressed by the policy considerations supporting these provisions.

5. Analysis

A. The Locus of Title Is Not Determinative

25 At the outset, it is important to note that the Court of Appeal's holding in the present appeal rests on the principle that the "property of the bankrupt" shall vest in the trustee (s. 71(2) BIA) and that only the property of the bankrupt shall be distributed among the bankrupt's creditors (s. 67(1) BIA). In the opinion of the Court of Appeal, the bankrupt, as lessee, did not have a proprietary interest in the car, and since the trustee obtains its entitlements to the contents of the bankrupt's estate through the bankrupt, the trustee cannot assert a proprietary interest in the car. In my view, the Court of Appeal, with respect, erred fundamentally in focussing on the locus of title and in holding that the lessor's common law ownership interest prevailed despite the clear meaning of s. 20(b)(i).

26 The Court of Appeal did not recognize that the provincial legislature, in enacting the PPSA, has set aside the traditional concepts of title and ownership to a certain extent. T. M. Buckwold and R. C. C. Cuming, in their article "The Personal Property Security Act and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: Two Solitudes or Complementary Systems?" (1997), 12 Banking& Finance L. Rev. 467, at pp. 469-70, underline the fact that provincial legislatures, in enacting personal property security regimes, have redefined traditional concepts of rights in property:

> Simply put, the property rights of persons subject to provincial legislation are what the legislature determines them to be. While a statutory definition of rights may incorporate common law concepts in whole or in part, it is open to the legislature to redefine or revise those concepts as may be required to meet the objectives of its legislation. This was done in the provincial PPSAs, which implement a new conceptual approach to the definition and assertion of rights in and to personal property falling within their scope. The priority and realization provisions of the Acts revolve around the central statutory concept of "security interest". The rights of parties to a transaction that creates a security interest are explicitly not dependent upon either the form of the transaction or upon traditional questions of title. Rather, they are defined by the Act itself. [Emphasis added.]

27 In International Harvester, supra, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal recognized that the regime put in place to regulate competing interests in personal property does not turn on title to the collateral (at p. 204):

> There is nothing in the language of the section [s. 20 of the Saskatchewan PPSA which is the equivalent of s. 20 of the British Columbia PPSA], or its relationship with other sections, or indeed in the overall scheme of the Act to suggest, for example, that an unperfected security interest, because it is rooted in and attached to the title of particular goods in the possession of a debtor, should be treated as superior to the more generally derived and broadly attached interest which an execution creditor comes to have in a debtor's goods. Indeed, the very opposite is suggested not only by the language of the section, but by the overall thrust of the Act.

28 The Court of Appeal in the present appeal did not look past the traditional concepts of title and ownership. But this dispute cannot be resolved through the determination of who has title to the car because the dispute is one of priority to the car and not ownership in it. It is in this context that the PPSA must be given its intended effect and it is to this question that I now wish to turn.

B. Definition of "Security Interest"

29 The PPSA applies to "every transaction that in substance creates a security interest, without regard to its form and without regard to the person who has title to the collateral" (s. 2(1)(a)).

30 Section 1 of the PPSA defines "security interest", in part, as "an interest in goods, chattel paper, a security, a document of title, an instrument, money or an intangible that secures payment or performance of an obligation". This definition is elaborated upon by paragraph 1(a)(iii) of the PPSA, which provides that "security interest" means the interest of "a lessor under a lease for a term of more than one year, whether or not the interest secures payment or performance of an obligation" (emphasis added). Further, s. 3 of the PPSA deems certain agreements, which do not secure payment or performance of an obligation, to be security agreements for the purposes of the PPSA. Section 3 includes leases "for a term of more than one year that do not secure payment or performance of an obligation".

31 The elements of the definition of "security interest" explicitly include within the definition of "security interest" leases for a term of more than one year. The lessor's interest in the car is the reservation of title in the car; this interest, created by the lease agreement, falls within the ambit of the PPSA.

C. The Nature of the Lessor's Interest in the Car

32 A security interest is valid and enforceable when it attaches to personal property. Section 12(1)(b) of the PPSA provides that a security interest "attaches" when the debtor acquires "rights in the collateral". Section 12(2) states explicitly that "a debtor has rights in goods leased to the debtor . . . when he obtains possession of them in accordance with the lease". Thus, upon delivery of the car to the bankrupt, the lessor had a valid security interest in the car that could be asserted against the lessee and against a third party claiming a right in the car. However, the lessor's security interest remained vulnerable to the claims of third parties who obtain an interest in the car through the lessee including, trustees in bankruptcy. In order to protect its security interest from such claims, the lessor must therefore perfect its interest through registration of its interest (s. 25), or repossession of the collateral (s. 24). The lessor did not have possession of the car, and it did not register its security interest. Thus, prior to the bankruptcy, the lessor held an unperfected security interest in the car. This brings us to the BIA.

D. The Bankrupt's Interest in the Car Vests in the Trustee

33 Section 71(2) of the BIA provides that, upon an assignment into bankruptcy, the bankrupt's "property . . . shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee". Section 2 of the BIA defines "property" very broadly to include "every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property".

34 In my opinion, the bankrupt's right to use and possession of the car constitutes "property" for the purposes of the BIA and the trustee, by virtue of s. 71(2) of the BIA, succeeds to this proprietary right. I find support for this conclusion in Paccar Financial Services, supra, where the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal held that "property" as it is used in the BIA is "broad enough to include a leasehold interest" (at p. 494, citing Re Cadieux and Jas. A. Ogilvy's Ltd. (1952), 33 C.B.R. 15 (Que. Sup. Ct.), at p. 16).

35 The trustee assumes the bankrupt's possessory interest in the car through the operation of s. 71(2); it is upon this basis that the trustee can assert a claim to the car.

36 I note that s. 12(2) of the PPSA also recognizes that a lessee obtains a proprietary interest in leased goods. Section 12(2) states explicitly that "a debtor has rights in goods leased to the debtor . . . when he obtains possession of them in accordance with the lease" (emphasis added). Thus, s. 12 operates to "deem or recognize that a lessee has a proprietary interest" (Buckwold and Cuming, supra, at p. 471). The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal considered a provision similar to s. 12 of the British Columbia PPSA in International Harvester and held that (at p. 206):

> . . . a trustee in bankruptcy, upon whom there devolves a chattel in the possession of the bankrupt under a commercial lease for a term exceeding a year, succeeds to the contractual or "possessory" interest of the bankrupt in that chattel, as well as the bankrupt's statutory or "proprietary" interest therein as conferred upon the debtor by s. 12 of the Act. [Emphasis added.]

37 From the perspective of both the PPSA and the BIA the bankrupt, as lessee, can be described as having a proprietary interest in the car.

E. The Priority Contest and the Operation of Section 20(b)(i)

(i) Purpose of Section 20(b)(i)

38 The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal explained the theory behind s. 20 of the Saskatchewan PPSA in International Harvester (at pp. 204-5). A person with an interest rooted in title to property in the possession of another, once perfected, can, in the event of default by the debtor, look to the property ahead of all others to satisfy his claim. However, if that interest is not perfected, it is vulnerable, even though it is rooted in title to the goods (at p. 205):

> A third party may derive an interest in the same goods by virtue of some dealing with the person in possession of them, and . . . he may become entitled to priority. That is, he may become entitled, ahead of the person holding the unperfected security interest, to look to the goods to satisfy his claim.

Public disclosure of the security interest is required to prevent innocent third parties from granting credit to the debtor or otherwise acquiring an interest in the collateral. However, public disclosure of the security interest does not seem to be required to protect a trustee who is not in the position of an innocent third party; rather, the trustee succeeds to the interests of the bankrupt. In one authority's opinion, trustees are given the capacity to defeat unperfected security interests because of the "representative capacity of the trustee and the effect of bankruptcy on the enforcement rights of unsecured creditors" (R. C. C. Cuming, "Canadian Bankruptcy Law: A Secured Creditor's Heaven" (1994), 24 Can. Bus. L.J. 17, at pp. 27-28).

39 Prior to a bankruptcy, unsecured creditors can make claims against the debtor through provincial judgment enforcement measures. Successful claims will rank prior to unperfected security interests pursuant to s. 20. Once a bankruptcy occurs, however, all claims are frozen and the unsecured creditors must look to the trustee in bankruptcy to assert their claims. Cuming describes the purpose of s. 20(b)(i) (at p. 29):

Digitized by Google

> In effect, the judgment enforcement rights of unsecured creditors are merged in the bankruptcy proceedings and the trustee is now the representative of creditors who can no longer bring their claims to a "perfected" status under provincial law. As the repository of enforcement rights, the trustee has status under s. 20(b)(i) of the BCPPSA to attack the unperfected security interest.

40 The purpose behind granting a trustee in bankruptcy the power to defeat unperfected security interests was recognized by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in International Harvester (at p. 206):

> Indeed, the fact that a trustee in bankruptcy is a representative of creditors serves to shed light on more than one aspect of the issue. It explains -- or at least assists in the explanation of -- why a trustee in bankruptcy is included in s. 20, as well as why a trustee is not necessarily confined to the interest of the bankrupt.

41 The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal again acknowledged the representative role of the trustee in bankruptcy in Paccar Financial Services, which also involved a priority contest between a trustee and the unperfected security interest of a lessor. The court stated that the trustee, after bankruptcy, acts as the representative of the unsecured creditors of the bankrupt and asserts "the claim of the unsecured creditors to the goods and possessions of the bankrupt pursuant to the priorities established for competing perfected and unperfected security interests. It is simply a contest as between an unsecured creditor and the holder of an unperfected security interest" (p. 490).

42 The Court of Appeal erred, in my view, in not recognizing that the purpose of s. 20(b)(i) is, at least in part, to permit the unsecured creditors to maintain, through the person of the trustee, the same status vis-à-vis secured creditors who have not perfected their security interests which they enjoyed prior to the bankruptcy of the debtor.

(ii) The Present Appeal and Section 20(b)(i)

43 In the present appeal, the trustee's possessory interest in the car, acquired through the bankrupt under the authority of the BIA, comes into competition with the unperfected security interest of the lessor. Section 20(b)(i) of the PPSA states explicitly that a security interest in collateral "is not effective against a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of the bankruptcy". On a plain reading of s. 20(b)(i), the lessor's interest in the car is ineffective against the trustee.

44 Section 20(b)(i) does not grant title or any other proprietary interest to the trustee, but it prevents the lessor from exercising rights against the trustee. Admittedly, the effect of s. 20(b)(i), on the present facts, is that the trustee ends up with full rights to the car when the bankrupt had only a right of use and possession. The Court of Appeal refused to accept this result because, in its view, it violated fundamental concepts of bankruptcy law. In this respect, the Court of Appeal cites Fleeming, supra, and Flintoft, supra, in support of the proposition that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot receive a greater interest in the property than the bankrupt had at the time of the bankruptcy.

45 With respect, I disagree with the Court of Appeal for two reasons: first, Fleeming and Flintoft can be distinguished; and second, s. 20(b)(i) modifies the principle that a trustee is limited to the rights in the property enjoyed by the bankrupt.

46 Both Fleeming and Flintoft involved circumstances where the contested property was held on trust by the bankrupt and therefore did not form part of the bankrupt's estate. Consider the following statement of Lord Chelmsford from Fleeming (at pp. 380-81):

> The general principle of every Bankrupt Act is, that the person in whom the estate vests for distribution under the bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt exactly as he himself held it. Lord Elphinstone at the time of his death was a mere trustee under a condition to denude in favour of Lady Hawarden, consequently the estate could only vest in the trustee under the sequestration subject to this condition. . . .
> It appears to me, therefore, that the lands in question were not part of the heritable estate of the bankrupt which, within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act, would vest in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors.

47 Lords Cranworth, Westbury and Colonsay all agreed that Lord Elphinstone was vested with the disputed property as a mere trustee and for that reason the property could not vest in the trustee in bankruptcy appointed for Lord Elphinstone's estate (at pp. 378-80, 383-84, and 385, respectively).

48 In Flintoft, a dispute arose between a bank and a trustee in bankruptcy over the ownership of uncollected debts owing to the debtor at bankruptcy. The debts arose from the sale by the debtor of goods covered by valid Bank Act security. An express trust protected the bank's interest in the debtor's book debts; the debtor also assigned its interest in the debts to the bank. The basis of the trustee's challenge was that the assignment of book debts held by the bank was void for lack of timely registration. The court held that the trust sustained the bank's interest in the book debts; trust property is excluded from the property of the bankrupt. Consequently, the bank's failure to register the assignment did not result in the book debts falling into the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy.

Digitized by Google

49 The trustee in bankruptcy cannot succeed to property held on trust by the bankrupt. This principle appears to be the source of comments made in Fleeming and Flintoft to the effect that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot take a greater interest than the bankrupt had. In my view, the proposition stated in these cases (that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot take a greater interest in property than the bankrupt had) should be restricted to the context in which they were made, namely, where the disputed property is held on trust by the bankrupt debtor. However, the bankrupt in the case on appeal did not hold the car on trust for the lessor.

50 I accept that there is a principle which provides that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot obtain a greater interest to the goods than the bankrupt (beyond the context of a trust where the goods are not property of the bankrupt). However, s. 20(b)(i) itself modifies that principle. Cases decided prior to the Court of Appeal decision in the case on appeal have consistently accepted that s. 20(b)(i), or its equivalent, can give the trustee a greater interest in the disputed property than that enjoyed by the bankrupt.

51 In International Harvester, the lessor of vehicles failed to register one security interest and improperly registered another. The lessee went bankrupt. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal had to determine the nature of the interest that the trustee had in the vehicles. The Saskatchewan PPSA had a provision very similar to s. 20(b)(i), except it provided that an unperfected security interest shall be "subordinate to" the interest of a trustee in bankruptcy (as opposed to "not effective against"). The lessor argued that this provision could not be interpreted to permit the trustee to acquire a greater interest in property than the bankrupt had.

52 The court acknowledged that federal bankruptcy legislation provides that a trustee shall step into the shoes of the bankrupt and "as a general rule acquires no higher right in the property of the bankrupt than that which the bankrupt enjoyed" (p. 200). The court then considered the policy considerations supporting the PPSA regime and the potential for mischief which arises in security transactions where title to property is separated from possession of that property. Provincial legislatures, faced with a policy choice involving the competing interests of the true owner and those of third parties dealing with the ostensible owner, have decided that the true owner must forfeit title, when faced with a competing interest, if she failed to register her interest as required. The court also noted that true leases were not regulated by the personal property regimes until recently. Thus, "as a general rule the common law did not allow the lessor's title to leased goods to be defeated through some dealing of the lessee. However, the Personal Property Security Act has effected far-reaching changes to the law" (p. 201).

53 The court stated that to find that the trustee in bankruptcy cannot have a greater claim to the goods than the bankrupt enjoyed would (at p. 205) > require resort to traditional common law concepts, to form over substance, to a technical construction of the term "interest", and to the defeat of the policy choice made by the legislature in choosing, as it did, to include within the scope of the Act a true lease of goods. It would render the section largely, if not wholly, ineffective in this instance. . . .

54 International Harvester was followed in Donaghy v. CNS Vehicle Leasing, 1992 CanLII 6150 (AB QB), [1992] 6 W.W.R. 70 (Alta. Q.B.), where a lessee leased a vehicle in Ontario and then moved to Alberta. The lessor failed to register its security interest in the vehicle in Alberta. The lessee went bankrupt and a contest developed between the trustee in bankruptcy and the lessor. The court found for the trustee. The court stated that the issue was not ownership of the vehicle, but rather priority to it. The court recognized that, for the purposes of priority, the PPSA replaces the common law principle that one cannot transfer better title than she possesses. It is a policy choice of the legislature that an unsecured creditor's position, as represented by the trustee, is more meritorious than the unperfected security interest of a secured creditor.

55 In David Morris Fine Cars Ltd. v. North Sky Trading Inc. (Trustee of), 1996 ABCA 134 (CanLII), [1996] 7 W.W.R. 332 (Alta. C.A.), a car dealer leased a car to a corporation; the corporation went bankrupt. The lease was not registered. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed priority to the car. The court dealt primarily with the car dealer's argument that it was exempt from the registration requirement because the lease was out of its ordinary course of business. The court held that the car dealer was not entitled to the exemption and that the trustee's interest in the car prevailed. The court made the following comments at para. 16:

> We endorse the view of the chambers judge that the PPSA is consumer protection legislation which in many respects gives a trustee in bankruptcy greater rights than the bankrupt, and which would be undermined by the application of the common law principle that one cannot give what one does not possess.

56 I agree with the decisions of the courts that have held that the principle that a trustee in bankruptcy cannot obtain greater rights to the property than the bankrupt had has been modified through the policy choices of the legislatures represented in s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA, and its equivalents in other provinces.

F. The Trustee Can Confer Clear Title

57 Title could not defeat the trustee's claim under s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA, but does the lessor's retention of title and the principle of nemo dat quod non habet prevent the trustee from selling the car, conferring clear title, and distributing its proceeds under the BIA?

58 Section 81 of the BIA provides a procedure through which third parties can file claims with the trustee against "property . . . in the possession of a bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy". Subsection 81(2) provides that where the trustee disputes a claim, and the claimant does not appeal within the prescribed time period, then the claimant is "deemed to have abandoned or relinquished all his right to or interest in the property to the trustee who thereupon may sell or dispose of the property free of any lien, right, title or interest of the claimant". Section 81 does not specifically deal with the circumstances where a claimant's claim is defeated, but presumably the trustee would be able to sell the good free of the claim.

59 The lessor could have made a claim under s. 81 of the BIA. This claim would have been defeated by the trustee in reliance on s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA. In my view, both the defeat of a claim and the failure to make a claim under s. 81 result in the effective abandonment or relinquishment of any claim to the car; the trustee can therefore sell the car and confer good title.

G. The Federal Priority Scheme, Which Is Subject to the Rights of Secured Creditors, Is Not Disturbed

60 Section 136 of the BIA sets out a priority scheme for the division of the property of the bankrupt; the interests of the various creditors are all "[s]ubject to the rights of secured creditors". Section 67 describes that which constitutes the property of the bankrupt.

61 This Court has held on a number of occasions that provincial legislatures cannot enact legislation which operates to interfere with the priority of distribution set out in the BIA, nor can they confer secured creditor status on a class of creditors not entitled to such status under the BIA. A very recent example is Husky Oil, supra, where a majority of the Court held that s. 133 of the Workers' Compensation Act, 1979, S.S. 1979, c. W-17.1, was inapplicable in a bankruptcy because it operated to secure the Workers' Compensation Board's claim against the bankrupt's estate in violation of the priority of the Board's claim as set out in s. 136 of the BIA.

62 Previous to Husky Oil were the so-called "quartet" of judgments on this issue. In Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35, and Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 785, this Court held that a province cannot claim to be a secured creditor in a bankruptcy pursuant to provincial legislation where the Crown claim is listed as a preferred claim with a particular ranking in the BIA. In Federal Business Development Bank v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 1061, the Court held that, where a secured creditor liquidates his security outside the bankruptcy proceedings, the property constituting the security is still property of the bankrupt and payment from the proceeds must be determined by the federal bankruptcy priorities and not in accordance with provincial law. Finally, in British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24, the Court held that the province cannot deem a statutory trust to remove property from the estate of a bankrupt and thereby create its own priorities.

63 The Court of Appeal applied this Court's decision in Husky Oil to conclude that a provincial law cannot add to the estate of a bankrupt property which the bankrupt never had. In my view, the Court of Appeal erred in its characterization of s. 20(b)(i). Section 20(b)(i) of the PPSA does not offend the priorities set out in the BIA as interpreted by the quartet and Husky Oil; rather, s. 20(b)(i) is but one element of the provincial legislation which serves to define the rights of the parties involved in a bankruptcy. More particularly, s. 20(b)(i) serves, on the present facts, to define the rights of the lessor and indicates that for the purpose of the bankruptcy, the lessor does not have the status of a secured creditor.

64 Even though bankruptcy is clearly a federal matter, and even though it has been established that the federal Parliament alone can determine distribution priorities, the BIA is dependent on provincial property and civil rights legislation in order to inform the terms of the BIA and the rights of the parties involved in the bankruptcy. Section 72(1) of the BIA contemplates interaction with provincial legislation.

65 This Court has recognized the important role that provincial legislation plays in the event of bankruptcy in Husky Oil. Gonthier J. stated, at p. 481:

> It is trite to observe that the Bankruptcy Act is contingent on the provincial law of property for its operation. The Act is superimposed on those provincial schemes when a debtor declares bankruptcy. As a result, provincial law necessarily affects the "bottom line", but this is contemplated by the Bankruptcy Act itself.

And I stated the following for the minority in Husky Oil, at p. 531:

Digitized by Google

> [P]rovincial legislation is deeply involved in determining the priority, registration, and amount of indebtedness in the bankruptcy process. In fact, the proprietary and contractual rights that are regulated by the bankruptcy process are usually created by virtue of provincial law.

66 J. S. Ziegel lucidly underlined the role which provincial law plays in bankruptcy in his article "Personal Property Security and Bankruptcy: There Is No War!" (1993), 72 Can. Bar Rev. 44, at p. 50:

> The answer is confirmed by the opening words of section 136(1), "Subject to the rights of secured creditors . . .". How are those rights (and obligations) to be determined? Since the Bankruptcy [and Insolvency] Act does not spell them out the reply must surely be: by consulting the law that gave them birth, and that law, in the absence of conflicting federal prescriptions, also determines what conditions and restrictions are imposed on the recognition and enforceability of the security interest.

67 Section s. 20(b)(i) does not reorder federal priorities. Compliance with the perfection requirements of the PPSA is a precondition to maintaining secured creditor status under the BIA. In the event of bankruptcy, the consequences of a failure to perfect are spelled out in s. 20(b)(i). In effect, the secured party with an unperfected security interest becomes an unsecured creditor of the bankrupt:

> . . . any secured party with a security interest in personal property, who fails to meet the requirements of the Act for perfecting its security interest prior to the date a petition is filed or an assignment is made, loses the status of a secured creditor in the bankruptcy and is relegated to unsecured status.

H. Other Arguments

68 The respondent raised three other arguments which I need discuss only briefly. The lessor submits that s. 30(1)(k) of the BIA requires that the trustee either elect to retain or disclaim its rights to any property leased by the bankrupt. The lessor argues that, if the trustee did have any proprietary rights to the car, these rights were disclaimed as a result of the trustee's failure to retain the lease by making the lease payments.

69 In my view, s. 30(1)(k) of the BIA has no bearing on the resolution of the present appeal. Section 20(b)(i) provides that the lessor's unperfected security interest is ineffective against the interest acquired by the trustee; the trustee need not make an election under s. 30(1)(k) of the BIA in order to realize its interest in the car. If the lessor had a valid and enforceable security interest in the car then the trustee could choose, pursuant to s. 30(1)(k), to continue with the lease or return the car to the lessor, but none of that applies in this case.

70 The respondent also submits that the bankrupt held the car on resulting trust for the lessor; consequently, by virtue of s. 67(1) of the BIA, the car is excluded from the "property of the bankrupt". Like the trial judge, I find no merit in this argument. The contract of lease does not contemplate the creation of a trust. Further, a resulting trust arises only where > legal or equitable title to property is in one party's name, but that party, because he is a fiduciary or gave no value for the property, is under an obligation to return it to the original title owner, or to the person who did give value for it. [Emphasis in original.]

> (D. W. M. Waters, Law of Trusts in Canada (2nd ed. 1984), at p. 299.)

The transferee, who obtains the property gratuitously, holds the property on trust for the transferor, who is the rightful owner, because equity does not assume gifts (Waters, at p. 300).

71 In this case, the lessor holds title to the car and is its rightful owner, having purchased it. But the lessor entered into a contract of lease wherein the lessee, for value, obtained the right to use and possession of the car. In my opinion, the facts at hand cannot give rise to a resulting trust.

72 Finally, the respondent argues that the trustee is estopped from asserting a claim to the car because the lessee, whose interests the trustee succeeds, signed documents which indicated that she did not have ownership of the car. I also must reject this argument. First, the lessee's understanding of the transaction is not at issue here. Second, ownership of the car is not at issue; rather, the contest, as discussed above, is not one of title, but priority.

6. Conclusion and Disposition

73 In accordance with s. 20(b)(i), the lessor's unperfected security interest is ineffective against the possessory interest acquired by the trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee's interest in the car takes priority over that of the lessor; the trustee is therefore entitled to the proceeds of the car.

74 For the foregoing reasons, I would therefore allow the appeal with costs throughout, set aside the judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal, and restore the disposition ordered by the trial judge.

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Long-term lease — Setting up of lessor's right of ownership against lessee's trustee in bankruptcy — Failure to publish rights resulting from lease within legislated time limit — Whether long-term lessor of automobile may set up right of ownership against lessee's trustee in bankruptcy even though lessor failed to publish rights within time prescribed in art. 1852 C.C.Q. — Whether lessor's right of ownership equivalent to simple security — Whether trustee may be considered third person for purposes of art. 1852 C.C.Q. — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, ss. 67, 71, 81.

Two debtors leased motor vehicles for 36-month terms under leases of movables, and the related rights were assigned to the appellants. Before the leases had terminated, the debtors made assignments in bankruptcy that included the vehicles, and the respondents were appointed trustees in bankruptcy. The appellants sent the trustees proofs of claim so as to be put in possession of the vehicles, of which they were the owners. The trustees disputed the claims because the leases had not been published in the register of personal and movable real rights within the time limit provided for in art. 1852 C.C.Q. The Superior Court and Court of Appeal agreed with the trustees. They felt that the appellants' rights of ownership could not be set up against the trustees because of the late publication thereof.

Held: The appeals should be allowed.

A lease contract does not effect a conveyance of ownership between the lessee and the lessor. The leased property remains in the lessor's patrimony. The lessee has only the status of a holder, which means that the property must be surrendered upon termination of the lease. Although the lessor's right of ownership does not arise out of the lease, the rules respecting the publication of rights alter its effects in relation to third persons, since it cannot be set up against third persons unless it is published. However, the publication requirement does not transform the right of ownership into a simple security. Nothing in the Civil Code of Québec or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act alters the nature of the lessor's right of ownership in the leased property or the resulting rights in relation to the lessee.

The status and duties attributed to the trustee following the initial bankruptcy event do not mean that he or she can be regarded as a third person against whom the lessor of the motor vehicle may not set up his or her rights owing to the failure to satisfy the publication requirement. The nature and legal characterization of the trustee's role vary depending on the nature of his or her actions. On the one hand, the trustee is subrogated to the bankrupt's rights in the exercise of his or her powers to hold and dispose of property of which he or she has been granted seisin; on the other hand, the law treats the trustee as the creditors' legal mandatary who will liquidate the property entrusted to him or her for the creditors' benefit. This dual nature does not give the trustee the status of a third person in relation to the bankrupt, especially given all the powers conferred upon the trustee by law in order to preserve and liquidate the debtor's property. When the trustee takes control of the property, his or her seisin is limited to the property in the debtor's patrimony and, apart from special powers, the trustee has no more rights with respect to the property than did the debtor.

In the case at bar, the appellants' rights of ownership can accordingly be set up against the trustees and their claims should have been admitted. The leased vehicles were never part of the debtors' patrimonies. The trustees, in refusing to deliver possession of the property, intended to dispose of property that was not included in their seisin.

LEBEL J. —

I. Introduction

1 These two appeals raise a similar issue: whether a long-term lessor of an automobile may set up his or her right of ownership against the lessee's trustee in bankruptcy even though the lessor failed to publish his or her rights in the Register of personal and movable real rights ("RPMRR") within the time prescribed in the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64. The appeals were heard at the same time as a third case, which concerned an instalment sale contract and in which the issue was whether the seller's reservation of ownership had effect against the buyer's trustee in bankruptcy (Ouellet (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 64 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 348, 2004 SCC 64). Separate reasons for judgment were handed down in that case.

2 In both of these cases, the Quebec Superior Court and Court of Appeal held that the lessor's right of ownership could not be set up against the trustee unless it was published in a timely manner. For the reasons that follow, I am of the opinion that the right of ownership justified the claim for the property in the trustee's hands and could be set up against the trustee. In my view, in light of the facts of these cases, the trustee cannot be considered a third party in relation to the appellants, who may lawfully exercise their rights to follow and rights of revendication as owners of the leased property. Consequently, I would allow both appeals and admit the appellants' claims.

II. Origin of the Cases

A. DaimlerChrysler Services Canada Inc.

3 In this case, Alfred Lefebvre leased a Dodge Dakota vehicle from an automobile dealership, Jules Baillot et Fils Ltée. The lease of a movable for a 36-month term was signed on April 19, 1999. On that same date, the dealer assigned the lease contract to the appellant, which now operates as DaimlerChrysler Services Canada Inc. ("DaimlerChrysler"). At the time the lease was signed, art. 1852 C.C.Q. had required since 1998 that rights arising out of leases of movables be published in the RPMRR. In this case, the rights were not published until November 24, 2000. That delay gave rise to this litigation.

4 Alfred Lefebvre made an assignment in bankruptcy on November 1, 2000, at a time when he was still the lessee of the Dodge Dakota, and the respondent Jean-François Lebel was appointed trustee. On November 24, 2000, in accordance with s. 81 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("B.I.A."), DaimlerChrysler sent the trustee a proof of claim so as to be put in possession of the vehicle, of which it was still the owner. As has been mentioned, DaimlerChrysler published its rights in the RPMRR that same day.

5 On December 5, 2000, the trustee notified DaimlerChrysler that he disputed its claim. According to him, the contract could not be set up against him because it had been published late. For that reason, he refused to deliver possession of the vehicle to DaimlerChrysler, which then filed a motion for appeal against this decision in the Quebec Superior Court. In that proceeding, DaimlerChrysler asked the court to recognize that its right of ownership was valid and could be set up against the trustee.

B. GMAC Leaseco Limited

6 In this case, Martin Tremblay leased a Chevrolet Cavalier automobile from an automobile dealership, Marlin Chevrolet-Oldsmobile Inc., for a 36-month term on September 28, 1998. That same day, the dealer assigned the contract to the appellant, GMAC Leaseco Limited ("GMAC"). The rights arising out of the lease were not published until January 9, 2001. On December 13, 2000, the lessee received a notice of repossession pursuant to s. 150.14 of the Consumer Protection Act, R.S.Q., c. P-40.1. On December 14, 2000, Mr. Tremblay went bankrupt. The respondent, Raymond Chabot Inc., was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. On December 15, 2000, GMAC sent the trustee a proof of claim pursuant to s. 81 B.I.A. and requested that it be put in possession of the vehicle.

7 The trustee responded by giving notice that it disputed the claim on the ground that GMAC's rights could not be set up against it because they had not been published in the RPMRR in a timely manner. On January 17, 2001, GMAC filed a motion for appeal in the Superior Court with a view to having its rights of ownership in the vehicle recognized and to repossessing it. During the course of this appeal, the parties agreed to sell the vehicle and place the proceeds in escrow.

III. Judicial History

A. Superior Court

(1) DaimlerChrysler

8 Trudel J. heard DaimlerChrysler's motion for appeal. She first conceded DaimlerChrysler's point that a lessor's right of ownership is not, strictly speaking, a right resulting from the lease. The principal rights are the lessor's right to receive lease payments and the lessee's right to use the vehicle. However, relying on Giffen (Re), 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91, a case whose principles she felt were applicable in Quebec law, she expressed the opinion that, as a result of the rules respecting the publication of rights in Quebec and of the requirement now imposed on lessors to publish rights arising out of a long-term lease of a motor vehicle published in the RPMRR, an unpublished lease cannot be set up against the lessee's trustee in bankruptcy. The right to repossess the property in the event of bankruptcy — which is defined as a default under the lease — must be treated as a right resulting from the contract of lease. This right is governed by art. 1852 C.C.Q. A failure to publish it therefore permits the trustee both to refuse to deliver possession of the property to its owner and to dispose of it for the benefit of the estate of the bankrupt. Trudel J. accordingly dismissed the appellant's motion: 2001 CanLII 9358 (QC CS), [2001] R.J.Q. 2679.

(2) GMAC

9 GMAC was no more successful in the Superior Court than DaimlerChrysler had been. Boisvert J. did recognize that GMAC's right of ownership did not arise out of the contract of lease. However, relying on Giffen, he held that, since the coming into force of art. 1852 C.C.Q., a right of revendication can no longer be set up against a trustee in bankruptcy where rights resulting from a lease have not been published within the prescribed time limits. Boisvert J. therefore dismissed GMAC's motion for appeal, as GMAC had not published its rights in a timely manner: [2001] Q.J. No. 3446 (QL).

B. Quebec Court of Appeal (Beauregard, Dussault and Thibault JJ.A.)

10 The appeals of DaimlerChrysler and GMAC were heard by the same panel of the Quebec Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal delivered common reasons for judgment in the two cases; the majority rejected the arguments of the property owners, holding that their rights could not be set up against the trustees in bankruptcy: 2003 CanLII 47947 (QC CA), [2003] R.J.Q. 819, 229 D.L.R. (4th) 697, and [2003] Q.J. No. 2305 (QL). Thibault J.A. wrote the principal opinion, and Dussault J.A. concurred in it in separate reasons. Both of them held that the appellants' appeals should be dismissed. Beauregard J.A. wrote dissenting reasons in which he held that the lessors' rights of ownership could be set up against the trustees even though the rights resulting from the leases of movables in issue had not been published.

11 The majority opinions endorsed a line of authority established by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Massouris (Syndic de), 2002 CanLII 39140 (QC CA), [2002] R.J.Q. 901, and Mervis (Syndic de), 2002 CanLII 41215 (QC CA), [2002] R.J.Q. 2268, which addressed the effect of the failure to publish a contract of lease or a contract of sale with a reservation of ownership in respect of movable property on the possibility of setting up a right of ownership against a trustee. These cases decided that trustees had the status of third persons in relation to property owners.

12 Thibault J.A. conceded that the classic principles of civil law recognize the right of the owner of a movable to revendicate it against its possessor without further formalities. However, she relied on Massouris and Mervis to conclude that, where long-term leases and instalment sales involving motor vehicles are concerned, the Quebec legislature intended to change these traditional rules. In these situations, to prevent the creation of hidden securities, the legislature imposed a publication requirement and it intended to treat as a security the reservation of ownership that was in its opinion provided for in the lease. In the case of long-term leases of motor vehicles, art. 1852 C.C.Q. clearly entrenches this new principle, which the courts must apply. The trustee, who stands in the legal position of a third person for the purposes of art. 1852 C.C.Q., may therefore, on behalf of all the creditors, challenge the security the owner-creditor attempted to create for him or herself. Consequently, in Thibault J.A.'s opinion, the appellants could not exercise their rights of revendication against the trustees in bankruptcy of their lessees. Dussault J.A. reached the same conclusion. In his view, the legislature had implicitly equated a reservation of ownership under a lease or an instalment sale contract with a security.

13 Beauregard J.A. found himself in fundamental disagreement with his learned colleagues' reasons. He began by asserting the view that the cases at bar could be distinguished from Giffen. Unlike the Civil Code of Québec, the British Columbia legislation provided that the lease of a vehicle for a term of over one year was equivalent to a security interest and that if it were not published, it had to be treated as an unperfected security interest. In Beauregard J.A.'s opinion, the provisions relating to the publication of long-term leases and instalment sales have not changed the basic principles of civil law or, more specifically, the essential difference between a right of ownership and a security. A right of ownership need not be published. Although a right of ownership cannot be set up against certain subsequent acquirers identified in the Civil Code of Québec, the trustee in bankruptcy is not one of them. Bankruptcy does not confer any more rights on the trustee against the owner of the property than the bankrupt had, and the trustee cannot contest the appellants' claim. Beauregard J.A. would have allowed the appeals and recognized the appellants' rights.

14 The appellants were then given leave to appeal to this Court. In the case of GMAC, the respondent trustee did not take part in the proceedings in this Court but left the matter up to the Court. In the case of DaimlerChrysler, the respondent actively contested the appeal in all respects.

IV. Relevant Legislative Provisions

15 Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64

> 1852. The rights resulting from the lease may be published.
> Publication is required, however, in the case of rights under a lease with a term of more than one year in respect of a road vehicle or other movable property determined by regulation, or of any movable property required for the service or operation of an enterprise, subject, in the latter case, to regulatory exclusions; effect of such rights against third persons operates from the date of the lease provided they are published within fifteen days. A lease with a term of one year or less is deemed to have a term of more than one year if, by the operation of a renewal clause or other covenant to the same effect, the term of the lease may be increased to more than one year.
> The transfer of rights under a lease requires or is open to publication, according to whether the rights themselves require or are open to publication.
> 2941. Publication of rights allows them to be set up against third persons, establishes their rank and, where the law so provides, gives them effect.
> Rights produce their effects between the parties even before publication, unless the law expressly provides otherwise.

V. Analysis

A. Issues

16 These cases raise issues relating to the interplay between Quebec civil law and federal bankruptcy and insolvency legislation. It will be necessary to review the legal characterization of certain movable real rights created under the Civil Code of Québec and the role and powers of trustees in bankruptcy in the exercise of those rights. This part of the analysis requires that we revisit the interpretation of the provisions of the Civil Code of Québec, art. 1852 C.C.Q. in particular, to determine whether the trustee may be considered a third person in relation to the lessor for the purposes of that provision. To do this, we will first consider the nature of the rights in issue and the scope and effect of the requirement to publish them in the RPMRR. Next, we will review the status of the trustee to determine whether the trustee may set up the failure to publish the rights against the lessor of the movable property. In short, it must be asked whether a long-term lessor of a motor vehicle has rights equivalent to a security and whether those rights must be published. It must then be asked whether the trustee is in the position of a third person and whether he or she may rely on the failure to publish the rights to defeat the claim for the property.

B. Submissions of the Parties

17 The appellants adopted a common position in these appeals. Their arguments can be summed up in a few basic propositions. The first is that the signing of a long-term lease does not reduce the lessor's right of ownership to a simple security. The lessor's right remains one of ownership, not one resulting from the lease within the meaning of art. 1852 C.C.Q. This right is therefore not subject to the publication requirement, as only rights resulting from the lease must be published. A failure to publish bars claims against third persons only. Owing to the nature of their role with respect to the property of bankrupts and the nature of their seisin under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, trustees cannot be considered third persons in relation to lessors. A trustee has no more rights in the leased property than the bankrupt did, and this would also be true under art. 1749 C.C.Q. of property subject to a reservation of ownership as a result of an instalment sale. The failure to publish the lease does not effect a transfer of ownership, and the trustee cannot set up the failure to publish against the lessor's claim. In this context, Giffen cannot be said to apply. In that case, the British Columbia legislation provided that an unpublished automobile lease was not effective against a trustee or against creditors, as it treated the lease as a security interest, whereas Quebec's civil law does not attach such consequences to a failure to publish in relation to trustees in bankruptcy.

18 According to the respondent in the DaimlerChrysler appeal, the principles in Giffen do in fact apply. As was the case in British Columbia, the Quebec legislature has imposed publication as a necessary condition for setting up rights against third persons, including trustees in bankruptcy of lessees. In the respondent's opinion, the Court of Appeal's decision to equate a lease and the rights it recognizes or establishes with a security subject to publication is in keeping with the requirements of commercial life and with the legislature's intent. The legislature has made it clear that publication is required to set up a lease against third parties.

C. The Legislative Context: Reform of the Law of Security at the Time of the Coming into Force of the Civil Code of Québec

19 Before discussing the arguments advanced by the parties, we must make a few brief comments on the structure of the law of security in Quebec civil law following the coming into force of the Civil Code of Québec in 1994. At the same time, a review of some of the fundamental concepts of property law might be useful for the purposes of defining the nature of the issues, correctly characterizing the parties' rights and assessing the validity of the solutions proposed for resolving the difficulties these cases raise.

20 The coming into force of the Civil Code of Québec marked an important step in the evolution of the Quebec law of real security (L. Payette, Les sûretés réelles dans le Code civil du Québec (2nd ed. 2001)). The legislature reorganized this field of civil law, structuring it primarily around a single type of security, the hypothec, which applies to both movable and immovable property, although it also recognized, in art. 2647 C.C.Q., another type of right, the prior claim, which protects certain kinds of claims. (See Payette, supra, at pp. 2-3 and 59.) This solution was adopted in preference to the presumption of hypothec recommended by the Civil Code Revision Office, which would have grouped all forms of security, including "ownership securities" (sûretés-propriétés), under a single concept: the hypothec (Report on the Québec Civil Code (1978), vol. II, t. 1, at pp. 427-31). That proposal had attracted strong objections from many critics. (See Payette, supra, at pp. 60-64; R. A. Macdonald, "Faut-il s'assurer qu'on appelle un chat un chat? Observations sur la méthodologie législative à travers l'énumération limitative des sûretés, 'la présomption d'hypothèque' et le principe de 'l'essence de l'opération'", in Mélanges Germain Brière (1993), 527; see also Commentaires du ministre de la Justice (1993), t. II, at p. 1654.) Thus, instead of agreeing to organize the law of real security around the concept of presumption of hypothec, the Quebec legislature set up a simplified, unified security system that nevertheless maintained the fundamental distinction between the legal concepts of security and ownership in relation to the creation and exercise of real securities.

21 This distinction between security and rights of ownership remains a fundamental element of the classification of real rights in property law in the Civil Code of Québec. The right of ownership, which is the fundamental real right that theoretically confers full legal control over property, can be distinguished from a security such as a hypothec, which is an incidental real right. One author characterizes incidental real rights as "real rights of security" (droits réels de garantie) that relate to the monetary value of a thing rather than to the thing itself and are designed to complement another right by securing it or guaranteeing the payment of a claim (P.-C. Lafond, Précis de droit des biens (1999), at p. 192).

22 Together with the reform of the law of security, the codification of 1994 brought significant changes to the system for publishing rights. At the same time as it substantially revised the rules governing land registration, the legislation provided for the creation of the RPMRR. This register was established to remedy some serious flaws in the former system, which had to deal with a wide variety of types of security whose true nature was often not readily apparent because of the absence of a general publication mechanism. This meant that transactions involving many classes of movable property were risky from a legal standpoint. A fundamental goal in setting up this institution was to make public the types of security in respect of movable property that were created under the rules of the new Civil Code of Québec. (See D.-C. Lamontagne, in collaboration with P. Duchaine, La publicité des droits (3rd ed. 2001), at p. 301.) As in the case of land registration, the purpose of publication, as provided for in art. 2941 C.C.Q., is not to effect transfers of ownership but, generally speaking, to allow rights that may or must be published to be set up against third persons. (See Lamontagne and Duchaine, supra, at pp. 31-32.)

23 When the Civil Code of Québec came into force in 1994, it did not yet require that rights resulting from long-term leases of road vehicles be published in the RPMRR. This requirement was not introduced until 1998, when art. 1852 C.C.Q. was amended by s. 8 of the Act to amend the Civil Code and other legislative provisions as regards the publication of personal and movable real rights and the constitution of movable hypothecs without delivery, S.Q. 1998, c. 5. This new provision required that such rights be published from then on as a condition for setting them up against third persons so as to facilitate trading in movable property. It applied to leases already in existence when it came into force. Sections 6 and 7 of this amending Act also established publication requirements in respect of leasing and of reservations of ownership under instalment sale contracts by amending arts. 1752 and 1847 C.C.Q. A transitional provision, s. 24 of the Act, provided for a time limit of one year from its coming into force for publication of the rights in question.

D. The Legal Position of Lessees in Relation to Lessors

24 The contract in issue in the case at bar is a lease. According to the fundamental rules applicable to leases, such a contract does not effect a conveyance of ownership between the lessee and the lessor. It merely gives the lessee the status of a holder and user by precarious title, which means that the property must be surrendered upon termination of the lease, as provided for in art. 1890 C.C.Q. The contracts in issue remain, by their very terms, leases, albeit long-term ones. Regardless of the nature of the legal relationships as described in these contracts, it must be determined whether they should be recharacterized in light of the wording of art. 1852 C.C.Q. and the requirement to publish imposed by it since 1998, to ensure that the rights arising out of them can be set up against third persons.

25 The majority of the Court of Appeal held that a recharacterization was necessary and, consequently, that the failure to publish could be relied on by the trustee, who had to be considered a third person for the purposes of art. 1852 C.C.Q. However, as Beauregard J.A. noted in his dissenting opinion, this position tends to confuse the concepts of ownership and security. This problem lies at the very heart of the solutions adopted by the Quebec Court of Appeal since Massouris to resolve conflicts that have arisen in the decisions of Quebec's trial courts with respect to long-term leases, leasing or instalment sales of vehicles, the related publication requirements and the rights of trustees in bankruptcy. In line with the very clear positions that were adopted in Massouris, the decisions of the Court of Appeal have presumed that all legal transactions by means of which an automobile is placed at the disposal of a user are secured credit transactions. This analysis and this characterization have made it possible subsequently to treat the owner's rights as the rights of the holder of a simple security. When this security has not been perfected because of a failure to publish it in a timely manner, it cannot be set up against a trustee in bankruptcy, who is regarded as a third party in his or her capacity as the creditors' representative.

26 This interpretation seems to reintroduce into Quebec's law of real security a concept that was rejected by the legislature in the 1994 codification, namely the presumption of hypothec. It might also be thought that this approach stems from a desire to identify the essence of the transaction and recharacterize the transaction accordingly. From an economic standpoint, it is quite likely that the various methods used by automobile dealers — long-term leases, leasing and instalment sales — all have the same objective: finding a customer, obtaining for the customer the credit needed to complete the transaction and placing the vehicle at the customer's disposal while protecting the interests of the credit provider. However, before dismissing all the applicable legal categories, it is necessary to consider the content of the contracts and where they fit in the classes of contracts established by the Civil Code of Québec and used by the parties.

27 In the context of these transactions, we must be careful to disregard neither the fundamental categories of property law nor the nature of the rights arising out of the framework of the type of nominate contract entered into in respect of the property in issue, namely, in the case at bar, a lease. Contrary to the proposals of the Civil Code Revision Office, no provisions of the Civil Code of Québec transform the lessor's right of ownership into a hypothec or bar the lessor from trading in automobiles by means of the legal instrument of a lease under which he or she retains ownership of the property. Under such an agreement, the automobile remains in the lessor's patrimony and the lessee has only a right to use it in accordance with the lease and the applicable legislation. It is therefore necessary to analyse the legal situation based on the fact that the lessor retains a right of ownership in the instant case, although the legislature may choose to adjust its effects in relation to third persons and trustees in bankruptcy. This raises the issue of the scope of the requirement to publish rights resulting from a lease on the right of ownership and the effectiveness of the right of ownership.

E. The Requirement to Publish Rights

28 When considering the publication requirement, it is important to first take into account the basic principle underlying Quebec's system for publishing rights. As stated in art. 2941 C.C.Q., be it for security on movables or immovables, publication is not a mechanism for transferring rights of ownership. Even if they are not published, the rights subject to the publication requirement retain their effects between the parties unless the law specifically provides otherwise. The function of the requirement is to allow these rights to be set up against third persons and to establish their rank or give them effect as provided by law:

> 2941. Publication of rights allows them to be set up against third persons, establishes their rank and, where the law so provides, gives them effect.
> Rights produce their effects between the parties even before publication, unless the law expressly provides otherwise.

29 The lessor's right of ownership does not arise out of the lease. It could be said that the right of ownership is pre-existing in relation to the lease. However, the rules respecting the publication of rights alter its effects in relation to third persons. Publication of these rights is now mandatory if they are to be set up against third persons. A failure to satisfy the publication requirement may therefore result in effective transfers of ownership based on the legal appearance created by possession, making it impossible to claim property in the hands of third persons. It does not follow from these possible consequences of implementing the rights publication system that publication creates the lessor's right of ownership or that publication is necessary for this right to exist. Publication is needed only to protect the right as against third persons, which is the essence of the concept of setting up rights.

30 Of course, the legislature may play a more active role in the legal relationships of the parties or other interested persons by recharacterizing the rights established by contracts or giving a more radical scope to the consequences of the failure to publish. An example of legislative action of this sort is found in art. 1756 C.C.Q., which governs sales with a right of redemption. In this provision of the Civil Code of Québec, a right of redemption used to secure a loan is equated with a hypothec. The seller is deemed to be a borrower, and the acquirer, a hypothecary creditor. The acquirer exercises his or her rights in accordance with the rules respecting hypothecs. Another example of this can be found in the law of bankruptcy and insolvency. In amendments made to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act's definition of "secured creditor" by the Federal Law — Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1, S.C. 2001, c. 4, Parliament equated the rights of a seller under a conditional or instalment sale, or of an acquirer under a sale with a right of redemption, with the rights of a secured creditor (ss. 25 and 28). Thus, as a result of this Act, the rights in question are subject to the publication requirement. The right of ownership accordingly becomes a debt relationship protected by a security that must be published.

31 In the case of a long-term lease, nothing in the Civil Code of Québec or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act alters the nature of the lessor's right of ownership in the leased property or the resulting rights in relation to the lessee. The lessor retains his or her status and rights of ownership in relation to the lessee. The lessee remains a holder by precarious title against whom the lessor may exercise, inter alia, the right to take back the property upon termination of the lease, upon resiliation of the lease or in cases provided for in the contract or by law. It is now necessary to consider whether, in light of the status and duties attributed to the trustee following the initial bankruptcy event, the trustee can be regarded as a third person against whom the lessor of the motor vehicle may not set up his or her rights because of the failure to satisfy the publication requirement. This question once again raises the difficulties resulting from the ambiguities inherent in the trustee's status in the law of bankruptcy and insolvency and from the need to adapt federal insolvency law to two modern legal systems that differ in their methods, their terminology and, in some instances, their basic classifications.

F. The Position of the Trustee in Bankruptcy

32 Following the logic of its characterization of the lessor's rights, the Quebec Court of Appeal equated trustees in bankruptcy with third persons and allowed the trustee to retain the property and dispose of it for the benefit of the bankrupt's creditors on the basis that the lessor's rights could not be set up against the trustee. This conclusion is based on an oversimplification of the multifaceted role of the trustee and the dual nature of his or her status at the time of the initial bankruptcy event, as well as of the nature of the assignment to the trustee of the bankrupt's property and the seisin the trustee consequently has of the property.

33 The terminology used in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act could lead a legal professional trained in the civil law to conclude too hastily that the assignment of property resulting from the bankruptcy constitutes a transfer of ownership to a third person. Section 71(2) B.I.A. provides that the bankrupt's property "shall . . . pass to and vest in the trustee". It would as a result be easy to believe that this is a case of alienation of property that, in a bankruptcy situation, would put the trustee in the position of a third person.

34 The legal content of the trustee's function is not easily defined. I am aware that the assignee concept was employed in judgments on which the Quebec courts have based their decisions for some time now, including the decision of Bernier J., as he then was, in Civano Construction Inc. v. Crédit M.-G. Inc., [1962] C.S. 45. (See also Kowalski v. Trust Général du Canada, [1976] C.A. 93; Poliquin v. Banque de Montréal, 1998 CanLII 13298 (QC CA), [1998] R.L. 560 (C.A.), at p. 566; see also the comments of professors J. Auger and A. Bohémier, "The Status of the Trustee in Bankruptcy" (2003), 37 R.J.T. 57.) Defining the precise nature of the seisin vested in the trustee has proven to be extremely difficult. Can it be regarded as a sui generis right of ownership, as fiduciary ownership or even as a case of administration of the property of others within the meaning of Title Seven of Book Four of the Civil Code of Québec? (Auger and Bohémier, supra, at pp. 67 and 102-06)

35 The strict concept of ownership accounts poorly for the nature of the trustee's duties and the rights a trustee exercises over the bankrupt's property following the initial bankruptcy event. The trustee's rights are exercised only in relation to a patrimony whose content is legally defined in s. 67 B.I.A. This patrimony consists of only the property that could be liquidated for the benefit of the creditors. The trustee exercises certain statutory rights over this property that are in part similar to the rights of an owner. The trustee may dispose of the property of which he or she has seisin, but for a specific purpose, namely to pay the claims of the bankrupt's creditors rateably following the order of priority provided for in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. In any cases, which are actually quite rare, in which there is a surplus following liquidation, the trustee may not retain the surplus but must return it to the bankrupt. The attribution and exercise of such powers do not correspond perfectly to alienation, so much so that some authors have expressed very strong criticism of the use of the assignee concept to describe the function of the trustee in bankruptcy (M. Cantin Cumyn, Traité de droit civil: L'administration du bien d'autrui (2000), at pp. 110-12).

36 At any rate, the use of the concept of dévolution (vesting) in the French version of s. 71(2) B.I.A. does not eliminate the distinction between the two aspects of the trustee's role following the initial bankruptcy event. In Mercure v. A. Marquette & Fils Inc., 1975 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 547, this Court clearly noted this distinction, which serves as a basis for characterizing the legal position of the trustee when exercising the powers and performing the obligations the law ascribes to trustees. Referring to the concept of representation to explain the trustee's twofold responsibility, de Grandpré J. stated that in his view the trustee is a representative of both the debtor and the creditors (p. 553). In order to liquidate the bankrupt's property as directed by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the trustee must take control of it. At this stage, the trustee is the bankrupt's successor or, in a broad sense, his or her representative. However, the trustee's juridical personality is not to be confused with that of the debtor. In fact, as de Grandpré J. noted, the law recognizes that the trustee has the right to sue the debtor if necessary (p. 553). This power illustrates the importance of the other aspect of the trustee's functions, that of representing the creditors in the management and liquidation of the bankrupt's property. The trustee's legal position is therefore more akin to that of a third person in relation to the debtor. On the one hand, the trustee is subrogated to the bankrupt's rights in the exercise of his or her powers to hold and dispose of property of which he or she has been granted seisin. On the other hand, the law treats the trustee as the creditors' legal mandatary who will liquidate the property entrusted to him or her for the creditors' benefit. The dual nature of the trustee's duties does not therefore make it possible to regard the trustee as a third person in relation to the bankrupt, given all the powers conferred upon the trustee by law in order to preserve and liquidate the debtor's property. The nature and legal characterization of the trustee's role will vary depending on the nature of the duties that the trustee's actions will entail.

37 When the trustee takes control or becomes seised of the universality of property defined in s. 67 B.I.A., his or her seisin is limited to the property in the debtor's patrimony. Apart from the special powers accorded by law to the trustee, as representative of the creditors, to restore the patrimony to be liquidated in its entirety, the trustee has no more rights with respect to the debtor's property than did the debtor, of whom the trustee remains the successor in this regard. This principle is well established in relation to the application of s. 67 B.I.A. It was laid down by Judson J. in Flintoft v. Royal Bank of Canada, 1964 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1964] S.C.R. 631, at p. 634. More recently, Iacobucci J. confirmed the validity of the principle in Giffen. In my view, the trustee has no greater interest in the property under his or her responsibility than that of the bankrupt, unless otherwise provided for by legislation (Giffen, at para. 50).

38 This being said, under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, and often under various provincial statutes, the trustee has special powers allowing him or her to restore the debtor's patrimony to its former state or to the state it should have been in, or to protect the estate of the bankrupt against rights unduly claimed or exercised against it. Such a situation may occur in cases where action must be taken to cancel preferential payments or improper transfers of the bankrupt's property or to contest a security that has been granted illegally or has not been perfected in accordance with the law.

39 However, these powers and the status they confer upon the trustee do not give the trustee the authority to liquidate property that was not in the bankrupt's patrimony, which is similar to the situation that has arisen in this appeal. The vehicles leased by the appellants were never part of the debtors' patrimonies. Since the lessors' rights cannot be considered simple claims guaranteed by real securities, the trustees, in refusing to deliver possession of the property, intended to dispose of property that was not included in their seisin.

40 At this stage of my analysis of these cases, I believe a few comments about Giffen are necessary. The Court of Appeal considered the principles in that case to be determinative in the case at bar. However, that interpretation gave Giffen a significance it did not in fact have, as the court failed to take into account the statutory context established by the provincial legislation of British Columbia, which defined the respective rights of a long-term lessor of a motor vehicle and the trustee in bankruptcy of the lessee. In Giffen, s. 20(b)(i) of the Personal Property Security Act, S.B.C. 1989, c. 36, provided that a lease in respect of an automobile was not effective against a trustee if the lease were not published as required by the Personal Property Security Act. Thus, the provincial legislation itself defined the nature of the respective rights of lessors and trustees. It allowed trustees to contest a lessor's claim and liquidate property for the benefit of creditors. As Iacobucci J. observed, s. 20(b)(i) of the Personal Property Security Act therefore gave the trustee an interest greater than that of the bankrupt, and this allowed the trustee to dispose of the property (para. 50). As has already been mentioned, the Civil Code of Québec does not provide for a similar consequence for failure to publish the rights arising out of a lease. In this context, Giffen did not justify the solution adopted by the Court of Appeal. On the contrary, Giffen confirmed the rules governing the composition of the bankrupt's patrimony. The appellants' claims should have been admitted. Their appeals therefore appear to be well founded.

G. Costs

41 The circumstances of these cases warrant a departure from the usual rules on the awarding of costs. In the appeal of GMAC, I would make no order as to costs, as the respondent did not participate in the appeal. In the appeal of DaimlerChrysler, it would be appropriate to award costs to the respondent on a solicitor-client basis. The appellant brought before this Court an issue of particular interest that it was more concerned about than the actual outcome of the case. The participation of the respondent and his counsel was helpful to the analysis of the issues raised by this case, and it would be unfair to make the respondent bear all the costs incurred in the general interest of the development of the law, which went beyond his narrow interest in the management of a relatively modest bankruptcy.

VI. Conclusion

42 For these reasons, I would allow the appeals and admit the appellants' claims. As the vehicle in GMAC has been sold, the appellant is entitled to the proceeds of the sale. The appeals should be allowed without costs in the case of GMAC and with costs to the respondent on a solicitor-client basis in the case of DaimlerChrysler.

Appeals allowed.

on appeal from the court of appeal for quebec

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Instalment sale — Setting up of trustee's reservation of ownership — Failure to publish reservation within legislated time limit — Whether reservation of ownership not published within time limit provided for in art. 1745 C.C.Q. can be set up against trustee — Whether trustee can be considered third person for purposes of art. 1749 C.C.Q.

In 1997, the debtor bought property from a dealer in instalment sales, and the dealer assigned its rights to the appellant bank. A few years later, the debtor made an assignment in bankruptcy and the respondent was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. The bank then sent the respondent a proof of claim for its reservation of ownership in respect of the property. The trustee disputed the claim because the bank had not published the reservation within the time limit provided for in art. 1745 C.C.Q. The Superior Court and Court of Appeal agreed with the trustee. They felt that the reservation could not be set up against the trustee because of the failure to publish it within the prescribed time limit.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

Based on the law applicable to this case, the reservation of ownership could be set up against the trustee. According to art. 1745 C.C.Q., an instalment sale is a term sale by which the seller reserves ownership of the property until full payment of the sale price, and this reservation of ownership must be published to have effect against third persons. If it is not published or if it is published late, art. 1749 C.C.Q. provides that the seller (or transferee) may take the property back only if it is in the hands of the original buyer. The reservation of ownership must not be equated with a security within the meaning of the Civil Code of Québec. The legal relationship between the original buyer and the seller must be interpreted as one of ownership. In this context, the rules regarding the scope of the trustee's seisin are relevant. Since a failure to publish does not have the effect of conveying ownership to the original buyer, the property sold does not become part of his or her patrimony. Upon bankruptcy, the trustee is vested with only the rights the bankrupt had in the property. He or she cannot be considered a third person acquirer for the purposes of art. 1749 C.C.Q. and cannot contest the claim of the seller, who still holds the right of ownership in the property.

LEBEL J. —

I. Introduction

1 In this appeal, the Court must decide whether a reservation of ownership in respect of an automobile and a mobile home sold in instalment sales can be set up against the buyer's trustee in bankruptcy when the seller has failed to publish his or her rights in a timely manner in the register of personal and movable real rights ("RPMRR") as required under the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 ("C.C.Q."). The case at bar was heard at the same time as two others that raise a similar issue, namely whether a lessor's right of ownership under a long-term lease of an automobile can be set up against the lessee's trustee in bankruptcy (Lefebvre (Trustee of); Tremblay (Trustee of), 2004 SCC 63 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 326, 2004 SCC 63 (hereinafter "DaimlerChrysler" and "GMAC")). A separate judgment is being filed today in those cases.

2 In the case at bar, the Quebec Superior Court and Court of Appeal both ruled that the reservation of ownership relied on by the appellant could not be set up against the trustee because it was not published within the time limit provided for in the Civil Code of Québec. For the reasons that follow, I find that the reservation of ownership could in fact be set up against the trustee. In the context of the facts relevant to this appeal, the trustee did not have the status of a third person for the purposes of the Civil Code of Québec. Consequently, I would allow the appeal and admit the claim of the appellant, the National Bank of Canada ("Bank").

II. Origin of the Case

3 On August 25, 1997, Stéphane Ouellet bought a mobile home, and on April 8, 1998, he purchased a Chevrolet Silverado. He bought this property from a dealer in instalment sales, and the dealer assigned its rights to the Bank on the day the contracts were signed. The reservation of ownership and the assignment thereof were not published in the RPMRR until February 28, 2001.

4 In the meantime, on December 1, 2000, Mr. Ouellet made an assignment under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("B.I.A."). The respondent was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. On February 1, 2001, the appellant sent the respondent a proof of claim for its reservation of ownership in respect of the property and requested that it be put in possession of the property pursuant to s. 81 B.I.A. On February 8, 2001, the trustee gave notice that it disputed the claim because the Bank had not published the reservations of ownership, which consequently had no effect against the trustee. On February 23, 2001, the Bank brought a motion for appeal in the Superior Court against the notice of dispute.

III. Judicial History

A. Superior Court

5 Barakett J. dismissed the Bank's motion: [2002] Q.J. No. 410 (QL). He pointed out that a reservation of ownership in the context of an instalment sale must be published in the RPMRR. In his view, a reservation of ownership must be regarded as a security. Based on what he understood to be the principles laid down in Giffen (Re), 1998 CanLII 844 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 91, he held that, as the reservation of ownership had not been published within the legislated time limit, it had no effect against the buyer's trustee in bankruptcy. In his opinion, this conclusion also applied to the buyer's ordinary creditors.

B. Court of Appeal (Rousseau-Houle, Rochette and Morin JJ.A.)

6 The Bank appealed to the Court of Appeal, which unanimously affirmed the trial judgment: 2003 CanLII 11411 (QC CA), [2003] R.J.Q. 1434. The court relied on its own consistent case law, including the judgments rendered on March 19, 2003, in Lefebvre (Syndic de), 2003 CanLII 47947 (QC CA), [2003] R.J.Q. 819, 229 D.L.R. (4th) 697, and Tremblay (Syndic de), [2003] Q.J. No. 2305 (QL), which were subsequently appealed to this Court. The Court of Appeal expressed the opinion, based on its case law, that a reservation of ownership in respect of the sale of a road vehicle is in the nature of a security and must be published as required by law. Failing this, it cannot be set up against a trustee, who is a third person for the purposes of art. 1749 C.C.Q. and may therefore rely on the failure to publish.

IV. Relevant Legislative Provisions

7 Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64

> 1745. An instalment sale is a term sale by which the seller reserves ownership of the property until full payment of the sale price.
> A reservation of ownership in respect of a road vehicle or other movable property determined by regulation, or in respect of any movable property acquired for the service or operation of an enterprise, has effect against third persons only if it has been published; effect against third persons operates from the date of the sale provided the reservation of ownership is published within fifteen days. As well, the transfer of such a reservation has effect against third persons only if it has been published.
> 1749. A seller or transferee who, upon the default of the buyer, elects to take back the property sold is governed by the rules regarding the exercise of hypothecary rights set out in the Book on Prior Claims and Hypothecs; however, in the case of a consumer contract, only the rules contained in the Consumer Protection Act are applicable to the exercise by the seller or transferee of the right of repossession.
> If the reservation of ownership required publication but was not published, the seller or transferee may take the property back only if it is in the hands of the original buyer; the seller or transferee takes the property back in its existing condition and subject to the rights and charges with which the buyer may have encumbered it.
> If the reservation of ownership required publication but was published late, the seller or transferee may likewise take the property back only if it is in the hands of the original buyer, unless the reservation was published before the sale of the property by the original buyer, in which case the seller or transferee may also take the property back if it is in the hands of a subsequent acquirer; in all cases, the seller or transferee takes the property back in its existing condition, but subject only to such rights and charges with which the original buyer may have encumbered it at the time of the publication of the reservation of ownership and which had already been published.
> 2941. Publication of rights allows them to be set up against third persons, establishes their rank and, where the law so provides, gives them effect.
> Rights produce their effects between the parties even before publication, unless the law expressly provides otherwise.

V. Analysis

A. Issues

8 This appeal, like the appeals considered in GMAC and DaimlerChrysler, raises the issue of the interplay between the rights of the owner of property and the rights of the trustee in bankruptcy of the user of the property. However, this appeal presents the issue in a different context, as has already been mentioned. The dispute arises out of a contract for an instalment sale within the meaning of art. 1745 C.C.Q. It must therefore be determined whether the reservation of ownership in favour of the seller has effect against the buyer's trustee in bankruptcy even though the reservation was not published in the RPMRR within the legislated time limit.

Digitized by Google

9 In addressing this issue, I do not intend to go back over the distinction between the right of ownership and real security, the classification and definition of these concepts in the Civil Code of Québec, or the nature and effects of the publication of rights, or over the trustee's status and role and the scope of his or her seisin following a bankruptcy. On these topics, I refer the reader to the reasons for judgment in GMAC and DaimlerChrysler. In the instant case, it will suffice to review the aspects of the effect against third persons specific to the instalment sale and to the failure to publish the reservation of ownership provided for in the case at bar. In my opinion, by relying on its consistent line of authority, the Court of Appeal incorrectly equated the reservation of ownership with a security within the meaning of the Civil Code of Québec and treated the trustee as a third person for all purposes without giving adequate consideration to the complex nature of the trustee's role. As a result, the Court of Appeal found that a trustee was in the same position as a third person for the purposes of art. 1749 C.C.Q. and could argue that the reservation of ownership had no effect against it owing to the failure to publish. If the Court of Appeal had correctly characterized the rights arising out of the instalment sale and had accurately defined the trustee's position in relation to the bankrupt and hence the scope of the trustee's seisin, it would have recognized the appellant's right to claim the property to which its reservation of ownership applied.

B. The Instalment Sale and the Reservation of Ownership

10 The definition of an instalment sale has been debated often in Quebec civil law. In 1989, a decision of this Court settled the difficulties involved in defining the nature of such a contract. In Venne v. Quebec (Commission de protection du territoire agricole), 1989 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 880, Beetz J. expressed the opinion that an instalment sale in respect of an immovable should be considered a term sale under which the transfer of ownership is suspended until the sale price is paid (pp. 900 and 902). Article 1745 C.C.Q. entrenched this analysis of this type of contract by defining the instalment sale as ". . . a term sale by which the seller reserves ownership of the property . . .". Ownership of the property thus remains with the seller until the term is fulfilled. Since the transfer of ownership takes effect only at that time, the property continues to be part of the seller's patrimony. The seller retains ownership rather than a mere security interest, according to the definition of an instalment sale contract adopted in art. 1745 C.C.Q.

11 Next comes the issue of the publication of rights. Since 1998, art. 1745 C.C.Q. has required that reservations of ownership be published in the RPMRR to have effect against third persons. This requirement was introduced into the Civil Code of Québec by s. 2 of the Act to amend the Civil Code and other legislative provisions as regards the publication of personal and movable real rights and the constitution of movable hypothecs without delivery, S.Q. 1998, c. 5. It is therefore necessary to consider the consequences of a failure to publish.

12 Article 1749 C.C.Q. attaches consequences to a failure to publish a reservation of ownership. In such cases, the seller may take the property back only if it is still in the hands of the original buyer, and subject to any charges with which it may have been encumbered in favour of a third person. In cases of late publication, repossession of the property is subject to any charges with which it may have been encumbered since the property was delivered to the buyer. In light of the facts of this appeal, it must now be determined whether the trustee should be considered a third person for the purposes of art. 1749 C.C.Q. and whether the trustee should be allowed to argue that the reservation had no effect against it because it had not been published at the time of the debtor's bankruptcy.

13 In considering this issue, we must avoid equating the reservation with a simple security interest. As has been noted above, art. 1745 of the Civil Code of Québec defines a reservation of ownership as a right of ownership. Article 1749 C.C.Q. recognizes the right to take the property back if it is still in the hands of the original buyer. Thus, despite the economic function of this type of contract in the automobile business, the legal relationship between the original buyer and the seller must always be interpreted as one of ownership in the legal sense and not as a security relationship.

14 In this context, the rules regarding the scope of the trustee's seisin, which I have discussed in the reasons for judgment in GMAC and DaimlerChrysler, remain relevant. A failure to publish does not have the effect of conveying ownership to the original buyer. The property sold does not become part of his or her patrimony. Upon bankruptcy, the trustee is vested with only the rights the bankrupt had in the property. In terms of this aspect of the trustee's role at the time of the bankruptcy, the trustee cannot be considered a third person acquirer and cannot contest the claim of the seller, who still holds the right of ownership in the property.

15 This is the conclusion that must be drawn from the law applicable to this case. However, it should be noted that amendments made to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act since the relevant time would have led to a different result had they been applicable to this case. The amendments made to this federal Act's definition of "secured creditor" by ss. 25 to 28 of the Federal Law — Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1, S.C. 2001, c. 4, equate a reservation of ownership in an instalment sale with a security for the trustee's purposes. In the context of a bankruptcy, this right now is of no effect against the trustee if it is not published.

16 For the purposes of this appeal, the reservation of ownership retains its full effect. Thus, as the Civil Code of Québec does not permit this right of ownership to be characterized as a security, Giffen does not apply and the Bank's claim should have been admitted. The Bank's appeal was well founded in all respects.

C. Costs

17 As in DaimlerChrysler, the circumstances of this appeal justify awarding costs to the respondent on a solicitor-client basis even though the appeal is being allowed. The appellant wished to bring before this Court a broad issue relating to the law of security and insolvency that went far beyond the individual interests at stake in this case, especially for the trustee. The trustee, through its counsel, played a helpful role in the conduct of the appeal and the analysis of the problems it raised. It would accordingly be unfair to expect the respondent to bear the full burden of its participation in the case before this Court.

VI. Conclusion

18 For these reasons, I would allow the appeal so as to admit the appellant's claim to the property to which its reservation of ownership applied. However, I would award the respondent reasonable costs in this Court on a solicitor-client basis.

Appeal allowed.

By s. 20(1)(b) of the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10 (the "P.P.S.A."), an unperfected security interest in collateral is not effective against a trustee in bankruptcy. By s. 20(2)(b), the rights of a trustee in bankruptcy in respect of the collateral are to be determined as of the date from which the trustee's representative status takes effect. Where a receiving order in bankruptcy has been made against a debtor, does the trustee's representative status take effect as of the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy or as of the date of the making of the receiving order? Brockenshire J., in the court below, in a decision reported in reflex, (1992), 13 C.B.R. (3d) 40, held that the representative status takes effect as of the date of the receiving order. With respect, I disagree.

THE FACTS

On March 15, 1990, Julien H. Plante purchased a 41 foot Mainship cabin cruiser from Beacon Bay Marina McKay Yacht Agency for $300,000. At the time of the purchase, Plante executed a consumer purchase security agreement. On the same day, the agreement was assigned by Beacon Bay Marina to John Deere Finance Limited ("John Deere"), the respondent in the appeal.

On April 2nd, 1990, John Deere registered a financing statement under the P.P.S.A.. The debtor was described in the financing statement as Julien H. Plante. The name of the bankrupt on his Quebec birth certificate was Joseph Julien Hervé Plante. It appears that the debtor used a variety of names, including Julien Hervé Plante, Harvey Joseph Plante, Joseph Julien Plante, and Hervé Julien Plante. If a search had been made in the P.P.S.A. registration system under the name Joseph J. Plante, it would not have disclosed the financing statement of John Deere under the April 2nd, 1990 registration.

On September 4, 1990, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against Plante. The petition was disputed. On January 8, 1991, an interim receiving order was made in which the appellant was appointed interim receiver and directed to take immediate possession of all property of the debtor save for certain real property. On January 9, 1991, the interim receiver took possession of the cabin cruiser.

On January 25, 1991, John Deere filed a new registration in respect of the same collateral. In this registration, the name of the debtor was shown as Joseph J. Plante.

On January 29, 1991, after hearing oral evidence, McGarry J., sitting as Bankruptcy Judge, made a receiving order against the debtor. The appellant, Price Waterhouse Limited, was appointed trustee of the bankrupt estate. The trustee in bankruptcy brought a motion in the bankruptcy court for an order that the interest of John Deere was subordinate to the interest of the trustee in the collateral. The motion was dismissed by Brockenshire J. with costs.

SECTION 97 OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT

Brockenshire J. was of the opinion that even if he was wrong in his interpretation of s. 20(2)(b) of the P.P.S.A., the priority of John Deere over the trustee in bankruptcy was saved by s. 97(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (the name of the Act was changed in 1992 to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but this case arose prior to the change of name).

On the argument of the appeal, counsel for the respondent informed the court that he was no longer relying upon s. 97(1) to support the priority of John Deere. In view of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Halpenny v. Paddon, 1982 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 559 on the effect of s. 97(1) where there has been a failure to register a security, I believe that counsel was right in concluding that s. 97(1) was of no assistance to the respondent in this case.

THE RELEVANT LAW FOR THIS APPEAL

By s. 16(1) of O. Reg. 372/89 (now s. 16(1) of R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 912), the name of the debtor who is a natural person should be set out in the financing statement to show the first given name, followed by the initial of the second given name, if any, followed by the surname. The financing statement registered by John Deere on April 2nd, 1990, should have shown the name of the debtor as Joseph J. Plante, as was done in the registration on January 25, 1991. Since a reasonable person making a search under the P.P.S.A. registration system under the name Joseph J. Plante would not have been able to discover the security interest of John Deere, the security interest of John Deere was unperfected at the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. The curative section, s. 46(4) of the P.P.S.A., is of no assistance to John Deere, since the error in the name was likely to mislead materially a reasonable person: Re Lambert 1995 CanLII 3500 (ON CA), (1994), 20 O.R. (3d) 108 (C.A.).

The predecessor section to s. 20 of the P.P.S.A. was s. 22 of R.S.O. 1980, c. 375. The relevant parts of s. 22 for the purposes of this appeal are the following:

22. (1) Except as provided in subsection (3), an unperfected security interest is subordinate to,

(a) the interest of a person,

. . . .

Digitized by Google

(iii) who represents the creditors of the debtor as assignee for the benefit of creditors, trustee in bankruptcy or receiver; and

. . . .

(2) The rights of a person under subclause (1)(a)(iii) in respect of the collateral are referable to the date from which his status has effect and arise without regard to the personal knowledge of the representative if any represented creditor was, on the relevant date, without knowledge of the unperfected security interest. [Emphasis added.]

The interpretation of these parts of s. 22 were discussed by Anderson J. in Re Hillstead (1979), 26 O.R. (2d) 289 (Bktcy.). In that case, the debtor, as purchaser, entered into two conditional sales contracts with the respondent as vendor. Before a financing statement was registered, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the debtor. The financing statement was registered prior to the making of the receiving order.

In holding that the security interest of the conditional vendor was subordinate to that of the trustee in bankruptcy, Anderson J. relied on s-ss. (4) and (5) of s. 50 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3. Subsections (4) and (5) of s. 50 are now s-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. They provide:

71. (1) A bankruptcy shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at the time of the filing of, the petition on which a receiving order is made or of the filing of an assignment with the official receiver.

(2) On a receiving order being made or an assignment being filed with an official receiver, a bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with his property, which shall, subject to this Act and to the rights of secured creditors, forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee named in the receiving order or assignment, and in any case of change of trustee the property shall pass from trustee to trustee without any conveyance, assignment or transfer.

On the basis of these subsections, Anderson J. concluded (at p. 291) that "the date from which the status of the trustee has effect is the date of the filing of the petition."

In 1989, the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 375 and amending Acts were repealed and replaced by the Personal Property Security Act, S.O. 1989, c. 16. Section 20 of that Act (now s. 20 of R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10) replaced s. 22 of the former Act. The relevant portions of s. 20 for the purposes of this appeal are the following:

20. (1) Except as provided in subsection (3), until perfected, a security interest,

(a) in collateral is subordinate to the interest of,

(i) a person who has a perfected security interest in the same collateral or who has a lien given under any other Act or by a rule of law or who has a priority under any other Act, or

. . . .

(b) in collateral is not effective against a person who represents the creditors of the debtor, including an assignee for the benefit of creditors and a trustee in bankruptcy;

. . . .

(2) The rights of a person,

(a) who has a statutory lien referred to in subclause (1)(a) (i) arise,

(i) in the case of the bankruptcy of the debtor, at the effective date of the bankruptcy, or

. . . .

(b) under clause (1)(b) in respect of the collateral are to be determined as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect. [Emphasis added.]

As can be seen, for a statutory lien, the rights of the holder of such a lien arise in the case of the bankruptcy of the debtor at the "effective date of bankruptcy". Brockenshire J. was of the opinion that, in light of s. 71(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, the "effective date of bankruptcy" is clearly the date of the petition. I agree with this interpretation of s. 20(2)(a)(i). The words "effective date of bankruptcy" are apt to describe the dating back of the trustee's title which occurs by reason of s. 71(1).

Brockenshire J. was, however, of the view that "the date from which the [trustee's] representative status takes effect" in s. 20(2)(b) refers to the date of the receiving order, not the date of the filing of the petition. At pp. 43-44, he set out his reasons for coming to this conclusion:

> In my view, in light of s. 71(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, the "effective date of a bankruptcy" is clearly the date of the petition. However "the date from which the trustee's representative status takes effect" in my view is the date of the receiving order which appoints the person. To hold that the latter date should also be the date of the petition would make meaningless the difference in wording of the two subsections of s. 20 of the new P.P.S.A. The words used in s. 20(2)(a)(i) are new to the statute, and the words in s. 20(2)(b) contain a significant change > from "status has effect", to "status takes effect". It has been said that where the legislature has changed the language of an Act, it is generally to be presumed that it thereby intended to change the law -- Ottawa (City) v. Hunter 1900 CanLII 10 (SCC), (1900), 31 S.C.R. 7. In my view "status has effect" can be taken to encompass the "relating back" provision, as was decided by Anderson J., but "status takes effect" can, in the context of s. 20 as a whole, and of the scheme of the Bankruptcy Act, only mean the date of the receiving order.

As I read this passage, Brockenshire J. arrived at the conclusion that the relevant date was the date of the receiving order for two reasons: (a) the use of the words "effective date of bankruptcy" in s. 20(2)(a)(i) as contrasted with "as of the date from which the person's representative status takes effect" in s. 20(2)(b); and (b) the change from "status has effect" in former s. 22(2) to "status takes effect" in s. 20(2)(b) of the present P.P.S.A.

With regard to the second reason, I can, with respect, discern no difference between "status has effect" and "status takes effect". In my opinion, the drafter of the legislation has simply used a more active verb "takes" in place of the rather passive verb "has".

The first reason is, however, more troublesome. Although it is difficult to say why the drafter used different wording in s. 20(2)(a)(i) and s. 20(2)(b), I do not believe that the drafter intended any change in s. 20(2)(b) from the interpretation that had been given by Anderson J. in Re Hillstead, supra. In their text, The Ontario Personal Property Security Act - Commentary and Analysis, Professor Jacob S. Ziegel and David L. Denomme (Aurora: Canada Law Book, Inc., 1994) refer to the decision in this case and Brockenshire J.'s query why the drafter would have used different wording, and they give this answer (at pp. 155-56):

We believe the answer to Brockenshire J.'s question is that there is no evidence to indicate the drafters of the new Ontario Act intended to change the prior position, and no reason why they should have, and that there is no rule of construction or even a presumption that differences in language indicate differences in desired outcomes unless there is additional evidence to support this conclusion. [Footnote omitted.]

I agree with these comments.

By virtue of s. 71(1) of the Bankruptcy Act, when a receiving order is made against a debtor, bankruptcy begins for all purposes at the date of the filing of the petition: R. v. Louis Minden and Mindens Ltd., [1935] O.R. 486 at 489 (C.A.). The bankruptcy of a debtor is deemed to have relation back to and to commence at the time of the presentation of the petition on which the receiving order is made: Re Clayton's Women's Wear Ltd.; Ex parte Louis K. Liggett Co. Ltd., [1933] O.R. 492 at 498 (C.A.). If Brockenshire J. is right in his interpretation of s. 20(2)(b), then s. 20(2)(b) would, in effect, be amending s. 71(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. By interpreting "the date from which the person's representative status takes effect" as being the date of the filing of the petition, this difficulty is avoided.

In Re Cronin Fire Equipment Ltd. reflex, (1993), 14 O.R. (3d) 269 (Gen. Div.), a financing statement purporting to renew a registration under the P.P.S.A. was registered after the filing of a petition in bankruptcy but before the making of a receiving order. In Cronin, Rosenberg J. declined to follow the decision of Brockenshire J. in this case and held that the interest of the trustee in bankruptcy had priority over the security interest of the creditor. The manner in which Rosenberg J. arrived at this result is commented on critically by Ziegel and Denomme, op. cit. (footnote 25 on P. 155). Suffice it to say that I agree with the result reached by Rosenberg J., even though the way in which the learned judge arrived at that result is not the same as mine.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, in the case of a receiving order, I am of the opinion that "the date from which the person's representative status takes effect" in s. 20(2)(b) of the P.P.S.A. is the date of the filing of the petition. I would, therefore, allow the appeal, set aside the order below and, in its place, make a declaration that the interest of the respondent John Deere in the cabin cruiser is not effective against the appellant, the trustee in bankruptcy. The appellant will be entitled to its costs here and below.

The Honourable Mr. Justice Lambert (pp. 30-43, paras. 58-81)
Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Donald:
[1] Hallmark Ford Sales Ltd. agreed to sell a truck to Greg Allan Ellingsen and let him take the truck to his logging operations without paying for it. Hallmark transferred ownership to Ellingsen on the expectation that the deal would be financed by a bank. Ellingsen would cover the balance by a trade-in.
[2] Various delays occurred in the financing arrangements. Three months after taking the truck Ellingsen went into bankruptcy. The Trustee now has the truck (or its sale proceeds) and asserts that it is an asset forming part of the general estate of the bankrupt.
[3] The Trustee brought a motion in the Supreme Court of British Columbia in bankruptcy for an order that the truck is vested in the Trustee free and clear of any claims by Hallmark and for an order that Hallmark discharge a registration against the truck in the Personal Property Registry. The latter refers to a registration filed in desperation by Hallmark after the bankruptcy occurred.
[4] On 29 September 1997 the motion was granted on the terms sought by the Trustee. Hallmark appeals from this decision on several grounds, including the contention that the chambers judge erred in failing to find a remedial constructive trust in its favour. As I would allow the appeal on that ground, I do not propose to discuss the other grounds of appeal. In my judgment, a constructive trust is necessary to prevent an unjust enrichment.
[5] The deal in question took place on 2 January 1997 at Hallmark's lot in Surrey. Hallmark agreed to take back a used truck it had earlier sold to Ellingsen under an incorrect declaration that the truck had not been in an accident involving more than $2,000 damage. In arranging the sale of the new truck Hallmark ascribed a trade-in value to the old truck as though it had not been previously damaged. To complete the purchase Ellingsen needed financing to pay out the outstanding balance of approximately $27,500 due under a conditional sales contract in favour of the Bank of Nova Scotia and to cover the balance of the purchase price of the new truck, $12,105.11.
[6] Ellingsen completed the required credit application, and advised Johann Halldorson, the salesman, that if the credit application was not approved, his own bank in Penticton, the Bank of Nova Scotia, would be willing to finance the deal. He said he needed to conclude the transaction quickly as he had to return to work up north in the bush. The credit application was left with Randy Jenks, the business manager of Hallmark.
[7] Jenks attempted to obtain financing on behalf of Ellingsen for the transaction. He initially called the Bank of Nova Scotia and determined the amount required to pay out the conditional sales contract and then called the Hongkong Bank to seek credit approval for the required amount of $39,641.10. He also spoke to the manager of Ellingsen's bank in Penticton, who indicated that he was prepared to work with Hallmark on the deal, but he wanted to see Ellingsen and receive the deal information first.
[8] Approximately three hours later that same day, Ellingsen returned to the dealership and was told by Jenks that financing had not yet been obtained. Ellingsen put pressure on Hallmark to complete the transaction as he was eager to leave for his job in the north. Jenks deposes that as a result of the pressure and based on the expectation that approval of financing would be forthcoming, he agreed to permit the delivery of the new truck to Ellingsen and to transfer the new truck into his name. Before doing so, Jenks had Ellingsen sign a Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement dated 2 January, 1997; a Hongkong Bank Conditional Sales Agreement bearing the same date; a blank Scotia Bank Buyer's Statement and two blank Scotia Bank Conditional Sales Agreements; a blank Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement; and a blank Credit Application for the Hongkong Bank of Canada. He also had Ellingsen sign a transfer form transferring the old truck to Hallmark which Jenks intended to process upon completion of the financing for the new truck. Jenks asked Ellingsen to sign the above noted documents in blank in case they were needed as part of the financing package. Hallmark executed the transfer but none of the other documents.

[9] Jenks then arranged for Ellingsen's insurance and Ellingsen left the dealership with the new truck. Jenks claims that the sale was conditional upon the financing being obtained, and says that although he never expressed to Ellingsen what would happen if the financing was not obtained, it was clear that the transaction was subject to the obtaining of financing. He maintains that it was always understood that Hallmark had not agreed to finance the transaction and that it was obvious that in the event financing approval was not obtained, Ellingsen would be required to return the new truck.

[10] The Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement dated 2 January, 1997 signed by Ellingsen stipulated that the transaction was "subject to credit approval". Under "Purchaser Declarations" it said:

> Purchaser understands that this agreement does not become binding on the parties hereto until accepted and executed by a duly authorized official of the Dealer. Salespersons do not have this authority. Deposits, partial payments and down payments are non-refundable.

[11] Ellingsen denies that it was ever expressed to him that the sale was conditional, and agrees that the issue of what would happen if the financing was declined was never discussed, as he had not anticipated there would be a problem.

[12] On 8 January 1997 the Hongkong Bank advised Hallmark that it would finance the transaction provided Ellingsen made a downpayment of $5,000. Jenks called Ellingsen and told him about the approval subject to a downpayment, and Ellingsen advised that he could not make that payment until he arrived from his work up north. Jenks responded that this would be acceptable, and that he needed Ellingsen to sign a new Hongkong Bank Conditional Sales Agreement showing the downpayment. Ellingsen agreed to sign and return the document on receipt. Jenks sent the documents out, and when he did not receive them back, he made numerous unsuccessful attempts to reach Ellingsen.

[13] On 15 March 1997 Ellingsen called Hallmark to ask that it "pay out the lien" on the old truck, and if it did not, Hallmark would have to come and get the new truck. Halldorson told Ellingsen that Jenks needed the contract, referring to the $5,000 downpayment, signed and returned. Approximately one week later, Ellingsen spoke to Jenks, who informed him again that Hallmark could not pay out the lien on the old truck until the financing contract was signed and returned, and that the old truck had been sitting on Hallmark's lot since January and that Hallmark could not process the transfer until the financing on the new truck had been concluded. Ellingsen told Jenks, as he had told Halldorson earlier, that he would return from the bush in April and he would deal with the paperwork then.

[14] On 11 April 1997 Jenks received a call from an employee of the Bank of Nova Scotia about payment of the lien on the old truck. Jenks informed her that he could not pay out the amount owed until he had received the financing documentation on the new truck, and that if he had not received it within two weeks, he was going to try to find the new truck and bring it back to Hallmark. On the same day, Ellingsen filed an assignment into bankruptcy. After the bankruptcy, the Bank of Nova Scotia seized the old truck from the Hallmark lot pursuant to its conditional sales contract which had been registered at the Personal Property Registry.

[15] Shortly after the assignment into bankruptcy, a representative of the Trustee advised Hallmark that Hallmark had no claim on the new truck as a Financing Statement under the Personal Property Security Act had not been filed. Without obtaining legal advice, Hallmark then filed a financing statement in the Personal Property Registry.

[16] In the court below Hallmark framed its argument on the law of trust in the manner described by the chambers judge:

> [11] Hallmark's position is that there was never a concluded sale of the new truck to Ellingsen, and that beneficial ownership of the new truck did not ever pass. Hallmark says that Ellingsen held only bare legal title, and was a trustee of the beneficial interest in the new truck in favour of Hallmark. Hallmark further says that there was no security interest which existed and could be registered in this case given the nature of the transaction, and consequently, the PPSA has no application. Finally, Hallmark says that the trustee has no interest in the new truck, given the express provisions of the BIA [Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act], and particularly s. 67 of the same, which provides that the property of the bankrupt shall not comprise property held by a bankrupt in trust for another.

[17] The chambers judge concluded that the transaction was a sale rather than a creation of a trust. She held that the unpaid sales price gave rise to a security interest which could have been registered and had it been registered it would have protected Hallmark from the bankruptcy. Her reasoning went as follows:

Digitized by Google

> [12] I cannot accept that the nature of the transaction between Hallmark and Ellingsen in January of 1997 was the creation of a trust. On the facts, Ellingsen must have considered that he had purchased, and that he owned, the new truck, even though the purchase price had not as of yet been paid. It is inconceivable that, as Hallmark now argues, Ellingsen could have driven the new truck in his work up north for more than three months, and then simply returned the new truck to Hallmark, or that he could have resisted an action by Hallmark for the purchase price of the new truck, on the basis that no deal had been made between the parties.
> [13] Further, Hallmark did not conduct itself in a way that would be consistent with a trust relationship, with mere legal title to the new truck having passed. Hallmark was aware, within weeks of the transaction, that there was a problem with financing. Hallmark made no effort to obtain possession of the truck, or to even demand return of the truck. The only interest Hallmark had at that time was to receive payment for the truck from someone, whether it be Ellingsen, or a finance company, or a combination of the two.
> [14] I have concluded, on these facts, that the nature of the transaction was a sale, with payment anticipated and agreed by the parties to be made shortly after the transfer of title and possession. The transaction created what was in substance a security interest, as that term is defined in s. 1 and s. 2 of the PPSA, on the part of Hallmark, which Hallmark could, and given what happened should, have registered in the Personal Property Registry. Given that Hallmark did not register, and thereby perfect, its security interest prior to the date of bankruptcy, I find that the new truck forms part of the bankrupt's estate, and is available for distribution to the estate's creditors.

[18] With respect, I do not think the evidence reasonably supports the finding that this was a sale and that Hallmark retained a security interest after it released the truck. The deal was subject to financing by a third party which never materialized. There was no enforceable instrument on which Hallmark could sue Ellingsen for the purchase price. As Hallmark did not sign the Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement it was never brought into effect. Ellingsen did not agree to pay cash for the new truck and at no time did Hallmark agree to finance the deal itself. The documents make it plain that credit was to be approved by a lending institution.

[19] Hallmark imprudently transferred ownership registration to Ellingsen and therein lies the problem. On the surface the transfer implies that a concluded contract of purchase and sale took place and that the relationship between the parties was one of debtor and creditor. But on a full appreciation of all the circumstances I think the only reasonable conclusion is that the proposed sale never occurred because a condition precedent, the proposed financing, was not fulfilled. The transfer facilitated acquisition of insurance and moved the transaction along but it did not complete it.

[20] The Trustee argues that if the term "subject to credit approval" was a condition precedent Hallmark waived it by transferring ownership registration. With respect, I do not think that conforms to the fact that the financing continued to be a problem after the transfer. I note, in particular, that the Hongkong Bank was not prepared to finance the deal as written and insisted that Ellingsen put $5,000 down.

[21] The Trustee further argues that the Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement and the Hongkong Bank Conditional Sales Agreement are structured so that the financing obligation is primarily between the seller and the purchaser with the bank taking the paper as assignee. This is said to establish a debtor-creditor relationship independent of the bank's involvement. While it is true that the full cost of borrowing and the payment schedule are set out in the sales agreement and that the conditional sales agreement is between the seller and purchaser with the bank as assignee, the fact remains that neither agreement was executed. They were not executed because financing was not concluded and so we return to the position that Ellingsen had a truck that he had no right to keep when he was unable to meet the conditions of financing.

[22] The more difficult area for analysis in this case is the relationship between the Personal Property Security Act (PPSA) and the law of remedial constructive trusts. Hallmark's case for a constructive trust can be broken down this way:

1. The contract of sale was ineffective through non-fulfillment of a condition precedent.
2. Hallmark is entitled to a proprietary remedy (return of the truck), on meeting three conditions:
   (a) no transaction effective to vest property rights has taken place;
   (b) it must be possible to trace the property;
   (c) against the actual holder of the property it is unjust that the claimant not be allowed to re-take it: G.H.L. Fridman and J.G. McLeod, Restitution (Toronto: Carswell, 1982) at 568-9.
3. Hallmark meets all three conditions: the contract was ineffective because no financing was arranged; the truck was still in Ellingsen's possession at time of bankruptcy; and Hallmark did not extend credit to Ellingsen. Not having extended credit, Hallmark occupies a different position from that of the general creditors of the bankrupt estate who did extend credit. The creditors would unfairly enjoy a windfall if the truck formed part of the assets available to them: P.D. Maddaugh and J.D. McCamus The Law of Restitution (Aurora: Canada Law Book, 1990) at 137.

Digitized by Google

4. Section 67(1)(a) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) provides that the property of the bankrupt should not comprise property held by a bankrupt in trust for another:

> 67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

5. A trust in the form of a constructive trust should be imposed to prevent an unjust enrichment with the order taking effect just prior to the bankruptcy so that s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA is engaged.

6. Since the trust is constructed as a remedy by the court on the doctrine of unjust enrichment it falls within an exclusion provided in s. 4(a) of the PPSA as an "interest given by a rule of law". Section 4(a) of the PPSA reads:

> Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act does not apply to the following:
> (a) a lien, charge or other interest given by a rule of law or by an enactment unless the enactment contains an express provision that this Act applies;

[Emphasis added]

[23] Hallmark must find an exclusion from the PPSA because if its interest was "a security interest" within the meaning of the PPSA (such interest can include a "trust" if the trust secures payment or performance of an obligation: (s. 2(1)(b)), then unless the interest is perfected by registration it is not effective against the trustee in bankruptcy: s. 20(b)(i). Section 2(1) of the PPSA reads:

> 2 (1) Subject to section 4, this Act applies
> (a) to every transaction that in substance creates a security interest, without regard to its form and without regard to the person who has title to the collateral, and
> (b) without limiting paragraph (a), to a chattel mortgage, a conditional sale, a floating charge, a pledge, a trust indenture, a trust receipt, an assignment, a consignment, a lease, a trust, and a transfer of chattel paper if they secure payment or performance of an obligation.

[Emphasis added]

Section 20(b)(i) reads:

> 20 A security interest
> (b) in collateral is not effective against
> (i) a trustee in bankruptcy if the security interest is unperfected at the date of the bankruptcy, or ...

[24] "Security Interest" is defined in s. 1 of the PPSA as:

> "security interest" means
> (a) an interest in goods, chattel paper, a security, a document of title, an instrument, money or an intangible that secures payment or performance of an obligation, but does not include the interest of a seller who has shipped goods to a buyer under a negotiable bill of lading or its equivalent to the order of the seller or to the order of an agent of the seller, unless the parties have otherwise evidenced an intention to create or provide for a security interest in the goods, and ...

[Emphasis added]

[25] The Trustee submits that this transaction comes within the PPSA and that the interest held by Hallmark is an unperfected interest and thereby ineffective against the Trustee under s. 20(b)(i). The argument is founded on two conditions on the reverse side of the Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement which are said to reserve rights to Hallmark in the event of a default by the purchaser. They are conditions 3(a) and 7(a):

> 3. If any cheque or other bill of exchange tendered as payment of any amount due as set out on the reverse side hereof is dishonoured, such cheque or bill of exchange shall be deemed not to be payment and shall be null and void and of no effect. If any such dishonoured cheque or bill of exchange forms all or part of the amount due by the Purchaser to the Dealer, then:
> (a) the Purchaser agrees that the Dealer shall have immediate possession of the motor vehicle as if the Dealer had never parted with possession and the Dealer may exercise all rights to possession;
> .....
> 7. Subject to paragraph 3 of this Agreement, if the Purchaser defaults in the payment of any amount due hereby or defaults in the performance or observance of any other matter or thing required to be observed

Digitized by Google

> or performed by the Purchaser or if any proceeding is commenced by or against the Purchaser under any bankruptcy or insolvency laws, then
> (a) the entire amount due by the Purchaser to the Dealer shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the Dealer.

[26] The difficulty with this argument is that it is premised on a concluded contract which is absent here. Hallmark's right to recover the truck does not arise, and could not arise, on the conditions quoted above; Hallmark's remedy lies outside the document and is found in the power of the court to provide a restitutionary remedy.

[27] The Trustee submits, in the alternative, that any equitable interest supporting a trust in the circumstances amounts to a security interest for the purposes of the PPSA, in the sense that that interest only existed as a method for securing payment of the truck.

[28] I think this argument goes to the kind of trust, implied or resulting, for which Hallmark argued below and which formed part of Hallmark's alternative submissions before us. As I apprehend the position, an implied or resulting trust arises from an understanding that Ellingsen would hold the truck in trust for Hallmark until financing was completed. But I am not concerned with these other trusts having been persuaded that the appropriate remedy is the constructive trust. I do not know how it could be said that a constructive trust secures a payment or the performance of an obligation; rather its purpose is to prevent an unjust outcome. The chambers judge inquired whether the behaviour of the parties "was consistent with a trust relationship". That can only refer to an implied or a resulting trust and is not relevant to the question whether a constructive trust should be imposed.

[29] The final point raised by the Trustee in relation to the PPSA is that s. 20(b)(i) provides a "juristic reason" for the deprivation of Hallmark and the corresponding enrichment of the general creditors of the estate. This refers to the classic three-part formula for determining unjust enrichment. McLachlin J. (now C.J.C.) put it this way in Peter v. Beblow, 1993 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 980 at 987:

> The basic notions are simple enough. An action for unjust enrichment arises when three elements are satisfied: (1) an enrichment; (2) a corresponding deprivation; and (3) the absence of a juristic reason for the enrichment. These proven, the action is established and the right to claim relief made out.

[30] If Hallmark's interest is a security interest the consequences of not registering the interest are prescribed by s. 20(b)(i) of the PPSA. The collateral goes into the general estate by operation of statute and hence a juristic reason exists for the enrichment. It is necessary to repeat, in order to deal with this point, that in my opinion Hallmark's interest was not a security interest within the meaning of the Act. There was nothing to register. The truck was not collateral to any enforceable contract. The substance of the transaction, not its form, must determine whether a security interest was created: see Skybridge Holdings Inc. (Trustee of) v. British Columbia (Registrar of Travel Services) 1999 BCCA 185 (CanLII), (1999), 173 D.L.R. (4th) 333, 68 B.C.L.R. (3d) 209 (C.A.). It follows that s. 20(b)(i) does not provide a juristic reason in answer to a claim of unjust enrichment.

[31] Is this an appropriate case for a remedial constructive trust? Two issues arise for discussion. First, why should equity intervene in a commercial transaction where Hallmark could have protected itself contractually? Second, is it appropriate to use a constructive trust to alter the priorities amongst creditors in a bankruptcy?

[32] On the first question, it is useful to refer to an article by D.M. Paciocco: "The Remedial Constructive Trust: A Principled Basis for Priorities Over Creditors" (1989) 68 Canadian Bar Review 315. Professor Paciocco distinguishes between the application of the constructive trust in family and commercial settings, arguing that the courts should be cautious in ordering specific relief in commercial cases. The constructive trust was adopted in the matrimonial context as a means of explaining the specific relief that courts were already awarding under the awkward resulting trust analysis. There is no parallel in the commercial context. Unlike in the spousal context, in commercial contexts parties are expected to protect their interests contractually. In addition, there are the further considerations of security of title as tied to efficiency of commerce and the protection of third parties from undisclosed charges. He concludes at 351:

> In commercial cases proprietary relief will not be warranted where the plaintiff parted with the property or money which represents the defendant's enrichment, while accepting the role of a general creditor. This will occur where there is a valid contract between the parties which accounts for the defendant's enrichment, or a contract which has been avoided where the condition which rendered the contract ineffective does not vitiate the voluntariness of the plaintiff's decision to assume the role of a general creditor...

[33] In her majority reasons in Peter v. Beblow, McLachlin J. refused to distinguish between family and commercial cases. She said at 996-97:

> I doubt the wisdom of dividing unjust enrichment cases into two categories – commercial and family – for the purpose of determining whether a constructive trust lies. ... In short, the concern for clarity and doctrinal integrity with which this court has long been preoccupied in this area mandates that the basic principles governing the rights and remedies for unjust enrichment remain the same for all cases.

Digitized by Google

[34] The more specific answer to the learned commentator's proposition as quoted above is that in the present case Hallmark never intended to grant credit to Ellingsen and so there is no justification for placing Hallmark in a class of general creditors.

[35] As I have said, Hallmark was imprudent in allowing the truck to leave the lot as it did, but it accepted the risk in the interest of good customer relations that it may have to take back a used truck if financing fell through, and in that event it would not be able to recover the depreciation. Ellingsen induced Hallmark to believe that he would be able to meet the Bank's cash requirements for the loan and so Hallmark waited the three months before bankruptcy occurred. Ellingsen knew he had no right to keep the truck and said as much to Jenks, the business manager of Hallmark, when he suggested during the telephone conversation of 15 March 1997 that Hallmark would have to pick up the truck.

[36] On the second question, that dealing with the priority of creditors, I wish to refer to the Ontario Court of Appeal decision in Barnabe v. Touhey 1995 CanLII 1672 (ON CA), (1995), 26 O.R. (3d) 477, which reversed a ruling that a court may impose a constructive trust for the very purpose of securing priority for some claimants over other creditors. At 479 the Court said:

> While a constructive trust, if appropriately established, could have the effect of the beneficiary of the trust receiving payment out of funds which would otherwise become part of the estate of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors, a constructive trust, otherwise unavailable, cannot be imposed for that purpose. This would amount to imposing what may be a fair result as between the constructive trustee and beneficiary, to the unfair detriment of all other creditors of the bankrupt.

[37] The Court of Appeal went on to determine that there was no unjust enrichment on the facts of the case so the above remarks are probably obiter dicta. Nevertheless, the case serves as a useful caution that in weighing the equities other creditors may have to be considered. In my judgment, for the reasons I have given, Hallmark does not stand on the same footing as the general creditors and as a result I do not think the remedy I would impose unfairly deprives other creditors of an asset to which they have any reasonable entitlement.

[38] I turn to consider the issue of timing: can the constructive trust be imposed prior to the bankruptcy? In order for the remedy to have any practical effect, it must be imposed before the bankruptcy, otherwise s. 67(1)(a) of the BIA could not operate. Support for the proposed timing can be found in Rawluk v. Rawluk, [1990] S.C.R. 70 at 91:

> It is important in this respect to keep in mind that a property interest arising under a constructive trust can be recognized as having come into existence not when the trust is judicially declared but from the time when the unjust enrichment first arose. As Professors Oosterhoff and Gillese state, "the date at which a constructive trust arises...is now generally accepted to be the date upon which a duty to make restitution occurs" (Oosterhoff and Gillese, A.H. Oosterhoff: Text, Commentary and Cases on Trusts (3rd ed. 1987), at p. 579). Professor Scott has stated in Law of Trusts, op. cit., at pp. 323-4, that:
> > The beneficial interest in the property is from the beginning in the person who has been wronged. The constructive trust arises from the situation in which he is entitled to the remedy of restitution, and it arises as soon as that situation is created. ... It would seem that there is no foundation whatever for the notion that a constructive trust does not arise until it is decreed by a court. It arises when the duty to make restitution arises, not when that duty is subsequently enforced.

[39] McLachlin J., in giving the minority judgment, agreed at 103 that the property interest, if conferred, may extend back to the point when it arose.

> That property interest, it appears, may be taken as extending back to the date when the trust was "earned" or perfected. In Hussey v. Palmer, in a passage referred to by Dickson J. in Rathwell v. Rathwell...Lord Denning postulated that the interest may arise at the time of declaration or from the outset, as the case may require. Scott views the trust as being in force from the outset, with a discretion in the court as to whether it should be enforced: Scott op. cit., §462.2. Another American scholar regards it as coming into existence only on an order being made, but having retrospective operation: Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees, (2nd ed. 1979), §472.

[40] Hallmark was entitled to the return of the truck when it became certain that the condition precedent could not be fulfilled. This point would have been reached, at the latest, when it became obvious that Ellingsen was stalling Hallmark for time without any real prospect of being able to put $5,000 down on the truck. In these circumstances it would be appropriate to make the order for a remedial constructive trust effective on and after 15 March 1997 when Ellingsen told Hallmark that it would have to come and get the new truck. Accordingly, the remedial constructive trust would have been in effect on the date of Ellingsen's assignment in bankruptcy on 11 April 1997.

[41] For these reasons I would allow the appeal and impose a constructive trust on the truck in favour of Hallmark with effect from 15 March 1997. I understand that by agreement the truck has been sold and the proceeds held by the Trustee pending the decision on this appeal. The restitutionary remedy I intend will be satisfied by payment of those proceeds plus costs.

Dissenting Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Chief Justice McEachern:

[42] I have read the Reasons for Judgment of Mr. Justice Donald on this appeal. I regret that I am unable to agree with the conclusions he has reached. I am, however, content to accept the careful statement of the facts that he has prepared and I need not repeat what he has said in that regard.

[43] In my judgment, Mr. Ellingsen purchased the new truck from Hallmark by turning in his old truck, by assuring Hallmark that his bank would finance the purchase if the dealer's financing resources were not fruitful, by signing a Motor Vehicle Purchase Agreement setting out conditions of sale, by accepting registration of the new truck in his name and by taking possession of the new truck.

[44] The Purchase Agreement signed by Mr. Ellingsen provided that the purchase balance would be payable "...in 60 equal monthly installments of $709.05 commencing on the 18 day of Feb. '97 with a final balance of $709.05 to be paid on the 18 day of Jan. 2002..." (clause 8).

[45] It is true this Agreement to Purchase, a printed form, stated "SUBJECT TO CREDIT APPROVAL". The Agreement, however, also provided remedies for the repossession of the truck in the event of non-payment, and Hallmark was at all times the unpaid vendor of the truck. Pending the completion of financing, the obligation of Mr. Ellingsen was to carry out the terms of the agreement. It is unthinkable that Mr. Ellingsen could retain the truck without completing the financing or that Hallmark would be without remedies. Either under the Agreement or at common law, Hallmark was entitled to be paid or to have the truck back. Hallmark, at least, waived the subject clause when it transferred title to Mr. Ellingsen. Mr. Ellingsen, in turn, must be taken to have waived the clause when he retained the truck without arranging the financing. However one analyzes this transaction, mutual obligations arose as soon as Mr. Ellingsen took possession of the truck.

[46] Accordingly, I have no doubt that this Purchase Agreement, or the mutual obligations undertaken by the parties, created a security interest in favour of Hallmark as defined in the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 359 (the Act). In fact, Hallmark registered it as such after Mr. Ellingsen had filed for bankruptcy and declared the new truck as a part of his estate at the time of his assignment in bankruptcy.

[47] Mr. Casey, in his able argument, conceded that he had to rely upon a trust analysis in order to escape the consequences of the Act. Mr. Justice Donald has undertaken such an analysis and concludes that there was no completed sale, and that it would be an unjust enrichment to the estate if Hallmark were deprived of its property interest in the new truck. He relies in part on the classic definition of a constructive trust furnished by McLachlin J. (now C.J.C.) in Peter v. Beblow, 1993 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 980 at 987:

> ...An action for unjust enrichment arises when three elements are satisfied: (1) an enrichment, (2) a corresponding deprivation, and (3) the absence of a juristic reason for the enrichment. These proven, the action is established and the right to claim relief made out.

[48] With respect, there are good juristic reasons for this enrichment (if such it is) in the provisions of the Act, which is intended to provide the certainty that is so necessary in the commercial law. It is probably unnecessary to point out that the assertion of a constructive trust based on unjust enrichment could become commonplace, with unfortunate commercial consequences, if such a remedy is made available upon a failure to make the necessary filings under the Act.

[49] Assuming for the moment that there was no completed purchase agreement in this case, which I do not accept, it becomes necessary to analyze further the position of Hallmark to see whether its then rights would prevail against a trustee in bankruptcy. This requires a closer examination of the Act.

[50] As already mentioned, there is no doubt Mr. Ellingsen agreed to purchase the truck and pay for it by trading in his old truck and by financing the balance at his own bank if necessary. On this basis, he took possession (and title) to the truck. There was no thought or discussion of a trust.

[51] What happened, obviously, was that Hallmark took a chance that the purchase price would be paid by or on behalf of Mr. Ellingsen, and Hallmark neglected to perfect its security interest by the appropriate filing until after the bankruptcy of Ellingsen.

[52] This is precisely the kind of case the Legislature had in mind when it enacted the Act.

[53] A "security interest" under the Act means "an interest in goods ... that secures payment or performance of an obligation..." At the very least, this transaction, even if characterized as a failed Purchase Agreement, entitled Hallmark to a return of the vehicle or to a debt and a corresponding obligation on Mr. Ellingsen to return the truck or pay for it. I need say no more about debt because such a debt would not prevail over a trustee in bankruptcy. If Hallmark's entitlement was to a return of the vehicle, that interest could only be protected by an appropriate filing under the Act.

[54] This is because, subject to section 4, the Act applies:

> ...to every transaction that in substance creates a security interest, without regard to its form..." (section 2(1)(a)). (Emphasis added.)

[55] Under this definition the obligation to return the truck creates a security interest in Hallmark.

Digitized by Google

[56] Turning to s. 4, the Act does not apply to interests "given by a rule of law" which could include a constructive trust, although I have serious reservations about the introduction of such concepts into consumer transactions. However, I have already concluded that there are strong juristic reasons militating against the recognition of an unjust enrichment or a constructive trust in the circumstances of this case.

[57] For these reasons, whether or not the Purchase Agreement was a completed agreement, Hallmark must fail in its attempt to establish an unregistered interest in this vehicle that survives a bankruptcy. I would dismiss this appeal.

"The Honourable Chief Justice McEachern"

Concurring Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Lambert:

[58] I have had the advantage of reading, in draft form, the reasons of Mr. Justice Donald and the reasons of Chief Justice McEachern. I agree with Mr. Justice Donald. But Chief Justice McEachern has expressed concerns about the integrity of the Personal Property Security Act and about the potential frustration of the legislative intention underlying that Act. Accordingly, I consider that I should indicate why I do not share those concerns in the circumstances of this case. To the extent that I repeat what has been said by Mr. Justice Donald, I do so only to emphasize that in my opinion the integrity of the Personal Property Security Act remains unimpaired by the decision in this case.

The Scholarly Writing

[59] I have been much assisted in my consideration of this appeal by the insights contained in David M. Paciocco, The Remedial Constructive Trust: A Principled Basis for Priorities Over Creditors (1989), 68 Can.Bar Rev. 315; Leonard Rotman, Deconstructing the Constructive Trust (1999), 37 (1) Alberta Law Review 133; and Robert Chambers, Constructive Trusts in Canada (1999), 37 (1) Alberta Law Review 173. That is by no means a complete list of the scholarly writing about the principles relevant to this appeal.

The Substance of the Transaction

[60] Section 2(1)(a) of the Personal Property Security Act affirms that the Act applies to every transaction that in substance creates a security interest, without regard to its form. That provision gives statutory force to the long-standing principle of equity that equity looks to the substance of events and not to their superficial appearance.

[61] In this case the contemplated transaction was never completed. The contemplated transaction was that Ellingsen would trade in the truck which had been sold to him by Hallmark under a misrepresentation and would purchase in its place a second truck for a higher price which would be financed either by the H.S.B.C. Bank or, if that financing did not go into place, by the Bank of Nova Scotia, Penticton Branch. It was never contemplated that Hallmark would finance the purchase. The contemplated financing security was to be in place before the transaction was complete. But because Ellingsen had bought the first truck under a misrepresentation, and because he needed a truck in his work, he was given possession of the truck, and of documents which made him the registered owner, before the financing was in place.

[62] In my opinion, the financing being in place was a condition precedent to the completion of the contract of purchase and sale of the second truck. That condition was never fulfilled. The registration of Ellingsen or his company as owner of the second truck is merely some evidence of ownership but it is not conclusive of true substantive ownership. The registration carries with it the consequence of being regarded as owner under the Motor Vehicle Act but it does not confer true ownership if ownership does not exist in fact. See Larocque v. Lutz reflex, (1980), 16 B.C.L.R. 348 at 351 (B.C.S.C. per Ruttan, J.) affirmed on this point and others, 1981 CanLII 419 (BC CA), (1981), 27 B.C.L.R. 357 at 366 (B.C.C.A.); Singh v. McRae, reflex, [1971] 5 W.W.R. 544 (B.C.S.C.); and Peters v. Shoreview Enterprises Ltd., [1987] B.C.J. No. 1687, (Q.L.) at p.9 (B.C.S.C.). Since the condition precedent to Ellingsen's acquisition of ownership of the second truck was never fulfilled and never waived, it is my opinion that Ellingsen never acquired ownership of the truck or of a proprietary interest in the truck.

[63] It seems to me to follow that the truck should not form any part of Ellingsen's estate in bankruptcy. Ellingsen had no interest at all in the truck after he told Hallmark that Hallmark could come and retake possession of the truck. At that time he abandoned any interest he may have had in the truck arising from his right to fulfil the condition precedent by completing the financing. So at that point the truck was owned entirely by Hallmark and Ellingsen only had simple possession.

[64] This point was not the focus of the argument at trial or on appeal, where it was assumed, as I understand the arguments, that Ellingsen had acquired some form of title. The argument was about whether that form of title was held as trustee for Hallmark. But when I consider the substance of the transaction between Ellingsen and Hallmark, as I am required to do both for the purposes of the Personal Property Security Act and for the purposes of determining the application of equitable principles, it is the substance which I have just described which ought to govern the application of the statute and the creation of the equities. However, the fact that Ellingsen's interest was mere possession does not prevent the imposition of a remedial constructive trust, either as against Ellingsen himself or against his trustee in bankruptcy. See Paciocco at p.329, and the authorities cited in footnote 75.

Unjust Enrichment in Commercial Cases

Digitized by Google

[65] It was said in Pettkus v. Becker, 1980 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 834 at 848, and repeated often since, that what is required to establish an unjust enrichment is:

(1) An enrichment,
(2) a corresponding deprivation, and
(3) the absence of a juristic reason for the enrichment.

But like most simple legal tests it must be applied thoughtfully and not mechanically, particularly with respect to whether there is a juristic reason for the enrichment which is said to have taken the enrichment out of the category of being "unjust". The juristic reason may be legal or equitable or both. But it must be measured in accordance with the principles of equity which underlie the remedies of restitution and the remedial constructive trust. So the "injustice" of an enrichment must be measured by the standard of "good conscience" and, in a commercial case, the "good conscience" must be good commercial conscience.

[66] With respect to the requirement of "good commercial conscience", I refer to the majority judgment of four judges of this Court in Atlas Cabinets& Furniture Ltd. v. Nat. Trust Co. 1990 CanLII 1312 (BC CA), (1990), 45 B.C.L.R. (2d) 99, particularly at pp. 109-112. At p.109, in relation to the three tests for unjust enrichment set out in Pettkus v. Becker, this was said:

> In the context of a domestic relationship those three circumstances are likely to be simpler to apply than in the context of a commercial relationship, where the essence of the relationship is the enrichment of the participants, perhaps at the expense of each other, all in the name of fair and honest business dealing. In a domestic relationship, equality of the parties to the relationship should normally be the standard of fairness. But, in a business relationship, honest dealing, not equal dealing, should set the standard of fairness. That is not to say that the three factors enumerated in Pettkus v. Becker are not equally applicable in commercial cases. They were referred to and treated as applicable in the majority reasons, on this point , of Chief Justice Dickson in Hunter v. Syncrude, at p.471. But it is important to understand what is meant by "enrichment", by "deprivation" and by "juristic reason" in the context of a commercial relationship where ordinary and extraordinary flows of funds are part of the reality and purpose of the relationship. To my mind the key to the correct interpretation and application of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada on this subject to a commercial relationship is to focus on the "unjust" element of "unjust enrichment".

> In my opinion the concept of the injustice of the enrichment as being against sound commercial conscience must continue to guide the application of the three tests in Pettkus v. Becker when they are applied to a commercial relationship.

[67] In my opinion that passage continues to set out the applicable principles with respect to unjust enrichment in a commercial relationship.

The Remedial Constructive Trust in Commercial Cases

[68] The leading case on the application of a remedial constructive trust in a commercial case is Soulos v. Korkontzilas, 1997 CanLII 346 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 217 (S.C.C.) where the judgment of a majority of five judges in a seven judge division was given by Madam Justice McLachlin. The case was a commercial case. After reviewing the authorities, Madam Justice McLachlin said this, at p.236, para.34:

> It thus emerges that a constructive trust may be imposed where good conscience so requires. The inquiry into good conscience is informed by the situations where constructive trusts have been recognized in the past. It is also informed by the dual reasons for which constructive trusts have traditionally been imposed: to do justice between the parties and to maintain the integrity of institutions dependent on trust-like relationships. Finally, it is informed by the absence of an indication that a constructive trust would have an unfair or unjust effect on the defendant or third parties, matters which equity has always taken into account. Equitable remedies are flexible; their award is based on what is just in all the circumstances of the case.

[69] While it is not necessary for the purposes of this case to add anything to the passage I have quoted, I think that these passages from the judgment of Mr. Justice Deane in the High Court of Australia in Muschinski v. Dodds, [1986] 60 A.L.J.R. 52, at p.65 indicate an important feature of the limits of the remedial constructive trust:

> The fact that the constructive trust remains predominantly remedial does not, however, mean that it represents a medium for the indulgence of idiosyncratic notions of fairness and justice. As an equitable remedy, it is available only when warranted by established equitable principles or by the legitimate processes of legal reasoning, by analogy, induction and deduction, from the starting point of a proper understanding of the conceptual foundation of such principles:....

Digitized by Google

> Viewed as a remedy, the function of the constructive trust is not to render superfluous, but to reflect and enforce, the principles of the law of equity.

[70] It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to decide whether the remedial constructive trust arises when the right to restitution arises, or when the enrichment occurs, or when the juristic reason for the enrichment fails, on the one hand, or whether it arises when declared by the court but with true retroactive effect (not merely retrospective effect) to the date when the right to restitution arose, or when the enrichment occurred, or the juristic reason for the enrichment failed, on the other hand. In this case, as in most cases, the result would be the same, which is probably why the point, as far as I know, must still be regarded as unsettled.

The Remedial Constructive Trust in This Case

[71] The principles applicable to this case are contained in the passage I have just quoted from the reasons of Madam Justice McLachlin in Soulos v. Korkontzilas. A remedial constructive trust will be imposed only if it is required in order to do justice between the parties in circumstances where good commercial conscience determines that the enrichment has been unjust. But a remedial constructive trust is a discretionary remedy. It will not be imposed where an alternative, simpler remedy is available and effective. And it will not be imposed without taking into account the interests of others who may be affected by the granting of the remedy. In this case that would include other creditors of the bankrupt, (both secured creditors and general creditors, since the trust may defeat both), and any relevant third parties.

[72] For the reasons that I have given in describing the substance of the transaction, it is not, in my opinion, in accordance with sound commercial conscience as between Ellingsen and Hallmark to permit Ellingsen to be regarded as retaining a proprietary interest in the second truck over and above his continuing equitable interest, if any, in the first truck.

[73] I turn to the secured creditors and general creditors of the bankrupt. They are set out in the Statement of Affairs which was filed. Except for the bank account of $1,200 and furniture valued at $1,420, both of which were pledged as security, one to the Bank of Nova Scotia and the other to Trans Canada Credit Corporation, the only asset of the estate was said to be the second truck. If the second truck is made subject to a remedial constructive trust then the two secured creditors, if they have claims over and above their security, and all of the general creditors, will receive no recovery on their claims. But there is absolutely nothing in this matter to indicate that the creditors are anything other than ordinary household creditors or ordinary small trade creditors, or to indicate that they advanced credit on the basis that Ellingsen had an unencumbered proprietary interest in the second truck. There is no indication in the material that any third party was misled or prejudiced by an assumption that since no security interest was registered against the second truck, it must be available to meet the demands of Ellingsen's creditors.

[74] In those circumstances, the relationship between Ellingsen and Hallmark invites the imposition of a remedial constructive trust, and there is nothing in the evidence with respect to secured creditors, general creditors or third parties which would make the imposition of a remedial constructive trust improper or contrary to good commercial conscience.

The Integrity of the Personal Property Security Act

[75] If the Personal Property Security Act applied, it would not be prevented from operation by the fact that there was no legally effective document creating a security interest in the collateral represented by the second truck, because no such document is necessary to the registration of a financing statement to perfect a security interest in collateral.

[76] And if the Personal Property Security Act applied, it would not be prevented from operating by the fact that the interest of Ellingsen was possessory only until such time as the condition precedent was fulfilled, since an interest in possession by a non-owner may be sufficient to support the registration of a financing statement to record a security interest by the owner in the collateral.

[77] Furthermore, the Personal Property Security Act may never have applied because the interest of Hallmark in the second truck was not an interest "that secures payment of the performance of an obligation" within the meaning of the definition of "security interests" in the Act, with the result that, there being no security interest in collateral, the Act would have no application. But it is not necessary for me to decide that point and I prefer not to do so until a case arises where it is essential to the decision.

[78] The reason why that point need not be decided is that by the declaration of a remedial constructive trust such as is proposed in this case that trust would become effective at the time when Hallmark was told by Ellingsen on 15 March to come and collect the truck. At that point Ellingsen's possession of the truck unjustly enriched him without any continuing juristic reason and Hallmark became entitled to restitution.

[79] The Personal Property Security Act provides explicitly, in s.4(a), that the Act does not apply to an interest given by a rule of law. The remedial constructive trust that came into being on 15 March, either directly at the time, or retroactively to that time by the declaration of this Court, is an interest given by a rule of law and so is excluded from the operation of the Act.

[80] The integrity of the Personal Property Security Act is maintained because this is not a case of a simple failure to register a financing statement in a timely way. The two elements which protect the integrity of the Act, though imposing a remedial constructive trust in this case, are, first, that the acts of the parties and not the failure to register created the right to restitution and the unjust enrichment, both of which came into being entirely independently of the Act, and both of which came into being through a failure of a contract to arise at all and not from non-performance of a contract or from a breach of contract, and, second, that no one has been shown to have been prejudiced by an absence of registration, neither a secured creditor, nor a general creditor, nor a third party, all of whom must have taken their credit risks without any assumption that the second truck was unencumbered. There is no evidence of any party relying on the absence of registration to extend credit. If there had been such prejudice or any such reliance, then such prejudice or reliance might well have affected the question of whether a remedial constructive trust ought to be declared and, if so, on the terms and extent of the remedial constructive trust.

Conclusion and Disposition

[81] I agree with Mr. Justice Donald. For the reasons I have given in supplement to the reasons of Mr. Justice Donald, I would respond to the motion for directions under s-s.34(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act by declaring that the Truck referred to in the Notice of Motion was held by Ellingsen as a constructive trustee for the benefit of Hallmark on and after 15 March, 1997 and came into the possession of KPMG as Trustee in Bankruptcy of Mr. Ellingsen subject to that constructive trust. It follows, in accordance with s.67(1)(a) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act that the truck was not the property of the bankrupt at the date of bankruptcy and that the funds arising from its disposition must be paid over to Hallmark.

P-4.05, s. 28(1).

The Royal Bank secured a loan made to Sparrow Electric with a general security agreement (GSA) covering Sparrow's present and after-acquired property and with Bank Act security (BAS) created by an assignment of inventory under s. 427 of the Bank Act. When Sparrow experienced financial difficulties, a standstill agreement was executed. This agreement allowed Sparrow to continue its business but permitted the bank, on default, to appoint a receiver and enforce its security. A receiver was appointed in November 1992 at which time it was discovered that Sparrow had not been remitting its payroll deductions as required by s. 153 of the Income Tax Act (ITA). It is probable that these defaults had occurred in 1992. In January 1993, the receiver received court permission to sell Sparrow's assets. An amount from the proceeds of sale equivalent to that owing the federal government was ordered to be held in trust pending resolution as to entitlement. The bank claimed priority based on its GSA and its BAS, which entitled it to inventory proceeds. The federal government's claim was based on the s. 227 ITA deemed trust provisions, which created a deemed statutory trust in the moneys deducted from wages but not remitted to Her Majesty.

On the first application to determine priority, the deemed trust was held to take priority over the GSA. On a subsequent application by the bank for a determination of whether its BAS took priority over the deemed trust, the Court of Queen's Bench found that the deemed trust took priority. The Court of Appeal found that the BAS took priority over the deemed trust. At issue here is whether the s. 227(5) ITA deemed trust takes priority over a previously executed GSA and a previously executed BAS with respect to the proceeds of the sale of the inventory.

Held (La Forest, Gonthier and Cory JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

(1) Section 227(4) and (5) of the Income Tax Act

Although the employer, at the point of withholding, becomes the trustee of a fund which is in law the property of its employee, s. 227(4) ITA has the effect of making Her Majesty the beneficiary under that trust. A conceptual difficulty arises when the tax debtor fails to set aside moneys which are to be remitted. The subject of Her Majesty's beneficial interest at that point becomes intermingled with the general assets of the tax debtor and Her Majesty's claim then becomes that of a beneficiary under a non-existent trust. Subsections (4) and (5) of s. 227 resolve this conceptual dilemma by clearly and unambiguously rendering amounts unremitted as held in trust for Her Majesty. In particular, s. 227(5) is designed to, upon liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, seek out and attach Her Majesty's beneficial interest to property of the debtor which is in existence at that time. The trust is not a real trust, as its subject matter cannot be identified from the date of the trust's creation. However, s. 227(5) has the effect of revitalizing the trust whose subject matter has lost all identity. This identification of the subject matter of the trust therefore occurs ex post facto. Her Majesty has a statutory right to access whatever assets the employer then has, and may realize from those assets the original trust debt. This interpretation is consistent with the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

The s. 227(5) deemed trust operates to Her Majesty's benefit in a secondary manner. Under it, Her Majesty's interest can attach retroactively to disputed collateral if the competing security interest has attached after the deductions giving rise to Her Majesty's claim in fact occurred. Conceptually, the s. 227(5) deemed trust allows that claim to go back in time and attach its outstanding s. 227(4) interest to the collateral before that collateral became subject to a fixed charge. The same result occurs when a statutory lien attaches prior to the mortgaging of disputed collateral. Here, the deductions of tax from the employees' pay cheques occurred after the attachment of the bank's fixed charge to the inventory, so this second aspect of s. 227(5)'s operation did not arise.

The mechanism of s. 227(5) cannot accurately be described as a means of "tracing"; indeed, this subsection is antithetical to tracing in the traditional sense in that it requires no link at all between the subject matter of the trust and the fund or asset into which the subject matter is being traced. Section 227(5) is more accurately described as a "relaxation of the equitable tracing rules".

Section 227(5) does not permit Her Majesty to attach Her beneficial interest to property which, at the time of liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, in law belongs to a party other than the tax debtor. Subsections (4) and (5) of s. 227 are manifestly directed towards the property of the tax debtor, and it would be contrary to well-established authority to stretch the interpretation of s. 227(5) to permit the expropriation of the property of third parties who are not specifically mentioned in the statute.

Therefore, the proper analysis in determining whether Her Majesty is entitled to priority pursuant to these subsections must utilize principles of property law. The nature of the interests competing with those of Her Majesty must be scrutinized in order to determine whether and to what extent such interests have title in the disputed fund. If it is found that legal title in the collateral is in the bank, and not Sparrow, Her Majesty's deemed trust could only attach to Sparrow's equity of redemption.

The "statutory trust" approach can be distinguished from other legislative methods, such as an explicit "Crown priority" provision, used to secure an interest to unremitted payroll deductions. The application of such a provision to a priority competition can proceed without regard to the quality of the "security interest" which competes with Her Majesty's claim. Such a provision simply transfers title in the collateral to Her Majesty regardless of whose interest may compete with it, so long as its requirements are met.

(2) Characterization of the Bank's Interests

The bank's interest in Sparrow's inventory must be characterized as either a floating charge or a fixed and specific charge. A specific charge is one that, without more, fastens on ascertained and definite property or property capable of being ascertained and defined. A floating charge floats with the property which it is intended to affect until it crystallizes. Crystallization occurs upon the default of the debtor and transforms the interest into a fixed and specific charge over the inventory. The critical significance of the characterizing of an interest as being fixed or floating is that it describes the extent to which a creditor can be said to have a proprietary interest in the collateral. During the period in which a charge over inventory is floating, the creditor possesses no legal title to that collateral and a statutory trust or lien attaching during this time will attach to the debtor's interest and take priority over a subsequently crystallized floating charge. A security interest characterized as a fixed and specific charge, however, will take priority over a subsequent statutory lien or charge because all that the lien can attach to is the debtor's equity of redemption in the collateral.

Common law principles did not alter the effect that legislation may have on the characterization of security interests. Here, the Alberta Personal Property Security Act (PPSA) and the Bank Act are determinative of the characterization of the bank's GSA and BAS, respectively. The PPSA explicitly removes statutory trusts from its operation and accordingly does not govern the priority competition between a statutory trust and a security interest. The Act's effect, however, fundamentally changes the characterization of security interests. Generally speaking, absent an express intention to the contrary, a security interest in all present and after-acquired personal property will attach when that agreement is executed by the parties. Once attachment has occurred, the GSA becomes in law a fixed and specific charge over the collateral. For these reasons, the GSA held by the respondent bank must be characterized as a fixed and specific charge with a licence to deal with the inventory that arose because of the bank's granting Sparrow permission to sell the encumbered inventory. The fixed charge attached on the agreement's execution.

Similarly, security taken under the Bank Act is in the nature of a fixed and specific charge. The concept of the fixed charge is correlative to the notion of a creditor's having legal proprietary rights in the collateral. It is misleading to suggest that s. 427 security is in the nature of a floating charge because the bank effectively acquires legal title. Unlike a floating charge which may apply to all property of a specified kind held by the borrower from time to time but does not affix itself specifically upon any particular item of property until it crystallizes upon default by the borrower, s. 427 security is a fixed charge on each item of assigned property held from time to time whether or not the loan is in default. This gives a bank significantly greater rights than it would hold under a floating charge debenture on inventory. For this reason, the security interest of the bank in the form of BAS should be characterized as a fixed and specific charge with a licence to sell the inventory.

The traditional concept of the fixed charge seems to be at odds with the notion of having a proprietary right over collateral such as after-acquired inventory which is not yet in existence at the time the security agreement is executed. A fixed charge over all present and future inventory represents a proprietary interest over a dynamic collective of present and future assets. The conception of this form of charge must change to meet the modern realities of commercial law and in particular the legislative provisions which have been brought to bear in this appeal. In effect, the fixed and specific charge gives to the secured creditor the title (subject to the debtor's equitable right of redemption) to the present inventory of the debtor, as well as the after-acquired inventory of the debtor. In this way, the secured creditor becomes the legal owner of inventory as it comes into possession of the debtor.

Where a secured creditor holds a fixed charge over a debtor's inventory, that charge will have the effect of ensuring the creditor has legal title to any and all inventory subject to the charge at any given time, subject to the caveat (not operative here) that no outstanding statutory payroll deductions had in fact been made prior to the attachment of the fixed charge. Here, the inventory which was subject to the liquidation sale belonged in law to the respondent bank: both under its GSA and its BAS the bank held a fixed charge over Sparrow's inventory. Her Majesty's beneficial interest accordingly could only attach, before its sale, to Sparrow's equity of redemption in the property.

(3) Licence Theory

Per Sopinka, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: The security interests that the respondent has under the Bank Act and the PPSA take priority over the deemed trust that arises in favour of Her Majesty by operation of s. 227(4) ITA. While the former interests are subject to a licence to sell, that licence is not nearly so broad as to encompass the satisfaction of income tax obligations. A licence to sell inventory authorizes at most only the satisfaction of obligations that are immediately incidental to an actual sale of the inventory.

The licence theory holds that a bank's security interest in a debtor's inventory, whether fixed and specific, is subject to a licence in the debtor to deal with that inventory in the ordinary course of business. The point is that the bank's claim to the inventory must as a consequence give way to any debts incurred in the ordinary course of business. In theory, a creditor who has granted a licence to sell inventory has thereby consented to his security interest's being subject to other obligations that may arise "in the ordinary course of business". The licence is thus supposed to afford evidence of the respondent's intention to take less than an entire security interest in the inventory.

Digitized by Google

The licence affords no such evidence. The potential sale of the inventory does not amount to an actual limitation of the security interest. A great difference exists between saying, on the one hand, that if a debtor sells inventory and applies the proceeds to a debt to a third party, then the third party takes the proceeds free of any security interest and saying, on the other hand, that because a third party could take the proceeds free of any security interest, no security interest exists in the proceeds as against that third party. A licence to sell inventory in the ordinary course of business is a condition of the former kind. The consequent (defeasance of the security interest) follows only if the antecedent (sale of the inventory and application of proceeds to an obligation to a third party) is satisfied. The security interest in the inventory disappears only if the debtor actually sells the inventory and applies the proceeds to a debt to a third party.

In accordance with s. 28(1) PPSA, the result of a sale of inventory is to give the purchaser an unencumbered interest in the inventory and the licensor a continuing security interest in the proceeds of the sale. Only if the debtor subsequently uses the proceeds to satisfy an obligation to a third party will the proceeds be removed from the scope of the licensor's security interest in them. Accordingly, a security agreement with a licence to sell creates a defeasible interest; but the event of defeasance is the actual sale of the inventory and the actual application of the proceeds against an obligation to a third party.

By itself, s. 28(1) PPSA does not necessarily compel rejection of the broad interpretation of the licence to sell. However, the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius is appropriately invoked here to complete the argument. The statute prescribes certain consequences for the security interest that follow a dealing with inventory, and in particular, it prescribes the defeasance of the interest if the debtor actually sells the inventory and applies the proceeds to an obligation to a third party. Significantly, the statute does not contemplate a defeasance on the happening of any other event. The statute occupies the field and crowds out other possible interpretations of the licence.

Because the inventory in question was not sold pursuant to the licence, here the licence can have had no effect on the respondent's security interest. What the debtor might have done with the licence does not matter. If it were otherwise, the licence to sell inventory would entirely eviscerate the respondent's GSA.

The argument might be made that the deemed trust works by deeming an actual sale of the inventory to have been made. It this were correct, then it would not matter that the inventory was not actually sold pursuant to the licence. However, the deeming is not a mechanism for undoing an existing security interest, but rather a device for going back in time and seeking out an asset that was not, at the moment the income taxes came due, subject to any competing security interest. The deemed trust provision cannot be effective unless it is first determined that there is some unencumbered asset out of which the trust may be deemed. In this case the inventory was encumbered by the GSA.

The debtor's covenant in the GSA to pay all taxes was not part of the licence and was merely a covenant to obey the law. It adds nothing to s. 153(1) ITA and does not prescribe the outcome of a priority contest.

A number of policy considerations support this conclusion. Judicial innovation in this field risks legal uncertainty. Inventory financiers would have to provide against the risk that their security interest might be defeated by some rival claim. There is also a real possibility that recognition of a broad licence theory would obliterate the PPSA charge against inventory. If Parliament wishes to do so, it may step in and assign absolute priority to the deemed trust. But in the absence of clear statutory language to that effect, the bank's GSA must prevail.

Per La Forest, Gonthier and Cory JJ. (dissenting): The critical issue here was the scope of the contractual licence. In particular, if the bank's consent included the right to sell the inventory in order to pay wages, then that consent by necessity included the right to sell inventory to remit payroll deductions. In such a situation, Her Majesty's interest would be able to attach to the proceeds of the inventory and so take priority over the bank's interest.

The licence theory operates, in the context of the statutory scheme at issue here, as an exception to the general rule that at the time of "liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy" Her Majesty's interest cannot attach to property which is at that time the property of a secured creditor. Where a secured creditor has consented to the use of its collateral when deductions are made in order to pay the statutory deductions which are the object of a deemed trust, that creditor has bound itself by the statutory requirements relating to those deductions. Here, therefore, the wage deductions at issue were made at a time when the bank had permitted the sale of inventory in order to pay wages (and thus wage deductions), and the bank's inventory existent at the time of receivership can accordingly be attached under s. 227(5).

The critical factor in the "licence to sell" argument is the permission which must be found to have been granted with respect to the usage of the proceeds of the disputed collateral. While licences are often expressed in terms of a "right to sell in the ordinary course of business", this permission is made with respect to the usage of proceeds, which is the proper focus of the inquiry, and not necessarily the circumstances of sale. Here, Sparrow was permitted to sell its inventory in the ordinary course of its business and "use" the proceeds generated therefrom.

The licence to sell inventory in the ordinary course of business in this case necessarily included a licence to sell inventory to pay wages, and remit wage deductions, in the course of Sparrow's business. Where, as here, the secured party has security over the majority of the assets of the debtor, the security interest over the inventory must permit the debtor to sell the inventory and put it to the general use of its business, including towards the payment of wages. The scope of the licence can be ascertained either from the express terms of the security agreement or from the nature of the agreement and the conduct of the parties. The licence here was to sell inventory in the "ordinary course of [Sparrow's] business . . . and use [the proceeds]" which renders it of such a quality as to include a right to use the proceeds to pay wages. A licence to sell inventory may in certain circumstances be circumscribed so as not to include a right to use the proceeds to pay wages.

The true test of whether the licence to sell inventory includes the right to pay wages is a matter of interpreting the contractual arrangement between the parties. The focus is not so much on the circumstances of the selling of inventory, but rather the permitted usage of the proceeds of inventory. Where the licence has a limited scope, that licence may not include the right to use proceeds to pay wages. However, the expression of a limited use for proceeds of inventory cannot prevail if the arrangement between the parties is such as to allow, in practice, the debtor to use the inventory proceeds in the course of its business. The test should be whether the debtor had the freedom to use these funds in the ordinary course of business as opposed to being under an obligation to remit them to the secured party.

The GSA contained an express licence permitting Sparrow to sell inventory in the course of its business and use the proceeds available; the BAS contained an implied licence to this effect. While it is true that the GSA contained a trust proceeds clause, this clause cannot have the effect of limiting the scope of the licence where the real arrangement between the parties was, as expressly stated, that Sparrow could use the proceeds of inventory in the course of its business. The bank in this case was not a small inventory financier who required Sparrow to remit proceeds of inventory to it immediately. To the contrary, the bank was a large scale lender who permitted Sparrow to use inventory sales to maintain the viability of its enterprise. Under the licence at issue here, the bank permitted Sparrow to sell inventory to pay wages and, necessarily, payroll deduction obligations.

The appellant's s. 227(5) deemed trust must take priority over the bank's security interests in the disputed collateral. The trust fund representing the deducted amounts, while without identified subject matter from the date of its inception, is capable of identifying property subject to that trust ex post facto. This result is not precluded with respect to the BAS by virtue of s. 428(1) of the Bank Act. Although s. 428(1) secures the respondent bank's proprietary right to the disputed collateral, the bank nevertheless consented to the divestment of this interest. Such a waiver of priority renders s. 428(1) of no assistance to the bank.

The licence theory, in addition to providing certainty in disputes between consensual and non-consensual security interests, achieves fairness in commercial law. In essence, the bank is willing to accept the benefits of Sparrow's non-payment of statutory deductions and has permitted the use of its collateral to pay these deductions, but refuses to accept the burden of Sparrow's unlawful action at the time of its receivership. It should be the policy of the law that the respondent bank be held accountable for Sparrow's outstanding statutory obligations. The licence theory ensures that in appropriate circumstances this result will obtain.

The licence theory does not go so far as to mean that every subsequent claim should prevail over the GSA because every rival claim might have to be satisfied out of the proceeds of a hypothetical sale of the inventory. The consent to pay wages is a necessary but not sufficient condition. It did not simpliciter lead to the conclusion that Her Majesty's interest must prevail. What is significant is that the bank consented to payment of wages, including deductions, out of inventory which, at the time of the deductions and upon actual payment of wages, were deemed by statute to be taken out of the estate of the debtor. The unique nature of the statutory provisions applicable to wage deductions, and the bank's consent thereto, are integral to the success of the s. 227(5) claim in the case at bar. In this way, the licence theory is circumscribed in its ability to defeat prior secured interests.

In addition, the licence theory as applied here is not inimical to the integrity of commercial law. It operates narrowly, in conjunction with unique statutory provisions, so as to actualize legally performed obligations. It does not create uncertainty in commercial transactions.

1 GONTHIER J. (dissenting) -- This case involves a determination of priority between a deemed statutory trust and various security instruments in regard to the proceeds of a liquidation sale of inventory. In particular, the appeal requires a determination of the priority status of Her Majesty's deemed trust under s. 227(4) and (5) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (hereinafter "ITA"), these provisions becoming operative in this case because of the misappropriation of unremitted payroll deductions lawfully belonging to Her Majesty. In competition to this claim, the Royal Bank of Canada asserts priority under both a general security agreement and an assignment of inventory under s. 427 of the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c. 46.

I - Facts

2 The debtor, Sparrow Electric Corporation (hereinafter "Sparrow"), carried on business as an electrical contractor in Alberta. The enterprise was of a substantial size, employing 200 to 300 employees in its business operations. To finance these operations, Sparrow borrowed heavily from the respondent Royal Bank of Canada (hereinafter the "bank"). The bank secured Sparrow's borrowing with various forms of security, covering most of the assets utilized in Sparrow's business. Of particular relevance to this appeal, however, the bank held a general security agreement over all of Sparrow's present and after-acquired personal property, as well as an assignment of inventory under s. 178 (now s. 427) of the Bank Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-1.

3 In 1992, it became apparent to the bank that Sparrow was having financial difficulties. On two occasions, August 5, 1992 and September 30, 1992, the bank wrote to Sparrow advising its management that Sparrow was in default on its loan obligations. On October 16, 1992, in order to give Sparrow some time to correct its default situation, the bank and Sparrow entered into a "Standstill Agreement". This agreement permitted Sparrow to continue carrying on business under the proviso that, should Sparrow's position fail to improve, the bank would be entitled to appoint a receiver and enforce its security.

4 Sparrow's financial position did not improve. For this reason, on November 19, 1992, the bank appointed a receiver to take over Sparrow's business, and on December 8, 1992, the bank successfully petitioned Sparrow into bankruptcy. The order appointing the receiver empowered the receiver to, among other things, carry on Sparrow's business as it deemed necessary. The receiver did in fact carry on Sparrow's business for some time, employing approximately 200 employees in order to fulfil Sparrow's outstanding contractual obligations. These employees were terminated effective January 15, 1993.

5 In addition to the failure to pay the loan obligations which inevitably led to its bankruptcy and receivership, Sparrow had failed to honour other obligations in its attempt to remain in business. In particular, Sparrow failed to remit payroll deductions as required by s. 153 ITA. While the record does not disclose the exact date of these failures, it appears that the first instance of non-remittance could have occurred no later than August 7, 1992. Having regard to the amount of payroll deductions outstanding as of August 7, and to the average number of Sparrow's employees on the payroll, we can conclude that the actual payroll deductions which give rise to Her Majesty's claim in all likelihood occurred some time in the year 1992. In any event, by the time of its receivership, in addition to substantial amounts outstanding to the bank, Sparrow was indebted to the appellant ("Her Majesty") in the amount of $625,990.86 for unremitted income tax payroll deductions.

6 On January 12, 1993, the receiver applied to the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench for authorization to sell various Sparrow assets. Part of the pool of assets to be sold included Sparrow's inventory which is the subject of this appeal. On January 15, 1993, Wilson J. authorized both the sale of the assets and remittance of its proceeds to the bank in partial repayment of its claims, but ordered that an amount equal to Her Majesty's claim for unremitted payroll deductions be held in trust pending a resolution as to the entitlement to this portion of the proceeds. At some later date, the assets were in fact sold, and the amount of $625,990.86 set aside. It has been held in judicial proceedings that the amount held is constituted entirely of proceeds from inventory (Royal Bank v. Sparrow Electric Corp., Alberta Court of Queen's Bench, Edmonton, November 24, 1993, unreported). That ruling is not at issue in this appeal.

7 At present, the fund being held and constituting the proceeds of inventory is sufficient to satisfy either Her Majesty's claim, or part of the outstanding claims owing to the bank. The determination of priority in this appeal will therefore be determinative as to which party is entitled to the entirety of the disputed fund.

II - The Competing Interests

8 For convenience, I will at the outset outline the claims of the bank and of Her Majesty which are advanced as being entitled to the proceeds of the inventory.

(A) The Bank

9 The respondent bank advances two distinct security instruments in order to establish its claim to the disputed fund. First, the bank argues that its general security agreement ("GSA"), executed on February 25, 1992, and perfected pursuant to the Alberta Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05 ("PPSA"), is entitled to priority. By this agreement, Sparrow assigned to the bank a security interest in all of its present and after-acquired personal property, including "all inventory of whatever kind and wherever situate" (para. 1(a)(i)). In addition, para. 7 of that agreement provided that proceeds of the collateral received by Sparrow would be received and held in trust for the bank. Of significance to this appeal, however, para. 4 of the GSA contained two express covenants, providing:

> So long as this Security Agreement remains in effect Debtor covenants and agrees:
> (a) to defend the Collateral against the claims and demands of all other parties claiming the same or an interest therein; to keep the Collateral free from all Encumbrances ...; provided always that, until default, Debtor may, in the ordinary course of Debtor's business, sell or lease inventory and, subject to Clause 7 hereof, use Money available to Debtor,
> (e) to pay all taxes, rates, levies, assessments and other charges of every nature which may be lawfully levied, assessed or imposed against or in respect of Debtor or Collateral as and when the same become due and payable; [Emphasis added.]

Additionally, under the credit facilities agreement between Sparrow and the bank, dated January 22, 1992, Sparrow covenanted as follows:

> (3) it will promptly pay when due all business, income and other taxes properly levied on its operations and property and remit all statutory employee deductions when due; [Emphasis added.]

10 The bank's second claim is that its Bank Act security ("BAS") entitles it to priority to the inventory proceeds. That security instrument was executed on two occasions, January 29, 1990 and December 12, 1990. Under the General Assignment, Sparrow assigned to the bank, inter alia, "all goods inventory, [and] stock-in-trade" as continuing security for the payment of loans to the bank. In addition, as part of the Agreement as to Loans and Advances, Sparrow granted security in both its inventory and its proceeds. At the time these instruments were executed, s. 178 of the Bank Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-1, was in effect. However, on June 1, 1992, that Act was replaced with the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c. 46. The relevant portions of these two acts are identical. However, as the facts giving rise to this case occurred while the latter Act was in force, I will refer to the provisions of this new Act for the purposes of this appeal. As such, the bank's claim for security under its BAS is grounded in s. 427 (formerly s. 178) of the Bank Act, which provides:

> 427. (1) A bank may lend money and make advances
> (a) to any wholesale or retail purchaser or shipper of, or dealer in, products of agriculture, products of aquaculture, products of the forest, products of the quarry and mine, products of the sea, lakes and rivers or goods, wares and merchandise, manufactured or otherwise, on the security of such products or goods, wares and merchandise and of goods, wares and merchandise used in or procured for the packing of such products or goods, wares and merchandise,
> ...
> (2) Delivery of a document giving security on property to a bank under the authority of this section vests in the bank in respect of the property therein described
> (a) of which the person giving security is the owner at the time of the delivery of the document, or

Digitized by Google

(b) of which that person becomes the owner at any time thereafter before the release of the security by the bank, whether or not the property is in existence at the time of the delivery, the following rights and powers, namely,

(c) if the property is property on which security is given under paragraph (1)(a), (b), (g), (h), (i), (j) or (o), under paragraph (1)(c) or (m) consisting of aquacultural implements, under paragraph (1)(d) or (n) consisting of agricultural implements or under paragraph (1)(p) consisting of forestry implements, the same rights and powers as if the bank had acquired a warehouse receipt or bill of lading in which that property was described, ...

and all such property in respect of which such rights and powers are vested in the bank under this section is for the purposes of this Act property covered by the security. [Emphasis added.]

Section 425(1) (formerly contained within s. 2(1)) provides that:

425. (1) ...

"goods, wares and merchandise" includes products of agriculture, products of aquaculture, products of the forest, products of the quarry and mine, products of the sea, lakes and rivers, and all other articles of commerce; [Emphasis added.]

And s. 435(2) (formerly s. 186(2)) provides:

435. ...

(2) Any warehouse receipt or bill of lading acquired by a bank under subsection (1) vests in the bank, from the date of the acquisition thereof,

(a) all the right and title to the warehouse receipt or bill of lading and to the goods, wares and merchandise covered thereby of the previous holder or owner thereof; and

(b) all the right and title to the goods, wares and merchandise mentioned therein of the person from whom the goods, wares and merchandise were received or acquired by the bank, if the warehouse receipt or bill of lading is made directly in favour of the bank, instead of to the previous holder or owner of the goods, wares and merchandise.

11 In addition, the respondent directed this Court's attention to s. 428(1) (formerly s. 179(1)), which it was submitted affected the priority position of the bank's BAS:

428. (1) All the rights and powers of a bank in respect of the property mentioned in or covered by a warehouse receipt or bill of lading acquired and held by the bank, and the rights and powers of the bank in respect of the property covered by a security given to the bank under section 427 that are the same as if the bank had acquired a warehouse receipt or bill of lading in which that property was described, have, subject to subsection 427(4) and subsections (3) to (6) of this section, priority over all rights subsequently acquired in, on or in respect of that property, and also over the claim of any unpaid vendor. [Emphasis added.]

Finally, s. 434(2) (formerly s. 185(2)) provides:

434. ...

(2) Nothing in any charter, Act or law shall be construed as ever having been intended to prevent or as preventing a bank from acquiring and holding an absolute title to and in any mortgaged or hypothecated real property, whatever the value thereof, or from exercising or acting on any power of sale contained in any mortgage given to or held by the bank, authorizing or enabling it to sell or convey any property so mortgaged. [Emphasis added.]

12 While no provision in the BAS explicitly permitted Sparrow to sell its inventory, the respondent bank has conceded that such a licence existed, as a practical matter, as between the parties. In any event, I would have thought that once a licence to sell inventory had been granted under the GSA, it would be impossible to grant a more restricted licence to deal with the same collateral under the provisions of the BAS.

(B) Her Majesty's Interest

13 Her Majesty's claim arises under the s. 227 deemed trust provisions of the ITA. Section 153(1)(a) of that Act requires employers to withhold from the pay cheques of its employees and remit to the Receiver General amounts on account of the payee's tax for the year:

153. (1) Every person paying at any time in a taxation year

(a) salary or wages or other remuneration,

...

Digitized by Google

> shall deduct or withhold therefrom such amount as may be determined in accordance with prescribed rules and shall, at such time as may be prescribed, remit that amount to the Receiver General on account of the payee's tax for the year.... [Emphasis added.]

Such amounts are deemed to be held in trust for Her Majesty by virtue of s. 227(4) and (5) ITA, which provide:

> 227. ...
> (4) Every person who deducts or withholds any amount under this Act shall be deemed to hold the amount so deducted or withheld in trust for Her Majesty.
> (5) Notwithstanding any provision of the Bankruptcy Act, in the event of any liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy of or by a person, an amount equal to any amount
> ...
> shall be deemed to be separate from and form no part of the estate in liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, whether or not that amount has in fact been kept separate and apart from the person's own moneys or from the assets of the estate.

As of June 15, 1994, these provisions have been repealed and replaced by a revised s. 227(4): S.C. 1994, c. 21, s. 104(1). However, as this amendment was not effective at the time the facts of this appeal arose, I decline to comment on the application of the new s. 227(4) to this case.

III - Judgments of the Courts Below

Alberta Court of Queen's Bench 1993 CanLII 7257 (AB QB), (1993), 19 Alta. L.R. (3d) 183

14 The first application brought to determine the priority over the inventory proceeds involved the competing claims under the GSA advanced by the bank, and Her Majesty's deemed trust. Agrios J. held that the deemed trust took priority over the GSA. In characterizing the statutory trust, Agrios J. concluded at p. 189 that the trust attaches to "whatever assets are left" upon bankruptcy. With regard to the GSA security interest, Agrios J. was of the view that it took the form of a fixed charge on the inventory with a licence to sell in the ordinary course of business. However, this latter characterization was not necessary to reach his decision, as the learned chambers judge ultimately reasoned, at p. 188, "[w]hether the charge is floating or fixed, if there is an ability to deal with an asset such as inventory, the asset becomes exposed to the normal market incidents of carrying on business". Relying on the decision of McLachlin J.A. (as she then was) in R. in Right of B.C. v. F.B.D.B., 1987 CanLII 156 (BC CA), [1988] 1 W.W.R. 1 (B.C.C.A.) (hereinafter "FBDB"), Agrios J. found that a normal incident of selling inventory was the payment of statutory liens. The sale of the inventory therefore permitted the statutory trust to attach.

Alberta Court of Queen's Bench 1994 CanLII 8992 (AB QB), (1994), 21 Alta. L.R. (3d) 275

15 The bank subsequently applied for a determination of whether their BAS over Sparrow's inventory took priority over Her Majesty's deemed trust. For substantially similar reasons, Agrios J. held that the deemed trust once again took priority. Whether the BAS could be characterized as a fixed charge with a licence to sell, or a floating charge, the sale of the inventory subjected the bank's interest in it to the "normal incidents of business" (at p. 283). And, in Agrios J.'s view, one of these incidents was the paying of wages and withholdings. As these proceeds were impressed with the deemed trust, whatever interest the bank had could not attach to them, as they were no longer the property of Sparrow.

16 Both the decisions of Agrios J. were appealed to the Alberta Court of Appeal. As such, the priority of both the GSA and the BAS were at issue before that court. However, the Court of Appeal, unanimously deciding to dispose of the appeal solely on the grounds that the BAS took priority over the statutory trust, neither heard oral argument nor ruled with regard to the priority of the GSA.

17 The Court of Appeal began with the premise that BAS was a fixed and specific charge transferring legal title to the bank and not a floating charge over inventory. For this proposition, the court relied upon two judgments of this Court, Dauphin Plains Credit Union Ltd. v. Xyloid Industries Ltd., 1980 CanLII 186 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1182, and Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121, both decisions which the court considered binding upon it. As the claim of Her Majesty arose subsequent to the execution of the BAS, in the court's opinion, the deemed trust could have nothing to attach to. In addition, the court rejected the argument that the inventory was subject to a licence to sell which would provide Her Majesty with an opportunity to attach its interest. The Court of Appeal found FBDB, supra, relied upon by Agrios J. to be distinguishable on the basis that the intimacy in that case between the sale of inventory and the statutory trust was not present in the case before it. In contrast, in the present case, the court found no conceptual or evidentiary link between the sale of inventory and the withholding of payroll deductions. In any event, the court found that any licence to sell inventory only lasted until default, and as the sale in this case occurred well after any default by Sparrow, the licence must therefore have been extinguished at the relevant time. For these reasons, the Court of Appeal found that the BAS took priority over Her Majesty's deemed trust.

IV - Issues

18 There are two issues to be resolved in this appeal: (1) whether, on the facts of this case, Her Majesty's s. 227(5) ITA deemed trust takes priority over a previously executed GSA with respect to the proceeds of the sale of inventory; and (2) whether, on the facts of this case, Her Majesty's s. 227(5) ITA deemed trust takes priority over a previously executed BAS with respect to the proceeds of the sale of inventory?

V - Analysis

(A) Introduction

19 The law reports are replete with cases involving competing claims between statutory liens and deemed trusts, such as the one found in s. 227 ITA, and other previously executed consensual security interests: Dauphin Plains Credit Union Ltd. v. Xyloid Industries Ltd., supra; Board of Industrial Relations v. Avco Financial Services Realty Ltd., 1979 CanLII 230 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 699; Royal Bank of Canada v. G. M. Homes Inc. (1984), 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 244 (Sask. C.A.); Roynat Inc. v. Ja-Sha Trucking & Leasing Ltd., 1992 CanLII 2767 (MB CA), [1992] 2 W.W.R. 641 (Man. C.A.); FBDB, supra; Ford Motor Co. of Canada Ltd. v. Manning Mercury Sales Ltd. (Trustee of), 1994 CanLII 4852 (SK QB), [1994] 6 W.W.R. 372 (Sask. Q.B.); National Bank of Canada v. Director of Employment Standards (1986), 5 P.P.S.A.C. 326 (Ont. Div. Ct.); Abraham v. Coopers & Lybrand Ltd. reflex, (1993), 13 O.R. (3d) 649 (Gen. Div.) (under appeal); Armstrong v. Coopers & Lybrand Ltd. reflex, (1986), 53 O.R. (2d) 468 (H.C.), aff'd reflex, (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 129 (C.A.), leave refused, sub nom. National Bank of Canada v. Armstrong, [1988] 1 S.C.R. xii. The ubiquitousness of this legal dilemma in our courts speaks no doubt, at least in part, to the prevalence of the unfortunate factual situation which such statutory trusts and liens were meant to counter. Namely, such deemed trusts or liens are devices which legislators often employ in order to recover moneys which ought to have lawfully been paid to them but have been unlawfully misappropriated by a debtor who subsequently encounters financial difficulty and is forced into winding up its business, e.g., Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-8, s. 23(3) and (4); Unemployment Insurance Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. U-1, s. 57(2) and (3); and the Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), s. 227(4) and (5). Indeed, it is perhaps more accurate to speculate that this sort of misappropriation of public funds is often a manifestation of an already-existing financial difficulty in a debtor's business, as a debtor foregoes statutory payments as required of it in order to increase artificially its supply of working capital.

20 At the same time that legislators have sought to protect the fiscal integrity of public institutions through the devices of statutory trusts and liens, however, they have also endeavoured to protect the security interests of those private institutions who are involved in providing credit to Canadian businesses. For example, the Bank Act has historically provided for the protection of the collateral of banking institutions. The current provision of the Bank Act granting a security interest in a debtor's inventory, s. 427, can be traced back over one hundred years to the enactment of its predecessor section, s. 74, in 1890 (S.C. 1890, c. 31). The historical and societal importance of this form of security was observed by this Court in Hall, supra, where, at p. 139, La Forest J. commented that "[i]n a word, the creation of the Bank Act security interest has been a key factor in the evolution of banking in this country". Later, at p. 140, La Forest J. concluded:

> The above considerations establish, to my satisfaction, that the s. 178 security interest, which originated as a policy response to structural deficiencies in the lending regimes of the nascent Canadian economy, has, since its inception, played a primordial role in facilitating access to capital by several groups that play a key role in the national economy. [Emphasis added.]

21 More recently, provincial legislatures have moved to protect secured creditors generally through the enactment of personal property security legislation: e.g. Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10; Personal Property Security Act, S.B.C. 1989, c. 36; and the PPSA. These statutory regimes have been implemented to increase certainty and predictability in secured transactions through the creation of a coherent system of priorities: Ronald C. C. Cuming and Roderick J. Wood, British Columbia Personal Property Security Act Handbook (2nd ed. 1993), at pp. 4-5; G.M. Homes Inc., supra, at p. 252. The benefits of such certainty in commercial transactions, on basic economic principles, are intended to accrue to the health of the economy in general.

22 It can be seen from the foregoing, therefore, that the priority competition between statutory trusts and consensual security interests represents, in a broad sense, a clash between conflicting legislative objectives. To this extent, then, a resolution of the priority competition in the present case requires a sensitivity to the differing legislative objectives here at play. In particular, however, to the extent that the aim of personal property security regimes is to effect certainty in commercial transactions, the interpretation by the courts of such legislation and the development of the jurisprudence generally in this area must, to every extent possible, seek to achieve predictable results.

23 It has been unfortunate that the development of the case law, to this point, has not inspired the degree of certainty which is so manifestly desirable in this area of commercial law. Indeed, the jurisprudence has been referred to as a "troubled area of the law" (Manitoba (Minister of Labour) v. Omega Autobody Ltd. (Receiver of) 1989 CanLII 178 (MB CA), (1989), 59 D.L.R. (4th) 34 (Man. C.A.), at p. 36), and has been the subject of, at times, scathing academic criticism (Roderick J. Wood, "Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp." (1995), 10 B.F.L.R. 429, and Roderick J. Wood and Michael I. Wylie, "Non-Consensual Security Interests in Personal Property" (1992), 30 Alta. L. Rev. 1055). The general view, I believe, has been summarized by Professor Wood in his most helpful case commentary, "Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp.", supra, at p. 430: "[i]t is somewhat of an embarrassment that after more than two decades we still cannot confidently predict the outcome of a priority dispute between a deemed trust and a security interest". The above judicial and academic commentary, I believe, invites this Court to proceed steadfastly towards the pronouncement of clear principles to be applied in determining the priority between statutory trusts and consensual security interests.

24 With these general observations in mind, I will now proceed to analyze the specific aspects of the competing claims advanced by the parties in the present case.

(B) The Nature of Section 227(4) and (5) Statutory Trusts

25 Section 153(1)(a) ITA places an affirmative duty upon employers to deduct and withhold amounts from their employees' pay cheques, and remit those withholdings to the Receiver General on account of the employees' tax payable. By virtue of s. 153(3) ITA, these withholdings are deemed to become the property of the employee:

> 153. ...
> (3) When an amount has been deducted or withheld under subsection (1), it shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed to have been received at that time by the person to whom the remuneration, benefit, payment, fees, commissions or other amounts were paid.

In a perfect world, these deductions would be made, a cash fund would be set aside by the employer, and the withheld amounts would be promptly remitted to the Receiver General when due. The deducted amounts, lawfully the property of the employee, would in this way be transferred to Her Majesty to be set against his overall tax payable.

26 As a practical reality, however, these deductions are often not remitted as required under the ITA. Instead, the withholdings are commonly made solely as a book entry, and therefore the deduction of taxes from wages becomes merely a notional transaction; no cash is actually set aside for remittance and, often, the deductions are not transferred to the Receiver General: see, e.g., Re Deslauriers Construction Products Ltd., [1970] 3 O.R. 599 (C.A.), at p. 601. It is at this point which a business becomes indebted to Her Majesty for the amount of moneys only fictionally deducted. I hasten to add, however, that while it can be said Her Majesty at this point becomes de facto, if not de jure, a creditor of the non-remitting employer, the arrangement is dissimilar to an ordinary debtor-creditor situation in two fundamental respects. First, in contrast to usual negotiated credit arrangements, this transaction is of manifestly a non-consensual nature. Second, by virtue of s. 153(3), the debtor can in law be considered to be utilizing an asset which is the property of its employees. In this sense, it is not inaccurate to characterize the non-remittance of payroll deductions as a "misappropriation" of the property of another. Indeed, the authorities, correctly in my view, commonly refer to the conduct of the tax debtor in this manner: Roynat, supra, at p. 646, per Twaddle J.A.; and Pembina on the Red Development Corp. Ltd. v. Triman Industries Ltd. 1991 CanLII 2699 (MB CA), (1991), 85 D.L.R. (4th) 29 (Man. C.A.), at p. 48, per Lyon J.A. dissenting.

27 The economic reality of this sort of misappropriation of statutory deductions is artificially to increase the working capital of the tax debtor. By foregoing a cash payment to Her Majesty in the amount of the payroll deductions, the tax debtor is able to utilize the freed resources elsewhere in its business. The effect of non-remittance was summarized by Lyon J.A. in his dissenting reasons in Pembina on the Red Development, supra, at p. 48:

> ... either the tax debtor used the misappropriated deductions for its own purposes or the pool of moneys available for distribution to the tax debtor's creditors ... has been increased by the amount which the tax debtor failed to remit to the Receiver-General.

28 It is against the backdrop of this unfortunate factual scenario that the provisions of s. 227(4) and (5) can be seen to have been enacted. While it can be said that at the point of withholding the employer becomes the trustee of a fund which is in law the property of its employee, s. 227(4) has the effect of making Her Majesty the beneficiary under that trust. I agree with the observation of the mechanics of s. 227(4) made by Twaddle J.A. in Roynat, supra, at p. 646, where he states:

> Although [s. 227(4)] calls the trust created by it a deemed one, the trust is in truth a real one. The employer is required to deduct from his employees' wages the amounts due by the employees under the statute. This money does not belong to the employer anymore. It belongs to the employees. The employer holds it in a statutory trust to satisfy their obligations.

The conceptual difficulty arises, of course, when the tax debtor fails to set aside moneys which are to be remitted. At this point, the subject of Her Majesty's beneficial interest becomes intermingled with the general assets of the tax debtor. As Twaddle J.A. rightly observed in Roynat, supra, at p. 646, "Her Majesty's claim ... then be[comes] that of a beneficiary under a non-existent trust". In short, the misappropriation of statutory deductions conceptually problematizes the legal vehicle -- the concept of the trust -- which Parliament has invoked in order to regain the moneys lawfully owed to Her Majesty.

29 This conceptual dilemma is resolved by s. 227(5). That provision states that:

> 227. ...
> (5) Notwithstanding any provision of the Bankruptcy Act, in the event of any liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy of or by a person, an amount equal to any amount
> ...
> shall be deemed to be separate from and form no part of the estate in liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, whether or not that amount has in fact been kept separate and apart from the person's own moneys or from the assets of the estate.

The effect of s. 227(5) naturally falls to be determined through a proper interpretation of the language contained in that subsection.

30 This Court recently had occasion to review the principles of law to be applied to the interpretation of tax legislation. In Alberta (Treasury Branches) v. M.N.R.; Toronto-Dominion Bank v. M.N.R., 1996 CanLII 244 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 963, at pp. 975-76, Cory J. quoted this Court's decision in Friesen v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 62 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 103, at pp. 112-14, where the relevant principles were summarized as follows:

> In interpreting sections of the Income Tax Act, the correct approach, as set out by Estey J. in Stubart Investments Ltd. v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1984] 1 S.C.R. 536, is to apply the plain meaning rule. Estey J. at p. 578 relied on the following passage from E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87:
> > Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.
> The principle that the plain meaning of the relevant sections of the Income Tax Act is to prevail unless the transaction is a sham has recently been affirmed by this Court in Canada v. Antosko, 1994 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 312. Iacobucci J., writing for the Court, held at pp. 326-27 that:
> > While it is true that the courts must view discrete sections of the Income Tax Act in light of the other provisions of the Act and of the purpose of the legislation, and that they must analyze a given transaction in the context of economic and commercial reality, such techniques cannot alter the result where the words of the statute are clear and plain and where the legal and practical effect of the transaction is undisputed: Mattabi Mines Ltd. v. Ontario (Minister of Revenue), 1988 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 175, at p. 194; see also Symes v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 695.
> I accept the following comments on the Antosko case in P. W. Hogg and J. E. Magee, Principles of Canadian Income Tax Law (1995), Section 22.3© "Strict and purposive interpretation", at pp. 453-54:

Digitized by Google

> It would introduce intolerable uncertainty into the Income Tax Act if clear language in a detailed provision of the Act were to be qualified by unexpressed exceptions derived from a court's view of the object and purpose of the provision.... (The Antosko case) is simply a recognition that "object and purpose" can play only a limited role in the interpretation of a statute that is as precise and detailed as the Income Tax Act. When a provision is couched in specific language that admits of no doubt or ambiguity in its application to the facts, then the provision must be applied regardless of its object and purpose. Only when the statutory language admits of some doubt or ambiguity in its application to the facts is it useful to resort to the object and purpose of the provision.

At pp. 976-77 of Alberta (Treasury Branches), supra, Cory J. concluded:

> Thus, when there is neither any doubt as to the meaning of the legislation nor any ambiguity in its application to the facts then the statutory provision must be applied regardless of its object or purpose. I recognize that agile legal minds could probably find an ambiguity in as simple a request as "close the door please" and most certainly in even the shortest and clearest of the ten commandments. However, the very history of this case with the clear differences of opinion expressed as between the trial judges and the Court of Appeal of Alberta indicates that for able and experienced legal minds, neither the meaning of the legislation nor its application to the facts is clear. It would therefore seem to be appropriate to consider the object and purpose of the legislation. Even if the ambiguity were not apparent, it is significant that in order to determine the clear and plain meaning of the statute it is always appropriate to consider the "scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament".

31 In the present case, I find the language in s. 227(5) to be clear and unambiguous, especially when viewed as a provision directly following s. 227(4), which renders amounts unremitted as held in trust for Her Majesty. In my view, this section is designed to, upon liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, seek out and attach Her Majesty's beneficial interest to property of the debtor which at that time is in existence. The trust is not in truth a real one, as the subject matter of the trust cannot be identified from the date of creation of the trust: D. W. M. Waters, Law of Trusts in Canada (2nd ed. 1984), at p. 117. However, s. 227(5) has the effect of revitalizing the trust whose subject matter has lost all identity. This identification of the subject matter of the trust therefore occurs ex post facto. In this respect, I agree with the conclusion of Twaddle J.A. in Roynat, supra, where he states the effect of s. 227(5) as follows, at p. 647: "Her Majesty has a statutory right of access to whatever assets the employer then has, out of which to realize the original trust debt due to Her".

32 I add that this approach was taken to a provision substantially similar to s. 227(5) by Gale C.J. in Re Deslauriers Construction Products Ltd., supra, at p. 601, whose reasoning was affirmed by this Court in Dauphin Plains, supra. The Deslauriers case, supra, involved a priority competition between a trustee-in-bankruptcy and a statutory deemed trust provision created under the Canada Pension Plan, S.C. 1964-65, c. 51. Section 24(3) and (4) of that Act stated:

> (3) Where an employer has deducted an amount from the remuneration of an employee as or on account of any contribution required to be made by the employee but has not remitted such amount to the Receiver General of Canada, the employer shall keep such amount separate and apart from his own moneys and shall be deemed to hold the amount so deducted in trust for Her Majesty.
> (4) In the event of any liquidation, assignment or bankruptcy of an employer, an amount equal to the amount that by subsection (3) is deemed to be held in trust for Her Majesty shall be deemed to be separate from and form no part of the estate in liquidation, assignment or bankruptcy, whether or not that amount has in fact been kept separate and apart from the employer's own moneys or from the assets of the estate.

This Court in Dauphin Plains, supra, at p. 1198, approved of Gale C.J.'s conclusion as to the interpretation of s. 24(4) (at p. 601 of Deslauriers, supra):

> It seems to us that s-s. (4), and particularly the concluding six words thereof, were inserted in the Act specifically for the purpose of taking the moneys equivalent to the deductions out of the estate of the bankrupt by the creation of a trust and making those moneys the property of the Minister.

33 This interpretation of s. 227(5) also has the virtue of being consistent with the scheme of distribution under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3. Section 67 of that Act expressly removes claims for unremitted payroll deductions, which are held in trust (inter alia) pursuant to s. 227 ITA, from the bankrupt's estate:

> 67. (1) The property of a bankrupt divisible among his creditors shall not comprise

Digitized by Google

(a) property held by the bankrupt in trust for any other person,

...

(2) Subject to subsection (3), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a bankrupt shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty for the purpose of paragraph (1)(a) unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply in respect of subsections 227(4) and (5) of the Income Tax Act, subsections 23(3) and (4) of the Canada Pension Plan or subsections 57(2) and (3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act....

34 It is to be observed that in addition to attaching Her Majesty's interest to the debtor's property upon the triggering of any of the events mentioned in s. 227(5), the deemed trust operates to the benefit of Her Majesty in a secondary manner. Namely, s. 227(5) permits Her Majesty's interest to attach to collateral which is subject to a fixed charge if the deductions giving rise to Her Majesty's claim arose before that charge attached to that collateral. This proposition flows from the decision of this Court in Dauphin Plains, supra. Dauphin Plains involved a determination as to priority in respect of the proceeds of a liquidation sale of a receiver-manager. In that case, the claims of Her Majesty (inter alia) arose by virtue of the non-remittance of payroll deductions in regard to payments under the Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-5, and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 48. Those Acts provided Her Majesty with claims pursuant to deemed trusts whose language is substantially similar to the version of s. 227(4) and (5) at issue in this appeal. In finding that these claims took precedence over a floating charge which had crystallized after the deductions at issue were actually made, Pigeon J. stated at p. 1199:

It should first be observed that, for reasons similar to those on which the decision in the Avco case, supra, was based, the claim for Pension Plan and Unemployment Insurance deductions cannot affect the proceeds of realization of property subject to a fixed and specific charge. From the moment such charge was created, the assets subject thereto, were no longer the property of the debtor except subject to that charge. The claim for the deductions arose subsequently and thus cannot affect this charge in the absence of a statute specifically so providing. However, the floating charge did not crystallize prior to the issue of the writ and the appointment of the receiver. In the present case it makes no difference which of the two dates is selected, both are subsequent to the deductions. [Emphasis added.]

Thus, s. 227(5) alternatively permits Her Majesty's interest to attach retroactively to the disputed collateral if the competing security interest has attached after the deductions giving rise to Her Majesty's claim in fact occurred. Conceptually, the s. 227(5) deemed trust allows Her Majesty's claim to go back in time and attach its outstanding s. 227(4) interest to the collateral before that collateral became subject to a fixed charge. The same result occurs when a statutory lien attaches prior to the mortgaging of disputed collateral. In Avco, supra, this Court per Martland J. commented upon just such a scenario, at p. 706:

From that date, the lien attaches to the employer's property and, as provided in subs. (1), it will take priority over any other claim, including an assignment or mortgage. In other words, after the lien attaches, its priority is unaffected by a disposition of his property made by the employer. Where a mortgage has been made prior to the lien attaching, it is not affected. The lien will only attach to the employer's equity in that property. [Emphasis added.]

See also G.M. Homes Inc., supra, at p. 250.

35 In this appeal, however, the deductions of tax from the employees' pay cheques occurred after the attachment of the bank's fixed charge to the inventory. As such, this second aspect of s. 227(5)'s operation is not at issue in this case.

36 I find support for the interpretation of s. 227(5) that I have taken in as much as it is consistent with the overall purpose of s. 227(4) and (5). In Pembina on the Red Development, supra, Lyon J.A. (dissenting) had occasion to comment upon the purpose of the predecessor section to the current s. 224(1.2) ITA, namely s. 224(1.2) and (1.3) of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, which were added by S.C. 1987, c. 46, s. 66. I find that Lyon J.A.'s comments in this respect to be fully applicable to the articulation of the purpose of s. 227(5). At p. 51, Lyon J.A. stated:

One must always remember that the withholding tax or source deduction to which s. 224 applies is at the heart of the collection procedures for personal income taxation in Canada. Indeed, if one makes a calculation from the statistics reported in "Taxation Statistics, 1987", a publication of Revenue Canada Taxation, Catalogue No. RV-1987, one finds that 87% of all personal income taxes paid in Canada are collected by source deductions. It can thus be seen that Parliament in passing s. 224(1.2) made it as all-encompassing as it is in order to ensure its continued viability. No other system is so crucial to the overall collection procedure adopted by the Crown. Parliament clearly meant to protect this system. Using the employer as a tax collector requires such extra protection in cases such as the one at bar where the employer converts the withheld tax money to its own purposes. Understandably, that conversion cannot be countenanced if the integrity of that system is to be preserved. Parliament, therefore, acting within its constitutional authority, has taken this extraordinary remedy to protect a major collection source.

Similarly, Parliament has clearly sought to protect the collection of unremitted payroll deductions through the device of the statutory deemed trust. Accordingly, s. 227(5) must be interpreted in light of this purpose. To summarize, it operates in a twofold manner: upon the triggering of an event specified in s. 227(5), Her Majesty's beneficial interest (i) attaches to the tax debtor's property then in existence; or (ii) attaches to collateral subject either to a fixed charge, or a crystallized floating charge, if the actual deductions giving rise to Her Majesty's claim occurred before the fixed charge attached, or the floating charge crystallized, respectively.

37 One further point with respect to terminology is necessary before leaving the present discussion. The method of attachment of Her Majesty's beneficial interest pursuant to s. 227(5) has been referred to at times as a "mechanism for tracing": Roynat, supra, at p. 647. This was indeed how it was presented by counsel for Her Majesty in his submissions before this Court. During the hearing of this case, it was questioned whether this was not an awkward usage of the word "tracing". After considering the matter, it is my view that it is not accurate to describe the mechanism of s. 227(5) as a means of "tracing"; indeed, it would seem that this subsection is antithetical to tracing in the traditional sense, to the extent that it requires no link at all between the subject matter of the trust and the fund or asset which the subject matter is being traced into: D. W. M. Waters, Law of Trusts in Canada, supra, at pp. 1037-53. For this reason, I find Professor Wood's description of the operation of s. 227(5), namely, a "relaxation of the equitable tracing rules", to be most accurate: Roderick J. Wood, "The Floating Charge in Canada" (1989), 27 Alta. L. Rev. 191, at p. 221; see also Omega, supra, at p. 43; and Re Deslauriers Construction Products Ltd., supra, at p. 603.

38 In conclusion, s. 227(5) is a provision designed to minimize the adverse effect upon Her Majesty from the misappropriation of trust funds held by tax debtors on account of their employees' tax payable. The provision contemplates an intermingling of Her Majesty's property with that of a tax debtor's, such that the subject matter of the trust cannot be (or indeed never was) identifiable. To address this conceptual problem, s. 227(5) allows Her Majesty to attach its interest to any property which lawfully belongs to the debtor at the time of liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy; this property is then deemed to exist "separate" and apart from the tax debtor's estate. The ITA thus permits Her Majesty to transfer title in the property from the tax debtor to Herself in order to satisfy the tax debtor's outstanding unremitted payroll obligations.

39 I would hasten to add to this, however, that this provision does not permit Her Majesty to attach Her beneficial interest to property which, at the time of liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy, in law belongs to a party other than the tax debtor. Section 227(4) and (5) are manifestly directed towards the property of the tax debtor, and it would be contrary to well-established authority to stretch the interpretation of s. 227(5) to permit the expropriation of the property of third parties who are not specifically mentioned in the statute. As Martland J. stated in Avco, supra, at p. 706:

> The property to which a s. 5A lien attaches is not defined nor identified. In the absence of a specific statutory provision to that effect, in my view it should not be construed in a manner which could deprive third parties of their pre-existing property rights.

Similarly, in Pembina on the Red Development, supra, Scott C.J. stated the presumption against expropriation of property, at p. 38:

> In Cross, Statutory Interpretation (London: Butterworths, 1987), the author writes at p. 180:
> > There is a general presumption that Parliament does not intend to take away private property rights unless the contrary is clearly indicated. Lord Atkinson stated that there is a canon of interpretation "that an intention to take away the property of a subject without giving to him a legal right to compensation for the loss of it is not to be imputed to the legislature unless that intention is expressed in unequivocal terms." After all, the protection of property is generally regarded as one of the fundamental values of a liberal society. [Emphasis added.]

Later in that same case, Twaddle J.A., in separate concurring reasons, articulated this same principle as follows, at p. 46, "[i]t is a long-established principle of law that, in the absence of clear language to the contrary, a tax on one person cannot be collected out of property belonging to another".

40 Thus, while s. 227(5) can be seen as a provision enacted to solve the conceptual dilemma precipitated by an intermingling of unremitted payroll deductions with a tax debtor's general assets, it is a legal vehicle not without its own conceptual limitations. Namely, while the s. 227(5) deemed trust permits Her Majesty to attach Her beneficial interest to property of the tax debtor upon liquidation (assignment, receivership or bankruptcy), it does not permit the expropriation of property which may belong to a third party creditor at the time the subsection becomes engaged.

41 However, as will be discussed in further detail, infra, it is my opinion that the licence theory may, in certain cases, create an exception to this general principle. In particular, where a secured creditor consents to the disposition of his collateral in order to pay wage deductions, that consent, coupled with the statutory trust provisions here at issue, may act to divest that creditor of its proprietary interest in that collateral at the time of liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy. Indeed, it is my view that this exception is engaged in the present case such that the s. 227(5) claim of Her Majesty must prevail.

(C) The Nature of the Bank's Security Interests

42 I begin from the observation that Parliament, in enacting s. 227(4) and (5), has chosen to secure Her Majesty's claims to unremitted payroll deductions through employing the concept of a deemed trust. Therefore, the proper analysis to follow in determining whether Her Majesty is entitled to priority pursuant to these subsections must utilize principles of property law. For this reason, it becomes relevant and indeed essential to scrutinize the nature of the interests which compete with Her Majesty's trust in order to determine whether and to what extent such interests have title in the disputed fund. As I mentioned previously, Her Majesty's trust can attach to the disputed collateral only to the extent that that collateral is not in law the property of a party other than the tax debtor at the time the deemed trust is engaged. More specifically, subject to the application of the licence theory, if it is found that legal title in the collateral is in the bank, and not Sparrow, Her Majesty's deemed trust could only attach to Sparrow's equity of redemption: see Avco, supra, at p. 706.

43 This "statutory trust" approach can be distinguished from other legislative methods which are used to secure an interest to unremitted payroll deductions, namely, through employing an explicit "Crown priority" provision. An example of such a provision can be found in s. 224(1.2) ITA, a subsection which was recently the subject of consideration of this Court in Alberta (Treasury Branches), supra. That provision reads:

> (1.2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy Act, any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any law, where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a particular person is or will become, within 90 days, liable to make a payment
> (a) to another person ... who is liable to pay an amount assessed under subsection 227(10.1) or a similar provision, or
> (b) to a secured creditor who has a right to receive the payment that, but for a security interest in favour of the secured creditor, would be payable to the tax debtor,
> the Minister may, by registered letter or by a letter served personally, require the particular person to pay forthwith, where the moneys are immediately payable, and in any other case, as and when the moneys become payable, the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor or the secured creditor in whole or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under subsection 227(10.1) or a similar provision, and on receipt of that letter by the particular person, the amount of those moneys that is required by that letter to be paid to the Receiver General shall, notwithstanding any security interest in those moneys, become the property of Her Majesty and shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to any such security interest. [Emphasis added.]

In contrast to the "deemed trust" approach, the application of this section to a priority competition can proceed without regard to the quality of the "security interest" which competes with Her Majesty's claim. Indeed, s. 224(1.2) simply transfers title in the collateral to Her Majesty regardless of whose interest may compete with it, so long as the requirements of s. 224(1.2) are met: see, e.g., Alberta (Treasury Branches), supra. For a general discussion of these two distinct analytical methods of determining priority between non-consensual security interests (such as statutory trusts) and consensual security interests, see Wood and Wylie, "Non-Consensual Security Interests in Personal Property", supra, at pp. 1072-83.

44 In the present case, it therefore becomes necessary to characterize the bank's interest in Sparrow's inventory as either a floating, or a fixed and specific charge.

45 The basic distinction between fixed and floating charges was articulated by Lord Macnaghten in Illingworth v. Houldsworth, [1904] A.C. 355 (H.L.), at p. 358:

> A specific charge, I think, is one that without more fastens on ascertained and definite property or property capable of being ascertained and defined; a floating charge, on the other hand, is ambulatory and shifting in its nature, hovering over and so to speak floating with the property which it is intended to affect until some event occurs or some act is done which causes it to settle and fasten on the subject of the charge within its reach and grasp.

The "event ... or ... act" to which Lord Macnaghten refers to as causing the floating interest to "settle and fasten" is described in the modern authorities as "crystallization". Generally speaking, crystallization occurs upon the default of the debtor. Once the floating interest has been said to crystallize, that interest is transformed into a fixed and specific charge over the inventory. See Wood, "The Floating Charge in Canada", supra, at pp. 204-8.

46 The critical significance of the characterization of an interest as being fixed or floating, of course, is that it describes the extent to which a creditor can be said to have a proprietary interest in the collateral. In particular, during the period in which a charge over inventory is floating, the creditor possesses no legal title to that collateral. For this reason, if a statutory trust or lien attaches during this time, it will attach to the debtor's interest and take priority over a subsequently crystallized floating charge. However, if a security interest can be characterized as a fixed and specific charge, it will take priority over a subsequent statutory lien or charge; in such a case, all that the lien can attach to is the debtor's equity of redemption in the collateral: Avco, supra, at p. 706. This correlative relationship between fixed charges and legal ownership was articulated by this Court in Dauphin Plains, supra, at p. 1199, where Pigeon J. stated:

> It should first be observed that, for reasons similar to those on which the decision in the Avco case, supra, was based, the claim for Pension Plan and Unemployment Insurance deductions cannot affect the proceeds of realization of property subject to a fixed and specific charge. From the moment such charge was created, the assets subject thereto, were no longer the property of the debtor except subject to that charge. [Emphasis added.]

See also Avco, supra.

47 There has been much debate as to whether it is appropriate to characterize a security interest over inventory which permits the debtor to sell that inventory in the ordinary course of business as a floating charge. The debate centres around the ability to characterize a security interest as fixed, in the presence of a licence given to the debtor to sell the collateral, where such an arrangement involves "no final and irrevocable appropriation of property to the creditor": FBDB, supra, at p. 33. McLachlin J.A. (as she then was) in FBDB, supra, fully considered the conflicting authorities on this point and concluded at pp. 37-38 and 40:

> In short, the answer to the question of whether the courts have recognized a fixed charge subject to a licence to sell in the ordinary course of business is no, with the exception of the line of cases confirming the right of a chattel mortgagor to sell mortgaged stock in the ordinary course of business.
> If a charge conferred on the debtor the right to deal with the goods in the ordinary course of business then, regardless of what the parties chose to call it, it was regarded as floating, with the result that third party interests acquired prior to crystallization of the charge had priority over the chargeholder.

Adopting this "either-or" doctrine, McLachlin J.A. chose to characterize the security agreement in FBDB, which permitted the debtor to sell the secured collateral in the ordinary course of the debtor's business, as a floating charge.

48 I note also that this Court very recently referred to the decision of McLachlin J.A. in FBDB, supra, with approval: Alberta (Treasury Branches), supra. While the issue in that case was different from that in FBDB, the comments of Cory J. can, I think, be taken as affirming the "either-or" doctrine as applied in FBDB.

49 The relevance of the "either-or" doctrine to the present case, of course, lies in the fact that Sparrow had been granted by the bank, both expressly and impliedly, a licence to sell the inventory over which the bank held a security interest. It therefore could be argued that such a licence renders the interest of the bank in the nature of a floating charge, an interest which must yield to a statutory trust which attaches prior to the charge's crystallization.

50 I do not find it necessary to comment on FBDB to the extent that that decision suggests that in the present case the interests of the bank should be characterized as a floating charge. It should be noted that the decision of McLachlin J.A. in the FBDB case predated the enactment of personal property security legislation in British Columbia, and so does not speak to the state of the law in a PPSA jurisdiction. Nor did that case deal with any other statutory enactment, such as the Bank Act, which could affect the characterization of the security agreement there at issue. For these reasons, I consider the comments of McLachlin J.A. in FBDB to be directed to the common law position with regard to the characterization of fixed and floating charges. Whatever those common law principles may be, they cannot be taken to alter the effect that legislation may have on the characterization of security interests. As it is my view that the Alberta PPSA and the Bank Act are determinative of the characterization of the bank's GSA and BAS, respectively, I do not need to address the common law view articulated in FBDB.

Digitized by Google

51 I turn now to consider each of the bank's security interests.

(i) The General Security Agreement (GSA)

52 Counsel for the appellant, Her Majesty, argued in his factum that the bank's GSA is to be considered in the nature of a floating charge. In support of this proposition, counsel advances the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Urman (1983), 44 O.R. (2d) 248. In that case, involving a general assignment of book debts perfected under the Ontario Personal Property Security Act, the security interest was characterized as a floating charge.

53 For the reasons which follow, I cannot accept this submission. In my view, the general security agreement in this case, which was subject to the Alberta personal property security legislation, must be characterized as a fixed and specific charge subject to a licence to sell the inventory.

54 It is of course true that the PPSA does not govern the priority competition between a statutory trust and a security interest. Subsection 4(a) explicitly removes statutory trusts such as the one created by s. 227 ITA from the province of the Alberta PPSA:

> 4 Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act does not apply to the following:
> (a) a lien, charge or other interest given by an Act or rule of law in force in Alberta;

However, this does not mean that the PPSA does not affect the characterization of a charge executed in a jurisdiction which is subject to such an Act. To the contrary, the effect of personal property security legislation has been said to have "fundamentally changed the characterization of security interests": Wood and Wylie, "Non-Consensual Security Interests in Personal Property", supra, at p. 1082. In particular, while pre-PPSA, a security agreement purporting to create a floating charge could be said to remain unattached to the collateral until crystallization, s. 12(1) of the Alberta PPSA manifestly alters this situation. That subsection reads:

> 12(1) A security interest, including a security interest in the nature of a floating charge, attaches when
> (a) value is given,
> (b) the debtor has rights in the collateral, and
> (c) except for the purpose of enforcing rights between the parties to the security agreement, the security interest becomes enforceable within the meaning of section 10,
> unless the parties specifically agree in writing to postpone the time for attachment, in which case the security interest attaches at the time specified in the agreement.

The relevant portion of s. 10 for our purposes states:

> 10(1) Subject to subsection (2), a security interest is enforceable against a third party only where
> (a) the collateral is in the possession of the secured party, or
> (b) the debtor has signed a security agreement that contains
> ...
> (ii) a statement that a security interest is taken in all of the debtor's present and after-acquired personal property ....

Generally speaking, therefore, absent an express intention to the contrary, a security interest in all present and after-acquired personal property will attach when that agreement is executed by the parties. Once attachment has occurred, in my view, the GSA then becomes in law a fixed and specific charge over the collateral.

55 I find support in this conclusion as to the effect of personal property security legislation upon security interests from the fact that the academic literature is unanimous on this point. For example, Professor Jacob S. Ziegel in his article "Symposium: Recent and Prospective Developments in the Personal Property Security Law Area" (1985), 10 Can. Bus. L.J. 131, commented as follows, at p. 152:

> It is of the first importance to determine whether a security interest under the PPSA retains any of the common law characteristics of a floating charge and if so which. My own view is that once a security interest has attached under the PPSA it has no "floating" attributes even though the security agreement, expressly or impliedly, gives the debtor considerable powers to dispose of the collateral in the course of his business. In brief, the PPSA only recognizes specific or fixed security interests although admittedly the collateral itself may often change its character because of the express or implied powers of disposition given the debtor. [Emphasis added.]

This opinion is echoed by Professor Wood in his recent article "Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp.", supra, at p. 433:

> Under pre-PPSA law, a plausible argument could be made that a security interest in the form of a fixed charge combined with a licence to deal is, in effect nothing more than a floating charge. However, this argument [is] untenable in the cases involving PPSA security interests....

Similarly, Professor Ronald C. C. Cuming, in "Commercial Law -- Floating Charges and Fixed Charges of After-Acquired Property: The Queen in the Right of British Columbia v. Federal Business Development Bank" (1988), 67 Can. Bar Rev. 506, at pp. 510-11, opined:

> In effect, [PPS] legislation treats all charges, including floating securities, as fixed charges. The legislatures that have enacted Personal Property Security Acts have implicitly declared that, as a matter of public policy, there is nothing objectionable to having a fixed charge on stock-in-trade of a debtor coupled with a licence to deal with the collateral in the ordinary course of business. [Emphasis added.]

At p. 519, the learned author concludes "there can be no such thing as a floating charge under a Personal Property Security Act".

56 Applying this principle to the case at bar, the GSA held by the respondent bank must certainly be characterized as a fixed and specific charge. It attached at the time the agreement was executed, February 25, 1992. More specifically, however, because of the permission granted by the bank which allowed Sparrow to sell the encumbered inventory, the GSA is in the nature of a fixed charge with a licence to deal with the inventory.

(ii) Bank Act Security (BAS)

57 The appellant has further submitted that the respondent bank's BAS is in the nature of a floating charge over the inventory. Several lower court decisions have been relied upon in support of this proposition: Abraham, supra (under appeal); Armstrong, supra; and North Sky Trading Inc. (Bankrupt), Re 1994 CanLII 8986 (AB QB), (1994), 158 A.R. 117 (Q.B.) (under appeal).

58 The earliest authority to comment upon the nature of BAS is the decision of this Court in Royal Bank of Canada v. Workmen's Compensation Board of Nova Scotia, 1936 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1936] S.C.R. 560. That case involved a priority competition between security under s. 88 of the Bank Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 12, the predecessor of s. 427, and a lien created by s. 79(2) of The Workmen's Compensation Act, R.S.N.S. 1923, c. 129. In his concurring judgment, Davis J. observed the effect of s. 88 security as follows, at p. 567:

> . . . the security [does] not operate to transfer absolutely the ownership in the goods but ... the transaction [is] essentially a mortgage transaction and subject to the general law of mortgages except where the statute has otherwise expressly provided.... Section 88 set up by the Bank Act enables manufacturers, who desire to obtain large loans from their bankers in order to carry on their industrial activities, to give to the bank a special and convenient form of security for the bank's protection in the large banking transactions necessary in the carrying on of industry throughout the country. Until the moneys are repaid, the bank is the legal owner of the goods but sale before default is prohibited and provision is made for the manufacturer regaining title upon repayment. To say that Parliament did not use language to expressly provide that the bank shall have a first lien on the goods is beside the mark. The bank acquires ownership in the goods by the statute. [Emphasis added.]

59 More recently, this Court had occasion to consider the attributes of Bank Act security in Hall, supra. In that case, La Forest J. underlined this Court's previous ruling in Workmen's Compensation Board of Nova Scotia, supra, that BAS gives to the lender legal title in the collateral. At pp. 133-34, La Forest J. stated:

> By section 178(2) [now s. 427(2)], a bank may take security in property owned by the borrower at the time of the loan transaction, and any property acquired during the pendency of the security agreement. The rights and powers of the bank with respect to the secured property are set out in s. 178(2)(c). By the terms of s. 178(2)(c), these rights and powers are stated to be "the same rights and powers as if the bank had acquired a warehouse receipt or bill of lading in which such property was described". These powers are defined, in turn, in s. 186 [now s. 435] of the Act where it is specified that any warehouse receipt or bill acquired by a bank as security for the payment of a debt, vests in the bank all the right and title to goods, wares and merchandise covered by the holder or owner thereof.

The nature of the rights and powers vested in the bank by the delivery of the document giving the security interest has been the object of some debate. Argument has centred on whether the security interest should be likened to a pledge or bailment, or whether it is more in the nature of a chattel mortgage. I find the most precise description of this interest to be that given by Professor Moull in his article "Security Under Sections 177 and 178 of the Bank Act" (1986), 65 Can. Bar Rev. 242, at p. 251. Professor Moull, correctly in my view, stresses that the effect of the interest is to vest title to the property in question in the bank when the security interest is taken out. He states, at p. 251:

> The result, then, is that a bank taking security under section 178 effectively acquires legal title to the borrower's interest in the present and after-acquired property assigned to it by the borrower. The bank's interest attaches to the assigned property when the security is given or the property is acquired by the borrower and remains attached until released by the bank, despite changes in the attributes or composition of the assigned property. The borrower retains an equitable right of redemption, of course, but the bank effectively acquires legal title to whatever rights the borrower holds in the assigned property from time to time. [Emphasis added.]

60 It follows from the comments of this Court regarding the ownership rights in inventory conferred by the Bank Act that security taken under that Act must be considered to be in the nature of a fixed and specific charge. As stated above, the concept of the fixed charge is correlative to the notion of a creditor's having legal proprietary rights in the collateral. I add that this view has been adopted by academic literature in this area: R. J. Wood, "Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp.", supra, at p. 433; and William D. Moull, "Security Under Sections 177 and 178 of the Bank Act" (1986), 65 Can. Bar Rev. 242. I find this following passage, at p. 251, from the article written by Professor Moull which was cited with approval by this Court in Hall, supra, particularly persuasive:

Because of its scope and flexibility, some commentators have suggested that section 178 [now 427] security is in the nature of a floating charge. This can be misleading, however. Because the bank effectively acquires legal title, section 178 security is really in the nature of a fixed charge on the present and after-acquired property of the borrower assigned to the bank. One attribute that section 178 security may be said to share with a floating charge is its application to all property of a specified class held by the borrower from time to time. But while a floating charge may apply to all property of a specified kind held by the borrower from time to time, it does not affix itself specifically upon any particular item of property until it crystallizes upon default by the borrower. Conversely, a section 178 security is a fixed charge on each item of assigned property held from time to time whether or not the loan is in default. This gives a bank significantly greater rights than it would hold under a floating charge debenture on inventory.

61 For these reasons, I consider the security interest of the bank in the form of BAS to be in the nature of a fixed and specific charge with a licence to sell the inventory.

(iii) Summary -- Fixed and Specific Charge Over Inventory

62 It would seem appropriate at this point, before leaving the present discussion, to comment briefly upon this novel and perhaps abstract notion of possessing a fixed charge over all of the present and future inventory of a debtor. To begin with, I note that traditional definitions of the fixed charge, as for example the one I previously quoted above from Illingworth, supra, emphasize the ability to "settle and fasten" upon ascertainable and defined property as being an integral attribute to this particular form of charge. This type of attachment to tangible and ascertainable property, of course, is impossible to achieve in the case of an assignment of inventory, where that collateral is changing constantly. In short, the traditional concept of the fixed charge seems to be at odds with the notion of having a proprietary right over collateral such as after-acquired inventory which, by definition, is not yet in existence at the time the security agreement is executed.

63 In my view, however, a fixed charge over all present and future inventory represents a proprietary interest over a dynamic collective of present and future assets. To this extent, as stated above, this form of security interest challenges our traditional conception of a fixed charge; to the same extent, in my opinion, our conception of this form of charge must change to meet the modern realities of commercial law, and in particular the legislative provisions which have been brought to bear in this appeal.

64 In effect, the fixed and specific charge gives to the secured creditor the title (subject, of course, to the debtor's equitable right of redemption) to the present inventory of the debtor, as well as the after-acquired inventory of the debtor. In this way, the secured creditor becomes the legal owner of inventory as it comes into possession of the debtor. I note that the Alberta PPSA contains a specific provision securing a creditor's proprietary right to after-acquired property in this way:

> 13(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), where a security agreement provides for a security interest in after-acquired property, the security interest attaches in accordance with section 12, without the need for specific appropriation. [Emphasis added.]

Professors Cuming and Wood, in their published annotation of the Alberta PPSA, observe that by virtue of this subsection "the security interest in after-acquired property has equal status with a security interest in collateral in existence at the time the security agreement is executed": Cuming and Wood, Alberta Personal Property Security Act Handbook (2nd ed. 1993), at p. 121 (emphasis added). Similarly, the BAS has the effect of presently attaching the secured creditor's interest to the after-acquired inventory of the debtor. In Hall, supra, La Forest J. approved of Professor Moull's description of the effect of the relevant provisions of the Bank Act, at p. 134, which is particularly apposite to the present discussion:

> The result, then, is that a bank taking security under section 178 [now s. 427] effectively acquires legal title to the borrower's interest in the present and after-acquired property assigned to it by the borrower. The bank's interest attaches to the assigned property when the security is given or the property is acquired by the borrower and remains attached until released by the bank, despite changes in the attributes or composition of the assigned property. The borrower retains an equitable right of redemption, of course, but the bank effectively acquires legal title to whatever rights the borrower holds in the assigned property from time to time. [Emphasis added.]

65 It follows from these observations that where, as here, a secured creditor holds a fixed charge over a debtor's inventory, that charge will have the effect of ensuring the creditor has legal title to any and all inventory subject to the charge at any given point in time. This, of course, is subject to the caveat (not operative in this case) that no outstanding statutory payroll deductions had in fact been made prior to the attachment of the fixed charge. Thus, in the present case, the inventory which was subject to the liquidation sale belonged in law to the respondent bank: both under its GSA and its BAS the bank held a fixed charge over Sparrow's inventory. As such, all that Her Majesty's beneficial interest could attach to, before its sale, was Sparrow's equity of redemption in the property: Avco, supra; C.I.B.C. v. Klymchuk reflex, (1990), 74 Alta. L.R. (2d) 232 (C.A.), at p. 240.

66 But this of course does not end the matter. While it is true that the bank held legal title in the inventory which is the subject of the dispute in this case, it is also true that at the time the deductions were made the bank had given its permission to Sparrow to sell this inventory in the course of its business. The GSA contained an express licence to this effect; and the BAS impliedly contained such a licence. In this way, the bank had consented, contractually, to the divestment of their interest in the collateral taken in inventory and the usage of the proceeds of that collateral for certain purposes. The critical issue which falls to be decided is, then, what is the scope of this contractual licence? In particular, if this bank's consent included the right to sell the inventory in order to pay wages, then that consent by necessity included the right to sell inventory to remit payroll deductions. In such a situation, for the following reasons, Her Majesty's interest would be able to attach to the proceeds of the inventory, and in this way take priority over the bank's interest.

67 As stated previously, at para. 41, it is my opinion that the licence theory may operate, in the context of the statutory scheme at issue in the present appeal, as an exception to the general rule that at the time of "liquidation, assignment, receivership or bankruptcy" Her Majesty's interest cannot attach to property which is at that time the property of a secured creditor. More specifically, where it can be said that at the time the deductions were made a secured creditor had consented to the use of its collateral in order to pay the statutory deductions which are the object of a deemed trust, it may also be said that that creditor has bound itself by the statutory requirements relating to those deductions. Here, therefore, if it can be said that at the time the wage deductions at issue were made the bank had permitted the sale of inventory in order to pay wages, and thus wage deductions, it will be possible for s. 227(5) to attach to the bank's inventory existent at the time of receivership. With regard to this approach to the licence theory, see FBDB, supra, at pp. 40-41, Roynat, supra, at pp. 649-50, and G.M. Homes Inc., supra, at pp. 252-54.

68 In short, where the bank has consented to the reduction in the value of its security in order to pay statutory deductions at the time those deductions are made, they have to the same extent, by virtue of s. 227(5), consented to the reduction in their security at the time of receivership. The critical question which falls to be decided in this case, then, is what was the scope of the bank's consent to sell inventory at the time the deductions were made?

(D) Whether on the Facts the Licence to Sell Included the Right to Use the Proceeds to Pay Wages?

69 I underline at the outset that the critical factor in the "licence to sell" argument is the permission which must be found to have been granted with respect to the usage of the proceeds of the disputed collateral. Thus, while licences may often be mouthed in terms of a "right to sell in the ordinary course of business", it must not be forgotten that it is permission with respect to the usage of proceeds, and not necessarily the circumstances of sale, which is the proper focus of the inquiry.

70 When interpreting the contractual provisions which gave Sparrow the right to sell the encumbered inventory, it is necessary to look at the words of the contract, the nature of the transaction which the parties entered into, and all of the surrounding circumstances.

71 The express provisions of the GSA establishes that Sparrow was granted a licence to sell the encumbered inventory. In particular, the licence stated that:

> . . . until default, Debtor may, in the ordinary course of Debtor's business, sell or lease inventory and, subject to Clause 7 hereof, use Money available to Debtor. [Emphasis added.]

Therefore, Sparrow was permitted to sell its inventory in the ordinary course of its business and "use" the proceeds generated therefrom. The critical question is what "us[age]" this licence to sell in the "ordinary course of ... business" contemplated. In this connection, I find two of the express covenants in Sparrow's contractual arrangements to be salient. Paragraph 4(e) of the GSA required Sparrow:

> (e) to pay all taxes, rates, levies, assessments and other charges of every nature which may be lawfully levied, assessed or imposed against or in respect of Debtor or Collateral as and when the same become due and payable; [Emphasis added.]

In addition, in the Credit Facilities Agreement, Sparrow covenanted to the bank as follows:

> (3) it will promptly pay when due all business, income and other taxes properly levied on its operations and property and remit all statutory employee deductions when due; [Emphasis added.]

72 Looking at these express provisions of the contractual arrangements between Sparrow and the bank, I conclude that the payment of payroll deductions would be a usage to which the bank contemplated Sparrow would use the proceeds of inventory sold in the "ordinary course of ... business". My conclusion in this respect is buttressed when the nature of the dealings between Sparrow and the bank, and all the surrounding circumstances, are observed.

73 The bank was Sparrow's primary lender; it held a security interest in most, if not all, of Sparrow's assets. In particular, the bank held various security interests in Sparrow's inventory. It was of course in the bank's best interest that Sparrow function as a viable economic unit. To do so, Sparrow was required to sell its services as an electrical contractor and, necessarily, sell its inventory. From the sales of the inventory, Sparrow could generate revenues to, inter alia, pay its outstanding operating debts. If it failed to do so, Sparrow could be petitioned into bankruptcy, with the result that Sparrow could no longer generate the profits necessary to pay its loan obligations to the bank in the long term. One of Sparrow's ongoing obligations, its costs of doing business, was the paying of wages. In order to stay in business, and operate as a profitable business enterprise, Sparrow would have to pay its employees. This is a necessary requirement of continuing in business. It would be reasonable that the bank expect, taking into consideration all the circumstances of this arrangement, that revenue from the sale of inventory would be used to pay wages.

74 From these observations, I consider the licence to sell inventory in the ordinary course of business in this case necessarily included a licence to sell inventory to pay wages, and remit wage deductions, in the course of its business. Where, as here, the secured party has security over the majority of the assets of the debtor, the security interest over the inventory must permit the debtor to sell the inventory and put it to the general use of its business, including towards the payment of wages. Indeed, the express terms of the licence intimates this, providing Sparrow could, "in the ordinary course of ... business, ... use Money available". The scope of the licence can thus be ascertained either from the express terms of the security agreement, or from the nature of the agreement and the conduct of the parties. To be clear, however, the scope of the licence in this case flows not merely from a right to sell inventory per se. Instead, it is the licence to sell inventory in the "ordinary course of [Sparrow's] business ... and use [the proceeds]" which renders it of such a quality as to include a right to use the proceeds to pay wages. As Professor Wood has correctly observed in "Revenue Canada's Deemed Trust Extends Its Tentacles: Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp.", supra, at p. 435, a licence to sell inventory may in certain circumstances be circumscribed so as to not include a right to use the proceeds to pay wages:
