TODAY. There's a time to wake and a time to sleep. A time to labor, a time to rest. There's a time to give and a time to keep. Free the hands at last fold over the breast. And the form is still on the will white bed. In the crowded street, by the lonely shore, Make haste to lead where the weary tread— The good we do do not come down before. The stars are out—and the night is high, Wherein we never may touch a sigh.

Some day the hands so quick to cease Will clasp each other no more; some night The brow that the brown locks here to greet Will lift its last in the war for right. The lips that offer sweet words of hope To hearts o'erclouded will move for none— No aid from those for the lost who grope Through the wind and rain, for their day is done.

We may wound or heal, we may scold or pray, But that we should not love today, —Charles E. Banks in Chicago Inter Ocean.

The First Violin. By J. K. Reeve.

How an Audience in a Theater Enjoyed a Courtship.

The orchestra brought the overture to a finish with a blare and bang that made the walls echo and the footlights dance, for the patrons of the Frivolity theater liked plenty of "go" in their music, as in everything connected with the entertainment.

As the music ceased, the gaudy curtain rolled up and revealed a brilliantly set stage scene—brilliant with paper mache and tinsel and the many make believes of the mimic world.

There was a crowded house, and the mixed assemblage gave good opportunity for the study of types. But among the hundreds were just two of whom I want to tell you.

Mims was first violin in the Frivolity orchestra. There was a tradition to the effect that his name had once been Mimes, but because some one had said that he was "timidly looking" the name had forthwith been contracted as above.

Mims was 200 years old. Perhaps you think I do not mean this, but let us see. Mims was a street boy. The urchin's earliest recollections were of the crowded thoroughfare of Drury lane, of his terror of the big policeman and of cold and hunger. His father was a thief—his mother a bad. His father's father died upon the gallows, while his maternal grandfather had taken up his permanent residence at a convict prison. I have not troubled to trace his genealogical tree further, but make no doubt that I should find that for 200 years the heredity and environment had been such as to concentrate and culminate in poor little Mims every wicked and industriously accumulating for him through so many generations, and it does not require much perspicacity to guess in which branch of this knowledge he had the greater inheritance.

Now, you may think from this that Mims was pretty bad, but he was not, because he possessed one saving grace. One day while he was yet a small lad Mims heard a hand playing in the street. Possibly he had heard music before, but only with the organ in the street. It had never reached and touched that micro-organism which we term the soul.

Mims followed the hand a long way. The band marched fast, and poor Mims' little feet grew very tired, until he would carry him no farther. Then he sat down upon the curb and cried.

But he arose from the curb with the seeds of ambition firmly implanted within him. He would be a musician.

Henceforth Mims sold papers and blacked boots more industriously than ever and hoarded his pennies with all the greed of a miser. When he finally counted them and found there were enough to buy a fife, it was the consummation of the first step in his career. From that day he ascended by regular stages, the first of which was hanging about an East End concert hall and cultivating the acquaintance of the musicians there, and the last of which was first violin at the Frivolity.

When the overture was over and the curtain lifted, Mims leaned back in his chair, closed his eyes and kept only wide awake enough to know when any musical accompaniment was needed. That part of the show did not interest him. No matter how many pretty girls were warping their shapely feet above the footlights, Mims thought it very foolish that the audience should prefer that to the numbers of the orchestra.

But he was not permitted to rest long in peace. There was a roar from the audience, half of applause and half of derision, and he opened his eyes to look around about for the cause.

On the stage was the usual thing—a young singer giving a serio comic song with interludes of dance steps and graceful posturing. A new singer he saw at once. And, to catch the audience, she was singing to and making eyes at some one in the orchestra, and that some one was Mims. Now, this had never happened before. There were plenty of comic fellows in the orchestra. The young man who played the bass viol was of a Byronic cast of features, and the cornet player was as round and rosy as a big red apple, and these were the men at whom the girls of the stage usually made pretty mouths. That she should have selected him, with his old weakened face, to draw all eyes toward him, Mims thought it very foolish.

As he sat up and glared about the girl who was just courtesying and throwing a kiss to him, Mims dashed, and the people howled at his discomfiture, while the girl, quick to see she had made a hit by chance, began to sing a little love song. This she accompanied with a manner of serio comic by play, with Mims still as its object.

As he could do nothing but sit quietly and hear it he began to study the singer. And this was what he saw: A young girl not beyond her teens. He was quite sure of that, in spite of the "make up" of the stage, which the footlights and her nearness to them and to him brought out so hideously. A girl with a fresh, bright face, yet unmarred by the hard life of the theater. A pretty face, with laughing blue eyes and golden hair, which Mims could see was not a wig. As he studied her carefully, from the crown of paste diamonds that glittered in her hair down to the silver lace that fringed the high tops of her dainty boots, the first violin grew less angry with the girl for singing her little love song to him, and when she left the stage he "gave her a hand" with as hearty good will as any man in the theater, which was a strange thing for an orchestra player to do.

The name of "Nonie," the new singer at the Frivolity, ran quickly through the town, and the theater was crowded nightly. And every night she sang at Mims, until it came to be the feature of her performance and looked for by the regular patrons. The piece de resistance of the entertainment.

"Do you see old Mims?" said one. "Upon my word, he blushes like a schoolboy when Nonie comes at him. Must be a new sensation to the old chap to have a girl look at him twice. Once is enough to scare most of 'em into a fit."

"Well, I would be willing to wear his face for a night to get as many smiles as he does. But here goes for a try for one, at least."

With that the young fellow turned to a flower seller and selected a bunch of the finest roses. At the end of Nonie's act he stood well up and threw them straight at her feet. Nonie bowed, picked them up and courted again, laughing and singing her white-toothed while, Mims, scowling a little, looked about to see who had thrown the flowers. When he saw, the sovi grew deeper.

That night the first violin did another strange thing for an orchestra player. He went to the stage door and waited for Nonie to come out. There was a group of men about waiting for a chance to ogle the favorite, or perhaps invite her to a little supper in some nearby cozy retreat, and among them Mims saw the one who had thrown the flowers. As Nonie came out this man hurried forward and spoke to her. The girl hesitated, stopped and listened, then, with a slow and half uncertain negative, went on past him to her omnibus.

The fellow made as if to follow, but, looking about, he saw Mims' eyes fixed upon him. Beneath the street light they glittered like beads of fire and seemed uncanny from the setting of his queer, pale face. The man shrugged and his shoulders and walked away, in the other direction.

The next night, when Nonie was singing, a heavy flower piece was sent down to the stage—an unusual thing at the Frivolity, where matters of that sort were not much indulged in. It so happened that it came down where Mims was, and he had to help lift it over the stage rail. As he did so he saw a note lying among the flowers, and with a dexterous flip he managed to throw it out so that it fell beneath his chair. He knew instinctively who had sent it, yet to confirm his suspicion he turned and looked about the house.

As he had thought, the same fellow was again standing to catch Nonie's glance and, beneath his acknowledgment, a glance was fixed instead upon the first violin, and the blue eyes shot out fiery darts as Mims deliberately stooped, picked up the note and placed it in his pocket.

Upon the following night Nonie thought to have her revenge so she began by singing and making eyes at the Byronic youth with the bass viol and utterly ignored Mims' presence. But she had reckoned without her host, for the audience were not so accustomed to having the first violin as the silent partner in this little play that they would brook no change. And then the contrast between the face of this old young gamin and the rosy cheeks and blue eyes of the girl lent a picturesque effectiveness to the scene that nothing else could. So the people began to hiss and howl and hoot to show their disapproval, while cries of "Mims! Mims! The first violin!" gave added interest to the scene.

The girl stopped, bewildered at the outburst, and at first did not realize the cause. But when she did her eyes flashed angrily, and she went on, insistently ignoring their displeasure and trying to divert the tumult with her own voice, and to charm them into good nature with her pretty ways.

In the confusion she carelessly came too near the footlights and, jarring the slight case covering her face of them, swept her tummy skirt above it. A tongue of flame leaped upon her, and there was a cry of horror from the house. The audience, panic-stricken by the possibility of fire among the inflammable material of the stage, rushed pell-mell for the doors. The orchestra followed, tumbling over their instruments, and in less time than it takes to tell it they had cleared such a space that only two people remained in the endangered portion of the stage. One of these was the girl, wrapped in the winding sheet of flame, and the other was Mims.

Tearing his coat from him as he sprang forward, Mims flung himself upon the stage. The girl, terror-stricken, but realizing his danger as well as her own, began to retreat toward the wings. Mims, seeing that in a moment more the flames would be communicated to the canvas scenes, leaped upon her and gathered the living flames into his arms. Himself insensible to pain and danger or regardless of them in his passionate endeavor to save the girl, he beat the fire down with his hands, tore her burning skirts away and at last wrapped her, tortured and burned, but living and conscious, in his own garment.

Nonie was not so severely injured but that she could appear at the Frivolity again in a few weeks, and when her return was announced the house was crowded.

Nonie did not attempt to sing to any one but Mims that night, but on this occasion he was not the first violin. He had spent his leisure during her retirement in composing a new accompaniment to her dance and had asked and obtained permission to lead the orchestra on this eventful night for its performance.—Buffalo News.

Did you ever See a Snow Storm in Summer? We never did; but we have seen the clothing at this time of the year so covered with dandruff that it looked as if it had been out in a regular snow-storm.

No need of this snowstorm. As the summer sun would melt the falling snow so will it melt the flakes of dandruff in the scalp. It goes further than this: it prevents their formation. It has still other properties: it will restore color to gray hair in just ten times out of every ten cases.

And it does even more: it feeds and nourishes the roots of the hair. Thin hair becomes thick hair; and short hair becomes long hair.

We have a book on the Hair and Scalp. It is yours, for the asking. If you do not obtain all the benefits expected from the use of the Vigor, write the doctor about it. Probably there is some difficulty with your general system, which may be easily remedied. Address: Dr. J. C. AYER, Lowell, Mass.

DEWEY'S PRIZE MONEY. MANILA HERO ENTERS SUIT TO RECOVER IT. Washington, July 21.—Admiral George Dewey yesterday filed suit as a litigant in the district court of the District of Columbia, to recover the prize money due him and the officers and crew of his fleet for the vessels sunk in the Battle of Manila, and the property subsequently recovered by the naval force under his command. Upon the ships and equipments which he had already been appraised and reported by the board of appraisers, appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Dewey demands the sum of $325,141, and in addition the amount due upon the three cruisers sunk in the engagement but subsequently raised, and upon which he places a value of $425,000.

HENNIKER HEATON HONORED. London July 20.—In recognition of his services in the cause of imperial penny postage, Mr. Heaton, M. P., has been honored with the freedom of the city of London, as well as a gold sash, upon occasion of which there is figure representing Britannia, and at the other end an allegorical figure of Canada.

Why not decide to use our Metallic Ceilings and Walls? THEY ARE EASILY APPLIED. SEE THAT BUTTON! There is nothing better, nor nothing else so good for interior finishing. They offer permanent beauty—don't crack or drop off—can be readily cleaned—don't need renewing—and are Fire proof and Sanitary.

We make countless artistic designs to suit every requirement—and they may be applied over plaster if necessary, tho' in new buildings plaster is not used. Think it over, and if you'd like an estimate, mail us an outline showing the shape and measurements of your ceilings and walls.
