

Argued From This That Japan Will Not Force Matters.

WIDESPREAD AND SECRET OPPOSITION

throughout the kingdom to depose the present foreign dynasty at the cost of revolution. That party has been in existence for thirty years, but it is only within the last five years that it has been able to make itself so as to become a source of great danger.

Details of its order it is almost impossible to obtain, but enough is known to show that it has a membership of about 50,000,000 adherents; that its members are sworn to secrecy and that it only awaits the appearance of a competent leader to spring into action. It is not only a source of many things, it is necessary to consider two conditions that are peculiar to this anomalous country. One is that a deep and hidden hatred against the foreign dynasty has been handed down and kept alive ever since 1044, when the Tartars, by a most enormous piece of treachery, established the present dynasty. The other is that the Russian people ever since the revolution of 1917 have been in a state of rebellion has broken heaval of three hundred million people, subject as they are to vast superstitions and to the influence of a despotic world. France and England—and especially England—would use every means to preserve the status quo, as she has formerly done in China. The only result of it is that the Russian interests on the Pacific are closely connected with China, and a disintegration of the empire would find the two nations in a state of open and undisputed territory. Another reason why England would support the present outward imperialism is commercial. She has no other outlet for her manufactures and other products to the reigning dynasty—or, rather, she has adapted the dynasty to her trade; and if there is anything that England has against it, it is the disturbance of trade by

It is to be withdrawn upon the settlement of the difficulty. It is therefore to be presumed that Japan and China are agreed with each other at first "that their troops will not be necessary to suppress the rebellion in Korea. But the Japanese here assert that the Chinese troops were dispatched into Korea under General Yeh, and that the Chinese troops were sent by Li Hung Chang, without any such preliminaries being settled, and in consequence the Japanese Government followed suit and sent troops to Korea to protect the safeguard Japanese interests in any disposition of Korean affairs which China may attempt to make. They believe that it is not unwise to have Chinese troops so near the coast of Korea into a mere Chinese province, and they will resist such an attempt unless they are rewarded with sufficient of the spoils of the rebellion."
